The structure of the loft space is understood piece by piece as one glimpses fragments of the integrating text. The entire space has the effect of being a rare, isolated glimpse of some larger usually invisible context of vectors, currents and coded messages.

Lyotard, p. 281
On the city street, hundreds of motor cars, electric trams and bicycles flash before my eyes every moment, yet I retain all of these in my mind at once; why, then, is the view commonly held that such disorder and speed in poetry makes it meaningless for the reader?
Shershenevich, p. 31.

Reading in the City

A city of subway readers.
Mahler, p. 43.

Her eyes never leave the pages of the book no matter how the train pitches and rolls as it thunders on.
Brooks, p. 10.

A person who picks up the crumpled sections of newspaper in the subway and reads haphazardly until the next step.
Ibid., p. 2.

New Yorkers carry their solitude around with them and employ it as their protection, which is why it's improper—tantamount almost to trespassing—to read the newspaper over your neighbor’s shoulder in the subway.
Conrad, p. 104.

Driving down a Los Angeles boulevard, a billboard was legible from a half-mile away. It said one or two words. In Los Angeles, people are used to reading single words, very large at far distances, and passing by them very quickly. It’s totally the opposite in New York where we get our information by reading a newspaper over somebody's shoulder in the subway.
Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag.

I was on a subway somewhere in Brooklyn when I saw that headline. The paper that bannered it belonged to another passenger.
Capote, p. 59.

Does the city read anything besides newspapers?
Brooks, p. 8.

Tom Wolfe: ‘To me the idea of writing a novel about this astonishing metropolis, a big novel, cramming as much of New York City between covers as you could, was the most tempting, the most challenging, and the most obvious idea an American writer could possibly have.”
Bloom, p. 151.

There are so many stenographers and typists in the city that if they joined in copying Anthony Adverse they would finish the job in ten seconds.

Take a scenic boat ride around the island, but read The Notebooks of Henry James during the entire trip, never once looking up.
Rich, p. 4.
In the winter of 1962 to 1963, they attempted access and libraries and museums. He liked to station himself in the neuropsychology section of the New York Public Library’s Main Reading Room and observe what books people were browsing, and wandering about, noting which books were being read. Upon finding a person involved in the book imagined to be “cosmic” in concern (books on psychology, religion or world affairs), he would stay close by the person, waiting for an occurrence that could bring about a conversation. He did much looking but he rarely found an opportunity to talk and often complained about the difficulties of striking up a conversation with strangers. Access was equally difficult to museums. While walking around looking at the exhibits at MoMA, his ploy was to station himself next to a co-patronizer and hope for a likely opening. He complained that it was difficult to make such an opening. If you looked at work while standing beside a stranger and said, “That is an interesting abstraction” (or whatever), they tended to “look at you as if you were some kind of nut” and walk away.
Lofland, p. 172

Movie stars who have led adventure-packed lives are often too egocentric to discover patterns, too inarticulate to express intentions, too restless to record or remember events. Ghostwriters do it for them. In this way I was Manhattan’s ghostwriter.
Koolhaas, p. 10.

Is there a key that opens the cultural meaning of the modern metropolis? The proliferation of difference that characterizes metropolitan modernity is so great that it seems unlikely that there is a single “text of the city,” the explication of which would reveal the city’s cultural script. New York is particularly difficult; there are no equivalents of Balzac or Dickens who reached very far toward incorporating into their narratives the vast kaleidoscope of Paris and London. Whether it results from a deficiency in New York’s literary culture or because of the peculiar difficulty of capturing the complexity of New York, the city has not had its Balzac. Whitman, who captured so much, relied upon his famous lists. Even he was unable to bring the many fascinations he found in the city into narrative form.

[Bender, p. 57]
d - Grid

Le Corbusier: The streets are at right angles to each other and the mind is liberated.
Fyfe, p. 3.

Your mind is free instead of being given over every minute to the complicated game imposed on it by the puzzle of our European cities.
Corbusier, p. 47.

New York lives by its clear checkerboard. Millions of beings act simply and easily within it. Freedom of mind. From the first hour, the stranger is oriented, sure of his course.
Ibid., p. 91.

The streets and avenues never empty, but the neat, spacious geometry of the city is far removed from the thronging intimacy of the narrow streets of Europe.
Baudrillard, Simulacra, p. 61.

The individuality of objects is heir to the formal possibilities of the grid, and it is the delineation of this orthogonality—its mathematics—which in turn elucidates the ideal of the road in Manhattan’s placemaking. Movement is both parent and progeny in the process of making equality into form.
Monson, p. 32.

Everything is determined with a Euclidean clearness. Thus you know instantly whether to walk, whether to take a taxi, or whether to catch the bus on the avenue or use the subway. I say that it is an immense and beneficent freedom for the mind.
Corbusier, pp. 47-8.

Straight lines everywhere.”
Still, p. 298.

The grid—in its peculiarly intense New York manifestation— Influenced a mode of seeing, an urban imagination which eventually rivaled that which we associate with Paris, “capital of the nineteenth century,” as Walter Benjamin called it. [Empire]
Tallack, Douglas, N. pag.

Thanks to the grid, New York disposes itself as a diagram. The tenements, however, mar this regularity, with dozens of rear houses huddled at odd angles on a single block.
Conrad, p. 71.

The grid reproaches the flâneur.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 406.

The Grid is, above all, a conceptual speculation.
In spite of its apparent neutrality, it implies an intellectual program for the island: in its indifference to topography, to what exists, it claims the superiority of mental construction over reality.
The plotting of its streets and blocks announces that the subjugation, if not obliteration, of nature is its true ambition.
All blocks are the same; their equivalence invalidates, at once, all the systems of articulation and differentiation that have guided the design of traditional cities. The Grid makes the history of architecture and all previous lessons of urbanism irrelevant. It forces Manhattan’s builders to develop a new system of formal values, to invent strategies for the distinction of one block from another.

The Grid’s two-dimensional discipline also creates undreamt-of freedom for three-dimensional anarchy. The Grid defines a new balance between control and de-control in which the city can be at the same time ordered and fluid, a metropolis of rigid chaos.”

With its imposition, Manhattan is forever immunized against any (further) totalitarian intervention. In the single block—the largest possible area that can fall under architectural control—it develops a maximum unit of urbanistic Ego.

Since there is no hope that larger parts of the island can ever be dominated by a single client or architect, each intention—each architectural ideology—has to be realized fully within the limitations of the block. Since Manhattan is finite and the number of its blocks forever fixed, the city cannot grow in any conventional manner.

Its planning therefore can never describe a specific built configuration that is to remain static through the ages; it can only predict that whatever happens, it will have to happen somewhere within the 2,028 blocks of the Grid.

It follows that one form of human occupancy can only be established at the expense of another. The city becomes a mosaic of episodes, each with its own particular life span, that contest each other through the medium of the Grid. [Nature]

Koolhaas, p. 20-1.

Frank Lloyd Wright on Manhattan’s grid: “An affected riot.”
Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 23.

Rather than to speak of urban order as opposed to disorder or chaos, it is more appropriate to speak of different urban orders… That definition of order to which the opposite notion of chaos or disorder can be applied is the order of the world, a “categorical order” the opposite of which is an undifferentiated state of things. Chaos is thus a negation of such an order and is only a hypothetical state.
Rapoport, pp. 51, 52

Rockefeller Center as the “center in the grid,” and the Guggenheim as the “thing illuminating the grid.
Monson, p. 30

Joseph Stella: “The depth of night tempers and renders mysterious the geometrical severity of the city.”
Sharpe, p. 199.

Feininger believed that curves were a rarity in cities.
Conrad, p. 255.

Its will to silence, its hostility to literature, to narrative, to discourse. As such, the grid has done its job with striking efficiency.
Krauss, p. 50.

As a straight line, Fifth Avenue can be a social arbiter. Fifth and Sixth avenues are the uprights of a gigantic ladder stretching from Washington Square to Central Park.
Conrad, p. 195.

The avenues may be ladders of ascent, but the cross streets at right angles to them are exits to dalliance, resorts of indolence.
Ibid., p. 196.

The flavor of any street is spiced by those streets that bisect it along the way."
Binzen, N. pag.

If the grid is to be converted to the purposes of the epicurean, its numerical regularity must be confounded, because its plan presumes a linear rectitude in one’s conduct.
Conrad, p. 196.

The uniform grid has often energized New York by liberating the deviant.
Bender, p. xvi.

The territory is simply the surface effect of its own topicality.
Kittler, p. 719.

The city’s giddy radiance is chastened by its steely rectilinear geometry.
Conrad, p. 135.

Geometry and anguish.
Sharpe, p. 207.

Geometry in this city maintains an inflexible civic discipline.
Conrad, p. 130.

The circle can be squared.
Amin, p. 56.

The city survives in its relentless grid.
White, Physical, p. xxiii.

A city is not a flattenable graph. In a city, networks overlap upon other networks. Every traffic light, every subway transfer, and every post office, as well as all the bars and bordellos, speak for this fact.
Kittler, p. 719

Flattened, geometricized, ordered, it is antinatural, antimimetic, antireal. It is what art looks like when it turns its back on nature. In the flatness that results from its coordinates, the grid is the means of crowding out the dimensions of the real and replacing them with the lateral spread of a single surface. In the overall regularity of its organization, it is the result not of imitation, but of aesthetic decree. Insofar as its order is that of pure relationship, the grid is a way of abrogating the claims of natural objects to have an order particular to themselves.
Krauss, p. 50.

City walls are pulled down and filled in; once rational grids are slowly obscured; a slashing diagonal boulevard is run through closegrained residential neighborhoods; railroad tracks usurp cemeteries and waterfronts; and wars, fires, and highways annihilate city cores.

Inam, p. 18

The grid’s mythic power is that it makes us able to think we are dealing with materialism (or sometimes science, or logic) while at the same time it provides us with a release into belief (or illusion, or fiction).

Krauss, p. 55.

The intersection of everything.

McCourt, p. 244.

In the temporal dimension, the grid is an emblem of modernity by being just that: the form that is ubiquitous in the art of our century, while appearing nowhere, nowhere at all, in the art of the last one.

Krauss, p. 53.

What matters most in the long run is not the mystique of the grid geometry, but the luck of first ownership.

Inam, p. 18.

Urbanism itself, this checkerboard of nameless streets, is the price that has to be paid in order that the streets be useful and no longer picturesque, in order that men and objects circulate, adapt themselves to the distances, rule effectively over this enormous urban nature: the biggest city in the world (with Tokyo) is also the one we possess in an afternoon, by the most exciting of operations, since here to possess is to understand: New York exposes itself to intellection, and our familiarity with it comes very quickly. This is the purpose of these numbered streets, inflexibly distributed according to regular distances: not to make the city into a huge machine and man into an automaton, as we are repeatedly and stupidly told by those for whom tortuosity and dirt are the gauges of spirituality, but on the contrary to master the distances and orientations by the mind, to put at one man’s disposal the space of these twelve million, this fabulous reservoir, this world emporium in which all goods exist except the metaphysical variety. This is the purpose of New York’s geometry: that each individual should be poetically the owner of the capital of the world. It is not up, toward the sky, that you must look in New York; it is down, toward men and merchandise: by an admirable static paradox, the skyscraper establishes the block, the block creates the street, the street offers itself to man. New York is an anti-city.

Barthes, Eiffel, p. 151.

Americans would as readily number their cities as they do their streets.

Monson, pp. 31-2.

It will be notes that the “squares” of the city are seldom parallelograms. The city’s little alterations and fictions are part of its charm.

Reisenberg, p. 21.

Rotary thrills, the violent circuitry of pleasure as opposed to the utilitarian drill of those lines, vertical and horizontal, diagonal and perpendicular, from which the workaday city is constructed... Urban people spend their lives traveling purposefully in straight lines. They come to Coney to enjoy the inane exhilaration of going around in circles. Elsewhere they trudge and plod; here they can whirl and rotate.
Conrad, p. 256.

New York is overwhelmingly square, regular, and right-angled, so why not take advantage of those rare oblique views where roads seem to diverge almost on the spur of the moment, affording you glimpses of an unwonted three-dimensional nature—unconventional cut-and-thrusts indeed.
Ibid., p. 256.

Most of all for its vast dimensions—the straight avenues ending in the sky, as they pursue some ultimately significant horizon.
Maffi, p. 18.

The grid lands one in the present, and everything else is declared to be the past.
Krauss, p. 53.

Grids are not only spatial to start with, they are visual structures that explicitly reject a narrative or sequential reading of any kind.
Ibid., p. 56.

The gridded street plan is a plastic representation of pure equilibrium.
Conrad, p. 120.

The grid is a transfer in which nothing changes place.
Krauss, p. 53.

The block becomes a “park” in the tradition of Coney Island: it offers an aggressive alternative reality, intent on discrediting and replacing all “natural” reality.
The area of these interior parks can never exceed the size of a block: that is the maximum increment of conquest by a single “planner” or a single “vision.”
Since all Manhattan’s blocks are identical and emphatically equivalent in the unstated philosophy of the Grid, a mutation in a single one affects all others as a latent possibility: theoretically, each block can now turn into a self-contained enclave of the Irresistible Synthetic.
That potential also implies an essential isolation: no longer does the city consist of a more or less homogeneous texture—a mosaic of complementary urban fragments—but each block is now alone like an island, fundamentally on its own.
Manhattan turns into a dry archipelago of blocks.
Koolhaas, p. 97.

On a chess-board, imagine a line cutting the squares it traverses, into obtuse and sharp angles, all equally geometrically to right angles, doubtless, but in reality, so different: this is Broadway crossing New York.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 436.

In straight New York, Broadway runs riot.
Ibid., p. 436.
Broadway is deleterious because it is diagonal, straying across Manhattan from east to west, and because it is nocturnal. Winchell called it New York’s hardened artery.

Conrad, p. 283.

“Broadway’s on the diagonal!” somebody cuts in. So was he. The diagonal, they’d been taught in geometry, is in relation to the straight sides of irrational incommensurate, as is the square root of two.

McCourt, p. 80.

Nothing is more tiresome than an infinite number of perfectly straight streets and avenues running on and on until they lose themselves in the sky. One goes along them without ever seeing an edifice closing the vista. There is a terrible monotony about a city each street of which is the counterpart of its neighbors. The idea for a city to aim at is not that the newly arrived stranger shall be able to dispense with map and find his road unaided.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 438.

This relentless set of right angles was like a brand on the wilderness of Manhattan’s forests, hills, springs, and streams, ignoring them so that inevitably the forests were cut, the hills leveled, and the streams seduced into the underground pipery that bore them invisibly from source to sea. [Nature]

White, Physical, pp. 112-3.

It is like a general introduction to the whole surface of life. Every point of it is worth investigation, for every point leads far into ultimate meaning.

Hapgood, p. 100.

Until medieval times European cities were circular structures arranged centers, while American cities are mostly linear structures built along axes. European cities tend to be closed, while American cities tend toward a more open structure. This is true at least in the sense that city roads in Europe are centripetal / centrifugal while in the United States, they tend to run and cut across. The European city is dominated by the square, but in America this role is taken by the “main street” that begins in the no-man’s land preceding the city, runs its course through the city, and peters out in the no-man’s land at the other end. In this way, instead of widening out in concentric circles, American cities “rise” from their original nucleus. Hence the reasoning between the divisions of downtown, midtown, and uptown.

Maffi, p. 15.

The grid acts as a reassuring compass, always ready to orient you. It pulls your eye straight up the avenue, to those long, unimpeded vistas... and so your gaze keeps adjusting astigmatically between long distance and middle range, and all the while there is so much coming at you that you have to attend to the immediate surround, dodging bodies and seizing openings.

The RCA Building’s sheer number of its windows, its system of multiplication; the United Nations Secretariat is a decapitated pyramid with its edges chiseled against a darker sky, depthless and unornamented. [Antiquity]
Conrad, p. 110.

The grid appears in the form of windows, the material presence of their panes expressed by the geometrical intervention of the window’s mullions. [Reflection]
Krauss, p. 59.

There is no necessary connection between good art and change, no matter how conditioned we may be to think that there is. Indeed, as we have a more and more extended experience of the grid, we have discovered that one of the most modernist things about it is its capacity to serve as a paradigm or model for the antidevelopmental, the antinarrative, the antihistorical. This has occurred in the temporal as well as the visual arts: in music, for example, and in dance. It is no surprise then, that as we contemplate this subject, there should have been announced for next season a performance project based on the combined efforts of Phil Glass, Lucinda Childs, and Sol LeWitt: music, dance, and sculpture, projected as the mutually accessible space of the grid.

Ibid., p. 64.

Dance by Lucinda Childs, Philip Glass and Sol LeWitt, was performed at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in December 1979. The collaboration was unusual because it brought together three individual who since the ‘60s have been working with similar modular structures in their separate disciplines. Characteristic of this production (and in contrast to the discontinuity which characterizes the collaborations between Cunningham and Cage, Tudor, et al.) was the fact that its three parts—film, dance and music—were designed to synchronize with each other. The presence of the grid substantially changed the appearance and the meaning of Childs’s dances. Though Childs has used geometric configurations as the basis of her choreography in the past, the existence of those structures—straight lines, triangles, arcs—often had to be intuited. When her dances were placed on a grid in the filmed segments of Dance, however, their mathematical foundation became immediately evident. The combination of dancers and grid had exactly the opposite effect for LeWitt’s work: the figures served to humanize it. In the visual arts the inclusion of figures within a grid has been relatively rare. For LeWitt, the placement of figures in/on the grid stresses the underlying physical / anthropomorphic quality of his own structures. The dancers thus appeared to be dancing both within and on top of one of LeWitt’s own sculptural grids, their movements transformed into a three-dimensional tic-tac-toe. They, in turn, completely revolutionized the meaning of the grid—changing its usual abstract, symbolic character to the more functional role of a high-tech piece of furniture. Together, the figures and grid seemed absorbed into the realm of painterly, illusionistic space and the move in some dimension beyond the reality of the stage on which we know they danced.

Sargent-Wooster, p. 143-7.

Abstraction

The city of realism is congested. Abstracted New York is empty. Human life has been expelled from it and its perimeters are blank walls, the screens for invisible vistas.
Whitewashed handball walls are the infinitudes of a negative sublimity, a pallor that appalls, like the incomprehensible whiteness of Moby Dick or the uncharted extent of American geography, which weary human beings have to trudge across and fill up.

A geometer’s New York of sharpened edges and extreme angles, a city which, in the process of rebuilding, can be seen recomposing itself abstractly, purged now of Whitman’s organic ferment. Even the city’s mobility is belied.

Abstract space reveals its oppressive and repressive capacities in relation to time. It rejects time as an abstraction—except when it concerns work, the producer of things and of surplus value. Time is reduced to constraints of space: schedules, runs, crossings, loads.

Lefebvre, Stage, p. 187.

Whitman is co-opted by the abstractors of New York.

New York invites re-formation because it’s a world city. Abstraction is the universal regime of structure beneath the variety of local appearance; it confounds and then rationally rearranges the visible world just as New York draws from and then resynthesizes the old political world of quarrelsome nationalities.

The first task of the American painter is repletion of this emptiness; but his way of colonizing it is simply to color it white. Tom Sawyer has been sentenced to whitewash “thirty yards of board-fence nine feet high.” He pauses, dismayed, to compare the few streaks he has accomplished with “the far-reaching continent of unwhitewashed fence” yet to be conquered. Tom’s canvas, like the unsettled continent or the white paintings (fleetingly colored and inhabited by the shadows of viewers, travelers through this vacant infinity) made by Robert Rauschenberg in 1951, is a void. So too is the city once it has been abstracted: a clean, well-lit place, its walls are as wide and as depressingly open as the continent they’re meant to occlude.

The distanced rather than the proximate, the displaced rather than the placed, the intransitive rather than the reflexive.

Amin, p. 5

Socially, politically, and ethnically, New York performs a benign reduction resembling that of the cubists, who see within all objects those ideal, ideational forms—the sphere, the cone, and the cylinder. It takes immigrants from every country and recomposes them as Americans. At the same time, New York devises an international language to accompany the visual universality of abstraction.

Conrad, p. 117.

Constance Rourke saw all New York culture, past and present—politics, religion, advertising, everything—as “doubled”; “Everything doubled.” (c.f. New York, New York)

The tension between the similarities and differences among the façades along a block, and the repetition of such blocks along streets which themselves subtly differ in dimension. Conrad, p. 123.
e - Loneliness

New York’s terrible when somebody laughs on the street very late at night. You can hear it from miles. It makes you feel lonesome and depressed.
Salinger, p. 81.

Occasionally, a single shoe is marooned in the city.
Brooks, City, p. 15.

A single human figure, equally isolated in a crowd, proceeds through the chill, bleak anonymity of the 20th-century transit catacombs (ancient catacombs softened even death with frescoes) in a setting of impersonal, ordinary sterility that could just as well be a clean, functional gas chamber. The human spirit and human environment have reached absolute zero. [Antiquity]
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 52.

The hours of depression that I have passed in New York.
Ford, America, p. 178.

Of the cities I know New York / wins the paranoia award
Lehman, Selected, p. 157.

The solitary are obsessed. Apartments furnish little solitude.
Oppen, Collected Poems, p. 43.

There is no agoraphobia any more, there is, simply no reason to go out.
Blandford, p. 95.

Riding the subway escalator at 14th Street, each eye downcast, avoiding direct contact with anyone, each staring intently at his shoes.
Mariani, p. 234.

One is still alone; among people who are alone, scattered like seed or pebbles strewn.
Rosenfeld, p. 470.

For months, I roamed the streets, trying to find people who would talk to me.
Kinkead, p. 5.

delirium of empty streets
Roche, p. 404.

Perhaps because so many here are lonely, there is a sense of depression.
Blandford, p. 120.

Summertime is a good time to reexamine New York and to receive again the gift of privacy, the jewel of loneliness.
White, Here, p. 37.

how sad the lower East side is on Sunday morning in May eating yellow eggs
O'Hara, p. 405.

I am a bit of a man with a seven-syllabled name in the vastness New York. [Names]

Frank, p. 177.

I am unfit for this puffed city of gray dust and lost soldiers drinking lost battles in the chasms between buildings making artwar to assuage rather than fight.

Jones, Modernism, p. 226.

The crypts of loneliness,
The dreams and immundicities of the crowd.

Depero, "Coney Island," p. 422.

Later I realized that behind much of the entertainment that the city poured forth into the nation there were only a lot of rather lost and lonely people. The world of the picture actors was like our own in that it was in New York and not of it.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 110.

At first, the symbolic gesture of the novel in New York is its closure of a door.

Conrad, p. 178.

Mingling is out; privacy is in.

Bladford, p. 95.

Once it has disallowed character, New York must rule out any narrative that grows from voluntary affinities. Its dwellings are constructed to enforce this denial.

Conrad, p. 185.

For in the city, things were definitely outside you, apart from you; you were alien to them, it seemed, and for your part you could not move closer to them, no more than to the people who moved amongst them; even to those of the people you were supposed to know the best of all and with whom you had spent years. It was as useless trying to feel yourself through the crowding towers of the lower town, and feel a whole, as it was trying to feel yourself through the forbidding people in the streets. The towers were not a whit less hard, less mutually exclusive, less eager to crowd each other out, than the people who had made them. They snatched the light from each other; rough-shouldered each other; were loud, anarchical, showy... unfriendly; flaunting money; calling for money. Edges stood, knife after knife. Nothing ever came with the warmth of heaven to do the work of the sun and melt the many antagonistic particles.

Rosenfeld, p. 467.

In the seventies, we used to dream of escaping to downtown New York to escape the draft. The labyrinth of forgotten streets made it seem like the perfect place to disappear into. We figured we'd go undercover for a few years there, and emerge later unnoticed by the draft authorities. [Unrest]

N. cit.

Only in a great city could an introvert give his overwhelming yearning free rein incognito and thus keep the respect of his every-day circle. In New York one can live as Nature demands without setting every one's tongue wagging.
Chauncey, p. 131.

I began to cherish the loneliness of it, the sense that at any given time no one need know where I was or what I was doing.

New York. A walking exile here I will always be—alone.
Jones, Modernism, p. 227.

It was a beautiful day. No one was around. So I was all by myself, but I had courage enough to go down to the office. I take a sharp stick with me in case the elevator doors stick, so I can pry myself out. And if I go over there alone on the weekend I always tell someone I'm going... No one was available to accompany me to the office, and I was afraid the elevator would get stuck, so I didn't go down.
Warhol, Diaries, 521-2.

The dark was coming quickly down, the dark of a February Sunday evening, and that vaguely perturbed him. He didn’t want to go "home," though, and get out of it. It would be gloomy and close in his hotel room, and his soiled shirts would be piled on the floor of the closet where he had been flinging them for weeks.

He sits in the lobby drinking brandy and asking again if he's received any messages (he hasn't). Restless, he wanders out again.
Finally after moping from bar to bar, he shuffles, drunk and maudlin, back to his hotel. It's three o'clock Monday morning; nothing awaits him but the night clerk and an absence of messages.
Caldwell, p. 261.

I wonder if one person out of the 8,000,000 is thinking of me as I shake hands with LeRoi
O'Hara, p. 336.

Lovers still become radiant and breathless; honest workers shave wood, rivet steel beams, dig in the earth, or set type with sure hands and quiet satisfaction; scholars incubate ideas, and now and again a poet or an artist broods by himself in some half-shaded city square.
Mumford, p. 24.

Out there, beyond the world of the box, and the security of the hermit's shell, is sensed a gallery of losers.
Blandford, p. 95.

Three Hundred Thousand People in Coney Island Yesterday. Twenty-three Children Lost.

The movies, the White Ways, and the Coney Islands, which almost every American city boasts in some form or other, are means of giving jaded and throttled people the sensations of living without the direct experience of life—a sort of spiritual masturbation.
Jones, Modernism, p. 176.

New York of the teens is as soulless as a department store.
[Commodity]
Ibid., p. 208.
The city as a confraternity of minds, each of which illuminates a window with a sign of its sentience, sinister in their lidded blankness.
Conrad, p. 103.

She stares out the window, across the freezing black river and into the bleakness of Queens.
Leibowitz, p. 200.

A room without a window is a life denied consciousness of itself and contact with others... 300,000 inhabited, windowless rooms in New York.
Conrad, p. 103.

And then he said to himself that this fair but pitiless city of Manhattan was without a soul; that its inhabitants were manikins moved by wires and springs, and that he was alone in a great wilderness.
[Display]
Henry, "Making" p. 108

City of ardent spinsters and impotent Galahads.
Reisenberg, p. 204.

A dialectic of incognito observations.
Tester, p. 11.

A sociability of Ones.
Ibid., p. 77.

An atomized form of association where individuals congregate in an anonymous crowd of randomly strolling people. Despite their proximity they keep their social distance from each other and preserve a discrete estrangement. This is the life of watching the world go by, not ever exchanging a word acknowledging the presence of an Other.
Ibid., p. 77.

To experience the city is, among many other things, to experience anonymity.
Lofland, p. ix.

To cope with the city is, among many other things, to cope with strangers.
Ibid., p. x.

Strangers in the midst of strangers.
Ibid., p. 19.

A situation of pure anonymity would be intolerable.
Ibid., p. x.

A collection of relatively large numbers of people in a relatively small space.
Ibid., p. 3.

There is nothing peculiar in the situation of living out one’s life amid persons one does not know.
Ibid., p. 4.
Pre-urban condition: the absence of anonymity.
Ibid., p. 4.

There would appear to be a sheer biophysical limitation on the capacity of human beings to recognize, either by name or by face an infinite number of their fellowmen.
Ibid., p. 10.

Keep one’s facial expression impassive. Look neither happy nor sad, angry nor peaceful.
Ibid., p. 151.

Keep oneself to oneself. Avoid bumping into, brushing past, stepping on, or colliding with any strange persons. Keep alert to the speed with which, and direction in which these persons are moving, so as to guide one’s own actions appropriately. Follow the rule of generally staying to the right but do not assume that others will do the same.
Ibid., p. 151.

Keep oneself apart. Avoid seating oneself in such a way as to suggest to a strange author that one wishes to interact.
Ibid., p. 153.

Keep one’s eyes to oneself. Avoid even accidental contact. Concentrate one’s games on inanimate objects. If one wishes to gaze about, glance at surrounding persons only below the neck.
Ibid., p. 154.

Wear sunglasses. One can then look people right in the eye without there being aware that one is doing so.
Ibid., p. 154.

Keep oneself protected. Avoid coming close to anyone who either looks or behaves “oddly.” Such persons are unpredictable, may accost one despite one’s precautions, and may involve one inconspicuous interaction. (cf. Auster: “Odd gestures of any kind are automatically taken as a threat.”)[Flâneur]
Ibid., p. 154.

Keep oneself aloof.
Ibid., p. 155.

People born and bred to life within earshot and eye glance of a score of neighbors have learned to preserve their own private worlds by uniformly ignoring each other, except on direct invitation.
Hayes, p. 1.

Street empty. Save for a solitary trudging head down shielding a big brown envelope.
Donleavy, N. pag.

A stormy morning is the best time of all in New York—when there isn’t a single loafers, not a spare person about. There are only the toilers of the great army of labour of the city of ten million.
Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 48.
Really it’s this lawlessness and anonymity simultaneously that I desire.
Wojnarowicz, p. 128.

Inhabited by 4,000,000 mysterious strangers.
Jackson & Dunbar, pp. 497-98.

_theme for an immense poem_ — collecting, in running list, all the things done in secret.
Turner, p. 110.

Streets already emptied at night by television.
Freeman, p. 275.

If he is dressed superbly well—there are a half a million people dressed equally well.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 671.

If he is in rags—there are a million ragged people.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If he is tall, it is a city of tall people.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If he is short, the streets are full of dwarfs.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If ugly, ten perfect horrors pass him in one block.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If beautiful, the competition is overwhelming.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If he is talented, talent is a dime a dozen.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

If he tries to make an impression by wearing a toga—there’s a man down the street is a leopard skin.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

Whatever he does or says or wears or thinks he is not unique. Once accepted this gives him perfect freedom to be himself, but unaccepted it horrifies him.
_Ibid._, p. 671.

It is truly the city that nobody knows.
Atkinson, p. 261.

The most desired yet least beloved of cities.

Whoever wishes company can find company; whoever wishes to be alone will not be disturbed.
_Ibid._, p. 264.

“Ladies of the Corridor”—widows with money and no inner resources who sit all day in hotel lobbies sadly watching life pass them by.
_Ibid._, p. 264.
Elderly men, somehow alone in the world, or unwanted, sitting on park benches staring into the past.
Ibid., p. 264.

A man I heard of whose sole social contact was going to the hat-and-shoe cleaners to have his hat cleaned. He had his hat cleaned a couple of times a week, just to sit waiting in the warm, bright shop, listening to the chatter of the proprietor and other customers.
Ibid., p. 264.

New York blends the gift of privacy with the excitement of participation; and better than most dense communities it succeeds in insulating the individual (if he wants it, and almost everybody wants or needs it) against all enormous and violent and wonderful events that are taking place every minute.
White, Here, p. 22.

On any person who desires such queer prizes, New York will bestow the gift of loneliness and the gift of privacy. It is this largess that accounts for the presence within the city’s walls of a considerable section of the population; for the residents of Manhattan are to a large extent strangers who have pulled up stakes somewhere and come to town, seeking sanctuary or fulfilment or some greater or lesser grail. The capacity to make such dubious gifts is a mysterious quality of New York. It can destroy an individual, or it can fulfill him, depending a good deal on luck. No one should come to New York to live unless he is willing to be lucky.
Ibid., p. 19.

The main external check upon a man’s conduct, the opinion of his neighbours, which has such a powerful influence in the country or small town, tends to disappear. In a great city one has no neighbours. No man knows the doings of even his close friends; few men care what the secret life of their friends may be. The young man is left free to follow his own inclinations.
Chauncey, p. 131.

Any taxi driver is a symbol of urban disengagement, a man who moves, works, walks and talks and yet somehow is invisible to the eyes of his fellow men. He is acknowledged briefly when the passenger enters the cab and then consigned to limbo, to nonexistence.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 395.

New York’s bus driver remains largely anonymous and goes through life with only half of his face showing in the rear-view mirror.
Talese, p. 31.

People who have no terraces and no gardens long to escape from their own four walls, but not to wander far. They only want to step outside for a minute. They stand outside their apartment houses on summer nights and during summer days. They stand around in groups or they sit together on the front steps of their buildings, taking the air and looking around at the street. Sometimes they carry a chair out, so that on old person can have a little outing. They lean out of their windows, with their elbows on the sills, and look into the faces of their neighborhoods at their windows on the other side of the street, all of the escaping from the rooms they live in and that they are glad to have but not to be closed up in. It should not be a problem, to have shelter without being shut away. The window sills are safety hatches into the open, and so are the fire escapes and the roofs and the front stoops.

Brennan, p. 32.

A city for eccentrics and a center for odd bits of information.
Talese, p. 1.

Yeah if those floorboards could talk, if those streets could talk, if the whole path this body has traveled—roads, motel rooms, hillsides, cliffs, subways, rivers, planes, tracks—if any of them could speak, what would they remember most about me? What motions would they unravel within their words, or would they turn away faceless like the turn of this whole river and waterfront street, all of its people, its wanderers, its silences beneath the wheels of traffic and industry and sleep, would it turn away speechless like faces in dreams, in warehouses, pale wordless faces containing whole histories and geographies and adventures?

Wojnarowicz, p. 147.

Love in Manhattan? I Don’t Think So.
Bushnell, N. pag.

“Relationships in New York are about detachment,” she said.
Ibid.

When it comes to finding a marriage partner, New York has its own particularly cruel mating rituals, as complicated and sophisticated as those in an Edith Wharton novel. Everyone knows the rules but no one wants to talk about them. The result is that New York has bred a particular type of single woman: smart, attractive, successful, and never married. She is in her late thirties or early forties, and, if empirical knowledge is good for anything, she probably never will get married.

Ibid.

What if, on the other hand, you’re forty and pretty and you’re a television producer or have your own PR company, but you still live in a studio and sleep on a foldout couch the nineties equivalent of Mary Tyler Moore? Except, unlike Mary Tyler Moore, you’ve actually gone to bed with all those guys instead of demurely kicking them out at 12:02 a.m.? What happens to those women?

There are thousands, maybe tens of thousands of women like this in the city. We all know lots of them, and we all agree they’re great. They travel, they pay taxes, they’ll spend four hundred dollars on a pair of Manolo Blahnik strappy sandals. [Commodity]

Ibid.

“Here’s the deal,” Jerry said. “There’s a window of opportunity for women to get married in New York. Somewhere between the ages of twenty-six and thirty-five. Or maybe thirty-six.” We agreed that if a woman’s been married once, she can always get married again; there’s something about knowing how to close the deal.

Ibid.
"But all of a sudden, when women get to be thirty-seven or thirty-eight, there's all this... stuff," he said. "Baggage. They've been around too long. Their history works against them.

"There's a list of toxic bachelors in New York," said Jerry, "and they're deadly."

Because if you're a successful single woman in this city, you have two choices: You can beat your head against the wall trying to find a relationship, or you can say "screw it" and just go out and have sex like a man.

The Bicycle Boy actually has a long literary-social tradition in New York. The patron saints of Bicycle Boys are white-haired writer George Plimpton, whose bike used to hang upside down above his employees' heads at the Paris Review offices, and white haired Newsday columnist Murray Kempton. They've been riding for years and are the inspiration for the next generation of Bicycle Boys, like the aforementioned Mr. New Yorker and scores of young book, magazine, and newspaper editors and writers who insist on traversing Manhattan's physical and romantic landscape as solitary peddlers. Bicycle Boys are a particular breed of New York bachelor: Smart, funny, romantic, lean, quite attractive, they are the stuff that grownup coed dreams are made of. There's something incredibly, er, charming about a tweedy guy on a bike especially if he's wearing goofy glasses.

John F. Kennedy Jr. is certainly New York's most famous and sought-after bike-riding bachelor.

On a recent afternoon, four women met at an Upper East Side restaurant to discuss what it's like to be an extremely beautiful young woman in New York City. About what it's like to be sought after, paid for, bothered, envied, misunderstood, and just plain gorgeous: all before the age of twenty-five.

He lives in a tiny studio that has white everything: white curtains, white sheets, white comforter, white chaise. When you're in the bathroom, you look to see if he uses special cosmetics. He doesn't.

[Interior] [Commodity]

Probably met by answering an ad in the New York Review of Books.

"Thirtyish academic wishes to meet woman who's interested in Mozart, James Joyce and sodomy."

Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.

Sometimes you feel like the only man in the city without group affiliation.

McInerney, p. 57.

He slipped his hand into mine and my reaction to that was almost bewilderment insofar as people rarely do that in this city, much less when they hardly know you, and I really dug it. We left each other after an embrace on the corner of Christopher and Hudson Streets. After walking half a block I turned to look back, and he was standing there, hand in pocket, the other hand up waving. I waved back and turned towards the subway and home.

Wojnarowicz, p. 156.

Memory, Nostalgia, Amnesia, Change

New York is a city that eats its history.
Solis, p. 9.

Crowned not only with no history, but with no credible possibility of time for history, and consecrated by no uses save the commercial at any cost, they are simply the most piercing notes in that concert of the expensively provisional into which your supreme sense of New York resolves itself.
Brook, p. 284.

In it seems to me that those days before I knew the names of all the bridges were happier than the ones that came later.

As speedily forgetful as the RR subway.

The lot is now a place of pictorial memory, a chimerical souvenir of the city before abstraction: on its blank wall is the imprint of a demolished house.
Ibid., p. 112.

It is both novelty and recognition that pleases him: the novelty of its actual and amazing encompassment, the recognition of great shafts and crowds and thoroughfares remembered from a hunched motion pictures, rotogravures and advertisements.
Federal Writers, p.5.

In these matters human psychology is very queer. I suppose that everybody who knows anything about them laments the decay of the ancient glories of ... well, say Spain. It is sad to think that never again will the great galleons trail away into the golden sunsets. London to me to-day is nothing—or next to nothing. I know nobody of its seventeen or so millions—five people perhaps outside my own family. New York really means a great deal more: my memories of her are nearly all pleasant—full of clean air and white Flatirons.
Ford, America, p. 81.

Everything’s changed. I couldn’t stand it here. I’d die. I belong to the Delmonico period. Ah, a table at the window, looking out on Fifth Avenue. Boxes with flowers, pink lampshades, string orchestras, and, yes, willow plumes. Inverness cape, dry champagne, and snow on the ground. Say, they don’t even have snow anymore!
Sanders, Skyline, p. 400.

The tempo of the city had changed sharply. The uncertainties of 1920 were drowned in a steady golden roar and many of our friends had grown wealthy. But the restlessness of New York in 1927 approached hysteria. The parties were bigger—those of Condé Nast, for example, rivaled in their way the fabled balls of the nineties; the pace was faster—the catering to dissipation set an example to Paris; the shows were broader, the buildings were higher, the morals were looser and the liquor was cheaper... Everything there was to say about the boom days in New York that couldn’t be said by a jazz band.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 112.

To a New Yorker the city is both changeless and changing. In many respects it neither looks nor feels the way it did twenty-five years ago. The elevated railways have been pulled down, all but the Third Avenue. An old-timer walking up Sixth past the Jefferson Market jail misses the railroad, misses its sound, its spotted shade, its little aerial stations, and the tremor of the thing. Broadway has changed in aspect. It used to have a discernible bony structure beneath its loud bright surface; but the signs are so enormous now, the buildings and shops and hotels have largely disappeared under the neon lights and letters and the frozen custard façade. Broadway is a custard street with no frame supporting it. In Greenwich Village the light is thinning: big apartments have come in, bordering the Square, and the bars are mirrored and chromed. But there are still in the Village the lingering traces of poesy, Mexican glass, hammered brass, batik, lamps made of whisky bottles, first novels made of fresh memories—the old Village with its alleys and ratty one-room rents catering to the erratic needs of those whose hearts are young and gay.

White, Here, p. 49.

Police now ride in radio prowl cars instead of gumshoeing around the block swinging their sticks. A ride in the subway costs ten cents, and the seats are apt to be dark green instead of straw yellow. Men go to saloons to gaze at televised events instead of to think long thoughts. It is all very disconcerting. Even parades have changed some. The last triumphal military procession in Manhattan simply filled the city with an ominous and terrible rumble of heavy tanks. The slums are gradually giving way to the lofty housing projects—high in stature, high in purpose, low in rent. There are a couple of dozens of these new developments scattered around; each is a city in itself (one of them in the Bronx accommodates twelve thousand families), sky acreage hitherto untilled, lifting people far above the street, standardizing their sanitary life, giving them some place to sit other than an orange crate. Federal money, state money, city money and private money have flowed into these projects. Banks and insurance companies are in back of some of them. Architects have turned the buildings slightly on their bases, to catch more light. In some of them, rents are as low as eight dollars a room. Thousands of new units are still needed and will eventually be built, but New York never quite catches up with itself, is never in equilibrium. In flush times the population mushrooms and the new dwellings sprout from the rock. Come bad times and the population scatters and the lofts are abandoned and the landlord withers and dies. [Robert Moses]

Ibid., p. 50.

Jules Romains visits NYC in 1924. An expert in the human resonance of great cities, he noted its equivocal ethics, at home in the guarded half-light of the speakeasy, its neurotic drive to make each moment pay in full, its violent emulation of the machine... He returns in 1936. There had been some extraordinary change in the face and character of the city. Its very streets were fresher, the sky had opened, there was a luster on the flanks of great clay shafts, the intimation of an unbelievable tranquility. True, it was summer; but the deeper signs were plain. They appeared in the faces of the people in every turn and feature. The old, abrasive will-to-action for its own sake was gone.
These men and women were freer, more open, casually good-natured, even happy. They had time for a new and more relaxed gaiety. He felt in them a profound reinvigoration of the democratic spirit.

Federal Writers, pp. 421-2.

This great city of perpetual change doesn't encourage nostalgia.
Much that is precious in the memory will have vanished months or years later, and the returning traveler must rediscover the city each time.
The scale of New York scorns the indulgences of personal sentiment. The towers of Manhattan are an embodiment of overachievement, a defiantly artificial megalopolis in which glass and stone and concrete overwhelm the human element. The lifelong sport of being a New Yorker is to overcome these extraordinary self-created obstacles. The art of doing so, which New Yorkers by definition have had to perfect, is urban living at its most extreme, most rhapsodic. Defying all the laws that sociologists lay down, impossibly overcrowded Manhattan functions as well, if not better, than most cities of the same size. Though individual buildings, even neighbourhoods, decay and disappear, the city as a whole is inextinguishable. It is more than an agglomeration; it is an idea, an assertion. Because it is self-renewing it can never, superpowers permitting, be destroyed.

Brook, p. 284.

Publicity is, in essence, nostalgic. It has to sell the past to the future. Nostalgia is no simple longing for the past, however, not least because we can be made to feel it for experiences we did not, and could not, have ourselves enjoyed. Nostalgia literally means—from the Greek nostalgos—a painful longing for one's home harbor, and Odysseus may be considered by this token the most celebrated nostalgic in history or literature. It is a paradoxical pain even in its simplest form, since there is the pain of return as well as the pain felt as return is successively thwarted: you really can't go home again, because when you get there it is not the same as when you left.

Kingwell, p. 182.

Seen from the ferry boat in the early morning, it no longer whispers of fantastic success and eternal youth. The whoopee mamas who prance before its empty parquets do not suggest to me the ineffable beauty of my dream girls of 1914.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 115.

All over town the great mansions are in decline. Schwab's house facing the Hudson on Riverside is gone. Gould's house on Fifth Avenue is an antique shop. Morgan's house on Madison Avenue is a church administration office. What was once the Fahnestock house is now Random House. Rich men nowadays don't live in houses; they live in the attics of big apartment buildings and plant trees on the setbacks, hundreds of feet above the street. [Decay] [Demolition]

White, Here p. 49.

From the confusion of the year 1920 I remember riding on top of a taxi-cab along deserted Fifth Avenue on a hot Sunday night, and a luncheon in the cool Japanese gardens at the Ritz, and paying too much for minute apartments, and buying magnificent but broken-down cars.

The past is the only real thing. You can brood on the past, reflect about it, enjoy it. The present is mere activity and the future is nothing.

Hapgood, p. 215.

History written in scratches and scars onto streets and houses. [Graffiti]

Maffi, p. 56.

The first New York I knew well, SoHo’s art world of twenty years ago, is no less vanished now than Carthage; the New York where my wife and I first set up housekeeping, the old Yorkville of German restaurants and sallow Eastern European families, is still more submerged, Atlantis; and the New York of our older friends—where the light came in from the river and people wore hats and on hot nights slept in Central Park—is not just lost but by now essentially fictional, like Narnia.

Gopnik, p. 4.

On the rare occasions when Old New York surfaces, the public is generally uninvited to the viewing.

Trebay, p. 130.

The leaden twilight weighs on the dry limbs of an old man walking towards Broadway. Round the Nedick’s stand at the corner something clicks in his eyes. Broken doll in the ranks of varnished articulated dolls he plods up with drooping head into the seethe and throb into the furnace of beaded lettercut light. “I remember when it was all meadows,” he grumbles to the little boy. [Nature]

Dos Passos, p. 249.

She changes so fast that you cannot at any moment say: “This is my New York.” And yet your New York it remains. The tobacco-store at the corner of Fourteenth Street vanished in next to no time after I had begun to use it as a means of communication with the outside world but it collected an extraordinary crop of associations and became part of the Past with a rapidity such as could have been equaled in surely no other city. And you may say the same of all New York. Impressions are all there so vivid that what, in another place, would leave next to no impress on the mind becomes between the Battery and Central Park of almost epoch-making importance. So New York clothes herself.

It is a city of silent movie stars and old fans who rarely recognize them. Although sometimes on Broadway an elderly man will swing around, stare at a passing figure and exclaim:

“Why, you’re Nita Naldi!” [Fame] [Celebrity]

Talese, p. 129.

Confusion is in the city, and so is pure simplicity. One hour is like a minute, and the day wanes, for the more you see, smell, and hear, the less you know.

Reisenberg, p. 156.

In a city like New York it is easy to relive the past ten years by walking to the Laundromat.
The city has become a tissue of memories. I can’t walk down any street after having lived here for thirty years without remembering a lover who lived on such-and-such a street or a long-vanished store that occupied a corner. The city can never be new again.

It’s so odd trying to write about the past based on memory: the landscape and human particulars fall to the odd logic of time and emotional impression. The landscape of memory is as affected by time and personal structure as is landscape affected by light or darkness. At night when sources of light are curtailed, shaped, bent, deflected, erased, the distances can suddenly be elongated or shortened, physicality of self or landscape expands or contracts in the dark. 8\textsuperscript{th} Avenue in memory can be a location or landscape no one else has ever raveled.

We walk the streets with a thousand legs and eyes, with furry antennae picking up the slightest clue and memory of the past. In the aimless to and fro we pause now and then, like long, sticky plants, and we swallow whole the live morsels of the past. [Flâneur]

And in spite of all the indistinguishable glass boxes and of monstrosities like the Pan Am Building and other crimes against nature and the people, there are fragments of still earlier days. Single buildings. Sometimes several together. And once you get away from midtown, there are entire city blocks that have been where they still stand for fifty, seventy, even eighty and ninety years. There are scattered places a century or more old, and a very few which actually knew the presence of Washington.

In the 1920s, nostalgia for the Gay 90s appeared. New Yorkers began to fight to preserve old buildings and to slow the pace of “creative destruction” in Manhattan. “Sentimental. Unjazzed. Jolly.”

And the New York of the eighties was dead.

I suppose that 30 years from now (as close to us as we are to 1958), when I’ve been safely tucked into the turf at the Green-Wood, someone will write in these pages about a Lost New York that includes Area and the Mudd Club and Nell’s, David’s Cookies and Aca Joe and Steve’s ice cream. Someone might mourn Lever House or Trump Tower or the current version of Madison Square Garden.

I confess to a feeling akin to sadness about the nineties. They record, in one sense, the last days of another Pompeii—the last days of little Old New York. The proud name which she had gallantly borne for three centuries was to be torn from her grasp. The last link that connected her with her days of romance, her Indians, her Pirates, her valiant struggle for freedom, her Raines Law sandwich was to be a thing of the past. No more was the little seaport at the mouth of the lordly
Hudson to be called by the name which navigators, explorers mariners had made known to the Seven Seas. In order to realize her manifest destiny—to become still greater—it became necessary to ally herself with Hunter’s Point, Far Rockaway, Long Island City and the Bronx! The mantle of her shining greatness fell upon these benighted communities and now the traveller from Brooklyn is no longer ashamed to register from his home town, but gaily and at last truthfully inscribes himself from New York. The Borough of Manhattan may in time come to mean something. For the present it is a mouthing—a cymbal of brass. To the old New Yorker the name New York will always mean the city on Manhattan Island at the mouth of the Hudson River and will never mean anything else. All the consolidations, annexations, combinations, etc., to the contrary notwithstanding. And now to the burden of my discourse. It is yet the early nineties and I am still in real old New York. Not till almost the closing years of this decade am I obliged to record this lamentable change. So till almost the last page I am speaking of New York and not of the contraption of five upstart Boroughs strutting around in unmerited splendor as part of that ancient and honorable commonwealth, the Empire City, little old New York... [Empire]

Brown, Valentine, pp. 19,

Here is D. W. Griffith, whose old Biograph Studio building still stands, solid but battered and neglected, at the Expressway’s edge; here is Sholem Aleichem, seeing the New World and saying that it was good, and dying on Kelly Street (the block where Bella Abzug was born); and there is Trotsky on East 164th Street, waiting for his revolution (did he really play a Russian in obscure silent films? we will never know). Now we see a modest but energetic and confident bourgeoisie, springing up in the 1920s near the new Yankee Stadium, promenading on the Grand Concourse for a brief moment in the sun, finding romance in the swan boats in Crotona Park; and not far away, “the coops,” a great network of workers’ housing settlements, cooperatively building a new world beside Bronx and Van Cortlandt parks. We move on to the bleak adversity of the 1930s, unemployment lines, home relief, the WPA (whose splendid monument, the Bronx County Courthouse, stands just above the Yankee Stadium), radical passions and energies exploding, street-corner fights between Trotskyites and Stalinists, candy stores and cafeterias ablaze with talk all through the night; then to the excitement and anxiety of the postwar years, new affluence, neighborhoods more vibrant than ever, even as new worlds beyond the neighborhoods begin to open up, people buy cars, start to move; to the Bronx’s new immigrants from Puerto Rico, South Carolina, Trinidad, new shades of skin and clothes on the street, new music and rhythms, new tensions and intensities; and finally, to Robert Moses and his dread road, smashing through the Bronx’s inner life, transforming evolution into devolution, entropy into catastrophe, and creating the ruin on which this work of art is built.

Berman, Solid, p. 342.

In the nineteenth century the nostalgic was an urban dweller who dreamed of escape from the city into the unspoiled landscape. At the end of the twentieth century the urban dweller feels that the city itself is an endangered landscape.

Lopate, Waterfront, p. 208

I came to the city as a stranger, and although I became a New Yorker, I left it finally as a stranger, too.

O’Connell, p. 304.
f - Mundane

Friday, July 15, 1960 was a typical day in New York City. Seven new “Littering Prohibited” signs were added in Central Park. John T. Jackson became Vice-President in Charge of Management Planning at Remington Rand and got his picture on page 26 of the Times. The Home for Aged and Infirm Hebrews of New York announced that it received $2,000,000 under the will of Solomon Friedman, a cotton merchant. John’s Bargain Stores leased a building at 184 West 213th Street, near Broadway from one Louis Cella. The Fifth Avenue Coach Lines, Inc., brought a $500,000 damage suit against Michael J. Quill’s union for an unauthorized bus strike. At 11:15 A.M., Joseph J. Marinello, 77, whizzed into Times Square on his bicycle, asked for a tomato juice, and remarked, “I just knocked off 671 miles on this bike.” (A sleepy-eyed counter clerk was very impressed.) Nitrous oxide seeped through gas masks and overcame twenty firemen at a blaze in the twelve-story loft at 107-109 West Thirty-eighth Street. At 8 P.M. it was 79 degrees. Eleanor Steber sang Il Trovatore at Lewisohn Stadium and everybody liked it. A Polish cleaning lady was stuck for five minutes in a Wall Street elevator on the 37th floor. A car plunged 40 feet down into the East River with a man and woman after speeding over the Tiffany Street pier shortly before midnight. Nobody saw either of them again until Saturday night, July 16, when a stocky deep-sea diver, wading through the slippery slime, felt the bodies, attached a hook to the car’s rear bumper, and then sent it up toward the surface again.

Talese, Serendipiter’s, p. 81.

Capture a piece of the street and make a history of the commonplace.
Rock, p. 287.

Somewhere, everywhere over there in that would that we had been around, actresses were getting their beauty sleep or were at school learning an arduous new dance. Somewhere a man was killing a gnat and somewhere else a man building a bomb. Someone was kissing, and someone was being born, and someone was dying. Some were eating and drinking and laughing, and others were starving. Some were thinking, and others were not. Waiters moved about in their great hotels, dragging their servility with them like trains. Pompous gentlemen in fat rings discuss politics amid spittoons, and handsome women read yellow-backed novels and gave their hands to be kissed by gallants. And there were some walking about, looking over at us as we looked back at them. The tall buildings threw their shadows down on little buildings, great men on small men, joy on sorrow.
Barnes, p. 294.

A man invited us to dinner. We went to his apartment. We looks at his paintings for a long time. He had painted them. We looked at each painting and said different things about them. We said nothing negative about any painting. Then the man said it was time for dinner. He offered us herbal tea. We sat down at the table. It was just the three of us. The man set the table and brought out a salad. It was a fairly large green salad. He gave us each some salad and we ate it. Then he asked if we would like some more. After a while we decided to have some more salad. Then a long time passed and we said we would have a bit more salad. Then the man brought out the herbal tea.
After a while longer we realized the meal was over and we went home.
Janowitz, p. 167.

Yawning, stretching, any number of people got up and started the business of the day. Turning on the shower, Dressing. Putting their hair up in plastic curlers. Squeezing the toothpaste out of tubes that were all but empty. Squeezing orange juice. Separating strips of bacon.
Maxwell, p. 392.

Across the way a guy in a leather jacket scooped frost off the windshield of a snow-packed black Mercury Montclair. Behind him, a priest in a purple cloak was slipping through the courtyard of the church through an opened gate on his way to perform some sacred duty. Nearby, a bareheaded woman in boots tried to manage a laundry bag up the street. There were a million stories, just everyday New York things if you wanted to focus in on them. It was always right out in front of you, blended together, but you’d have to pull it apart to make any sense of it.
Dylan, Chronicles, p. 32.

I used to get up in the mornings, shower, check the weather, dress accordingly, make sure the windows by the fire escape were closed, lock up, wait for the elevator, check whether the mail had arrived, say hello to the doorman. By the time I actually hit the street, the day was over and it was time to go home again.
Brook, p. 45.

Why do I feel so happy when I take the Madison Avenue bus past Grand Central Station and down Park Avenue? I would get off at East Thirty-eighth Street and each time I descended from the bus, and stepped on the curb, I felt this inexpressible happiness. Every time. Was it Murray Hill? The station? The pretty trees on Thirty-eighth Street? Was it the sunset in winter, the skyscrapers in the strange cold air of autumn? Was it the elegant, parcel-laden ladies dashing out of cabs? Was it the light cast into the sky? I would walk across Thirty-eighth Street to Third Avenue, usually stopping at the Italian grocery store. I would climb the stairs to my third-floor apartment, put the food in the Frigidaire, sit down in a chair—and wait. The Third Avenue El rushed by. Silence for a while—and then I would wait again. What, I asked myself, am I waiting for?
Myers, p. 95.

Time: the passage of time, the endlessness of time, the patter of repetition, of daily actions, the patterns of traffic; (going to work, shopping, deliveries, children play in the street, coming home from work, the closing stores, etc.). the feeling of the day as a unit of time—awareness of time.

He learns to tell the striking in utterly conventional form.
Hapgood, p. 99.

The brooding emotional impact of what might have been ordinary evening occurrences: a trip to the corner store, a subway ride, a look at the newspaper on a park bench.
Sharpe, p. 282.
Life is never free and easy in New York. One has too little to do or much too much. In no other city must existence be planned so carefully. Not to go out is to be forgotten, but one invitation leads to a dozen more. New York has too many cocktail acquaintances, and half the time people go out against their will and overtired.

Yet one has the impression of being in much closer contact with everyday events in New York. The daily routine is more easily dispensed with. Everyone is more available and on hand. Somehow or other, everybody knows where and how the other person is spending his day and, without instructions having been left, you are successfully tracked down by the telephone, even in the most obscure restaurant that has been chosen for lunch. In Paris, to make a telephone call is an event. Here, telephoning is as easy as breathing... Not only is it unwise, and even dangerous, to be listed in the telephone book, it has come to be considered inelegant.

Beaton, New York, p. 249

Do you have your name in the telephone book?

Cage: No, I don't, but that's not my wish. That's Merce's wish because he's involved with a large company of dancers and a school, so if his name were in the telephone book, it would be awful. Anyway, people find out what your number is whether it's in the book or not. [Technology]

Cage, Conversing, p. 19.

I stood looking around for a moment at New York in the second half of the twentieth century. But there wasn't much to see besides the walls of the buildings around me, a long stretch of asphalt on which only a single cab was moving and a fragment of gray-black sky directly overhead too hazed for any stars to be visible. The day's car-exhaust seemed to have settled down here and was making my eyes smart; it had turned cold; and half a block down the cross street, on the corner of which I was standing, a group of young Negroes was walking toward Lex, so I didn't hang around to encounter them and explain how fond I'd always been of Martin Luther King. I walked on, up Lexington and then across town toward the warehouse; I felt tired, a little sleepy, yet so excited I was conscious of the beat of my heart.

Finney, p. 104.

For most people on the street—including, we liked to think, us—New York City was the only imaginable home, the only place that posted no outer limit on appearance or behavior.

Sante, “My Lost City,” N. pag.

Is the city the sum of indices and facts, of variables and parameters, of correlations, this collection of facts, of descriptions, a fragmented tree analyses, because it is fragmentary?

Lefebvre, Cities, p. 94-5.

Mr. Brown is proud of the fact that he keeps books or sells insurance on the eighteenth story of a skyscraper; but so much of the ground was used to build those splendid offices that Mr. Brown works most of the day under artificial light; and in spite of the slick system of ventilation, the middle of the afternoon finds him dull.

The journey home undoubtedly calls forth physical effort; unhappily it is not invigorating. The Swedish massage he receives at the hand of the subway guard does not improve his appetite; nor is it helped by the thick fumes of gasoline when he walks out upon the street. Eventually
Mr. Brown sits down at his dinner table and looks out on an airshaft or a court where a dozen other kitchens have been busily preparing a dozen other meals; it never varies. No change in color, no hint of sunset or moonlight, no variation from season to season as the vegetation flourishes or shrivels: only the smells that creep through the windows tell the difference between Thursday and Friday.

Once upon a time Mr. Brown used to stretch his legs and play with the children; the six-room flat apartment was common in Boston and New York; the seven-room house flourished in Philadelphia and Chicago and St. Louis. Now the walls of the rooms have contracted: Mr. Brown pays so much for his four cubicles he is perhaps forced to harbor an ancient aunt or his wife’s parents in the same narrow quarters; and, as likely as not, there are no children. When the Browns have put by a little—they will have either a baby or a cheap car: it is hard to decide which, for the upkeep is high in both cases; but the car has this advantage—it would enable the whole family to get out into God’s own country on Sundays.

This pursuit of God’s own country would make the angels themselves weep: it means a ride through endless dusty streets, and along an equally straight and endless concrete road, breathing the dust and exhaust of the car ahead, and furnishing an equal quantum of exhaust and dust to the car behind; a ride with intervals spent at hot-dog stands, and long hours wasted at ferry houses and bridges and main junctions and similar bottlenecks, where the honking of impatient horns reminds Mr. Brown in the spring of the frog ponds he was not quite able to reach. As the main city grows, the country around becomes more suburban and the fields and hills and lakes are more difficult to reach. A generation ago Mr. Brown’s father used to catch shad in the Hudson, or he might have spent the Sunday rambling with his youngsters along the bays and inlets of Long Island Sound. Today a vast load of sewage has driven away the fish; and the expansion of great country estates for the lords of the metropolis has blocked and fenced off the rambler. Nor does New York alone suffer. Buffalo was forced to jump sixteen miles from the city line the other day to recover a paltry thousand feet of lake front for its citizens. By the time open spaces are set aside, however, the population has multiplied so furiously that, on a summer Sunday, the great parks are as congested as the city’s streets—so much for solitude and natural beauty!

When dinner is over neither Mr. Brown nor his wife is in condition to listen to great music or to attend the theater. First of all, they are not in financial condition to do this because ground rents are high in the amusement district, and the price of seats has risen steadily to meet the increase in rents. Unless the occasion is important or Mr. Brown is willing to scrimp on the week’s lunches, he cannot afford to go. Again, he is in no mental condition to participate in play that demands mental activity or emotional response above the spinal cord; and if this were not enough, the prospect of another hour in the subway kills most of the impinging [close together; touching] joys. The seventy theaters that exist in sophisticated New York are, really, only one to a hundred thousand people; there are a score of little towns in continental Europe that are far better provided with drama and music. The fact is that, with all New York’s wealth, its cultural facilities are relatively limited: they would be insufficient were it not for the fact that only a minority can afford to enjoy them regularly.

But Mr. and Mrs. Brown have their amusements? Oh yes, they have the movies, that is to say, the same entertainment, served in almost the same form, as it comes in Peoria or Tuscaloosa or Danbury—no more and no less. If they are too tired to “drop around the corner” they have another consolation, the radio: this, too, works no better than it does in the despised, backward villages of the hinterland, and if the Browns happen to be situated in one of the mysterious "dead areas" it does not work nearly so well! In short, Mr. Brown travels through the pulping mill of the subway, endures the tawdry monotony of his flat, divorces himself from the natural environments he can never quite recover on Sunday—for what? For an occasional visit to the museum or the opera? He could have as much if he lived a hundred miles away. His sacrifices are in reality made for a much more mystical purpose: his presence increases the "greatness" of his city. By adding to its population, he raises the capitalizable value of its real estate; and so he increases rents; and so he makes parks and playgrounds and decent homes more difficult to obtain; and so he increases his own difficulties and burdens; and his flat gets smaller, his streets bleaker, and his annual tribute to the deities who build roads and subways and bridges and tunnels becomes more immense.

Mr. Brown grumbles; sometimes he complains; but he is only just beginning to doubt. His newspaper tells him that he is fortunate; and he believes it. He fancies that when another subway is built he will find room for his feet—if he leaves the office promptly.

Mumford, "Intolerable" p. 283-93.

A quiet couple sitting rapt and remote at a free concert at Yankee Stadium.

Atkinson, p. 39.

Young things in the cheapest seats at the Metropolitan.

Ibid., p. 40.

And so the Madison Avenue car carries thousands past doors and gates that are marvels of loveliness in wrought iron, in perfect glass, in priceless bronze, and not an eye is lifted from the daily paper.

Arnett, 97-105.

The oft-quoted thumbnail sketch of New York is, of course: "It's a wonderful place, but I'd hate to live there." I have an idea that people from villages and small towns, people accustomed to the convenience and the friendliness of neighborhood over-the-fence living, are unaware that life in New York follows the neighborhood pattern. The city is literally a composite of tens of thousands of tiny neighborhood units. There are, of course, the big districts and big units: Chelsea and Murray Hill and Gramercy (which are residential units), Harlem (a racial unit), Greenwich Village (a unit dedicated to the arts and other matters), and there is Radio City (a commercial development), Peter Cooper Village (a housing unit), the Medical Center (a sickness unit) and many other sections each of which has some distinguishing characteristic. But the curious thing about New York is that each large geographical unit is composed of countless small neighborhoods. Each neighborhood is virtually self-sufficient. Usually it is no more than two or three blocks long and a couple of blocks wide. Each area is a city within a city within a city. Thus, no matter where you live in New York, you will find within a block or two a grocery store, a barbershop, a newsstand and shoeshine shack, an ice-coal-and-wood cellar (where you write your order on a pad outside as you walk by), a dry cleaner, a laundry, a delicatessen (beer and sandwiches delivered at any hour to your door), a flower shop, an undertaker's parlor, a movie house, a radio-repair shop, a stationer, a haberdasher, a tailor, a drugstore, a garage, a tearoom, a saloon, a hardware store, a liquor store, a shoe-repair shop. Every block or two, in most residential sections of New York, is a little main street. A man starts for work in the morning and before he has gone two hundred yards he has completed half a dozen missions: bought a paper, left a pair of shoes to be soled, picked up a pack of cigarettes, ordered a bottle of whiskey to be dispatched in the opposite direction against his home-coming, written a message to the unseen forces of the wood cellar, and notified the dry cleaner that a pair of trousers awaits call. Homeward bound eight hours later, he buys a bunch of pussy willows, a Mazda bulb, a drink, a shine—all between the corner where he steps off the bus and his apartment. So complete is each neighborhood, and so strong the sense of neighborhood, that many a New Yorker spends a lifetime within the confines of an area smaller than a country village. Let him walk two blocks from his corner and he is in a strange land and will feel uneasy till he gets back.

White, Here, pp. 35-6.

New York as an assembly of cells or cadres which he must syndicalize, a hive of separate neighborhoods, each with its own economic specialism.

Conrad, p. 189.

Storekeepers are particularly conscious of neighborhood boundary lines. A woman friend of mine moved recently from one apartment to another, a distance of three blocks. When she turned up, the day after the move, at the same grocer’s that she had patronized for years, the proprietor was in ecstasy—almost in tears—at seeing her. “I was afraid,” he said, “now that you’ve moved away I wouldn’t be seeing you any more.” To him, away was three blocks, or about seven hundred and fifty feet.

Berger, New York, p. 4.

The city’s microcosms, synchronized but unaware of one another.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 620.

Weekend

Sunday morning in Manhattan. This is the most peaceful time of the whole week. Everything is so quiet... no traffic noises... and no crime either. People are just too exhausted for anything. The Sunday papers, all bundled up, are thrown on the sidewalk in front of the still-closed candy stores and newspaper stands. New Yorkers like their Sunday papers, especially the lonely men and women who live in furnished rooms. They leave early to get the papers... they get two. One of the standard-size papers, either the Times or Tribune... they’re thick and heavy, plenty of reading in them, and then also the tabloid Mirror... to read Winchell and learn all about Cafe Society and the Broadway playboys and their Glamour Girl Friends. Then back to the room... to read and read... to drive away loneliness ... but one tires of reading. One wants someone to talk to, to argue with, and yes, someone to make love to. How about a movie—NO—too damn much talking on the screen. “But Darling I do love you... RAHLLY I do,”... then the final clinch with the lovers in each others arms... then it’s even worse, to go back alone to the furnished room... to look up at the ceiling and cry oneself to sleep.

Sunday morning is the only time these cuties get a chance to get cleaned up... while the store is closed... they are taken from the store window... their garments with price tags removed... and given a thorough scrubbing... the mannequins are patterned after the current Hollywood movie glamour stars... and are worth their weight in gold, each one costing a few hundred dollars. [Window Display]
Ibid, p. 15.

The weekend is not so much longed for as tumbled across by accident.
Bladford, p. 119.

Weekends are but a hiatus in money-making.
Ibid., p. 183.

There is Saturday, but Saturday is not much better than Monday through Friday. Saturday is the day for errands in New York. More millions of shoppers are pouring in to keep the place jammed up. Everybody is bobbing around, running up to Yorkville to pick up those arty cheeses for this evening, or down to Fourth Avenue to try to find the Van Vechten book, Parties, to complete the set for somebody, or off to the cleaner's, the dentist's, the hairdresser's.
Wolfe, Kandy, p. 295.

I hate Sundays: there's nothing open except plant stores and bookstores.
Warhol, Philosophy, p. 133.

On Sunday the city ceases to be anything, the streets being empty and the buildings deprived of their meaning... Sunday is an astonishing touchstone which, for twenty-four hours, can cause the collapse of this magnificent city which, in its essence, is still a Babel.
Corbusier, p. xv.

Sunday has come and with it creeps into the empty street all the life that for the other six days bides its time till night and gives no sign of existence.
Campbell, Knox, p. 50.

The grey depression of a musical Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 566.

 Chronicle

George Bellows, just before his death, patiently expounding his defense of an alleged indecent picture: "Art strives for form and hopes for beauty."... Jed Harris, sitting at a prizefight and undergoing more intense agony than either man in the ring... . Dr. John Roach Stratton, of the sepulchral voice, pointing to the rude chairs which he had made for his bride years before and declaring, "You know, the Master was a carpenter."... Owney Madden, turning to Walter Winchell and snarling, "You louse! You think you know so much about Broadway and you never heard of Doody Broderick!"... Charles Francis Potter, the Humanist, and his admiring tales of the great deeds of Oom the Omnipotent... . William J. Guard, looking more like Robert Louis Stevenson than Stevenson looked, lying in his coffin... . Frederic MacMonnies, the sculptor of "Civic Virtue" in City Hall Park, defending his private opinion that it was the best of his works... My first meeting with Edwin C. Hill, the great reporter, who mistook me for an office boy... A last train ride with James J. Corbett, obviously dying but able to growl in his rich baritone, “I’ll be all right, boys.”... Whit Burnett and the amazing brown beard which he brought back from Majorca... Texas Guinan, one afternoon in the old Stork Club, whispering to a friend, “I hear they snatched Big Frenchy last night.”... J. Frank Dobie, the “Pancho” of the brush country in the Southwest, patiently enduring a literary tea... .
Walter Davenport the night in Jimmy Kelly’s, when he believed the Apache dance was real and chivalrously rose to the defense of the girl...
The old San Quentin graduate who gave me the friendly smile as I picked him out of a line-up at the Tombs for misdeeds that sent him on a long stretch to Sing Sing... . Keats Speed, most understanding of managing editors, walking seventy feet to say a kind word to a reporter... . Frederic F. Van de Water, tall and white-haired, and his formal greeting, “Good evening, Commissioner.”... Joel Sayre, former bodyguard to Admiral Koichak, giving the supreme rendition of “Frankie and Johnny.”... Captain Stephen Norton Bobo, leaping from his automobile to paint a landscape that had attracted him... . Herbert Hoover, as Secretary of Commerce, reading in a dull monotone a speech he had written for a small gathering at the old Waldorf... . Senator Huey Long, king of the canebreaks, sitting up in bed in the New Yorker Hotel eating peanuts... . Don Skene’s definition of an old cow-country word:
A maverick is a lamister dogey.”... Dashiell Hammett’s old assignment when he worked for the Pinkertons—to find a Ferris wheel which had been stolen in Sacramento, California... . Cameron Rogers, in top hat, morning coat and striped trousers, touring the countryside on New Year’s Day in a rented Rolls-Royce... . A memory of Richard A. Knight, now the most amusing of New York lawyers: a little boy with a large head riding a bicycle down Guadalupe Street, Austin, Texas, and reciting Byron aloud...
. Henry L. Mencken, barging down Fifth Avenue during the dull days of the Coolidge administration and wishing for another war... . Ruth Hale, wife of Heywood Broun and most articulate of the Lucy Stoners, denouncing me in Barney Gallant’s for some ancient injustice... . John Nance Garner, Vice-President of the United States, and his friend, Edward Angly, newspaper man and author of Oh, Yeah!”, taking a drink, which they called striking a blow for Liberty.”... James W. Elliott, of the old Business Builders, sitting at a table at the Algonquin and expounding the technique of selling cemeteries... . James J. Montague’s stories of his long service with the quixotic William Randolph Hearst...
. Alice Roosevelt Longworth giving her dinner-table parody of her cousin, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, speaking over the radio, a great bit of mimicry... . The deadly, close-clipped command of Captain Patrick McVeigh of New York Police Headquarters as he turned to his strong-arm squad during a raid on a clip”: Toss this joint in the street.”... The gentle Adolph, who cultivated tobacco plants on the rooftop speakeasy, now closed, where Dudley Field Malone once had had his pent house... . The proud terror of Herbert Asbury the week he thought he had been threatened by gangsters... . The pathetic incredulity of Geoffrey Parsons when he was told that, in many parts of the country, cemeteries are the most popular spots of assignation... . Ring W.
Lardner, coming in drenched after the Dempsey-Tunney fight at Philadelphia and announcing that Tunney would be the most popular champion since Tommy Burns.”... Gene Buck, sentimental old song writer, propounding his belief that when love is weighed against duty and all else, “one woman’s hair is stronger than the Atlantic cable.”... Gene Fowler joining me one Sunday afternoon in hiring an open hansom cab to convey us to a meeting of hoboes on the East Side, where James Eads How presided... . William Muldoon, the Solid Man, sitting in his ‘hygienic institute’ in Westchester and showing his sentimental side his deep affection for Kid McCoy, the bad boy of pugilism... . Owen Oliver, who, when past sixty, smoked twelve cigars a day and walked from his office at 280 Broadway to his home in Yonkers... . Robert Livingstone, New York’s first bluestocking reporter, and his memories of Paddy the Pig, once-famous dive keeper. . . Martin W. Littleton, lawyer, eating at the Lunch Club of Wall Street and pointing to another lawyer with the remark that “there goes an astridulent zither.”... . Owen P. White, the grizzled plainsman, and his tales of the feuds and tangled politics of New Mexico... . Hector Fuller, who was Jimmy Walker’s writer of scrolls for distinguished guests during the years of the Great Madness, and his embarrassment when he erroneously referred to Queen Marie of Roumania as “Your Imperial Highness.”... . John Francis Curry, close-mouthed leader of Tammany Hall, in the days when he was a district leader and a writer of eloquent and bitter letters... . William J. Fallon, criminal lawyer, putting on one of the greatest shows of his life conducting the defense in the Bronx of a little chauffeur named Fritz, on trial for killing his sweetheart, and getting an acquittal... . Louis Bromfield, in the days when he worked for the Associated Press and toured the newspaper offices late at night checking up on dull items... . Frank Sullivan, fresh from Saratoga Springs, in the precarious days when he and I were cubs under William A. Willis on the old Herald at Herald Square... . Silliman Evans, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General under the New Deal, and the time he was almost fired from a paper for spelling “sergeant” correctly because his boss thought it was spelled “sargent.”... . The astonishingly pointed nose of Felix, major-domo at Madame Mon’s place in Bleecker Street... . Griffo, once the most scientific of fighters, sitting in his later days, bloated and coarse, catching live flies with his lightning-like paws and releasing them unhurt for the amusement of street gamins. . . William O. McGeehan, the old Sheriff, explaining to a young man who had been drinking too much that one particular specter, a sinister fellow with hip boots, dinner jacket and fireman’s helmet, was a harmless fellow once you got to know him... . The curious belief of many persons that Edward P. Mulrooney, former Police Commissioner and now in control of New York State’s beer, is a heavy drinker, while the truth is that he never drank, not even 3.2% beer.... . Harry Staton, former circus press agent, singing hymns from o’clock in the afternoon until 3 o’clock in the morning and getting them all perfect... . Bob Clifford, managing genius of society funerals, arguing that William Jennings Bryan should not be buried in Arlington Cemetery. . . Leo Newman, the ticket broker, who, when meeting a new acquaintance, likely as not will pull out a new necktie and give it to him... . Georges Carpentier and the beautiful women who lolled about him on the porch of his training camp at Manhasset the day after he was beaten by Dempsey in 1921... . Julius Tannen, the monologist, coming back to New York in 1933 with an iron-gray toupee making him almost unrecognizable .... Abner Rubien, the great mouthpiece, telling about what a whale of a wrestler he was at Cornell... . Nunnally Johnson, deeply moved at the funeral of Zip, the circus freak. . . Percy Hammond, quivering with fright the day after he had been gypped in a fly-by-night speakeasy, and his relief when the place was broken up. . . Chester T. Crowell, who can eat three heaping plates of tripe in an Italian restaurant, and who, though highly literate, pronounces it clen’th and stren’th.”... E. E. Paramore, author of the immortal “Ballad of Yukon Jake,” sitting in a corner at the Brevoort... . Beverly Smith, the old quarter-miler of Johns Hopkins, who, though the most cynical of men, writes success stories for a magazine... . Armstead R. Holcombe, the good gray editor, at whose behest I once had the prostitutes chased off Riverside Drive... William Archer Sholto Douglas, author of 'The End of Oofty-Goofy,' who made himself an expert on the dialect and folkways of many parts of America... Clare Briggs, in the days before his last illness, when he wore a yellow coat, wing collar and stick, hat cocked on one side and was the life of the party... Richard Reagan, who covers the New York waterfront, and his practically interminable recollection of the time when he almost became a Trappist monk... Enrico Caruso, the day he was able to leave the Vanderbilt after his long illness... Reginald A. Wilson, the Canadian, handsomest of all reporters, who dropped dead on the station platform in Albany... Charles B. Falls, proud of his lithograph of the old Everleigh Club in Chicago as it looks today... John F. Hylan, former Mayor, and his splendid denunciations of what he called "art artists."... Herbert Bayard Swope in a poker game with Gerhard M. Dahi, a battle to the death between the two greatest extraverts of the Western World... James Stephens, the Irish writer, drinking Irish whisky in the home of the late Cornelius J. Sullivan, New York lawyer... Nicholas Murray Butler, and his anger when it was called to his attention following a speech at the Metropolitan Opera House that he had said "neutrality don't."... Julian Starkweather Mason and his elegant long cigarette holders... Lucius Beebe and his Tattersall waistcoats... The touching grief of Thyra Samter Winslow at the death of her pet dog, Lobo, a superannuated Pomeranian... The explanation of Joab H. Banton, former District Attorney of New York County, that the initial RH didn't stand for anything but was there merely because he liked it... Col. Oscar H. Fogg refusing to acknowledge the greetings of a man he didn't like at a dinner at the Astor, and remarking to no one in particular, I like clean things."... James W. Barrett's lengthy song which he developed from a limerick based upon the doings of the late Chile Mapocha Acuna, stool pigeon of the vice squad... Silas Bent and his patronizing greeting of Young man... Julian Street Jr. being bawled out by his father-in-law, Frank A. Vanderlip, for being late at a lunch at the Union League Club... Laurence Stallings, before the days of What Price Glory, expounding his theories of literature over a table at the Newspaper Club... Eddie Jackson, the photographer, and his almost reverential love for the memory of Woodrow Wilson... The jokes cracked by the late Harry Reichenbach, press agent, when District Attorney Edward Swann summoned him in connection with a fake drowning in the Central Park lake... Detective Edward T. V. Fitzgerald of Headquarters, who, when pressed, will exhibit a bullet imbedded just below the skin in the calf of his leg... Bruce Gould, sitting at the Rhinelander annulment trial in 1925, barely able to control his amusement at the fantastic evidence... Frank W. Wozencraft, once the boy Mayor of Dallas, Texas, learning the ropes of New York, from the University Club bar to Madison Square Garden... Earl Carroll, pale-faced, long-haired and smiling wanly, lunching at the Lambs... Joe Cook and his fabulous place at Lake Hopatcong, New Jersey, where, in the living room, are suspended every imaginable object that is no larger than a man's hand... Dexter Fellows, the great circus press agent, who, when told that the show was stupendous and dazzling, waved his hand depreciation and said, 'I wouldn't go that far.'... An afternoon in a New York apartment listening to the greatest tale of adventure of the twenties, the story of J. Frank Norfleet, the Texas rancher who lost his life's savings to a gang of confidence men and who trailed them to the ends of the earth and caught them all... Al Smith, on his way to a Democratic picnic in Chicago in 1925, sitting up most of the night on the train singing old songs... Walter Howey, drinking brandy in a drawing room on a Pennsylvania Railroad train and telling of the old days in Chicago newspaperdom, the days of The Front Page.”. . . The yachting parties of Larry Schwab and the fast set of the North Shore of Long Island... Steve Hannegan’s tale of his wild, lonely drive through the Middle West to find his favorite surgeon and have his appendix removed... Kent Watson, who, in the early days of prohibition in New York, accompanied the agents on most of their liquor raids... Phil Stong, who once hung around the Criminal Courts Building but who later made money and had Young Otto come to his apartment to give him boxing lessons... Freddie Wildman, now planning to import wine from France in large quantities, engaged in long conversation with John Perrona, proprietor of the old Bath Club in West Fifty-third street... Father Wilfrid Parsons, one of the most articulate, engaging and realistic of priests... Whitney Bolton, the most Broadway-struck young man who ever came from South Carolina... Larry Smits, the bald lion of the tea parties... B. O. McAnney and his realistic imitations of tree frogs, best performed late at night... Stuart P. Sherman, who came to New York a shy professor from the Middle West and had begun to like the place before he was drowned... Gene Tunney, delivering a lecture to a panhandler who had poked his head into Tunney’s cab, and then giving the bum a quarter... The late Harriette Underhill, motion picture critic, who came back to Broadway from Saranac to work and die... The Rev. J. H. Randolph Ray of the Little Church Around the Corner and the ex-convict forger whom he sought to befriend, to no purpose... Harold Ross and his almost pathological fear of crossing bridges in a cab... Dan Williams, the crusading editor, and his gestures as he inveighs against evil... Lulu Volimer, when she lived in Eighth Street before she wrote the play, “Sun-Up.”... The exciting wedding of Morris Gilbert in the old church in Hudson Street... George Gray Barnard, hair waving, discoursing in organ tones in an apartment in West Seventy-second Street... Holger Lundberg, the Swedish poet, who can say Thank you” in more different ways than any man in New York... Justice Peter Schmuck of the New York Supreme Court, explaining that he drew upon Carlyle for his amazing prose style, which is the marvel of the New York bar... James Thurber, very tired, sitting quietly fondling a French poodle... Ross Santee, the artist, as gentle a soul as ever came out of the desert... Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., who, as a cub reporter on the old Herald, used to come to work in his automobile, a strange sight in those days... Oliver H. P. Garrett, who is now wealthy in Hollywood, and his consuming fear the night before he left New York that he would not make good... The spectacle of David Belasco and Benny Leonard in earnest conversation at a prizefight... The Hahn girls from Chicago—Helen, Emily and Josephine and how they captured New York... Isabel Ross, who suffers dreadfully from seasickness but who passes most of her spare time on the ocean... Dorothy Parker, the night she set out fessional sports, and his identification of a popular character, “Just a con man, but a nice guy.”... The night in the Park Avenue Club where I saw Bill Corum for the first time since 1920... The night in 1920 when Tris Speaker, then manager of the Cleveland Indians, came into Moore’s restaurant with his ballplayers and all shucked off their coats because it was so hot... The curious truth, probably of little importance, that there are two Tony Weirs; one Tony Weir, a big fellow, used to be a bartender at the Knickerbocker, while the other, a short man, has looked out for the public welfare both before and during prohibition... Tim Shine, old saloonkeeper and the yarns of how he kept every cent he ever made... Paul Mellon, son of Andrew W. Mellon, sitting in a café and planning to go to work for a bank... Tony Muto, who got the “bends” by going down with the sand-hogs under the Hudson to write a story about it... John Stewart Bryan, the tall, gray, Virginia publisher, and the night he was charged with being head of the Confederate Army... William Macbeth and Wilbert Robinson, rotund and Rabelaisian, and great friends... Sam Untermyer, Mephisto, flower-lover, great lawyer, riding through the Bronx in his Mercedes late at night and quoting Tennyson’s Locksley Hall. “...Lawrence Tibbett, fresh from one of his early triumphs at the Metropolitan Opera House, dropping in at a near-by oasis... Larry Fay at 4 o’clock in the morning sitting with a beautiful woman in Reuben’s... Joseph Shalleck, criminal lawyer, reeling into a political headquarters in the old Hotel Marbleboro one night, bleeding from a beating suffered at the polls... Franklin D. Roosevelt, tall, lean, dark, amazingly alert and eloquent, captivating a group of women in an uptown club with a speech just before he was stricken with infantile paralysis... Marquis (Gimpy) Curtis, one of the smartest of criminals, being captured by Detectives under Inspector John D. Coughlin in an apartment on the West Side... Dr. Francis Carter Wood, the cancer specialist, and his lifetime work of exposing fake cancer cures... David Hirshfield, later a Magistrate, trying to joke with a waitress at the lunch counter of the Hotel Pennsylvania... Mike Haggerty’s terse description of a garment worn by one of the women involved in the murder of Joseph Bowne Elwell... Artie Hitchman, the little ticket hawker, the freshest kid on Broadway... John McHugh Stuart, the mysterious journalist who brought about the conference which resulted in the forming of the Irish Free State... Richard Maney’s first remark on recovering consciousness after having been knocked out by a Jew whom he had been chaffing in a barroom: Custer in the Ghetto. “... Donald Henderson Clarke, returns come in on the night of the Roosevelt landslide... Jack Johnson, the big smoke, giving an afternoon sermon on clean living in a Harlem Negro church... William Travers Jerome, in his last fling in support of reform in the municipal election of 1921, smoking innumerable cigarettes and snarling his scorn of loose public officials... Inspector John J. Sullivan, in charge of New York detectives, presiding at the line-up of criminals at Headquarters and tearing into each prisoner with a savagery that suggested that he must have done something to Sullivan personally... An unfortunate brawl at Reuben’s old place on Broadway, which ended with two beautiful women carrying out a battered and unconscious actor head first... Morris Tremaine, Comptroller of the State of New York, having a glass of legal beer with the boys and discoursing upon the excellent quality of a forthcoming bond issue... Detective Hugh Sheridan, gray-haired, probably the most suave and gentlemanly of all of New York’s thug-hunters... Harry Benge Crozier telling everybody that he had just rediscovered O. Henry and found him great... The amazing energy of Grantland Rice, probably due to clean living... Louis Fehr, heftiest of New York journalists, who can, and does, toss off a Scotch highball in one gulp, which is no mean trick... The unimportant but rather curious fact that I have never met, or seen, or talked over the telephone with O.O. McIntyre... The unbelievable face and the scrambled vocabulary of Phily Lewis (born Luigi Filippi) as he attempted, in Duffy’s Tavern, to conceal the fact that he couldn’t read... The handsome mustaches of Stanley Sackett, manager of the Madison, who looks and acts like an improvement on the visions of Peter Arno... Ned McIntosh, the misanthrope, and his insistence that he must live in a pent-house... Eddie McBride, the veteran artist, and his high-pitched, complaining voice... Dr. John C. Moorhead, great surgeon, and his tales of the broken bones of men from war time on... John D. Rockefeller, Jr., walking with his boys down Fifth Avenue on an Easter morning... Alva Johnston, best of all reporters, doing more work over the telephone in an hour than a dozen leg men could do in a month... Burton Rascoe, stammering in his excitement, recalling the rough old days in Chicago... Ward Greene, and his willingness to forget that he had been reported dead and his obituary printed in full... Jimmy Walker on a Staten Island ferryboat giving advice to a consumptive who was about to go away: "'Don't stand up if you can sit down; don't sit down if you can lie down."... The Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, at eighty-five, sitting in a hotel room just off Broadway and chuckling about how he could hold abiding cynicism of Joseph Mulvaney, Hearst's great rewrite man... Mildred Paxton, the week before she went back to Texas to become the bride of Dan Moody, who later became Governor... Earl Reeves, perfect householder, who can cook, do interior decorating and chop trees... The infinite poses and the essential soundness of Franklin Pierce Adams... Will James, the cowboy artist, puzzled and sick on his first trip to New York... John Bleeck, club owner, and his diatribes against crooked prohibition agents... Robert Barton Peck, who, though busy in New York for more than twenty years, still has his chief interest in the early Indian troubles in Western Pennsylvania... The blush of Joseph Phillips, who, excepting Irvin S. Cobb, is the only man ever to come from Paducah, Kentucky... Heywood Broun trying to disguise himself so he could pass the night in the Municipal Lodging House without being recognized, a palpably impossible feat... John W. Goff, New York's last Recorder, at the reception for Eamonn de Valera in 1920... The dinner table banter of Alexander Woollcott... An evening with Frank E. Campbell, the undertaker, at Janssen's old place, and his straightfaced, blood-chilling jocosity... The girl who used to smuggle notes out of prison for her sweetheart, in the belief that, somehow, he might get out in less than ten years... Jack Sharkey, in his hotel room, yelling to a waiter to throw a raw steak through the transom instead of bringing in an ordinary dinner... A murderous appetite, and a breakfast of bacon and eggs near the water at Fire Island... A little island in Lake George, amid the clear water, where there are neither bucket shops nor clip joints nor traffic jams... A roof on Central Park South, very late at night, with no noise except distant music and the low hum of far-off motor cars... A walk along the Palisades at dawn, and the sight of New York's skyline unfolding and the city coming to life... The unforgettable sound of a human head hitting a concrete floor... Time for one more before we catch the train.

Walker, pp. 298-321.
Robert Mapplethorpe was the 1970s leather-clad equivalent of the great dandies and decadents of the nineteenth century—Beardsley, Oscar Wilde, Huysmans, Baudelaire. What made his personality so intriguing were the same qualities found in his work—the chilling contrast between the viciousness of his sexuality and the grace and finesse of his personal style. Mapplethorpe embodied both Dionysian and Apollonian qualities—Dionysus being the "god of frenzy" and Apollo "the god of proportion and form."
Morrisroe, p. 181.

Verlaine, Rimbaud, Smith, Mapplethorpe; we are dealing here with a network of homage and swapped destinies, like Piaf and Cocteau, people who would die within minutes of each other.
Ibid., p. 209.

A Rimbaud of the baths.
Didion, Some Nomen, N. pag.

A perverse Oscar Wilde—meets—Duchamp reworking of the highly charged imagery of church and state.
Morrisroe, p. 272.

Of his childhood he said, "I come from suburban America. It was a very safe environment and it was a good place to come from in that it was a good place to leave."

Robert will always be a figure of bizarre fascination. He’s no Oscar Wilde. He never produced in photography, no matter how much his "perfect moments" are touted, anything as good as The Importance of Being Ernest, which is the perfect symbol of comedy.
Fritscher, p. 78.

Mapplethorpe is virtually a retroversion of The Picture of Dorian Gray. Certainly, in court and controversy, Mapplethorpe is this fin de siècle’s Wilde with a Hasselblad.
Ibid., p. 78.

He was as fated as Byron, Shelley, and Keats to die prematurely, the same as James Byron Dean, Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin and his famous look-alike, the poet-singer of the perverse, Jim Morrison of The Doors.
Ibid., p. 6.

Half in love with mournful death, Robert particularly worshipped rock star Jim Morrison, the pouty Botticelli lead singer of The Doors. Robert physically resembled Morrison and, after the singer’s mysterious death in Paris, in July 1971, Robert, three years younger than Morrison, began to assume the dead singer’s look, attitude, and doomed-angel leather-style straight out of auto-cide James Dean.
Ibid., p. 171.

An androgynous Burton and Taylor.
Ibid., p. 25.
The Diaghilev milieu would have suited Robert very well.
Ibid., p. 72.

Patti Smith may have been his Mona Lisa odalisque, but Isadora Duncan is the woman most inherently presage of Mapplethorpe.
Ibid., p. 101.

Mapplethorpe was typical of those deliberately artificial artists, somewhat like Gustav Moreau, who helped begat Art Nouveau. Moreau and that group admired in Michelangelo’s figures what they took to be the “ideal somnambulism” of Michelangelo’s figures.
Ibid., p. 130.

Derivations: works reference the Bible, Baudelaire, Beardsley, Rimbaud, George Platt Lynes, and George Dureau, but all reimagined through the identifiable Mapplethorpe Spin—that confrontational edge to render his sources more controversial and commercial.
Ibid., p. 184.

He aspired to a code of conduct hardly typical of his times, somewhere between dandyism and gentlemanliness.

He is fascinated by the satanic and confronts his night-based world with the elegant and melancholic stance of the dandy. He stumbles through the day like a sleepwalker, but comes alive and charged with energy after dark. He uses the photographer’s lamp as though it were an artificial moon.
Chatwin, p. 9.

His classic narcissism was perfect for the seventies.
Fritscher, p. 102.

Ezra Pound once wrote that “the age demanded an image of its accelerated grimace,” and Mapplethorpe provided his age with the very image it required.
White, Altars, p. 129.

That crucial “moment,” not yet a “perfect moment,” was that nano-second when Robert “came out” from heterosexuality into the which homosexuality that would certify him as genuinely avant-garde.
Fritscher, p. 70.

He was his own greatest object.
Ibid., p. 99.

Mapplethorpe seemed incapable of handling even the most basic tasks: he couldn’t compose business letters, couldn’t be bothered to eat lunch.
Morrisroe, p. 255.

Robert complains about people who say the word apple in Mapplethorpe; he hates it worse when I call him “Nipplethorpe.”
Fritscher, p. 59.

Robert is so urbane and cool and classic.
Ibid., p. 62.
Mapplethorpe would stamp his foot to get people to pay attention.

He likes cameras, Coke, kooks, and Crisco.

He was five feet ten inches and 150 pounds, hung about six inches and virtually without body hair.

Robert’s wafer-thin, drug-waif body, adroitly abstracted by black leather, was unimportant, really, compared with his head. More specifically, his face, especially his eyes, and, despite his androgynous inability to grow a real beard, his triumph of black faun-hair and aggressive Pan-teeth captured people’s attention.

Robert hated bodybuilding the way he hated blacks; he couldn’t get enough.

He is, in fact, his Hasselblad. His camera eye peels faces, bodies, and trips.

He rearranges reality in his SoHo loft in Manhattan. His studio is his space for living, balling, and shooting. He lunches afternoons at One Fifth Avenue. He maneuvers after midnight at the Mineshaft. He photographs princesses like Margaret, bodybuilders like Arnold, rockstars like his best friend Patti Smith, and night trippers nameless in leather, rubber, and ropes. He’s famous for his photographs of faces, flowers, and fetishes.

Never in his wildest imagination did he think his own son would embrace the holy trinity of parental nightmares: he was an artist, a homosexual, and a pornographer.
Morrisroe, p. 186.

My life began in the summer of 1969. Before that I didn’t exist.

1964 - Mapplethorpe works at the World’s Fair, where he operated the games of chance at the Belgian Pavilion. Sees Warhol’s Ten Most Wanted Men.
Morrisroe, p. 32.

Mapplethorpe on Warhol in 1964: “Someone who knew what he was doing.”

In Mapplethorpe’s loft, looming over the sitting room adjacent to his bedroom was the ultimate symbol of his success—a Warhol silkscreen portrait of Mapplethorpe himself.

The then-editor of Interview did indeed have a crush on Mapplethorpe. “He’s so dirty,” Warhol complained. “His feet smell. He has no money. And that horrible Patti Smith..." Mapplethorpe worried that Warhol was going to steal his ideas and viewed him, perhaps rightfully so, as someone who had sucked the life out of people.

Ibid., p. 140.

January 16, 1978 Mapplethorpe attended a dinner for the artist David Salle at Mr. Chow’s. Andy Warhol refused to sit next to him because, as he later recorded in his diary, “he’s sick.”

Ibid., p. 317.

Warhol longed to be a machine; Mapplethorpe found comfort behind one.

Ibid., p. 359.

Robert charged into the scene and opened it up. He was young, fresh, and coyly abrasive. His bold condescension, his icy coldness to anyone who challenged him, was excitingly assaultive in a decade when theater loved cruelty. He broke the perceived taste of the avant-garde obeying Warhol’s pontifications.

Fritscher, p. 72.

Warhol wrote the sort of book that was Popism, ghost-written, really. Mapplethorpe wrote only letters. Maybe he hadn’t enough intellectual mass to write. He wasn’t well educated. He was great at small talk: deflecting, derailing, trivializing, humoring. I remember him saying that primitive tribes who believed the camera sees the soul were right. Maybe that says everything he had to say about his photography.

Ibid., p. 74.

Like Warhol, who let other people do his work, Mapplethorpe sometimes seemed more into product than art.

Ibid., p. 77.

Andy’s taste ran to the fashionable. Robert tilted more toward the arcane.

Ibid., p. 91.

Robert’s own messy life and formal art, enhanced by drugs and the rags-to-riches mystique of Warhol, defined itself to seesawing through fashion and society, and from art to commerce. Mapplethorpe threw himself headfirst into this trendy world for his rites of passage.

Ibid., p. 97.

At the beginning of 1994, Warhol’s estate was block-priced at $220 million; Mapplethorpe’s $228 million.

Ibid., p. 118.

Mapplethorpe received no substantial cash from Warhol for his photographic work in Interview. He traded his photographs for Andy’s endorsement.

Ibid., p. 196.

Candy Darling, whom Robert shot in 1973, once complained to Robert that it was so dreadfully boring and difficult to find something famous to do everyday.

Ibid., p. 196.
Andy and Robert would have loved fax.
Ibid., p. 196.

Early Mapplethorpe collage of Warhol, found portrait. A tear bisects the right eye and a layer of spray paint delineates a ghostlike finger shape that seems to point to this torn area, emphasizing the fact that what Mapplethorpe selected, painted, and claimed as his own was a photograph of a damaged photograph. His recognition of a photograph as object.

Mapplethorpe codged drugs, sex, leather, superstars, and ideas from the underground movies of Warhol and Anger.
Fritscher, p. 274

I mean the fact that Warhol says, “anything can be art,” and then I can make pornography art.
Kardon, p. 28.

He smiled and introduced himself as “Robert Mapplethorpe, the pornographic photographer.”
Fritscher, p. 181.

I’m a male nymphomaniac.
Ibid., p. 30.

The idea of the homomasculine man.
Morrisroe, p. 164.

Mapplethorpe once joked that he was just a “fag decorator.”
Ibid., p. 179.

Sex is the only thing worth living for.
Ibid., p. 127.

I had many affairs during that period, but I was never into quickie sex. I’ve only slept with maybe a thousand men.
Ibid., p. 189.

Near the bed hung a “masturbation machine,” which he had designed by surrounding a mirror with dozens of white lights that blinked off and on, like a carnival roulette wheel.
Morrisroe, p. 126.

No sex tonight? Then how about some photographs?
Fritscher, p. 177.

Few admit to bedding him. Some who do, say it didn’t work, usually because of the drugs. He was very affectionate, but he wasn’t emotional sex; he was intellectual sex. Accepted for that novelty, he was a stimulating partner, if one likes to have rational sex, which to some is not as torrid as passionate sex. Mapplethorpe used every sexual fetish and gimmick he could find to try to ignite real heat and passion in himself and his work. That’s why he turned to leather, and that’s why he turned to black men, in his quest of the passion’s soul.
Ibid., p. 180.

Art and sex in the seventies are inextricably linked.
Ibid., p. 102.

Mapplethorpe: "You’re afraid to go as far into nasty sex as I want to take you."
Ibid., p. 28.

S&M not as sadism and masochism, but as “sex and magic.”
Morrisroe, p. 145.

Sex is magic. If you channel it right, there’s more energy in sex than there is in art.
Ibid., p. 145.

Sadomasochism was practiced by only a small percentage of the gay population, yet the uniforms and equipment were everywhere in the West Village. S&M accessories, such as studded cuffs, ropes, chains, and bondage masks, were sold at places like the Marquis de Sade and the Pleasure Chest. Artist Robert Morris publicized his April exhibit at the Castelli-Sonabenn Gallery by designing a poster that featured him in a Nazi helmet, his hands manacled to a thick chain attached to his neck. Susan Sontag in her 1974 essay “Fascinating Facism” quotes Morris as saying he considered the picture to be “the only image that still has any power to shock.” Six months later, Italian film director Liliana Cavani brought out The Night Porter, the story of an SS officer who carries on an S&M love affair with one of his former concentration victims. The following year S&M had so infiltrated American consumer culture that it was being used to sell everything from clothes to records.
Ibid., p. 146.

What was so different about Mapplethorpe’s work, and consequently more unsettling, was that instead of a woman being tied up in ropes—a standard pose in straight photography—he had the audacity to turn the tables and reveal a whole universe of submissive men. Helmut Newton could photograph a woman tethered to a bed by a chain around her neck, or another crouched on all fours, with a saddle on her back, and the images were vied as kinky and decadent, for the conjured up a privileged world of Vogue fashion shoots and jet-set society. In comparison, Mapplethorpe’s S&M photographs made no reference to the outside world at all; his men were defined exclusively by their sexual predilections.
Ibid., p. 147.

Mapplethorpe’s signature colors, in his art, were red (blood), purple (the Church), and black (Satanism and the leather culture).
Ibid., p. 153.

He’s a man who knows night territory.
Fritscher, pp. 93-4.

From his observations at the leather bars, he realized he was in a position to become the documentarian of the 1970’s gay S&M scene, but unlike photojournalism, this was a niche that allowed his own sexual compulsions to flourish. He did not approach it as a voyeur, but as an active participant.
Morrisroe, pp. 163-4.
Mapplethorpe’s loft had become a port-of-call for men with every conceivable sexual perversion, and they arrived with suitcases, and sometimes doctor’s bags, filled with catheters, scalpels, syringes, needles, laxatives, hot water bottles, rope, handcuffs, and pills. They dressed up as women, SS troopers, and pigs. One wore baby clothes and a bonnet, drank from a bottle, and defecated in his diapers. “Joe” appeared at the loft in a rubber body suit and Mapplethorpe took a picture of him kneeling on a bench; the tube inserted in his mouth was later connected to an enema bag.

Up until now Mapplethorpe had attempted to steer clear of the “crazies”—men whose sexual proclivities included bodily mutilation—but he had already documented most forms of gay S&M, and since he didn’t want to keep repeating himself, he was open to meeting people with extreme tastes. “Ken,” for example, enjoyed having people carve their initials into his skin. “I think he’s probably dead now,” said Mapplethorpe. “He was totally scarred, like a tree trunk, with initials. He’d just lay there like a piece of beef, and you could do anything you wanted to him. But there was no real energy there. He was a down trip.”

At the time Mapplethorpe photographed “Ken,” he received a call from an art critic who offered to introduce him to someone who derived sexual satisfaction by having someone slash his penis with a razor. Stoned on MDA, Mapplethorpe arrived at the appointed apartment with his camera and met “Richard”—a “mathematician and computer person”—whose penis was strapped into a stock-like device, with a hole in the center and bolts on the side. “Then the scalpel came out. I was told I could be a participant or an observer. I managed to do both. It was hard to focus on the camera, but I found I really got off on this thing. Holding a scalpel in my hand and grazing a cock was a real turn-on. You could feel the energy in your fingers. Another guy went through his number. He came out of a bathroom with a wig, garish makeup, and leotards, but that wasn’t my scene.”

When he had finished taking pictures of Richard’s “crucifixion,” he waited for the other man to strap himself into the contraption so he, too, could submit to the ritual. “Then all of a sudden it was my turn. The other guys were older, and certainly as intelligent as I, and I had certainly been an active participant. But I thought, how am I going to deal with this?” He placed the device over his genitals and tried to divorce himself of the reality of the situation, which was that a man in a curly wig and tights, who was flying high on LSD, was holding a scalpel in his hands. “Okay,” he said, panicking. “I’m not getting off on this. It’s not my thing.”

“I had exhausted the S&M thing. I had gone through it all both photographically and physically, and I was meeting too many guys like Richard. It was getting a little too crazy.”

Ibid., pp. 201-2.

Mapplethorpe’s “Censored” show drew the most colorful opening night crowd, with a cavalcade of leather men, in addition to the local chapter of the Hell’s Angels, who roared up to the gallery on their motorcycles.

Ibid., p. 206.

Initially, he was intimidated by Mapplethorpe’s hardcore reputation and by his sinister loft—“I had never seen a black leather bedspread before.”

Ibid., p. 398.
His Morris chairs and Stickley settee had been upholstered in black leather, which, he believed, reflected an “amorous, masculine quality.”

Chaps were held together on the inside seam by leather thongs. He had tied the thongs of the left leg to that of the right leg, so he could only walk a few inches. A cross-gartered figure hopping around the room. The two of them were as dandified and foppish as anything.

Tuxedo elegance and leather attitude.
Fritscher, p. 24.

A mob scene of white ties, pearls, black leather, and New Wave funk.

Perhaps perversity, that last urban frontier, is avant-garde and retro-garde.

I want you to meet the most polymorphously perverse person I have ever met in my life.

He was not threatening to women or gay men in a decade in which “threat” meant “sexy.”

Leather fetishists found his documentation fresh because he brought the leather world out of the closet. While S&M leathermen lionized his work for a time, they did not buy it. They themselves took hotter pictures of their own sex style. Perhaps his inability to achieve real eros, personally or on film, was the price fate charged him for his careerism.

A dirty jockstrap frames the buttocks.

The leather scene in the seventies was so wild that Mapplethorpe’s work looks like still-life studies when compared to such classic period films as Erotic Hands (three-way handballing), Sebastiane (Derek Jarman’s S&M version of the homoerotic martyrdom of St. Sebastian; a British film, dialogue in Latin, with English subtitles), Wakefield Poole’s Bijou and Moving, and Dave Masur’s Skulls of Akron Fisting Ballet, which was shot at the Mineshaft in New York.
Ibid., p. 188.

Robert deliberately tried to clean the leather scene up to acceptability to push his avant-garde following. He thought the genre legitimate. In fact, he envied director/porn star Fred Halsted, whose films Sextool and L.A. Plays Itself (with the S&M and fisting sequences intact) were purchased for the permanent collection at the Museum of Modern Art.

Robert could not sell the gristy reality of leather.
The reality of leather would be too radical. He had to formalize leather to sell it.
_Ibid._, pp. 188-9.

When it came to real sex, Robert didn't have a clue about leather, fisting or fetish sex. He sometimes seemed like a scared heterosexual posing as a homosexual, putting on his alternate sexuality the way he pulled on his leather pants.
_Ibid._, p. 218.

He pulled from his leather jeans pocket one of those little plastic MDA bags he was always dipping his finger into and shoving up my nose.
_Ibid._, p. 29.

We do not for the most part live our fantasies out, and so they never evolve. But the form of life Mapplethorpe had entered had made of sex a public practice, and this enabled it to evolve in ways quite beyond the power of private fantasy to anticipate. Whatever one might think of it, sex was probably lived more creatively in those years when the barriers to its enactment had fallen than at any other time in history. It had become as public as a language.
_Danto_, p. 8.

Yes, venerated and tongue washed—every limb and crevice of him.
_McCourt_, p. 342.

Before going out at night, he made sure he put on his clothes in exactly the same order; he was careful not to wash beneath his underarms because he believed perspiration odor was vital to his sex appeal. He picked up men in bars by staring at them to see if he could detect "something" in their eyes; those who passed the eyeball test came home with him, but then he had difficulty maintaining an erection unless his partner stared into his own eyes. Sight, he believed, was the most important of all the five senses. If his partner reached a premature climax, Mapplethorpe considered the evening a failure, and no matter what time it was, he would put on his clothes—jeans or leather pants, sometimes a codpiece, shirt, vest, studded leather cuffs, black leather jacket—and return to the West Village.

The scene at the Mineshaft was not about conversation. In fact, you'd be told to leave if you were standing around too long talking about the opera or something. It was a stalking animal thing. I think what happened was that in one concentrated period of our history a whole group of people became addicted to this concept of going out every night and getting laid. It wasn't even a question of having an orgasm. Some of the ways one would end up doing that might seem tragic if viewed from the outside, but it was just to experience that feeling—like the release one gets from exercise—and then you could go home, go to sleep, and move on.

Mapplethorpe had a lifetime pass to the Mineshaft and was there so often he inspired the running joke "Who did you see out last night besides Robert?" Yet he rarely participated in any of the public orgies; he spent most of his time roaming the dimly lit passageways that led to rooms where men were being whipped and chained. There was a bathtub for "watersports" and a jail where "prisoners" were handcuffed or strapped to chairs, and leather slings to facilitate fisting. Mapplethorpe was constantly on the lookout for someone to take home, and the Mineshaft provided him with an opportunity to connect with other men who also venerated sexual excess. "If the average person had ever gone there," said an art critic and biographer, "they would have been horrified. You'd see these incredible models with these great bodies in a sling. They'd be completely drugged, their eyes rolled up in their heads... it would be two fists, three fists. In sexual terms, they saw themselves as Olympic athletes. The next day I'd see some of my female friends, and they'd tease me and say, 'I'm sure you were up to something terrible last night,' and I used to think, 'God, if they only knew, they would faint in horror at the extremities of it.'"

Ibid., p. 190.

Most humans would fail miserably in this environment, designed for bats, hanging stark naked from the ceiling in caves cluttered with dung, catching insects in one's open mouth while flying at high speeds through the night. Not them however – they glory in it.

McCourt, p. 332.

The Mineshaft is in the heart of the meat-packing district, an eerie and fascinating corner of the city sandwiched between Greenwich Street and the Hudson, a strip of warehouses that only comes to life at night, as at most wholesale markets. The pavements are narrow here, as half the area next to the warehouses is raised to form a loading dock, so that when the huge trucks back towards the warehouse entrances, it's easy to send the carcasses swinging off the trucks and into the storage area. These loading docks are sheltered by rusty iron canopies. Metal rails are suspended from the canopies, and to them are attached evil-looking hooks from which dangle immense sides of beef that then rattle their way into the arctic depths of the warehouses.

The street lighting is dim but illumination is provided by the warm glow beaming out of the warehouses, and by flaring fires lit in oil drums by the bums sleeping under the disused canopies—for even though the weather was unseasonably warm, a chill set in if one remained motionless for too long. The roughly paved streets are full of potholes; almost the only traffic here is that of heavy, multi-axled trucks that churn up the paving with their huge tyres. Rows of trucks were parked along the streets, their powerful engines and refrigeration units throbbing away.

This is the meeting place of meat.

We passed a burly driver unloading a bleeding carcass and wiping his scarlet hands on a dingy apron. We stepped gingerly to avoid the blood and grease underfoot; the smell rising from stacked garbage bags awaiting collection was rancid and sharp, pricking the nostrils. And then at the end of the journey, more meat, hunky men in leather and rough denim, their bodies taut with sexual anticipation.

We saw ahead of us a narrow doorway, its yellow welcome surprisingly warm against the blank walls of the deserted warehouses.

We sauntered into the back room. Near the entrance was a cloakroom where you can check your clothes, some or all, and here in the back and down in the basement there were quite a few men naked or wearing jockstraps. It was much darker back here and it took a while for my eyes to adjust. Cubicles lined the rear wall; they didn't have doors, but they did surround occupants with three low walls so that their exertions wouldn't be in full view of the entire room. Slings and straps hung from the ceiling, but weren't in use. The night was still young.

Next to me was a man in black leather, in his 40s, heavy set. Facing him stood another piano mover, a bit younger, wearing a grubby white T-shirt (but then it’s hard to keep your clothes whiter than white down the Mineshaft). They were tweaking each other’s nipples and absentmindedly groping each other as they talked. The younger man was trying to date Mr. Leather. Why they didn’t head for a cubicle and have it off, I didn’t know, and they were talking so quietly that I couldn’t catch all the sub clauses of their negotiation. But I did notice that every sentence uttered by the younger man ended with ‘sir’: ‘Can I call you tomorrow, sir?’ ‘I would like that very much, sir.’ Voluntary enslavement before my very eyes.

My attention was diverted by some activity on a curious wooden construction in front of us. It was not unlike an easel: two ladders at 45 degrees met at the top to form an apex, and two men were about to demonstrate its uses. A naked man leaned face down against the ladder, so that the length of his body was within easy reach. Behind him stood a Nazi. I use that term as shorthand for a standardized brute wearing jacket, trousers, boots, and a peaked cap, all in black leather; optional extras include studded gauntlets, bikers’ insignia, and a chain or two. This Nazi was wielding a crop with which he was slowly whacking the buttocks before him. The slow beating went on for some time, after which the naked man heaved himself off the wooden frame. His place was taken by the Nazi.

We crossed the room, where there was a good deal of coming and going, coming and blowing, and descended a rickety staircase to what felt like a basement, but was in fact the street level. Down there were three or four rooms and passageways. I found it hard to keep my bearings. The smell hit me first: dampness, the sharp whiff of amyl nitrate, and the equally pungent aroma of piss. Sanitary facilities at the baths and bars leave much to be desired, and in the Mineshaft, or at least down at the coalface, bodily functions too are tendered as sexual coinage.

Here in this dank hole there were fewer clothes than upstairs, partly because of the warmth of the fetid atmosphere and partly because the sexual activity was in full spate. There were more cubicles, more slings, more leather thongs hanging on chains from the roof, and from dark corners came the sounds of slurping and the thwack of callused palm or leather strap coming down hard on undulating buttocks.

I had to sidestep deftly to avoid another Nazi going at it hammer and tongs. This thug was stocky and orange-bearded, and his jacket seemed to be delightfully decorated with ball bearings he’d probably split with his teeth. He was standing over a younger man, similarly attired, and with teeth clenched and head thrown back the Nazi was masturbating.

This, however, was harmless fun compared to what was going on in the next room. The smell alerted me, as did the slipperiness of the concrete floor. The room contained two deep metal bathtubs. In one of them crouched a plump and sodden man. Encircled by other men who were pissing on him, he kept shifting his position to catch the full steamy force of these arcs of urine. To my astonishment he was clothed, and his wringing wet T-shirt, by now blotchy yellow in colour, was kneaded and pressed by many eager hands. So, never shake hands with anyone at the Mineshaft; you never know where they’ve been. Later on we passed the bathtub again and this time there were two men in it sharing the golden shower. Piss and sweat, piss and sweat.

It was four in the morning by the time we stepped out onto the pavement. I’d expected the street to be deserted here in the belly of the night, but not a bit of it: there was a queue of cabs waiting by the kerb. It was odd to think of those sweaty, pissy, fucked-out men in uniform stumbling out of the Mineshaft in the wee hours and falling into waiting cabs that would take them back home.

I thought we'd try the Spike and so we headed up Eleventh Avenue along the river's edge. The street was full of men, some just walking to and fro, others plainly hustling as they leaned against parked cars or stood in doorways. A small group of what could have been mistaken for Hell's Angels without their bikes loitered outside the Spike. It had just closed. So we walked back down Eleventh and then down West Street as far as The Ramrod, probably the most notorious of the Village leather bars, since it was here that some years ago a trigger-happy goon who hated gays opened fire on a crowd similar to the one now gathered outside its door. Most of these men, it appeared, were simply hanging about nurturing the hope of finding a body and a bed for the night.

It was 5:15 Like a number of similar establishments in the West Village, it has a back room. As we walked into the shop I could hear a sound I had learned to recognize: leather against flesh, followed by the groans of the happy whackee. But I no longer wanted to look at more bodies in sexual travail. I wasn't tired, but I had decidedly had enough, and said so.

Brook, pp. 162-8.

Are we talking, darling, about what is coming or came down at the Mineshaft? What flecks of gold in the sluice of the experience?

McCourt, p. 322.

Wally Wallace was founding owner of the Mineshaft, which was to male sex and drugs what CBGB was to punk music and drugs and what Studio 54 was to celebrity schmoozing and drugs. The three clubs' name lists overlapped. Not everyone went to CBGB or Studio 54, but sooner or later everyone came to the Mineshaft, where sex, not status, ruled.

Fritscher, p. 209.

The Mineshaft was opened in October 1976 and was closed on November 7, 1985, by the New York City Department of Health.

Ibid., p. 209.

Between 1979 and 1980, Robert was the "official" Mineshaft photographer. Wally Wallace asked Robert to shoot a party at the club. Robert worked dutifully but he was unable to shoot in the paparazzi style required so he hid or destroyed the party negatives. Robert, in an uncontrolled environment, could not shoot from the hip. In October 1979, he shot David O'Brien, that year's Mr. Mineshaft, at the bootblack's stand where inferiors shined the shoes and worshipped the boots of superiors.

Ibid., p. 190.

The place smelled of the usual telltale mix of Crisco, poppers, and smoke. The lights were low, throbbing disco pounded out from the large-reel tape deck. Candles, maybe a hundred of them, all different shapes and sizes, flickered across the room.

Ibid., p. 36.

One night, Robert, quite thrilled, said he had seen Mick Jagger turned away at the door, not because he was Mick Jagger, which counted for nothing once inside, but because he was with a woman. Women, disguised as men, often made it into the Mineshaft. In fact, more than one woman, aided in disguise by her escort Mapplethorpe, spent a splendid night of active orality and fisting at the Mineshaft.

Mapplethorpe sometimes became so desperate for sexual contact that he prowled the Bowery picking up homeless black men. When asked about getting diseases, Mapplethorpe answered, “They’re okay if you give them a bath. And besides, they’re the least likely people to have diseases because nobody else wants them.”

On Max’s: “I hated going there, but I had to.”

Fritscher, p. 68.

Ogle the fist-fuckers and the Glory Holes, and then return to Xanadu.

Haden-Guest, p. 105.

Cruising was completed, and, despite the “politically correct” changes, gave the best cinéma vérité take on the real seventies leather subculture of masculine-identified men ever seen in a commercial Hollywood film.

Anyone wanting to know the texture of all-male leather nightlife in the seventies will witness in Cruising the pop-sex world that Mapplethorpe cleaned up for museum consumption.

Available on video, the film can be scanned slowly, the VCR put on pause, and surviving denizens of that wonderfully decadent decade can recognize he faces of once-familiar friends and famous “Sex Stars of the NY Night” whom Friedkin hired as atmosphere extras.

Cruising is a virtual documentary of a night in the life of Robert.

Fritscher, p. 284.

He boldly advertised his own coprophiliac tendencies by wearing a belt that spelled the word “SHIT” in metal studs, yet he was evasive with people he thought might be repulsed by his activities, and coyly referred to his own fetish as “dirty.” He hinted at the origins of his fixations, in a 1978 self-portrait that was taken at the prompting of a German art director named Helmut, who, after agreeing to reveal his “secret,” pressed the photographer to divulge his own. Mapplethorpe inserted the handle of a bullwhip into his anus and glared defiantly at the camera.

He developed a worldwide network of coprophiliacs who visited Bond Street whenever they were in town, and who spoke of excrement as the “ultimate sacrament.” He often boasted of his sexual prowess and believed he had cultivated his senses to a far greater degree than anyone else he know. Yet to reach a point where one can eroticize excrement involves a certain shutting down of the senses, and while Mapplethorpe proudly maintained he was not a voyeur, he derived his greatest pleasure from watching others consume his excrement—an act of perverse voyeurism. Perhaps his chilly detachment explains why many men found him to be utterly devoid of sensuality, a cold-blooded angel figure, curiously unisexual for someone who was supposed to be so sexual.

Dr. Larry Downs, Mapplethorpe’s physician, repeatedly advised him to stop his coprophiliac obsession with feces, but since he failed to follow the doctor’s advice, he was continually battling parasites and spreading them to his sexual partners. Worn down by stomach cramps and diarrhea.

Ibid., p. 269.

On May 21, 1978, he wrote: “It’s midnight... I almost forgot to tell you. I let some creep stick his hand up my ass. I’ve been fisted—even came—but I think I prefer being the giver. I can’t help but to give preferential treatment to the feeding process. I want to see the devil in us all. that’s my real turn on. The MDS is coming on stronger.
I have to take a dump but I’ll save it. I’m sure somebody out there is hungry. It’s time to get myself together, pack my skin in leather. The package is always important. goodnight for now. I feel the pull to the West Side. The night is getting older. Love, Robert.”

Fritscher, p. 31.

Fisting, many think, is the last taboo to be incorporated into male sportfucking. They better think again. Scatology, from ritual to anointing to communion, is the latest rage among sexual sophisticates who pay Robert court.

Ibid., p. 41.

“With scat, I make myself invulnerable. I build up my resistance to everything.”

Ibid., p. 172.

Rear nudes, which have long been socially acceptable, were made very shocking by Mapplethorpe, esp. when one knows the existence of the scatological photographs.

Ibid., p. 186.

Mapplethorpe had recently seen Pasolini’s Salo and found it a brilliant piece of filmmaking.

Morrisroe, p. 192.

What Mapplethorpe (and Pasolini) found in sadism and scatology was a practice, a world, so revolting that even (or especially) other homosexuals were horrified by it.

White, Altars, p. 132.

Robert is quite frank about everything, even though he never really had sex in groups. he stated explicitly that the orgy would be scatologically satanic sadomasochism.

Fritscher, p. 40.

“I feel like a vampire,” Robert said. “I am a vampire.”

Ibid., p. 194.

“Blood is in the air. Love, Robert.”

Ibid., p. 31.

He became totally infatuated with the man he called “the serpent in Eden.”

Morrisroe, p. 164.

Mapplethorpe was fully aware that he was breaking taboos, and the act of transgression was central to his work. He pushed his sexual partners to transgress their own boundaries by repeating the phrase “Do it for Satan.” He wanted to bring to light previously hidden sexual secrets, and often taunted the various men by telling them, “You know you’re dirty.” Once he had succeeded in breaking down their reserve, he often photographed the “secrets” and made them public. He was careful not to reveal anyone’s identity, and while he never dreamed of blackmailing his subjects, the pictures gave him the sense of control he craved. “Robert was really interested in photographing people’s private desires,” explained a model whose picture appears in the “X Portfolio.” “He’d always tell you, ‘Do it for Satan.’ When he found out that I was into smells and odors, dirty jockstraps, and being submissive, he convinced me to wrap two jockstraps around my head for the picture. Actually, my photograph should have been the piss one, but he’d already done that.”

Ibid., p. 192.

“You can tell,” he says, “who’s interesting, who’s sick by the way they say uh huh. You can tell who’s dirty by their eyes. I look for dark circles. Interesting people have dark circles.”
Fritscher, pp. 93-4.

“You’ve got what I want. You’ve got perfect dark circles under your eyes. You know that’s what I look for.”
“Robert Mapplethorpe’s famous raccoon effect.”
“Actually, right now, your soul is outside your skin where I can shoot it.”
Ibid., p. 45.

When I have sex with someone I forget who I am. For a minute I even forget I’m human. It’s the same thing when I’m behind a camera. I forget I exist.
Morrisroe, p. 193.

Robert was a creature of the night. Talk a walk down Greenwich after midnight. Peer in the windows of shops where we browsed for antiques. Robert was an offhand collector. He wrote impulsive, enormous checks for small bronze sculptures of the goat-footed devil.
Fritscher, p. 33.

Whenever you make love with someone, there should be three people involved—you, the other person, and the devil.
Morrisroe, p. 211.

Robert was one of the most tortured, tormented individuals I’ve ever met. He was a bundle of insecurities and always seemed ready to snap.
Ibid., p. 212.

In Civilization and Its Discontents, Freud talks about artists who descend into what he calls the maelstrom, meaning the unconscious and they come back and tell us what was there. Robert went into the maelstrom, no question about it, but he came back with an elegant picture postcard—“Having a wonderful time, wish you were here. Love, Robert.”

Ibid., p. 220.

He likes to set people up to shock them into admitting to their own repressed desires.
Fritscher, p. 40.
Ultimately he treated people the way he treated a statue or his collection of pottery. People were either subjects for his photographs, or they were in his life the way his collections were in his life.

Morrisroe, p. 282.

Robert clobbered anyone and everyone. He used money, fame, drugs, or whatever he needed to exert his will. Life was easy. Everyone was caving in to Mapplethorpe. How could he create a “perfect moment” without resistance? By the early Eighties, Robert was disdainful of everything and everyone, because whatever Mapplethorpe wanted Mapplethorpe got. He wanted people to resist him.

Fritscher, p. 217.

In his studio, a loft on Bond Street in lower Manhattan, there is a condition of perpetual night: the floor gray and grainy, mission-style furniture upholstered in black leather, the reflections of mirror or faceted glass, a black bedroom behind a white wire-netting cage, and, ranged around, the paraphernalia of an irreverent perversity (a scorpion in a case, a bronze of Mephistopheles, and a much smaller bronze of the Devil with his toasting-fork).

Chatwin, p. 10.

People who remember the apartment remember a murky room full of Robert’s sculptures—fetishes, rather—sexual, frontal, and, for the most part, black.

Ibid., p. 10.

“There’s one particular person I photographed any number of times; as a person, he’s horrible, but I couldn’t take a bad picture of him. There was a sympathy in the studio, but outside I couldn’t talk to him. He was disgusting.”

Kardon, N. pag.

They were powerful and cruel, and though on the scale of suffering one witnesses every evening on cable news, the actual pain depicted was slight and of the imagination, the fact that it was voluntary and strange, that it was an exercise of spirit, gave it an edge of meaning that had to be dealt with in a different way from the meaningless, pointless, unwanted suffering of Rwanda or Bosnia. White,

That romantic agony should have been revived as the downtown style in the greatest bourgeois city in the modern world at the moment of its decline way, in any historical sense, predictable, and yet Robert Mapplethorpe’s work has often been seen as an aesthetic sport, so entirely outside any historical or social context and so “new,” as to resist interpretation. This “newness” has in fact become so fixed an idea about Mapplethorpe that we tend to over look the source of his strength, which derived, from the beginning, less from the shock of the new than from the shock of the old, from the rather unnerving novelty of exposure to a fixed moral universe. There was always in his work the tension, even the struggle, between dark and light. There was the exaltation of powerlessness. There was the seductiveness of death, the fantasy of crucifixion.

Didion, Women, N. pag.

Robert Mapplethorpe was no more shocking than his times.

Fritscher, p. 197.
Shock was Robert's medium in the seventies: the shock of burning bras, the shock of abortion, the shock of sexual liberation, the shock of losing Vietnam, the shock of terrorist Olympics, the shock of Watergate, the shock of Americans hostage in Iran, the cumulative culture shock that led to the aftershocks in the eighties' shock of AIDS, IranContra, the Republican deficit, the destruction of the middle class, the meltdown of the nuclear family, the epidemic of drugs, the homeless, the savings-and-loan scandals, the blasphemy of television evangelists, the rise of shock-rock music, shock-trash television, and shocking US. policies in the Mideast.

Ibid., pp. 196-7.

"I don't like that particular word, 'shocking'." Robert Mapplethorpe told ArtNews in late 1988, when he was struggling with illness and asked one more time to discuss the famous leather photographs. "I'm looking for the unexpected. I'm looking for things I've never seen before. But I have trouble with the word 'shocking' because I'm not really shocked by anything... I was in a position to take those pictures. I felt an obligation to do them."

Didion, Women, N. pag.

Imagine the young Robert in the late sixties, early seventies, deliberately setting up avant-garde savants by showing them his fresh, shocking images. They had to lie about his work, because if they blinked in shock, they immediately lost their avant-garde status. His assault on them was an "invitation to a mugging" he could not lose. Robert wanted status and he achieved it by threatening their status. If they thought themselves far out, he presented himself as farther out.

Fritscher, p. 66.

"All Robert wanted to do was to fuck his models, then photograph them," Baril said. "He was documenting his life and sticking it in front of everybody's faces, daring them to say something about it." Perhaps sensing Baril's hostility, Mapplethorpe confined him to the darkroom, but Baril knowing his employer was too intimidated to confront him directly, delighted in disobeying him. Mapplethorpe, then, would send 2 message through a third party directing Baril to "stay in the darkroom." From Mapplethorpe's perspective, it was the ultimate putdown, as he derived great pleasure from having made a name for himself as a photographer without ever making a print.

Morrisroe, p. 239.

Mapplethorpe had confided to several friends that he blamed a black man for infecting him with the AIDS virus, but given his boast of having had sex with an estimated thousand men, he couldn't possibly know for sure. Still, he approached his task like an avenging angel, picking up one back man after another with the word "nigger." One man screamed at him to stop, but when Mapplethorpe still kept repeating the word, the man grabbed his clothes and ran out the door. "You're evil," the man shouted, in parting. "Evil!"

Ibid., p. 318.

Mapplethorpe's "neo-fascist politics."

Ibid., p. 204.

He often referred to Jews as being money-hungry and vulgar.

Ibid., p. 204.
I think Robert liked me but he despised Jews, and I happened to be Jewish. We both felt uncomfortable with each other. I believed his pictures had to be shown.

_Ibid._, p. 204.

Taking a cue from classical sculpture, he expected white skin to approximate marble and black skin the color of bronze. His printers were to selectively lighten the white faces to obscure any imperfections and selectively darken the blacks.

_Ibid._, p. 240.

Only sexually was Mapplethorpe multicultural.

_Fritscher_, p. 249.

Lesbian black women deemed him acceptable, because he at least made black people visible.

_Ibid._, p. 212.

How can a biographer build him up as a modern hero and then tell the world that one of his turn-ons was to force his black sex partners to say, “I’m your nigger?”

_Ibid._, p. 92.

Robert asked Wally, the source of all New York sexual information, about, in Robert’s term, “nigger” bars.

“I told him about the black bars,” Wally said, “but he was scared. He kept after me, so I took him there myself. I’d never seen Bob so nervous. He had shot a few black men previously, but they had been gay black men, some of them professional models. I knew Bob. He wanted the danger of the real thing.

Mapplethorpe: “I’m still into Niggers. I even have a button on my leather jacket that spells it out when I hit the bars. It seems to attract them.”

He asked if she knew how stimulating the word “nigger” was during sexual foreplay. “Let me get this straight,” she said, dumbfounded. “You’re looking for an intelligent, successful black millionaire who wants you—a white man—to call him ‘nigger’?” Mapplethorpe patiently explained that he hadn’t grasped the whole concept. “I wouldn’t call him ‘nigger’ all the time,” he said, offended. “Only during sex.”

_Morrisroe_, p. 28.

People who walked through the Miller Gallery to see such beautiful black bodies as “Ajitto” had no idea the man who took the pictures referred to his subjects as “niggers” or that he subscribed to racist ideas.

_Ibid._, p. 252.

Mapplethorpe’s meeting with Leni Reifenstahl in Manhattan to discuss the mystique of blacks.

_Fritscher_, p. 214.

Riefenstahl’s exotic forays to Sudan and East Africa. Piling gilt upon guilt, she brought back her naked-warrior images, thinking—and she was not alone—that they shone with the truth of her subjects’ nobility. Instead, her theatrics, her kitschy choices and angles betrayed the fact that she saw these people through those Aryan glasses that seem to have only one end in sight—the creation of an Übermensch. Her reduction of the Nuba people or the Masai to picturesque members of an animal kingdom—there for the snapping of the paparazzi who want them in their "natural habitat."

Marshall, p. 15.

Blacks are only sporadically visible in the history of photography: Louise Dahl-Wolfe, Edward Weston, Eikoh Hosoe, George Dureau, Miles Everett.

Fritscher, p. 218.

There was something about the pictures, even the commercial ones, that did not lend itself well to American consumer culture.

Morrisroe, p. 287.

The unfortunate shift today away from an emphasis on sexual freedom to gay identity has made the explicit sexual content of Mapplethorpe’s photos look sleazy, politically incorrect, even racist.

White, Altars, p. 129.

He coveted Butler’s photographs of black body builders like Serge Nubret, Leon Brown, and Gordon Babb, displayed next to antique photographs of strongmen, including 1951 Mr. Universe, the black Monotosh Roy, who posed for fantasy photographs, not nude, but suggestive of the “Young Physique” magazines Robert had come out on in the adult bookstores on Forty-second Street.

Fritscher, p. 221.

Mapplethorpe: “Black guys are hung bigger, except for the ones who date white chicks.”

Ibid., p. 215.

He hoped in the perfect moment of sex to find the perfect moment of death. He hoped someday a black would kill him.

Ibid., p. 218.

By 1980, Mapplethorpe claimed that white men no longer interested him sexually.

Morrisroe, p. 233.

Mapplethorpe: “Once you go black, you can never go back.”

Ibid., p. 233.

Mapplethorpe’s racism intensified with the progression of his disease, and Kelly Edey, who had presumably heard everything, was so startled by Mapplethorpe’s venomous comments that he noted one incident in his diary. Mapplethorpe was standing outside Keller’s on the evening of August 2 when he suddenly began to shout, “This is the sleaziest corner in New York. How can it be that I’m standing here in the midst of all this human garbage? They’re so stupid, every last one of them is so unbelievably stupid.” And yet he kept returning to Keller’s, hoping his demigod might rise from the debris. “A lot of people yelled at him for continuing to go to the bars,” Mark Isaacson explained. “But he looked at it, like, well, that’s their problem—if they’re not protecting themselves, why should I worry about it? When Robert first got sick, I said to him, 'You've got to stop your old lifestyle,' and he said to me, 'If I have to change my lifestyle I don't want to live.'”

Ibid., p. 325.

Keller’s Bar—West St., pickup spot for biracial sex. The whites had money; the blacks did not. What the blacks had, however—or so went the myth—was an exotic, “primitive” sexuality that lured the white men to Keller’s the way affluent whites were once drawn to Harlem’s Cotton Club. Mapplethorpe went at least four times a week.

Ibid., p. 233.

Keller’s on the waterfront was pure theater in the tradition of Genêt’s The Balcony. At the bar, and around the edges of the room were the plumbing supply salesmen, electricians, furniture movers, and parking-lot attendants who were playing the sadist for the evening. They were in black leather caps, dark glasses, black leather jackets with a plethora of chains, studs, and emblems, black leather pants and boots, with heavy key rings hanging from their belts. They lounged around like lethargic tigers, drinking their beer and licking their chops as they observed the center-stage activity around the pool table. There were gathered the chemists, hairdressers, junior accountants, and college students who were playing the masochists for the evening, attired in black plastic jump suits, fetchingly unzipped. To watch one of those masochist take a stance with a pool cue was to know the full eloquence of body language, right down to the twitch of the buttocks as the shot was made. The tigers would stir languidly.

Hamilton, p. 23.

Mapplethorpe’s favorite subject: the physical superiority of the black male. Once Mapplethorpe began photographing blacks, he found to his delight that he could extract a greater richness from the color of their skin. “For one thing, the texture of a black man’s skin is different. The most beautiful black bodies have a thin layer of fat all over them which gives an amazing consistency to the musculature and to the surface of the body. Another thing about black bodies at their best is the broadness of shoulders in proportion to the narrowness of the hips. Then, of course, there’s the size of the cock. The average black cock is bigger.” I don’t think people realize how hard Robert worked to find the perfect one. He examined thousands and thousands of them.

George Stambolian once heard Mapplethorpe describe the perfect black phallus in such detail that he had even worked out the ideal measurement of the tiny opening at the tip of the glans through which the urethra carries urine and semen. “Robert had drawn a picture of a penis on a chart,” Stambolian recalled, “and he was like a surgeon, using medical terms like ‘corpus spongiosum.’ I was impressed by his dedication.” But in those rare instances when Mapplethorpe found the ideal phallus, he was usually dissatisfied with another part of the man’s anatomy. Perhaps he had too much of a “prison build”—the upper body too large for the hips—or perhaps his skin color was too muddy, or his legs too short. “When the ancients did a painting or a sculpture of a god,” Edey explained, “they often took parts from different models—a hand, or a leg, or a face. Robert couldn’t do that as a photographer, so he needed to find everything in one person. He was searching for the Platonic ideal.”

Mapplethorpe’s method of seduction varied little from night to night; since black leather was not standard attire among black gays, he dressed in jeans and a simple shirt, then, arriving at Keller’s after midnight, he would order a beer and stake out a position in front of the bar so he could watch the men walk in the door. He had nicknames for all the regulars—"Pail and Shovel," "Mutton Chops," "Pigeon." After twenty minutes of gossiping with Kelly Edey and John Abbott, he would saunter to the far end of the bar, light a cigarette, and fix his eyes on the most desirable person in the room, staring so intently the chosen man was compelled to approach him. "Robert's eyes just blazed whenever he saw a person whom he thought was spectacularly beautiful," Edey said. "I was trying to find a word for that intense look on Robert's face, and I finally realized it was the same word they used to describe Michelangelo's eyes—terribilità."

Mapplethorpe's charisma was enhanced considerably by the vial of cocaine he kept in his back pocket and waved at the appropriate moment. Some of the men at Keller's were there for the sole purpose of procuring drugs, and even if they weren't homosexual, they were amenable to trading sex for coke. Others went home with Mapplethorpe because they knew he was a photographer and they hoped they might be able to make some money modeling for him. Curiously, while Edey maintained that both he and Mapplethorpe longed to be "swept away by a black superstud," the men Mapplethorpe wound up with were often small and slightly built.

The photographer's repeated assertion that it is the bodies of black men which will take the light, and the darkness, with the most resolute formal determination.

The photographer's repeated assertion that it is the bodies of black men which will take the light, and the darkness, with the most resolute formal determination.

Marshall, p. 10.

What happened when black men ceased to be "form" was a different matter entirely. Mapplethorpe referred to his Platonic ideal as "Super Nigger," and told John Abbott he longed to find a black man who was "free enough" to allow him to repeat the pejorative word in bed. "I've always liked to talk dirty," he explained. "It's like magic words, forbidden words. The idea that someone white would call them 'nigger' worked consistently with blacks. It made their cocks jump." When he discussed his work with art critics and journalists, he addressed the aesthetics of dark skin, but with friends at Keller's he talked about the way blacks smelled different from whites; the size of their lips and genitals; how he could always "catch a nigger with coke"; and which blacks were "gorillas." He and his friends weren't interested in middle-class blacks, because then, according to Abbott, "they weren't black anymore." Consequently it was nearly impossible for Mapplethorpe to find someone who could fit comfortably into his social world.

"Robert's leitmotif was how unbelievably and impossibly stupid they all were," said Edey. "We called it 'the curse of beauty.' There was an inverse proportion between mental development and cock size. The most beautiful ones didn't seem to develop their brains much. Robert came to just accept it as a fact of life that the ones he was attracted to sexually and as a photographer weren't going to have much upstairs. So we did a lot of sitting around wringing our hands. And then somebody would walk through the door, and we'd say, 'My God, did you see that?' There was a sense of obligation. If somebody is that beautiful you have to capture them on film, like catching a total solar eclipse."

From the time Mapplethorpe entered his "black period," he made a concerted effort to study the work of other photographers who had taken pictures of black male nudes. He didn't regard this as "stealing" other photographers' ideas or techniques, but rather as creating a library of images in his subconscious from which he could occasionally borrow. "I like to look at pictures, all kinds," he said in Portrait: Theory. "And all those things you absorb come out subconsciously one way or another. You'll be taking photographs and suddenly know that you have resources from having looked at a lot of them before. There is no way you can avoid this. But this kind of subconscious influence is good, and it certainly can work for one. In fact, the more pictures you see, the better you are as a photographer." Photographic images of the black male nude, however, were relatively rare. Of the 134 images in Constance Sullivan's Nude: Photographs 1850-1980, the black male is not represented at all. Given the taboo against male nudity in general, white heterosexuals were not inclined to celebrate the erotic properties of the black male body. And since blacks rarely had the financial resources to become art photographers, it was left to gay white men to present their vision of the black male nude.

F. Holland Day, who had shocked nineteenth-century Boston with his staged crucifixion scenes, was one of the first Americans to photograph the black male nude. Day's fascination with male beauty was evident in the highly stylized portraits of black models that comprised the "Nubian series." His photograph of a black man dressed as an Ethiopian chief in a striped African robe and feathered headdress was featured by Alfred Stieglitz in the October 1897 issue of Camera Notes; Day's biographer, Estelle Jussim, cited the picture as "one of the first photographic embodiments of the idea that 'Black is beautiful.'" In his photograph "Ebony and Ivory," Day further explored the erotic properties of the black body by contrasting the model's dark skin with the white figurine he holds in his hand. Allen Ellenzweig, in The Homoerotic Photograph, emphasizes Mapplethorpe's debt to Day: "Certainly Day proffered the black male as a desirable sexual object, aesthetic in himself, worthy of admiration, and, to those open to the possibility, likely to spur sexual longing. What we have here is a forerunner of Robert Mapplethorpe."

In the years between Day and Mapplethorpe, the black male nude was largely invisible, and the pictures that existed were usually done in secret. George Platt Lynes too photographs of black nudes in the early 1950s, but these didn't surface until several decades later. Morrisroe, pp. 236-8.

In most instances, Mapplethorpe's images of the nude male are isolated, solitary.
Marshall, p. 10.

Mapplethorpe eventually began to photograph his black models against black backdrop paper instead of gray, to enhance the skin's highlights.
Morrisroe, p. 238.

The world of inorganic form is absent save as it is defined by the organic.
Marshall, p. 11.

Black men perceived as physiognomies so symmetrical as not to admit those "accidentals" which for most of us constitute the recognizable self.
Ibid., p. 11.

Black lover / model Milton Moore wouldn't allow Mapplethorpe to take pictures of him until the photographer agreed that he would never show his face and genitals together in the same photograph.
Disappearing into the bedroom, Mapplethorpe returned with a pillowcase, which he then placed over Moore’s head before proceeding to shoot several rolls of film.

Morrisroe, p. 246.

[Moore] was afraid family members would see the pictures and figure out he was gay.

White, Altars, p. 130.

Robert kept complaining that Milton would only eat “nigger food” and that he couldn’t stand it anymore. Robert’s relationships with blacks were all terribly sexual, but he didn’t actually like them. He constantly called them “niggers,” and said they were stupid.

Morrisroe, p. 254.

Mapplethorpe encouraged Moore to take advantage of his “natural rhythm” by presenting him with a pair of tap shoes.

Ibid., p. 248.

Robert had this poor black kid from the South cooped up in what looked like a showroom for a glass company. It was like keeping a tiger on a leash in your apartment.

Ibid., p. 257.

We drove to the beach and everyone was in bathing suits except for Robert and Milton, who were still dressed in black leather. This was not exactly a normal sight for the Hamptons...

Ibid., p. 254.

Asked to photograph a pair of high heels for the German magazine Stern, for example, he balanced a shoe on the buttocks of a naked black man; for Vogue Italia, he accessorized a black model’s body with diamond jewelry; later for a Japanese department store, he photographed the same black model bound by leather belts. The real message of the picture wasn’t about fashion, but power and submission, especially as it related to black men, whom Mapplethorpe regarded as the ultimate accessory—a fetish equal to a high-heel shoe, or a diamond elephant pin.

Ibid., p. 287.

Mapplethorpe preferred models, both leather and black, who posed for little or nothing.

Fritscher, p. 172.

Ibid., p. 219.

Mapplethorpe’s evident parodies of muscleman poses and House Beautiful arrangements.

I can remember that when I was interviewing black gay men in Atlanta in 1978 several told me that Mapplethorpe was virtually the only photographer who was giving them exciting and beautiful images of their race.

White, Altars, p. 129.
Blacks crossed over the same way gays crossed over. Race and sex: blacks and gays. To the mix, Robert carried camera and checkbook.
Fritscher, p. 211.

In the gay seventies, women who were poets, singers, and performance artists were considered chic ornaments for gay men. They were not unlike straight men’s trophy wives.
Masculine-identified gay men, particularly, matched up with female partners who were not like female-identified gay men’s sisters.
Ibid., p. 119.

Robert, in the final analysis, spotlighted a primal masculinity contrapuntal to the seventies’ emerging feminist consciousness.
Ibid., p. 276.

Mapplethorpe’s work gives some internal evidence that he clung to Smith as symbolic of some possibility he had lost.
Ibid., p. 75.

Patti Smith: the grieving, about-to-be-widowed Mrs. Robert Mapplethorpe.
Ibid., p. 75.

She was his alter ego. She was the light to his dark. I suspect his photographs of her are his best work.
Ibid., p. 75.

Mapplethorpe’s photos are always beautiful, but a Mapplethorpe’s photos of Patti Smith is, well, history.
Morrisroe, p. 209.

Patti Smith: Mapplethorpe’s twin, his divining androgyne.
n.cit

Robert Having His Nipple Pierced. The scene was pure Warhol. Miss Daley’s screening of her film took place in the very room where it had been shot. Some of the silver plastic pillows, their helium depleted, flitted through the film. Robert was there with Patti.
Fritscher, p. 69.

“I just thought it would be an interesting idea, having a ring through your tit,” he told the BBC about the early film “Robert Having His Nipple Pierced,” the romance of the edge.
Didion, Women, N. pag.

In the film Robert and Patti were very like each other, outsiders, pretty, but hungry and skinny, and deathly intense. Patti had a slightly hysterical edge, which I think probably has to do with something in her childhood. She did the soundtrack of the movie. She spoke live; it was an improvised poem. Patti watches while Robert, having his nipple pierced, lies in the arms of a male lover. I think the film was supposed to be about the tensions in Robert’s nature, about his attraction to Patti and his attraction to men. They seems to have come to some terms with the ambiguity, perhaps through the film. It encapsulated the moment from which they were all moving away.
Fritscher, p. 70.

Rock music’s merchandizing of androgyny.
Morrisroe, p. 215.

Literally, as well as metaphorically, pop culture success depends on who fucks whom.
Fritscher, p. 95.

Pop art faces are generally blank.
Ibid., p. 132.

The Pop couple, Robert Pop and Patti Pop, moved through their Pop Adolescence in the Pop Art World, influenced by the invitation of British Pop. In the Pop Speak of the sixties and seventies, Pop People often played “What movie am I in now?” Pop Urchins living at the Popularly Priced Chelsea hotel, Robert Pop and Patti Pop Popped Pills and listened to Pop Music (to make Pop Music) and watched Pop Movies (to make Pop Movies). Imagine Robert Pop and Patti Pop at a rock horror triple-feature picture show. Consider that the Pops are tropes turning in tandem periodicity to the light of the movie screen.
Ibid., p. 114.

Robert, essentially, was a one-woman man and that woman was his mirror, Patti Smith, whose very existence fueled Robert’s introspection.
Ibid., p. 127.

If Mapplethorpe had lived longer, would he have come to his senses after a misspent youth, married Patti Smith (thus redeeming them both from sex, drugs and rock ‘n’ roll)?
Ibid., p. 136.

Lisa and Patti represent in body type the Mapplethorpe female who is not in the tradition of the fecund female figure. Mapplethorpe’s women straddle androgyny by their very slender builds.
Ibid., p. 128.

Lisa Lyon was 5’3”, 102 lbs.
Ibid., p. 128.

The plot thickens when Lisa Lyon is cast “as the other woman” who comes between Mapplethorpe and Smith.
Ibid., p. 136.

Edie leaves the stage to be replaced by an inferior version of herself in Ingrid Superstar. Smith replaced by Lyon.
Morrisroe, p. 231.

Although Lisa Lyon had won the 1979 First World’s Women’s Bodybuilding Championship, she was hardly a stereotypical athlete and regularly took angel dust, quoted Carlos Castaneda, R.D. Laing, and William Blake; she counted among her friends Henry Miller and former Black Panther leader Huey Newton.
Ibid., p. 231.

Lyon was a gifted child who suffered from hallucinations. She developed compulsive rituals such as running around the house counterclockwise and tapping on furniture hundreds of times.
Ibid., p. 231.
She was hurtled into the limelight by winning, in Los Angeles in 1979, the First World Women’s Bodybuilding Championship. She had then enraged the new crop of women body builders by declining to defend her title at the Second World Championship, considering herself not so much an athlete as a “performance artist”—a sculptor whose raw material was her own body. Since this material was, in the long run, ephemeral, she was on the lookout for the right photographer to document it. “A mirror,” she says, “is not an objective witness.”

Chatwin, p. 11.

Driven by her compulsive behavior, she began rigorously counting bicep curls and leg lifts, and when she was too wired to fall asleep at night, she exercised on the trapeze hanging from the ceiling of her apartment. Instead of steroids, she used LSD, which she claimed helped reprogram her cellular structure and made it possible for her to lift 265 pounds and squat 285. “I was using LSD to resculpt myself,” she said. “Not only was I leaping forward in my body, but I was having visionary experiences. I was going into zones you can’t talk about to people.”

Ibid., p. 232.

Lyon’s drug problems and emotional difficulties.

Ibid., p. 279.

Lyon was a potential marketing goldmine, and plans were underway for an exercise book and a new perfume. Lyon, however, was unwilling to play the game for even a short time. She never dreamed of being an athlete in the first place. She saw herself as a sculptor who used her own body as raw material. Her meeting with Mapplethorpe, then, was serendipitous, for she was searching for a photographer to document her “work-in-progress.” Mapplethorpe, coincidentally, was searching for ways to change his gay S&M image.

Ibid., p. 232.

Mapplethorpe complained that Lyon hadn’t capitalized on her bodybuilding career, and he couldn’t understand why she persisted in labeling herself a “performance artist” when she could have been a female Conan the Barbarian.

Ibid., p. 279.

On Wednesday, February 25, 1976, Schwarzenegger appeared live, as a performance artist, posing, one night only, at the Whitney Museum of American Art. Presenting Schwarzenegger with the bodybuilders Frank Zane and Ed Corney were Pumping Iron authors, Charles Gaines and George Butler.

They were all “Exhibit A” for the panelists debating a kind of pop culture wrestling chautauqua of “Mind versus Body.” The panel included professors of fine arts from NYU, of English and comparative literature from Richmond College, and of the Art Department at Rutgers. They were all male and made legitimate by the gender of the assertive moderator, Vicki Goldberg.

That night at the Whitney was historical for itself and for its directly quoted reference of the night nearly 170 years before when Lord Elgin brought the Parthenon marbles to London.

“In June 1808,” Goldberg said, “the famous prizefighter Gregson was induced to stand naked in the museum and pose for two hours in various attitudes so that his anatomy could be compared with that of the statues.”
At the Whitney that night, Schwarzenegger and Ed Corney and Frank Zane posed on a revolving platform. The SRO crowd went wild. The scene was a gladiator-slave show “straight” out of a Fellini coliseum in ancient, decadent Rome.

As the symposium concluded, Robert worked his way to the green room, where the musclemen were holding court and signing autographs. He invited them to pose for him at his Bond Street studio. Schwarzenegger, the most self-promoting of the three, recognized a kindred soul in Robert Mapplethorpe.

Fritscher, p. 221.

Mapplethorpe confided that the female pubic region was so unattractive to him that he couldn’t imagine photographing full-frontal nudes. Instead, he arrived at homoerotic aesthetic: a book entitled Small-Breasted Women. How to define small-breasted? Mapplethorpe wondered if women who wore bras should be automatically disqualified, or if “small” meant totally flat. He even worked out on a piece of paper the exact nipple-to-breast radio of the ideal candidate.

Morrisroe, p. 232.

Lisa Lyon: “These pictures are a little hard, like us.”
Chatwin, p. 12.

Lisa Lyon: “I like weapons. They are a part of my reality.”
Ibid., p. 12.

She might explain her concept of the prototype for the woman of the eighties: The concept of a woman’s body (“neither masculine nor feminine but feline”), her conceptual of body building as ritual, and her concept of the ritual as Art. She might tell how awkward it is to be a white woman in “a port meant for black men”; how she learned to highlight her muscles by darkening her skin with liquid graphite; how she just ordered a further ten tubes of it from the Ace Lock and Key Store in Santa Monica (“graphite’s a lock lubricant, you know”); how once, at a performance at a museum in California, anointed with this ceremonial patina, she drew a crowd of thousands to watch her perform a three-minute ritual in front of a chalk wall.

Ibid., p. 12.

In his studies of the bodybuilder Lisa Lyon, it is of course a reversal of stereotypes which Mapplethorpe effects. Precisely the kind of lyric stasis so lovingly studied in male bodies traditionally granted movement and power (in other words, a paradoxical anti-phallicism, if we take our lead from the culture’s interpretation of the phallic as dominance, as inflexibility, as denial of the other’s response) is withheld in the Lisa Lyon series: Lyon repeatedly subverts, in images of sleek force and definition, the conventions of female iconography she is made to criticize, to parody, to transform.

Marshall, N. pag.

In session after session, Lisa posed as bride, broad, doll, moll, playgirl, beach-girl, bike-girl, gym-girl, and boy-girl; as frog-person, mud-person, flamenco dancer, spiritist medium, archetypal huntress, circus artiste, snake-woman, society woman, young Christian, and kink. She posed in Jamaica. She posed, naked on an arctic day, in Joshua Tree National Monument. One afternoon in New York, she posed flat out on a masseur’s bench. “I think there is something of the slab in this one, don’t you? The anatomy table? I don’t find it morbid, though. I find it calm.”

In the seventies, Patty Hearst, everybody’s Pop Debutante of the Decade, was Robert’s favorite society child.

Deconstructed as a debutante and reconstructed as a revolutionary, Patty Hearst switched identities with an ease Robert envied. He referenced Hearst as Tonya, Queen of the SLA in his photograph of himself with a machine gun.

Robert loved the pop culture concept of Patty the Deb having her consciousness raised when kidnapped by the Big Black Buck, Cinque, leader of the Symbionese Liberation Army... She was Mapplethorpe’s dream girl: the rich bitch who is kidnapped and through force becomes the white sex slave of a dangerous black revolutionary who makes her betray her family and rob banks.

He wanted Patty to be his wild WASP heiress the way the doomed superstar Edie Sedgwick was Warhol’s, so he could shoot his own underground movie.

In his black-and-white dreams of race, gender, and money, Robert’s fantasy, because of Patty Hearst’s mythic pop culture past, was to photograph the rescued heiress as a lacquered Bay Area society matron who had been forced into romance-novel adventures beyond her will to resist.

Fritscher, p. 95.

In the seventies, the decade of black music, black magic, Black power, Black Panthers, and the Symbionese Liberation Army, black males’ inherent defiance was Robert’s way of realigning hot spin on the cold axis of his formal work.

Ibid., p. 216.

Robert Mapplethorpe has been a society photographer in the largest sense.

Marshall, N. pag.

He wanted to sell photographs to his target market, the radical chic, who had attended Leonard Bernstein’s fund-raising party for the Black Panthers in 1970. Agnès Varda had made her films, Black Panthers and Lion’s Love (1969), back to back. Lion’s Love starred Warhol superstar Viva, the authors of Hair, Gerome Ragni and James Rado, and filmmaker Shirley Clarke.

Tom of Finland meets Mapplethorpe in SF in the 70s. In the 80s in NYC.

Pfanner & Khoury,” transcription.

Derek Jarman was Mapplethorpe’s bête noire.

Fritscher, p. 63.

Jarman was the British Mapplethorpe and then some.

Ibid., p. 105.

British film director Derek Jarman remembered that one night in the 1980s, at a party at Heaven, the disco, he was going down one stairway as Robert Mapplethorpe was climbing up another and Robert shouted out, “I have everything I want, Derek. Have you got everything you want?”
He assaulted the New York avant-garde with his camera. Robert Mapplethorpe was a cultural terrorist.

Love was impossible with him, because the only people he wanted in his life were the rich people, famous people, and people he could have sex with.
Morrisroe, p. 134.

He hated the murder of the rich and famous because it cut into his model and client list.
Fritscher, p. 112.

He was conspicuously apolitical and obsessed with his own career, with a degree of self-absorption friends might have called anarchic individualism and enemies might have labeled narcissism.

He was the man who removed Yoko Ono’s shades and presented her eyes to the world.

He liked dropping the names of Tom Wolfe and Joan Didion before he knew them.

He equated publicity with life itself. Following the show, when his name receded from the newspapers, he glumly said, “Well, I guess that’s it.”
Morrisroe, p. 351.

He appeared in 1987 in an ad selling Roses Lime Juice for Schweppes.
Fritscher, p. 194.

His surname became an answer on the TV game show Jeopardy in September 1990.

I had to sell a lot of photographs to make the kind of money a painter made from selling just one painting.
Morrisroe, p. 251.

His real thrill was the kill, the sale.
Fritscher, p. 183.

Mapplethorpe: “My theory about creativity is that the more money one has, the more creative one can be.”
Morrisroe, p. 286.

He was an aerobic shopper.
Fritscher, p. 79.

Mapplethorpe ran himself like a department store.
He loved the surfaceness of haute couture.

Their chic glossy-magazine ambience heightens the drama. We’ve all turned the pages of these magazines, ogled the luxury goods, envied the rich and famous, and then closed them, newly conscious of our own mortality. Vanitas vanitatum.
Ashbery, p. 255.

The term “marketable” is an index to the transformation in attitude from formalism to a certain “smooth, stylish, and [academically] marketable Marxism, which had come to replace it.
Danto, p. 19.

Mapplethorpe demonstrated his talent for being a quick-change artist when he flew to London to do portraits of his English friends, from S&M call boys, he was now a photographer of Isabel and Rose Lampton, daughters of a former cabinet minister; Guy Nevill in his riding gear; Lady Astor’s granddaughter, Stella; Colin Tennant’s son, Charlie; John Paul Getty III; and beer heiress Catherine Guinness. This might indicate some schizoid nature in his work, a meretricious split approach and interest. In fact, although these subjects come from a universe of extravagant contrasts, Mapplethorpe casts them from the same mold. The polished world of high fashion and country-house living seems as hard and brittle as the underworld of burnished chains and studded leather.
Morrisroe, p. 165.

The familiar face of Grace Jones, as photographed by Mapplethorpe, suggests not the androgynous future for which it has come to stand but the nineteenth-century passion for the exotic, the romance with Africa, with Egypt.
Didion, Women, N. pag.

I wonder, do Richard Gere and Princess Margaret and Arnold Schwarzenegger feel somehow changed? Robert’s tongue never licked their eyeball. Robert’s lean body never made love to them.
Fritscher, p. 33.

Aren’t many of the other works that complete his oeuvre a hairbreadth away from classy commercial photography?
Ashbery, p. 256.

Basically a commercial photographer with fine art aspirations. He gave good product.
Fritscher, p. 175.

So many gay photographers don’t take portraits of nude men. They just shoot pictures of a cock which happens to have an appendage, a person attached to it.

The penis, in all the images by Mapplethorpe, is never shown erect.
Marshall, N. pag.

Actually, I know no one, at least in California, who thought that Robert would be any more talented, famous, or controversial than the thousand other gay photographers.
Fritscher, p. 95.

Amazingly, Robert never received a really bad review from straight critics. The gays avoided comment. "I'm beyond them," Robert said. Ibid., 80.

Ingrid Sischy once tried to interest a publisher of pornography in Mapplethorpe's work, only to have him refuse to look at it. "I know these pictures," she reports him as saying. "I've never liked them. They're so personal."
Ashbery, p. 255.

Patti Smith, Robert's girlfriend, would show his work to gay dealers who'd reject it; as he recalled, "Several of them told me, 'I think the work is really interesting, but how can I exhibit it without making a statement about who I am?'"
White, Altars, p. 129.

Paradoxically, Robert Mapplethorpe is both a link in a long photographic tradition and someone who was startlingly original, without precursors.
Ibid, p. 128.

"If I were a movie, I'd be I Am a Camera."
Fritscher, p. 181.

Every Mapplethorpe photograph is a single frame in a move, which, if it existed, would be a series of dissolves:
the lily dissolves to the genitalia,
the face to the skull,
the skull to the lily.
Ibid., p. 129.

A cover shot is always a signature shot.
Ibid., p. 132.

Mapplethorpe often X-rayed subjects who interested him.
Ibid., p. 73.

It [photography] was the perfect medium, or so it seemed, for the seventies and eighties, when everything was so fast. If I were to make something that took two weeks to do, I'd lose my enthusiasm. It would become an act of labor and the love would be gone. With photography, you zero in; you put a lot of energy into short moments, and then you go on to the next thing. It seems to allow you to function in a very contemporary way and still produce the material.
Morrisroe, p. 133.

If I had been born one hundred or two hundred years ago, I might have been a sculptor, but photography is a very quick way to see, to make sculpture.
Kardon, p. 27.

People don't have time to wait for somebody to paint their portraits anymore, so the money is in photography. It's the perfect medium for our times, because it's of the instant.
Morrisroe, p. 142.

I went into photography because it seemed like the perfect vehicle for commenting on the madness of today’s existence.
_Ibid._, p. 142.

Portraits, flowers, and sex pictures.
_Ibid._, p. 130.

He described a disconcerting image of a man inserting a finger in his penis as “a perfect picture, because the hand gestures are beautiful. I know most people couldn’t see the hand gestures, but compositionally I think it works. I think the hand gesture is beautiful. What it happens to be doing, it happens to be doing, but that’s an aside.”
_Ibid._, p. 192.

Mapplethorpe was not an intrusive photographer; he barely raised his voice above a whisper and gave directions by just flicking his hands.
_Ibid._, p. 211.

The only way Mapplethorpe was able to discuss and evaluate his work; it was whether or not he liked the people, not the pictures.
_Ibid._, p. 279.

He purposely wore a loose-fitting Katharine Hamnett jacket to the photo session, and while Mapplethorpe smoked a joint, the curator projected a mental image of himself as someone relaxed and friendly. When they moved from the sitting room into the studio area, however, Narine noticed that Mapplethorpe no longer seemed stoned, and that his blurry eyes had assumed an expression steely intensity. He began firing instructions at Narine is a soft but commanding voice: “Move your hands before your lapel... turn your head to the left... shift your eyes to the right.” Before Narine had time to think about what was happening to him, he had abdicated control of his own body. “I was suddenly part of the process,” he explained, “and I felt myself becoming stiff and formalized. Robert was sculpting me into a Mapplethorpe photograph as surely as I had been a piece of stone.”
_Ibid._, p. 279.

Mapplethorpe, Sontag observes, could never become a photographer of accidents. He wants to photograph whatever can be made to pose.
_Marshall, N._ pag.

In fact, I was genuinely curious to see how Robert had Mapplethorped me. I’d seen his interpretations of other people I know and how their real faces were transformed into Mapplethorpe masks.
_Fritscher, p. 55._

When Robert sent me a package with a print of his photo of me, or perhaps not-me, or, more, what I was then, I hesitated. I wanted to see what this magnificent visionary photographer had found in me. I had to see if I looked dirty: not from the inside out—that id I had always known—but from the outside in. I had to know if I had a gay face: the haunted, hunted, distorted, stereotypical kind. I had to find out if my face had become like the Fellini faces in the bars and baths: a dead giveaway of whatever night hunger it was that made us terminally different from other men. Had Robert exposed my soul?

F. Holland Day – photographer who dieted himself down to emaciation to play the Christus in his own 1898 self-portrait hanging on the cross, Crucifixion.

Joel-Peter Witkin, 1982 crucifixion photograph, Penitent.

Mapplethorpe’s influences: Edwin Weston’s vegetables, Cecil Beaton’s fashion studies, Julia Margaret Cameron’s portraits, the African-American work by George Dureau and Miles Everett, and male physique work by Eadweard Muybridge, Baron Wilhelm von Gloeden, Fred Holland Day, George Platt Lynes, and Leni Riefenstahl.

George Platt Lynes’s pictures of erect penises, of black and white male couples, of a suffering man in bondage; he paired nude men with classical sculptures. In all these ways Lynes set an important precedent for Mapplethorpe. Lynes, too, isolated body parts and fetishized sexual organs.

However modern its content, its severe classicism seemed to consign it to another age.

The photographs seem scarcely to belong to his own time at all. They are controlled, composed exercises in a classical mode. They fit, aesthetically, with the photographs of the nineteenth century, which Mapplethorpe admired and collected, far more than they do with the work of his contemporaries.

There were whiffs of Neoclassicism in the air: already, the orthodoxies of Modern Art were grating on people’s nerves. No longer was it quite so retrograde for artists to shun the body beautiful; and photographers seemed to be showing the way. It was symptomatic of Robert’s approach the he used the Hasselblad as though it were a nineteenth-century plate-camera, slowing down the shutter speeds for greater penetration of the subject.

Chatwin, p. 10.

In 1972, he took a long hard look at the history of photography; although some “great” photographs were anonymous and accidental (just as an objet trouvé can be called a “great” object), there were a few photographers with all the attributes of genus. To these pioneers he looked for inspiration; and when he took up portraiture, he turned to one of the greatest portraits of all time—Baudelaire’s friend Gaspard-Félix Tournachon, better known as Nadar.

It was Nadar—the photographer of Liszt and of Sarah Bernhardt, of Delacroix and of Rossini—who, marveling at the variety of human expression, perfected the techniques of studio lighting and left a series of character studies unseen in Western art since the realistic portraits of the Roman Republic. And it was Nadar who, in a suit against his brother, explained to a French law court why his own pictures were inimitable, thus disposing of the theory, still held in some quarters by the ignorant, that the camera is an objective apparatus; that photography is not an art.

Ibid., p. 10.

I think the greatest portrait photographer of all time was Nadar, and he was probably one of the most interesting, if not the most interesting, photographers ever. You can tell by the way the subjects are giving themselves to the camera that they’re not sitting in the company of anyone other than their equal. They’re not just doing something for a picture; they respect the photographer. Of course, in Nadar’s time, it was often the first time they were being photographed, so that the whole experience was not just another photo session, which unfortunately is the case today, because everybody is so oversaturated with photography.

Kardon, p. 27.

Partial views of bent-over nudes may bring to mind Edward Weston’s still lives of single peppers.

Marshall, N. pag.

However wide his subject matter, he could never become a war photographer or a photographer of accidents in the street.

Ibid., N. pag.

He is not really an outlaw; he is a preservationist.

Ibid., N. pag.

He condensed whole feature-length films into single-frame elegance.

Fritscher, p. 45.

Mapplethorpe differs perhaps from other artists in photography by this insistence upon the darkness: if other photographers are artists precisely insofar as they see the light and register its capacity to seize and transform our response to the world, Mapplethorpe would be the photographer who sees the darkness.

I have presumed to say that he sees a particular darkness through three subjects: through flowers, through faces, through figures, discarding the prolixity, then, of the real and discarding the prolixity of the unreal. When we are not prolix (which means when we are not liquid), then we are concise (which means we are crystalline), and this indeed is Mapplethorpe’s quality and goal: to restore potency to flowers, to restore aesthetic dignity to the genitals, and to restore form to identity—and in so doing to set his images before us in such a way that we realize that what might never have been seen at all can never be seen as anything but what it appears. What is, as Paul Valéry used to say, the realization of the beautiful.

Marshall, N. pag.

Valéry, speaking of the effect of light upon the sea, calls it “a mass of calm and visible reserve.”

Ibid., N. pag.

His friend Lynn Davis recalls him asking for stronger and stronger light, to the point where you felt boxed in by power packs if you sat for a portrait.

Ashbery, p. 255.
Not for him the shadow-stealing of the unauthorized snapshot.

Sometimes their bodies are oiled, although Mapplethorpe himself disliked this look, believing it to be reminiscent of corny physique photography of the 1950s, and shot oiled bodies only when the subjects insisted.

Mapplethorpe was an adept of the cult of beauty and rejected the freakish photo à la Diane Arbus or the unmasked-celebrity photo à la Avedon.

Perfection means you don’t question anything about the photograph. I often have trouble with contemporary art because I find it’s not perfect.
Kardon, p. 28.

"I’m not after imperfections."
Ashbery, p. 253.

Objectify: the French word for “lens” is objectif.
White, Altars, p. 130.

Mapplethorpe usually gives us his subject’s names, or at least, depending on the model’s preference, his first name.

... the way the images from the X portfolio were segregated off in specially marked precincts into which one could not possibly wander by accident, so that one had to make a moral decision whether or not to look at them.
White, Altars, p. 130.

I confess to being a great deal more excited by Larry Clark’s pictures, partly because of their heterosexual content, partly because I imagine the sexual fantasies of most of us are teenage formations that never especially change.
Danto, p. 5.

It is Dionysiac and Apollonian at once.

[uninhibited and austere, dirty and pure, wild and disciplined]

The book must enter into the very fiber of its reader, whereas the photograph can be glanced at without being assimilated.

“Let’s face it, most photographers are living their lives vicariously by taking pictures. When they get into sex or pornographer it’s often a sort of cover-up for their own sexual inactivity or inadequacy. They’d rather do it through the camera and sublimate their desires in order to take pictures.
If Mapplethorpe was linked to earlier photographers and painters, he was also genuinely original, especially in his simplicity, his directness, his unapologetic curiosity, the unwavering force of his regard. As any look at gay art, whether literary or plastic, reveals, nothing is so difficult, so recent, so evolved as the simplicity of unmediated vision. Early gay fiction, for instance, is set in ancient Greece or in another country or occurs between innocent schoolboys or touches on the subject of forbidden sexuality only on the last page or takes place between an aristocrat and a lord on a fog-swept island or involves a doomed couple living far from other gay people. Madness or suicide or accidental death is usually the conclusion. Similarly, the alibi of early gay photography is the classical world or ballet or mythology or “scientific” studies of motion or degeneration. Sleeping boys or the dead Christ or the martyred Saint Sebastian or mudlarks fishing coins out of the Thames or naked wrestlers or exotic Arab dancing boys dressed as girls—these are just a few of the pretexts for earlier gay photography.

What is extraordinary about Mapplethorpe is his abandonment of all these contexts, this window dressing for, if you will, the naked fact of sexual curiosity and erotic intensity.
Ibid., p. 132–133.

Homosexuality has always been in a visual ghetto.
Marshall, N. pag.

The artificial atmosphere is often claustrophobic, which, subject matter aside, is even more shocking than that of the erotic pictures.
Ashbery, p. 255.

Pornography ordinarily represents the sexual organs, making them into a motionless object (a fetish), a flattered like an idol that does not leave its niche; for me, there is no punctum in the pornographic image; at most it amuses me (and even then, boredom follows quickly). The erotic photograph, on the contrary (and this is its very condition), does not make the sexual organs into a central object; it may very well not show them at all; it takes the spectator outside its frame, and it is there that I animate this photograph and that it animates me. The punctum, then, is a kind of subtle beyond—as if the image launched desire beyond what it permits us to see: not only “the rest” of the nakedness, not only toward “the rest” of the nakedness, not only toward the fantasy of a praxis, but toward the absolute excellence of a being, body and soul together.
Barthes, Camera, p. 59.

“I am obsessed with beauty. I want everything to be perfect and, of course, it isn’t. And that’s a tough place to be because you’re never really satisfied.”
Morrisroe, p. 182.

George Dureau was another photographer whose work attracted Mapplethorpe’s attention; Dureau, a resident of New Orleans, had a curious relationship to his models, many of whom were dwarves and amputees. “I ran a little kingdom where I was an esteemed patriarch,” he said, “and the blacks were like natives of my village.” Dureau often met his models by driving through the city in his pickup truck and offering to give them a ride; his photographs were strategically placed in the backseat. “They’d look at them and say, “What a coincidence! I have a missing leg, too,' "Dureau explained. "Then I’d offer to photograph them. Almost everyone on earth wants to be remembered." When Mapplethorpe saw a picture of Dureau’s longtime lover, Wilbert Hines, nicknamed “Wing Ding,” whose left arm had been amputated at the elbow, he wrote to the photographer and asked if he could buy the photograph. He then invited Dureau to New York, where the two men discussed their approach to the subject of black men. Dureau explained that he viewed his models’ handicaps as visual metaphors, and that despite their disabilities, he saw them as vibrant, sexual creatures. Dureau spent only a short time taking pictures; most of his efforts, he said, were directed at understanding the model as a human being. “Okay,” Mapplethorpe interrupted, “but what’s your feeling about their armpits?” Dureau was appalled by his single-minded focus on sex. “I was searching for the greatest universal truths,” he said, “and Robert was searching for pungent armpits.”

Ibid., p. 238.

He almost always used coke during a shooting and frequently offered it to his sitters. The wide-eyed stare that became a distinguishing characteristic of his portraits was often the result of cocaine, and when it wasn’t, he seemed to be aiming for a sharp “coke look.”

Ibid., p. 267.

As early as 1971, he made the astonishing confession — or was it a challenge, even a defiance? — about his work as a portrait-maker: “I often don’t know who these people are. It’s not that important to me. I never had heroes.”

Marshall, N. pag.

In Mapplethorpe’s portraits, almost no one is smiling.

Ibid., N. pag.

A remarkable exception to this general solemnity of regard is the portrait of Louise Bourgeois (one of three superb effigies of old women artists in Certain People, the others, Alice Neel and Lee Krasner, revealed as flaunting the damages of a lifetime like a shield before them, stoically endured). Sometimes exhibited or reproduced in a cropped version, the Louise Bourgeois portrait then seems no more than a rictus of mysterious complicity. Seen in the version Mapplethorpe prints in the book, the complicity is accounted for: under her arm (and she is wearing a shaggy monkey fur jacket which accentuates the spooky side of things), she carries like a sidearm her own sculpture of a two-foot phallus-and-testicles, lighted and held in such a way as to form the base of a sinister — castrational? — pyramid. The livid light on Bourgeois’ face, explicitly tracing the seamed and wrinkled flesh, pronounces sentence on the entire composition: like some sibyl out of Petronius, the sculptor is on her way to a ceremony of puzzling erotic nature; she knows what she is about to do, as the shocking hand makes explicit: fingers can be taught, but that thumb was born knowing.

Ibid., N. pag.

The portrait of Roy Cohn made in 1981 is precisely the portrait of everything that name has come to signify, and the portrait is not so much a proleptic death mask as a Veronica’s Veil of ill-omen, floating in a black void, bodiless and therefore soulless.

Ibid., N. pag.
Susan Sontag asked Mapplethorpe what he does with himself when he poses, to which he answered, ‘try to find that part of the subject which is self-confident.’

A Mapplethorpe portrait represents a power of the flesh as a Mapplethorpe flower constitutes an effigy of sacred assertion: it figures Being taken — posed, beguiled, inveigled by all the sortileges of darkness — to the very limits of itself, all that flesh is heir to without the connivance of circumstance.

What we call the facial mask has momentarily triumphed over individuality, over the personal, the human, and all that the merely human hides. Indeed, in the face of such an image, I no longer know why we must praise an artist, a photographer, for being “human,” when as Mapplethorpe shows us, all that fulfills and completes humanity is inhuman.

Nothing of Diane Arbus’ fascinated repulsion in Mapplethorpe’s exploration of drastic erotic identities.

Faces are transpicuous with energy, with appetite, yet there is always the gravity of the features, of the flesh which pulls, which ponderates, in the sense of bearing down what aspires to rise, to mount to expression, to identity.

I’ve tried to juxtapose a flower, then a picture of a cock, then a portrait, so that you could see they were the same thing.

Robert gave people permission to be avant-gardistes with photographs of lilies in the dining room, because, as soon as everyone knew about his fisting photographs, his lilies gained an edge. The flowers opened up whispered avant conversations about his forbidden photographs, which, at first, not too many had been granted favor to see.

Edward Steichen said in 1963 that the custom in New York since the 1920s was to hang nude art, especially photographs, discreetly away in the bedroom.

“So the subtext of the flower photographs’ popularity is the existence of the nude and leathersex photographs?”

“The forbidden photographs,” Edward replied, “made the flowers desirable, salable.”

“Did that same sexual subtext cause his celebrity portraits to succeed?”

“He definitely benefited from his private history. Of course, it was sexy to be shot by such a naughty boy.”

Sam Wagstaff: “As an old-fashioned gesture I once sent Mapplethorpe some flowers at Easter which, to my chagrin were greeted with snarls. ‘I hate flowers,’ he said and pretended to spit on them. Now, if you will, he still spits on them but with his Hasselblad, or he does something perverse to them that nobody else seems to have thought of before.”
Morrisroe, p. 182.

Many of Mapplethorpe’s flowers appear to have lost their virginity, as though the photographer himself had defiled them in some exotic and unspeakable way. There was an air of the kidnapper about him as he rushed home from Gifts of Nature, a florist shop on Sixth Avenue, his arms laded with orchids, irises, and tuberoses. By the time he had finished photographing his “gifts of nature” the had no connection to nature at all and had become, in Mapplethorpe’s words, “New York flowers”—hard edged and decadent. Like the hero of Joris-Karl Huysman’s novel Against Nature, Mapplethorpe despised “bourgeois blooms” and preferred orchids and lilies—the “princesses of the vegetable kingdom,” or in his case, the “princes.”

Flowers being the sex organs of plants, Mapplethorpe’s view of botanical reproduction was colored by his own sexual interests; he transformed protruding pistils and stamen into male genitalia. “My approach to photographing a flower is not much different than photographing a cock. Basically it’s the same thing.”

Mapplethorpe treated his flowers no differently than the men who modeled for him. He didn’t know what to do with the flowers once he had taken their picture, and since he didn’t want the responsibility of watering them, he tossed them in his garbage bin before they wilted and died.
Ibid., p. 182.

He always saved Robert his filthiest jockstraps and his best blooms for Robert’s Baudelairean flowers—of—evil still lives.
Fritscher, p. 27.

Janet Kardon: Do you think they’re threatening?
Robert Mapplethorpe: That’s not the exact word. But they’re not fun flowers.
Kardon, p. 25.

The “expression” of the uncircumcised glans and the “assertion” of the cut flower.
Marshall, N. pag.

In the heat of ardor, you might think, “That’s an elegant cock.” Normally, it’s not a subject you would consider elegant. But you think of flowers as possessing an elegance, or refinement, and I think you treat the flowers like the cocks and the cocks like the flowers.
Ibid., N. pag.

These frozen bouquets are so exquisite that they might almost have us forget the fact that hours or days after they have posed here they will end up on the street waiting for the garbage trucks. S Sischy, “Robert Mapplethorpe: a Society Artist,” N. pag.

Flowers spring up against their own weight; engorged with juice, they are never shown attached to the cycle which would make their momentary victory more than just that.
Marshall, N. pag.

Mapplethorpe: I don’t love flowers and I don’t like having them.
Q: What don’t you like about living with them... the bother of watering them?
A: Watering them and dripping on the floor.
Q: And watching them die?
A: And watching them die and feeling guilty about them. I can’t have part of my life devoted to flowers. But I can photograph them and get excited about photographing them... I’ll sort of force myself to photograph them before they die because I know I can get a good picture of them.

Ibid., N. pag.

His concern for the flowers is almost touching.
Ashbery, p. 253.

Flowers — just think of Emily Dickinson, of Georgia O’Keeffe, with their patient explorations of bloom — which have so traditionally been associated with female art and female organs, are here, in their engorged, erectile, anti-chthonic forms, identified with that “male” principle we so clumsily (and often so reductively) decry as “phallic.”
Marshall, N. pag.

Taking revenge on the flowers for the transience of their perfection.
Ashbery, p. 253.

“I think flowers have a certain edge... I don’t know if ‘nasty’ is the right word—if you look at the picture of the orchid, to me it is a kind of scorpion—it has a sharp edge to it. I get something out of flowers that other people don’t get... I love the pictures of flowers more than I love real flowers.”

Ibid., p. 253.

What is spoken, Heidegger says, is never — and in no language — what is said. I might add: not even in the language of flowers.
Marshall, N. pag.

On bright days, when the rest of Manhattan scintillates in the sunshine, he will emerge onto the sidewalk, screw up his face, and say, “I hate the sun.”
Chatwin, p. 10.

Can one feel sympathy for an artist who hates not only flowers but sunlight too?
Ashbery, p. 253.

Because he is fashionable, because there is tremendous demand for his work, and because so much of it cannot be shown in public, these presumably innocent photographs of flowers have been summoned to stand in for the others. It is impossible to look at them and ignore their context, and so they have taken on a further ambiguity: They are, in effect, calling attention to the pictures that are hidden from view. Like fig leaves for absent genitalia, they point to the scandal of what is not there.
Ashbery, p. 254.

Yeats: “the mystery which touches the genitals, a blurred touch through a curtain.” Marshall, N. pag.
This wasn't in the original plan: at most Mapplethorpe was trying to make some money with the flowers to finance other work that mattered more to him.

Ashbery, p. 255.

A vase of tulips, more disheveled and past their prime than he usually allows his subjects to get, is perched perilously on the edge of a table; one tulip at far left is about to swan-dive into the abyss.

Ibid., p. 256.

The great white calla lily whose horizontal lines serve as a foil to its proud gold erection, strikes an uncharacteristic jubilant note. It is an invitation to pleasure that will not be rebuffed.

N. Cit.

"Nulle fleur du jardin n'égale ma splendeur, / Mais la nature, hélas! n'a pas verse d'odeur / dans mon calce fair comme un vase de Chine."("No other flower of the garden equals me in splendor, But nature, alas! poured no scent into my calyx, shaped like a Chinese vase.")

N. Cit.

AIDS was too popular a form for Mapplethorpe to be excluded.

Fritscher, p. 216.

Several photographers who have AIDS all said they'd speeded up their production.

Ibid., p. 77.

Mapplethorpe, unlike Rock Hudson, wasn't a sympathetic AIDS victim.

N. Cit.

You know, faggots are dying.

Morrisroe, p. 270.

Contrary to his fears that rumors of AIDS would ruin his career, the disease only served to increase his sales potential. He was already one of the most visible photographers in the world, and during the past decade his work had been the subject of sixty-nine one-person shows, five books, and fifteen catalogues. But AIDS would soon catapult him into another realm of celebrityhood; unfortunately, nothing enhanced his life more than the prospect of his leaving it. "I don't think it's impossible to sell a million dollars' worth of Robert's pictures," Howard Read boasted to dealer Peter MacGill. "He's ill."

Prices often escalate after an artist's death—"the deader, the better" goes the art world saying—so Mapplethorpe's terminal illness had, according to Read, created a "built-in market condition," whereby people purchased Mapplethorpe photographs in anticipation of his demise. "AIDS," Read said, "had a terrific influence."

Lisa Lyon recalled a photography dealer calling her up to see if she'd sell some of her Mapplethorpe photographs from Lady. "The dealer said, 'You know, Robert's dead,' " she explained, "so I immediately got crazy and said, 'What do you mean he's dead?' Then the dealer told me, 'Well, he's dead... in terms of the market.'"

Ibid., p. 323.

Mapplethorpe's ability to discuss his work in terms of "just starting" was an example of how he truly believed in the magic power of his own creativity, and how, despite his deteriorating body, he was still capable of expanding the boundaries of his vision. Physically, however, he was like the photograph of Thomas Williams trapped in the circle. The neuropathy was spreading from his feet to his legs, and from his fingers to his hands. Since Mapplethorpe had long defined his identity in terms of sex, it must have terrified him to imagine a nerve disorder traveling to his genitals, and he obsessed on the idea that when it struck the center of his body, it meant he would no longer exist.

Yet AIDS had already diminished his sexual desire, and in response, he wasn’t focusing on black nudes anymore. “I’m over that phase,” he told Janet Kardon. “I’m not photographing anything naked these days. That isn’t to say I won’t again, but I haven’t been concentrating on bodies recently.” Instead, he turned his attention to marble statues—“chilly white icons of desire,” as art critic Kay Larson described them.

In doing so, Mapplethorpe had come full circle, for having once excelled at transforming his models into pieces of sculpture, he was now attempting to breathe life into stone. Most of the statues he photographed were nineteenth and twentieth-century reproductions of classical gods, which Dimitri Levas bought for him at Malmaison. Mapplethorpe purposely sought the reproductions because the ancient classical figures were rarely in perfect condition, and he did not want to own them if they were missing “noses and things.” Yet even his reproduction gods failed to measure up to his exacting standards, and discovering a slight mark on the bridge of Apollo’s nose, he sent the statue out to be professionally cleaned. He then began sending all his statues out for cleaning until Levas finally put a stop to it. “This is ridiculous,” he said. “You’re ruining the beautiful patina and making them look like brand-new statues. It doesn’t make any sense.”

Ibid., p. 334.

To legitimize itself from stigmas, bodybuilding often referenced classic statuary. Gaines’s pop-seminal Pumping Iron called bodybuilders “living sculpture.”

Fritscher, pp. 221-2.

John Russell Taylor, in a review of the show for The Times, attributed the sudden surge of interest in Mapplethorpe not to his talent, which he found to be on the level “of the average photographic graduate from art school,” but to the elaborate myths surrounding his career: “Certainly no photographer of recent times—perhaps no photographer ever—has been so ruthlessly hyped, so skillfully merchandised.” The issue of Mapplethorpe’s impending death from AIDS only served to enhance the myth.

Morrisroe, p. 232.

A late exhibition of Mapplethorpe’s busts and religious icons. Gallery-goers meditated on his photograph of a crucified Christ figure as if they were studying the Pietà. One man swore he could see a real tear in the eye of an African bronze.

Ibid., p. 356.

Mapplethorpe’s Whitney retrospective, summer 1988. People poured into the exhibit by the dozens, until Mapplethorpe was nearly engulfed by a crowd that numbered sixteen hundred. The museum’s air conditioning was malfunctioning, so the rooms were sweltering, and the fashionably attired guests were soon complaining that the museum felt like a sauna.
Meanwhile, paparazzi encircled the couch hoping to capture what was fast becoming a new genre of celebrity portraiture—the AIDS shot.

Ibid., p. 345.

Mapplethorpe’s eyes were one of the few parts of his body relatively unaffected by the disease, and his compulsion to weed the ugly from the beautiful was the only way he could still exert control over his life. Fittingly, his last self-portrait was a picture of his eyes only.

Ibid., p. 354.

Among the last images was a faint self-portrait, followed by his signature—“Robert Mapplethorpe... Robert Mapplethorpe... Robert Mapplethorpe”—until his name was reduced to a blur.

Ibid., p. 359.

I used to think Mapplethorpe’s photography was grim with the restrictive occasions of obsession and fetishism; but after a certain meditation, pondering their reasons and their realizations, I discern these pictures—a good share of them—to be emblems of contested mortality, grave with the contradictions of organic life in their aspiration to ecstasy, as crystalline in terms of their own art as the sonatas of Scarlatti or the last paintings of Mondrian, but as problematic, as imprecatory as any representation of the body I know, fond enemy and ally.

Marshall, N. pag.

Mapplethorpe’s final photo-sort profiles the homage he paid to photographers, historical or personal friends, who influenced him or whom he admired: F. Holland Day (Orpheus Series, Return to Earth), Adolph de Meyer (The Opium Smoker and Portrait of Robert Stowitz in a Diaghilev Ballet), Harold Edgerton (30 Cal. Bullet through an Apple), George Dureau (assorted male nude studies), Peter Hujar (selected images), Clarence Kennedy (fashion and society sculpture studies), Angus McBean (male face portrait and reclining male nude), George Platt Lynes, Julia Margaret Cameron (The Shadow of the Cross), Edward Curtis (Native American Portraits: Crow–Chief White Swan and The Potter, Hopi), Edward Steichen (Fashion Portrait), Alfred Stieglitz (Portrait of Marie Rapp), three from Diane Arbus, two from Bruce Weber, seven from Joel–Peter Witkin (Lisa Lyon as Hercules, bearded, and Mandan, depicting the sun dance ritual enacted by Fakir Musafar), five from longtime friend and Mapplethorpe Foundation board member Lynn Davis (Iceberg and Selected Images), and two from Annie Leibovitz (John Lennon and Yoko Ono, 1980: Lennon nude, curled fetally across the reclining Ono whose hair flows across the floor; this photograph was taken the afternoon of the evening Lennon was shot).

Fritscher, p. 89.

Drawings, photographs and screens of Mapplethorpe, sold on the auction block: Patti Smith, Robert Mapplethorpe and Patti Smith Go to Coney Island Together, graphite and crayons, $400; David Hockney, Portrait of Robert Mapplethorpe, pen and black ink on paper, New York, June 1, 1971, $75,000; Francesco Clemente, Untitled (Robert Mapplethorpe), watercolor on paper, March 1976, $15,000; Don Bacardy, Portrait of Robert Mapplethorpe, pen and black ink wash on paper, February 2, 1979, $1,500; Tom of Finland, Portrait of Robert Mapplethorpe, 1979, $600; Andy Warhol, Portrait of Robert Mapplethorpe, synthetic polymer silkscreen on canvas—unframed. 1983, $120,000.
Ibid., p. 90.

After Mapplethorpe’s death, magazine mail-order advertisements offered an edition of collectible “dinner” plates printed with his signature calla lily. T-shirts are sold in museum shops along with posters and greeting cards. His photographs appear on refrigerator magnets manufactured in places where copyright means nothing.

Fritscher, p. 192.

Three Mapplethorpe photographs were found, trashed in a dumpster in San Rafael. At the time vintage Mapplethorpe sold for $10,000. The photographs, all signed, were dated 1977.

Ibid., p. 187.

The Vatican’s art collection is rumored to have more than one “forbidden” Mapplethorpe.

Ibid., p. 185.

Mapplethorpe’s memorial service at the Whitney Museum was a “guests only” affair, and several of the photographer’s friends who wanted to pay their respects had to sneak past the Mapplethorpe sentinels at the door. Music executive Danny Fields, who had been the first person to befriend Mapplethorpe and Patti Smith at Max’s Kansas City, was confronted by a woman demanding “Where’s your ticket?” When he confessed he didn’t have one. “It’s a memorial service,” he said, “not a rock concert”—he was informed that without a ticket he couldn’t have a seat, although standing room was still available in the back. “One of the ushers was a friend of mine,” Fields recalled, “so I told him, ‘This is embarrassing … get me a seat.’ Then I looked around me, and I couldn’t figure out what any of the people had to do with Robert’s life. There were no black men, and I didn’t see any of the gay crowd from the Eagle’s Nest or the Mineshaft. It was mostly art dealers in suits and leaders of fashion society, and you could almost see prices climbing in everybody’s heads. It was like an auction at Christie’s.”

Photographer Sheila Metzner was overheard saying, “I feel bad that Robert’s dead, but I’m just glad to be alive.” A photographer from British Vogue was trying to get pictures of the memorial for the magazine, and the celebrity count was on the low side.

Morrisroe, p. 368.

He loving photographed his things in the glamorous, pricey style suited for beautiful commercial print ads for magazines to up their resale value.

When finally his precious objects were auctioned, he had, in addition, his beautiful photographs of them: sale objects selling themselves. The physical collectible might be sold, but he maintained ownership of the negatives of their photographs. Because he photographed the objects, they were worth even more, endorsed by his selection and enhanced by his take.

Every perfect object served double duty.
Through his camera, he multiplied his loot.
He not only sold the stuff.
He sold photographs of the stuff.
The Christie’s auction was a collection of the relics of St. Mapplethorpe.
He endorsed his collection the way athletes endorse Wheaties. He upped the value. A George Sakier glass vase became even more important when collected, photographed, and signed by Mapplethorpe.
When Arthur C. Danto’s overwhelming Mapplethorpe, created with the cooperation of Robert’s estate, appeared with 280 duotones, London’s Harrods, one of the world’s largest departments stores, declared the book pornographic. The same week in November 1992, Harrods sold out, in one hour, their entire allotment of Madonna’s book, Sex, with heterosexual and lesbian photographs by Stephen Meisel.

Actually, the Mapplethorpe Truth is not going to match the Mapplethorpe Legend. And people will always prefer the legend.

Mapplethorpe would love the contretemps of corporate biography competing with personal reminiscence.

Mapplethorpe had excluded his parents from his multimillion-dollar will.

Morrisroe, p. 368.

No one claimed Mapplethorpe’s ashes.

"New York," Zelda said, "is more full of reflections than of itself."
Douglas, Honesty, p. 59.

The reflecting surfaces, of the ironic, of the epic order, suspended in the New York atmosphere, have yet to show symptoms of shining out, and the monstrous phenomena themselves, meanwhile, strike me as having, with their immense momentum, got the start, got ahead of, in proper parlance, any possibility of poetic, of dramatic capture.
James, p. 83.

City of a million mirrors, actual and unseen.
Reisenberg, p. 207.

Self-consciousness has come to suggest a beam of light thrown back upon itself after impact with a reflecting surface.
Gasche, p. 16.

Reflections and mirrorings, transparent and translucent building materials are carefully calculated and organized to focus divergent spatial vistas in one visual grasp.
Friedberg, p. 120.

The reflecting surfaces, of the ironic, of the epic order, suspended in the atmosphere, have yet to show symptoms of shining out, and the monstrous phenomena themselves, meanwhile, strike me as having, with their immense momentum, got the start, got ahead of, in proper parlance, any possibility of poetic, of dramatic capture.
James, p. 378.

The vertical reflections on the sidewalk.
Sharpe, p. 125.

A window-ledge refraction, where the curved surface of a brandy glass capsizes the skyline of Washington Square South, holding it afloat and inverted: the city acquiescently melts in the transparent chambre claire of the glass.
Conrad, p. 175.

A viewer can't tell whether a pane of glass acts like a mirror or a cloth.
Kozloff, n. pag.

The street dies in the mirror.
Garfias, p. 305.

The city rights and assigns, that is, it signifies, orders, stipulates. What? That is to be discovered by reflection.
Lefebvre, p. 102.

Reflection is the structure and the process of an operation that, in addition to designating the action of a mirror reproducing an object, implies that mirror's mirroring itself, by which process the mirror is made to see itself.
Gasche, pp. 16-7.
The metaphor of the mirror—producing substitutive, deceptive, illusory vision—and the metaphor of the window—producing direct, veridical, unmediated vision—imply very different epistemological consequences.
Friedberg, p. 15.

New York was more full of reflection than of itself—the only concrete things in town were the abstractions.
Fitzgerald, Waltz, p. 68.

Is there any other place where an entire cloud bank can be completely reflected in the windows of one wall of only one building, and with room to spare?
Finney, p. 10.

Glass, in hues of plum to bronze to charcoal, that mirror their towering neighbors.
N. cit.

The blackness somewhere gouged glass on a sky.

In the large plate glass, he saw a clear reflection of himself and the crowds that were passing, like shadows at his back.

Imagine a city iridescent by day, luminous by night, imperishable! Buildings—shimmering fabrics—woven of rich glass—glass all clear or part opaque and part clear-patterned in color or stamped... Such a city would clean itself in the rain, would know no fire alarms nor any glooms. [Purity] [Weather]
Friedberg, p. 116.

I start to stalk the dark, cold streets off Central Park West and I catch sight of my face reflected in the tinted windows of a limousine that’s parked in front of Café des Artistes.
Ellis, Psycho, p. 163.

Stopping on the corner of East Fourth I catch my reflection superimposed in the glass covering of an Armani Exchange ad.
[Advertising]
Ellis, Glamorama, p. 107.

If you’re left alone, you cheer up yourself by becoming an amusing stranger to yourself in the mirror, relying on it to supply you with company.
Conrad, p. 102.

Reflection shows itself to mean primarily self-reflection, self-relation, self-mirroring.
Gasche, p. 13.

We don’t think about it. The girls keep looking in the mirror... which is all right by me. I loathe narcissism, but I approve of vanity.
Vreeland Papers, NYPL.
The sides of tall buildings on Forty-second Street reflect the lightnings and amplify the crashes.
Reisenberg, pp. 189-190.

Boxes of various products, bottles, cars, always cellophaned and supplied with reflections. [Commodity]
Corbusier, p. 101.

... the shattered glass glittered in the street like the water of a flooded river upon the surface of which I ran as in a dream...
Ellison, p. 546.

Warhol suggested that the Velvet Underground's LP have a built-in skip so that the line “I’ll be your mirror” would repeat infinitely.
“I’ll Be Your Mirror,” N. pag.

With the inordinate length of the buildings, and the winking colors of the traffic controls, all the motions are doubled, tripled and magnified tenfold by the asphalt—which has been licked as clean as a mirror by the rain.
Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 47.

When glass architecture comes in, there will not be much more talk of windows either; the word “window” will disappear from the dictionaries... The window will effectively become the wall.
Scheerbart, p. 55

Windows are much more expensive to build than blank walls; they occupy valuable wall space; they increase heating costs; their washing is a big item of expense; and the light they admit fades most kinds of hangings and decorations more rapidly than does artificial light.
American Meteorological, p. 88.

As a transparent vehicle, the window is that which admits light—or spirit—into the initial darkness of the room. But if glass transmits, it also reflects. And so the window is experienced by the symbolist as a mirror as well—something that freezes and locks the self into the space of its own reduplicated being. Flowing and freezing; glace in French means glass, mirror, and ice; transparency, opacity, and water.
Krauss, pp. 59-60.

The metaphors of windows and mirrors fall into a slippery discursive tumble of synecdoche and displacement.
Friedberg, p. 18.

Moloch whose eyes are a thousand blind windows!
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 6.

Brick culture does us only harm.
Friedberg, p. 115.

The 1920s had delighted in hard surfaces.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 470.

The concept of transparency takes on a new set of meanings in the utopian turns of architectural modernism.
Friedberg, p. 117.
Transparency has an odd effect on the discursive “materiality” of glass.

Transparency means simultaneous perception of different spatial locations.

Dematerializing the corners

Thermopane, a type of double glazed window with two pieces of glass separated by a sealed air space invented in 1930s, reduces the degree of air-conditioning ordinarily needed to counter the effect of the sun on so much skyscraper glass, thus making it possible for glass curtained buildings. [Climate]
Trager, p. 578.

A complete visibility without exposure of the other senses.
Friedberg, p. 117.

All around you is a building unchanged from the day it was built, including the room you stand in and very possibly even the glass pane you look through. And this is what’s unique in New York: Everything you see outside the window is also unchanged. [Memory] [Nostalgia] [Stasis]
Finney, pp. 74-5.

The condition of the window implies a boundary between the perceiver and the perceived. It establishes as a condition for perception a formal separation between a subject who sees the world and the world that is seen, and in so doing it sets the stage, as it were, for that retreat or withdrawal of the self from the world which characterizes the dawn of the modern age. Ensconced behind the window the self becomes an observing subject, a spectator, as against a world which becomes a spectacle, an object of vision.
Friedberg, p. 16.

One gloomy afternoon, millions were won and lost in bets over which raindrop would first reach the bottom of a window.
Culbertson & Randall, p. 150.

One window was streaked with something that looked like soy sauce.
Kinkead, p. 18.

Window cleaners charge very high prices and do a smeary, slovenly job of window cleaning.
Atkinson, p. 30.

Lever House: a traveling gondola suspended from its roof enables window cleaners to wash its 1,404 panes of heat-resistant blue-green glass, but the windows are sealed, the centrally air-conditioned building makes profligate use of energy, and it will be a model for energy wasting architectural extravaganzas that will be constructed throughout most of the world.
Trager, p. 590.
I looked out the windows, and they were dirty, very much the tonality of Rauschenberg’s pictures. They were very much New York Lower Broadway windows.

Kostelanetz, p. 5.

Although New York has more windows than any other city in the world, it has no window life. In Italy, a large part of the day is happily spent leaning on the windowsill. When Spain was a land of peace, much of her social life was carried on from the balcony. A dance in a London square brings neighbouring footmen, housemaids and passersby to see the waltzing figures pass lighted windows. Tweenies in curl papers gaze dreamily down into lamplit squares before going to bed. Yet here, in New York, never a face is to be seen at the numberless windows. Only when one passes them in a train do these illuminated frames show any life at all—a family in shirt-sleeves, eating its evening meal in full view of the plumbing fixtures; a couple dancing halfheartedly to an unheard radio; a man, like a wax figure, studying an unseen mirror as he shaves his latherless face with an electric razor. [Voyeur]

Beaton, Portrait, p. 30.

Rosario Candela: designer of irregular fenestration. [Candela] [Architecture]

Hawes, N. pag.

Windows split the city’s great hell into tiny hellets—vamps with lamps.
Mayakovsky, “Hell” p. 505.

Tall office buildings closed up for the night with drawn curtains, so that the faces of the buildings looked hard and cruel and lifeless.
Stevens, Letters, pp. 67–8

Windows rather sinister in their lidded blankness.

Conrad, p. 103.

Blank windows gargle signals through the roar. [Sound]
Crane, “Tunnel,” p. 95.

Voyeur, Exhibitionism

Darkness whirls streaks of light, shadows against people’s windows:
are you in?

Parland, p. 346.

The odd idea that New Yorkers abhor shades or window treatment, content with the knowledge that everyone can (and does) see each other.

Sharpe, p. 274.

When we moved in, I acquired a pair of binoculars. Now, I stand in the kitchen, binoculars trained on the twenty-storey building next door. Any neighbors who don’t like it, I reasoned at first, could simply draw their nets. Not one window opposite has net curtains; not one has any curtains that close for that matter.
No one knows or apparently cares that I am watching. If you assume the world outside is hostile, you try to shut it out. If you assume that it's merely impersonal, that it doesn't give a damn about you either way, there's no point in bothering.
Blandford, p. 11.

Voyeurism rests on a kind of fiction, more or less justified in the order of the real, a fiction that stipulates that the object "agrees," that it is therefore exhibitionist.
Metz, p. 62.

One night window offers the man sexual fantasy, the other domestic drudgery.
Sharpe, p. 274.

How much undressing will the girl do by the window? Will she turn out the light or discover our presence before she is naked?
Ibid., p. 274.

All voyeuristic desire depends on the infinite pursuit of its absent object.
Metz, p. 60.

Town of snoopers, peepers, keyhole astronomers.
Reisenberg, p. 208.

The voyeur is very careful to maintain a gulf, an empty space, between the object and the eye, the object and his own body... the voyeur represents in space the fracture which forever separates him from the object.
Metz, p. 60.

Edward Hopper, tireless street prowler and elevated snooper.
Sharpe, p. 277.

Hopper used the vantage point of the nighttime elevated train to encourage viewers to fantasize about people never to be seen again—except in the picture frame, where they are frozen forever in the instant when their unknowability hovers on the edge of a giveaway act.
Ibid., p. 277.

Racing up Third Avenue on the el, gazing into living rooms out of John Sloan or Edward Hopper.
Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

"Nighthawks," he once said, "seems to be the way I think of a night street."
Levin, Hopper, p. 349.

Bare interiors starkly lit by electric light spotlight the invisible desperation of motionless people in their supposed leisure hours.
Conrad, p. 102.

From a position above the street, he looks in to an upper-story apartment. Three windows glow; the middle one reveals, in a patch of interior light, the buttocks, bare legs, and bare back of a slip-clad woman who bends forward into her room, away from the window. Her head and feet are cut off by the heavy masonry of her apartment building’s walls. Her vulnerability—or is it availability?—to the implied male viewer is signaled by the open window on the left, whose thin curtain, echoing the curve of her torso, flutters out in the breeze. Meanwhile, the window on the right glares flame-like through a backlit red curtain... The central window and the provocative posterior beckon at the cusp of the curve, open to the night air, while an exterior ledge wide enough to support a bold criminal or lover accentuates the rounding of the corner, the broachable interior, and the soft fall of light from inside outward.

Sharpe, pp. 278-9.

The couple on the El have turned away, twisting awkwardly together in their desire to guard themselves from observation.

Conrad, p. 104.

Hopper recalled that the picture “was probably first suggested by many rides on the ‘L’ train in New York City after dark and glimpses of office interiors that were so fleeting as to leave fresh and vivid impressions on my mind.”

Sharpe, p. 281.

He commented that his “East Side Interior” (1922) derives from “memories of glimpses of rooms seen from the streets in the eastside in my walks.” (cf. Haden: “Lovecraft and his circle spent several years, on and off, exploring the city by night...” [Flâneur])

A Hopper interior is never a shelter. Seeing into his rooms, you see through them, as with that glass box which contains, as if in a cage or an aquarium, his “Nighthawks.” No blinds mask the scenes of depression or sexual discontent he looks in on because the emotional lives of his people are as unfurnished as their rooms or the streets they frequent in the small hours.

Ibid., p. 105.

The painter’s surest way of knowing his fellow citizens is to spy on them.

Ibid., p. 101.

[John Sloan] was offended when, in his new studio on West 4th Street, some Italians salaciously bored holes through the wall to peek at the artist closeted with his models.

Ibid., p. 101.

Sloan’s looking is a speculative sympathy, a guessing fascination with the lives of others, like the couple he observes across the backyards on West 24th Street. The woman has bleached hair, the man lacks a hand. “I have rather fancied,” Sloan records, “the notion that he is something of an outlaw.”

Ibid., p. 101.

Sloan thinks of New York as a landscape populated by chubby healthy female nudes, who sun themselves on rooftops. [Body in City]

Ibid., p. 91

From his studio on West 23rd Street Sloan could spy on such women bathing in rooms across the backyard or sunning themselves on the roof, and he would often walk east to the Flatiron, where the impudent air currents between the buildings caused the skirts of passersby to blow around their knees. In adjacent Madison Square he would “soak up a little sunlight,” his own urban body luxuriantly roasting itself.

In these trailing skirt days it was nothing unusual to see a crowd of boys and young men and men not so young, congregate around the sheltered doorways of the Flatiron Building. The gusts that were created by the peculiar position of this particular building were the cause of much embarrassment to the ladies caught unaware in a mall-sized hurricane. The resultant effect—sometimes you could actually see a glimpse of hosiery—was the cause of much merriment among the cloistered group in the doorways. (c.f. At the Foot of the Flatiron. American Mutoscope and Biograph Co., November 2, 1903; Susan Strasberg & Marilyn Monroe on Fifth Avenue [Power]; Straw Hat Riots [Fashion])

The afternoon shot full of windows.
Arce, p. 20.

On West 26th Street he sees “eyes between the slats of shutters” and hears soft voices inviting him.

In June 1906 he watches a baby die in a neighboring room and is as helplessly concerned as the men who can only clumsily force a drink on the distraught mother.

King Vidor, making The Crowd in New York in 1928, hides the camera inside a barricade of packing crates on a corner or mounted it on the back of a truck from where it peers out through a hole in the flap. Vidor loiters alongside, posing as an idler on the street, and mutters his instructions to the cameraman under cover. [Cinema]

Voyeurism rests on a kind of fiction, more or less justified in the order of the real, a fiction that stipulates that the object “agrees,” that it is therefore exhibitionist.
Metz, p. 62.

The filming of Dassin’s “The Naked City” is organized with a devious skill worthy of the criminals whose activity it investigates. To allay the suspicions of passersby, diversions are staged: a juggler performs and a man propped on a thirty-foot ladder waves the American flag. Street smart imps relish the way the camera picks the pockets of the citizens by cheating them of their fees as extras. A shoeshine boy remarks to the producer, Mark Hellinger, that the crowd distracted by the juggler “should be getting twenty-five a day for being in the movies and they don’t know it.” Sometimes, while conducting surveillance, the camera unintentionally sees things it shouldn’t—not breaches of the law but incriminating social details which Dassin is forced to cut from the release print, such as Bowery bums selling off their last possessions outside the Diamond Exchange. [Cinema]
Conrad, p. 159.
The Naked City (1948): Two hundred thousand New Yorkers turned out to watch the camera crews; at one point the producers turned to a professional juggler to help distract the crowds while the actual shooting was completed.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 330.

Pleasure derived as much from the witnessing of lovely images as from any sexual embrace.
Wojnarowicz, p. 140.

This is the city self, looking from window to lighted window / It is the city consciousness / Which sees and says: more: more and more: always more.
Schwartz, p. 4.

After the day’s work I climb up these stairs into the distant company of strange yet friendly windows burning over the roofs. I read a few hours, catch glimpses of my neighbors in their nightgowns, watch their lights disappear ad then am swallowed up in the huge velvet October night.
Stevens, pp. 67-8

The fleeting intimacy you form with people in second- and third-floor interiors, while all the usual street life goes on underneath, has a domestic intensity mixed with a perfect repose that is the last effect of good society with all its security and exclusiveness. It is better than the theater, seeing those people through their windows: a family party of workfolk at a late tea, some of the men in their shirt sleeves; a woman sewing by a lamp; a mother laying her child in its cradle; a man with his head fallen on his hands upon a table; a girl and her lover leaning over the window-sill together. What suggestion! What drama! What infinite interest!
Sharpe, p. 271.

Like spotlights, streetlamps create pools of light to direct the viewer’s gaze; like stage sets, lit interiors framed glimpses of intimate life for strangers watching in the dark.
Ibid., p. 267.

hazy brilliance of windows
Khlebnikov, p. 47.

Hers is the only light in the apartment building, and I see her shadow pass the drawn curtains twice, then recede back into the room.
Spillane, p. 268.

You stand at the corner of Bleecker and Cornelia and gaze at the windows on the fourth floor of a tenement.
McInerney, p. 9.

This evening, on my way to supper, I see the man again. He is standing across the street, leaning against a tree and staring up at Holly’s windows. Sinister speculations rush through my head. Is he a detective? Or some underworld agent connected with her Sing Sing friend, Sally Tomato? The situation revives my tenderer feelings for Holly; it is only fair to interrupt our feud long enough to warn her that she is being watched. As I walk to the corner, heading east toward the Hamburg Heaven at Seventy-ninth and Madison, I can feel the man’s attention focused on me. Presently, without turning my head, I know that he is following me. Because I can hear him whistling. Not any ordinary tune, but the plaintive, prairie melody Holly sometimes plays on her guitar: Don’t wanna sleep, don’t wanna die, just wanna go a-travelin’ through the pastures of the sky. The whistling continues across Park Avenue and up Madison. While waiting for a traffic light to change, I watch him out of the corner of my eye as he stops to pet a sleazy Pomeranian. “That’s a fine animal you got there,” he tells the owner in a hoarse, countrified drawl.

Capote, p. 52.

It’s been a year since anyone occupied the apartment on the top floor of the little building tucked into a small street in the financial district. Its windows are empty, pools of darkness in an area that is beginning to brighten as the neon sheen of night arises.

Brooks, p. 53.

The windows of a large studio apartment on Greenwich Avenue were flung open with a flourish last Thursday afternoon and a girl dressed in a black sweater and what looked like black tights peered out. There is nothing significant in either this item or any of the information that follows, and the only reason I mention it is that the apartment windows are across the street from this office, thereby catching my eye several times a day.

For the past two or three weeks, the apartment has been empty, its windows closed and blinds drawn. I went to have a look at it myself one day and though it would’ve been just the right location and size for me, its $80 rent was beyond my budget. I’m sure the new tenant will like it, however; apart from the big windows, it has a fireplace, an excellent view, and a fire escape suitable for a kitten.

The new girl, still in black, was pottering around most of Thursday evening—probably unpacking—but the light from three table lamps kept most of her face in shadow. From what I could see of her, she looked like a Shirley or possibly a Jennifer. I doubt if she has had the time to reach any conclusions about us.

Wilcock, p. 155.

The girl in the apartment across the street is a blonde called Kay. Born in Minneapolis, she works in a public-relations office uptown, and just got back from a Paris vacation. This information isn’t from observation—a man in her office called me. In fact, since my peeping-john note of last week, my new neighbor has kept her blinds drawn.

Ibid., p. 169.

Intrigue was largely an indoor business, an acquis communautaire negotiated behind the windows in the skyline’s million slits.

McCourt, p. 31.

While he is continuing his phone conversation, we see the object of his look. Two pretty girls have appeared on the distant roof. They are smiling and talking, although we cannot hear their dialogue. Each wears a terrycloth robe. With their backs to the CAMERA, they take off the robes, slipping them down over their shoulders slowly. Then, seductively, they turn—revealing the full beauty of their tanned and bathing-suited bodies. It is almost as if they want to be noticed, the center of neighborhood attention. They at least have all of Jeff’s attention. Then they spread the robes in front of them, and lie down on the roof, and out of sight. He seems a little disappointed.
Hayes, p. 6.

I can smell trouble right in this apartment. You broke your leg. You look out the window. You see things you shouldn’t.

Hayes, p. 16.

There is a slight, but warm, smile on his face as he looks at the drawn shade. His eyes move away from the newlyweds’ apartment, and slowly explore the neighborhood to his right. He finds something of interest, and stops to stare at it. His face sobers at what he sees. He becomes completely absorbed with he sees. He leans forward a little.

Ibid., p. 35.

He returns to the window. He lights a cigarette and smokes it peacefully, as he contemplates the neighborhood.

Ibid., p. 45.

From his viewpoint we see the first few drops of rain starting to fall. It is sort, gentle rain, not a downpour. There are still some windows lit in the neighborhood. The apartment house corridors all have small night lights burning.

Ibid., p. 46.

The couple who sleep on the fire escape. The increasing rain cause them to hastily gather their things to retreat inside.

Ibid., p. 46.

He lowers the binoculars and there is an expression of exasperation on his face. He throws the binoculars down, and then looks about him. He backs his chair up quickly toward the main cabinet on his left. He leans down, opens a cupboard door and takes out a long-focus lens. Then from a shelf above he takes a small Exacta camera. He quickly takes off the existing lens and puts on the telephoto lens in its place. He wheels himself back to the window and raises the camera to his eye. He lowers the camera for a moment, and watches tensely. Suddenly he puts it up to his eye again.

Ibid., p. 57.

We have been able to see all this because it has transpired in front of open windows, or on fire escapes or terraces. No one has bothered to shut themselves off from view by closing blinds, or using interior rooms, or avoiding outdoor areas. And these are clearly rituals, performed everyday in a casual, unthinking manner, without a trace of self-consciousness. If we really were a “race of Peeping Toms,” would not people regularly try to hide themselves behind solid walls and shuttered windows? Instead, they reveal themselves to an astounding degree. It is no trivial point; in fact, it is an important lesson on how cities work.

Some of their behavior can be traced to the heat; in the days before residential air-conditioning became common, summer life in the city naturally gravitated toward open windows, or to outdoor spaces like fire escapes. But some of their behavior, it is fair to speculate, is encouraged by the space itself. Many of these people might feel far less comfortable performing the same actions on the street side of their buildings, in full view of strangers. Is there something about this courtyard that encourages them to feel comfortable treating it as an extension of their homes?
There is. The courtyard, as Hitchcock shows us, is a place of perceived privacy—a subtle yet enormously valuable quality for an urban space. Real privacy comes from actual isolation, from placing oneself behind closed doors and solid walls. Perceived privacy grows from the sense that, while others might be looking, it is reasonable to act as if they are not. Perceived privacy allows urban dwellers to go about their lives without the tiresome effort of constantly closing blinds and shades and shutting themselves off from the light, view, and air of windows, doors, terraces, and yards.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 233.

Privacy is undermined by the complexity of the sewer network... Sewers, like gas and electricity, involve the intrusion of an external institution into the private home.

Dennis, p. 326.

Photography

The camera seemed made to record the velocity of urban existence: one machine competitively raced another.

Conrad, p. 154.

People seen in New York appear as acute, as carelessly and permanently vivid as only images of themselves could be. New York is the camera town. Always the sharp but unnoticed click: the face caught in the store window, the short sounds struck from the pavements, the air broken by buildings, the quick discarded moment, the disconnected continuous opportunities for defining and defining without the solace or the dullness of meaning.

Douglas, Honesty, p. 59.

The camera’s presence in the city offends against that urban pact whereby we abide the congestion which has denied us privacy by politely ignoring one another. To be photographed is to be stared at, which urban etiquette forbids (except to out-of-towners, who have come to gape). The photographic image knows that it’s accosting and perhaps defrauding its subject because its purpose in the city is to create visibility, to coerce reality out of hiding. Thus the photographic act becomes that rudest and (in a city) most perilous of denotations, a pointing of the finger. It’s a visual citation: an image is compelled, maybe against its will, to bear witness.

Conrad, p. 155.

The photographer who “clicks” the avenue “into being” with his shutter.

Sharpe, p. 125.

Over $40,000,000 worth of property has been compressed by the camera eye into one visual record.

Abbott, Thirties, p. 69.

Cinematic / photographic spectacle: Electric lights beamed down upon the boxers with such intense clarity that spectators in the galleries could see every move of their slick and gleaming bodies.

Aycock, p. 169.
For work in New York Paul Strand fixed a dummy lens to his camera and pretended to aim it while the real lens jutted out from under his arm. (cf. King Vidor, filming The Crowd, above)

Conrad, p. 158.

Using a camera to heal the city’s “brokenness.”

Ibid., p. 235.

For a decade, the first cameramen carried their cameras all around this remarkable setting—from street corners to rooftops to boats in the river making a special kind of documentary-like film that they called “actualities.” Usually only a few minutes long, actualities were merely views of actual events, people, or places. They had no plots. They had no stories. They had no characters. Filmmakers still didn’t know how to tell a story; they hadn’t yet discovered editing, the bringing together of two pieces of film to contract time. So these actualities could last only as long as the real event they showed: the cameraman just pointed his camera at something interesting and started cranking. They were simply glimpses, in what today might be called “real time,” of the city and its life.

Their deadpan titles suggested just that. Skating on Lake, Central Park, or Excavation for Subway, these films were called. East Side Urrchins Bathing in a Fountain, or Panoramic View of Brooklyn Bridge, or New York City in a Blizzard. One was named At the Foot of the Flatiron, and that is exactly what it shows: a stretch of sidewalk in front of the Flatiron Building, on a very windy day. During the course of the film, only two minutes and nineteen seconds long, pedestrians—ordinary, turn-of-the-century New Yorkers—simply walk down the street and past the camera, unaware for the most part that they are being photographed. The men grapple with their coats. The women clutch their long skirts. A well-dressed black man stares into the lens with curiosity and suspicion—until his hat flies off. (He disappears offscreen to retrieve it; the camera never moves from its position.) A streetcar can be noticed on the far right, crossing 23rd Street. Then two young women pass by, struggling gleefully against the strong wind. One of them turns and breaks into a wide, joyful smile. The film ends. [Cinema] Sanders, Celluloid, p. 26.

In the 50s... Saul Leiter used the camera as a thermometer just as much as an optical instrument... record[ing] the city through screens of evidently disparate temperature zones. From where he stands, often in the shade, to what he sees, the centigrade level is not the same.

Kozloff, n. pag.

On Leiter: “He’s fond of antique lamp-posts, balustrades, pawn shop windows, and vendor’s carts. When revealed in color, they seem dusted with a tender recognition of their age. Just as there are after-images in his oeuvre, these are remainders from an earlier metropolitan scene. Here, the low-keyed chromaticism has a symbolic function, for it overlays a feeling for the past upon an urban environment that is otherwise contemporary. Not only do we have the weight of atmosphere in these image, but the weight of memory.”

Ibid.

Coburn photographed industrial New York at the same time as the sublime nature of Yosemite, and for him the city and the landscape were equivalent in their demonstration that “nothing is really ‘ordinary,’ for every fragment of the world is crowned with wonder and mystery.”
On 22 February 1893 he stood for hours in a blizzard on Fifth Avenue, awaiting “the proper moment” for photography. As soon as that moment arrived, he made it into ancient history. His snow scene doesn’t look like an anecdotal instant: it seems to represent an arctic world, prior to human society. [Weather]

Ibid., p. 166.

“My dream,” V. told me more than once, “is to come upon a parked truck transporting Kodak film. Think about it: film is small, light, untraceable, easy to dispose of, and proportionately expensive. It’s the ideal score. A find like that could set you up for years to come? I lost track of V., so I don’t know whether he ever fulfilled his dream.

Sante, “Commerce,” p. 111.

Man with a camera stopping another man with a small girl. As she stands with a flowered umbrella and raincoat. Just as it begins to rain. All delighted with smiles as the flash bulb pops. And people turn to look. A tiny moment like that.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Early photographers developed a pictorial mis-seeing of New York into a tricky smudging of sight. In their eagerness to render the city impressionistically molten, they’d jolt their cameras during exposure so the image trembled, or they’d grease their lens. Atmosphere was applied from without, as a shock or a lubricant smear. [Voyeur] [Sex]

Conrad, p. 74.

The rise of rain-slicked night photographs of New York streets: Exposure time could be cut by a third if the pavement was covered with rainwater.

Caldwell, p. 274.

Asking a friend to “[k]eep photographing the instant when you “go down West / Fourteenth Street.” O’Hara explains that this way “I will know what / it is like there,” and “I will now you are al least all right” even if “my eyes seem incapable of the images I’d / hoped.”

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 19.

The El as an early form of the movies: the lighted windows flicker past in a tantalizing montage, while the dramatic-seeming tableaux have the advantage of being real, not staged. The proprieties of ordinary social life—not to mention the class barriers between spectators and spectacle—would never permit such access. [Voyeur]

Sharpe, p. 272.

The sensory roughage of New York life is softened and appears miraculously more coordinated than it is in reality.

Kozloff, N. pag.

Stieglitz / O’Keeffe

Stieglitz reverts to a natural order by making it a rule never to work with artificial light.

Conrad, p. 77.
Beauty may not belong to the skyscrapers; Stieglitz, however, can award it to them.
Conrad, p. 83.

Modern photography began in America in the 1890s, when Alfred Stieglitz started taking pictures of New York’s streets, parks, people, and buildings. Stieglitz had been living in Berlin, and when he came home at the age of twenty-six in 1890, he initially thought New York uninspiring, even photo-resistant. But Stieglitz underwent something like a conversion experience in the next year or two; he realized that New York was not so much inimical to photography as insistent on a new approach to it. He needed to stop imposing on the American metropolis photographic techniques and ideas worked out in the various very different circumstances of European cities, and to let New York itself call the shots. The way one perceives things when looking at New York was, then, the impetus and precondition of Stieglitz’s art; New York was as important to photography as photography was to New York. The city changed forever the history of perception and the ways of recording it.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 60.

Steiglitz urged his students to move in a little closer, to crop their scene a little tighter, after they composed a shot.
Krieger, pp. 64-71.

Stieglitz moves to the Shelton; Margaret Bourke-White establishes herself in the Chrysler Building; Lewis Hine, suspended in a derrick lift a quarter of a mile above the streets, records the construction of the Empire State.

Both Steichen and Stieglitz express their qualms about and hopes for New York by photographing it from their studio windows.
Ibid., p. 81.

Alfred Steiglitz to Sherwood Anderson in 1925: “New York is madder than ever. The pace is ever increasing. But Georgia and I somehow don’t seem to be of New York—nor of anywhere. We live high up in the Shelton... All is so quiet except the wind—& the trembling shaking hulk of steel in which we live.”
Greenough, p. 214.

Stieglitz was probably put off by Duchamp’s aloofness from any kind of commitment, political or personal, though later he “repeatedly expressed regret” for not having exhibited the man’s work.”
Marquis, p. 116

In the 1900s, Alfred Stieglitz took picture after picture of New York’s audacious new Flatiron Building... a breathtakingly unbroken and slender wedge of matter slipping gravity’s laws. Stieglitz thought that the Flatiron was “to the States what the Parthenon was to Greece,” and during one snowstorm he had something like a vision: “The Flat Iron impressed me as never before. It appeared to be moving toward me like the bow of a monster ocean steamer—a picture of new America in the making.” The Flatiron, like the nation it emblematized, was to Stieglitz both a wonder of civilization and a “monster” whose course could not be known. [Antiquity]
Douglas, Honesty, p. 155.
Stieglitz’s father called the Flatiron Building hideous, and when he saw the photograph said, “I do not see how you could have produced such a beautiful thing from such an ugly building.” The wonder that irradiated the structure during that first winter faded for Stieglitz. Later, he admitted, he found it gloomy, no longer beautiful. Is the photographic imagination therefore only a capacity, like the picturesque, to deceive yourself about the incorrigible reality of things.

Conrad, p. 80.

Ford Madox Ford sensed a meaning in the Flatiron: it symbolized the staid, genteel city’s renovation of itself. He professes to find the Flatiron beautiful because to do so is to offend the pieties of old New York. “Very beautiful it used to look,” he comments, “towering up, slim and ivory white when you saw it from the Fifth Avenue stage or from on top of a trolley descending Broadway.”

N. cit.

Ford: “New York, I think, has lost a little in impressiveness, if not in beauty. To-day the Flatiron is gray and the skyline along Fifth Avenue where it goes along Central Park is too uniform in height with the rest of the city to let you have any feeling either of entrance or of plunging down.”

Ford, America, p. 55.

shiny flatiron, pleating their inhabitants into crisp, unwrinkled folds of symmetry

Khlebnikov, p. 48.

The angled point of the Flatiron parts the traffic as if cleaving the ocean: the Mauretania stalked like a skyscraper through the harbor.

Dos Passos, p. 734.

As used by Steichen, the soft-focus lens dims and smoothes objects into images. His Brooklyn Bridge (1903) is a dark wedge inset with jewels against a furry gray sky. Structure is befuddled, and the span is pattern, not engineering. His dusky Flatiron (1909) withdraws into the sky, belying its own solidity and angularity, vanishing as we watch.

Conrad, p. 80.

Steichen’s portrait of J.P. Morgan: The only thing that J. Pierpont Morgan could not control was Steichen’s camera: the essence of a man called Jupiter because he was an omnipotent as an ancient Roman god... His left hand tightly clutched the arm of his chair as if symbolizing the intensity of his grip on the American economy. Morgan so hated the picture that he tore the frit print to shreds.

Reitano, p. 105.

Stieglitz helped create night photography; Weegee almost bumped it off. Stieglitz wanted to show how beautiful the night city could be; Weegee tried to prove how wrong he was.

N. cit.

Alfred Stieglitz became famous both in Europe and America as the master of the camera, and what did his fame get him?
On Madison Avenue in the fifties... morning... noon... and night a lone man walks the streets. He wears a black cape (Loden cape bought in Tyrol, Austria), white shirt, black tie (not bow), black hat. No one pays any attention to him. A few kids turn around. Just another character. I've noticed him many times... walking as if in a trance. I was afraid to disturb him... finally I walked up to him and said...

'You Stieglitz? I'm Weegee. You may have read about me in magazines, or seen my pictures in PM.'

He stared at me as if I had waked him from a dream and told me that he never read about other people or himself. I apologized for the intrusion and told him that for a long time I had wanted to meet him. He became gracious and invited me to come up to his studio but first he stopped at a drug store, where he left a prescription to be filled... then up to No. 509 Madison Avenue where we took the elevator to the seventeenth floor. We stopped at a door. On the glass was painted AN AMERICAN PLACE. It wasn't locked and we walked in. The place was fitted up as a gallery, with paintings hung on the walls... there was a smell of disinfectant like in a sick room.

In the back of the gallery, in a cubbyhole, Stieglitz slumped on the cot, half sitting and half lying, too exhausted to take his cape off. That was his home. We started to talk. I was at last talking not only to the most famous photographer in the world, but one who had also sponsored painters and sculptors... unknown once, but famous now. I had so many questions to ask...... hours went by fast... (I was wondering if I was going to find a ticket on my jalopy parked at the door.) Stieglitz pointed to the phone near the cot... "It never rings... I have been deserted... the paintings on the wall are orphans... no one comes up to see them." I switched the talk back to photography. Was he a success? No, he was a failure. What about the photographers he had known and started and helped? They were successful...why?... because they had wanted money and were now working for the slick-paper magazines... because they were politicians and showmen who knew how to sell themselves. As for himself... he hadn't made a photograph for the past ten years... had never used the products of one company, because they had advertised, 'You push the button. We'll do the rest...'... that slogan was a bad influence on photographers because a picture needed careful planning and thinking and could only be captured on film at a certain fleeting fraction of a second... and that once that passed, that fraction of time was dead and could never be brought back to life again... that he had never compromised with his photography, for money or to please an editor. One had to be free to do creative work.

What about his influence on American photographers? Could he teach or influence them to do the same things he had accomplished? The answer was a firm no... I thought of a lecture which I recently gave at the Museum of Modern Art... and the questions which were asked of me there. I thought perhaps Stieglitz would have the answers.

He also told me that he was eighty-one years old. That the happiest time of his life was spent in Berlin at the turn of the century... it was free then and that when he returned to America he used to cry himself to sleep every night for two years thinking of the dirty streets here.

I asked Stieglitz how he lived and paid the rent. He told me that he had a private income of eighteen hundred dollars a year. That three hundred and fifty dollars went for income tax. (Not that he had to pay it but he felt that the government needed the money worse than he did), that the rent money and expenses, about four thousand dollars a year for the studio, was contributed by the artists when they sold the paintings which were on exhibit... That few paintings were being sold now… that the rent was not going to be ready and he was afraid he was going to be dispossessed.

Suddenly he slumped over in pain. “My heart, it’s bad,” he said in a whisper as he slumped over on the cot. I waited till he recovered then left quietly… wondering if that elusive fame I was after was worth while.

Weegee, Naked, pp. 233-4.

Marking an age, the essence of perfection, the faces of Garbo and O’Keeffe were like giant skyscrapers: cold, gleaming, and modern… Garbo’s face, elusive and yet available, private yet consumable, like the images of the city, white framed by black.

Rabinowitz, p. 164.

At the very moment Walter Benjamin was cruising the “one way streets” of Berlin and noticing the intrusion of signs like those that had caught the eye of Hart Crane as he crossed “the bridge” from Brooklyn, O’Keefe’s images—her portraits of flowers—grabbed the attention of gallery-goers as movie posters called forth movie-goers. After all, she had worked first in advertising and commercial art.

Ibid., p. 165.

Changing from evocative / erotic abstractions and gigantic flowers to skyscrapers suggests new symbols for modernity—from interiorized attempts to depict states of mind and emotion and sexuality, or to reveal details of interior spaces secreted within flowers, the city paintings marvel at “something bigger, grander, more complex than ever before in history.” Modernity has been exteriorized onto steel and concrete, industry and power, attributes of national pride.

Ibid., pp. 165-6.

It was the scale of New York’s buildings that had stimulated O’Keeffe in 1924 to begin painting her famous blowups of flowers: “I thought I’ll make them big like the huge buildings going up. People will be startled; they’ll have to look at them—and they did.”

Sharpe, p. 249.

In O’Keeffe’s mural design Manhattan (1932) she paints flowers superimposed on skyscrapers.

Ibid., p. 250.

“Lexington Avenue looked, in the night,” Georgia O’Keefe wrote, “like a very tall thin bottle with colored things going up and down inside it.”

Ibid., p. 255.

For these sons of well-off assimilated Jews, the avant-garde offered a new country; it was called Am/bition/erica and it was located in one city. In Europe, modernism was a territory deterritorialized—not tied to national identity as artists migrated to cosmopolitan cities like Paris or Berlin or Prague. This was especially true for Jews, especially after the rise of Fascism and National Socialism sent them into exile. In American, however, an urban nationalism located in New York, the city of ambition, as a “unit,” its panorama, found on one page of the daily tabloid, might include a Jewish baseball payer at the Polo Grounds and a prim ex-country schoolmistress in her Midtown skyscraper, or anything else in between.

Rabinowitz, p. 167.
When Stieglitz and O’Keeffe moved into Room 3003 of the Shelton Hotel, the city’s first skyscraper hotel on Lexington Avenue, they also became the first artists in America to live and work in that icon of the modern city, the skyscraper.

Ibid., p. 153.

Contrary to the usual association of the Steiglitz group with Greenwich Village bohemianism, I would argue that the artists associated with the 291 Gallery, located above Madison Square, faced north, toward midtown. Few of that group lived in the Village. In the 1920s, for example, Stieglitz and Georgia O’Keeffe lived in midtown. The Sloan group, by contrast, lived mostly in the “extended Village.” Each group depicted its own neighborhood.

Bender, pp. 119-20.

Mumford, writing on Steiglitz’s photograph, “Wall Street”: “Stieglitz ironically shows the skyscraper—the mock city of the future—in the last state of mechanical perfection and human insignificance, devoid at last of even the possibility of earning money; financial liabilities, as well as the social liabilities their reckless misuse had already made them... These skyscrapers of Stieglitz’s last photographs might be the cold exhalations of a depopulated world.”

Rabinowitz, p. 154.

The structure of the city’s architectural space had been the subject of Atget’s Paris photographs, images Walter Benjamin likened to the scene of a crime: the cityscape, a dead landscape poised in anticipation of corruption and danger, of commerce and seduction. Yet Stieglitz only worked with natural light so his images reflect the harshness of daily life, rather than the dreadful fears accumulating at night.

Ibid., p. 154.

The same year Henry James published his impressions of “New York Revisited,” nineteen-year-old O’Keeffe had come to New York in 1907-8 to study art in what was just beginning to be America’s art center.

Ibid., p. 156.

If Stieglitz’s skyscrapers captured the ebullient commercialism of the early twentieth century, the New York of the thirties and forties was a city of “libraries and parks.”

Williams, Ambition, p. xi.

Riis

In 1887, Jacob Riis read of magnesium flash powder: “There it was, the thing I had been looking for all those years... The darkest corner might be photographed that way.”

Sharpe, p. 149.

Riis saw photography as a form of war. His “raiding party... invaded the East Side by night.”

Ibid., p. 149.

Riis or an assistant fired an explosive round of magnesium-based “lightning powder” from a revolver, jolting the subjects, garishly illuminating every speck of dirt and every crack in the wall, and occasionally setting the room on fire. Once he accidentally ignited the wallpaper in a room full of blind men, up several flights of stairs—and he was painfully burned in putting out the blaze with his hands. Using military metaphors and flash pistols, Riis perfected his own form of the new art: photography as blitzkrieg. "It was not too much to say," recalled Riis, "that our party carried terror wherever it went."
Ibid., p. 150.

The poor became anthropological specimens, to be "shot" in their hovels by the crusading photojournalist... His flash functions like the police officer's bull's-eye lantern, but like the photographer, it remains concealed. We see only the target that the light hits.
Ibid., p. 150.

His determination to photograph "the darkest corner" involved a fundamental shift in nocturnal art. That is, he did not seek either to capture the elusive aesthetic qualities of darkness, as did Whistler and his photographic followers, or register the new look of an artificially lit cityscape, as did Hassam or Steichen. Rather, he wanted to bring to light—or bring light to—what usually dwelled in darkness. He was on the side of Light with a capital L. His aim was not to record but to alter. His photographs were literally exposures—exposures of greasy wallpaper and grimy skin, filthy bedding and sootcaked stoves that never saw the light of day. It was a vision created only for an instant by the flash camera. Displaying what even the poor themselves were unable to see, the full degradation of their environment, Riis hoped to destroy the world his flash fell on.
Photography is often thought of as a form of preservation; for Riis it was an agent of demolition.
Ibid., p. 150.

In the darkness, the magnesium flash ensured a certain spontaneity, since the photographer could not see his subject until he took the picture, and human subjects were surely unprepared for the violence of the flash powder's explosion. And then there was the element of surprise, as Riis and his assistants burst into the room with their "weird and uncanny movements," and then fired off "the blinding flash" before beating a hasty retreat.
Ibid., p. 152.

Photography is by nature ill-suited to night: it needs light, hence has to destroy darkness in order to represent it. Technology has over the course of modern history transformed, even to some extent created the possibility of life at night, and has repeatedly reinvented our perceptions of it.
Caldwell, p. 275.

What they saw was a ghostly tripod, three or four figures in the gloom, some weird and uncanny movements, the blinding flash, and they heard the patter of retreating footsteps and the mysterious visitors were gone.
Sharpe, p. 150.

Presenting the photographs in the form of a guided tour, Riis asked his spectators if they had the courage to follow him into the worst slums. When they assented, he conducted them into various tenements, his commentary accentuating the dirt, stench, and atmospheric poison through which the visitor had to move. Out of the darkness, in unprecedented detail, came a sooty man in a coal cellar, a gang of thugs in bowler hats lining an alley, a withered hag with clawlike hands in a decrepit room. Viewers seemed to be thrust up against these people; the encounter was brutal, repulsive, claustrophobic. Some of the audience wept, others fainted—such are contemporary accounts of Riis’s lectures.

The sleepers indistinguishable from the piles of bedding and washing piled around them in a ramshackle room in Midnight in Ludlow Street Tenement.

The camera and flash trespass on their privacy and ingloriously turn them into lumps under blankets, legless bare feet (there are at least four pair in Men's Lodging Room), and greasy heads with scarlike parts on the scalp.

Riis eventually shifted the ignition of his flash powder from a revolver to a frying pan because “it seemed more homelike.”

Riis’s invasive photographs fling back the cover of night, claiming intimacy without any kind of human engagement. By dispelling darkness, the flash deprives the sleepers not only of privacy but also of a reason for sleeping in the first place. The night has been dissolved, abolished.

These are the first night pictures without any trace of night—a moon, stars, darkness, or any evidence of blazing lights. Nothing in the picture suggests the hour, a reason for revelry or repose.

Why do the boys (who seem to be outdoors, in the daylight) sleep while the grown-ups awake? Are the boys—or both groups—posing? These pictures disturb partly because of their voyeuristic quality—photographer and viewers glimpse something meant to be hidden—but partly because we can’t tell if those unseeing faces are pretending to act unseen. Through this uncertainty, the night’s mystery sneaks back into Riis’s photographs. Someone is being manipulated but we don’t know whom.

A step into the side streets and you felt set back by centuries.

In the 1930s and 1940s, the perfection of the flashbulb and fast film enabled Weegee to bring Jacob Riis’s nocturnal lowlife a few steps closer to the rest of us. While Riis had to struggle to place his photos in front of the public, Weegee’s aim was to see his night’s work in the papers the next morning. For him, night was an exploitable frontier, the fertile soil from which he could harvest a crop of corpses, evidence of his boldness and food for the sensation-hungry urbanite.

Sharpe, p. 292.
The flash explodes in the dark street, and its flare lights up a huge revolver suspended over the pavement to advertise the gunsmith's wares. The camera shoots on behalf of the gun, which will also emit light along with its missile when the trigger is pressed.

Conrad, p. 155.
Le Corbusier, upon seeing NYC’s skyscrapers in the 1930s: “In New York, then, I learned to appreciate the Italian Renaissance. It is so well done that you could believe it to be genuine.”

Corbusier, p. 60.

This is all from another place, I thought, shocked by the derivativeness of Fifth Avenue architecture. I felt, I saw, for the first time ever, the adolescent absurdity of so many Manhattan monuments—the sad, wilderness, opera-house-in-the-Arctic and Amazon pathos of copying old European styles in a New World city. This isn’t a true Gothic cathedral, I thought, staring at St. Patrick’s. There are such things, I’ve seen them, and this is just a... copy, a raw inflated thing thrown up in emulation of a far-off and distant thing! That Renaissance palazzo on Fifty-fourth Street is no Renaissance palazzo— it’s a cheap stage-set imitation!

This perception of New York as a blown-up Inflato city, aspirational rather than achieved, gawkily imitating its models, the proper cities of Europe—which was once so obvious and embarrassing (to Henry James, much less to Tocqueville), has faded away now, and I no longer see it that way. For that single early morning, though, it seemed that the architecture of New York was not quite real, not organic, coming from elsewhere and imposed, a delirium of old styles and other people’s European visions: the Gothic vision of sublime verticality, or, for that matter, the Bauhaus vision of the glass tower. For a moment New York seemed unnatural, the anti-matter city. “You’re not real!” I wanted to cry out, to the city. “Yes, we are, “the buildings cried back blankly. “It is the old thing that is the lie; the true thing is our re-creation of it.” But the moment passed quickly, and now New York just looks like New York: old as time, worn as Rome, mysterious as life.

Gopnik, p. 74.

Between 1890 and 1940 a new culture (the Machine Age?) selected Manhattan as laboratory: a mythical island where the invention and testing of a metropolitan lifestyle and its attendant architecture could be pursued as a collective experiment in which the entire city became a factory of man-made experience, where the real and the natural ceased to exist... Manhattan as the product of an unformulated theory, Manhattanism, whose program—to exist in a world totally fabricated by man, i.e., to live inside fantasy—was so ambitious that to be realized, it could never be openly stated.

Koolhaas, p. 10.

Every great law firm in New York moves without a sputter of protest into a glass-box office building with concrete slab floors and seven-foot-ten-inch-high concrete slab ceilings and plasterboard walls and pygmy corridors—and then hires a decorator and gives him a budget of hundreds of thousands of dollars to turn these mean cubes and grids into a horizontal fantasy of a Restoration townhouse. I have seen the carpenters and cabinetmakers and search—and-acquire girls hauling in more cornices, covings, pilasters, carved moldings, and recessed domes, more linenfold paneling, more (fireless) fireplaces with festoons of fruit carved in mahogany on the mantels, more chandeliers, sconces, girandoles, chestnut leather sofas, and chiming clocks than Wren, Inigo Jones, the brothers Adam, Lord Burlington, and the Dilettanti working in concert, could have dreamed of.
Wolfe, Bauhaus, pp. 7-8.

In your offices, however high they may be, these cottage windows are annoying.
Le Corbusier, p. 67.

A 345-year-old Jacobean room on the thirty-seventh floor of the Empire State Building. Linked by ancient doors with a Gascon chamber originally put together in a château near Dax in southwest France and a Georgian room made for the Guildhall in London in 1730. Installed by the Schenley Distillers Company. The Jacobean room has green mullioned windows threaded with lead and stained glass images of Louis II of Hunary and his Queen, Maria of Austria.
Berger, New York, p. 171.

The custom of assigning descriptive labels to domestic architecture was borrowed from the rural English, who named their manor houses and country estates to expedite the delivery of mail through uncharted countryside. In New York, no one used the Melba, the Sophomore, the Altoona, the Greylock, or the Pamlico as a mailing address. Nor did names necessarily have anything to do with physical realities: Les Chateaux was not castlelike; the courts of the Georgian Court, the Columbia Court, and the Chatham Court were aggrandized air shafts, and no one knew that the “arms” of the Washington Arms or the Clarendon Arms, among dozens of arms buildings, referred to a family coat of arms. They were used the way Beaux-Arts style was—to project an image of importance to the outside. Names, however preposterous, were yet another ornament, and tantalizing in that.
Haves, N. pag.

Hearst’s apartment included tapestries, suits of armor, mummies, figurines, bronzes, and bibelots. It measured three-quarters of an acre of living space, excluding the roof garden, to which Hearst soon added two more floors, eventually purchasing the entire building. Within these walls, he fashioned a Georgian dining room, an Empire bedroom, a three-story galleria modeled on a vaulted Gothic cathedral, a two-story display room for his collection of silver salvers, and an office suite; he continued to redecorate, adding carved ceilings, choir stalls, stained glass from French cathedrals, redesigning to incorporate new possessions from his warehouse full of art treasures, until he left New York for his castle at San Simeon. Hearst, like other apartment dwellers, was engaging in a bit of make-believe, creating the illusion that he was living elsewhere than in a large new apartment house.
Ibid.

It’s sad and funny to see it done again by the Franklin National Bank at Madison Avenue and 48th Street. Watching this building being transformed from 20th century to 18th century was one of the top midtown acts of last season’s Follies. First, there was the steel frame, strong, severe, handsomely rectilinear (the bones are best in most buildings), suggesting the logical shape and design that its covering surface might take, subject only to the architect’s talent, imagination and respect for the inspiration of the structure. Painstakingly, brick by brick, the façade was laid up for anyone to observe.

Eighteenth-century arches were hung on the façade like theatrical scrim. Originally, of course, arches like these were carefully built up to be wedge-shaped, locking keystones to make openings in a brick wall without having the wall fall down. They were as natural and beautiful for masonry construction as the thin curtain wall is for the metal-framed building today.

Presto change. The hand is quicker than the eye. The arches aren’t arches because the masonry is non-supporting. It’s all backed by steel. Fooled you. What we have here is a kind of large architectural practical joke. It is tiresome, like most practical jokes.

But the undertaking was carried out in consistent comic spirit to the end. The opening luncheon, which featured authentic colonial cooking, was served by waiters in knee breeches. (Authentic Madison Avenue.)

To heighten the impression that they patrons were part of the world of wealth and opulence, the Broadway restaurants borrowed their décor from aristocratic Fifth Avenue and foreign homes. From the elaborate exteriors to the gilded interiors, the restaurants removed their patrons from the humdrum business activity of Broadway and brought them the fantasies of Europe and the past... Murray’s Roman Gardens, which opened on Forty-second Street in 1906: Once leaving the busy street the visitor was “transported as though on the famous carpet of Mahomet, back into ancient Rome.” There, in this American-created world foreign world, the guest would “feast his eyes on artistically and authentically beautiful features of Rome’s most ornate homes, of the palaces, villas and pleasure resort of her wealthiest and most cultured citizens.” While the interior was Roman, the exterior was French, reproducing for the lower two stories the ancient hotel of Cardinal de Rohan of Paris in Caen stone. A huge doorway marked the entrance, over which rested a copy of “Les chevaux du soliel” from the cardinal’s stables. This regal imagery was not limited to Murray’s. The Rectors decorated their restaurant in green and gold furnishings of the Sun King. The Hotel Martinique on Broadway and Thirty-second Street featured a main dining room modeled after the Apollo Room of the Louvre, with panels depicting Maurice de Saxe, Rosnard, Voltaire, Louis XV, the ladies of the court, and other great figures of the eighteenth century. Up two streets, the Hotel McAlpin had a Sun King Room while the Knickerbocker bar on Forty-second Street sported a Louis XIV design. [Food]

Erenberg, pp. 44-5.

The elevator, going up and down like the mercury in a typhoid’s thermometer, decorated with French Boiseries, Renaissance brocades and an El Greco.

Please, gentleman, no horse-drawn cars, no costumes, no wigs, no stage sets, no cute-old-stores, no “re-creations” that never were, no phone little-old-New York. There is a tendency in American restoration for corn to conquer all. In Europe old buildings are used naturally and normally, not reduced to cultural kitsch. That is perversion, not preservation. The past becomes real by its legitimate and handsome contrasts with the present.

If the authentic city exists, it is as a mere shadow of itself, one that serves only to underline what has been lost.

Amin, p. 32.
A second New York is being built a little west of the old one. Each man works on the replica of the apartment building he lived in, adding new touches.

It is impossible, as impossible as to raise the dead, to restore anything that has ever been great or beautiful in architecture... Do not let us talk then of restoration. The thing is a Lie from beginning to end. You may make a model of building as you may of a corpse, and your model may have the shell of old walls within it... but the old building is destroyed, and that more totally and mercilessly than if it had sunk into a heap of dust, or melted into a mass of clay.

Lowenthal, p. 249.

For every Brooklyn Heights, which preserves a historical continuity of real buildings of the real past, there are numerous projects that will put up brand-new “aged” imitations mixed with a few dislocated victims of throughways or urban renewal for spuriously quaint little groups of instant history is sterile isolation. Across the country the genuine heritage of the 19th century is still being razed to be replaced by elaborately built synthetic 18th-century stage sets more pleasing to 20th century tastes.

This disease, which we have previously called galloping restorationitis, evades the sticky problem of saving the real thing by letting it be bulldozed and putting up a copy at a more convenient time or place... The result is a lot of sham history and sham art.

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 171.

One can find a cast-iron-fronted building, shipped in sections from New York City, on a street in Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. xiv

The contents of Magoos, the famous 70s Tribeca artist bar, ended up in Japan, perfectly preserved.

Yau, p. 277.

In the South Bronx, the Charlotte Street pastel-colored houses, which sit in the center of green lawns and are bordered by white picket fences, stand in splendid isolation from one another as abandoned tenements loom in all directions.

Rooney, p. 159-60.

You go through a thin-barred iron gate down a long flagged corridor till you’re midway between the north side of Forty-ninth Street, but perhaps forty feet short of Fiftieth, and you’re in a cool, ailanthus-shaded garden restored to look much as it was, say, 150 years ago. White and gray cottages face each other across the court. The ground’s neatly laid out in squares and oblongs that smell of rain and dew through lush fern growth and pachysandra. Lotus bowls and wrought-iron benches are cunningly placed in it and a wall sign reads “Boston Post Road, 1673.”

Berger, New York, p. 29.

Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. 5.
I felt that no actuality could live up to my conception of New York's splendor.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 107

How do you finish an anachronism? How do you complete a cathedral begun too late, beset by conflicts in symbolism, construction, art and costs, overshadowed by skyscrapers, clinging to obsolete crafts, mismeasured for glory and miscalculated for meaning in the modern world?

The Cathedral of St. John the Divine, on Morningside Heights, was conceived in 1891 as the world's largest and latest of the great medieval line that ran from Arles to Amiens. There was only one thing wrong. It was not the product of a cathedral-building age. The medieval cathedral was a superb structure, the creative flowering of a special confluence of forces at a particular moment in time. Its synthesis of technology, necessity, timeliness and expression is the basic formula of all great architectural art.

Out of context, the formula is not reproducible. The same moment and the same results never come twice. Archeological copying will not make it so. This is an ineluctable reality of art and life. Until it is understood, we will continue to have the pious reproductions, the dead reconstructions, the vacuum-packed imitations and the false, nostalgic standards that, at best, evoke only the second-hand suggestion of the artistic glories of some other age, or at worst, throttle creativity and subvert values in our own.

When the design for St. John the Divine was projected, the church spire was already losing out to the commercial tower—a kind of symbolism, if one wished to look for it, that the cathedral was no longer the physical capstone of the city or of society and could no longer offer the comforting assurances of an older, more familiar symbolism merely by increasing the size of its traditional forms. The medieval cathedral already belonged to history.

And so the cathedral sits unfinished, not through the inexorable process of the evolutionary architectural change of the Middle Ages, but through conflicts over aims, objectives, symbolism and commitment of church funds in the 20th century.

What all this leads up to is the simple fact that it doesn't really matter now the cathedral isn't finished now—a subject that has been the cause of some little rarefied furoir. It is merely, again, a matter of taste. The forms and meanings of the building are so totally removed from the social, spiritual and aesthetic mainstream of the 20th century that the result, whatever the decision, will inevitably be cold, thin stuff.

A careful and conscientious effort has been made by the firm of Adams and Woodbridge to solve the problems that exist. The cost of the central tower planned for the crossing and of the completion of the west towers would be prohibitive today, even if stonemasons were available for the work, which they are not. The "temporary" Guastavino dome, guaranteed for 10 years and going for half a century a testament to that fascinating and now equally historic form of tile construction—is to be replaced.

The architects have been forced, ironically enough, by that same evolutionary process of art and history that the cathedral ignored, to go to modern concrete construction in the name of cost and practicability. They are providing elevators in the piers that will support the beams for a "modern Gothic" glass and concrete lantern to substitute for the unbuildable crossing tower, because labor to change an electric light bulb, for example, is too costly today to permit the bulb changer the inefficiency of toiling up stone steps. Count the anachronisms, architectural and otherwise, in that sentence. You can only finish a superanachronism like St. John the Divine with more of the same, and there is not much to be said in praise or blame.

If an impassable wall were built around this island which would prevent any one of its present inhabitants from leaving it, and would prevent any one from the outside from coming on it, it is only a matter of a few hundred years until its human inhabitants would become extinct, or be reduced to an insignificant remnant. In other words, the population of Manhattan Island is not self-supporting in the matter of reproducing itself, and but for the continual accessions from without, the race could not continue to exist here indefinitely.

That physical conditions have something to do with bringing about this state of affairs there can be no question, but the principal cause is to be found in the habits and character of the inhabitants themselves, and in the artificial life they lead. By artificial life is meant the continual violation of those mental, moral, and physical laws which nature has imposed on mankind everywhere, and the observance of which is essential to its existence and continued well-being.

Girdner, pp. 17-19.

Psychoanalysis

New York is less a place than an idea or perhaps a neurosis.

A new agenda for geography, where geographers would explore the terra incognitae of the simultaneously real, experiential and imaginary, and profoundly personal world.

For the moment, our unconscious architecture has gone Surrealiste: indecent and extravagant, like the dreams a dutiful patient prepares for a psychoanalyst.

A psychoanalysis of space.

Pile, p. 15.

Psychoanalysis is, after all, a spatial discipline.

Freud, on his one visit to New York in 1909, showed no interest in the city... No metropolis anywhere took up psychoanalysis so eagerly as New York. By the early 1920s, there were about 500 Freudian analysts in the city. Translations and articles popularizing his ideas poured from New York presses.

Greenwich Villagers were gripped by mania psychological and spent their time in “Freuding parties,” “psyching” and probing each other’s motives and dreams... Vachel Lindsay found the New York enthusiasm for psychoanalytic ways torture: “I do not,” he asserted, have a matriarchal complex!”

John Barrymore’s 1922 Hamlet with its self-consciously Freudian interpretation of the role. He prepared for the role by having extensive conversations with an analyst, Smith Ely Jeliffe, who later published three lengthy psychoanalytic critiques of Barrymore’s pre-

The Freudian discourse, no matter how simplified or distorted, had by the mid-1920s eclipsed the Protestant pieties sovereign in America’s official life until then. It had become the explanatory discourse, if not of America, then of New York.

For his part, Freud always acknowledged that America had been the first country to welcome psychoanalysis: “ex-communicated” in Europe, he had been “received [in America] by the best as equal,” and American recognition had removed psychoanalysis from the realm of “delusion” and made it a valuable part of reality. Despite numerous invitations, however, Freud refused to go back to the United States; indeed, he developed a vehement, even obsessional, hatred for all things American.
Americans might not put their seal of approval on psychoanalysis, but they did not and could not understand it, he insisted. Psychoanalysis, he wrote a friend in 1924, “suits Americans [only] as a white shirt suits a raven.” America was a “gigantic mistake”; his suspicion of its aims was “unconquerable.” At the end of his life in great peril as a Jew in Nazi Vienna, he refused to go to America for refuge, as most of his friends wished him to do. Stubbornly, predictably, he elected to finish his days in England, where his work had been far less influential and he himself far less revered, and he continued to hope that America would secede or be expelled, from the ranks of psychoanalysis.

Freud saw only the simplification and distortions Americans wreaked his science. In his view, American versions of psychoanalysis were to the Viennese original what mass culture was to elite art, and he was a bitter enemy of the democratic tendencies endemic in the mass arts that America in general and New York in particular hosted. Further, as attached as he was to modes of temporal sequence in his science and his art, Freud gave his allegiance to the print culture which the mass media with threatening to succeed. Where James had responded eagerly to New York’s promise that “there was nothing that was not easy,” whereas Stein loved the effortlessness and abundance created by the new technology of consumer-oriented mass production and saw her own art as it’s ally and analog, Freud prized the arts, not of consuming or absorbing, but of mastering the world. He reified productivity and hard, unrelenting work; “Travailler sans raisonner” (Don’t debate’ work!) was his motto. The flow of curiosity by which James and Stein oriented themselves in a fast-modernizing culture was foreign to him.
He rebuffed not only Sam Goldwyn’s Hollywood offer to write a scripts, but several others like it, avoided the telephone, seldom listen to the radio, and never, so far as we know, went to a movie.

Throughout his studies of what he called the “pathology of cultural communities” and his voluminous correspondence, Freud seldom missed a chance to jab at the values, or lack of values, and popular American culture. He hated the “uncultivated public” that put “quantity” above “quality,” intellectuals in capable of “living in opposition to the public opinion as we [Europeans ]are prepared to do,” the insane “rush of American life” with its worship of the “almighty dollar,” its “cheap” and “manic” promises of instant gratification, and it’s prudish middlebrow moralizings. Most of all, he detested the blind “optimism,” the “noble intentions” and the utter disregard of “facts,” of those he took to be America’s political and religious spokespersons.

Freud’s disciples, including Otto Rank, Alfred Adler, Theodor Reik, Hans Sachs, Franz Alexander, Helene Deutsch, Erik Erikson, Fritz Wittels, Sandor Rado, and Karen Horney all visited America and New York and most of them love with they found. Deutsch thought the new skyscrapers "The most beautiful architecture that one can imagine" and telegrammed her son: "AMERICA IMPOSING REALLY NEW WORLD EVERYTHING GIGANTIC MAD TEMPO." What Freud hated as cheap commercialism she saw as the prosperity and energy of a people "striving forward," exciting evidence of "hope" and "sheer life!"

Some of the émigrés lingered in this "really new world" for months, years, decades, even life. Both Ferenczi and Rank used trips to New York to signal their attempt break from Freud. Rank, who fell in love with Harlem dancing and occasionally signed his letters "Huck [Finn]," expatriated for good in the 1930s. Jung stayed in Switzerland, but visited America often and found his biggest following and surest funding there. If there were, as Freud claimed, irreparable differences between the new discourse of psychoanalysis and America, most of his followers refused, if not to see them, to condemn them. Freud charged his American patients higher fees then he asked from European patients and gave them last time and attention; Americans have no value, he insisted, except their "dollarei." But these "dollarei" were critical to his still-fledgling discipline. Psychoanalysis might've originated in Vienna, but it was copied and Americanized, then marketed, and marketed on a scale immeasurably greater than Europe could offer, in New York. [Harlem Clubs]

The Village's chief psychoanalysts: A.A. Brill, Smith Ely Jelliffe, and Samuel Tannenbaum.

Humphrey, p. 227.

Freud was attractive to Villagers because of the special status he assigned to those who transformed primitive impulses into artistic creations. The artists' gifts, originating deep within the unconscious, emerged only after a terrific inner struggle. For some Villagers the presence of psychological problems seemed to verify the existence of unmined talent. Failure to develop and produce meant that repression had dammed up creativity.

The Village popularized psychoanalytic theories and supplied American psychiatrists with patients to treat. Seeing a psychiatrist was considered avant-garde. While the rest of society ignorantly confessed their sins to clerics, the modern Villager explored the psychic forces at work in the world. Floyd Dell remembered:

"There must have been... a half dozen or more people in the Liberal Club who knew a great deal about psychoanalysis, and a score more who were familiar enough with the terms to use them in badinage... Everyone... who knew about psychoanalysis was a sort of missionary on the subject, and nobody could be around Greenwich Village without hearing a lot about it."

Psychoanalysis was fascinating, Dell admitted, because "it [dealt] with ourselves, a subject in which we are all deeply interested." While psychoanalysis was embraced as a method of self-exploration, it enhanced and expanded the practice of mutual evaluation. Margaret Anderson and Jane Heap spent their evenings searching for "the Achilles hell of everybody's psychic set-up." With its "recondite technical vocabulary" psychoanalysis permitted "talk about morbid states of health without seeming to indulge in a vulgar predilection." Psychoanalysis provided new topics of discussion and a new form of entertainment. Liberal Club members played parlor games of "associating" their thoughts to lists of words and tried to unravel dreams by following "the Freudian formula." Plain, everyday gossip was elevated to scientific analysis, and commonplace dreams were assigned intellectual and sexual significance.

Ibid., pp. 227-8.

Freud read his nephew Edward Bernays's book Propaganda and praised it as “clear, clever, and comprehensible,” and Bernays in turn devoted considerable time and money to publicizing Freud’s work in America. In 1920, Freud had asked him to peddle among New York publishers the idea of a popular book to be written by himself. For a title, he suggested the catchy “Scraps of Popular Psychoanalysis.” Cosmopolitan was interested but Freud wanted more authorial freedom and money than Cosmopolitan was willing to give, so the project was dropped.

He was connected to modern white urban America less because American read him, though they did, than because they did not have to read him. Freud and America in the modern era were not just conversationalists on a common theme, critics working within the same interpretative project, but mutual mind readers at work in an age fascinated with all forms of mind reading and mental telepathy.

Ibid., p. 147.

As powerful arrivistes, Freud and New York shared in its most acute form the adrenaline rush that was modernism.

Ibid., p. 148.

The unholy alliance of the hardline New York Freudians and the McCarthy-Army State Department.

McCourt, p. 106.

Each day people go to a Fifty-eighth Street psychodrama studio to scream and curse at two masked dummies.

Talese, p. 48.

I, or rather it was “we” now, did not know exactly what New York expected of us and found it rather confusing.

Fitzgerald, Lost City, p. 110

For all that they are supposed to be “crisis-oriented” and boast of living under perilous conditions, New Yorkers actually fall apart under the slightest strain that has not been planned for.

Blandford, p. 112.

On weekends psychotherapists are not available (there is a Manhattan condition known as Saturday anxiety).

Ibid., p. 120.

bone-drunk on starry metaphysics

Buzzi, p. 56.

It is part of the character of Manhattan that interior and exterior realities mingle recklessly.

McCourt, p. 243.

When its fixative won’t hold, collage cobbles together a schizophrenic, self-torturing machine. If you can entertain at once all those impossible contradictions, the machine may work. If not, it won’t heed your efforts to restrain and order it and will fly derangedly apart.
Conrad, p. 309.

Manhattan’s children learn early that life here is but a series of fragments.
Blandford, p. 69.

Your opponent is the City.

Hart Crane begins to complain of a dejected exhaustion. The manic city depresses him. “The N.Y. life is too taxing,” he admits in 1923, and has left him insomniac and irritable. The summer heat sucks away his vitality and brings him near collapse. “New York takes such a lot from you that you have to save all you can of yourself or you simply give out.”
Conrad, p. 227.

Look at me, I’m in tatters
I’m a shattered
My brain’s been battered, splattered all over Manhattan
Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

I may be one of Manhattan’s therapized elite, I’m still coming to terms with some aspects of the process—like having my recently blown-out hair savagely reblown by the punishing wind off the Hudson. [Wind] [Air]
Quan, p. 8.

What are you depressed about?
I missed my therapy. I overslept.
Allen, Annie Hall, p. 17.

Jesus, last night it was some guy honking his car horn. I mean, the city can’t close down. You know, what—whatta yuh gonna do, h-have ‘em shut down the airport, too? No more fights so we can have sex?
I’m too tense. I need a Valium. My analyst says I should live in the country and not in New York.
Well, I can’t li- We can’t have this discussion all the time. The country makes me nervous. There’s... You got crickets and it—it’s quiet... there’s no place to walk after dinner, and... uh, there’s the screens with the dead moths behind them, and... uh, yuh got the—the Manson family possibly, yuh got Dick and Terry—Okay, okay, my analyst just thinks I’m too tense. Where’s the goddamn Valium? [Nature]
Ibid., p. 38.

Alvy, you’re incapable of enjoying life, you know that? I mean, your life is New York City. You’re just this person. You’re like this island unto yourself.
I can’t enjoy anything unless I... unless everybody is. I—you know, if one guy is starving someplace, that’s... you know, I—I... it puts a crimp in my evening.
Ibid., p. 143.

What’s so great about New York? I mean, it’s a dying city. You read “Death in Venice.”
You didn’t read “Death in Venice” till I gave it to you!
Well, you only give me books with the word “death” in the title.
Alvy, you are totally incapable of enjoying life.
Behold this paper city, buried in its newspapers in the morning, intent through the day on its journals and ledgers and briefs and Dear-sir-in-reply-to-yours-of-even-date, picking at its newly invented typewriters and mimeographs and adding machines, manifolding and filing, watching the ticker tape flow from the glib automatons in Broad Street, piling its soiled paper into deep baskets, burying its dead paper in dusty alphabetical cemeteries, binding fat little dockets with red tape, counting the crisp rolls and bank notes, cutting the coupons of the gilt-edged bonds, redeemable twenty years hence, forty years hence, in paper that might be even more dubious than the original loan issue. At night, when the paper day is over, the city buries itself in paper once more: the Wall Street closing prices, the Five Star Sporting Extra, with the ninth inning scores, the Special Extra, All-about-the-big-fight, all about the anarchist assassination in St. Petersburg—or Pittsburgh.

The cult of paper brings with it indifference to sight and sound: print and arithmetic are the Bible and the incense of this religious ritual. Realities of the world not included in this religion become dim and unreal to both the priests and the worshipers: these pious New Yorkers live in a world of Nature and human tradition, as indifferent to the round of the seasons and to the delights of the awakened senses and the deeper stores of social memory as an early Christian ascetic, occupied with his devotions amid the splendid temples of a Greek Acropolis. They collect pictures as they collect securities; their patronage of learning is merely a premature engraving of their own tombstones. It is not the images or the thoughts, but the reports of the munificence in the newspaper, that justifies their gifts. The whole social fabric is built on a foundation of printed paper; it is cemented together by paper; it is crowned with paper. No wonder the anarchists, with more generous modes of life in mind, have invented the ominous phrase: "Incinerate the documents!" That would wreck this world worse than an earthquake.

The huge bundles of newspapers which at night and in bulk have the merit of a really great commodity—the dignity almost of a bag of meal or a crate of eggs—are now resolved into units on the stationers' stands, and if the new day be Sunday the newsman is busy sorting out the different sections of the Sunday paper and putting the comics section on top. Nor can I think of anything human affairs which must be more futile in the eyes of the Creator than a stationer sorting out comic supplements in the full glory of early sunrise. With the newspaper waiting for it, New York of the ordinary life is ready to get out of bed.

Strunsky, p. 706.

On Sunday, with breakfast, comes a huge and sphinx-like bundle of papers, neatly folded, layer on wad. Breakfast waits the investigation... Reading this gigantic newspaper becomes a sort of game or endurance test, a task a Spartan mother might well assign her son if she lived in New York today... The bed is lost in the avalanche of paper... the bed, the breakfast tray, myself, utterly submerged by the Sunday Times... I contemplate helplessly the vast paper tent that envelopes me. The room is newspaper, the newspaper is room.
Beaton, Portrait p. 49.

I leaped swiftly out of the car and presented her with the seven pounds of Sunday Times as if it were a basket of flowers.
Lobas, p. 25.

Imagine being in New York City on the morning of Sunday, April 28, 1974, like I was, slipping into that great public bath, that vat, that spa, that regional physiotherapy tank, that White Sulphur Springs, that Marienbad, that Ganges, that River Jordan for a million souls which is the Sunday New York Times. Soon I was submerged, weightless, suspended in the tepid depths of the thing, in Arts & Leisure, Section 2, page 19, in a state of perfect sensory deprivation.

To see a family reading the Sunday paper gratifies. The sections have been separated. Papa is earnestly scanning the pages that pictures the young lady exercising before an open window, and bending—but there, there! Mamma is interested in trying to guess the missing letters in the word N–w Yo–k. The oldest girls are eagerly pursuing the financial reports, for a certain young man remarked last Sunday night that he had taken a flyer in Q., X. & Z. [Textuality]
Henry, Complete, p. 28.

I hate New York on a Sunday. At about ten o’clock, some office worker opposite, dressed only in lilac underwear, raises his blinds.
Without, it would seem, putting on his trousers, he sits down at the window with his hundred-page edition of either the World or the Times, weighing two pounds. He’ll read for an hour first the poetic and colourful section of big-store publicity (which forms the basis of the average American world outlook), and after the adverts he’ll have a glance at the burglary and murder pages. [Voyeur]
Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 56.

The radio, the Sunday New York Times, Pullman cars, fill up the voids and empty spaces.
Corbusier, p. 213.

That Sunday, I’m reading the New York Times real estate ads—comparing my worth to everybody else’s on the Upper West Side.
Braly, p. 399.

In today’s thirty-two page Times’s news section, twenty-one of them were taken up with advertisements of a life of looking gorgeous.
Bladford, p. 58.

Rubbing shoulders with New York Times advertisements.
Ibid., p. 13.

A copy of the New York Times was spread out, unread, at her feet.
Van Vechten, p. 77.

Hurrying to the subway, Rip is reminded to pick up his copy of the daily Times. He’s an imp who flourishes in the remissness of time.
Conrad, p. 232.
His daily paper must be highly spiced.
Girdner, p. 40.

He prefers news to romance.
Hapgood, p. 78.

Instead of making the commonplace interesting, the newspaper makes the exceptional commonplace. The striking becomes the daily thing.
Ibid., p. 96.

Those bundled Sunday newspapers strewn on the sidewalk at the beginning of Naked City could just as well be corpses, bagged in neat rows after a tenement fire. They contain corpses and will soon be corpses, or refuse. Sleepers in a mission use them for mattresses, and, in Weegee’s photographs of a car crash, they double as a shroud: the dead man is sheeted with newspaper until the ambulance arrives. [City as Body]
Conrad, p. 274.

A newspaper truck went from building to building dropping off heavy bundles of, for the most part, bad news, which little boys carried inside on their shoulders.
Maxwell, p. 391.

One woman kneels at the still-closed church on the way to work, while another girl checks off jobs in the help-wanted section of the New York Times.
Weegee, Naked, p. 43.

LaGuardia coatless, his eyeglasses pushed over his head, as he read the comics to children during a newspaper strike.
Heckscher, p. 10.

This is the way it is in New York, where 250 people die each day, and where the living dash for empty apartments. This is the way it is in a big, impersonal, departmentalized city—where on page 29 of this morning’s newspaper are pictures of the dead; on page 31 are the pictures of the engaged; on page 1 are pictures of those who are running the world, enjoying the lush years before they land back on page 29.
Talese, p. 134.

Baseball players with AIDS, more Mafia shit, gridlock, the homeless, various maniacs, faggots dropping like flies in the streets, surrogate mothers, the cancellation of a soap opera, kids who broke into a zoo and tortured and burned various animals alive, more Nazis... and the joke is, the punch line is, it’s all in this city—nowhere else, just here, it sucks, whoa wait, more Nazis, gridlock, gridlock, baby-sellers, black-market babies, AIDS babies, baby junkies, building collapses on baby, maniac baby, gridlock, bridge collapses—“
Ellis, Psycho, p. 4.

NYC Left-wing newspapers, including at least five dailies: the Daily Worker, the Forward, Morgen Freiheit, the China Daily News (Meizhou Huaqiao Ribao), and PM.
Freeman, p. 57.
We can see three daily newspapers: the Journal-American, the World-Telegram, and PM; the magazines are Liberty, Air News, Argosy, Song Parade, American, Judy's, Crack Detective, Phantom Detective, Cartoon Digest, American Astrology, White's Radio, Magazine Digest, Popular Science, Mechanix Illustrated, Die Hausfrau, and Die Welt (must've been a Yorkville newsstand). We cannot see some other New York dailies that were publishing that year: the Herald Tribune and the Mirror, and in the outer boroughs, the Brooklyn Eagle, the Brooklyn Times-Union, the Bronx Home-News, the Long Island Press, the Long Island Star-Journal.

The News, the Tribune, and the American Between the Evening Mail and the Morning Telegraph Between the Morning Journal and the Evening Telegram
From the Times to the World
Behrens, p. 315.

Let’s go back to the corner newsstand. — SPACE BLAST... POPE WASHES FEET OF POOR...
Kerouac, Traveler, p. 109.

Yesterday’s newspaper is a synonym for waste and the city’s amnesia; and they too, like the streets, can only be read nonhierarchically, since their columns adjoin stories without relating them, which is how the city randomly orders the lives entrusted to it. Those lives are in turn diminished, consumed and wasted by the paper.
Conrad, p. 302.

This page, an experiment in newspaper format, was largely a rearrangement of phrases from the front page of The New York Times, September 17, 1899, cast in the form of code messages.
Burroughs, p. 920.

Typography opens shouting at the crowd hungry for the future. newspaper-poetry, a mass of feelings and colors, dedicated to the miraculous new LIGHT.
Fillia, p. 49.

Five floors down, a sheet of newspaper flutters across the cement at the bottom of the airshaft.

Newspapers wing, revolve and wing.
Lehman, Oxford, p. 443.

Newsies that shout sensational headlines.
Ono, “Midsummer.”

In hundredstreet multithousand cities every day thousands of newspapers come out, long, black columns of words, are announced loudly in all the boulevards they are written by little middle-aged men in spectacles wrong they are written by the City in its shorthand of thousands of accidents in its rhythm, pulse, blood long forty-column poems ticked out by multithousand machines which feel the pulse of the world millions of miles away.
[...]
all this the city writes in its forty-column poems this is true gigantic poetry the only one ever new, every twenty-four hours one that affects me as a strong electric current how ridiculous is all other poetry in front of it poets you are superfluous. [City as Body] [Textuality] Mehring, p. 34.

He’s as disposable as the daily paper.
Conrad, p. 232.

In the smoking car, whose etiquette is that you keep quiet and let men read the morning paper, it occurs to the student that future historians might value a casual abstract of one day’s marginalia on the book of life. I take a New York morning newspaper, on a Monday in August, 1928, and quote some of its minor items. It is not for me to offer comment; I leave that to the historian of 2028.
Morley, Morley’s, p. 185.

Perhaps grown-ups get somewhat that same feeling of reality—though not always of safe care and protection—by reading the newspaper. Once every two or three years I take a copy of the New York Times and sit down with it to study it intensively. The last time I did so was in 1928 when things were riding high. And now, cleaning up in my study in hope of a small vacation, I find the issue of May 29, 1931.
Ibid., p. 194

By purchasing a ragpaper copy of the New York Times, of which a limited edition is printed each day, “records of births, deaths, engagements may be preserved indefinitely.” This special perdurable edition costs 75 cents on weekdays, $1.25 on Sundays.
Ibid., p. 198.

The paper before me is the New York Times of Thursday, July 20. Giving ourselves the privilege of detachment, what can we deduce of the state of the world?
Ibid., p. 206.

The transcontinental air mail left New York at 11 A.M., arrived Chicago 7 P.M., arrived Omaha 20 minutes after midnight, arrived Cheyenne 4:30 A.M., arrived Salt Lake City 10 A.M., arrived San Francisco 4:30 P.M.
Ibid., p. 206.

An “overnight bag” containing a black coolie coat, a navy blue dress, and a typewritten manuscript was lost in a taxicab outside a restaurant on 58th Street.
Ibid., p. 208.

Marathon dancers, the biological oddities of the year 1928, were still going strong. A pair of them had just reached the outskirts of New York after having danced down the Post Road all the way from Bridgeport.
Ibid., p. 208.
Electric refrigeration was highly spoken of in the ads.
Ibid., p. 208.

People in the Chrysler Building elevators were stalled for 41 minutes, suspended between floors.
Ibid., p. 208.

Six circus lions housed in a barn on East 221st Street kept the neighbors awake.
Ibid., p. 208.

Babe Ruth muffed a fly and the Yankees lost, ending their winning streak of 9 games.
Ibid., p. 208.

Gimbel’s has a few openings for elevator girls of good appearance; must be at least feet 5 inches tall and under 25 years.
Ibid., p. 208.

With an atlas, an encyclopaedia, and a shelf of histories one might adequately absorb one issue of a newspaper.
Ibid., p. 209.

As one moves deeper into this fascinating maze of printed paradox we realize that only the merciful opium of habit makes it possible for the pensive citizen to skim all this every morning and not go haywire. Everywhere he turns is the perfection of astonishment.
Ibid., p. 211.

Here’s a letter to the New York Post
The worst piece of paper on the east coast
Matter of fact the whole state’s forty cents
In New York City fifty cents elsewhere
It makes no goddamn sense at all
America’s oldest continuously published daily piece of bullshit Flavor Flav is the one that makes The Post money

Ain’t worth the paper it’s printed on Founded in 1801 by Alexander Hamilton
That is 190 years continuous of fucked up news
Public Enemy, “Letter.”

You get a seat and hoist a copy of the New York Post. The Post is the most shameful of your several addictions.
McInerney, p. 11.

The Post confirms your sense of impending disaster. There’s a Fiery Nightmare on page three—an apartment blaze in Queens; and on page four a Killer Tornado that ravaged Nebraska. In the heartland of the country, carnage is usually the result of acts of God. In the city it’s man-made—arson, rape, murder.
Ibid., p. 57.

There are people out there from The New Yorker magazine. My God! What would they think?
Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.
I proceed to various newsstands in desperate need of a New York Post or a New York News to check out what course my life is taking back in Manhattan, but I can’t find any foreign papers anywhere.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 274.

Radio / TV (see also [Sound / Radio])

The time—7:15 A.M., WOR, New York. The temperature, outside, 84—

Friends—is your life worth one dollar?

Hayes, p. 1.

The decline of the street may be blamed upon several causes—the growth of radio and the motion picture.

Television killed the supper and nightclubs. The movie houses began closing, too.

Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

As the evening slowly falls upon us living here in Brooklyn, New York, this is ya Love Daddy rappin' to you. Right now we're gonna open up the Love Lines.

Lee, p. 64.

New York's multitudes became acutely aware of a new miracle in the fall of 1947, on the eve of the World Series baseball games. In a remarkably short time practically every tavern in town displayed signs bearing the single word "Television."

Rodgers, p. 311.

In anticipation of the imminent application of TV technology, NBC conceives of the entire block (insofar as it is not punctured by RCA's columns) as a single electronic arena that can transmit itself via airwaves into the home of every citizen of the world—the nerve center of an electronic community that would congregate at Rockefeller Center without actually being there. Rockefeller Center is the first architecture that can be broadcast.

This part of the Center is an anti-Dream Factory; radio and TV, the new instruments of pervasive culture, will simply broadcast life, "realism," as it is organized at the NBC studios.

By absorbing radio and TV, Rockefeller Center adds to its levels of congestion electronics—the very medium that denies the need for congestion as condition for desirable human interaction. [Dream City]

Koolhaas, p. 200.

The majority of chalk sidewalk art of Chelsea children in 1954 was identified as either television sets or characters and / or objects from popular television shows. None of the children’s interpretations of their drawings included references to personal or group associations.

Theater of protest expanded from the streets to the television studio. [Unrest]

Hoffman, Autobiography, p. 113.

To claim that the city is defined as a network of circulation communication, as a center of information and decision-making, is an absolute ideology; this ideology proceeding from a particular arbitrary and dangerous reduction – extrapolation and using terraced means, sees itself as total truth and dogma.
Lefebvre, Cities, p. 98.

The Waldorf-Astoria (1931) had a web of radio antennae strung between its towers as a means of universalizing itself.
Conrad, p. 257.

I get the news I need on the weather report.
Simon & Garfunkel, “Living Boy.”

Sunshine still with us and temperature still climbing, and it should get to sixty, and even into the sixties today. It’ll be coolest on the south shore of Long Island and the Connecticut coast with a southerly breeze coming in off the water. Then it clouds up tonight, could start to drizzle. We get drizzle and rain at times tomorrow, especially tomorrow night on into Sunday morning, could be some heavy rain and maybe a thunderstorm. The rain, um, er, probably at least the steady rain, ends Sunday morning, but there still may be some rain showers around Sunday afternoon, and it will be noticeably colder with temperatures no higher than the forties. Right now, though, uh, it is fifty-six degrees and sunny in Central Park, and the temperature today going up to, uh, about sixty.
Goldsmith, Weather, p. 41.

I paid $258 for that durned TV set. I was sitting there watching a program on the thing went blooey. I got so doggone mad, I just picked up the set and threw it out the window. When it hit the pavement, the picture tube exploded.
Greenburg, p. 115.

Why are you so hostile?
‘Cause I wanna watch the Knicks on television.
Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.

WBAI is kind of obscure, but you hear it from time to time if you take a lot of cabs.
Quan, p. 93.

From 1010 WINS to Live At Five Beastie Boys “Open Letter.”

Radio traffic reports and local TV news are in a frenzy.
Caldwell, p. 2.

Well, we’ve been telling you how bad the rush hour’s been in Midtown and through Manhattan and it’s only getting worse right now. We’ve been, uh, checking out the FDR Drive just south of the Triboro. This delay goes straight on down to the Brooklyn Bridge. And the northbound side, there was a crash in the 40’s with delays right off the Brooklyn Bridge going north. And the West Side, I’m telling you, it can take you upwards to two and a half to three hours to sit in this mess from the 120’s all the way down to the Battery Tunnel. I’m not seeing any movement at all right now around the Chelsea Piers area, around the 40’s, up in the 90’s. It’s just horrible on the West Side. Eighth Avenue’s gonna be bad, Teens all the way up to Columbus Circle. You got a ton of traffic right now on Seventh Avenue out of, uh, the area of Central Park, all the way down, going past Times Square. Broadway's being impacted by that too. On the East Side steer clear of Second Avenue. Because of the dump-off off the 59th Street Bridge and coming out of the Midtown Tunnel, you’ve got delays on Second Avenue from the 80’s all the way down to the Teens. And the East Side side streets through the 40’s and 50’s are an absolute mess. Big problems right now across the East River. The only thing south of the Triboro that’s moving is the Manhattan-bound Manhattan Bridge. Other than that, forget it. And right now off the Verrazano we’ve got troubles, Brooklyn-bound lower level there’s an accident. It’s a flipped over car, the Brooklyn-bound lower level of the Verrazano on the ramp to the Belt. This will impact the upper roadway too. So right now coming out of Staten Island coming off the Verrazano, it'll be very slow.

Goldsmith, Traffic, p. 87.

Technology

New York is Senegal with machines.
Lorca, Poet in NY, p. xi.

Entire cities are made of silicon, silicon oxide, and gold wire.
Kittler, p. 721.

The vernacular of the machine.
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 65.

The Machine Age equals jazz equals triangles equals modernism.
Ibid., p. 82.

We need the new urban landscape,
the dance of turbines,
the oily atoms of machines
Goll, p. 5.

Pneumatic mail—1897. Tube system built from General Post Office to Grand Central and Brooklyn, from Battery to 125th St.
Tubes are cast iron. Cylinders are twenty-four inches long, with a 7-inch diameter. Pressure provided by rotary blowers and air compressors.
Fifty-four miles of tube to 23 post offices, traveling at a speed of 30 and 40 m.p.h.
Operated weekdays between 5am and 10pm, carrying 6 to 7 million letters a day. By 1947 the U.S. Post Office had stopped using pneumatic tubes in all cities except Boston and NYC.
Tubes displaced by teleprinters.
Reasons for blockage: messengers drop chewing gum, rubber bands and erasers into inlets. If a carrier jams, pressure is doubled and sometimes reversed. If that doesn’t dislodge it, a heavy carrier may be shot against it, or it may have to be poked out with a steel rod.
New York office of The Associated Press snapped its dispatches to local offices by air chute.
Newspapers were delivered in chutes.
The streets of a city are alive in more ways than people usually imagine: as we walk the streets millions of letters and thousands of telegrams are shooting every which way under our very feet.
Granick, pp. 96-9.
Instantaneous landscapes flit through systems of pneumatic tubes.
Arce, p. 18.

Telegrams sorted at 60 Hudson Street (The Western Union Building) by girls on roller skates.
Granick, p. 105.

the street is my electric lyre,
I walk in its midst, like string above me are wires
Młodożeniec, p. 324.

1889 protest where a crew of men climbed 90 foot poles at the corner of Broadway and 14th St. and sheared the lines to the ground.
Granick, p. 134.

Overhead wires, dense as jungle vines began disappearing in the 1890s, and sky, both by day and night, returned to the landscape.
Caldwell, p. 209.

wireless subways vacuum cleaners pianolas funnygraphs skyscrapers an safetyrazors Cummings, p. 85.

The great forests of cedar and chestnut poles that once carried the telegraph wires are now forgotten. [Nature]
Granick, p. 105.

Metro, metronome, mechanical, constructive: nickel, express, radium, telephone, radio, cable, elevator, thermometer, petroleum, integral calculus, vermouth, speed, passport, radiator, voltaic arc, pneumatic, motor, alcohol, turbine.
Vinea, p. 54.

The living units or houses in cities must be measured in terms of molecules whose total reproduced millions of times, technologic media miniaturize surface area, even after having been barely fill a square millimeter.
Kittler, p. 721.

In a shockproof vault below 60 Hudson are two pendulum clocks each six feet in diameter. These huge mater clocks are regulated to tick off every sixtieth of a second in perfect unison with the clock at the Naval Observatory. If anything were to happen to the Observatory clock, the nation’s radio station, railroads, air fields, business houses and research laboratories would be able to get the correct time during the emergency from the Western Union clocks.
Granick, p. 105.

Everything whirls towards its mechanical destiny.
Sánchez, p. 306.

Is not the click of the telegraph, telephones, arc lights, elevators, cranes, trains, airplanes not a blossoming of terrestrial monotony?
They get scattered through all the floors of the downtown skyscrapers, around the side corridors fed by the main entrance of dozens of lifts. There are dozens of lifts for local connections, stopping at every floor, and dozens of express lifts, going up without a stop until the seventeenth, the twentieth, or the thirtieth. Special clocks show you what floor the lift is now on, lights indicating, in red and white, descent or ascent. And if you have two calls to make—one on the seventh floor and another on the twenty-fourth—you take the local up to the seventh, and then, so as not to waste six whole minutes, you change to the express.

Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 49.

We are caught up... on a great wave whether we will or not, a great wave of expansion and progress. A great deal is going to happen in the next few years. All these mechanical inventions—telephones, electricity, steel bridges, horseless vehicles—they are leading somewhere. It's up to us to be on the inside, in the forefront of progress...My God! I can't begin to tell you what it will mean..." Poking amid the dry grass and the burdock leaves he had moved something with his stick. He stooped and picked up a triangular skull with a pair of spiralfluted horns. "By gad!" he said. "That must have been a fine ram." [Primitive] [Nature]

Dos Passos,, p. 15.

You my century!
electrical gears,
speedway racer to the sun,
headlights on the stars,
I'm yours!
Goll, p. 5.

All the electricity belongs to the bourgeoisie, yet they eat by candle-end. They have an unconscious fear of their own electricity. They are embarrassed, like the sorcerer who has called up spirits he is unable to control. [Cosmic]

Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 59.

To support the alibi of "business," the incipient tradition of Fantastic Technology is disguised as pragmatic technology. The paraphernalia of illusion that have just subverted Coney Island's nature into an artificial paradise—electricity, air-conditioning, tubes, telegraphs, tracks and elevators—reappear in Manhattan as paraphernalia of efficiency to convert raw space into office suites.

Koolhaas, p. 87.

Canal Street, the city's graveyard of industrial mechanism.
Conrad, p. 309.

In 1879 there were only 17 residence telephones in New York and 5 in Brooklyn. The names of the owners were:

Barney, A. H. 101 E. 38th Street.
Barricklo, A. 52 Sedgwick St., Bklyn.
Borden, Wm. 411 W. 23rd Street.
Boncicault, D. 6 E. 15th Street.
Brown, Robert 280 Carlton Ave., Bklyn.
Boys operated the first switchboards. They were succeeded by girls in the eighties.

1877—The first telephone subscriber in New York was Mr. J.H. Haigh, 81 John Street. His line, five miles in length, was laid across the then half-finished Brooklyn Bridge to his steel plant in South Brooklyn. Mr. Haigh had the distinction of being the first paid line in New York City. [Loneliness]

New York Telephone Co. installs outdoor telephone booths in 1960. The disappearance of candy and cigar stores since the 1940s has created a need for public phones, and the company sees an opportunity to profit from calls made on impulse by pedestrians, but the new booths will be vandalized, used as urinals, turned into shelters, and employed as offices by drug dealers; directories will be stole and beginning in the 1970s the company will replace the booths with simpler, doorless enclosures.

In the telephone booth passing a finger up and down the names. Write the number on the back of a business card. Pop in the coin, hear it go clink and bing down into the black box.

And how quiet the telephone operator's office is! It is like a strange library where the librarians sit before their shelves and silently reach for the conversations which their invisible public desires.

Granick, p. 129.
Telephone billing—the practice of making monthly photographs of the phone meter.

N. cit.

Each day in New York 90,000 people dial WE6-1212 for the latest weather report; 70,000 dial ME7-1212 for the correct time.

talese, p. 37.

555-1212 for information wasn’t introduced until 1959.

lapsley, endnote 53.

The energy, time and money that go into preparing temporary political headquarters is astonishing. Early in September, on Republican order, Roosevelt Hotel housemen stripped the seventh floor of everything except the carpets, draperies and television sets. The sets were kept because Mr. Rockefeller wanted his staff to keep up with campaign developments.

When the floor was cleared, brand-new office equipment was carried in by the carload. Countless reams of stationery were piled up. Three hundred telephones were hooked up with a special three-position headquarters switchboard. Forty more telephones will be installed in the Roosevelt’s Grand Ballroom tomorrow. So will extra circuits for radio commentators and television men.

The Rockefeller men tried something new with good results. They set thirty telephones aside to carry Mr. Rockefeller’s stand on major issues. His voice was recorded on tape. The numbers of the special telephones were advertised so that any voter who wanted to brush up on Mr. Rockefeller’s platform could hear it in his own words, in his own voice.

Trager, p. 509.

“The Herald announces: ‘Residents of New York City and the country around will be able to read in the skies the result of the battle of the ballots to-morrow.’ A searchlight, place a top the Madison Square Garden Tower, beamed out the results as soon as they came in, pointing southward to announce that the Democrats had won.

La Guardia passes a bill describing slot machines as gambling devices that can be seized on sight, whether or not they are in use, and dumped into the Atlantic Ocean. Makers of the machines try to evade the law by placing an obscure knob that releases a cheap (and almost inedible) candy bar, claiming that their devices are vending machines. [Prohibition]

Trager, p. 485.

May 26, 1950: Mayor O’Dwyer says that he will not approve parking meters until he has proof that their manufacturers are not linked to slot machines.

Ibid., p. 575.

Ballpoint pens go on sale in 1945 at Gimbels for the price of $12.50 with the promise that the pens will write underwater. Some banks suggest that ballpoint pen signatures may not be legal. (cf. Cage’s malfunctioning pen & Revlon’s destroying [Window Displays] [Commodity])

Ibid., p. 549.
Ten years ago, in the early 1940s, the historian Allan Nevins of Columbia University saw a stumbling block ahead for historians of generations yet to be. Before the twentieth century, men had relied chiefly on letters to keep them in touch with associates in their calling, or in government. They wrote when they were on holiday; kept diaries.

When the telephone came into wider use and radio communications developed, the letter and the diary came to figure less and less in the daily scheme. Men could speak to one another though whole oceans lay between. Fast planes swept them in brief time to friends or kinsmen and that cut down a lot more on use of the written word.

Professor Nevins finally figured a way to build a source-material stockpile for tomorrow’s historians: get competent researchers to make tape-recordings of interviews with men and women notable in law, medicine, the arts, government, journalism, industry, advertising in all fields.

The Oral History Research Office was created. It operates out of Columbia University’s Butler Library. Finished tapes are transcribed there in triplicate—one copy for the subject, two for the files. The tapes are used over and over again, but small sections are cut off from time to time so the historian may hear the actual sound of the subject’s voice.

In ten years Oral History Research has accumulated 100,000 pages of manuscript in interviews with some 450 persons. All are stored in the Butler Library. Some will not be available to historians while the subjects still live, some will stay closed to from fifty to eighty years after a subject passes; one or two are not to be opened to historians until the Year 2001.

Columbia University does not own the manuscripts; it merely has them in custody. Ownership, it is explained, might make the university liable if any libel action resulted from a historian’s use of the material; mere custodianship would not. Each subject owns his own manuscript. At his death ownership passes to his estate. Closed items are locked away with rare books in the library’s fireproof vaults. Open manuscripts may be scanned by qualified scholars.

Researchers and transcribers are carefully chosen. They must be persons who would not be likely to disclose restricted material. Only the other day a girl transcriber resigned. She was working on an almost legendary police case, which is still unsolved. She told Oral History Research executives, “I’m afraid I couldn’t go on listening to this material without blurting some of it out somewhere.” Her resignation was accepted.

The project owns seven tape-recorders. Their newest models will take up to twelve interview hours on a single reel. Wherever they’re available, researchers pick up any diaries, pertinent documents, photographs or drawings and put them in with the Mss. Several open biographies already have gone into books, or into parts of books -- J. M. Burns’ “The Lion and the Fox,” A. M. Schlesinger’s “The Crisis of the Old Order,” among others.

Columbia has hired its project researchers out for special projects to Book-of-the-Month Club, to the Ford Motor Company, Radio Pioneers, Weyerhauser Timber Company, McGraw-Hill. The material will probably be used for corporate or institutional histories. The fee comes to around $90 an hour, which leaves a small profit margin. The margin is applied to other projects, although most of the work is done on special grants.

Not all subjects want their names made public now, but among those who have left their material open are Sir Norman Angell, Nobel prize winner; John W. Davis, the barrister; Senator William J. Fulbright; Edward J. Flynn, the late Democratic leader; John R. Gregg, the shorthand man; James W. Gerard, the diplomat; Mrs. Fiorello H. La Guardia, the former Mayor’s widow; Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth; Geoffrey Parsons, the late journalist; Keats Speed, the journalist; Norman Thomas; Henry A. Wallace; the Rev. George Barry Ward, parish priest. Frances Perkins’ manuscript, more than 5,000 pages, is to stay closed until five years after her death.

One of the subjects, a minister, is 100 years old. Close to fifty of the persons interviewed since the project started have died since. “Some of us,” one of the project people said the other day, “keep thinking of it, in some cases, as a race with death.” (cf. Joseph Mitchell on Joe Gould’s Oral History of Our Time [Art])

Berger, New York, pp. 245-7.

In early 1965, Norelco came out with the first affordable video recorder. “Andy called me up and said he had been making these underground movies and asked for a loaner on this Norelco video recorder for both a black & white and a color camera,” recalled Ekstract. “I thought it would be good publicity for Norelco to lend him one and have a world premiere underground party for him.”

Ekstract had heard that there was an unused train tunnel beneath the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel and thought the location would be an ideal setting for the premiere of Warhol’s videos made with the new equipment. The party was held on Friday, October 29, 1965. Entering through a hole in the street, denizens of the New York underground mixed with Park Avenue housewives, all dodging rats and roaches. The party was a success but the exact content of the tapes, recorded on an obsolete one-inch format which makes playback virtually impossible today, remains unknown. (cf. Trager: “Waldorf-Astoria Hotel built with a private railroad siding…” [Commodity])

Ekstract, p. 71.

The party for the machine was held underground, on the abandoned New York Central Railroad track on Park Avenue under the Waldorf-Astoria. You went in through a hole in the street. There was a band and Edie came in shorts, but there were people all dressed up in gowns who were screaming and dodging the rats and roaches and everything—it was the real thing all right.

Warhol, POPism, p. 19.

The purist refrigerators of New York.
Conrad, p. 136.

The intent escalator lifts a serenade.
Lehman, Oxford, p. 443.

I’m now living the way all outsiders think all New Yorkers live, i.e. under siege conditions, alleviated only a little by the shower with tension-soothing massage attachment, commercial meat slicer, automatic lettuce dryer and similar aids to lie. At least there’s a sense of other human beings being nearby.

Blandford, p. 11.

Cold War Radar-guided Nike missiles that once surrounded the city like a ballistic “ring of steel” were removed by the mid-1970s. Most of the missile batteries were positioned near sleepy towns on Long Island and in New Jersey and Westchester, but a couple were placed in now-abandoned military installations on the outskirts of the city itself.
The first true Xerox image appears October 22 at Astoria, Queens. The electrophotographic image “10-22-38 Astoria” is imprinted on wax paper which has been pressed against an electrostatically charged two-by-three inch sulfur-coated zinc plate that has been dusted with lycopodium powder.

Trager, p. 59.

“I could stay living in this city if they just installed Blaupunks in the cabs. Maybe the ODM III or ORC II dynamic tuning systems?” His voice softens here. “Either one. Hip my friend, very hip.”

Ellis, Psycho, p.4.

New York in the late 1990s, a seamless citywide transition from nicotine culture to cellular culture. One day the lump in the shirt pocket was Marlboros, the next day it was Motorola. One day the vulnerably unaccompanied pretty girl was occupying her hands and mouth and attention with a cigarette, the next day she was occupying them with a very important conversation with a person who wasn’t you. One day a crowd gathered around the first kid on the playground with a pack of Kools, the next day around the first kid with a color screen. One day travelers were clicking lighters the second they were off an airplane, the next day they were speed-dialing. Pack-a-day habits became hundred-dollar monthly Verizon bills. Smoke pollution became sonic pollution. Although the irritant changed overnight, the suffering of a self-restrained majority at the hands of a compulsive minority, in restaurants and airports and other public spaces, remained eerily constant. Back in 1998, not long after I’d quit cigarettes, I would sit on the subway and watch other riders nervously folding and unfolding phones, or nibbling on the teatlike antennae that all the phones then had, or just quietly clutching their devices like a mother’s hand, and I would feel something close to sorry for them. It still seemed to me an open question how far the trend would go: whether New York truly wanted to become a city of phone addicts sleepwalking down the sidewalks in icky little clouds of private life, or whether the notion of a more restrained public self might somehow prevail.

“I mean, this is the Internet,” he said, standing among the chattering switches. “You’re looking at it. It smells like an old Lionel train set. It weighs a ton. It sits on the floor on Hudson street. Virtual reality depends on the strength of this floor.”

Gopnik, p. 107.
Fitzgerald in The Beautiful and the Damned describes New York "struggling to approach the tremendous and impressive urbanity ascribed to it," in competition with its own publicity. Having already grandly imagined itself, it confronts the artistic imagination with a rebuff. The city promulgates values of its own: how can it then be made to speak for the different values of the artist? New York's monuments—the Empire State Building, the Statue of Liberty, the Brooklyn Bridge—defy the symbolizing faculty because they are already symbols, prepackaged and self-expounding. They therefore provoke in the artist a mischievous revisionism. If he is to capture the city, he must reinterpret them.

Conrad, p. 207.

Statue of Liberty

The Statue of Liberty: she is an image alarmingly disproportionate to the idea she's meant to serve. Why is she so menacingly gigantic, and if she's Liberty, why does she frown so illiberally? Instead of a mother, is she another mechanized bogey? Those who are made uncomfortable by her rewrite the allegory and reassign the image. Her torch, for instance, is meant to enlighten the world. Yet she seems to be raising it as a weapon, in hostility or at least admonishment.

Conrad, p. 215.

The torch is in reality a threatening club: "Get to work," it commands.

I am sorry to say that whenever I have returned from Europe, the first peep of lower Manhattan, with its craggy battlements, its spires splintering the very firmament, and the horrid Statue of Liberty, all these do so work on my spirit that I feel like repining. Not because I am home again—not, my friend, because the spectacle is an uplifting one, but, shame that I must confess the truth, because my return means back to toil, back to the newspaper forge, there to resume my old job of wordsmith. Why, the very symbol of liberty, that stupid giant female, with her illuminating torch, becomes a monster of hated mien, her torch a club that ominously threatens us: Get to work! Get to work!

Huneker, p. 22.

The torch: the blackened hilt of a broken sword.

Conrad, p. 215.

Statue of Bigotry

Reed, "Hold On."

Christopher Isherwood remembers the Statue as "the Giantess," an overbearing and unnurturing mother.

Conrad, p. 215.

Because the Statue is a woman, she's more the victim of interpretative impertinences than her male architectural colleagues.

Her cast-ironical welcome to the oppressed of other lands.

Max Beerbohm renamed her the Statue of Vulgarity. For Cecil Beaton in 1938 she appeared as a frumpish matron in last year’s ball gown; for Beerbohm she is an overeager hostess.
_Ibid._, p. 216.

Beerbohm told Robert Ross that the Statue must come down.
_Ibid._, p. 216.

Shaw once said that his reason for not going to the United States was that he couldn’t bear to see the Statue, and when he did go, he denounced her as a Statue of Anarchy.
_Ibid._, p. 216.

that empire outhouse that receptacle for all varieties of puke then there’s queen liberty tin shit standing in the middle of pee green water
[...]
(the statue of liberty is a prostitute)
The Last Poets, “New York New York.”

A monstrous idol which you call Liberty.
Conrad, p. 216.

Czech Dadaist Jindrich Styrsky, who in 1939 drew the Statue in construction. For a torso she has girders and pulleys, but she flaunts a swollen human mammary.
_Ibid._, p. 217.

Lady Liberty resembles a disturbed sleepwalker, wearing a bronze dressing gown and carrying a huge candlestick.
_Ibid._, p. 217.

If you ponder the inner life of the Statue of Liberty, you discover a head empty of thought.
_Ibid._, p. 223.

Why, Morand asks, is she turning her torch in the direction of Europe? Does she want to light her homeland first? Why has she been stranded on that islet? Are they afraid of her setting fire to things with her torch in the wind?
_Ibid._, p. 217.

She’s a symbol you can enter. But this erotic decipherment—reading the allegory by trespassing inside the body—ends in fear and frustration, as Liberty traps him within her. “From near by, the towering, green, abstract figure terrified me,” Morand reports. He valiantly thrusts himself into the abstraction: “I penetrated her skirts by fortress casements.” Once inside, he discovers a disquieting truth about her. Though she professes to be Liberty, her interior resembles a prison, and though she claims to be the impersonation of an idea he finds, when he climbs to the top of her, that her head is empty.
_Ibid._, p. 217.
Does Liberty have to be encircled by water because it’s too incendiary a notion and may need a cautionary quenching?

_Ibid._, p. 217.

When Mae West slinks into her garments in 1934, the Statue of Liberty is redefined as a statue of ignited libido. She earned the right to pose as the Statue because she’s a superwoman contemptuous of the official morality. Kong on the Empire State characterized the city’s mechanical monstrosity; if Mae West, mounting the Statue’s pedestal, is a monster, she’s at least a sacred one. Kong is the city’s nightmare of itself, Mae West its lubricious daydreaming.

_Ibid._, p. 217.

In 1950 Weegee photographed the Statue through one of his distorting lenses and warped her strict uprightness. She bends lewdly at the waist, vampily redistributing her weight and acquiring a disheveled femaleness. The spikes of her crown, elongated and blurred by the lens, fly out of control like unraveled braids of hair. Though she’s no longer an allegorical mentor, the new lileness of her body bestows a more up-to-date iconic status on her. She’s as sinuous in her wreathings as a Coca-Cola bottle, and her torch, also squeezed out of shape by the lens, resembles a hot dog. Weegee has made her a deity for the age of advertising, the logo of a product, not the emblem of an idea. And her visual association with fast food—with Coke and frankfurters—revises her monumental meaning. Her virtue is her infinite reproducibility, like the commodities of junk food. She forfeits heroic singularity but gains in recompense repeatability and ubiquity, which augment her power: Coke and hot dogs are themselves symbols of the consumer economy, that great boon of American liberty.

_Ibid._, pp. 218-20.

What’s great about this country is that America started the tradition where the richest consumers buy essentially the same things as the poorest. You can be watching TV and see Coca-Cola, and you know that the President drinks Coke, Liz Taylor drinks Coke, and just think, you can drink Coke, too. A Coke is a Coke and no amount of money can get you a better Coke than the one the bum on the corner is drinking. All the Cokes are the same and all the Cokes are good. Liz Taylor knows it, the President knows it, the bum knows it, and you know it.

_Warhol, Philosophy_, pp. 100-01.

In Rauschenberg’s “Die Hard” (1963) she floats sideways, bobbing in the ocean with splashed-down space capsules, or lumbers like a dirigible across the sky above the water towers on the New York rooftops. Horizontality at once changes her meaning. It’s a more democratic posture than standing up straight, though it also allies her with the cruising weaponry—submarines and planes—which supposedly exist to defend her. Tilted sideways, she’s both an odalisque and a missile.

_Conrad, p. 220.

In the poster Rauschenberg designed for the exhibition of his work in 1977 at the Museum of Modern Art, she stands next to the Flatiron and is dwarfed by it—a crude figurine, one of the clichés the city merchandizes as a remembrance. Inherited symbols we consign to the junk heap; the only objects which are authentically symbolic for us are the tacky castoffs of the city’s gutters or its dime stores. A cheap replica of Liberty is to him more truly iconic than the Statue itself.

_Ibid._, p. 220.
Rauschenberg does a jokey version of a Time magazine cover, where she’s ranked among the paraphernalia of patriotism, like the American flag and other symbols of a putative reference as cosmic as her own: the see-through globe from the 1964 New York World’s Fair and an aerial map of the fair grounds. [World’s Fair 1964]

Rauschenberg dreams of liberating Liberty from the arbitrary task of having to represent liberty, inviting her to step down from her pedestal. He delights in the city’s free-for-all. Iconography shackles its helter-skelter, blown-about things to a system and chains each one to a meaning. Rauschenberg protests that art should consist, as do the streets of New York, of happenings with no particular order or significance. Deposed as a statue, Liberty is reclaimed as litter.

Rauschenberg at exactly 12:18 am of a Sunday morning, balanced himself atop a ten-foot ladder, unscrewed a 500-watt light bulb, held his arm outstretched momentarily, and descended—thus completing his rarely performed Statue of Liberty happening.

Malanga, Archiving, p. 49.

If you ponder the inner life of the Statue of Liberty, you discover a head empty of thought.

Conrad, p. 223.

It used to be that the Statue of Liberty was the signpost that proclaimed New York and translated it for all the world. Today Liberty shares the role with Death.

The Liberty statue used to épater les bourgeois on the grounds of its height, many times eclipsed by the towering skyscrapers invented since.

Henderson, p. 21.

The inside of the Statue of Liberty has been coated in Teflon.

[Surrealism]

Moorhouse, p. 25.

A 1920 memorial at Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn called the Altar to Liberty includes a bronze statue of the goddess Minerva in full regalia. She is positioned facing west with her left arm raised in perpetual salute to the Statue of Liberty, visible across the bay.

[Death]

Goldenberg, pp. 11-12.

The second Statue of Liberty—the obscure almost unnoticed statue that stands on top of the Liberty-Pac warehouse at 43 West Sixty-fourth Street. This reasonable facsimile, erected in 1902, at the request of William H. Flattau, a patriotic warehouse owner, stands 55 feet high above its pedestal as compared with Bartholdi’s 151-footer on Liberty Island. The smaller Liberty also had a lighted torch, a spiral staircase, and a hole in the head through which Broadway could be seen. But in 1912 the staircase became weakened and the torch blew off in a storm.

[Simulacra]

Talese, p. 21.
When Port Authority Chairman Austin Tobin opened a new arrival terminal at Idlewild (later Kennedy International) Airport, he had it inscribed with four of the five lines form the Emma Lazarus poem immortalized on the Statue of Liberty. He had ordered the "wretched refuse" line expunged, presumably because he thought it sounded gauche at a modern airport terminal. "That line had meaning during the mass migrations of the nineteenth century," Tobin said when the criticism inevitably burst in his face, "but it has no meaning now. It might be offensive to the fine people of Europe—they might not regard themselves as 'wretched refuse.'" What really incensed Tobin, however, was the allegation that his omission had harmed the metrical pattern of the poem. "I didn't think I'd be criticized for that," he snapped. (cf. Berger: "The slogan on the General Post Office on Eighth Avenue is a mistranslation of Herodotus." [Antiquity]) [Textuality] Glanz, p. 45.

Liberty Island is now a tourist attraction, but in the 1930s, when it was called Bedloes Island—its official name until 1956—the section open to those visiting the statue was a comparatively small piece. Most of the island's dozen acres were occupied by Fort Wood.

The island was relatively isolated, with no stores or cars. There was a recreation center with two bowling alleys. Food had to be bought at the commissary at Fort Jay. The sole vehicle on Bedloes Island was an Army truck that delivered coal and ice to homes.

Their children recall having free run of the statue, often all the way up to the torch, 305 feet in the air. "We would get up to the torch, and we could actually rock it back and forth. We would walk around the torch—it was frightening but quite an experience."

Kilgannon, N. pag.

That statue of a woman holding aloft a torch over the grey green harbour of New York. Two flat ferries pass, one to and one fro.

Donleavy, N. pag.

A garbage scow burning in the upper bay just under Liberty's right arm.

Beatrice pointed out the fact that no longer Liberty held her bronze torch aloft. Save for a black, misshapen mass protruding through the tree-tops, the huge gift of France was no more.

England, p. 20.

She sits like a great witch at the gate of the country, showing her alluring white face, and hiding her crooked hands and feet under the folds of her wide garments, constantly enticing thousands from far within, and tempting those who come from across the seas to go no farther. And all these become the victims of her caprice. Some she at once crushes beneath her cruel feet; others she condemns to a fate like that of galley slaves; a few she favors and fondles, riding them high on the bubbles of fortune; then with a sudden breath she blows the bubbles out and laughs mockingly as she watches them fall.

Bridge
By the late nineteenth century, the Brooklyn Bridge had become clogged with traffic.
Hawes, N. pag.

A bridge exists to pave water.
Conrad, p. 231.

The skyline Stella observed from the bridge at night was a rain of meteors, a planetary holocaust. The lights resembled “suspended falls of astral bodies or fantastic splendors of remote rites.” The bridge’s structural responsibility is to cage light, to imprison an explosion.
Ibid., p. 239.

Whitman’s primary act of naming is followed by a series of impudent or insurgent renamings which announce a take-over. His biologically continuous Brooklyn Ferry becomes the tense, distraught Brooklyn Bridge of Hart Crane.
Ibid., p. 207.

Crane hears the bridge harmonically singing, Stella transcribes its outcry as the high-pitched complaint of color. Both oracularly implant a voice in mechanism.
Ibid., p. 245.

Crane writes of “the ecstasy of walking hand in hand across the most beautiful bridge of the world, the cables enclosing us and pulling us upward in such a dance…”
Ibid., p. 228.

In 1924 Crane removed himself to Columbia Heights, where he could be at a meditative distance from the city. Now, instead of living in it and being spent by it, he could look at it and understand it from afar. Across the river, it has receded into an image; between himself and it he has placed the Brooklyn Bridge, “the most superb piece of construction in the modern world,” as he called it, which engenders or engineers that image. The bridge suggests a reconstruction of himself. The valor of structural steel is its resilient preparedness for stress and tension, the inner ailments (as Crane discovered when abraded by New York) of modernity. In its combination of stone piers and steel cables, the bridge dramatizes a change in architectural physiology. There’s a difference in building materials between strength and stress, between plastic and elastic deformation. Iron is strong but breaks easily and can’t be pulled about. It has to be cast or molded, fixed into a solid shape. But if you add carbon, you change the properties of iron and make steel, which is tensile and abides stress. Engineering is the calculated application of stress to a material. Steel is manipulable, and if you know it must withstand a certain stress, you can ensure that it will do so. It copes by flexing, by giving slightly, like the upper tiers of the Empire State swaying in a gale. The cables on the bridge are examples of those contrary ‘pull forces’ that John Mann saw as the dynamics of cubism. Under pressure from both ends at once, they’re stressed to maintain form despite that tug-of-war. Rather than snapping, they bend, because the big cords are woven of smaller ones which cooperate in the chore. When in 1930 Crane was commissioned by Fortune magazine to write about the construction of the George Washington Bridge, it was the plaiting of these cables which most impressed him.
Ibid., p. 227.
The bridge posed a series of technical challenges to Bernice Abbott, who in 1943 lamented that "we cannot yet take a satisfactory photograph from the Brooklyn Bridge" because no film was fast enough to catch detail from the requisite distance, and the bridge's lateral swaying disrupted the exposure. [Photography]

Ibid., p. 244.

Comparing the Brooklyn Bridge with the noblest achievements of European architecture.

Ibid., p. 241.

The bridge's roadway is gloomy too in the afternoon, but in the evening aglow with aureoles.

Ibid., p. 242.

There is a Brooklyn Bridge sound, such as a million swarming bees might make, and it can be heard a mile away downwind for months on end, after which it is extinguished for a year or two before becoming audible again. It is caused by the tarmac on the bridge's roads having worn away to expose metal strips, which produce the high-pitched hum in the endless contact with tyres revolving at high speed; until workmen come to lay fresh tarmac again. [Sound]

Moorhouse, p. 23.

To play the harp of great cables strung sweeping the gothic arches of Brooklyn Bridge. Trembling a music solemn and sad. For all those down deep and listening in their street walking sorrow. [Sound]

Donleavy, N. pag.

Derelict after an air raid, the Brooklyn Bridge roadway still serves as a concert platform for an unheeding harpist. While the strings he plays on are taut and tuned, the bridge's cables have buckled, drooped, and twisted out of shape. The bricks crumble, the girders sag sickly. [Sound]

Conrad, pp. 246-7.

One walks the street at night with the bridge against the sky like a harp. [Sound]

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 599.

The bridge's roadway is effaced by a row of featureless warehouses. No one travels across it, for like Hopper's exterminating railway tunnel it's a route to nowhere.

Conrad, p. 245.

The Brooklyn Bridge vanishes in a fog in 1943, and the blizzard of 1947 immobilizes the city, icing up the riggings of the fishing boats and obstructing Fifth Avenue with the mounds of buried cars. [Weather] [Snow]

Ibid., p. 257.

Over the great bridge, with the sunlight through the girders making a constant flicker upon the moving cars, with the city rising up across the river in white heaps and sugar lumps all built with a wish out of non-olfactory money.

Fitzgerald, Gatsby, p. 54-5.
For Mayakovsky the Brooklyn Bridge prophesies the advent of dialectical materialism, for its own constructive means, advancing beyond the stolidity of stone and suspending masses in the air by the agency of tense steel, take matter and raise it to spirit, as poetic imagery does. It's not a weighted, completed, obstructive thing, but a field of forces distributed through space. Not planted in earth, it unfolds in air, and the logic of its design suggests a similar engineering of society and history: man would be released from his servitude to material forces if only those forces could be operated on, directed, articulated. The bridge is built in time as much as in space. It’s a passage into the future as well as a conduit across a river. Mayakovsky sees it as a prehensile predator, standing with one steel leg in Manhattan while extending a paw to grip Brooklyn.

He adopts the bridge's own method of segmenting in his poetic punctuation. Mayakovsky experimented with a punctuation that would array sentences in space, rather than hastening them through time toward a dying fall, with every comma an expression of reserve or hesitancy, every full stop an obsequy; and this new punctuation, stepped or tiered or zigzagging, works like the bridge, whose cables divide New York in order to rule it.

If the Eiffel Tower stays too long in wanton Paris, it will, he fears, get flabby and sell out to the frivolous values of Montmartre. Traveling home across the Atlantic in 1925, he worries about the same mechanical disfunction in himself. He has been estranged from his activist purpose while abroad and feels himself to be tarnished, corroded: 'steel words rust, blacken copper brass. why is it, under foreign rain, I get wet, and rot and rust?''

Conrad, p. 224.

so I,
in graying evening
haze, humbly set foot
on Brooklyn Bridge.
As a conqueror presses into a city
all shattered,

so, I from the near skies
bestrewn with stars, gaze at New York through the Brooklyn Bridge.
New York,
heavy and stifling
till night, has forgotten its hardships and height;
and only the household ghosts ascend in the lucid glow of its windows.

Here
the elevateds drone softly.
And only gentle telling here trains are crawling and rattling like dishes being cleared in a cupboard.

Mayakovsky’s poem about the making of the bridge takes the bridge to pieces—unraveling its muscular wires, capsizing its building blocks—in order to refabricate it as a poem.

Many nights, I stood on the bridge—and in the middle alone—lost—a defenseless prey to the surrounding swarming darkness—crushed by the mountainous black impenetrability of the skyscrapers—here and there lights resembling the suspended falls of astral bodies or fantastic splendors of remote rites—shaken by the underground tumult of the trains in perpetual motion, like the blood in the arteries. [City as Body]
Sharpe, p. 207.

The Brooklyn Bridge is still to be observed, but the Hudson Tube is a more modern wonder.
Ibid., p. 206.

The skyscrapers are the children of the bridges.
Federal Writers, p. 215.

The Brooklyn Bridge conjoins two worlds, fusing earth and heaven;
the skyscrapers are a collective cathedral; New York is an angry cyclops, gesticulating with steel girders in defiance of the gods.
Conrad, p. 136.

With every step the lines of those cables shift, so that you are glimpsing the city through a constantly changing geometric design.
[Grid]
Brook, p. 15.

Picking his teeth he walked through the grimy dark entrance to Brooklyn Bridge. A man in a derby hat was smoking a cigar in the middle of the broad tunnel. The arching footwalk was empty except for a single policeman who stood yawning, looking up at the sky. It was like walking among the stars. Below in either direction streets tapered into dotted lines of lights between square blackwindowed buildings. The river glimmered underneath like the Milky Way above. Silently smoothly the bunch of lights of a tug slipped through the moist darkness. A car whirred across the bridge making the girders rattle and the spiderwork of cables thrum like a shaken banjo. [Sound]
Dos Passos, p. 124.

On Brooklyn Bridge, color glowers from an inferno. The green and red glare of the traffic lights signals seething of the pit. [Light]
Conrad, p. 239.
The central arch of the Brooklyn Bridge is cloven.
_Ibid._, p. 133.

The object in New York which most keenly attunes itself to the subject is a bridge. If you anthropomorphize the skyscrapers, you get either an overweening ego or an ape; if you ponder the inner life of the Statue of Liberty, you discover a head empty of thought; but the Brooklyn Bridge seems to take on naturally the attributes of a human body. It's as vibrant as a body, receiving from and transmitting to your body as you walk across it the hum and clatter of the traffic using it, and it's a lucid mental apparatus as well. Being transparent, it segments the city with its cables and instructs you—if you look at New York through it—in a way of seeing it. The bridge’s engineering is the effortful but gracious enforcement of synthesis, holding contraries together with the violence of spun steel. And its bravest feat of this kind is visual, not architectonic. It analyzes the city, proposing itself to the artist as a mediator between his subjective retreat and the throng of clamoring objects which is downtown Manhattan.
_Ibid._, p. 223.

One looks down from the Brooklyn Bridge on a spot of foam or a little lake of gasoline or a broken splinter or an empty scow.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 599.

And high upon the Brooklyn Bridge alone,
An ugly ogre masturbates by ear
Berrigan, “Traditional Manner,” p. 32.

Steve Brodie was an American from New York City who jumped off the Brooklyn Bridge and survived on July 23, 1886. The resulting publicity from the supposed jump, whose veracity was disputed, gave Brodie publicity, a thriving saloon and a career as an actor.
“Steve Brodie (bridge Jumper),” N. pag.

Brodie swung to and fro in the breeze, and steadied himself as well as he could. When he hung perpendicularly over the river he let go his hold, and shot down like an arrow. It was but a few seconds before he struck the water. His body inclined a little to the right, and his legs were parted. He, however, struck with his feet and then on his side, disappearing from view as the water splashed up around and then closed over him. He was under water four seconds. When he came up he began floundering about, as though bewildered by the shock he had received…
Dr. White proceeded to examine him all over. He found a small contusion on the right breast, just below the shoulder, and another below the right nipple. He finally pronounced him in excellent condition, only suffering somewhat from shock. He could not find anything the matter with his internal organs. They were as sound as they could be, and, in his opinion, Brodie was only shamming a little. Then Brodie called for more whisky… The only other person who succeeded in jumping from the Brooklyn Bridge was Emmett Odlum, a Washington swimming teacher, who lost his life in his attempt in 1885.
“A Leap,” _NYTimes_, N. pag.

“Steve Brodie” jumping nightly off a reproduction of the Brooklyn Bridge, 100 feet high at the Fair. [World’s Fair] [Simulacrum]
Conrad, p. 265.
who jumped off the Brooklyn Bridge this actually happened and walked away unknown and forgotten into the ghostly daze of Chinatown soup alley ways & firetrucks, not even one free beer
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 5.

Ginsberg’s description in Howl is fictional... Tuli Kupferberg did jump from the Manhattan Bridge in 1944, after which he was picked up by a passing tugboat and taken to Governor Hospital. Severely injured, he had broken the transverse process of his spine and spent time in a body cast. He told Thelma Blitz he feels it’s important that people don’t think they can emulate this leap and walk away unscathed as the poetic accounts suggest he did.

“Tuli Kupferberg,” N. pag.

I asked Tuli Kupferberg once, ‘Did you really jump off of The Manhattan Bridge?’ “Yeah,” he said, “I really did.” “How come?” I said.
“I thought that I had lost the ability to love,” Tuli said. “So, I figured I might as well be dead. So, I went one night to the top of The Manhattan Bridge, & after a few minutes, I jumped off.” “That’s amazing,” I said. “Yeah,” Tuli said, “but nothing happened. I landed in the water, & I wasn’t dead. So I swam ashore, & went home, & took a bath, & went to bed. Nobody even noticed.”

Ibid.,

The bridge, he said, “emerges victorious,” subjugating the hellish “fluvial abyss” of the torrent beneath.
Ibid., p. 239.

As the New York City municipal bridge worker said to Ms. Sontag when, to mark a significant birthday, she once, with a companion, scaled the pylons of the Brooklyn Bridge, “You can do it, Sue!”
McCourt, p. 250.

G.W. Bridge

No bridge has yet been built across the Hudson at New York.
Stokes, p. 815.

Corbusier: “The George Washington Bridge over the Hudson is the most beautiful bridge in the world. Made of cables and steel beams, it gleams in the sky like a reversed arch. It is blessed. It is the only seat of grace in the disordered city.”
Miller, p. 479.

The anonymity of the G.W. Bridge shares its status with the Empire State Building, The Chrysler Building, and Rockefeller Center. New York’s major landmarks are faceless: “The George Washington Bridge now marks high water in current architecture. How many people know that this bridge was designed and built by Mr. Othmar Ammann for the Port of New York Authority?”
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 60.

If all the wires in all the cables wrapped into the George Washington Bridge were stretched out lengthwise, they’d circumnavigate the world four times over.
Conrad, p. 249.
In intense cold, the metal framework of the George Washington Bridge contracts, creating a rise of three feet in the roadway, at the centre of its span. In hot weather, due to the expansion of its giant cables, the centre is twelve feet closer to the Hudson than in mid-winter. With its grey lines and trellises, its silver spokes and curving girders, this bridge is like an exquisitely complicated cat’s-cradle of steel that leaps into the immensity. Connecting Manhattan Island with New Jersey, it is one of the most beautiful of man-made objects. To defray the cost of building, fifty cents is charged for crossing the bridge by car, and it cannot but be fortunate that funds ran out before the intended decorations could be added. Its extreme and unpretentious functionalism makes it a supreme example of modern engineering.

Beaton, New York, p. 39.

From dawn to dusk to dawn, day after day, you can hear the steady rumble of tires against the concrete span of the George Washington Bridge.

Talese, p. 19.

The boat passed under the massive darkness of the George Washington Bridge, turned around, and started back down the river. I was on the top deck, alone, while the kids were whooping it up on the dance deck. After the pack of people, it was good to be alone. The couples on the top deck kept very much to themselves. I watched the bridge, and played time games with myself. I could remember when the bridge was built, remember when I used to walk back and forth across it, remember seeing it from the Cloisters, remember the loom of it coming back from weekends in New Jersey. I was twelve. I was twenty. I was thirty-two. Things that had happened on the bridge were checkpoints through the years. Passing under it was another checkpoint; I’d never done that before.

Hamilton, p. 52.

As the boat passed under the George Washington Bridge, I began to play time games again. Every two minutes a year passed: that was the game. Ten minutes was five years. Twenty minutes ten years. Forty minutes, twenty. What was going to happen to those people on the dance floor as the minutes rolled by? Where would they be? What would they be doing? What would they look like? How would they feel? What would they think about themselves?

Ibid., p. 53.

Many people opposed the name Verrazano because they could not spell it. Others, many of them Irish, did not want a bridge named after an Italian, and they took to calling it the “Guinea Gangplank.” Still others advocated simpler names—“The Gateway Bridge,” “Freedom Bridge,” “Neptune Bridge,” “The New World Bridge,” and “The Narrows Bridge.” One of the last things ever written by Ludwig Bemelmans was a letter to the New York Times expressing the hope that the name “Verrazano” be dropped in favor of a more “romantic” and “tremendous” name, and he suggested calling it the “Commissioner Moses Bridge.”

Talese, pp. 268-9.
Robert Moses

Empire

Moses built the infrastructure that secured New York’s place among the greatest cities in the history of the world. Alexander Garvin has said it succinctly: “Nobody, not even Baron Haussmann in 19th century Paris, has ever done more to improve a city.”

Moses himself once said of the man who rebuilt the French capital in the 1850s and 1860s: “Baron Haussmann has been described as a talker, an ogre for work, despotic, insolvent, full of initiative and daring, and carrying not a straw for legality.” Moses might have been describing himself. And so also Moses’s conclusion about Haussmann: “Everything about him was on a grand scale, both good qualities and faults. His dictatorial talents enabled him to accomplish a vast amount of work in an incredibly short time, but they also made him many enemies, for he was in the habit of running roughshod over all opposition.” Baron Haussmann operated under the tutelage of Napoleon III. Moses also operated in a special time, when most people thought that government could and should do grand things for ordinary families.

Ballon, p. 71.

He had “the energy and enthusiasm of a Haussmann.” This made him “uniquely equal, as Haussmann himself had been equal, to the opportunities and needs of the period,” and uniquely qualified to build “the city of the future” in our time.

Berman, Solid, p. 302.

He appeared as the latest in a long line of titanic builders and destroyers, in history and in cultural mythology: Louis XIV, Peter the Great, Baron Haussmann, Joseph Stalin (although fanatically anti-communist, Moses loved to quote the Stalinist maxim “You can’t make an omelet without breaking eggs”), Bugsy Siegel (master builder of the mob, creator of Las Vegas), “Kingfish” Huey Long; Marlowe’s Tamburlaine, Goethe’s Faust, Captain Ahab, Mr. Kurtz, Citizen Kane. Moses did his best to raise himself to gigantic stature, and even came to enjoy his increasing reputation as a monster, which he believed would intimidate the public and keep potential opponents out of the way.

Ibid., p. 294.

The greatest intracity road development of modern times before Robert Moses was the boulevarding of Paris envisioned by Emperor Napoleon III and carried out by his Prefect of the Seine, the “brawny Alsatian” George-Eugène Haussmann, between 1852 and 1870. But the roads of Haussmann impressive though they were, were nonetheless still roads designed for the carriage rather than the car.

Caro, p. 838.

Moses made land.

Ibid., p. 392.

Moses would be the man, who patching together the rent torn in the earth millennia before by the glaciers rumbling down from Hudson Bay, reunited Long Island with the mainland of the United States.

Ibid., p. 387.
Great roads of the twentieth century: Mussolini’s autostrade, Hitler’s Autobahn, and Moses’ Long Island parkways.
Ibid., p. 838.

From the pyramids of Egypt, the rebuilding of Rome after Nero’s fire, to the creation of the great medieval cathedrals… all great public works have been somehow associated with autocratic power. It was no accident that most of the world’s great roads—ancient and modern alike—had been associated with totalitarian regimes, that it took a great Khan to build the great roads of Asia, a Darius to build the Royal Road across Asia Minor, a Hitler and a Mussolini to build the Autobahnen and autostrade of Europe.
Ibid., p. 874.

“He was a man of vision… a giant… He saw Nature as a whole… He was a hero of old, always rushing into battle with Excalibur waving above his head. I always thought of the Park Association as Aaron and Hur… They were the soldiers in the Bible who stood behind Moses and held up his arms when he got tired (at the battle of Rephidim, at which ‘Israel prevailed’ so long as Moses held up his hands). Well, that’s how I thought of the Park Association, as upholding the arms of Bob Moses.”
Ibid., p. 4259.

Moses commented upon the building of Shea Stadium, “When the Emperor Titus opened the Colosseum in 80 A.D. he could have felt no happier.”
Ibid., p. 6.

[A] measure of his career is immortality. Men strive for a sliver of it; Robert Moses had it heaped upon him. Not only is there a Robert Moses State Park on Long Island, there is a Robert Moses State Park on Long Island, there is another Robert Moses State Park at Massena. there is a Robert Moses Causeway on Long Island, a Robert Moses Parkway at Niagara. The great dam at Niagara is named for him. And over the entrance to the dam at Massena, in letters of stainless steel each three feet height, gleaming the words “Robert Moses Power Dam.”
Ibid., p. 9.

To compare the works of Robert Moses to the works of man, one has to compare them not to the works of individual meant but to the combined total work of an era. The yardstick by which his public housing and Title 1 feats can best be measured, for example, is the Age of Skyscrapers, which reared up the great masses of stone and steel and concrete over Manhattan in quality comparable to his. The yardstick by which the influence of his highways can be gauged is the Age of Railroads. But Robert Moses did not build only housing projects and highways. Robert Moses built parks and playgrounds and beaches and parking lots and cultural centers and civic centers and a United Nations Building and a Shea Stadium and a Lincoln Center and the mid-city campuses of four separate universities. He was a shaper not of sections of a city but of a city. He was, for the greatest city in the Western world, the city shaper, the only city shaper. In sheer physical impact on New York and the entire metropolitan region, he is comparable not to the works of any man or group of men or even generations of men. In the shaping of New York, Robert Moses was comparable only to some elemental force of nature.
But if in the shaping of New York, Robert Moses was an elemental force, he was also a blind force: blind and deaf to reason, to argument, to new ideas, to any ideas except his own.

The life of a suspension bridge, engineers tell us, is measureless. Atomic attack or natural catastrophe could render all New York shapeless. Barring such monumental calamity in centuries to come discerning historical will, if they look for it, be able to see writ plain throughout the great city and its suburbs evidence of the shaping hand of Robert Moses. [Apocalypse]

Roads

The major roads in Rome, the widest paved highways in any ancient city, were, only sixty-five and a half feet wide; the highways Moses was preparing to build were two hundred feet wide.

Caro, p. 838.

Moses: “What will people see in the year 1999? The long arteries of travel will stand out.”

The roads of Rome stood for two thousand years and more; who would predict less for the roads of Moses? Who would predict less for his Shea Stadium, a structure consciously shaped to resemble Rome’s Colosseum because he was afraid that his convention center-office tower “Coliseum” didn’t make the comparison clear enough?

During the 1930s, Robert Moses had announced a program—of New York Bridge and arterial highway construction and park reconstruction—which, taken as a whole, as the single coordinated system it was, dwarfed any public work or coordinated system of public works built in any modern city, and, perhaps in any ancient city as well. The program Robert Moses was announcing now—during the 1940s—would, if completed, dwarf those earlier programs. And, he said, there was no reason why it shouldn’t be completed; it was, he said, no mere visionary dream; “The postwar highway era is here.”

Moses’ Northern and Southern State parkways, leading from Queens out to Jones Beach and beyond, opened up another dimension of modern pastoral. These gently flowing, artfully landscaped roads, although a little frayed after half a century, are still among the world’s most beautiful. But their beauty does not (like that of, say, California’s Coast Highway or the Appalachian Trail) emanate from the natural environment around the roads: it springs from the artificially created environment of the roads themselves. Even if these parkways adjoined nothing and led nowhere, they would still constitute an adventure in their own right.

Berman, Solid, p. 298.

Blueprints were ready for widening the city’s old boulevards—Horace Harding, Queens, Conduit, Northern, Eastern—and his old parkways— the Belt, the Gowanus, the Cross Island, the Laurelton—and for building

To build his highways, Moses threw out of their homes 250,000 persons—more people than lived in Albany or Chattanooga, or in Spokane, Tacoma, Duluth, Akron, Baton Rouge, Mobile, Nashville or Sacramento. Ibid., p. 19.

His highways and bridges and tunnels were awesome—taken as a whole the most awesome urban improvement in the history of mankind—but no aspect of those highways and bridges and tunnels was as awesome as the congestion on them. Ibid., p. 20.

Moses: “Cities are created by and for traffic.” Ballo, p. 125.

Before they existed, four bridges had connected Long Island with the rest of the world, and they all had been jammed. Now six bridges connected Long Island with the rest of the world. And they were jammed. Caro, p. 519.

On August 17, 1936, A little more than a month after the Triborough Bridge opened, Long Islands parkways where the scene of what some observers called the greatest traffic tie-up in the history of the metropolitan area. Referring to it as a “cross-country traffic jam, “the Herald Tribune was forced to conclude that the bridge had, at least indirectly caused it. Apparently, the “motoring residents of the Bronx” had all discovered at the same moment that the Triborough “brought them with an easy time of Jones Beach and other cool and pleasant resorts on the south shore of Long Island” and had decided “at the same moment to head for the ocean by way of the new bridge and the Grand Central Parkway. And nearly all of them got stuck—as did countless other motorists going to and from Long Island.” [Congestion] [Density] Ibid., p. 516.

Within weeks of the opening of the Van Wyck Expressway, the road was jammed. The four miles of roadway which Moses had hacked across Queens looked like a four-mile-long parking lot. “Traffic will flow freely,” Moses had promised... Drivers were chained to the Van Wyck; men who, commuting daily had taken twenty minutes to cover the four miles had looked forward to the opening of the publicized new road; now, clocking their first trips on it, they could hardly believe their watches; where it had taken twenty minutes on local streets, it now took thirty minutes on the expressway—if conditions were good. And, so often, they were bad. The new road had not freed them from the trap of daily travel; it had closed the trap on them more firmly than ever, for new traffic, generated by the new road, was also jamming the local streets. With every passing year, congestion on the expressway worsened. Ibid., pp. 910-11.

The Times, clocking travel time to the Lincoln Tunnel found on one evening that it took a truck twenty-seven minutes to make a one-block-square circuit to the entrance plaza. Within the city, it seemed that there was no a crevice into which cars did not cram; traffic was piling up everywhere; on the crosstown side streets in midtown Manhattan, the Times found, motorists frequently spent forty minutes traversing the two and a half miles from one side of the island to the other.

Ibid., p. 912

And it wasn't only the bridges and highways that were jammed. As seen from the air, at rush hours, every street in the neighborhoods near the approaches to the East River crossings was a crawling mass of cars.

Ibid., p. 912.

In 1955, you would have had to build sixty lanes of new highway just to keep up with the increase in traffic.

Ibid., p. 943.

He had condemned all Long Islanders— for generations to come.

Ibid., p. 954.

We learn to tolerate intolerable conditions.

Ibid., p. 912

People caught in intolerable traffic jams twice a day, day after day, week after week, month after month, began after some months to accept traffic jams as a part of their lives, to become hardened to them, to suffer through them in dull and listless apathy.

Ibid., p. 913

Traffic was "normal," which meant jammed.

Ibid., p. 911.

New bridges jammed up without easing the jams on the old, as every lane of gleaming white concrete was filled with cars as soon as it was opened to traffic.

Ibid., p. 913

How to come grips in one's imagination with a situation in which a mighty expressway, a gigantic superhighway of dimensions literally almost unknown to history could be opened one month—and be filled to absolute capacity the next.

Ibid., p. 914.

He wanted to plow a 48-foot wide highway through the middle of Washington Square Park in a trench below grade, crossed only by a few pedestrian bridges.

Ballon, p. 126.

On the opposition to his road through Washington Square Park: "There is nobody against this—NOBODY, NOBODY, NOBODY, but a bunch of, a bunch of MOTHERS!"

Ibid., p. 125.

Greenwich Village is sound. It needs no broad highways, no great projects, no straightening out of streets.

Abrams, p. 205.
Stuart Constable, aide to Robert Moses: “I don’t care how those people in Greenwich Village feel. They can’t agree on what should be done. They’re a nuisance. They’re an awful bunch of artists down there.” To which community activists responded, “Not only do we applaud Mr. Constable’s outspokenness in this matter, but we feel he is right when he says that Villagers are a nuisance. Anyone who joins in community action to preserve local traditions and resources is always a terrible nuisance to The Authorities. We hope there are thousands of nuisances like that within a stone’s throw of his office.”

Ballon, p. 126.

Jane Jacobs was just a housewife.
Grantz, p. 20.

Moses called people of tiny neighborhoods and small-scale streetscapes “little schnooks.”
Glanz, p. 73.

It was in transportation, the area in which Robert Moses was most active after the war, that his isolation from reality was most complete: because he never participated in the activity for which he was creating his highways—driving—at all. Insulated in the comfortable rear seat of his limousine, unable to experience even once the frustration of a traffic jam, unable, unless he made an effort and put his work side and leaned forward to look out the window, even to look at a traffic jam, Robert Moses did not know what driving in the modern era was. He did not know that the sheer weight of numbers of new cars changed the very nature of the activity for which he was creating facilities, had introduced... He was making transportation plans based on beliefs that were not true anymore. He was making plans that had no basis in reality.
Caro, p. 836

His car, the most luxurious Detroit could provide (the richness of its leather upholstery gave one guessed the feeling that he was not in a motor vehicle but the library of a fine men’s club, an illusion reinforced by the placement of the limousine’s side windows so far forward that the occupants of its deeper rear seat could see out only by leaning forward—there was a feeling of isolation; normally when you ride in the back of a car people are able to look in and you’re able to look out, but here it was as if you were isolated from the outside world”), rushed to him by Detroit at his command, stood at his call day and night; to ensure that it would, he had not one but three personal chauffeurs.

Of the tens of thousands of cars that passed daily through the empire’s toll booths, that car alone did not stop. And when the big black limousine with the row of shields on its bumper and the license plate “2000” roared through a booth, not even slowing down, the uniformed officer inside jumping to salute and then staring after it, straining vainly to catch a glimpse of the living legend riding in the rear seat, the lieutenant or captain in charge at the toll plaza would hastily pick up his telephone—as hastily as the commission trooper, miles down the road, seeing the long black limousine looming out of the distance, would reach for his radio microphone—to keep the empire’s capital on Randall’s Island appraised, minute by minute and mile by mile of its ruler’s progress, so that urgent messages could be delivered to him at the next toll plaza. If, in reply, he wanted to make a call—he would not allow a telephone in his car so that he could work in it uninterrupted—his chauffer would pull in to the next police barracks, troopers springing up to escort him to a phone.

When the calls from the toll booths and the troopers out on the parkways indicated that Moses was headed toward one of his offices, that office would erupt into frenzied excitement. Grown men—men who were themselves in positions of authority over hundreds of men—Which out to each other: “RM is twenty-four minutes away!” “He’s 12 minutes away!” “The boss will be here in one minute!”

Ibid., pp. 813, 815.

Moses had never, aside from a few driving lessons 30 years before, driven a car. He didn’t know what driving was. His chauffeured limousine was in office, to him a particularly pleasant office...

Traveling by car have been pleasant for him in the 1920’s; it was still pleasant for him in the 1950’s. The nature of driving might’ve changed immensely for the people of the metropolitan area; it had not changed for him at all.

Ibid., p. 834

I wish that Robert Moses had been in charge of the subways instead of the highways.

Ballon, p. 71.

At rush hour, the scenes at subway stations in the greatest city in history’s richest and technologically most advanced civilization were incredible. At hundreds of stations, the traveler arrived each morning at the head of the stairs leading down onto the loading platforms to beneath him, overflowing them, lapping precariously full to their very edges, a sea of humanity—a sea into which the traveler had no choice but to hurl himself.

To get inside the trains, men and women pushed and shoved like irritable animals, rushing proceeds as animals rush for a food trough, for without a seat they would have to stand—body crushed against body, strangers smells in their nostrils, strangers breaths in their faces—in a press so dense that there could exist in it neither comfort nor dignity nor manners. Writers called subway cars “cattle cars”; they said people were crammed into them “like sardines”; and such nonhuman images were apt. For the crowding in New York subways—crowding to which hundreds of thousands of human beings were subjected after day, year after year, for all the years of their working lives—was inhuman. Although most office workers were not due until 9 o’clock, on any weekday morning one could see around the subway stations in outlying areas of the cities—past the chain-link fences of the giant parking lots on Woodhaven Boulevard near the giant new Lefrak City housing development in Queens, for example—long lines of men and women, during the fall and winter huddling in their coats against the too early morning chill, hurrying for the stations at 7:45 for even 7:30, willing to forgo a half hour or more of sleep, willing to cope down the coffee and danish at the office instead of breakfasting at home, to avoid the worst of that degrading ordeal. By 8 o’clock, it was already too late.

Caro, p. 931.

When Moses came to power in New York in 1934, the city’s mass transportation system was probably the best in the world. When he left power in 1968, it was quite probably the worst.

Ibid., p. 933.
With money, you could buy almost anything in mid-twentieth-century New York. But you couldn’t buy a decent trip to and from work.
_Ibid._, p. 933.

Modernism

To oppose his bridges, tunnels, expressways, housing developments, power dams, stadia, cultural centers, was—or so it seemed—to oppose history, progress, modernity itself.
_Berman, Solid_, p. 294.

The public works that Moses organized from the 1920s onward expressed a vision—or rather a series of visions—of what modern life could and should be.
_Ibid._, p. 296

Thanks to Robert Moses, the modernity of the urban boulevard was being condemned as obsolete, and blown to pieces, by the modernity of the interstate highway.
_Ibid._, p. 295

Its most striking feature as a landscape is its amazing clarity of space and form: absolutely flat, blindingly white expanses of sand, stretching forth to the horizon in a straight wide band, cut on one side by the clear, pure, endless blue of the sea, and on the other by the boardwalk’s sharp unbroken line of brown. The great horizontal sweep of the whole is punctuated by two elegant Art Deco bathhouses of wood, brick and stone, and halfway between them at the park’s dead center by a monumental columnar water tower, visible from everywhere, rising up like a skyscraper, evoking the grandeur of the twentieth-century urban forms that this park at once complements and denies. Jones Beach offers a spectacular display of the primary forms of nature—earth, sun, water, sky—but nature here appears with an abstract horizontal purity and a luminous clarity that only culture can create.
_Ibid._, p. 296.

Giedion compared Moses’ parkways to cubist paintings, to abstract sculptures and mobiles, and to the movies. “As with many of the creations born out of the spirit of this age, the meaning and beauty of the parkway cannot be grasped from a single point of observation, as was possible from a window of the château at Versailles. It can be revealed only by movement, by going along in a steady flow, as the rules of traffic prescribe. The space-time feeling of our period can seldom be felt so keenly as when driving.”
_Ibid._, 302.

Culture

It was always Moses’s ambition to write “cheap pulp” fiction.
_Caro_, p. 811.

In the mid-1950’s, short on cash as usual, [Moses] announced to aides that he was going to write “a trashy piece of pulp” that he was sure to sell. Ironically, when he finished it—a reportedly sex-filled novel titled From Palms to Pines—and sent it to various publishing houses under a pseudonym, not one would publish it.

Moses’s own court musicians were Guy Lombardo’s red-coated Royal Canadians, an orchestra whose banal rigidly traditional arrangements complemented his personal philosophy.

Regarded in Russia as our greatest builder, was how he characterized Frank Lloyd Wright.

Walter Gropius, he said, was seeking to change the American system by advocating a “philosophy which doesn’t belong here.”

Planners, in general, he said, are “socialists” and “revolutionaries.”

Moses: “I am in the position of an artist or a sculptor... I can see New York as it should be and as it can be... But now I am like the man who has a conception that he wishes to carve or to paint, who has the model before him, but hasn’t a chisel or a brush.” In certain respects, Robert Moses became La Guardia’s “chisel.”

Peretti, p. 153.

You could see avenues being widened as if a giant chisel was being rammed between them.

Caro, p. 397.

Moses hated Isamu Noguchi. In 1952, the artist was commissioned to create a privately-funded, sculptured playground for the United Nations building on city property which was given a special international diplomatic designation. All parties were a go until Moses stepped in and criticized the design as little more than a “rabbit warren.” He went so far as to threaten to not install the guard rail facing the East River to force the project’s abandonment.

Walrod, p. 61.

When I heard Allen Ginsberg ask at the end of the 1950s, “Who was that sphinx of cement and aluminum?,” I felt sure at once that, even if the poet didn’t know it, Moses was his man.

Moses contended that a few writers knew intimately the New York of today so as to be able to appreciate it, and he criticized even the best writers for merely representing only “a quarter, a corner, phrase or facet, certainly not the essence of today of the city’s totality.”

Warhol / World’s Fair

During the spring of 1964, the incestuous fevered party of the art world was forced to contend, if only in passing, with the more institutionalized global festival of the World’s Fair. O’Hara reacted to the event with a mixture of bemusement and anger. His irritation was partly due to the public glorification of the art of the Pop artists rather than the Abstract Expressionists. As the architect of the New York Pavilion at the Fair, Philip Johnson had commissioned murals for the outside wall of its concrete theatre almost exclusively from the New Realists contingent—Lichtenstein, Rosenquist, Indiana, Chamberlain, Rauschenberg, Warhol. Allan D’Arcangelo executed a Pop Art mural for the outside of the Transportation and Travel Building.

Gooch, pp. 423-4.

In 1964, architect Johnson invited the edgy up-and-coming artist Andy Warhol to produce one of ten commissions for the facade of the New York State Pavilion—Warhol’s first and ultimately last public-art project. Working in the midst of his “Death and Disaster” depictions of car crashes and race riots, while taking his initial photobooth strips of socialites, friends, and, of course, himself, Warhol devised a work for the pavilion that would merge the profane and the portrait: blown-up silk-screened mug shots of the thirteen most-wanted men taken straight from the City of New York’s police department. As the story goes, someone in power had objections, perhaps to its coarse aesthetics, thinly veiled homoeroticism, or simply the banal subject material. By the time the World’s Fair opened on April 22, 1964, the Thirteen Most Wanted Men was covered in a thick coat of silver paint (a proposal to replace the work with twenty-five identical panels of a beaming World’s Fair President Robert Moses was, alas, rejected out of hand).

Haines, N. pag.

Warhol contributed Thirteen Most Wanted Men, a silkscreened mural of mugshots appropriated from the files of the New York City Police Department. A week before the grand opening of the Fair on April 22, 1964, Thirteen Most Wanted Men was installed on the exterior façade of the Pavilion’s “Theaterama,” a large, cylindrical movie theater. Within a few days of the murals installation, a work crew covered it with aluminum house paint, thereby muffling it under a monochrome of silver. Warhol’s mural, now a visible absence on the New York State Pavilion, was left to stand in this state throughout the opening festivities of the Fair and for several months thereafter. Years later, Philip Johnson would claim that Governor Nelson Rockefeller had insisted on the murals removal. Other sources, including Warhol himself, would hold World’s Fair president Robert Moses responsible for the mural censorship.

Meyer, Outlaw, p. 130.

By April 17, Warhol had already written to the New York State Department of Public Works authorizing them to paint over the mural “in a color suitable to the architect.” On April 18, both the Journal-American and Emily Genauer in the New York Herald Tribune reported that Warhol had asked to have the work removed because, as the Journal-American put it, “He did not feel his work achieved the effect he had in mind, and asked that it be removed so he could replace it with another painting.” Philip Johnson was quoted as follows, “He [Warhol] thought we hung it wrong. He didn’t like it the moment he saw it.”

An aerial view in Newsday, dated April 21, shows Warhol’s mural covered by a dark tarp.

The World’s Fair was out in Flushing Meadow that summer with my mural of the Ten Most Wanted Men on the outside of the building that Philip Johnson designed. Philip gave me the assignment, but because of some political thing I never understood, the officials had it whitewashed out. A bunch of us went out to Flushing Meadow to have a look at it, but by the time we got there, you could only see the images faintly coming through the paint they’d just put over them. In one way I was glad the mural was gone: now I wouldn’t have to feel responsible if one of the criminals ever got turned in to the FBI because someone had recognized him from my pictures. So then I did a picture of Robert Moses instead, who was running the Fair—a few dozen four-foot squares of Masonite panels—but that got rejected, too. But since I had the Ten Most Wanted screens already made up, I decided to go ahead and do paintings of them anyway. (The ten certainly weren’t going to get caught from the kind of exposure they’d get at the Factory.) The thing I most of all remember about the World’s Fair was sitting in a car with the sound coming from speakers behind me. As I sat there hearing the words rush past me from behind, I got the same sensation I always got when I gave an interview—that the words weren’t coming out of me, that they were coming from someplace else, someplace behind me.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 90-1.

At a World’s Fair devoted to the achievements of tomorrow, Warhol chose to look backward by recovering criminal mugshots from the New York City Police Department. Far from celebrating the promise of America’s future, Thirteen Most Wanted Men stood as a darkly sardonic commentary on its past. The updated status of “most wanted men” would later be offered as a defense of the mural’s overpainting. Recall Johnson’s comment that “it was an old list, and a lot of them had been proven not guilty. And to label them, we would have been subject to lawsuits from here to the end of the world.” The visible gap between the original context of the “most wanted men” as police photography and Warhol’s recycling of them as Pop art here serves to justify the censorship of Thirteen Most Wanted Men.

“One of the men labeled ‘wanted’ had been pardoned, you see,” said Mr. Warhol the other day, “so the mural wasn’t valid anymore. I’m still waiting for another inspiration.”

Ibid., p. 133.

Prior to its overpainting, the mural had been reproduced by both the New York Times and the New York Journal American, the latter on page one. The three New York newspapers that covered the incident each inform the readers that Thirteen Most Wanted Men had been overpainted at Warhol’s own request.

Ibid., p. 130

More forcefully than any other painting from this period, the World’s Fair mural bridges Warhol’s interest in celebrity, death, and criminality. Each of the men pictured in the mural was a kind of low-level star, one whose image was reproduced across the nation, albeit in post offices and police stations rather than films and fan magazines. By endowing the mug shot but the grandeur he typically reserved for Elvis Presley or Marilyn Monroe, Warhol insisted on the most wanted man as mass-cultural icons and, by implication, as objects of desire for a mass audience.

Ibid., p.136
Warhol himself would later write of the alignment of criminal” and “star” within the space of popular culture: “Nowadays if you’re a crook you’re still considered up there. You can write books, going TV, give interviews—you’re a big celebrity and nobody even looks down on you because you’re a crook. You’re still really up there. This is because more than anything people just want stars.”

Ibid., p. 136

In portraying the criminal as iconic American antihero, Warhol acutely mocked the official ethos of the Fair.

Ibid., p. 135

Warhol posed the following question to his viewers: If the police is no longer pursuing the outlaws pictured here, by whom are these men most wanted now? One answer is, by Warhol himself; another is, by the viewer of the mural; the third is that the men are now wanted by one another.

Ibid., p. 137.

Although most visitors to the World’s Fair did not know that a set of mug shots lay underneath the silver monochrome, Warhol and the officials who censored his mural certainly did. Through this knowledge the mug shots continued to haunt the scene of representation after their evacuation from it, dismay Fair officials even when muted under aluminum house paint.

Ibid., pp. 145–6.

Mark Lancaster remembered stretching a series of canvases printed with the faces of the Most Wanted Men in early July. This indicates that Warhol probably produced the series of paintings some time between late April and the end of June, in the aftermath of the mural. The same screens were used for the paintings and the panels of the mural. In late September 1964, when Warhol joined the Leo Castelli Gallery, eight canvases were recorded in the gallery registry. According to the registry, these canvases were consigned to Ileana Sonnabend in May 1966, a year before they were exhibited at her Paris gallery. The catalogue of the Sonnabend exhibition in Paris is not dated, but contemporary reviews place it between February 26 and May 7, 1967. The Sonnabend exhibition traveled to Galerie Rudolf Zwirner, Cologne, where it was on view in September and October, and to the Rowan Gallery, London, in March 1968.

Andy asked me if I could stretch a canvas, which I could, and he brought out a stack of unstretched canvases of the Most Wanted Men, versions on canvas of the big panels he had made for the World’s Fair. Those paintings were around for a long time. They were shown at the Sonnabend Gallery in Paris and even at the Rowan gallery in London, where I also showed my work, in 1968. It was the first ever Warhol show in London. It opened March 7th, 1968. He didn’t come. There were ten or twelve Wanted Men, some paired as front and profile views, and in the same show a set of the recently made big silkscreen prints of Marilyn Monroe. I think they were about $500 for the set of 10, and I always wish I had bought one. One of the Wanted Men canvases was still at the Union Square Factory in 1984 or 85. I had been there for lunch, and Andy had retreated afterwards into his “painting area” in the back, as he always did. I went in to say goodbye and one of those paintings was leaning against the wall. I said “Gee, Andy, we made that painting in 1964” and he gave me a sly look and a little smile, as if to say, without saying it, “Well I made it, you just stretched it.”

Several months after completing Thirteen Most Wanted Men, Warhol shot a silent 16mm film entitled Thirteen Most Beautiful Boys, a film that extends and renders explicit, the homoeroticism of the World’s Fair mural. The Thirteen Most Beautiful Boys were in fact young men variously associated with the Factory.

Meyer, Outlaw, p. 140.

After the Fair, he began making the Screen Tests, which were inspired both by the Thirteen Most Wanted mug shots and the photobooth pictures Warhol began using in 1963.

Philip Johnson rejected Warhol’s proposal for a Robert Moses mural. As Johnson would later recall, “I forbade that, because I just don’t think it made any sense to thumb our noses… I don’t like Mr. Moses, but inviting more lawsuits by taking pot shots at the head of the Fair would seem to me very, very bad taste. Andy and I had a little battle at the time, though he is one of my favorite artists.”

Meyer, Outlaw, p. 146.

Warhol’s painting, Robert Moses Twenty-five Times consisted of 25 panels with Robert Moses’ headshot, taken from Life magazine.

The Moses panels were lost or destroyed.

Racism

Moses despised the animal warmth and the decadent, multiethnic, walled-in artifice of urban leisure of the 1920s. During the opening of his new West Side Manhattan / Riverside Drive project in 1935 he mused, “I wonder sometimes whether people, so obsessed wit the seamy interior of Manhattan, deserve the Hudson.”

Peretti, p. 146.

It’s a great amorphous mass to him: it needs to be bathed, it needs to be aired, it needs recreation.

Ibid., p. 147.

He kept the swimming pool in Harlem unheated because he believed that blacks avoided cold water.

Ibid., p. 162.

“Don’t you have this problem with the Negroes overrunning you?”

“Well, they don’t like cold water and we’ve found that helps.”

Caro, p. 514.

Priests blessed the waters of the Astoria Pool before its opened.

Ibid., p. 457.

How to force swimmers to wash their feet before entering the pool.
Fears of the new public pools: prospects of racial intimacy as well as being associated with racist ideas of unclean bodies.
Ballon, p. 82.

Believing that what Negroes liked most to do was dance and sing, he arranged that the opening ceremonies for the Colonial Park Pool in Harlem include an exhibition by Bojangles Bill Robinson (identified by the Times as a “negro tap dancer”), a rendition of the Battle Hymn of the Republic by “negro tenor” Roland Hayes... and community singing.
Caro, p. 457.

He built one pool in Harlem, in Colonial Park, at 146th Street, and he was determined that that was going to be the only pool that Negroes—or Puerto Ricans, whom he classed with Negroes as “colored people”—were going to use. He didn’t want them “mixing” with white people in other pools, in part because he was afraid, probably with cause, that “trouble”—fights and riots—would result; in part because, as one of his aides puts it, “Well, you know how RM felt about colored people.”

In some pools, the parks department staff tolerated black and white bodies coming in close contact with one another.
Ballon, p. 83.

He had always displayed a genius for adorning his creations with little details that made them fit in with their setting, that made the people who used them feel at home in them. There was a little detail on the playhouse-comfort station in the Harlem section of Riverside Park that is found nowhere else in the park. The wrought-iron trellises of the park’s other playhouses and comfort stations are decorated with designs like curling waves.
The wrought-iron trellises of the Harlem playhouse-comfort station is decorated with monkeys.
Caro, p. 560.

“We have, it is true,” a Negro problem,” Moses announced.

As Moses responded early in 1968 to a question about the concentration of low income people in a few neighborhoods. “There’s only one answer. That is to tear down every building in the slums and put new ones unless land, then bring the people back.”

“I was coming up to one bridge across the parkway and just as I was about to go under it, I noticed how low it seemed to be. I took a good look at the next bridge, and goddammit, it was low! I pulled over and measured it with my arm at the curb, and I could see that it wasn’t any fourteen feet high. At the next exit I got off and found a store and bought a yardstick and got back on the parkway and measured the next bridge. At the curb it was eleven feet high. and I didn’t have to go and measure all the other bridge. I knew right then what I was going to find. I knew right then what the old son of a gun had done. He had built the bridges so low that buses couldn’t use the parkways!”
Caro, p. 951.
Most buses were about twelve feet high.
_Ibid._, p. 951

Underlying his strikingly strict policy for cleanliness in his parks was the deep distaste for the public that was using them. "He doesn’t love the people, “ he used to say... "It used to shocked me because he was doing all these things for the welfare of people... He’d denounce the common people terribly. To him they were lousy, dirty people, throwing bottles all over Jones Beach. ‘I’ll get them! I’ll teach them!’"... Now he began taking measures to limit the use of his parks. He had restricted the use of state parks by poor and lower-middle-class families in the first place, by limiting access to the parks by rapid transit; he had vetoed the Long Island Rail Road’s proposed construction of a branch to spur Jones Beach for the this reason.

Now he began to limit access by buses; he instructed Schapiro to build the bridges across his new parkways low—too low for buses to pass. Bus trips therefore had to be made on local roads, making the trips discouragingly long and arduous. For Negroes, whom he considered inherently “dirty,” there were further measures. Buses needed permits to enter state parks; buses chartered by Negro groups found it very difficult to obtain permits, particularly to Moses his beloved Jones Beach; most were shunted to parks many miles further out on Long Island. And even in these parks, buses carrying Negro groups were shunted to the furthest reaches of the parking areas. The Negroes were discouraged from using “white” beach areas—the best beaches—by a system Shapiro calls “flagging”; the handful of Negro lifeguards (there were only a handful of Negro employees among the thousands employed at the Long Island State Commission) were all stationed at distant, less developed beaches.

Moses was convinced that Negroes did not like cold water; the temperature at the pool at Jones Beach was deliberately icy to keep Negroes out. When Negro civic groups from the hot New York City slums began to complain about this treatment, Roosevelt ordered an investigation and an eight confirmed that “Bob Moses is seeking to discourage large Negro parties from picnicking at Jones Beach, attempting to divert them to some other of the state parks.” Roosevelt gingerly raise the matter with Moses, who denied the charge violently—and the governor never raised the matter again.

By banning public transportation, he had barred the poor from the state parks.
_Ibid._, p. 492.

In building his state parks, he had been uninterested in building for the “lower classes,” who didn’t “respect” or “appreciate” what was done for them, in particular the Negroes who were “dirty” and wouldn’t keep his beautiful creations clean... The protests about this policy from the slums themselves were faint and few; slum dwellers—particularly slum dwellers with black skins—weren’t making many protests in the 1930’s.
_Ibid._, p. 489–90.

Robert Moses spent millions of dollars enlarging Riverside Park through landfill, but he did not spend a dime for that purpose between 125th and 135th Streets. He added 132 acres to the parts of the park most likely to be used by white people—but not one acre to the part of the park most likely to be used by black people.
  Ibid., p. 557.

Moses’ arrogance was first of all intellectual; he had consciously compared his mental capacity with other men’s and had concluded that its superiority was so great that it was a waste of time for him to discuss, to try to understand or even listen to their opinions... For not only could Robert Moses not help showing his contempt for others, he seemed actually to take pleasure in showing this contempt—a deep, genuine pleasure, a pleasure whose intensity leads to the suspicion that, in a way, he needed to display his superiority, with a need so great that he simply could not dissemble it.
  Ibid., pp. 424-5.

The public is a great amorphous mass to him; it needs to be bathed, it needs to be aired, it needs recreation, but not for personal reason just to make it a better public.
  Ballon, p. 73.

FDR on Moses: “I don’t trust him. I don’t like him.”
  Caro, p. 426.

La Guardia on Moses: “Jesus Christ! Jesus Christ! Seven million people in the city and I had to pick the one Roosevelt can’t stand!”
  Ibid., p. 426.

“That dago son of a bitch,” “that wop son of a bitch” and “that guinea son of a bitch” were three of Moses’ favorite private descriptions of La Guardia... he referred to him a “the little organ grinder.”
  Ibid., p. 447.

If Robert Moses was a pioneer in the fields of parks and highways, he was also a pioneer in McCarthyism, twenty years before McCarthy.
  Ibid., p. 472.

Comparisons of Moses to Hitler: “He is the original smear artist, like Hitler.” ... “He is a liar. And he is a liar in the way Hitler was a liar. He doesn’t lie because he can’t help it. He lies as a matter of policy.”
  Ibid., p. 688.

Moses was known as Cardinal Spellman’s “pet Jew.”
  Ibid., p. 741.

There are people who like things as they are. I can’t hold out any hope to them. They have to keep moving further away. This is a great big state, and there are other states. Let them go to the Rockies.
  Berman, Solid, pp. 294-5

Beach

The final conquest and definitive eradication of Coney’s original urbanism are assured in 1938 when Commissioner Robert Moses brings beach and boardwalk under the jurisdiction of the Parks Department, ultimate vehicle of the Urbanism of Good Intentions. For Moses, Coney becomes—again—a testing ground for strategies intended ultimately for Manhattan.

"Engrossed in dreams of lawn-flanked parkways and trim tennis courts," he considers the thin strip of oceanfront under his control as merely the base for an offensive that will gradually replace Coney's street grid with innocuous vegetation. The first block to fall is the site of Dreamland, where he establishes the new New York Aquarium in 1957.

It is a modern structure, an incarnation of the "whitewashed barracks," painfully cheerful in the upward sweep of its concrete roofline, implanted in a vast lawn.

"Its lines are trim and clean."

The aquarium is a Modernist revenge of the conscious upon the unconscious: its fish—"inhabitants of the deep"—are forced to spend the rest of their lives in a sanatorium.

When he is finished, Moses has turned 50 percent of Coney's surface into parks.

Mother island to the bitter end, Coney Island has become the model for a modern Manhattan of Grass.

Koolhaas, p. 79.

The WWII scrap metal drive dovetailed with Robert Moses' urban renewal schemes. Buildings were pulled down to make way for Moses' ideas, even stripping the old Aquarium—the circular structure that was once Castle Garden—of its metal was okay, since the structure was being threatened with demolition to make way for the Brooklyn Battery Tunnel.

Diehl, p. 165.

"The Battery is no place for an aquarium," I once heard Mr. Moses say angrily.

Atkinson, p. 79.

The demolition of the old aquarium in Battery Park. Moses threatens to dump the fish into the sea. He also suggests that the fish be made into a chowder.

Caro, pp. 681, 682.

The sand he imported for Jones Beach blew away because it was not anchored. He sent teams of men out on their hands and knees illegally yanking out grass from private homes. The next weekend, when people arrived at the summer homes, they found men yanking out the grass on their beach.

Ibid., p. 832.

He dispatched landscape architects to other Long Island beaches to find out why the sand on older, natural dunes was more stable. They reported that it was because of the presence on these dunes of a form of beach grass whose roots, seeking water in the dry sand, spread horizontally rather than vertically and thus held sand around it in place. But to be effective, they reported, the grass had to be planted thickly—hundreds of thousands, even millions, of clumps would be required to hold down the new dunes on Jones Beach—and it could be planted only by hand. In the summer of 1928, on the desolate sand bar on the edge of the ocean, amid half-completed building skeletons that looked like ancient ruins, was a panorama out of the dynasties of the Pharaohs: hundreds, thousands, of men, spread out over miles of sand, kneeling on the ground digging little holes and planting in them tiny bundles of grass. [Antiquity] [Egypt]
Ibid., p. 233.

On weekends a continuous procession of small planes cruise just above the shoreline, skywriting or bearing banners to proclaim the glories of various brands of soda or vodka, or roller discos and sex clubs, of local politicians and propositions. Not even Moses has devised ways to zone business and politics out of the sky. Berman, Solid, p. 297.

Terrain

In 1949 Robert Moses answered the question: “What Will New York City Look Like in the Year 1999?”: “Nature, not man, will still be predominant... a fourth of The Bronx will remain field, forest, and stream... Staten Island will be largely rural... Traffic will flow freely in 95 per cent of the city... There will be no sign of decrepitude, decay or resignation.” [Nature] [Primeval]
Caro, pp. 909-10.

Inwood Hill Park was not a park at all, but a wilderness, a wonderful wilderness, a last reminder, crowded into the craggy hills in the northwestern most corner of Manhattan Island by the relentless spread of concrete, that once almost all of the island had been covered with lush green forests. To the east, the hills sloped down into a valley that opened on a beautiful, peaceful cove formed by a U-curve in the Harlem River. In the valley, the site of the old Algonquin village of Shora-Kap-Kock (“in between the hills”), was a little museum operated by an Indian woman and a pottery studio, complete with kilns capable of the most delicate ceramics. In the cove, the last bit of natural waterfront on Manhattan Island and the reputed site of the landing of a longboat from Henry Hudson’s Half Moon 300 years before end of a battle between the longboat crew and the Algonquins, stood a giant tulip tree under which Hudson had held a powwow with the Indians. On the opposite, or Hudson River, side of the parks hills, 200 feet below the steep escarpment that formed their western edge, was a narrow strip of landfill that held a New York Central roadbed. But in the 300 acres covered by the hills themselves, there was hardly a sign of the hand of man. The Lords of Lord & Taylor had once lived in two mansions on the escarpment, but these had burned to the ground decades before. When Exton turned off the city’s asphalt streets and wandered up the steep slopes—it was their steepness that had saved them from development—he found himself in a different world, a world of wild underbrush and towering trees. Hiking up to their crest, under foliage so thick that it all but blotted out the sun, he could pick wild blackberries and blueberries or, in spring and early summer, could stop and look for a while at the fragrant purple-or white-blossomed lilac bushes, some of them three times as tall as he. At the crest, out on the escarpment, was a view that guidebooks marveled over—“perhaps the finest Manhattan offers,” said one: the broad sweep of the Hudson below and, looming above the river on its far shore, the endless miles of the Palisades, unmarked north of the George Washington Bridge by a single man-made structure. If Exton sat so that he couldn’t see the bridge, there was nothing to remind him of what he had left behind at the foot of the hills except for the occasional passage, far below him, of a little toy New York Central train.
“It was the only real woodland left on Manhattan, “he would recall years later. “It was the last unique hunk of primeval forest and the whole metropolitan area. It was unique. It was irreplaceable. “

And to alter it with a highway! “When you were upon top there, you were away from the roar of cars in the smell of gasoline. It was the only place a Manhattan where you could still say that.” Moses’ proposed Henry Hudson Parkway would bring the roar and the smell right into that beautiful spot. In fact, it would, to a large extent, eradicate it, bury it under six lanes—140 feet in width—of concrete, since Moses’ plan was to run the highway right along the escarpment. Moses was saying that running the roads with the park with only “destroy only a few trees.”

Ibid., pp. 541-2.

Moses was more than satisfied with his handiwork. The sheer cliffs of the forest-topped Palisades, opposite the sheer cliffs of Manhattan’s apartment houses, were “the most magnificent river wall anywhere,” he felt, and the wall he created was its match. Now that it was complete, the Hudson vista was the greatest river vista in the world. The Rhine? The Rhine with its “silly, quaint, Wagnerian castles”? Thanks to the West Side Improvement, the Hudson absolutely dwarfed the Rhine. [Europe] [Empire]

Ibid., p. 553.

All sweeping curves and spacious straightaways, lined with woods, underbrushy and shadowy and deep, that drenched them in autumn colors, and with clearings in which black boulders sat dramatically in the center of sun-dappled grass.

Ibid., p. 554.

In April of 1956, a new parking lot was to be made for Tavern on the Green. The spot selected was a greasy hollow shaded by maple trees, barely to the northwest at 68th Street. Neighborhood mothers, however, habitually frequented it with their children. It was a small, secluded amphitheater, ideal for rest and recreation, safe for youngsters, and soothing for adults. Learning of the plan through observation of an exposed blueprint left on the grass by Park engineers, twenty-three mothers signed a petition to Moses asking that the parking lot idea be abandoned and their children’s play area left as it was.

Without public notice, Moses dispatched a bulldozer to the site to take off the turf and topple the trees. Seeing this, a few indignant mothers quickly assembled and stood in front of the machine. Whereat the operator stopped work.

Within a week Moses struck back under the cover of darkness, shortly after midnight, when the watchful eyes of the mothers were closed. And elite task force composed of gardeners, laborers, a bulldozer, its operator, and more than thirty police officers under the command of an inspector went to work. A fence was erected, ringed by the police. Inside, the bulldozer started up and axmen attacked the trees.

Ibid., pp. 110-11.
Moses' fingers drummed impatiently on a table when someone dared to disagree with him.
Caro, p. 241.

Power is being able to laugh at people who oppose you and to laugh at them with impunity, to antagonize them without fear of reprisal. Now Robert Moses seemed to be going out of his way to laugh at people...
Power is being able to ruin people, to ruin their careers and their reputations and their personal relationships. Moses had this power, and he seemed to use it even when there was no need to, going out of his way to use it, so that it is difficult to escape the conclusion that he enjoyed using it.
Ibid., p. 499.

The City Builder must have an odd mixture of qualities. He must have a basic affection for his community, he must hate what is ugly, barren and useless. He must have an instinctive dislike of things which are built or run wrong. He must have a healthy contempt for the parasite, the grafter, the carpetbagger, the itinerant expert, the ivory tower planner, the academic reformer and the revolutionary. He must have the barge captain's knowledge of the waterfront, the engineer's itch to build, the architect's flair for design, the merchant's knowledge of the market, the local acquaintance of a political district leader.
Ibid., p. 832.

As he was above the rules, he was above the law.
Ibid., p. 831.

Once you did something physically, it was very hard for even a judge to undo it.
Ibid., p. 218.

Once you sink that first stake, they'll never make you pull it up.
Ibid., p. 218.

Misleading and underestimating, in fact, might be the only way to get a project started.
Ibid., p. 219.

Once they had authorized that small initial expenditure and you had spent it, they would not be able to avoid giving you the rest when you asked for it. How could they? If they refused to give you the rest of the money, what they had given you would be wasted, and that would make them look bad in the eyes of the public. And if they said you had misled them, well, they were not supposed to be misled. If they had been misled, that would mean that they hadn't investigated the projects thoroughly, and therefor had been derelict in their own duty. The possibilities for a polite but effective form of political blackmail were endless.
Ibid., p. 219.

You can draw any kind of picture you like on a clean slate and indulge your every whim in the wilderness in laying out a New Delhi, Canberra or Brasilia, but when you operate in an overbuilt metropolis, you have to hack your way with a meat ax.
Ibid., p. 849.
For the rest of his life, when a friend, an enemy—or one of his own lawyers—would protest that something he was doing or was proposing to do was illegal, Moses would throw back his head and say, with a broad grin, a touch of exaggeration and much more than a touch of bravado:
"Nothing I have ever done has been tinged with illegality."
Ibid., p. 220.

Would dreams—dreams of real size and significance and scope—the accomplishment his mother had taught him was so important, ever be realized by the methods of the men in whose ranks he had once marched, the reformers and idealists? He asked the question of himself and he answered it himself. No.
Ibid., p. 220.

The Port Authority: “an unconquerable Frankenstein... no one has successfully opposed it in the past.”
Glanz, p. 137.

Waiting to lunch with Robert Moses, a guest would be ushered at Randall’s Island into an anteroom lined with pictures of Robert Moses’ bridges, Robert Moses’ parks, Robert Moses’ parkways, of Robert Moses posing with Hoover, of Robert Moses posing with Roosevelt, of Robert Moses posing with Truman, with Eisenhower— with Kennedy, Johnson—and Pope John.
Caro, p. 814.

For decades, to advance his own purposes, he systematically defeated every attempt to create the master plan that might have enabled the city to develop on a rational, logical, unified pattern—defeated it until, when it was finally adopted, it was too late for it to do much good.
Ibid., p. 20.

Decline

Moses had no hobbies or relaxations. He did not golf, play bridge, attend sporting events or theater... Guests at his home can recall no single day that he spent with his family, on which he did not disappear for hours into his study and shut the door behind him. He still refuse to allow any of the chores that consume chunks of other men’s lives—buying clothes and getting haircuts, for example—to consume chunks of his. As she had been doing since the day she married him, Mary still ordered his socks and underwear, bought his suits, carried them home, if they weren’t the correct size took them back and brought home others, and when she got ones that fit, arranged for a tailor to come to his office and make minimum alterations, out to dine, placed money in his pocket. (If she forgot, he would have to ask his companion for a dollar or two for the waiter.)
Caro, p. 807.

Moses had a table in his office, never a desk.
Ibid., p. 268.

Moses claimed that golf was not a game in which the masses were interested; it was, he said, played only by the “privileged few.” Golf was now a game played by millions in all walks of life. But Moses didn’t know this. His statement would have been true in the Twenties and he thought it was still true in the Fifties.

Because he didn’t know anything had changed.

Ibid., p. 836.

No longer the face of a poet, it was the face of a man accustomed to command.

Ibid., p. 269.

His lieutenants first noticed about 1950 that the boss was having difficulty understanding what people were saying to him. His hearing deteriorated rather rapidly thereafter, and doctors told him there was nothing to be done for the condition, a simple result of age—Moses was, after all in his 60s—except for him to wear hearing aid. Robert Moses wearing a hearing aid?!?! He refused to even consider the suggestion. The condition grew worse. More and more frequently, if he was asked a question at the big conference table, his reply would not be responsive—he would be answering the question he thought he had been asked... In a way, of course, Moses’ deafness was symbolic. He had, in a way, been deaf all his life—unwilling to listen to anyone, public, Mayor, Governor, deaf to all opinion save his own... Now, thanks to the deafness, he was unable to hear the views, of others.

Ibid., pp. 835-6.

Reality had changed; the reality of the 1920s was not the reality of the 1950s. The metropolitan area that Moses was now attempting to shape was not the metropolitan area that he had begun shaping; there were more people in it, so many more that the very fact of their numbers alone changed all the dimensions of life in the area; they covered so much more of its land surface with their homes; they were, moreover, a different people: the population of the area had been transformed; to mention just one change, there have been fewer than 200,000 nonwhites in the area when Moses had begun his public career, there were more than 2 million now; embarking on a recreational policy that deliberately excluded nonwhites from most parks may have had in Moses’ mind some sort of rationale in 1923; it is difficult to believe that that mind would formulate the same policy in 1953; Moses was nothing if not realistic, and excluding so large a part of an areas population from parks was not realistic. Quality, Hegel said, changes with quantity. Automobiles had meant weekend excursions to the country, leisurely drives, pleasure, freedom, in the 1920’s when there had been relatively few automobiles. Automobiles meant something very different now.

But Robert Moses did not see those changes. He did not see that reality had changed. Not only the sycophancy with which he had surrounded himself but also three hard physical facts of his existence insured this.

Ibid., p. 834

The scenery amid which the New Yorker traveled around his city was a vast mosaic of FUCK and SUCK and COCK and CUNT. [Graffiti]

Ibid., p. 933.

When he died in 1981, Robert Moses’s estate was valued at $50,000, less than many individuals who were born with nothing and worked for a salary all their lives.

Ballon, p. 70.
Would New York have been a better place to live if Robert Moses had never built anything? ... It is only possible to say that it would have been a different city.

Caro, p. 21.
Before him, then, the slope stretched upward, and above it the brilliant sky, and beyond it, cloudy and far away, he saw the skyline of New York. He did not know why, but there arose in him an exultation and a sense of power, and he ran up the hill like an engine, or a madman, willing to throw himself headlong into the city that glowed before him.

Baldwin, p. 30.

A city burning with the itch to Grab It Now.
O'Connell, p. 291.

The city’s love of excess is replicated in its very name: New York, New York.
Sharpe, p. 277.

The possibilities were endless.
McNeil, p. 163.

It was really all about Me! Me! Me! Me!
Haden-Guest, p. xxi.

The eternal question of the ambitious: “Why not me?”
Stevens & Swan, p. 301.

The city: its weird gravitational pull, extending in all directions; the way, even if you have never been here before, it seems to exist in order to make all things seem possible. Even or especially.
Kingwell, p. 17.

Our whole scheme of life and progress and profit was perpendicular. There was nothing for us but height. We were whipped up the ladder. We depended upon the ever-growing possibilities of girders and rivets as Holland depends on her dikes.
Sharpe, p. 186.

It should be tall, every inch of it tall.
Ibid., p. 233.

Its brash, self-confident love of newness, and its dollar-driven, accelerated pace of life.
Ibid., p. 6.

Historically, it has been to an exceptional degree a city of accumulation: its methods promotion and commerce, its principle aggrandizement.
Federal Writers, p. 4.

Make it now! That motto burned in every heart like myocarditis.
O'Connell, p. 293.

On his first night in New York in 1924, the German filmmaker Fritz Lang suddenly had a vision of a looming, overbuilt, power-hungry city: “I looked into the streets—the glaring lights and the tall buildings—and there I conceived Metropolis.”
Sharpe, p. 198.
On November 14, 1925, The New Yorker described the city as a “gymnasium of celebrities” and would-be celebrities; there are always “more non-entitles trying to attract attention and failing than celebrities trying to avoid attention and succeeding.” New York attracted those who wanted, sometimes desperately, to find out not so much who they were as who they could appear to be, those who needed the gaze of others to come alive, exhibitionists and attention addicts who possessed, in Fitzgerald’s words, “theatrical innocence,” the preference of the “role of the observed to that of the observer.” Cynical Thomas Beer thought the “whole ‘Lost Generation’ movement… as coldly commercial as a burlesque show”; if this was a “lost generation,” it was lost in plain sight of all the spectators America could summon… As Al Jolson put it in an ad he placed in Variety in the 1910s: “Watch me—I’m a Wow!”

Douglas, Honesty, p. 64.

In New York, the space between what you want and what you’ve got creates a civic itchiness: I don’t know a content New Yorker. Complacency and self-satisfaction, the Parisian vices, are not present here, except in the hollow form of competitive boasting about misfortune. (Even the very rich want another townhouse but move into an apartment, while an exclusive subset of the creative class devotes itself to dreaming up things for the super-rich to want, if only so they alone will not be left without desire.)

Gopnik, p. 6.

New York is the concentrate of art and commerce and sport and religion and entertainment and finance, bringing to a single compact arena the gladiator, the evangelist, the promoter, the actor, the trader and the merchant. It carries on its lapel the unexpungeable odor of the long past, so that no matter where you sit in New York you feel the vibrations of great times and tall deeds, of queer people and events and undertakings.

White, Here, p. 19.

“Insincerity is a necessary element of material progress.”

Hapgood, p. 126.

It’s a drama that is monumentally present, dwarfing, bullying, pounding into submission.

Brook, p. 15.

Years before, he’d moved to New York believing himself to be penetrating to the center of the world, and all of the time he lived there the illusion of a center had held: the sense of there always being a door behind which further mysteries were available, a ballroom at the top of the sky from which the irresistible music wafted, a secret power source from which the made energy of the metropolis emanated.

O’Connell, p. 299.

Babe Ruth: our national exaggeration.

Douglas, Honesty, p. 65.

You have to fight the city constantly, carving out your own space. When you’re feeling jaunty and high, full of zest, Manhattan will back you up, opening the door to pleasure and wonder. But when your spirits are low, or you’re caught in a tangle of sadness and heartache, the city won’t offer you any relief as it asserts that the race goes unwaveringly on even if you choose to stand aside for a while.

Brook, p. 16.

I always marvel at those who are willing, seemingly, to pay any price, the price, whatever it may be—for one sip of this poison cup. What a stinging, quivering zest they display. How beauty is willing to sell its bloom, virtue its last rag, strength an almost usurious portion of that which it controls, youth its very best years, its hope or dream of fame, fame and power their dignity and presence, age its weary hours, to secure but a minor part of all this, a taste of its vibrating presence and the picture that it makes. Can you not hear them almost, singing its praises?

Dreiser, p. 4.

The original necessity of enduring noise, dirt, conflict, confusion as symptoms of a transitional phase developed into a taste for the mindless intoxicant of sensation.

Josephy, p. 41.

I was a failure—mediocre at advertising work and unable to get started as a writer. Hating the city, I got roaring, weeping drunk on my last penny and went home. Incalculable city. What ensued was only one of a thousand success stories of those gaudy days, but it plays a part in my own movie of New York.

But sometimes in New York you run across the disillusione—a young couple who are obviously visitors, newlyweds perhaps, for whom the bright dream has vanished. The place has been too much for them; they sit languishing in a cheap restaurant over a speechless meal.

White, Here, p. 33.

Its exhilaration is also a kind of terror.

Brook, p. 16.

It strews in your path every dreamed-of gratification.

Ibid., p. 40.

While the many consume, a few are consumed.

Ibid., p. 42.

To be intelligent here is the equivalent of being a starlet in Los Angeles.

Blandford, p. 81.

I remember daydreams of being a big success in New York City. (Penthouse and all!)

Brainard, “I Remember,” n.pag.

I remember fantasies of all of a sudden out of the blue announcing “An evening with Joe Brainard” at Carnegie Hall and surprising everybody that I can sing and dance too, but only for one performance. (Though I’m a smash hit and people want more.) But I say “no”: I give up stardom for art. And this one performance becomes a legend. And people who missed it could shoot themselves. But I stick to my guns.

Ibid.
Getting out of the taxi next to the famous fountain, you seemed to be arriving at the premiere of the movie which was to be your life. A doorman greeted you at the steps. A string quartet played in the Palm Court. Your tenth-floor room was tiny and overlooked an airshaft; though you could not see the city out the window, you believed that it was spread out at your feet. The limousines around the entrances seemed like carriages, and you felt that someday one would wait for you. Today they put you in mind of carrion birds, and you cannot believe your dreams were so shallow.

McInerney, p. 151.

Warhol: “Success is a job in New York.”
Wolf, Gossip, p. 95.

Here, on drab Tenth Avenue, was a definition of an inexhaustible city, a place where even at 4:30 on a winter’s morning you have to queue for a table at a restaurant.
Brook, p. 255.

Indeed I am being driven out of New York by the ceaseless ringing that goes on on my telephone all the morning when I ought to be working.
Ford, pp. 78-9.

I am not defending New York in this regard. Many of its settlers are probably here merely to escape, not face, reality. But whatever it means, it is a rather rare gift, and I believe it has a positive effect on the creative capacities of New Yorkers—for creation is in part merely the business of forgoing the great and small distractions... Although New York often imparts a feeling of great forlornness or forsakenness, it seldom seems dead or unresourceful; and you always feel that either by shifting your location ten blocks or by reducing your fortune by five dollars you can experience rejuvenation. Many people who have no real independence of spirit depend on the city’s tremendous variety and sources of excitement for spiritual sustenance and maintenance of morale. In the country there are a few chances of sudden rejuvenation—a shift in weather, perhaps, or something arriving in the mail. But in New York the chances are endless. I think that although many persons are here from some excess of spirit (which caused them to break away from their small town), some, too, are here from a deficiency of spirit, who find in New York a protection, or an easy substitution.
White, Here, p. 25.

The great pitfalls of young artists coming to New York is the lure of the social. Every evening there are more openings, readings, performances, dinners and parties than one could ever attend. In order to succeed as an artist, one must decline most of these invitations and stay in the studio working, attending the very few which will truly open doors. I have seen more artists fall by the wayside in this way, pulled by the allure of glamorous distraction.
Goldsmith, Theory, n.pag.

It is astonishing how little New York figures in American literature. Think of the best dozen American novels of the last generation. No matter which way your taste and prejudice carry you, you will find, I believe, that Manhattan Island is completely missing from at least ten of them, and that in the other two it is little more than a passing scene, unimportant to the main action. Perhaps the explanation is to be sought in the fact that very few authors of any capacity live in the town. It attracts all the young aspirants powerfully, and hundreds of them, lingering on, develop into very proficient hacks and quacks, and eventually adorn the Authors' League and the National Institute of Arts and Letters. But not many remain who have anything worth hearing to say. They may keep quarters on the island, but they do their writing somewhere else.

Primarily, I suppose, it is too expensive for them: in order to live decently they must grind through so much hack work that there is no time left for their serious concerns. But there is also something else. The town is too full of distractions to be comfortable to artists; it is comfortable only to performers. Its machinery of dissipation is so vastly developed that no man can escape it—not even an author laboring in his lonely room, the blinds down and chewing gum plugging his ears. He hears the swish of skirts through the key-hole; down the area-way comes the clink of ice in tall glasses; some one sends him a pair of tickets to a show which whisper promises will be the dirtiest seen since the time of the Twelve Apostles. It is a sheer impossibility in New York to escape such appeals to the ductless glands. They are in the very air. The town is no longer a place of work; it is a place of pleasure. Even the up-State Christian must feel the pull of temptation, though he has been warned by his pastor. He wanders along Broadway to shiver dutifully before the Metropolitan Opera House, with its black record of lascivious music dramas and adulterous tenors, but before he knows what has struck him he is lured into a movie house even gaudier and wickeder, to sweat before a film of carnal love with lewd music dinning in his ears, or into a grind-shop auction house to buy an ormolu clock disgraceful to a Christian, or into an eating-house to debauch himself with such victuals as are seen in Herkimer county only on days of great ceremonial.

Mencken, Chrestomathy, pp. 186-7.

No time for consciousness.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 452.

No place for the working hours of the contemplative.
Ford, p. 142.

"A peaceful Sunday on Long Island takes years off my life," he confessed.
Caldwell, pp. 300-1.

There are more frauds and scoundrels, more quacks and cony-catchers, more suckers and visionaries in New York that in all the country west of the Union Hill, N.J., breweries. In other words, there are more interesting people. They pour in from all four points of the compass, and on the hard rocks of Manhattan they do their incomparable stuff, day and night, year in and year out, ever hopeful and ever hot for more. Is it drama if Jens Jensen, out in Nebraska, pauses in his furrow to yearn heavily that he were a chiropractor? Then why isn't it drama if John Doe, prancing in a New York night club, pauses to wonder who the fellow was who just left in a taxi with Mrs. Doe? Is it tragedy that Nils Nilsen, in South Dakota, wastes his substance trying to horn into a mythical Heaven? Then why isn't it tragedy when J. Eustace Garfunkel, after years of effort, fails to make the steep grade of St. Bartholomew's Church?
Morris, Manhattan ’45, p. 8.

The Present tantalizingly sublimated.
Ibid., p. 8.

New York has made up its mind. New York won’t wait.
Ibid., p. 8.

City of actions first, and thoughts afterwards.

Teeth sparkling for stardom.
Donleavy, n.pag.

“Do I pick you up or do I meet you there or shall we let it go?”
“Did you get my message? ’Cause I looked in vain.”
“Can we see each other Tuesday if it doesn’t rain?”
“Look, I’ll call you in the morning or my service will explain.”
Sondheim, “Another Hundred People.”

The promise of glorious fulfillment, of love, wealth, fame—or unimaginable joy—is always impending in the air. He is torn with a thousand desires and he is unable to articulate one of them, but he is sure that he will grasp joy to his heart, that he will hold love and glory in his arms, that the intangible will be touched, the inarticulate spoken, the inapprehensible apprehended; and that this may happen at any moment.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 569.

And lastly from that period I remember riding in a taxi one afternoon between very tall buildings under a mauve and rosy sky; I began to bawl because I had everything I wanted and knew I would never be so happy again.
Ibid., p. 607.

“We’re leading sensory-saturated lives,” Peter said. “High density. Intensity. Millions of appointments. Millions of lawyer appointments. A simple thing is no longer fun. Now you have to have two or three girls, or exotic strippers at Pure Platinum.”
Bushnell, n.pag.

Or maybe it’s proof that the sex drive is stronger than ambition, even for New Yorkers.
Ibid., n.pag.

Ten years ago I left home to go to the city and strike it big. But the only that was striking was the clock as it quickly ticked away my life.

New York should be their oyster. But is it?
Bushnell, n.pag.

Would he end up lionized on Fifty-seventh Street, or bleeding to death in some West Street gutter? Or maybe both, plus a tactfully phrased obituary in The New York Times. [Media] [Death]
Hamilton, p. 55.
To find I’m a number one, head of the list,
Cream of the crop at the top of the heap.
Frank Sinatra “NY, NY”.

Ambition

New York is a place where people come to fulfill their fantasies. Money. Power. A spot on the David Letterman show. And while you’re at it, why not two women? (And why not ask?) Maybe everyone should try it at least once.
Bushnell, n.pag.

Pride and joy and greed and sex
That’s what makes our town the best Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

Power beats sex anytime.
Haden-Guest, p. 164.

Another option in a city of options.
Bushnell, n.pag.

“But enough about me, let’s talk about you...how do you really feel about me?” is a New York joke that is wearing thin.
Blandford, p. 43.

Like everything else in New York, sharing is about power.
Blandford, p. 49.

Charged with power—the double meaning of the Battery.
Sharpe, p. 203.

Money and power are everywhere, and the sense of a bubble, a perfect glass dome that extends over the city, is palpable—one can almost see its highlight, its gleam.
Gopnik, p. 88.

We will discover and uncover this new Imperial City of Today, celebrating its peak of arrogance.
Riesenberg, p. 56.

In a city where success and power are prized so highly, the velvet glove means nothing without the iron first.
Blandford, p. 81.

This is not about statistics. Or exceptions. We all know about the successful playwright who married the beautiful fashion designer a couple of years older than he is. But when you’re beautiful and successful and rich and “know everyone,” the normal rules don’t apply.
Bushnell, n.pag.

Welcome to the Age of Un-Innocence. The glittering lights of Manhattan that served as backdrops for Edith Wharton’s bodice-heaving trysts are still glowing but the stage is empty. No one has breakfast at Tiffany’s, and no one has affairs to remember instead, we have breakfast at seven a.m. and affairs we try to forget as quickly as possible. How did we get into this mess?
Truman Capote understood our nineties dilemma: the dilemma of Love vs. the Deal all too well. In Breakfast at Tiffany's, Holly Golightly and Paul Varjak were faced with restriction she was a kept man, she was a kept woman but in the end they surmounted them and chose love over money. That doesn’t happen much in Manhattan these days. We are all kept men and women by our jobs, by our apartments, and then some of us by the pecking order at Mortimers and the Royalton, by Hamptons beachfront, by front-row Garden tickets and we like it that way. Self-protection and closing the deal are paramount. Cupid has flown the coop.

There’s still plenty of sex in Manhattan but the kind of sex that results in friendship and business deals, not romance. These days, everyone has friends and colleagues; no one really has lovers even if they have slept together.

This is a real question for women in New York these days. For the first time in Manhattan history, many women in their thirties to early forties have as much money and power as men or at least enough to feel like they don’t need a man, except for sex.

Fame, Celebrity

I was famous! But for all the wrong reasons.
Haden-Guest, p. 277.

The puddle of limelight.

No matter where you walk, you are likely to pass people who were once the toast of the town.
Talese, p. 130.

Susan Strasberg once said that she and her friend Marilyn Monroe were walking down Fifth Avenue and no one noticed them.
Marilyn, who was studying at Lee Strasberg’s Actor’s Studio, said to Susan, “Do you want them to see me do her?”
The private Norma Jean, standing on the street, adjusted her posture, her walk, and her face.
Suddenly she was mobbed.
Fritscher, p. 182.

In 1944 Cornell briefly captured—with his eye only—Marlene Dietrich, who was waiting for a cab at the curb of Jay Thorpe’s.
Conrad, pp. 311-2.

Margot Channing returning from time to time, stalking the old locations, sitting alone in winter, a shopping-bag lady in a sable coat, in the pocket park where the Stork Club once stood, and skulking through decrepit Broadway byways where she had swaggered not all that long ago, then quietly boarding the Brewster train at Grand Central for “that little place just two hours from New York.”
McCourt, p. 32.
Diana Ross stopped traffic on Sheridan Square Wednesday night. Teetering in black patent pumps, she hiked her skirt, tossed her head back for the wind to catch her man, and let out a patented diva whoop.

Trebay, p. 29.

It was such a beautiful day. The whole town came out of the woodwork. Walked toward the park and a woman lunged at me and said, "I’m Mary Rosenberg, you gave me my best advice, you told me, ‘Hang in there,’" but I didn’t know who she was. I just closed my eyes and headed through the park with people pointing at me all the way—"That’s that famous artist."

Warhol, Diaries, p. 561.

The next day as I walked along 57th Street I realized how powerful television is, because so many of the Christmas shoppers were pointing at me and saying, “It’s him,” and “No, it’s not, look at the hair,” and “Yes, but the sunglasses,” and “Yes... no,” etc. Up until then I’d been in Time and Life and all the newspapers a lot and nothing had ever made me be recognized this much, but now just a few minutes on TV had really done it.

Warhol, POPism, p. 175.

I’ve been remembering what it felt like as a young man to live in the same town with giants. When I first arrived in New York my personal giants were a dozen or so columnists and critics and poets whose names appeared regularly in the papers. I burned with a low steady fever just because I was on the same island with Don Marquis, Heywood Broun, Christopher Morley, Franklin P. Adams, Robert C. Benchley, Frank Sullivan, Dorothy Parker, Alexander Woollcott, Ring Lardner and Stephen Vincent Benet. I would hang around the corner of Chambers Street and Broadway, thinking: “Somewhere in that building is the typewriter that Archy The Cockroach jumps on at night.” New York hardly gave me a living at that period, but it sustained me. I used to walk quickly past the house in West 13th Street between Sixth and Seventh where F. P. A. lived, and the block seemed to tremble under my feet—the way Park Avenue trembles when a train leaves Grand Central. This excitation (nearness of giants) is a continuing thing. The city is always full of young worshipful beginners—young actors, young aspiring poets, ballerinas, painters, reporters, singers search depending on his own brand of tonic to stay alive, each with his own stable of giants.

White, Here, p. 38.

A dive into a civic fountain, a casual brush with the law, was enough to get us into the gossip columns, and we were quoted on a variety of subjects we knew nothing about.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 110.

Camera bait.

Haden-Guest, p. xiv.

Gossip is the new pornography. We have it in the daily newspapers.

[Media]

Allen, Manhattan, p. 184.

I was walking down Eighth Street and I heard these two girls behind me say, “Isn’t that Jim Morrison?” Ha ha ha. I felt like saying, “No, my jaw is a bit more angular.”
A bunch of us were on Oprah Winfrey. Oprah asked, “What do you do in your spare time?” We said, “Oh, we sit around and read articles about ourselves.”

Jolie Bernard used to be an agent who handled rock bands at International Creative Management. Five years ago, when she wasn’t stomping the globe in her cowboy boots, hanging out with rock stars and sometimes sleeping with them, she lived in New York, in a one-bedroom apartment decorated with black leather couches and a giant stereo system. She had long blond hair and a tight little body with big tits, and when she came home she had a million messages on her answering machine, and when she went out, she had money and drugs in her purse. She was kind of famous.

There are only a half-million big men in New York.

I’m getting my M.A. in fame, and I’ll be getting my Ph.D. in money.

The line in front of the Paramount Theatre on Broadway starts forming at midnight. By four in the morning there are over five hundred girls... they wear bobby sox (of course), bow ties (the same as Frankie wears) and photos of Sinatra pinned to their dresses... They bring their lunches... sandwiches wrapped in paper bags... and thermos bottles full of hot coffee... with paper cups... By seven in the morning when daylight breaks, some of the girls read movie fan magazines, others play cards, a favorite game being “Old Maid.” While still others proudly show their scrap books of Sinatra photos clipped from newspapers and magazines to the others in line...

By eight in the morning there are over ten thousand trying to get in line... that’s the time the box office opens up... The opening day there was a riot. The next day the cops were prepared. There were:

- 5 policewomen
- 5 cops with their horses
- 41 temporary cops in civilian clothes with P. D. arm bands
- 60 cops
- 200 detectives
- 2 emergency trucks
- 20 radio cars
- and an unannounced number of truant officers
- and also...
- Reporters
- Photographers
- and curious bystanders, etc.

The line moves slowly towards the box office... Policewomen yank out of the line those that appear to be under sixteen years... some of the girls cry, offer to show their Social Security cards as proof of age, and plead to be allowed to go inside the theatre as they had come all the way from Brooklyn and Long Island... Meanwhile big trucks loaded with rolls of newsprint arrive at the Times Building which adjoins the theatre, unable to back up and unload, the Times guards clear the entrances and act as ushers, keeping the mob behind the ropes. (The
The next day an editorial appeared in the New York Times on the Sinatra menace.)

A big blow-up picture of Sinatra in front of the theatre is marked red with lipstick impressions of kisses, endearing messages of love, and even telephone numbers. The theatre is soon filled. The show starts with the feature (Our Hearts Were Young and Gay). This is the most heckled movie of all times... not that it's a bad movie... just the opposite... but the girls simply didn't come to see that... as far as they are concerned they could be showing lantern slides on the screen.

Then the great moment arrives. Sinatra appears on the stage... hysterical shouts of Frankie... Frankie... you've heard the squeals on the radio when he sings... multiply that by about a thousand times and you get an idea of the deafening noise... as there is no radio control man to keep the noise within ear level. Sinatra does a few numbers and leaves the stage hurriedly. Now the whole theatre is a bedlam of noises with the audience refusing to quiet down. Shouts of Frankie!... Frankie!... don't leave us... but the orchestra starts playing The Star Spangled Banner... they all get up. The noises cease... and then slump into their seats...

Inside the lobby a big crowd is waiting patiently for seats... with the management wondering where to put them... as those inside are going to remain all day and night in the theatre for the full five shows... and that goes for Frankie too... a big mob is waiting at the stage door entrance... he dares not leave... so he's marooned inside the theatre... with a steady stream of messengers bringing him his lunch... laundry... and even a barber arriving in a taxi...

At two in the morning the theatre closes up... the porters come in to clean up... some of the girls having been in all day and night and having seen all the five shows refuse to leave... and try to hide in the ladies room... but the matrons chase them out... so those having had some sleep during the picture, go outside and wait in line again... others take the subway home... will they get Hell when they get home! They are a clannish bunch, the Bobby Soxers... and they among themselves that Frankie should be in the White House as President. One of the girls remarks sadly that that couldn't be... because Frankie is too skinny. [Media] [Sound]

Weegee, Naked, pp. 112-5.

NOVEMBER 4, 1987

Back in New York. But had to write this down. It's almost a full moon.

Today Claude and Sydney and Jasmine Picasso stopped in to visit.
Tina Chow called to say hello.
Called George Condo about Julian Schnabel’s opening at the Whitney tomorrow.
I bought a piece of mine at auction for $10,000.
Stephen Sprouse fashion show is tomorrow, but I can't even bring a date.
Allen Ginsberg called to invite me to be his date to a dinner at the American Academy of Arts & Letters but I can't go because I already promised to go see my friend Molissa Fenley dance at Dia Foundation.
Yves and Debbie Arman are in New York and tried to buy my piece at auction, but stopped at $8,000.
Grace Jones invited me to dinner.
Larry Levan stopped in to see me.
What a day! Is this New York on a full moon in 1987, or what?
Haring, Journals, p. 266.

There's always a car waiting.
Ellis, Glamorama, n.pag.

There’s always a Steven Meisel photo shoot.

It’s Friday night at the Bowery Bar. It’s snowing outside and buzzing inside. There’s the actress from Los Angeles, looking delightfully out of place in her vinyl gray jacket and miniskirt, with her gold-medallioned, too-tanned escort. There’s the actor, singer, and party boy Donovan Leitch in a green down jacket and a fuzzy beige hat with earflaps. There’s Francis Ford Coppola at a table with his wife. There’s an empty chair at Francis Ford Coppola’s table. It’s not just empty: It’s alluringly, temptingly, tauntingly, provocatively empty. It’s so empty that it’s more full than any other chair in the place. And then, just when the chair’s emptiness threatens to cause a scene, Donovan Leitch sits down for a chat. Everyone in the room is immediately jealous. Pissed off. The energy of the room lurches violently. This is romance in New York.

Bushnell, n.pag.

It’s so diabolically crowded outside Bowery Bar that I have to climb over a stalled limo parked crookedly at the curb to even start pushing through the crowd while paparazzi who couldn’t get in try desperately to snap my photo, calling out my name... Candy Bushnell suddenly pushes through the crowd screaming “Richard,” and then when she sees me her voice goes up eighty octaves and she screams “Pony!” and places an enormous kiss on my face while slipping me a half and Richard finds Jenny Shimuzu but not Scott Bakula and Chloe is surrounded by Roy Liebenthal, Eric Goode, Quentin Tarantino, Kato Kaelin and Baxter Priestly, who is sitting way too close to her in the giant aquamarine booth and I have to put a stop to this or else deal with an unbelievably painful headache. Waving over at John Cusack, who’s sharing calamari with Julien Temple, I move through the crowd toward the booth where Chloe, pretending to be engaged, is nervously smoking a Marlboro Light... Naomi Campbell, Helena Christensen, Cindy Crawford, Sheryl Crow, David Charvet, Courteney Cox, Harry Connick, Jr., Francesco Clemente, Nick Constantine, Zoe Cassavetes, Nicolas Cage, Thomas Calabro, Cristi Conway, Bob Collacello, Whitfield Crane, John Cusack, Dean Cain, Jim Courier, Roger Clemens, Russell Crowe, Tia Carrere and Helena Bonham Carter—but I’m not sure if she should be under B or C. ... We sit there sort of looking out over the rest of the room, my eyes fixed on the big table in the center, beneath a chandelier made of toilet floats and recycled refrigerator wire, where Eric Bogosian, Jim Jarmusch, Larry Gagosian, Harvey Keitel, Tim Roth, and oddly enough, Ricki Lake are all having salads... Um, table one is you and Alison and Alec Baldwin and Kim Basinger and Tim Hutton and Uma Thurman and Jimmy and Jane Buffett and Ted Field and Christy Turlington and David Geffen and Calvin and Kelly Klein and Julian Schnabel and Ian Schrager and Russell Simmons, along with assorted dates and wives... Nodding as Russell Simmons walks past me and out onto Fourth Street.

Ellis, Glamorama, n.pag.

In fact, the guy was so into the place that he didn’t want me to write about it because he was afraid that, like most decent places in New York, it would be ruined by publicity.

Bushnell, n.pag.
Money

I wasn't there to become famous. I was there to make as much money as I possibly could.
Haden-Guest, p. 6.

F. Scott Fitzgerald to Edmund Wilson: "Culture follows money. New York, not London will soon be the 'capital of culture.'" [World City] Douglas, Honesty, p. 4.

Money and power are everywhere, and the sense of a bubble, a perfect glass dome that extends over the city, is palpable—one can almost see its highlight, its gleam.
Gopnik, p. 88.

Does money ever sleep? Do the machines in a factory ever need rest?
Conrad, p. 275.

Irreverent ravishing city of dollar signs.
Reisenberg, p. 205.

The bull’s eye of wealth in this town. Makes me so nervous I need to take another pee.
Donleavy, n.pag.

Financial miners had discovered fat veins of money coursing beneath the cliffs and canyons of the southern tip of Manhattan. As geological and meteorological forces conspire to deposit diamonds at the top of one continent and to expose gold at the edge of another; so a variety of manmade conditions intersected more or less at the beginning of the new decade to create a newly rich class based in New York, with a radical new scale of financial well-being. The electronic buzz of fast money hummed beneath the wired streets, affecting all the inhabitants, making some of them crazy with lust and ambition, others angrily impoverished, and making the comfortable majority feel poorer. [Nature] [Prehistoric]
O’Connell, p. 298.

Sidewalk and curb alike flaunt super-refined wealth.
Irwin, p. 186.

A place of business, not a nursery.
Bladford, p. 56.

Crowned not only with no history, but with no credible possibility of time for history, and consecrated by no uses save the commercial at any cost.
James, p. 373.

Such a tight mecca of mechanized, commercial efficiency that every throb and whistle sounds prerecorded or piped, every flirtatious come-on is reduced to a paid announcement, hand-holding seems unsanitary, a fleeting hump the only practical reality.
Petronious, p. 6.

Space as a whole enters into the modernized mode of capitalist production: it is utilized to produce surplus value. The ground, the underground, the air, and even the light enter into both the productive forces and the products. The urban fabric, with its multiple networks of communication and exchange, is part of the means of production. The city and its various installations (ports, train stations, etc.) are part of capital.

Lefebvre, Stage, p. 98.

I have a fantasy about money: I’m walking down the street and I hear somebody say— in a whisper—“There goes the richest person in the world.”

When world realization of its unlimited wealth has been established there as yet will be room for the whole of humanity to stand indoors in greater New York City, with more room for each human than at an average cocktail party.

Kolbert, n.pag.

Transaction

Money in New York has oddly different values. A gardenia may cost ten cents, but an orchid five dollars. A nickel is charged for a forty-eight mile ride on the subway. Twenty-five cents will buy an excellent lunch at an automat, but, at more expensive restaurants, as much as $2.50 is charged for one dish.

Glickman, p. 20.

American money is very well-designed, really. I like it better than any other kind of money. I’ve thrown it in the East River down by the Staten Island Ferry just to see it float.

thousands—millions—trillions of probabilities of percents of accounts—credits—debits provisions—customs—tariffs

The plastic credit card is pioneered by Brooklyn-born Long Island banker William Boyle, who has devised the Franklin Charge Account Plan for Franklin National Bank. Franklin markets its plan with the slogan, “Just charge it.” The Franklin Charge Account Plan will play a major role in fueling the rise of Long Island suburbs.

Trager, p. 581.

Only one out of ten cash machines seems to have any cash in it.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 18.

Transactions fluctuate like thermometer mercury

Voronca, p. 463.

On the sidewalks, braving the weather, stand Bowery diamond dealers whose whole stock in trade may consist of one diamond, wrapped in tissue paper and carried in the vest pocket.

WPA Guide, p. 120.
The city, the urban space, and the urban reality cannot be conceived simply as the sum of the places of the consumption of goods (commodities) and the places of production (enterprises).
Lefebvre, Stage, p. 188.

Max Weber argued that the emergence of the modern city is distinguished by the market. The market, so much less heroic in the traditional sense and apparently so formless and morally empty as a public phenomenon, symbolically represents—and on occasion creates—the public culture of modern cities. In the market—as in the modern city generally—there is an “incomplete integration” of participants. People enter and withdraw from the market of public life without relinquishing other structural attachments.
Bender, pp. 58-9.

The sociology of a service economy.
Sassen, p. 9.

The very richness of life in New York creates a spectacular undertow.

The divinity of engineering is summed up by the doors of safes, “so extremely well made,” in a bank he visits. Léger too was impressed by the steel vaults of the Irving Bank. In this impregnable tabernacle resides, perhaps, the posthuman genius of the city.
Conrad, p. 138.

Irving Trust Building’s vault has a chemical coating designed to emit a paralyzing gas should it be attacked by a safecracker’s blowtorch.
Trager, p. 471.

A determined misreading of money-making structures as religious fanes.
Conrad, p. 73.

Deep in New York’s downtown financial district, with its odd collection of illuminated architectural styles—Corinthian columns cheek by jowl with neo-Baroque doorways, Gothic towers loftily disdaining mid-Victorian embellishments—lies an innocuous building that houses the Stock Exchange. The twin green domes of this place, where a nation’s fortunes may be jeopardised, are ironically reminiscent of Monte Carlo’s Casino, where fortunes are won and lost for pleasure.

Looking down, they are bewilderingly like ants, their every movement accelerated as in old-time movies, when even a funeral was a breathless business. These human ants swarm wildly, weaving in and out, chewing gum, snapping at newspapers, hurling them down, scribbling fanatically on pocketpads, never attempting to do less than three things at a time. Paper lies thick on the floor like giant confetti, and we see a sudden white fountain as a cloud of it shoots into the air, settling down again gently like snow.
To the strange underworld of the Counting House. Neat little ants here, with immaculate creases in sober suits, hair unruffled, eyes impersonal but bright as buttons. They sit behind tall desks, in front of them long books in which they write without respite. All day this has gone on, yet they remain unruffled, neat, methodical, efficient.
Into their long books go strings of figures, chronicling in mathematics the rise and fall of family fortunes.

These rooms are bare, severe; so lacking adornment of any kind that the telephones, in regular rows, become decorative rather than functional, the only decorative feature in them. "We're geared up to high speed and big business, eh?" winks an ant with a cigar in his mouth.

Each of these rooms has eight or more of these inhumanly neat little men human adding, machines, tabulating the gains and losses of others' financial bets, in perfect running order always. Do they ever break down? And if so what fate befalls them? Unimaginable that they could break down, but one day, perhaps.

The President of the Exchange mounts a marble balcony and strikes the three o'clock gong. The horseplay is suddenly halted. The men reach for bowler hats, their eyes turn to stone, their mouths become grim as they leave for respectable homes in Long Island, Westchester, Park Avenue and Riverside Drive. With the striking of the gong life changes utterly. The feckless boys have become alarmingly transformed into heads of families, dignified, intimidating pillars of New York society.

When later you meet these same schoolboys away from the Exchange it is difficult to believe your recollections of tooth-paste and wet pockets, and unthinkable to remind them of such things.

Beaton, Portrait, pp. 76-7.

Men and women may have created Wall Street, but it has lost any human scale.

Rock, p. xvi.

Your Empire State creation may presage an apotheosis of the dying profit bug.

Reisenberg, p. 95.

One story is only good till another is told, and sky-scrappers are the last word of economic ingenuity only till another word be written.
This shall be possibly a word of still uglier meaning, but the vocabulary of thrift at any price shows boundless resources, and the consciousness of that truth, the consciousness of the finite, the menaced, the essentially invented state, twinkles ever, to my perception, in the thousand glassy eyes of these giants of the mere market.

James, p. 373.

Until the World War II blackout, a perpetual oil flame burned at the Standard Oil Building in the Financial district and could be seen for miles around.

An empty pedestal in the lobby of the Standard Oil Building where a statue of John D. Rockefeller used to stand.

Ibid., p. 20.

Before the salt air damaged it, the entire ceiling in the lobby of the Standard Oil Building was gilded.

Ibid., p. 20.

On the original Black Tuesday in 1929, Lorca, the Andalusian poet wandered through the canyons of Wall Street, watching in amazement as ruined investors flung themselves from windows of monstrous buildings.
"The ambulances collected suicides”, he wrote, “whose hands were full of rings.” Amidst the “merciless silence of money,” Lorca “felt the sensation of real death, death without hope, death that is nothing but rottenness.” It was easy, then, for him to visualize the inevitable destruction of lower Manhattan by “hurricanes of gold” and “tumults of windows.”

Lorca was on Wall Street on the day of the stock market crash and afterward claimed to have seen six people commit suicide during Black Tuesday.

Lorca, Poet, p. xii.

Time for the cobras to hiss on the uppermost levels, / for the nettle to jostle the patios and roof-gardens, / for the Market to crash in a pyramid of moss. / Time for the jungle lianas that follow the rifles— / soon, soon enough, ever so soon. / Woe to you, Wall Street!!!

Lorca, Collected, p. 667.

December 1929
PAISAJE DE LA MULTITUD QUE VOMITA
(Anochecer de Coney Island) LANDSCAPE OF THE VOMITING CROWD
(Twilight at Coney Island)
New York, 29 de diciembre de 1929.
New York, December 29, 1929
PAISAJE DE LA MULTITUD QUE ORINA
(Nocturno de Battery Place) LANDSCAPE OF THE URINATING CROWD
(Nocturne of Battery Place)
Lorca, Poet, p. 53.

But it is necessary to make money, and in the commodious corners of the bright city, as everywhere in the world, depravity laughs disdainfully at hypocrisy and falsehood. Of course the depravity is hidden, and, of course, it’s a wearying, tiresome depravity, but it also is “for the people.” It is organized as a paying business, as a means to extract their earnings from the pockets of the people. Fed by the passion for gold it appears in a form vile and despicable indeed in this marsh of glittering boredom.

I regard all bankers with distrust as being the root of most of the evil of the world; all financiers outside bankers I would export, as was done with the dogs of Constantinople, to a small desert island where they might subsist on each other’s flesh.

Ford, p. 82.

More than a film, almost a period documentary. The unbridled luxury of the coastal home of the broker Gordon Gekko, crammed with artworks from Picasso to Louise Nevelson; the “uniform” of the powerful, impeccable suits, elegant suspenders silhouetted against immaculate shirts, the hair slicked back and the brand-named cigarillo always lit, the décor of the office, white and aseptic for the lower echelons, sumptuously post-déco and with a view over Manhattan for those who really count. Wall Street depicted the lifestyle of excess even in seemingly ordinary yet revealing details, such as the sequence showing the "rewards" for young Fox in the form of a limousine, cocaine and a high-class call girl, or the total refurbishment of his apartment, transformed into an orgy of faux marble stucco, rich rapes, and hi-tech furniture.

Frisa p. 112.

The new law of evolution in corporate America seems to be survival of the unfittest. Well, in my book you either do it right or you get eliminated. In the last seven deals that I’ve been involved with, there were 2.5 million stockholders who have made a pretax profit of 12 billion dollars. Thank you. I am not a destroyer of companies. I am a liberator of them! The point is, ladies and gentleman, that greed—for lack of a better word—is good. Greed is right. Greed works. Greed clarifies, cuts through, and captures the essence of the evolutionary spirit. Greed, in all of its forms—greed for life, for money, for love, knowledge—has marked the upward surge of mankind.

"Wall Street" American Rhetoric, n.pag.

“What we need is a teensy-weensy depression,” somebody said. “We have too much prosperity. It makes for greed.”

Atkinson, p. 132.
n - Commodity

The city as an antic consumerism, a big store supplying fantasies for free.
Conrad, p. 310.

In the city of consumerism, art is a search for the recondite treasures New York has randomly buried.
Ibid., p. 311.

In commodity society all of us are prostitutes, selling ourselves to strangers.
Jones, Modernism, p. 185.

I am truly withering in the sordid materialism of New York.
Ibid., p. 229.

The objects purchased are devalued by the act of purchasing.
Buse, p. 18.

F. Scott Fitzgerald’s Gatsby, lavishing wealth on clothes, entertainment, and the purchase of a dream, is a latter-day version of the Jamesian New Yorker, except that the superstitious Jamesian reticence about wealth has changed to the alternative policy of apologetic splurging. Gatsby’s extravagant consumerism uses wealth for the satiation of appetites and the requisitioning of visions. He desolidifies possessions. He’ll never wear all the shirts he owns; he seldom attends his own parties. He spends to expend, disperse, dissipate himself. The orgy is an experiment in controlled self-destruction, and New York is the emporium catering to such exorbitant and drastic whims as these.
Conrad, p. 193.

Window Display, Mannequin

The question of shop windows
To undergo the interrogation of shop windows
The exigency of the shop window
The shop window proof of the existence of the outside world Duchamp, A L’Infinifitif, N. pag.

In 1939 Dalí was commissioned to design a shop window for Bonwit Teller on Fifth Avenue. He began from a detestation of those mannequins. Dalí dislikes them because they’re immune to decay and refuse to be consumed: “so hard, so inedible,” as he calls them, they have defeated surrealism. He revenges himself by surreally aging them. In the window he placed some musty, cobwebbed models exhumed from an attic. They extruded—as corpses continue to do, and as Lorca surreally chooses to do when deciding, on arrival in New York, to let his hair grow—“long natural dead women’s hair.” For Kiesler and the purists the shop window had been a laboratory exhibiting the abstract future; Dalí makes it a charnel house of surreal memory. At Bonwit Teller his elderly mannequins bathed in a tub with a hirsute lining of astrakhan and slept on charred sheets under a canopy from which trickled the blood of a pigeon. The management of the store, aghast, dismantled the display. Dalí insisted on its restoration and, when the management refused, clambered into the window to upset the furry bathtub. His intention was only to embarrass Bonwit Teller by spilling the water, but as he dislodged the tub it slid across the floor, smashed the plate glass, and deluged the sidewalk. Dalí followed it through the gaping pane to join the crowd on Fifth Avenue. In doing so, he was acting out the forced entry into consciousness which he wanted his irrational images to make. They too crave to splinter the glass that flattens and suppresses them, to rebel into a third dimension. They are the interior which vomitously insists on exteriorizing itself. Dalí was arrested for his pains and remarked that the affair did more for his glory than if he’d devoured Fifth Avenue entire. This constitutes his triumph: a parabolic digestion of the city; a surreal conquest by cannibalism.

[Body in the City]

The window-dressing is one of the city’s chief features. Each new fashion lives brilliantly, but dies an early death, in the shop windows, as the seasons of the year pass prematurely. In this clean, new world Christ is born in November, and Bergdorf Goodman have robbed surrealism of its novelty before Dalí’s new exhibition.
Lowe, p. 78.

Parallel infinities into the improbable kaleidoscope of its shop windows, its transparent towers... its windows lit all through the long nights of winter.
de Chirico, p. 401.

Mayakovsky sees a model demonstrating shaving gear in a Woolworth window. Through the plate glass he tells her in Russian that she’s being a fool. She lip-reads him and imagines he’s asking her in English to open the door. You’ve been made an idiot, he rails; she translates his fulmination into a declaration of love.
Conrad, p. 122.

Fashionable women examining shop windows at night—to buy a painting.
Sharpe, p. 195.

Her eye is caught by something in the window; sexual adventure and drugstore accessories gently rub shoulders in the warm night air.
Ibid., p. 283.

By this time Fifth Avenue is deserted by all but a few strolling insomniacs, some cruising cab drivers, and a group of sophisticated females who stand in store windows all night and day wearing cold, perfect smiles—smiles formed by lips of clay, eyes of glass, and cheeks that will glow until the paint wears off. Like sentries they line Fifth Avenue—these window mannequins who gaze onto the quiet street with tilted heads and pointed toes and long, rubber fingers reaching for cigarettes that aren’t there. At 4 A.M., some store windows become a strange fairyland of gangling goddesses, all of them frozen in the act of dashing to a party, diving into a swimming pool, or sashaying skyward in a billowy blue negligee.

While this wild illusion is partly due to the runaway imagination, it is also partly due to the incredible skill of mannequin makers, who have endowed mannequins with certain individual characteristics—the theory being that no two females, not even plastic or plaster females, are quite alike. As a result, the mannequins at Peck & Peck are made to look young and prim, while at Lord & Taylor they seem wiser and wind-blown. At Saks they are demure but mature, while at Bergdorf's they look agelessly elegant and quietly rich. The profiles of Fifth Avenue's mannequins have been fashioned after some of the world's most alluring women—women like Suzy Parker, who posed for the Best & Co. mannequins, and Brigitte Bardot, who inspired some mannequins at Saks. The preoccupation with making mannequins almost human, and equipping them with curves, is perhaps responsible for the rather strange fascination so many New Yorkers have for these synthetic virgins. This is why some window decorators frequently talk to mannequins and give them pet names, and why naked mannequins in windows inevitably attract men, disgust women, and are banned in New York City. This is why some mannequins are attacked by perverts, and why the svelte mannequin in a White Plains shop was discovered in the basement not long ago with her clothes torn off, her make-up smeared and her body possessing evidence of attempted rape. The police laid a trap one night and caught the attacker—a shy, little man: the porter.

Talese, pp. 4-5.

Some years back, a lot of manikins looked like Greta Garbo, or the Duchess of Windsor. A few years later, they looked like Greer Garson. Manikins with broad shoulders often resembled Joan Crawford. And when the sloped shoulder came in, they looked like Gainsborough's Duchess of Devonshire.

Early, p. .59.

Window shopping is a delightful pastime, because manikins on Fifth Avenue are even more glamorous than models. For a woman is only a woman, but a manikin is a creature with hair of spun gold and silvered glass, with breasts so high she can rest her chin on them, and eyelashes so long you can hang your hat on them.

Ibid., p. .58.

There's nothing more boring than narcissism—the tragedy of being totally... me. We're all capable of it. And we all know examples of it—these beautiful tragedies. Many of them, of course, are mannequins. Mannequins are either divine—or they're the most boring girls in the world.

Vreeland Papers, NYPL.

Mannequins, immaculately outfitted and attitudinizing in a shop window at night or nude and virginally sheeted in cellophane. Their robust sensuality defeats the city's attempts to douse or chill it.

Legs,
what do you know about legs?
you who think about skirts
when you pass the windows of the department store.
What do you know about the legs
of the twentieth century?
Parland, p. 345.

In the bleakly radiant, renovated New York foreseen by Le Corbusier, the ideal citizens would be the effigies of femininity he admires in the window displays on Fifth Avenue.

Conrad, p. 140.
The wax manikins in the windows of the smart dress shops on Fifth Avenue make women masters, with conquering smiles. Square shoulders, incisive features, sharp coiffure—red hair and green dress, metallic blonde hair and ultramarine blue dress, black hair and red dress.

The Greek coiffure, the Doric and Ionic of Asia Minor, predominates. The face, with its strong features, stands out. The casque is gold, platinum, auburn, sandy, even white.

The manikins in the windows have the heads of Delphic goddesses. Green, lamp-black, red hair. Antique-like heads, here one as if from a tragedy, there one like a Caryatid, Athenas from the Acropolis Museum. Polychromy. When polychromy appears it means that life is breaking out. [Antiquity]

Corbusier, p. 165.

In the window of the GAP a young man and woman froze in mannequin poses. "They do it for about an hour and a half at a time," the store guard said. The "mannequins" had Astor Place haircuts and bright cotton clothes.

Trebay, p. 77.

The shop windows are dressed with a few dispirited dummies.
Atkinson, p. 144.

You stand in front of Saks Fifth Avenue and stare at the mannequin. Sometime last week, when you started shouting at it, a policeman came over and told you to move along. This is just how she looked at the end, the blank stare, the lips tight and reticent.

McInerney, p. 78.

Two men and a woman were dressing a shop window. From the middle of the upper legs down the manikins were all wire. Empty shoe boxes lay banked against the window like last year's snow.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 600.

Gene Moore was the head of Tiffany & Co. design team when he hired two young artists, Robert Rauschenberg and Jasper Johns, in 1956 to create memorable window design inspired by a book on famous still lifes and nature.

While the artists pursued careers in galleries, they took on window design work. Moore said, "Although I was not showcasing their serious work, the window design was serious work to me. One influenced the other it can't help it. What you are comes out, whether you are doing windows or a painting."

Rauschenberg met Johns on a winter night in 1954 walking home on the corner of 57th and Madison Avenue in New York. The two would become friends and, at times, collaborators. Rauschenberg was full of conceptual ideas and Johns had the precise craftsmanship to execute them.

Under their fictitious name Matson Jones Custom Display, a name created for all their commercial work to not confuse them with their art careers, Johns and Rauschenberg got steady work for their ability to create striking theatrics within windows.

To create these natural settings, fruits and flowers were cast in plaster, while actual moss, rocks and dirt were used. Their miniature environments ranged from highways with telephone poles, swamp scenes, and winter landscapes after an ice storm. They would split open pomegranates and cassata melons, cast them, and spill out Tiffany diamonds and jewels from inside.

Accompanied with dramatic lighting, they really did appear like actual paintings.

After their careers took off, window design at both Tiffany & Co. and Bonwit Teller wasn’t needed to pay the rent. And they proceeded to preserve their own places in art history with target paintings and taxidermy sheep.

Gaboriault, N. pag.

The filmmaker and impresario Emilio de Antonio had, as “an artists’ agent,” been involved in arranging commissions from Moore for Rauschenberg, Johns, and Andy Warhol. One project Matson Jones executed for Moore client I. Miller involved “a kind of three-dimensional window display” interpretation of Andy Warhol’s shoe drawings, which were featured in the company’s ads at the time.

Another display for a Moore client [and Tiffany neighbor] Bonwit Teller included Johns’ 1957 painting, Flag on Orange Field.
After Construction with J.J. Flag / Short Circuit’s inclusion at the Stable Gallery Annual in 1955, this may have been the second public exhibition of Johns’ Flag paintings; neither was credited to him.

Despite this professional overlap, and their mutual friendship with de Antonio, Johns told Paul Taylor in 1990 that he only met Warhol for the first time in 1961, when Andy bought a drawing out of Johns’ second SOLO show at Castelli. Soon after that, Warhol’s own comic strip-based paintings were shown in a Bonwit Teller window display, where they were likely seen by Roy Lichtenstein.

In April 1961 Andy Warhol exhibited five large paintings in the window of Bonwit Teller, a New York department store where he had been working for some time producing window displays. The paintings, which were based on comic strips and black-and-white newspaper advertisements and positioned behind mannequins wearing the latest fashions, marked a turning point in Warhol’s transition from a highly successful commercial illustrator to an iconic figure in the New York avant-garde. Through the lowbrow subject matter of his canvases and its collapsing of the distinction between the space of art and the space of commerce, Warhol’s Bonwit Teller window display in many ways announced the artist’s forthcoming assault on the form, content and production of mainstream art and on how we look at and understand art in the context of popular and consumerist culture.

Weintraub, N. pag.

Andy was doing ad sketches for Bonwit’s, and I decided that he should do some windows... I remember on thing that was very exciting: he painted directly onto the glass [of the show window].

Smith, Warhol, p. 111.

Blake stopped opposite here and looked into a store window. It was a decorator’s or an auctioneer’s. The window was arranged like a room in which people live and entertain their friends. There were cups on the coffee table, magazines to read, and flowers in the vases, but the flowers were dead and the cups were empty and the guests had not come.
[Nature] [Death]

A shopkeeper in 1957 arranges a street display of frilly crinoline petticoats which, hung above his doorway, seem to be floating through the air to the pavement like angels with parachutes.

Splendid city of dream within dream, city of Plate Glass, Plate Glass City, Shop Window City.

de Chirico, p. 401.

If the store window with the scribble on it were washed, she’d be unable to find her way home.

Conrad, p. 122.

I stopped and looked in the window of a stationery shop. A mechanized pen was suspended in space in such a way that, as a mechanized roll of paper passed by it, the pen went through the motions of the same penmanship exercises I had learned as a child in the third grade.

Centrally placed in the window was an advertisement explaining the mechanical reasons for the perfection of the operation of the suspended mechanical pen.

I was fascinated, for everything was going wrong. The pen was tearing the paper to shreds and splattering ink all over the window and on the advertisement, which, nevertheless, remained legible.

Cage, Indeterminacy, N. pag.

Revlon cosmetic salesmen “accidentally” destroy displays set up by the competition in urban drugstores. As a result, Revlon will have a virtual monopoly on beauty salon sales by 1941. (cf. Trager: “Ballpoint pens go on sale in 1945 at Gimbels...” [Media])

Trager, p. 471.

Angels in samite descended from white cloud in the Lord & Taylor windows. The Tree of Light that reaches from roof to sidewalk was radiant on massed, upturned faces. [Cosmic]

Ghouls look into brilliant restaurant windows. [Voyeur]

Reisenberg, p. 205.

Department Store

All life in a mercantile society, one sometimes feels, is dedicated to the disguises of wanting. The sin of capitalism, perhaps, is to make wants feel like needs, to give to simple silly stuff the urgency of near-physical necessity: I must have it. The grace of capitalism is to make wants feel like hopes, so that material objects and stuff can feel like the possibility of something heroic and civic. The urge of the great department stores was to hide acquisition as sociability, to disguise acquisitiveness as membership, so that one entered them not as one entered a store— with one eye on the beseeching salesgirl, one hand on the knob of the door, just looking— but as one entered a library or a club: striding in with pleasure. The department store was the cathedral of that material aspiration, and its diminishment leaves us with one less place to go and hope in.

Gopnik, p. 209.

You can shop at the Hester Street market or at Wanamaker’s, at Namm’s or Loeser’s or Mays or Martin’s in Brooklyn, at Gertz in Jamaica, at Best and Company or Ohrbach’s, at Masters or Korvette’s. You can still go to Gimbel’s.

The great department stores of New York now lie on the avenues like luxury liners becalmed in a lagoon, big shops in shallow water. Saks and Bergdorf’s and Bloomingdale’s, immense and slow, look down at them and try to continue on a stately course, but the water is ebbing from around their keels.

Gopnik, p. 201.

For over half a century, in New York particularly, department stores presided over everything from Thanksgiving Day parades and patriotic lectures to Cubist exhibitions.

Ibid., p. 204.

In 1942, Gimbel’s and Macy’s begins selling old master paintings. Gimbel’s offers one of its Rembrandts at $9,999.99.

Morris, Manhattan ’45, p. 255.

One window on Sixth Avenue was apparently reserved for fascinating displays of objets d’art for which Benjamin Altman had a decided predilection.

Marcuse, p. 293.

John Wanamaker at Astor Place and Broadway had an entrance hall and an art gallery and was said to have more windows than the Empire State Building. The model and master of the department store as a civic-seeming institution.

Gopnik, p. 204.

If you are poor, you can go to S. Klein on Union Square and battle for bargains with the toughest women in the history of New York.

S. Klein’s policy of never advertising.

Trager, p. 459.

Women cram their purses down the fronts of their blouses to free both hands to pluck dresses off the racks.

Ibid., p. 459.

If a shoplifter is apprehended she is immediately placed on display in one of the store’s glass-enclosed “crying rooms.”

Ibid., p. 459.
Sign at S. Klein: “Honesty is its own reward. The penalty of dishonesty is JAIL.”
Atkinson, p. 145.

Traffic sweeps around the square. Long before the doors of Klein’s Dress Shop opens, crowds of women and girls have gathered. Private policemen in gray uniforms try to keep order at about nine-thirty, because at that time all the doors are unlocked and the women sweep forward in a powerful surge, grabbing at the dresses on the racks, searching and clawing for bargains. It is cash down here, “on the Square,” each woman holds her money in her fist.
Trager, p. 476.

It looks at first sight like an accident or a riot; then you perceive that the units are women—all young, mostly pretty. Intently, expectantly, they are tilting up their chins to peer at the doors of two or three large bargain-sale stores whose windows display presentable but frail-looking dresses, priced as low as $4, and hats, in which a man sees no fault, going for less than $2. Suddenly there is a massed rush forward. Two policemen have opened the doors to let out a store full of sated shoppers; are admitting the shoving, struggling, laughing, squealing replacements. The floor jammed to capacity, the police close the doors again. So it goes; shops emptying and refilling at half-hour intervals all Saturday afternoon long.
Irwin, p. 164.

Thronges charging through the doors of the department store.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Women with set faces were charging in all directions, pawing at whatever is displayed on the counters.
Atkinson, p. 145.

When the noontime crowds are surging through it—the girls and women in their bright dresses, their eager eyes darting from window to window and their voices raised in never-ending chatter, the men, less colorful, but very alert and vigorous and full of plans for spending money.
Ibid., p. 95.

New York women are the most beautiful in the world. They have their teeth straightened in early youth. They get their notions of chic from S. Klein’s windows instead of the movies.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 623.

I remember Klein’s at Christmas time.

Noon on Union Square. Selling out. Must vacate. WE HAVE MADE A TERRIBLE MISTAKE... Noon sunlight spirals dimly into the chopsuey joint. Muted music spirals Hindustan. He eats fooyong, she eats chowmein... Highest value, lowest price. Must vacate. WE HAVE MADE A TERRIBLE MISTAKE. Must vacate.
Dos Passos, p. 144.

In order to appease protesting residents, B. Altman erects a building whose mundane function is decorously hidden by a façade resembling a Florentine palace; until recently not even the owner’s name appears on the exterior. As commerce—having thus crept in disguise into Fifth Avenue—appropriates most of the district, residents move farther up the avenue. [Simulacra] [Antiquity]

WPA, p. 217.

Betty Isaacs went shopping at Altman’s. She spent all her money except her last dime, which she kept in her hand so that she’d have it ready when she got on the bus to go home and wouldn’t have to fumble around in her purse since her arms were full of parcels and she was also carrying a shopping bag. Waiting for the bus, she decided to make sure she still had the coin. When she opened her hand, there was nothing there. She mentally retraced her steps trying to figure out where she’d lost the dime. Her mind made up, she went straight to the glove department, and sure enough there it was on the floor where she’d been standing. As she stooped to pick it up, another shopper said, “I wish I knew where to go to pick money up off the floor.” Relieved, Betty Isaacs took the bus home to the Village. Unpacking her parcels, she discovered the dime in the bottom of the shopping bag.

Cage, Indeterminacy, N. pag.

Lovely expensive laces, rugs, furniture and tapestries make Altman’s a kind of rare merchandising museum constantly replenished by buyers who travel all over the world and brave war, bandits and pestilence in line of duty.

An Altman rug buyer was held up by bandits in Persia and robbed not only of his rugs but his clothes. A lace buyer was three times blown up during the war and once was locked in a military prison. He also sailed the Bay of Biscay when it was a sea of mines and went into Switzerland on a diplomatic passport when the border was closed.

That’s what laces mean to Altman’s—and no wonder since customers sometimes order $50,000 worth of them at a time.

Perhaps it ought to be explained that one can’t just drop in and buy these special laces over the counter. The must first be ordered and the order must be transmitted to Europe by a buyer who will, more likely than not, go down on his knees on the mud floor of a lacemaker’s hut to plan the pattern. In two years or maybe three, the order will be finished and the buyer will go back and collect it.

The seventh floor of Bergdorf Goodman hums, the eighth floor of Saks sings, and there are few places that seem more entirely of Manhattan than Fred’s at Barneys on a Saturday at noon.

And there are apartments in stores—the Goodmans live on the top floor of Bergdorf Goodman, opposite The Plaza. Many banks and business houses also have penthouses. [Aerie]

Josephy, pp. 224-5.

The origin of the name Bloomingdale’s goes back to a lovely spot on the Upper West Side called “blooming dale” (Bloemendael in Dutch).

Maffi, p. 7.

My favorite thing here is the parties they give in the different sections. The last party was in the rug room. That was for Martha Graham and Halston. I was a model in that show. It was my longest modeling assignment, eight hours. The other great party was at the hardware room.
Brobston. p. 302.

Warhol: In Bloomingdale’s. As soon you give them cash they don’t know what to do with it. You have to have a card. I don’t believe in credit cards. (To salesgirl) Do you, have anything good to say about Altman’s, I mean, Bloomingdale’s?
Salesgirl: It’s a beautiful place to work.
Warhol: Oh really? Oh. Well, that’s good. Thanks a lot. ‘Bye. Now we’re going to the perfume department.
Ibid., pp. 305-6.

If the Gestapo would take away your Bloomingdale’s charge card, you’d tell ‘em everything.
Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.

I don’t know how to shop in America… Bloomingdale’s is the end of shopping because there isn’t anyone to wait on you; you just sort of admire things.
Vreeland, DV, p. 135.

Some kind of existential chasm opens before me while I’m browsing in Bloomingdale’s.
Ellis, Psycho, p. 179.

The face that launched a thousand trips to Bloomingdale’s.
McInerney, p. 173.

As recently as the early nineties, when Bloomies almost fell and women wept, department stores still mattered.

But we miss the big stores, because they defined a world, little duchies of commerce, with their faith in literal display: the things themselves shown as the things themselves, these shirts, these ties—the wooden escalators and crowded elevators, and the ghosts of elevator operators wearing small hats and announcing, “Notions.”

Lord & Taylor still gives one a sense of the department store as it once was, a last lingering resonance of the old dispensation. It is not a very distant world. The first floor of the store, at Thirty-eighth and Fifth, is laid out sweetly and expectantly, all mirrors and cosmetics; the salespeople in the Clinique department look serious in their white coats, as though actually about to attempt something clinical. There are no divisions, no urgency, no one spraying perfume—it is a ground floor seemingly arranged by the hand of God for displaying goods. There are striped men’s ties placed like salmon fillets and men’s shirts hanging like partridge. There are hats. The store plays the national anthem at ten o’clock every morning. The old Lord & Taylor implies a rhythm of time, of women’s time, in particular, a pace not slowed but purposeful and expansive: It takes a morning and lunch, or tea and an afternoon, to make a survey of the place, shopping as a setting out rather than a dropping in.

At last, up on the tenth floor, in the men’s department, one can find an awe-inspiring demonstration of the sheer numbing stasis that capitalism can achieve—for it is insensitivity to the immediate pressure of the market that separates big-ticket capitalism from the rug bazaar and the vegetable stall. Capital slows down the market and places it within the shell of The Firm, firm in every sense, so that things can linger after their appeal to the market has passed. The brand names are Jack Victor and Grant Thomas, name brands that are neither really names nor really brands, and seem to set off the commercial logic of brand-naming in a twilight zone of pure performance: No one wants to wear Jack Victor slacks, but there they are, hanging in poignant rows, their creases abjectly offered. It is a kind of installation piece: the department store as an abstract exercise in naming and branding and display, without commercial urgency and, mostly, without customers.

When it begins to get dark, and all the shoppers have left Macy's, ten black Doberman pinschers begin to tip-tap up and down the aisles sniffing for prowlers who may be hiding behind counters or lurking in clothes racks. They wander though all twenty floors of the big store, and are trained to climb ladders, jump through window frames, leap over hurdles, and bark at anything unusual—a leaky radiator, a broken streamline, smoke, or a thief. Should a thief try to escape, the dogs can easily overtake him, run between his legs—and trip him. Their barks have alerted Macy's guards to many minor hazards, but never to a thief—none has dared to remain in the store after closing hours since the dogs arrived in 1952.

Talese, p. 25.

Upon her arrival in New York, Macy's, charmed by the brash ring of Gertrude Stein's Four Saints in Three Acts, was advertising its fall collection as "Four Suits in Three Acts" and the electric message running around the New York Times building in Times Square read: "Gertrude Stein has arrived in New York, Gertrude Stein has arrived in New York," ad infinitum.

There are no skillets in any Fifth Avenue department store! And Macy's have no goldfish.

Josephy, p. 145.

Alexander Woollcott claimed to have been born in Macy's show window.

Not long ago, I made my first pilgrimage to the MAC counter at Macy's, a minute "boutique" crowded with a throng of hungry women, their hands extended like starving refugees at a camp kitchen where they beseeched the Red Cross cosmeticians for a little eye shadow, a smidgen of brow gel or bronzer, a lip gloss to save a ding child. They stood there three and four deep, milling about impatiently, craning their necks, their eyes fixed greedily on elegant pyramids of eye shadows and ziggurats of compacts and black velvet powder puffs.

Harris, Diary, p. 16.

What I've found does the most good is just to get into a taxi and go to Tiffany's. It calms me down right away, the quietness and the proud look of it; nothing very bad could happen to you there, not with those kind men in their nice suits, and that lovely smell of silver and alligator wallets. If I could find a real-life place that made me feel like Tiffany's, then I'd buy some furniture and give the cat a name.

Capote, p. 40.
The city no longer needs to be constructed, which was Whitman’s self-appointed task. On the contrary it flirts, as Saks’s naming of the Metropolis shoe indicates, with its own teetering imbalance. Conrad, p. 201.

Or I go into, say, Saks Fifth Avenue, and there on a rack on wheels are two dozen five-thousand-dollar dresses. On a rack! It shocks me. I mean, first of all, to get through Saks is quite a performance. You get off the elevator; you’re in the wrong department; you turn and get back on the elevator. Then you get off again, past the lingerie, past the cosmetics, and on for miles through the shoe department, and then finally you get to the five-thousand-dollar dresses, dangling there, Oscar de la Rentas, Bill Blass, each next to the others on a rack. Of course, lots of people enjoy the variety. They go home empty-handed. But they’ve shopped. In Paris it’s a serious interval in one’s life—perhaps twice a year. It’s a pilgrimage. [Map]

Vreeland, DV, p. 135.

She was very fast, very efficient, and had never been caught. She was an expert at confusion—she would affix a Bendel tag, say, to an garment from Saks, then dispose of the Saks tags with a twist of the wrist quicker than a pit stop at the Grand Prix. [Crime]

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 366.

Kmart on Astor Place—an occupying space—with an irony harder than iron, in the original Wanamaker’s. It is a grim place to visit, with its fluorescent glare, its vast area marked but undivided, as though made for surveillance, its antitheatrical insistences: The stuff is here, and the stuff is as cheap as we can make it, or so these orchestrations suggest. The choice is now between Kmart and Prada, and the institutions that joined them together are finished. We’ve gone from shopping through trust to a culture of discounting and edge, and edge is the one thing that seems to baffle the department store.

Gopnik, p. 206.

I stopped in at a Woolworth store when I was walking down Nassau Street the other day. It was about two-thirty and the place looked as though a typhoon had been through it. The noon hour had been active and profitable. Paper lay ankle deep all over the floor—discarded paper bags, tattered labels, wrappings of one kind and another. A couple of men were attacking the wreckage with brooms. The salesclerks looked weary and pale. They were languidly trying to put their stock in order. The store still seemed to quiver with noise, and a few belated shoppers stood at the jewelry and cosmetic counters. At the belt counter (largest size carried, twenty-six) two young saleswomen were straightening out some black velvet, rhinestone-studded belts.

Atkinson, p. 97.

Shopping

For a long time everybody walked on the west side of Fifth Avenue and business houses scrambled to build there. Then, apparently because the east side of town became fashionable, the east side of Fifth Avenue began to thrive and now pedestrians prefer to do their window shopping there. Merchants actually count the walkers, so anybody from this time forth who seems to have to wedge his way along the west side of Fifth will know he is suffering from the delusion. Practically nobody walks there; the statisticians say so! [Street] [Flâneur]

Josephy, p. 61.

Archer walked down Fifth Avenue, past the shops with their windows full of dresses, coats and furs, and the women rushing in and out of the doors, their faces lit with the light of purchase. It is the new profession of the female sex, he thought—buying. If you wanted to set up an exhibition to show modern American women in their natural habitat, engaged in their most characteristic function, he thought, like the tableaux in the Museum of Natural History in which stuffed bears are shown against a background of caves, opening up honeycombs, you would have a set of stuffed women, slender, high-heeled, rouged, waved, hot-eyed, buying a cocktail dress in a department store. In the background, behind the salesgirls and the racks and shelves, there would be bombs bursting, cities crumbling, scientists measuring the half-life of tritium and radioactive cobalt. The garment would be democratically medium-priced and the salesgirl would be just as pretty as the customer and, to the naked eye at least, just as well dressed, to show that the benefits of a free society extended from one end of the economic spectrum to the other. One goes into the room—but the resources of the English language would be much put to the stretch, and whole flights of words would need to wing their way illegitimately into existence before a woman could say what happens when she goes into a room. The rooms differ so completely; they are calm or thunderous; open on to the sea, or, on the contrary, give on to a prison yard; are hung with washing; or alive with opals and silks; are hard as horsehair or soft as feathers. [Textuality] [Apocalypse] [Mannequin]

Lefebvre, Critique, p. 28.

What was once a living is now an empty routine. Memories and hopes are buried among the jumble. Wives have passed on. Sitting outside the doorway, looking back over fifty, maybe sixty, summers passed this way, the old shopkeepers remember another age as the young go by in their satin shorts.

Blandford, p. 118.

Shop-girl "refinement" is based upon a clever imitation of genuine refinement. To imitate the "real thing" exaggeration is necessary; so that the "swell" shop-girl is refined in head-lines, so to speak. The subtle refinement, which is the real thing, would have no effect in the store. It must be sharp and screaming to be noticed in the crowd. Shop girl refinement is like stage scenery—unreal, but prominent and obvious. It must be seen. It can not escape the crowd.

Hapgood, p. 127.

There is hardly a single weird store left on Broadway from Forty-second Street to Forty-sixth Street—hardly a single place in which a peculiar passion seems to have committed itself to a peculiar product. [Gentrification]

Gopnik, p. 220.

All buildings used by diamond merchants in Forty-seventh Street between Fifth Avenue and the Avenue of the Americas are single-ended. Diamond men will not operate in a structure that might give thieves easy run-through from one street to another. [Crime]

Berger, New York, p. 20.
Madison Square as a giddy havoc of shoppers engaged in sportive contest with the wind. [Air] Conrad, p. 87.

Along the traditional shopping roads from Broadway on the Upper West Side to the narrow lanes of the Lower East Side. Blandford, p. 117.

Your grandmother, middle-aged madame, bought her crinolines and basques in Canal Street; your mother her shirt-waists and brush braid in the Ladies’ Mile between Union Square and Madison Square; you purchase your transparent hose and your sport sweaters in the Woman’s City above Thirty-fourth Street. And it is not unlikely that your great-granddaughter will shop for her synthetic diamonds and her Tibetan sandals in this identical spot. Irwin, p. 183-4.

The department-store nearest the corner of Fourteenth Street and Fifth Avenue, very fashionable once, then exceedingly cheap and “common”; and now, with the recrudescence of the district, growing smart again. Ibid., p. 122.

But reason doesn’t animate the retail trade, impulse does, and on Broadway from 14th Street south to Houston there may be more unchecked impulse than in any location outside the Pentagon. There are several latitudes here and several economies at work. For present purposes Broadway begins at Mays, the world capital of nylon tricot shells, and ends at Getty’s gas station on Houston, where Don Henry stores his squeegee when he’s not in traffic smearing windshields for a quarter. The northern reach of this stretch is given over to the wholesale antiquarians and the limousine trade. On any given afternoon rafts of decorators pilot clients from Biedermeier chair to Georgian fall-front secretary to (if they’re hip and under 40) 1905 Venetian glass vases. Piped Belgian loafer shoes line up outside Hyde Park, the smartest of the antiquarians, docilely waiting to be buzzed in. You hear a lot of Texan spoken, although rarely to the one-legged mendicant who works the corner of 13th... It’s Broadway south of 8th that’s changed most radically and developed headlong into a boutique strip whose hip graphics and pop colorations seem like the latest gleeful ripple of retailing fashion, but are in fact an emblem of political cynicism in a city whose social fabric is threadbare. Between 8th Street and Houston you can flog your disposable income at spin-art T-shirts, parachute pants, Bermuda shorts, short shorts, droll “modernist” postcards, prewashed button-fly jeans, modishly tattered corselets, then stop off for a tuna-stuffed avocado or perhaps a serving of thinnest carpaccio drizzled with virgin olive oil and flaked with aged Parmesan. While you’re at it, you can mentally or morally or visually engage one of the people intended by the graffitist who stenciled “People Starve on this Block” outside Caramba!! Or you can just turn your chair to the window and order another blue margarita. Trebay, p. 75.

In my neighborhood, traffic was in chaos this week because some kind of street fair was in full swing. Someone explained that the same objects are offered for sale at all New York’s open-air markets. The vendors simply pretend that they and their wares are Italian one week, Ukrainian the next, and so on all summer long.
Its gutters are emporia, where the trinkets don’t have price tags. It’s a place where commodities, surfacing again after death, have their second coming in the bazaars of Canal Street.

Red Devil paint, Cat’s Paw soles and heels, Griffin All-Black might still exist, but I don’t see them anymore. Nor do I see beers called Trommers White Label, Ruppert’s, and Rheingold, candies called Sky Bars, Houten’s, and B-B Bats. And for young men going out on dates, a repulsively flavored package of licorice microchips called Sen-Sen that is guaranteed to keep your breath sweet while kissing.

The men are smoking Fatimas and Wings.

In the candy stores, they are selling loosies (2 cents apiece, two for 3), mel-o-rolls, Nibs, hard car’mels, Bonomo Turkish taffy, long pretzels, Mission Bell grape and Frank’s orange soda, twists, egg creams, lime rickeys, and a nice 2-cents plain.

And here you always have spaldeens. An endless supply. Pink and fresh and beautiful.

Midtown takes up only one square mile, not much more space than many a regional shopping mall.

The place where the greatest numbers of choices are available in the smallest geographical area.

and I don’t see anything that I want

False choice in spectacular abundance.

City that orders without looking at the prices.

An index of consumption: How many millionaires are there in the city? How much does land cost per square inch on Wall Street? What’s the lucrative length of Fifth Avenue.

Shouters, sales boosters, sales executives, sales girls, sales bodies, sales women, sales scientists, sales resistance, sales softening, sales campaigns, sales organizations, sales philosophy, sales religions, sales happiness, sales ecstasy, sale singing, sale stories, sales poetry, sales plugs, and no sales; all are in and of our city of the cash.

Reisenberg, p. 203.

On August 6, 1979, I hit the street clutching a $10 bill. With that sum ($9.98, to be precise) I bought three slices of pizza, a can of Welch’s Strawberry Soda, a pack of Viceroy, six joints, two quarts of orange juice, two containers of yogurt, and a pint of milk. For some reason I was moved to enter those details in my notebook. I often revisited the entry. On May 29, 1981, I noted that the shopping list would cost around $12 at current prices. On March 24, 1983, the sum had risen to $13.50, and a year later to $15. On August 2, 1986, I calculated the cost as $39–35–loose joints were rare on the street, and by then a dime bag of marijuana yielded about two joints. On December 1, 1990, the cost had reached $72–$12 minus the marijuana. On March 28, 1993, I figured it had attained $92.75, or $22.75 for everything but the pot.

Sante, “Commerce,” p. 111.

Thus it runs, mostly, throughout the entire region on this joyous occasion, a wealth of feeling and desire expressing itself through the thinnest and most meager material forms. About the shops and stores where the windows are filled with cheap displays of all that is considered luxury, are hosts of other children scarcely so satisfactorily supplied, peering earnestly into the world of make-believe and illusion, the wonder of it not yet eradicated from their unsophisticated hearts.

Dreiser, p. 282.

In talking about a social setting such as a fashionable New York store, it is possible to speak of someone present as being properly or improperly dressed for the time and place.

Goffman, p. 23.

About June our stores begin to mention autumn merchandise. Then, about September, they begin to nag about Christmas. As soon as Christmas is past, they sing die praises of spring. Seldom does anybody settle down to endure winter. “Once Christmas is past, spring is nearly here,” New Yorkers tell one another. It’s nothing of the kind, of course, but we have a blind spot for winter. Only the most beat-up kind of winter merchandise is available in the stores, even in January. “Spring stocks, of course,” say the haughty salesgirls. It’s a New York mania.

Atkinson, p. 23.

A world of retailing rather than a world of production.

Every street is dotted and spangled with shops to lure the office workers’ salary.

Atkinson, p. 95.

Necktie bargains, the razor-blade transformers, the empty non-pickable purses, the blood tonic and iron cement and manhood pills, are offered for a mere pittance, together with wonderful devices that improve the radio set and purify the air.

Reisenberg, p. 154.
It was characteristic that the vast railroad terminals suggested neither arrivals nor departures, that the trains which justified their erection were buried far underground. Immense public concourses with labyrinthine arcades of shops.
Morris, Incredible, p. 289.

The precincts of New York retailing, Fifth Avenue, Broadway, and Soho, became, as many people noted, mall-like themselves, with a predictable range of national boutiques and a predictable effect on the department stores, which continued to "make" the neighborhoods and continued to lose market share.
Gopnik, p. 205.

In his [Harvey Wiley Corbett] scheme for elevated and arcades walkways (first proposed 1923), the entire ground plane of the city—now a chaos of all modes of transportation—would gradually be surrendered solely to automotive traffic. Trenches in this plane would allow fast traffic to rush through the metropolis even faster. If cars needed more room again, the edges of existing buildings could be set back to create still larger areas for circulation.

On the second story pedestrians walk along arcades carved out of the buildings. The arcades form a continuous network on both sides of streets and avenues; bridges provide its continuity. Along the arcades, shops and other public facilities are embedded in the buildings.
[Architecture] [Ferriss]
Koolhaas, p. 120.

Someday I'm going to take a big shopping bag and five dollars and set myself adrift on Park Place.
Atkinson, p. 98.

Warm, desultory, idle, pleasure-grabbing, but also clean and safe.

Street

Posing for the sidewalk as if the plate glass were a proscenium.

Has there ever been s designer's runway that produced better fashion than a city sidewalk?
Frisa, p. 271.

"Everything in fashion begins in the street," Diane von Fürstenberg once observed.
Ibid., p. 271

Avenues of lovely women and clean-cut men.
Reisenberg, p. 205.

City of shirt fronts and backless vests.
Ibid., p. 206.

City of anklets, bracelets, slave chains, solitaires, tiaras.
Ibid., p. 208.
It is not nature that decrees the seasons in Manhattan but the wardrobe of its inhabitants.
Bladford, p. 28.

In summer, people do not dress for those whom they are off to meet but for those whom they might get to know along the way. It becomes a city of bright plumage, of exotic creatures dipping and diving along the sidewalks, each flashing colour and consciousness. If there are any drab, mousy relics of good taste, garbed in discreet and sensible cottons, they vanish into concrete undergrowth. Summer in Manhattan is a neon moment that dazzles and delights.
Ibid., p. 114.

In summer they dress too warmly, in winter they wear too little.
Ibid., p. 139.

Raincoats are IN . . . even if it's sunny.
"Fashion at the Top," N. pag.

People dressed in plastic bags
Directing traffic
Some kind of fashion
Rolling Stones, "Shattered."

Cruising up Madison, stopping at a light in front of Barneys, and Bill Cunningham snaps my picture, yelling out, "Is that a Vespa?" and I give him thumbs-up.
Ellis, Glamorama, p. 20.

I go to work in sensible heels, a conservative pleated skirt, and a white blouse with a floppy bow but I walk around my apartment wearing my wigs and panties.
Harris, Diary p. 54.

Lovecraft's sartorial tastes and epic pursuit of the best suit at the lowest price deserves an essay all of their own. He put an enormous amount of effort into the presentation of his public personality, but it was only in small details of dress that this was manifest. He refused to change the style of his suits to accommodate fashion, and felt that sloppy dressing was heralding a new distinctly American style that would presage the decline of the West.
Haden, p. 49.

And finally there was the matter of Vernon's pants. They were worn out when I met him. Now, a year later they are still worn out. In the course of the year they have been sewn together, patched, studded, and, for all I know, lithographed, into a veritable harlequinade of fabric and leather improvisation. Other people might work on a diary, Vernon worked on his pants, and like artists before him, he went through various periods. During the time that he and I were lovers, he was in his leather and silver-stud period. From there, under the influence of a horde of Puerto Ricans, he went into a flowered print period. He's now back on solid colors, like late Matisse.
Hamilton, pp. 30-1.

For here comes one whose clothes are good but tasteless, or dirty; and I would not have his taste or his dirt.
Dreiser, p. 78.
A pair of sleek shoes with buttoned spats on the subway: these are not proletarian feet. Collins, p. 296.

Raymond Loewy designs an advertisement in 1927 for a new shoe called Metropolis. An athletic female nude holds a sample in the air on top of a pyramidal pile of skyscrapers, the sky behind her raked with searchlights. The shoe’s a metonym for the buildings, and the comparison associates architectural vertigo with the stratagems of sexual enticement, since the high heel is the female’s signal to the male that she won’t be able to outrun him. [Advertising] Conrad, p. 201.

A dedicated observer could pause at a Manhattan corner—say, Eighth Street and Broadway—and snap a mental picture later to be diagrammed for the unconscious influences on parade—of social currents and movements, from hippies to Black Panthers to feminists and homosexuals. Frisa, p. 271

There is the athletic sock. For quite a long time, this striped tube of white stretch cotton has signified not just the dregs of unfashionable dressing, but also a pretty intractable marker of class. Tube socks have always conjured images of clothes sold from binds to people not likely to have heard of Coco Chanel, much less the darlings of style cognoscenti like Alexander McQueen or Nicholas Ghesquière. That was before a group of young urbanites got hold of the tube sock and subjected it to what in theoretical circles might be called a critique. Deciding that its lack of cool was in itself a kind of cool, and not altogether an ironic one, they put the tube sock back into fashionable circulation. Ibid., p. 271.

His suit would have been snappy in Harlem, edged with sharp pleats and creases. Spillane, p. 157.

Off the train, I’d go through that Grand Central Station afternoon rush-hour crowd, and many white people simply stopped in their tracks to watch me pass. The drape and the cut of a zoot suit showed to the best advantage if you were tall—and I was over six feet. My conk was fire-red. I was really a clown, but my ignorance made me think I was “sharp.” My knob-toed, orange-colored “kick-up” shoes were nothing but Florsheims, the ghetto’s Cadillac of shoes in those days. X, p. 78.

Over all these fur coats of fox, sable, mink, beaver, leopard, and maybe even chipmunk and polar bear. Pull mine out. Woven from sheep on the outer Hebrides. Donleavy, N. pag.

One night, I found a beautiful Russian sable coat neatly folded over a railing outside a brownstone in the Village. Someone was probably getting in a cab to go to the airport or somewhere and forgot it. It fit me like a glove, and it looked fantastic. It was one of those magic things, like it was meant to be mine. Highberger, p. 53.
On Fordham Road, a 200 pound woman clutches a Fendi bag to her bosom like Alberich’s gold. Three pairs of door-knocker earrings just from her small ears beneath a rich crop of Senegalese corkscrews. The woman peers at the window of a discount appliance shop where a bank of televisions show 18 Tina Turners strutting by gas-guzzling Plymouth automobiles. The woman cackles, tosses her head back, addresses the strangers who happen at that moment to be sharing her air. “Tina Turner is my girl! Don’t have to talk. Don’t have to sing. Don’t have to dance, do nothing. All she has to do is get out there and walk that mad, mad walk!”
Trebay, p. 8.

Just before nine and just after five, the very pavement runs brimful with office people, hurrying between the ferry and their jobs. And on any late afternoon, you are likely to encounter a group in peasant costumes of Italy or Hungary or the Tyrol, making their way northward with a chattering escort in stiffly worn American clothes. Irwin, p. 24.

New Yorkers wear the softest lambswool and silken fur as though they were breastplates. Bladford, p. 81.

The new ideology was Jane Jacobs dressed in latex and leather. Gopnik, p. 217.

Lingerie sold in sex shops seems constructed to fall apart within the first half hour. Yet it costs many times the price of lingerie sold in department stores. It is ironic that a pair of crotchless pants winds up being so much more expensive than cotton briefs. Califia, p. 221.

Trousers with one leg rolled the way Rikers Island inmates used to wear them. Frisa, p. 270.

Model

Modeling Todd’s new ‘70s-influenced punk/New Wave/Asia-meets-East-Village line are Kate Moss paired with Marky Mark, David Boals with Bernadette Peters, Jason Priestley with Anjanette, Adam Clayton with Naomi Campbell, Kyle MacLachlan with Linda Evangelista, Christian Slater with Christy Turlington, a recently slimmed-down Simon Le Bon with Yasmin Le Bon, Kirsty Hume with Donovan Leitch, plus a mix of new models—Shalom Harlow (paired with Baxter fucking Priestly), Stella Tennant, Amber Valletta—and some older ones including Chloe, Kristen McMenamy, Beverly Peele, Patricia Hartman, Eva Herzigova, along with the prerequisite male models: Scott Benoit, Rick Dean, Craig Palmer, Markus Schenkenberg, Nikitas, Tyson... In the audience I’m able to spot Anna Wintour, Carrie Donovan, Holly Brubach, Catherine Deneuve, Faye Dunaway, Barry Diller, David Geffen, Ian Schrager, Peter Gallagher, Wim Wenders, Andre Leon Talley, Brad Pitt, Polly Mellon, Kal Ruttenstein, Katia Sassoon, Carré Otis, RuPaul, Fran Lebowitz, Winona Ryder (who doesn’t applaud as we walk by), René Russo, Sylvester Stallone, Patrick McCarthy, Sharon Stone, James Truman, Fern Mallis. Music selections include Sonic Youth, Cypress Hill, Go-Go’s, Stone Temple Pilots, Swing Out Sister, Dionne Warwick, Psychic TV and Wu-Tang Clan... It’s freezing backstage even with all the lights from the video crews, and huge clouds of secondhand smoke are billowing over the crowd. A long table is covered with white roses and Skyy martinis and bottles of Moët and shrimp and cheese straws and hot dogs and bowls of jumbo strawberries. Old B-52 records blare, followed by Happy Mondays and then Pet Shop Boys, and Boris Beynet and Mickey Hardt are dancing. Hairstylists, makeup artists, mid-level transvestites, department store presidents, florists, buyers from London or Asia or Europe, are all running around, being chased by Susan Sarandon’s kids. Spike Lee shows up along with Julian Schnabel, Yasmeen Ghauri Nadege, LL Cool J, Isabella Rossellini and Richard Tyler. [Celebrity] [Fame]

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 139.

Modelizers inhabit a sort of parallel universe, with its own planets (Nobu, Bowery Bar, Tabac, Flowers, Tunnel, Expo, Metropolis) and satellites (the various apartments, many near Union Square, that the big modeling agencies rent for the models) and goddesses (Linda, Naomi, Christy, Elle, Bridget).

Bushnell, N. pag.

On the Tuesday before he died, Warhol still wasn’t well, so Paige Powell canceled a lunch for potential advertisers. That night, however, Warhol and Miles Davis were scheduled to model Koshin Satoh’s clothes at the Tunnel. And there was no way Andy Warhol could have tolerated an announcement that he was indisposed.

“Andy stood in a cold dressing room for hours, waiting to model,” says Stuart Pivar, a trustee of the New York Academy of Art and, for the past five years, Warhol’s best friend. “He was in terrible pain. You could see it in his face.” Still, Warhol went out and clowned his way through the show. Then he rushed backstage.

“Stuart, help. Get me out of here,” he gasped. “I feel like I’m gonna die.”

One of those long, lean, languid people who might’ve led me into the world of fashion, theater, decoration, and the outer reaches of High Culture.

Hamilton, p. 6.

He imagines that the young woman who walks Sixth Avenue, unkempt, and dressed in cheap, ill-fitting clothes, is an entirely different creature when he sees her powdered and perfumed, and dressed in the height of fashion, walking on Fifth Avenue, or lolling in the scented atmosphere of the Turkish room of a modern hotel.

Girdner, p. 38.

Flow, Circulation

An imitation from New York
You’re made in Japan
From cheese and chalk Sex Pistols, “New York.”

Before the war there may have been some excuse for a woman’s going to Europe for the purpose of adorning her person or her house. But since New York became a capricious gift of the gods financial capital of the world, her only excuse is the excitement of the trip. The most cunningly fabricate silks of Lyons come to our Woman’s City, either in the bolt or in the finished product of the Parisian modistes; the rarest furs of the Siberian steppes and the Hudson Bay forests; the filmiest laces of Brussels, Dublin, Le Puy, Venice; the bonanza discoveries of the South Sea pearl divers; the most cunning creation of the Quimper and Limoges potters. [Empire]

Irwin, p. 190.

The stories behind Wanamaker’s Oriental House would fill a book—the indefatigable buyers have been through innumerable plagues, civil wars, bandit raids. A woman brought back one of Wanamaker’s great treasures—a carved and painted Chinese screen from the Imperial Palace in Pekin, obtained after a six-month’s journey of 50,000 miles by train, steamer, camel-back and bullock cart through an area torn by civil war. The route list of such a buyer sounds like something from the voyages of Marco Polo—Seven Fountains in the Vale of Kashmir, Holy City of Benares, Pink City of Jaipur and golden road to Samarkand are stop-overs.

Josephy, p. 154-5.

Many a happy traveler, returning laden with treasure from the bazaars of Teheran or the street booths of Cairo, from the sidewalk displays of Java or the evil little cubbyholes of Pekin, from any foreign place at all, has found to his chagrin and astonishment that whatever was purchased so eagerly abroad could have been had in New York for less than the price paid elsewhere and with none of the nuisance of lugging the stuff home and easing it through the customs.

Atkinson, p. 125.

During many a single week, I daresay, more money is spent in New York on useless and evil things that would suffice to run the kingdom of Denmark for a year. New York, indeed, is the heaven of every variety of man with something useless and expensive to sell. There come the merchants with their bales of Persian prayer-rugs, of silk pajamas, of yellow girls, of strange jugs and carboys, of hand-painted oil-paintings, of old books, of gim-cracks and tinsel from all the four corners of the world, and there they find customers waiting in swarms, their checkbooks open and ready. What town in Christendom has ever supported so many houses of entertainment, so many mimes and mountebanks, so many sharper’s and coney-catchers, so many bawds and pimps, so many hat-holders and door-openers, so many miscellaneous servants to idleness and debauchery? One must go back to the oriental capitals of antiquity to find anything even remotely resembling it. Compared to the revels that go on in New York every night, the carnalities of the West End of Berlin are trivial and childish, and those of Paris and the Côte d’Azur take on the harmless aspect of a Sunday-school picnic.

Mencken, Chrestomathy, p. 181.

The late afternoon sun glitters on windshields, chauffeurs’ caps, on Parisian gowns, Chinese ivories, ebony from Africa, Mexican pottery, and furs from Siberia.

WPA, p. 50-51.

New York takes its place among the fabled cities of ancient times, treasure laden, filled to overflowing with gold, frankincense and myrrh, with jewels and costly raiment.

Atkinson, p. 142.
Jimmy Walker

Jimmy Walker as dandy: His tailor created unique clothes for his slight frame in which shirttails never became visible and “his clothes seemed to cling to him perfectly, no matter what his posture.” Walker’s single-button suit jackets (pinched at the waist), “toothpick”-pointed shoes, fedoras and derbys, narrow cravats, and garish colors received much notice. On a 1927 European vacation he toured Venice in “purple striped trousers and a green sweater” and arrived in Paris wearing a brown hat, “a tie of emerald and brown stripes, a blue shirt, a blue-striped suit, low black shoes, a beige sport coat, and, completing the picture, a lavender handkerchief with dashes of purple and brown protruding from his only coat pocket.”

The real mayor’s widely publicized short workdays were built around nocturnal activity. Usually rising at midday, Walker dispatched official business quickly. At sunset he presided at political conferences and public hearings and then began long nights at the theater, restaurants, and nightclubs. Walker did not frolic in public to make himself available to the populace. He was a claustrophobe who feared crowds and elevators; in nightclubs he specialized in grand entrances and exits, but otherwise isolated himself in private booths and hidden tables. Like the gambler Arnold Rothstein, another Broadway habitué, Walker was a hypochondriac who inhabited his body uncomfortably.

He was also strikingly passive. He went to baseball games, he confessed in a revealing interview, “because there I found the thing I liked best—a game, the drama, the spectacle, the emotions of human-beings.” “When I go to the theatre I do not go to criticize. I go to be entertained. I give myself over to the player, and I do not want to see the inconsistency in the plot. I want to live in that make-believe world, the theatre … Broadway is nothing but the world passing in review.”

Walker was a 1920s New York version of a flâneur. He loved public display and artifice; he disdained personal intimacy. Walker’s individuality was bound up in the generally passive consumption ethic of the era of Broadway shows and the cinema. The passivity of spectatorship militated against the nightclubs’ encouragement of customer participation, but it also suggested that even in clubs, individuals might retreat into their own private subjectivities. Mayor Walker, for his part, reveled in keeping a safe physical distance from other people in order to gain the most pleasure from their social and artistic performances. [Flâneur] Peretti, pp. 53-4.

Just turned forty-five, but with the appearance of a man still in his early thirties. His hair is black, thick and unruly. His eyes are dark and restless. He has the slim build of a cabaret dancer, of a gigolo of the Montmartre. He dresses in the ultra advanced fashion redolent of the tenderloin. He is a native New Yorker, smokes cigarettes continuously, has a vast contempt for the Volstead Act, and reads nothing but the sporting pages. He knows the speakeasies, the hotels and the nightclubs. If Alfred E. Smith comes from the sidewalks of New York, Jimmy Walker comes from the dance floors. [Prohibition] Lerner, p. 161.
Walker blended public and private business in a new and theatrical way.
Peretti, p. 55.

The nightclub mayor.
Ibid., p. 55.

He claimed it was a sin to go to bed on the same day you got up.
Sharpe, p. 6.

He gained fame for rising regularly at noon.
Peretti, p. 8.

Walker confessed, "I've read not more than fifteen books cover to cover."
Ellis, Darkness, p. 525.

When Republicans in the Senate proposed a Clean Books Bill in 1923, Walker famously ridiculed it, telling his fellow Senators, "I have never yet heard of a girl being ruined by a book."
Lerner, p. 163.

Walker vacationed extensively, missed work frequently, and raised his own salary from $25,000 to $40,000.
Ibid., p. 168.

Walker was caught in a gambling raid at the Montauk Island Club, mistress at his side, and unsuccessfully tried to sneak out disguised as a waiter.
Ibid., p. 168.

Diana Vreeland

I can't stand the vulgarity of a woman who makes a noise when she walks—it's o.k. for soldiers, but, when I was growing up, the quintessence of breeding in a lady was a quiet footstep.
Vreeland Papers, NYPL.

Maintenance is so essential. I mean that is what we are lacking today. Nobody maintains anything—not the insides of cabs or beautiful floors and walls. Beautiful buildings are torn down; there are potholes in the streets; people don't maintain their clothes so they have to go out and buy something new.
Ibid.

And whatever you do, don't try to make it grammatical! Don't forget the dots and dashes! As this is entirely a visual age… [Textuality]
Ibid.

I never wore clothes from Seventh Avenue myself, you understand. I always kept a totally European view of things. Maybe that's why I was so appreciated there. I was independent. In those days, don't forget, fashion traveled very slowly. When I arrived back in this country after the war started, I couldn't believe what I saw. In the summer, every woman wore diamond clips on crêpe de chine dresses. And they all wore silk stockings—this was before nylons—under these hideous strappy high heels. This is in the summer, you understand—in the country. It was unbelievable.
Vulgarity is a very important ingredient in life. I’m a great believer in vulgarity—if it’s got vitality. A little bad taste is like a nice splash of paprika. We all need a splash of bad taste—it’s hearty, it’s healthy, it’s physical. I think we could use more of it. No taste is what I’m against.

Vreeland, DV, p. 122.

What catches my eye in a window is the hideous stuff—the junk. Plastic ducks! [Window Display]
Vreeland, DV, p. 163.

Unshined shoes are the end of civilization.
Vreeland Papers, NYPL.

I’m mad about her nose. A nose without strength is a pretty poor performance. It’s the one thing you hold against someone today. If you’re born with too small a nose, the one thing you want to do is build it up.

Ibid.

The girl’s legs in the picture were superb, but she was quite thick around the middle and her face was ghastly. So I said, “The legs are great but as for the face—forget it! Let’s use just the legs and combine them with this torso and that…”

Ibid.

I approve of plastic surgery. None of my friends can understand why I haven’t done it myself. I have my own reasons. But the only point is, now it’s as normal as taking an aspirin. Whereas only fifteen years ago. [Body in the City]

Ibid.

Then, at Vogue… I really went to town! I put legs and arms and heads and everything else together… to give the perfect whole. And I was the world’s greatest retoucher. A girl moving looked the way I’d retouch her standing still. I never took out fewer than two ribs. [Media]

Ibid.

They couldn’t publish half the things I did on Vogue. I remember Elliott Erwitt did some pictures for us of an eye-lift operation. That was a scene. The pictures were shown to various members of the staff. One left immediately to throw up, others were gagging and carrying on, others… these were professional women working on a woman’s magazine, you understand—not a gaggle of housewives. It was un-believable!

Now most of what looked like blood was Mercurochrome, because it’s a special operation where the knife almost heals the blood flow, and the pictures were marvelous. [Photography]

Ibid.

Fashion

The late Forties were the golden years of the fashion magazines when they were among the liveliest publications in America and provided a haven for the new and daring. A handful of powerful European-born art directors and designers developed a new, sophisticated, Bauhaus-influenced commercial art that was strikingly graphic and visually alive.

Bockris, Warhol, p. 81.

Like artichokes, women were covered by layer after layer of clothing—chemise, drawers, corset, corset cover, and one or more petticoats. Skirts were so long that they merely showed the tip of the shoe. Ladies exposed much more of their bosoms for a formal evening on the town, but during the day they wore shirtwaists with high collars. It was considered fashionable for well-dressed women to walk in such a forward-sloping position that they seemed to be falling forward. Gentlemen wore blue serge suits most of the time, and only dudes put on garters. Men’s shoes had tips as sharp as toothpicks. In hot weather, men might remove their jackets in their offices, but never, never were they allowed to take off their vests. To appear hatless, whatever the season, was unthinkable. Men wore derby hats in winter and hard straw hats in the summer.

Ellis, Darkness, p. 459.

The raising of hemlines, rooflines, and consciousness proceeded in concert.

Hawes, N. pag.

By mid-November 1929, women’s hemlines, which had risen dramatically in the early 1920s and fluctuated nervously throughout the decade somewhere around the knee, dropped conclusively to the lower calf. Breasts and waists reappeared. Recently mandatory “bobs” seemed to grow out overnight; the back of the neck was once again a secret. Young women no longer looked freightless, no longer seemed designed for the possibilities of sudden and violent motion. They aspired to “glamour” (a word that came in big in the early 1930s); they had reacquired mass… Langston Hughes now denounced as “Bunk!” the notion on which the Harlem Renaissance had been founded, that “art could break down color lines and prevent lynching.” “There is no cure… in poetry or art … for unemployment… civic, neglect, and capitalistic exploitation.”

Early one afternoon in 1913, a young New York debutante named Mary Phelps Jacob sat quietly in her boudoir trying to decide which dress she would wear to a dance that evening. Exasperated at the thought of once again being harnessed into her stiff, heavily starched whalebone corset, she decided to give some more consideration to a more comfortable alternative. Apparently, she understood the important role necessity plays in the process of invention and set about devising a replacement for this constricting undergarment. With two handkerchiefs, some baby ribbon, and the assistance of her French maid, Miss Jacob invented the prototype of today’s modern brassiere.

This new method of support not only left the midriff free for the important requirement of breathing, but also eliminated the rounded artificial look of the low-fronted bosom, popular since Edwardian times, and gave the breasts a more natural separation. The new Backless Bra, as Miss Jacob called her invention was an overnight success. In November, 1914 she was granted a patent.

Naumann, p. 8

Dorothy Parker writing ad copy for women’s underwear at Vogue: “Brevity is the soul of lingerie.”
The Straw Hat Riot of 1922 spread due to people wearing straw hats past the unofficial date that was deemed socially acceptable, September 15th. In the early 20th century, there was an unwritten rule that one was not supposed to wear straw hats past September 15th. This date was arbitrary; it had earlier been September 1st, but it eventually shifted to mid-month. If someone was seen wearing a straw hat, they were, at minimum, subjecting themselves to ridicule, and it was a tradition for youths to knock straw hats off of wearers’ heads and stomp on them. This tradition was well established, and newspapers of the day would often warn people of the impending approach of the fifteenth, when people would have to switch to felt hats. The riot itself began on September 13th of 1922, two days before the supposed unspoken date, when a group of youths decided to get an early jump on the tradition. This group began in the former “Mulberry Bend” area of Manhattan by removing and stomping hats worn by factory workers who were employed in the area. The more innocuous stomping turned into a brawl when the youths tried to stomp a group of dock workers’ hats, and the dock workers fought back. The brawl soon stopped traffic on the Manhattan Bridge and was eventually broken up by police, leading to some arrests. Although the initial brawl was broken up by police, the fights continued to escalate the next evening. Gangs of teenagers prowled the streets wielding large sticks, sometimes with a nail driven through the top, looking for pedestrians wearing straw hats and beating those who resisted. Several men were hospitalized from the beatings they received after resisting having their hats taken, and many arrests were made. The tradition of hat smashing continued for some time after the riots of 1922, although they marked the worst occurrence of hat smashing. In 1924, one man was murdered for wearing a straw hat. 1925 saw similar arrests made in New York. The tradition died out along with the tradition of the seasonal switch from straw to felt hats. [Unrest]

“Straw Hat Riot.” N. pag.

City Has Wild Night of Straw Hat Riots

Gangs of young hoodlums ran while in various parts of the city last night, smashing unseasonable straw hats and trampling them in the street. In some cases, mobs of hundreds of boys and young men terrorized whole blocks. Complaints poured in upon the police from men whose hats were stolen and destroyed but as soon as the police broke up the gangs in one district, the hoodlums resumed their activities elsewhere.

A favorite practice of the gangsters was to arm themselves with sticks, some with nails at the tip, and compel men wearing straw hats to run a gauntlet. Sometimes the hoodlums would hide in doorways and dash out, ten or twelve strong to attack one or two men. Along Christopher Street, on the lower west side, the attackers lined up along the surface car tracks and yanked straw hats off the passengers as the cars passed.

The streets where such incidents occurred were strewn with broken hats. Hat stores which kept open last night were crowded with purchasers of fall hats.

The complaint was made of a gang swarming on an open street car and attacking the passengers to get their hats. A man who said he was E.C. Jones, a promoter of 70 West Ninety-third Street, telephoned to THE TIMES that this happened when he was riding uptown on an Amsterdam Avenue car between 135th and 136th Street about 9 o’clock last night. He said the car was attacked by a group of boys who later disappeared in a mob of about 1,000 who were destroying straw hats along Amsterdam Avenue. Jones said he complained at the West 152nd Street Station and the mob was dispersed.

[...]

At Madison and Thompson Streets a boy knocked off a man’s hat with a long stick. Then other boys kicked the hat along the street until it reached another boy, waiting to jump on it...

“City Has Wild,” N. pag.

The clerks and stenographers of lower New York were among the first to show the metamorphosis. The postwar male shaved early and often; he wore white collars or even more fashionable blue ones; he looked more like the clothing advertisements than would seem to be humanely possible. The postwar female was engaged in an epochal struggle for youth. The result, of course was a good deal of ridiculousness: old faces on young bodies, young faces on old bodies, fat legs in thin stockings, wide hips in narrow skirts, nobody old, nobody young, more grotesqueness than beauty; but withal a modicum of sense.

Ironically, as fashions became “more revealing”, the “fevered conjecture” that so “fired the imagination” of the City’s sidewalk “ankle connoisseurs”, undoubtedly lost some of its former “heat”. Today’s styles are more “in your face”, but all these 8-inch heeled 6’3” women with anatomically enhanced “nearly everything”, barely constrained or covered, while “thrilling at a distance”, seem somehow “less approachable” as they get closer.

It took quite a time to allure the dandies of the Seventies and Eighties away from the cast-iron “shield” bosom shirt that would deflect a bullet. It opened only at the back and had a tab on it with a button-hole for some mysterious purpose connected with underwear... Once freed from the yoke of this armorial garment we swing to the other extreme and men’s shirtwaists appeared in the shop windows with no sign of mob violence. the shirtwaist brought the belt in place of suspenders and removed this unsightly blot on the landscape, to the further advancement in popularity of the shirtwaist.

Brown, Valentine’s, pp. 24-5.

60s-80s

Paraphernalia opened late in ’65, and another trend started—stores opening late in the morning, even noontime, and staying open till maybe ten at night. Paraphernalia sometimes stayed open till maybe ten at night. Paraphernalia sometimes stayed open till two in the morning. You’d go in and try on things and “Get Off My Cloud” would be playing—and you’d be buying the clothes in the same atmosphere you’d probably be wearing them in. And the salespeople in the little boutiques were always so hip and relaxed, as if the stores were just another room in their apartment—they’d sit around, read magazines, watch TV, smoke dope.

Warhol, POPism, p. 73.

Boutiques started opening up around St. Mark’s Place, and used fur coat places and, of course, Limbo. Limbo was the most popular place in the area, because it was basically army-navy surplus (at first) and all the kids had started wearing military clothes. I recall an item in Howard Smith’s Voice column about Limbo’s selling strategy / psychology—it said a lot about the way kids were thinking: the store couldn’t sell a bunch of funny-looking black hats, so one morning they made a sign that said, “Polish Rabbis’ Hats” and they were sold out by that afternoon.

Ibid., p. 206.

Tiger Morse opened her tiny new boutique called Teeny Weeny on upper Madison Avenue at the end of August. Her policy there was man-made materials only—vinyl, Mylar, sequins. There were mirror bricks all over the walls. Wherever I saw fragmented mirrors like that around a place, I’d take the hint that there was amphetamine not too far away—every A-head’s apartment always had broken mirrors, smoky, chipped, fractured, whatever—just like the Factory did. And Tiger did take a lot of amphetamine. She always boasted, “I am living proof that speed does not kill.”

A little bit later Tiger got the backing of some big company to design a line of pajamas and nightgowns for them, and to launch that, she gave a big party at the Henry Hudson Baths on West 57th Street that was sort of a fashion show “happening” around the pool, with models walking out onto the diving board, sometimes diving in, sometimes just turning around and walking back. As I said, it was Tiger who made happenings pop, turning them from something artistic into big parties. She’d stand around in her silver jeans and huge sunglasses, having a ball herself. People got so drunk they jumped into the pool with all their clothes on and then later tried to dive to the bottom for things like wallets that had fallen out of their pockets.

I’d done a few movie sequences with Tiger at her old boutique, Kaleidoscope, on East 58th Street, above Reuben’s Restaurant, where she had about six seamstresses sewing for her and hundreds of jars of beads and sequins all around. Before that she’d sold her clothes out of a house on 63rd Street near Madison. In those days she did very expensive, chic, silk-and-satin brocade-and-lamé-type designs for women who wanted nicely made couture-type dresses—a little froufrou sometimes—the kind of outfits that would have a hand-stitched lining that was more elaborate than the dress itself. Then Tiger went off to England, and after she came back she went plastic and started to make dresses out of shower curtains. Eventually she took over the Cheetah boutique on Broadway, right outside the club—it stayed open as late as Cheetah did, and people would just pop in and buy new disco clothes on their way in to dance.

Tiger designed that famous dress that said “Love” on the front and “Hate” on the back. And she did dresses that lit up on the dance floor, only there would always be some problem with the technology—the lights wouldn’t work or the batteries would be dead, etc. Women used to have old-fashioned problems like slips hanging and bra straps showing, but now there was this whole new slew of problems.

I’ve heard people say, “Tiger Morse was a fraud.” Well, of course she was, but she was a real fraud. She’d make up more stories about herself for the newspapers than I did. Nobody knew where she came from, really, but who cared? She was an original, and she showed a lot of people how to have fun. [Amphetamine]

Ibid., p. 223.

An editor was describing to me how when you were sent clothes from a designer’s showroom, you were usually sent the clothes neatly wrapped—period. When Tiger sent something over, you got the dress as well as the misplaced cotton ball or syringe cap.

Brandes, N. pag.
Morse took a native African cloth, Kanga, put it in a tank of vinyl, and made unique clothes out of it.

_Ibid._

Morse said, “I’m making dresses that make noises, I’m making dresses that whisper, dresses that smell.”

“Tiger Morse,” N. pag.

One of Tiger’s sayings, “I am living proof that speed does _not_ kill” came to be sadly ironic in 1972. She passed away from an overdose of sleeping pills. [Drugs]

_Ibid._

Max’s became the showcase for all the fashion changes that had been taking place at the art openings and shows: now people weren’t going to the art openings to show off their new looks—they just skipped all the preliminaries and went straight to Max’s. Fashion wasn’t what you wore someplace anymore; it was the whole reason for going. The event itself was optional—the way Max’s functioned as a fashion gallery proved that. Kids would crowd around the security mirror over the night deposit slot in the bank next door (“Last mirror before Max’s”) to check themselves out for the long walk from the front door, past the bar, past all the fringe tables in the middle, and finally into the club room in the back. [Downtown/Max’s]

Warhol, _POPism_, p. 236.

Pop fashion really peaked about now—a glance around the Gymnasium could tell you that. It was the year of the electric dress—vinyl with a hip-belt battery pack—and there were lopsided hemlines everywhere, silver-quilted minidresses, “microminiskirts” with kneesocks, Paco Rabanne’s dresses of plastic squares linked together with little metal rings, lots and lots of Nehru collars, crocheted skirts over tights—to give just the idea of a skirt. There were big hats and high boots and short furs, psychedelic prints, 3-D appliqués, still lots of colored, textured tights and bright-colored patent leather shoes. The next big fashion influence—nostalgia—wouldn’t come till August, when Bonnie and Clyde came out, but right now everything mod-mini-madcap that had been building up since ’64 was full-blown.

Something extremely interesting was happening in men’s fashions, too—they were starting to compete in glamour and marketing with women’s fashions, and this signaled big social changes that went beyond fashion into the question of sex roles. Now a lot of the men with fashion awareness who’d been frustrated for the last couple of years telling their girl friends what to wear could start dressing themselves up instead. It was all so healthy, people finally doing what they really wanted, not having to fake it by having an opposite-sex person around to act out their fantasies for them—now they could get right out there and be their own fantasies.

Skirts were getting so short and dresses so cut-out and see-through that if girls had still been the sexy Playboy or Russ Meyer types, there might have been attacks all over the streets. But instead, to counteract all these super-sexy clothes, to cool down the effect of, say, microminis, the kids had new take-it-or-leave-it attitudes about sex. The new-style girl in ’67 was Twiggy or Mia Farrow—boyishly feminine.

_Ibid._, p. 263.
And the Sgt. Pepper was the general uniform for the boys at this point—the high-collar military jacket with red epaulets and piping that they wore with stovepipes pants—nobody was wearing bell-bottoms anymore. As for hair, lots of the boys had theirs Keith Richard-style—spiky and all different lengths.

The girls in California were probably prettier in a standard sense than the New York girls—blonder and in better health, I guess; but I still preferred the way the girls in New York looked—stranger and more neurotic (a girl always looked more beautiful and fragile when she was about to have a nervous breakdown).

One hot August afternoon during that Love Summer of ‘67, Fred and I were out walking around the West Village on our way to pick up some pants I was having made up at the Leather Man. There were lots of flower children tripping and lots of tourists watching them trip. Eighth Street was a total carnival. Every store had purple trip books and psychedelic posters and plastic flowers and beads and incense and candles, and there were SpinArt places where you squeezed paint onto a spinning wheel and made your own Op Art painting (which the kids loved to do on acid), and pizza parlors and ice cream stands—just like an amusement park.

By the time the Museum’s big Op Art show opened in the fall, two out of every three women entering the glass doors on West Fifty-third Street for the opening-night hoopla were wearing print dresses that were knockoffs of the paintings that were waiting on the walls inside. In between the time the show had been announced and the time it opened, the Seventh Avenue garment industry had cranked up and slapped the avant-garde into mass production before the Museum could even officially discover it. (They liked knocking off Bridget Riley’s fields of vibrating lines best of all.)
Wolfe, Painted, pp. 77-8.

When paint-it-yourself dress kits were introduced onto the market in spring 1967, the Brooklyn department store Abraham & Straus commissioned Andy Warhol to paint a dress during an in-store “happening.” Warhol stenciled “FRAGILE” onto a dress while it was being worn by a model, and then signed the dress “Dalí.”
Walford, p. 117.

In the eighties, Madonna wanted to dress you up in her love.
Frisa, p. 412.

East Village street fashion of the eighties: mohawks, brothel creepers, knee-belted bondage trousers, septum piercings and shredded schoolgirl uniforms.

On 80s fashion: The body begins to define its own structure with aerobics and the gym. The garment is designed to give personality and power to individuals. Padding builds up the shoulders and lends an imposing and authoritative touch to the female figure… The female superbody is at its ease in the uniform of the career woman as well as in the costume of the sexy heroine. The male superbody is sculpture and has no fear of turning into a neoclassical gay icon. [Lisa Lyons] [Mapplethorpe] [Body in the City]

Ibid., p. 15.

On Mike Nichols’s Working Girl (1988): “Melanie Griffith smiles with satisfaction in the office she has won at such a high price, while the lens frames her from outside the building and zooms back. To show her buried in a skyscraper filled with thousands of offices like her own, among a myriad of skyscrapers filled with other offices, just one ant in the anthill… If you’re a woman in world of men you have to adopt their uniform.

Sigourney Weaver: assertive and confident in her Donna Karan suits, sure of her upper-class accent, a successful female executive, an insincere feminist and therefore a real bitch… To do it, they need to adopt attitude, but above all the right clothes and well-padded shoulders.”

Ibid., p. 64.

Rei Kawakubo opened her first American shop on Wooster Street in 1983. It looked absolutely nothing like the traditional idea of a shop. There was no merchandise in the window, and not much in the store itself. Instead of broadcasting its wares to passersby, the store acted as a filter. Its character demanded a certain confidence from the customer—those who would not feel comfortable with the clothes would be unlikely to brave the front door.

Ibid., p. 399.

Luxury

Yuppie culture: a cityscape of chrome mirrors, Ermenegildo Zenga suits, Salvatore Ferragamo shoes, portable scanners, compact disk players, mobile telephones, keyboards with incorporated telephones for transmitting stock exchange orders with electronic displays showing constantly moving market prices. Rooms fitted out with saunas, gyms, and squash facilities. Paintings by Julian Schnabel, Mimmo Paladino, Sandro Chia, Francesco Clementa and Enzo Cucci; brie-fragranced popcorn and Chardonnay wine.

In the early light of a May dawn this is what the living room of my apartment looks like: Over the white marble and granite gas-log fireplace hangs an original David Onica. It’s a six-foot-by-four-foot portrait of a naked woman, mostly done in muted grays and olives, sitting on a chaise longue watching MTV, the backdrop a Martian landscape, a gleaming mauve desert scattered with dead, gutted fish, smashed plates rising like a sunburst above the woman’s yellow head, and the whole thing is framed in black aluminum steel. The painting overlooks a long white down-filled sofa and a thirty-inch digital TV set from Toshiba; it’s a high-contrast highly defined model plus it has a four-corner video stand with a high-tech tube combination from NEC with a picture-in-picture digital effects system (plus freeze-frame); the audio includes built-in MTS and a five-watt-per-channel on-board amp. A Toshiba VCR sits in a glass case beneath the TV set; it’s a super-high-band Beta unit and has built-in editing function including a character generator with eight-page memory, a high-band record and playback, and three-week, eight-event timer. A hurricane halogen lamp is placed in each corner of the living room. Thin white venetian blinds cover all eight floor-to-ceiling windows. A glass-top coffee table with oak legs by Turchin sits in front of the sofa, with Steuben glass animals placed strategically around expensive crystal ashtrays from Fortunoff, though I don’t smoke. Next to the Wurlitzer jukebox is a black ebony Baldwin concert grand piano. A polished white oak floor runs throughout the apartment. On the other side of the room, next to a desk and a magazine rack by Gio Ponti, is a complete stereo system (CD player, tape deck, tuner, amplifier) by Sansui with six-foot Duntech Sovereign 2001 speakers in Brazilian rosewood. A downfilled futon lies on an oakwood frame in the center of the bedroom. Against the wall is a Panasonic thirty-one-inch set with a direct-view screen and stereo sound and beneath it in a glass case is a Toshiba VCR. I’m not sure if the time on the Sony digital alarm clock is correct so I have to sit up then look down at the time flashing on and off on the VCR, then pick up the Ettore Sottsass push-button phone that rests on the steel and glass nightstand next to the bed and dial the time number. A cream leather, steel and wood chair designed by Eric Marcus is in one corner of the room, a molded plywood chair in the other. A black-dotted beige and white Maud Sienna carpet covers most of the floor. One wall is hidden by four chests of immense bleached mahogany drawers. In bed I’m wearing Ralph Lauren silk pajamas and when I get up I slip on a paisley ancient madder robe and walk to the bathroom. I urinate while trying to make out the puffiness of my reflection in the glass that encases a baseball poster hung above the toilet. After I change into Ralph Lauren monogrammed boxer shorts and a Fair Isle sweater and slide into silk polka-dot Enrico Hidolin slippers I tie a plastic ice pack around my face and commence with the morning’s stretching exercises. Afterwards I stand in front of a chrome and acrylic Washmobile bathroom sink—with soap dish, cup holder, and railings that serve as towel bars, which I bought at Hastings Tile to use while the marble sinks I ordered from Finland are being sanded—and stare at my reflection with the ice pack still on. I pour some Plax antiplaque formula into a stainless-steel tumbler and swish it around my mouth for thirty seconds. Then I squeeze Rembrandt onto a faux-tortoiseshell toothbrush and start brushing my teeth (too hung over to floss properly—but maybe I flossed before bed last night?) and rinse with Listerine. Then I inspect my hands and use a nailbrush. I take the ice-pack mask off and use a deep-pore cleanser lotion, then an herb-mint facial masque which I leave on for ten minutes while I check my toenails. Then I use the Probright tooth polisher and next the Interplak tooth polisher (this in addition to the toothbrush) which has a speed of 4200 rpm and reverses direction forty-six times per second; the larger tufts clean between teeth and massage the gums while the short ones scrub the tooth surfaces. I rinse again, with Cepacol. I wash the facial massage off with a spearmint face scrub. The shower has a universal all-directional shower head that adjusts within a thirty-inch vertical range. It’s made from Australian gold-black brass and covered with a white enamel finish. In the shower I use first a water-activated gel cleanser, then a honey-almond body scrub, and on the face an exfoliating gel scrub. Vidal Sassoon shampoo is especially good at getting rid of the coating of dried perspiration, salts, oils, airborne pollutants and dirt that can weigh down hair and flatten it to the scalp which can make you look older. The conditioner is also good—silicone technology permits conditioning benefits without weighing down the hair which can also make you look older. On weekends or before a date I prefer to use the Greune Natural Revitalizing Shampoo, the conditioner and the Nutrient Complex. These are formulas that contain D-panthenol, a vitamin-B-complex factor; polysorbate 80, a cleansing agent for the scalp; and natural herbs. Over the weekend I plan to go to Bloomingdale’s or Bergdorf’s and on Evelyn’s advice pick up a Foltene European Supplement and Shampoo for thinning hair which contains complex carbohydrates that penetrate the hair shafts for improved strength and shine. Also the Vivagen Hair Enrichment Treatment, a new Redken product that prevents mineral deposits and prolongs the life cycle of hair. Luis Carruthers recommended the Aramis Nutriplexx system, a nutrient complex that helps increase circulation. Once out of the shower and toweled dry I put the Ralph Lauren boxers back on and before applying the Mousse A Raiser, a shaving cream by Pour Hommes, I press a hot towel against my face for two minutes to soften abrasive beard hair. Then I always slather on a moisturizer (to my taste, Clinique) and let it soak in for a minute. You can rinse it off or keep it on and apply a shaving cream over it—preferably with a brush, which softens the beard as it lifts the whiskers—which I’ve found makes removing the hair easier. It also helps prevent water from evaporating and reduces friction between your skin and the blade. Always wet the razor with warm water before shaving and shave in the direction the beard grows, pressing gently on the skin. Leave the sideburns and chin for last, since these whiskers are tougher and need more time to soften. Rinse the razor and shake off any excess water before starting. Afterwards splash cool water on the face to remove any trace of lather. You should use an aftershave lotion with little or no alcohol. Never use cologne on your face, since the high alcohol content dries your face out and makes you look older. One should use an alcohol-free antibacterial toner with a water-moistened cotton ball to normalize the skin. Applying a moisturizer is the final step. Splash on water before applying an emollient lotion to soften the skin and seal in the moisture. Next apply Gel Appaisant, also made by Pour Hommes, which is an excellent, soothing skin lotion. If the face seems dry and flaky—which makes it look dull and older—use a clarifying lotion that removes flakes and uncovers fine skin (it can also make your tan look darker). Then apply an anti-aging eye balm (Baume Des Yeux) followed by a final moisturizing “protective” lotion. A scalp-programming lotion is used after I towel my hair dry. I also lightly blow-dry the hair to give it body and control (but without stickiness) and then add more of the lotion, shaping it with a Kent natural-bristle brush, and finally slick it back with a wide-tooth comb. I pull the Fair Isle sweater back on and reslip my feet into the polka-dot silk slippers, then head into the living room and put the new Talking Heads in the CD player, but it starts to digitally skip so I take it out and put in a CD laser lens cleaner. The laser lens is very sensitive, and subject to interference from dust or dirt or smoke or pollutants or moisture, and a dirty one can inaccurately read CDs, making for false starts, inaudible passages, digital skipping, speed changes and general distortion; the lens cleaner has a cleaning brush that automatically aligns with the lens then the disk spins to remove residue and particles. When I put the Talking Heads CD back in it plays smoothly. I retrieve the copy of USA Today that lies in front of my door in the hallway and bring it with me into the kitchen where I take two Advil, a multivitamin and a potassium tablet, washing them down with a large bottle of Evian water since the maid, an elderly Chinese woman, forgot to turn the dishwasher on when she left yesterday, and then I have to pour the grapefruit-lemon juice into a St. Rémy wineglass I got from Baccarat. I check the neon clock that hangs over the refrigerator to make sure I have enough time to eat breakfast unhurriedly. Standing at the island in the kitchen I eat kiwifruit and a sliced Japanese apple-pear (they cost four dollars each at Gristede’s) out of aluminum storage boxes that were designed in West Germany. I take a bran muffin, a decaffeinated herbal tea bag and a box of oat-bran cereal from one of the large glass-front cabinets that make up most of an entire wall in the kitchen; complete with stainless-steel shelves and sandblasted wire glass, it is framed in a metallic dark gray-blue. I eat half of the bran muffin after it's been microwaved and lightly covered with a small helping of apple butter. A bowl of oat-bran cereal with wheat germ and soy milk follows; another bottle of Evian water and a small cup of decaf tea after that. Next to the Panasonic bread baker and the Salton Pop-Up coffee maker is the Cremina sterling silver espresso maker (which is, oddly, still warm) that I got at Hammacher Schlemmer (the thermal-insulated stainless-steel espresso cup and the saucer and spoon are sitting by the sink, stained) and the Sharp Model R-1810A Carousel II microwave oven with revolving turntable which I use when I heat up the other half of the bran muffin. Next to the Salton Sonata toaster and the Cuisinart Little Pro food processor and the Acme Supreme Juicerator and the Cordially Yours liqueur maker stands the heavy-gauge stainless-steel two-and-one-half-quart teakettle, which whistles “Tea for Two” when the water is boiling, and with it I make another small cup of the decaffeinated apple-cinnamon tea. For what seems like a long time I stare at the Black & Decker Handy Knife that lies on the counter next to the sink, plugged into the wall: it’s a sliver/peeler with several attachments, a serrated blade, a scalloped blade and a rechargeable handle. The suit I wear today is from Alan Flusser. It’s an eighties drape suit, which is an updated version of the thirties style. The favored version has extended natural shoulders, a full chest and a bladed back. The soft-rolled lapels should be about four inches wide with the peak finishing three quarters of the way across the shoulders. Properly used on double-breasted suits, peaked lapels are considered more elegant than notched ones. Low-slung pockets have a flapped double-besom design—above the flap there’s a slit trimmed on either side with a flat narrow strip of cloth. Four buttons form a low-slung square; above it, about where the lapels cross, there are two more buttons. The trousers are deeply pleated and cut full in order to continue the flow of the wide jacket. An extended waist is cut slightly higher in the front. Tabs make the suspenders fit well at the center back. The tie is a dotted silk design by Valentino Couture. The shoes are crocodile loafers by A. Testoni. While I’m dressing the TV is kept on to The Patty Winters Show. Today’s guests are women with multiple personalities. A nondescript overweight older woman is on the screen and Patty’s voice is heard asking, “Well, is it schizophrenia or what’s the deal? Tell us.”

DIE YUPPIE SCUM
EAT THE RICH
McInerney, “Yuppies” N. pag.

Who are all those upwardly mobile folk with designer water, running shoes, pickled parquet floors, and $450,000 condos in semi-slum buildings?”

Ibid.

Dhurrie rugs, potted ferns, pickled parquet floors, European automobiles, gourmet kitchens, computer literacy, designer clothing, sushi.

Ibid.

You see yourself as the kind of guy who wakes up early on Sunday morning and steps out to cop the Times and croissants. Who might take a cue from the Arts and Leisure section and decide to check out an exhibition—costumes of the Hapsburg Court at the Met, say, or Japanese lacquerware of the Muromachi period at the Asia Society.
McInerney, “Yuppies,” p. 4.

Vicky stops in front of an antique shop window on Bleecker and points to a wooden carousel horse, painted red and white, mounted on a pedestal. “I’d like to have the kind of house someday where a carousel horse wouldn’t be out of place in the living room.”
Ibid., p. 94.

James Bryce: The rich could be divided neatly into “best men” and “capitalists.”
Hammack, p. 104.

In mysterious New York luxury and wealth create, in an apotheosis of fireworks, those strange paradises in the very center of this antique, mechanical and polymorphous city, those paradises that transport us with a gentle and imperceptible speed.
de Chirico, p. 401.

Smoking cigars wrapped in $100 bills or ordering gold-plated and gem-encrusted bicycles from Tiffany’s.
Conrad, p. 65.

If you could go breezing down the FDR Drive in a taxi, then why file into the trenches of the urban wars?
Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 54.

McKim, Mead and White shaped a new city in which the luxury apartment could find a natural place.
Hawes, N. pag.

On Park Avenue, above Grand Central, many people—at a very high cost—believe they are living in style.

Let’s go slumming, take me slumming
Let’s go slumming on Park Avenue
Let us hide behind a pair of fancy glasses
And make faces when a member of the classes passes.

Let’s go smelling where they’re dwelling
Sniffing everything the way they do
Let us go to it, they do it, why can’t we do it too?
Let’s go slumming, nose thumbing at Park Avenue
Berlin, “Slumming.”

Lower Park Avenue, with its smoking open cut and clangor of steam engines, its fringe of disused breweries, livery stables and ancient factories, was roofed over and transformed into an esplanade bordered by luxury hotels and splendid apartment houses. Gradually Park Avenue extended its arrogant magnificence, its costly, pampered residential exclusiveness for nearly three miles northward, to sink at last into the misery of East Harlem slums.
Morris, Incredible, p. 289.

Park Avenue offered a new and revised version of well-to-do urbanity; it spelled out how the modern aristocracy intended to live now: lavishly, privately, but also cooperatively and efficiently, well served and well serviced, “near ‘business’ (and yet not actually, in their homes, on a business street).” From a Park Avenue address, it was walking distance to the new “Little Wall Street” of Madison Avenue, to the theaters and clubs of the West 40s, to Grand Central and points north and west. The city encircled, but it did not encroach.

Hawes, N. pag.

200 bronze dolphins from the Juilliard mansion on 57th St. are sold to a decorator who used them for lamp bases.

Berger, New York, p. 55.

Eight-twenty Fifth Avenue is a vortex of desire in Manhattan residential real estate. Stand on the corner of East Sixty-third Street and Fifth Avenue, it looks like money.

Gaines, p. 22.

A 24-hour-a-day population... being replaced by a 7-hour-a-day population for a period of only a 5-day week. We therefore have to look at this expensive machine—Park Avenue—being developed for usage only 30 hours per week.

Trager, p. 43.

Waldorf-Astoria Hotel built with a private railroad siding, which enables guests with their own railcars to have them routed to the hotel’s special elevator on Track 61, whence they can be whisked directly to their suites or to the lobby. Two subbasement levels extend far below the tracks to accommodate service facilities. (cf. Ekstrakt: Warhol’s video recorder party in the Waldorf tunnel [Media])

Ibid., p. 465.

The Waldorf-Astoria has its wine cellars on the fifth floor. The hotel is built on steel and concrete stilts over the New York Central tracks. A stabilizer keeps the wine from being rocked by passing trains.

The first and only parlor car on New York’s subways was built in 1904 for August Belmont, the financier who organized the Interborough Rapid Transit Construction Company, which built the IRT. The only known private subway car in the world, it was named Mineola and contained a bar, a washroom with stained-glass windows, full-length windows for observation, an arched Empire ceiling tinted green, and such amenities as pads against which strikers could strike their matches. Besides its motorman—Mineola had its own motor—the car’s staff included a white-coated waiter who served caviar and drinks to guests. It was sold for scrap in 1973.

Moscow, p. 102.

Sally became a big model
she moved up to eighties and park
She had a studio apartment and that’s where she used to ball, folk singers and that’s where she used to ball, folk singers, but Sally, she can’t dance no more [...] She knew all the really right people she went to Le Jardin
She danced with Picasso’s illegitimate mistress and wore Kenneth Lane jewels, really it’s trash, but Sally can’t dance no more. Reed, “Sally Can’t Dance.”

Roger was sitting in a restaurant on the Upper East Side, feeling good and drinking red wine. He’s thirty-nine, and he runs his own fund and lives on Park Avenue in a classic-six apartment. Bushnell, N. pag.

He’s sitting in his junior loft in SoHo, which is paid for by his parents, as are all the rest of his expenses, his father being a coat-hanger magnate in Minneapolis. [Downtown] Ibid.

In my case, it’s about leaving my cozy East Side cocoon for the shopless tree-lined wasteland that is Riverside Drive. Quan, p. 7.

The conversion of a slum into New York’s most fashionable quarter: on the edge of the East River and overshadowed by noisy Queensboro Bridge, several blocks of ancient, decaying brownstone dwellings lined the deserted continuation of Avenue A. It was here that Mrs. W.K. Vanderbilt chose to erect a handsome Georgian residence when she abandoned her Fifth Avenue chateau. Her friends bought and rebuilt adjoining houses. Old dwellings were remodeled as small, expensive apartments. Great apartment houses soon encroached on this exclusive precinct: “A Sutton Place address.” A colony of millionaires, people of the theater, highly paid artists and writers. [Bohemia] Morris, Incredible, p. 298.

Mrs. Astor’s social quota of four hundred had been multiplied by O. Henry into four million. [Literature] Conrad, p. 278.

The crime teletype machine was quiet at police headquarters... so I decided to sneak away and go to the opening of the opera. I watched the last minute rehearsal. I had no invitation but my press card was enough. War or no war, the Rolls Royces, big and shiny, kept arriving. Some had two chauffeurs with the usual gas ration sticker in the windshield. I guess if they ran out of gas one would steer while the other one would push.

I took stock of the situation. It was a cold night. Inside the warm lobby about two dozen photographers were lined up Wolf Gang Fashion. If one flashed a bulb all the others did too. It was like a game of “follow the leader.” This is a big night for the cameramen, with the papers and syndicates sending only high class photographers who know society to cover because before a paper will publish a photo of the opening night the subject’s name must be listed in the Social Register.

I like to get different shots and don’t like to make the same shots the other dopes do... so I went outside into the street. I started talking to a cop. On stories I always make friends with cops... gangsters... prostitutes, etc. A nice Rolls Royce pulled up... I waited ‘till the occupants got out and snapped the picture. I couldn’t see what I was snapping but could almost smell the smugness. I followed the women into the lobby, where the other photographers then snapped their picture too. I knew then that I had photographed real society so I asked the two women their names and made them spell them out too.
Reporters gathered around them and asked them, if, in these critical times, it was appropriate to wear so much jewelry. The older woman first apologized for wearing last year's jewels and added the reason she did it was to help morale.

P. S. N. W. Ayer & Son, the big advertising agency who has the account of De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd., that's the diamond trust, bought this picture for their files. They examined the photograph with a magnifying gloss and said the diamonds were real...

The theatre was jammed so I went into the grand tier where the board of directors of the Metropolitan Opera House have their private boxes and picked myself a nice private box. There was another occupant, a director who kept his high silk hat on. I gave him a couple of dirty looks but he paid no attention to me or to the usher, who was evidently afraid to go near him.

During the intermission I went into the packed salon to watch what was going on. Cameramen were shooting fast and furious. Press agents, seeing my camera, pointed out notables to me but I refused to waste film or bulbs as I don't photograph society unless they have a fight and get arrested or they stand on their heads.

One woman dressed in ermine was pleading with her escort for a ham sandwich. Another couple was saying it was "well done." I don't know whether they were talking about their Thanksgiving turkey or the opera. [Photography]

Weegee, Naked, pp. 124-5.

There are women who have charge accounts, plenty of leisure, poodle dogs, chauffeurs, a box at the opera and the right to sit in Gramercy Park. They have regular appointments with hairdressers.

The wife perhaps of a Wall Street plunger; a woman who, in her startling clothes, and soaring hat, is the target in her box at the Broadway theater for all the bourgeois, vulgar eyes in the audience. If you talk to such a person you will find her, as you know, inconceivably empty with her few ideas distorted perversely from anything important or universal.

It is a well-known fact among those with access to a broad spectrum of bank statements that the widows of Manhattan are in possession of its money.

Blandford, pp. 89-90.

He said he'd rather paint an old suit of clothes than a new one because things used and frayed have "character, reality is exposed and not disguised." The wealthy, he thought, "spend money to disguise themselves."

Conrad, p. 97.

Why did they all come to New York? "These kids from Cambridge in their early twenties," Danny said, "represented inherited wealth, inherited beauty, and inherited intelligence. These were the most glamorous young people in all America. I mean, they were so rich and so beautiful and so so smart. And so crazy. But up in Cambridge, all together, all they could think was, 'Oh, God, we're so bored, we're so tired of going to classes. We want to move out into the real world.' Moving out into the real world meant getting their picture in the papers and getting written up in the magazines."
I’ve always been fascinated by the assumptions that rich kids make. A lot of them think it’s normal, the way they live—because it’s all they’ve ever known. I love to watch their minds operate. There are two kinds of rich kids—the ones who’re always trying to act poor and prove that they’re just like everybody else and who secretly worry that people only like them for their money, and the ones who relax and have fun with it, who even play it up. The second kind are fun.
Warhol, POPism, p. 123.

The higher your class, the less patient you are. Class determines intervals between cars, and also the length of time you can be caged in a car.
Reisenberg, p. 73.

Smartness, nowadays, is a relative term; and society and the last one. It is possible to be smart without being in the social register and to be in the social register without being smart, in the present-Day sense. These people lunching about us are of mixed origins.
Hilder, p. 595.

The New Yorker of foreign white stock, having made tremendous contributions to the city for 300 years, is now in the process of becoming socially invisible.
Federal Writers, p. 84.

The society of the so-called WASPs... continued until World War II to dominate certain institutions: private schools, subscription dances for teenagers, debutante parties, and clubs, but the city’s well-to-do had become too numerous and heterogeneous to be rallied under any single group, and the charm of a closed society had largely collapsed... Ancestry now counts for nothing; family for little. Looks are far more important than a century ago, when they hardly counted at all. Society today cares very much about appearance and clothes. It likes to make an attractive picture, which is part of the immense role that public relations plays in modern life.
Auchincloss, p. 35.

In order to be a real New Yorker, one must have been born in New York, or else have lived in New York ten full years!... It is permissible for newcomers to mention the fact that they reside in New York, and when they travel they may register at hotels as from New York, but under no circumstances may they claim to be New Yorkers, until they have served their full ten years of apprenticeship. New Yorkers are proud of New York. They are unwilling to permit strangers who merely move to the city, to declare themselves New Yorkers until they have lived here sufficiently long to have achieved something or done their bit in adding to New York’s prestige.
Parker, New York, the Wonder City, p. 4.

The problem with Manhattan is that there is no acceptable way of going to seed.
Bladford, p. 57.
Gentrification

This is not an account of the city's changes but of the changes in this writer's feeling for the city.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 110

SoHo

The neighborhood around us transformed like a slowly developing photograph. The factories and loading platforms vanished one by one. Galleries and restaurants and boutiques proliferated like new life-forms escaped from some laboratory experiment. Once SoHo was declared chic, the rich descended on the area. They bought out the lofts that the artists vacated or were forced to leave. "The zombies," my father called them.

Pinchbeck, N. pag.

A few years earlier, when I'd first moved to Sullivan Street, I'd run into Dick Serra on the corner of West Broadway and Spring. After a muttered hello, he fixed me with a fierce scowl, flung his arm out, and snarled, "Some day all this will be fucking boutiques!" I laughed.

Tucker, p. 140.

One can now climb long flights of wooden stairs to a loft, there to be greeting by a woman in a hostess gown. In the huge space, the furniture is chromium and black leather. The floors shine. the walls are white-on-white. The paintings hang splendidly. Over drinks, conversation is smart and knowing, and from the "kitchen space" (all stainless steel with a fantastic restaurant stove) wafts the odor of a bubbling boeuf bourguignon.

Anderson & Archer, p. 11.

One day a big artist realized that if he took all of the sewing machines and bales of rags out of a three-thousand-square-foot loft and put in a bathroom and kitchen he would be able to live and make big art in the same place. He was quickly followed by other big artists and they by big lawyers, big boutique owners, and big rich kids. Soon there was a Soho and it was positively awash in hardwood floors, talked-to plants, indoor swings, enormous record collections, hiking boots, conceptual artists, video communes, art bookstores, art grocery stores, art restaurants, art bars, art galleries, and boutiques selling tie-dyed raincoats, macramé flowerpots, and Art Deco salad plates... Scores of nine-by-twelve photo-realist renderings of gas stations, refrigerators, pieces of cherry pie, art collectors, diners, '59 Chevys, and Mediterranean-style dining room sets.

Leibowitz, pp. 131, 133.

Making homes of the factory lofts of SoHo produced a new interior design for living. Loft space was not divided into a series of rooms, specialized areas, and personal territories. There was a great deal of variation in how lofts were converted for residential use; the common denominator, however, was the emphasis on large open areas. Lofts, with the same number of square feet as many American homes, are frequently entirely free of interior walls; a usual exception is the bathroom, but even that is open in some lofts. All lofts have high ceilings ranging up to fifteen feet. Areas for eating, sleeping, entertaining, and other routine functions are widely scattered. The following cases are extreme, in that they represent some of the most dramatic examples of loft living and life-style; however, since they are taken from the mass media, they indicate how the style of loft living was being presented to the public.

A flatbed elevator opens onto polished hardwood and hanging greenery. The whole vista is partitioned by track-lighting into living, working and dining space. There are modular couches and Breuer chairs; a work in monumental burlap covers an entire wall. The owner greets you with cashews and Perrier. She's a buyer in the garment center. Her boss doesn't understand why she won't live on Third Avenue. But what good is the East Side if you can't get into Regine's? And besides her shrink lives down the block.

$1,200 king-size bathtubs and enough hot water to fill them, acres of exotic plants, uniformed housekeepers, children in private schools, Chinese chefs, Touch-tone phones, closed-circuit TV surveillance, light dimmers, ice makers, trash compactors, industrial vacuum cleaners, Steinway pianos, antique pool tables, imported eighteenth-century beams, 24-foot-long leather sofas, original Rietveld chairs, Directoire settees, foundations, fireplaces, and more Bloomingdales. And the most middle-class hang-up of all—good housekeeping, and I don't mean the magazine.

Most people have to go outdoors to jog. Neils Diffrient and his wife, Helena Hermmarck, do their jogging in their loft, running past her looms and his drawing board, around the Ping Pong table, the open kitchen area, the free standing fireplace and the open bedroom, while Thomas, the ginger cat, gets out of the way by bedding down on a table full of yam... However, for all its high ceilings, while walls, and vast space, the Diffrients' loft hasn't the barren look of a gymnasium. The tools of their separate crafts form some of the furniture and certainly most of the decorative aspects of the loft.

These examples illustrate loft living and life-style at its most complete and polished. Their variety demonstrates the creative uses the tenants made of such spaces. Large numbers of loft dwellers, however, made only modest changes to handle the necessities of living: e.g., repairing broken windows, installing toilets that worked, and covering up holes in the floor. A few created museums of modernity.

The methods of dividing living and work space varied, as the quotations above indicate. Living and work spaces often overlapped. In other lofts there were clear separations. One loft owner installed three overhead garage doors to separate his work space from his family's living space. These could be opened at the end of the work day so that the spaciousness of the entire loft could be enjoyed by all. A printmaker kept his nineteenth-century press at the back of the loft:
because of his very neat work habits, there was no jarring contrast between the living and work areas. In part, it was this variety of styles that led to the public attention and popularity enjoyed by loft living. In 1977, the Village Voice made the following assessment: "The presence of unified avant-garde within a single neighborhood has profoundly altered the New York style, from the way we furnish our homes (high tech) to the way we envision public space. Even the decision to wear a solid T-shirt over painter's pants, reflects the SoHo aesthetic—combining the minimal with the found."

Loft living as a style became a recurrent subject for the media. A sampling of titles from contemporary magazine articles gives some of the flavor of this coverage: "Living Big in a Loft" (Life); "SoHo: Brave New Bohemia" (Art News); "SoHo: The Most Exciting Place to Live in the City" (New York Magazine); "Still Funky but oh so chic SoHo" “Loft Living: Can You Make it on the Urban Frontier?” (Art News); “An Unmarried Woman” (Apartment Life). SoHo was even chosen as the locale for the film An Unmarried Woman.

Hudson, pp. 56-60.

Said one woman tourist to another standing on the corner of Prince and Wooster: “And this is where she threw up after he told her that he was leaving her.”

Anderson & Archer, p. 67.

Within easy memory, you couldn’t eat out in SoHo except in hero sandwich shops for the factory workers. It is now a place where limousines line up and idle in the evening darkness while rock stars as rich as they are dumb (to-wit preposterously) vie for tables in little bistros with pretentions that are grand indeed. (cf. Matta-Clark’s [Food]) “Art” as both lifestyle and commodity is the basis of transformation. The actual form is the loft.

Byrne, p. 135

So the outcome of these combined developments was at least understandable, if not inevitable: SoHo became one of the major New York tourist attractions. By 1978, a 274-page SoHo guidebook had been published, complete with street maps, suggested walking tours, and a directory of eighty-five art galleries, twenty-five restaurants, and sixty-five shops and boutiques. In the huckster style of such books, Seigfried and Seeman provided the eager tourist with this opening description: “You are now about to enter SoHo, one of the most exciting ‘new’ neighborhoods in New York City.” SoHo was in. In 1981, a novel entitled SoHo (Byrd) appeared, further enhancing the romantic image of the area. In 1984, the New York Review of Books published The SoHoiad: or the Masque of Art: A Satire in Heroic Couplets, by the pseudonymous Junius Secundus, which satirized many of SoHo’s pretensions and mythological history. This work did not diminish SoHo’s luster, but rather added to its notoriety.

Hudson, p. 60.

Close by the Hudson, in MANHATTAN’S town,
The iron palaces of Art glare down
On such as, wandering in the streets below,
Perambulate in glamorous SoHo,
A spot acclaimed by savant and by bard
As forcing-chamber of the Avant-Garde.

Secundus, n.pag

The district between Houston and Canal Streets in which all the buildings contain huge rooms—not just on the ground floor, where they are art galleried, but at all levels. These huge salons have ceilings as high as churches, and beautiful dance floors, all of laths of wood the same width, polished to the same colour, and all installed on the same day. They have never been walked on.

Crisp, p. 217.

Ever since there has been a SoHo, people have been grimly pronouncing it to be “over.” It isn’t “over”: It wasn’t over when the epitaph was first delivered: it is not “over” now.

By that fall, SoHo was getting very trendy. People were already talking about this new urban frontier: Tribeca.

Dray, p. 225.

Frank O’Hara angrily lamented one night, “Jane [Freilicher] cares more about her new refrigerator than she does about her painting”—this, after spending a perfectly decent evening at the Hazan’s new place, an apartment he apparently found alarmingly comfortable and middle class.

Lesueur, p. 128.

Kitchens are becoming less like kitchens and more like works of art.

Lefebvre, Critique, p. 8.

The “Juddian” Kitchen.

N. cit.

Stills from Chloe’s loft in a space that looks like it was designed by Dan Flavin: two Toshiyuki Kita hop sofas, an expanse of white-maple floor, six Baccarat Tastevin wineglasses—a gift from Bruce and Nan Weber—dozens of white French tulips, a StairMaster and a free-weight set, photography books—Matthew Rolston, Annie Leibovitz, Herb Ritts—all signed, a Fabergé Imperial egg—a gift from Bruce Willis (pre-Demi)—a large plain portrait of Chloe by Richard Avedon, sunglasses scattered all over the place, a Helmut Newton photo of Chloe walking seminude through the lobby of the Malperisa in Milan while nobody notices, a large William Wegman and giant posters for the movies Butterfield 8, The Bachelor Party with Carolyn Jones, Audrey Hepburn in Breakfast at Tiffany’s. A giant fax sheet taped above Chloe’s makeup table lists Monday 9am Byron Lars, 11am Mark Eisen, 2pm Nicole Miller, 6pm Ghost, Tuesday 10am Ralph Lauren, Wednesday 11am Anna Sui, 2pm Calvin Klein, 4pm Bill Blass, 7pm Isaac Mizrahi, Thursday 9am Donna Karan, 5pm Todd Oldham and on and on until Sunday. Piles of foreign currency and empty Glacier bottles litter tables and countertops everywhere. In her refrigerator the breakfast Luna has already prepared: ruby-red grapefruit, Evian, iced herbal tea, nonfat plain yogurt with blackberries, a quarter of a poppy-seed bagel, sometimes toasted, sometimes not, Beluga if it’s a “special day.” Gilles Bensimon, Juliette Lewis, Patrick Demarchelier, Ron Galotti, Peter Lindbergh and Baxter Priestly have all left messages. [Fame] [Celebrity]

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 45.

While walking through the streets of Soho with Alison Knowles, where she has lived for decades, I asked her how she dealt with the drastic changes in the neighborhood. She smiled and said, “When I walk down the streets, I just look up at the tops of the buildings. And it’s the same as it always was.”

Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag.

General

This was your neighborhood. These shops were your shops. You possessed these streets as securely as if you held title. Now the vista is skewed slightly, someone has tilted the ground a few degrees, and everything is the same and not the same. [Psychogeography]
New York had become more like the rest of the country, the rest of the country, in some respects, had become more like New York.

Freeman, p. 336.

It’s no accident that New York, as Paris did twenty years ago, is becoming a tourist spot (a tourist trap). People come to see the streets where bohemians once roamed. The city is dead, killed by the growth of the edge cities where suburban sprawl meets the semi-urban mall; by the final triumph of the car; by the need for schools and lawns and cheap shopping. Flight from the city, which seemed, in the past twenty years, to have been stemmed by the property tycoon’s child-bearing revolution, the late-arriving baby is really (the argument goes) a force as inevitable as continental drift or evolution itself. All of life will soon be an exchange of pixels from seated positions in secure rooms. [Empire]

Gopnik, p. 293.

By “city” we mean more than an urban amusement park; we mean a collection of classes, trades, purposes, and functions that become a whole, giving us something more than rich people in their co-ops and condos staring at other rich people in their co-ops and condos.

Ibid., p. 11.

So cities are dying, though their death will not be, as we long through, slow and violent. They are just being strangled. Cities will die sighing, not screaming, but they will die. They will be inherited not by feral gangs and rampaging hordes but by again yuppies, professions, like ourselves, who will linger to remember the Last Bohemia, Soho and the Village, after their children have fled to the edge or to the Sunbelt, as they age and their apartments drip value, like coffee filters, year after year. If the city remains intact at all, it will be as a relic, just as Venice is now, which people will visit for “culture” (rather than for the life or art) and for recreation (meaning sex in a hotel room, for people who can afford it.) London is already nearly Londonland, Paris already a city of the rich and retired, and there is no more Venice at all, really, is just a kind of simulacra of itself, drained of inhabitants, if not of floodwater, and all in the past twenty-five years. Ten years ago New York seemed as much a city as Dickensian London was a city—a great grim lamp shining with greed and need, drawing people, like insects, to a doom they didn’t quite mind. Now New York is sinking beneath our feet.

I have an interest in this, as someone whose entire wealth, or, rather, whose entire weight of optimistic debt, is sunk into the city, and as one who has learned that he will never be able to drive (or sail or swim or do anything save walk), and so I do not want it to be true. But when I walk the streets, I don’t feel something coming to an end, as one did in the early seventies, when the previous New York of immigrant manufacture was dying and no new thing was yet clearly being born. What I feel instead is a thing coming into being through common need, which is a all a city is. The immigrant stories of this generation will be epic when the immigrant children come to write them.

Ibid., pp. 293-4.

Picture a city with polite taxi drives and children in strollers crowding the avenues, where everyone is addicted to strong, milky coffee.
One might have the impression that it is the Upper West Side atheist and the Lancaster County Amish who dispute the prize for who can be most obsessive about having the children around the table at six p.m. for a homemade dinner from farm-raised food.

As for the LES, the forces of McDisneyfication began a new assault around 1995—or at least that’s when I began to notice it. Squats were attacked with tanks. Rents began to skyrocket. Bohemia was holding on by the skin of its teeth. Precious gardens were bulldozed and cheap shitty yuppie housing was jacked up in the old sad vacant lots.

There was an old Dominican guy who had a tiny garden next to my building, with flowers, Virgin Mary, chairs, strange white “Chinese” chickens, and afternoons of rum and dominos. He got swept away. After a few months of hideous pile-driving construction, a big new apartment building appeared. In the lobby I saw arty b&w photos of picturesque LES people like crusty-punk girls and old Dominican guys—the very people displaced to raise this deluxe lazarette-like trophies in some rod ‘n’ gun club of bourgeois splendor. “Everything that once was real moves away into representation.”

Wilson, “Tar,” p. 103.

The new office buildings and lofts are flanked by apartment houses as stupidly planned, as extravagantly designed, as crazily and as dishonestly financed as the business buildings themselves. The megalopolitan architects who designed these puerile structures gloated over the prospect of a whole city composed of skyscrapers, with aerial drives for the rich, and in the murky canyons below the working and living quarters for the poor—artificially lighted! artificially ventilated!—a city in which sunlight would be supplied by sunlamps, grass by green tiles, and babies, presumably, by mechanical incubation.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 34.

The concert of the expensively provisional.

Nordenson, p. 15.

What do you want to live in a Black neighborhood for? Motherfuck gentrification.

Lee, p. 31.

It briefly seems as though the hour of reckoning has arrived, when all those outsiders will seize control.

Sante, “My Lost City,” N. pag.

In 1914, the government of New York City took ownership of a Manhattan apartment building belonging to David Hess. The city used a legal power called eminent domain, which allows a government to seize private property for public use—in this case New York City wanted to expand the subway system. Hess fought them and lost, and when all was said and done, his building was torn down, and he was left with a triangle-shaped piece of property. It was about the size of a large slice of pizza.

Later, the city tried to get him to donate his pizza-shaped property so that they could build a sidewalk. He refused again. They built the sidewalk anyway, and in the middle of the sidewalk is Hess' triangle, with a tile mosaic that reads:

PROPERTY OF THE HESS ESTATE WHICH HAS NEVER BEEN DEDICATED FOR PUBLIC PURPOSES

(cf. Matta-Clark’s Fake Estates: “At auction in 1973, Matta-Clark bought some small pieces of land…” [Psychogeography])

The water and soil, as the prime environment of life, were becoming “immaterial,” that is to say, they were of no use to the canny minds that were promoting the metropolis, unless they could be described in a legal document, appraised quantitatively, and converted ultimately into cash. A farm became for the speculator a place that might be converted into building lots… There was always the chance that some negligible patch of earth might become, in the course of the city’s growth, a gold mine. That was magic. In atmosphere of magic, the desire to get something for nothing, a whole population hoped and breathed and lived. Mumford, Sidewalk p. 43.

The ordinary lives caught in the spectacle of Manhattan. N. cit.

Set plumb down in the midst of slums, antique warehouses, discarded breweries, slaughter houses, electrical works, gas tanks, loading cranes, coal-chutes, the very wealthy have begun to establish their city residence in huge, new palatial apartments. Hawes, N. pag.

The denial of the tenement as a tenement and insisting upon it as “a charming place” once it had been stripped to its core, taken back virtually to its prehistory as a dwelling. Plaster was laboriously scraped off brick that that had always been plastered; windowsills and lintels were sanded raw; decades of linoleum were ripped up to reveal floorboards underneath, even parquet, sometimes, perfectly preserved by generations of housewives who always put a covering on anything “good.” [Palimpsest]

If authenticity has a schizoid quality, it can also be deliberately made up of bits and pieces of cultural references: artfully painted graffiti on a shop window, sawdust on the floor of a music bar, an address in a gritty but not too thoroughly crime-ridden part of town. [Simulacra]

Zukin, p. xii-iii.

Every building seemed to be of the very highest type, of the very best construction, have the latest conveniences, be blessed with the most exclusive neighborhood. Quite ordinary buildings were described as monuments or ornaments, their addresses as breeze-swept or panoramic, even if they happened to be set back in the middle of the island. Hawes, N. pag.
Like many young people, I'd assumed the world—the physical reality of stores, restaurant locations, apartment buildings, and movie theaters and the kinds of people who lived in this or that neighborhood—was far more stable than it was.

Delany, p. xiv.

_Essex St. ... Where Jewish People Used To Be_ _Fosyth St. ... Where Puerto Ricans Used To Be_ _“Little Italy” ... Where Italians Used To Be_
Maffi, p. 13.

Apartment buildings are being torn down and replaced by offices... This is the real estate man’s answer to a need for additional income. Space, which as apartments, is returning $3 a square foot, is being replaced by space, which as offices, is returning $8 a square foot—a very simple arithmetic improvement.

There will always be some corner of this city the developers can’t reach. Some run-down parcel full of garbage that can pass for a backyard.

Trebay, p. 314.

There is, in fact, a kind of creeping bank disease laying a cold, dead hand on New York wherever the shiny new construction appears.

Huxtable, _Goodbye_, p. 23.

A century ago, this vibrant city neighborhood made a kind of quantum leap and became a hyper-city neighborhood.

Berman, _Town_, p. xxi.

When the city is totally renovated, when gays have restored all the tenements, garden restaurants have sprouted on the Lower East Side, and the meatpacking district is given over entirely to boutiques and card shops—then we’ll build an island in New York Harbor composed entirely of rotting piers, blocks of collapsed walls, and litter-strewn lots. Ruins become décor, nostalgia for the mud. [Nature] [Antiquity]

The cult of change, of substitution, pretends that new locations are best.

Reisenberg, p. 20.

The coffee bar in the television show _Friends_, ostensibly in New York, could be in any American city, unlike the coffee shop in the slightly earlier _Seinfeld_, which had a distinctly New York ambience. [Television]

Huxtable, _Goodbye_, p. 22.

A commissioner of Cobb County, in Gingrich’s congressional district outside of Atlanta, told a _New York_ magazine reporter, “We’re the power now. These suburbs, built on white flight, are only going to become more conservative and more powerful. New York has been deposed.”

Freeman, p. 336.

So many neighborhoods in New York are recent inventions.

Brook, p. 236.
Transition

The cult of change, of substitution, pretends that new locations are best.
Reisenberg, p. 20.

Leave town for a week and you will notice changes when you return. It is quite possible to pay a visit to your lawyer or your bank only to discover that the erstwhile building in which their business was formerly transacted has disappeared in favor of a deep hole in the ground. Contrariwise, a new and glittering tower, fifty or more stories in height, may rise in another direction before you are aware of the preparatory excavations. It is quite possible in New York to lease an apartment on the thirty-fourth floor with a splendid and uninterrupted view and a great deal of sunlight only to find before a year has passed that both view and sunlight have been blocked out by taller neighbour. It is even possible to live on a short, narrow street which suddenly, through an aldermanic whim, becomes longer and broader. Elevated and street-car lines, traditional for a quarter of a century or longer, have been known to disappear in a week. Even a New York taxi driver—and New York taxi drivers are celebrated for their charm, wit, and intelligence—cannot hope to keep himself informed in regard to the hotels, theaters, and restaurants. In Victorian days such landmarks as Delmonico’s and Martin’s moved northward every decade, the Hartigan Theater became the Mansfield, and later the Garrick. Now, the changes are accomplished more swiftly. Almost before the last stone had been removed from the old Waldorf-Astoria, a new Waldorf-Astoria was rising on Park Avenue. Stanford White’s Madison Square Garden, with its celebrated replica of the Giralda Tower, in Madison Square, has been supplanted by a Madison Square Garden on Eighth Avenue. Maxfield Parrish’s mural decoration representing Old King Cole which so recently graced the Knickerbocker Hotel bar has been transformed to the Racket Club, but what has become of Saint-Gauden’s Diana nobody seems to know. Famous old theaters devoted to the drama become movie picture houses overnight, and new theaters arise on every corner. Only exceptionally does a hotel hold its prestige or its clientele over long periods, and when a friend telephones that he is stopping at the New Neptune, although one has never heard of it before, he knows that it is the latest thing in hostelries. You must ask its location so you can inform your taxi driver, for you probably will not be acquainted with it. Probably even the telephone company is ignorant of the telephone number and by the time it learns it, the number will have changed. Once Bryant, Gramercy, Riverside, Columbus, Stuyvesant, Chelsea, and a few other simple names, suggestive of New York families and localities, designated the exchanges. Now scarcely a day passes but what some fantastic appellation like Lifeguard, Volunteer, Caledonia, El Dorado, Medallion, Galsworthy, or Nightingale is added to the list. It is not beyond possibility that there are more telephones in New York and there are people.

Like the restaurants—and many speakeasies are restaurants—this or that speakeasy or bootlegger goes in or out of fashion. It is one man’s gin this month, another’s next. A bootlegger must have unusual qualities to retain his custom over a long period of time. It is not that New Yorkers are more fickle than the citizens of another town, it is perhaps that they do not exist homogeneously. If they applaud this concert artist in 1927, and neglect him in 1928, if they buy their Corton 1915 on Sixth Avenue in 1929 and on Lexington Avenue in 1930, it is not so much because they are forgetful as because for the most part they are entirely different people who have moved in from London and Chicago while the New Yorkers of the twelve months earlier have gone to Africa, Palm Beach, and China. It is also quite certain, as Paul Morand has repeatedly pointed out, that what is new in New York is always more beautiful and better than what is old. This statement may not be comprehensible to the inhabitants of Bruges or Segovia, but nevertheless it is quite true. [Panorama] [Prohibition]

The “sights” of New York change perpetually: McGowan’s Pass Tavern, Jack’s, Shanley’s, Rectors, have all disappeared while the new Casino in Central Park would not be on speaking terms with the old. The Brooklyn Bridge is still to be observed, but the Hudson tube is a more modern wonder. Negro Harlem has supplanted Chinatown and the Bowery in the affections of those who seek diversion at night. The Woolworth Building, once the eighth wonder of the world, is no longer solitary or even paramount. Towers have sprung up on every hand—and continue to rise—until New York begins to resemble in the twilight a greater and more glimmering glittering San Gimignano in which the machine-gun battles of the gangsters and racketeers remind one of the medieval conflicts between the Guelfs and Ghibellines.

Ibid., p. 142.

If the Chanin Building were to be torn down next week, nobody in New York would realize it was gone.

“The Chanin Building? It’s all right with me. Let ’em tear it down!”

“The Chanin Building? A very good idea!”

“The Chanin Building? Jeez, miss, they tore that down years ago!”

Atkinson, p. 38.

The vanished ornaments of our city: the beautiful Produce Exchange at Beaver and Bowling Green, destroyed in the mid-fifties; the three Brokaw mansions at 79th and Fifth, two of which were smashed into rubble in 1965, to be replaced by an ugly high rise; Rhinelander Gardens on 11th Street between Sixth and Seventh Avenues, with their cast-iron filigreed balconies and deep front gardens, demolished in the late fifties; the splendid Studio Building at 51-55 West 10th Street, designed by Richard Morris Hunt, inhabited by a string of artists, including John La Farge and Winslow Homer, until it was demolished in 1954; the elegant, high-ceilinged cast-iron buildings on Worth Street between Church and Broadway, torn down in 1963 to make way for a parking lot; the old Ziegfeld Theater at 54th and Sixth; the Astor Hotel on Broadway between 44th and 45th; dozens of others. A city is always more than its architecture, but to destroy the past that is expressed by enduring architecture is an assault on history itself. Growing up here, you learned one bitter lesson: Whenever something was destroyed for the crime of being old, what replaced it was infinitely worse.

Steaming machines and riveters grating
Motors instead of men
Buildings go up with wrecking crews waiting
To tear them down again
Ono, “Midsummer.”
Luxury apartment buildings rose up, and French flats, family brownstones, and historic mansions were carted off in pieces to the dump.

Hawes, N. pag.

The records show that the streets were always in a state of disrepair; the city was always being torn down and rebuilt.

Atkinson, p. 262.

There is a geometric progression of chaos. [Grid]

Corbusier, p. 111.

The latest skyscraper is always the best.

Federal Writers, p. 13.

A metropolis forever in the making, New York is a constant reminder of the mutability of urban landscapes and the radical impermanence of the city.

On January 1, 1898, New York had become Greater New York, verified the passing of Old New York, and relegated the old ways and the old cityscape to the history books.

Hawes, N. pag.

Looking back on the splendid relaxation of 1945, it seems that just for a spell the city was finished, was staying the same, as it contemplated its new status in the world and breathed the long sigh of victory.

Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 11.

New York is not a finished or completed city. It gushes up. On my next trip it will be different.

Corbusier, p. 45.

He visited again in 1928.

Hawes, N. pag.

When Henry James returned to New York in 1904, he saw gold dust in the air. New York looked like a boom town, he said, and surmised that the changes were mere tokens of those yet to come. Describing the twenty-story triangulated Fuller Building, which had just risen on a strange and stingy little pie-shaped piece of real estate pointed uptown at the southern end of Madison Square, Saltus pointed out, like a clairvoyant, that “Its front is lifted to the future. On the past its back is turned.” [Stieglitz]

Ibid., N. pag.

It scarcely seems possible that this vertical island, as frail as skittles, as solid as trees, could exist. And yet you know it’s not just a fantasy of form but a living city. It changes not just because its permutation of relationships, one building to another, is close to infinite, but because the city itself is dedicated to change. With cannibalistic delight New York consumes itself, tearing down the old and then creating, and not always for the worse, a new structure in its place. New York, constantly surprising you, constantly tightening the screws of its own intensity, is the ultimate city of the world, the last word in urban existence; around the clock it will make its demands of you, never letting you go, rarely allowing you to relax, repeatedly assauling the senses.

Brook, p. 15.

As a whole section of the city like the Upper West Side changed its contours, it was like a great geological event—the collision of continents or the birth of mountain ranges. The territory literally erupted. Dynamite blasts rocked the neighborhood, shaking houses and scaring horses in the street. Broadway opened up like a fault. In almost every block of the grid, there were yawning pits in the bedrock, created by the vast excavations necessary for the foundations of the new, oversized buildings. [Psychogeography] [Grid]

Hawes, N. pag.

To define a building is to tell its history. Originally a row house, built for a single family in the nineteenth or early twentieth century, it has since been converted into apartments, usually one to a floor. Kitchens have been added on the upper stories, and bathrooms, too, to make each floor a self-contained unit. The old house’s staircase has become a common area, giving access to each apartment’s door. There are thousands of such buildings, all across the city.

Sanders, p. 207.

For Frank O’Hara, New York was the New Jerusalem. I remember just going down the street with him when they were tearing down some brownstones. I said, in the usual clichéd way, “Oh what a pity they’re tearing down those brownstones.” Frank said, “Oh no, that’s the way New York is. You have to just keep tearing it down and building it up. Whatever they’re building they’ll tear that down in a few years.”

Gooch, p. 218.

As usual in New York, everything is torn down before you have had time to care for it. Head bowed, at the shrine of noise, let me try to recall what building stood here. Was there a building at all? I have lived on this same street for a decade.

Merrill, p. 21.

Throughout the 1920s, new buildings appeared every fifty-one minutes.

Hawes, N. pag.

Midtown, since shortly after 1900 the city’s nighttime center, looked more threadbare and tired every year, with decades-old institutions like the Stork Club, Lindy’s, or Toots Shor’s aging and moribund. Yet by the 1960s the suburbs were beginning to show unmistakable hints of senescence as well—full of passive human livestock who lumbered unseeingly through mindless workdays, then sat out their evenings, faces gaping and gray-blue in the light from television sets. To the baby boom children dangerous or not, New York started to seem desirable, even its decrepitude romantic and alive with opportunity. [Media]

Caldwell, p. 313.

Early in the twentieth century, every city had its “Great White Way.” Most of these went dark after World War Two, when the Federal Highway System engineered the destruction of downtowns all over the country; New York alone survived to tell the tale.

Yesterday's solution became today's problem.
Feininger, Face, unpaginated.

At present, [New York] is like a house-moving, all the furniture in confusion, scattered about, unkempt. But order will come.
Corbusier, p. 45.

What follows demolition is preordained by the divine right of development. There will be the same new buildings out of the same old mold, sleekly commercial or shoddily residential; and in the ground floor store space of all, as if by some holy decree, there will be banks.

Neighborhoods fall like dominoes.

Every building shown here has since been demolished.
Laredo, p. 22.

I've begun work on the west side, and in Washington Market I have somewhat a jump on the demo men. The Trade Center site is practically impossible to work in. PATH has the ruins guarded, and the wrecking is going so fast that buildings have disappeared overnight. As I see it now I might weave a kind of song of destruction. The base of it would be a documentary record of buildings and blocks soon to be demolished, and a record of demolition work... The market, located in the area since the War of 1812, was moved one day to a new quarters in Hunts Point, the Bronx. the silence left in the streets was startling. As one wanderer put it, everyone left one night, even the dogs and the rats.
Lyon, p. 12.

There's nothing quite like a good house wrecking. Come one, come all. You are cordially invited to a demolition watching. It's a great performance of a kind being given with increasing frequency in Manhattan, one that could replace the "happening" as the most chic of avant-garde architectural event... Free demolition watchings will be offered in all of New York's best styles and periods: High Victorian, Early Skyscraper, Cast Iron Commercial in Lower Manhattan, Greek Revival on the waterfront.

Last call for anyone who wants to see the wonders of old New York, the real, live, genuine, remaining bits of the old city in Lower Manhattan, sitting at the feet of the most famous skyscrapers in the worlds. The biggest buildings on the smallest streets, the newest next to the oldest, the soaring present and the small-scale past. There is no doubt about it, this jam-packed mass of spectacular stone and steel with its dash of historical seasoning is the most spontaneously romantic and shatteringly magnificent cityscape ever know.

Fate probably never meant Lower Manhattan to attain any semblance of hoary antiquity anyway. Almost every vestige of the original Dutch village was burned away by great fires in 1776 and 1778. The area was leveled to ash again in 1835.

The splendor of the necessary acts of destruction are almost magnificent in themselves—small wonder that some planners find ruthless change fascinating.
Silver, p. 12.

The esteemed cobbled slips and lanes, the Greek Revival coffee and spice houses just about the Battery that are rapidly disappearing and taking with them the sense of the harbor's historic sailing age, the shabby Georgian-Federal structures redolent of fish in the old Fulton Market; dormered and pitch-roof brick houses against the Gothic stone and spiderweb steel of the Brooklyn Bridge; the granite blocks and Greek lintels that still face ropeworks and casual bars and beaneries in the old city; the 19th-century breaks in the 20th-century skyscraper-lined canyons that let in the sleety New York sky and the ghosts of New York history. It is all going, going, gone.

Remember Brooklyn Bridge South? The city crushed the life and color out of it and handed the wreckage to developers for urban renewal superblocks. We won't bore you with the losses again; they are recorded in New York histories and architectural textbooks. They are also preserved on hundreds of feet of underground movies and uncounted photographs by artists, historians and observers of the New York scene who roamed the rosy brick rubble—there is no brick quite as handsome as that of the 18th and early 19th centuries—while recording film and grim despair. (You meet some of the most interesting people on demolition sites.)
Ibid., pp 115-6.

For several years the Times carried a box that contained addresses of buildings destroyed the previously day or night.
Berman, Calling, p. 19.

And then, instantly, as if by magic, the fires stopped. In the last year of fire insurance, the Bronx lost about thirteen hundred buildings; in the first year of no fire insurance, it lost twelve.
Ibid., p. 25.

I got used to seeing large fires in that direction every night, usually set by arsonists hired by landlords of empty buildings who found it an easy choice to make, between paying property taxes and collecting insurance. Avenue C was a lunar landscape of vacant blocks and hollow tenement shells.
Sante, "My Lost City," N. pag.

Without giving much thought to it, New Yorkers naturally consider that they are living in the most modern and most luxurious city in the world. Nothing could be farther from the truth. As a matter of fact, most of this city is tumble-down, old-fashioned, battered and crumbling. Walking about the streets and observing the state of dwelling houses in general, you get the uncomfortable feeling that this is a doomed city. [Apocalypse]
Atkinson, p. 28.
The illustrations of Joseph Pennell wishfully ruin the city in order to make it pictorially appealing. Thus, while the engineers are building New York, Pennell is picturesquely demolishing it.
Conrad, p. 79.

A splayed lintel or the double keystone of an eighteenth-century survival rates with the spotting of a pileated woodpecker. [Nature]
Huxtable, Architecture of NY, pp. 32-3.

Abbott’s images are obituaries. These houses no longer exist, she noted in 1943 of a Cherry Street row she had photographed in 1931. [Photography] [Reproduction] [Media]
Conrad, p. 169.

We could tear the Chrysler building down in nine months. The Woolworth Building would take my army eight months to reduce to dust.

Modern demolition is truly wonderful. As a spectacle it is the opposite of a rocket launch. The twenty-storey block remains perfectly vertical as it slides towards the centre of the earth. It falls straight, with no loss of its upright bearing, like a tailor’s dummy falling through a trap-door, and its own surface area absorbs the rubble.
Baudrillard, America, p. 17.

In an unusual challenge for demolition experts, contractors are planning to lop off the top 12 floors of a 31-story tower at 108 East 96th Street, just east of Park Avenue.
Kaplan, p. 40.

Workers strip the Ansonia Hotel of four 100-pound cornices during the wartime scrap metal drive.
Diehl, p. 148.

Of course the Woolworth is nothing but yesterday’s little old skyscraper, and nobody pays attention to it any more.
Atkinson, p. 93.
The commuter is the queerest bird of all. The suburb he inhabits has no essential vitality of its own and is a mere roost where he comes at day's end to go to sleep. Except in rare cases, the man who lives in Mamaroneck or Little Neck or Teaneck, and works in New York, discovers nothing much about the city except the time of arrival and departure of trains and buses, and the path to a quick lunch. He is desk-bound, and has never, idly roaming in the gloaming, stumbled suddenly on Belvedere Tower in the Park, seen the ramparts rise sheer from the water of the pond, and the boys along the shore fishing for minnows, girls stretched out negligently on the shelves of the rocks; he has never come suddenly on anything at all in New York as a loiterer, because he has had no time between trains. He has fished in Manhattan's wallet and dug out coins, but has never listened to Manhattan's breathing, never awakened to its morning, never dropped off to sleep in its night. About 400,000 men and women come charging onto the Island each weekday morning, out of the mouths of tubes and tunnels. Not many among them have ever spent a drowsy afternoon in the great rustling oaken silence of the reading room of the Public Library, with the book elevator (like an old water wheel) spewing out books onto the trays. They tend their furnaces in Westchester and in Jersey, but have never seen the furnaces of the Bowery, the fires that burn in oil drums on zero winter nights. They may work in the financial district downtown and never see the extravagant plantings of Rockefeller Center, the daffodils and grape hyacinths and birches and the flags trimmed to the wind on a fine morning in spring. Or they may work in a midtown office and may let a whole year swing round without sighting Governors Island from the sea wall. The commuter dies with tremendous mileage to his credit, but he is no rover. His entrances and exits are more devious than those in a prairie-dog village; and he calmly plays bridge while buried in the mud at the bottom of the East River. The Long Island Rail Road alone carried forty million commuters last year; but many of them were the same fellow retracing his steps.

The terrain of New York is such that a resident sometimes travels farther, in the end, than a commuter. Irving Berlin's journey from Cherry Street in the lower East Side to an apartment uptown was through an alley and was only three or four miles in length; but it was like going three times around the world.

The Connecticut contingent of Wall Street and Park Avenue arrived in waves of cologne. They were bond traders and advertising executives, lawyers and radio personalities, the blue bloods and blue shirts. The men wore tasseled loafers, suede loafers, wing tips. They sported gold watches and legal briefs. The woman wore a power suit.

LeDuff, p. 114.

The place was crowded with commuters putting down a drink before the ride home. They had brought in on their clothes—on their shoes and umbrellas—the rancid smell of the wet dusk outside.

And then something happened. No one thought it would, but it did, which just goes to show that you can never tell about these things. She turned thirty-five and she met this investment banker who worked for Salomon Brothers, and before you knew it, they were married, she was pregnant, and they were moving to Greenwich. [Suburbs]
Bushnell, N. pag.

"Nothing will change," she said. "We'll still get together all the time and you can come to visit us and we'll have barbecues in the summer."
We all said, Yeah, yeah, yeah.
Bushnell, N. pag.

The suburbanite is merely an intelligent heretic who has discovered that the mass of New York or Chicago or Zenith is a mean environment.

A substitute hometown in which everyone lives and no one is at home.
Federal Writers, p.5.

Long Island as a gigantic cul-de-sac, a dead end.
Caro, p. 942.

You can’t think east; it’s got to be west. Your raw materials have to come in from the west; your finished products have to go out to the west. And the west is New York, and New York is congestion.
Ibid., p. 942.

you will split the heavens of Long Island and resurrect your living human Jesus from the superhuman tomb
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 7.

Wantagh, Seaford, Massapequa, Massapequa Park, Amityville, Copiague, Lindenhurst, Babylon.
Trebay, p. 312.

Onto Long Island’s potato fields was going to be dumped a population the size of Philadelphia.
Caro, p. 943.

Last Sunday afternoon I took a trip to Hackensack,
But after I gave Hackensack the once over, I took the next train back.
Porter, "I Happen to Like N.Y"

Girls coming to live in New York, like any out-of-towner here for a spree, are often grotesque caricatures of the well-turned-out New York Girl. Their hair is too high, teased, pampered or dated. Their clothes too short, bizarre or tight. Their make-up too extreme… Not yet aware that even models don’t appear in public as they do in the ads, the new girls imitate them and wind up looking like animated cartoons. Depending on whose hands they fall into… or through… or are influenced by… they may eventually acquire the New York polish.
Petronius, p. 8.

A giant orphanage. Many of those who come here have lost or, purposely, mislaid those parents they once had. At Thanksgiving they gather friends and talk of having a real “family” holiday, meaning the peer group of the moment.
New York is a prerequisite to America a disguised sin
The Last Poets, "N.Y. N.Y."

I knew I couldn’t live in America and I wasn’t ready to move to Europe so I moved to an island off the coast of America—New York City.

Gray, Quote, N. pag.

A mysterious island in the mare tenebrosum.
Stokes, p. i.

So that the one thing I am certain of is what I set out with... that New York Is Not America...and of that I am certain—certain sure—because all, all the rest, the inhabitants of Terre Haute, of Seattle, of Los Angeles, of St. Augustine, of Norfolk, Va., or Boston, Mass... all, all the rest of the inhabitants of the Republic of the United States of North America will assure you that New York is not that.
Ford, America, p. 233.

America collapses inside New York.
Maffi, p. 76.

The American who settles in New York becomes at once an ex-American.
Ford, America, p. 95.

The sense of not being a part of America.

I don’t like New York. It’s just another foreign country.

I would remain physically in Harlem and psychologically in Alabama.

Somewhere in the grainy, indivisible out-there: area code 718, and what did that signify—the Bronx, Queens?

Siting here in Queens
Eating refried beans
We’re in all the magazines
Gulpin’ down thorazines
Ramones, “Happy Family."

The Bronx/No Thonx
Moorhouse, p. 58.

No sleep ‘til-Brooklyn
Beastie Boys, “No Sleep."

I-I-I mean, I’m comparatively normal for a guy raised in Brooklyn.
Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.

Brooklyn has all the luck.
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 134.
Staten Island is the Australia of New York City.
Sullivan, 1001 p. 201.

Three kinds of New Yorkers move to the country—the small-salaried family man, the Bohemian, real or pseudo, who now finds it smart to commune with nature and the very rich cosmopolitan who automatically has a home in Long Island or Westchester just as he does in Paris or Palm Beach, and stays in none.

I hereby prophesy that in 1900 A.D. Brooklyn will be the city and New York will be the suburb.
Templeton, p. 565.

To Manhattanites, Brooklyn remained a vague region lying between the East River and the Atlantic Ocean at Coney Island, a human reservoir hat released its floods into the subway during he early morning rush-hour and drew them back during the evening one.
Morris, Incredible, p. 291.

Speaking for myself, I know I’m very tired of this city.
Atkinson, p. 266.

Let’s not delay,
Make Mother Nature our Messiah,
New York is not for us,
Let’s fly away!
Porter, “Let’s Fly Away.”

I’m going back to New York City
I do believe I’ve had enough
Dylan, “Tom Thumb.”

Commuter Train

Living standards on affluent Long Island were high even for America. The homes of many Long Island Rail Road commuters were large, luxurious, thickly carpeted, richly drapered, crammed with the most modern appliances for cleanliness and cooking. The vicissitudes of climate were eliminated for them not only in their homes—no county in America had so many centrally air-conditioned homes as Nassau—but in their automobiles, all of them heated, most of them air-conditioned. These automobiles—the automobiles out of which Long Islanders stepped every weekday morning to board the Long Island Rail Road—symbolized the degree to which the affluence and technological genius of America had given its people a life cushioned against physical discomfort.

Then the train arrived, and the Long Islanders climbed aboard.

The linoleum on the floors of the coaches into which they stepped was cracked and split, impacted with layers of grime. Paint was flaking off grimy walls. The windows, so thickly smeared with grime that you could hardly see through some of them, were filled with spider webs, and with the lacy spread of thin cracks radiating out from holes smashed in them and never repaired. Some of the holes were covered with bits of cardboard held on with tape; others gaped jaggedly.

The seats were ripped and humped. Their springs were sprung. Their backs sagged limply backwards. Sitting in those seats meant sitting in dirt. If you rested your arm on a windowsill, your coat sleeve came away covered with dust. You sat with your feet among wads of chewed-up gum on which the spittle had long since dried, among gum and candy wrappers, sheets of newspapers, fragments of ice-cream cones and, occasionally, discarded hunks of food. It was a good idea not to let your eyes focus on the floor. You might see drobs of spittle, or fat bugs scuttling by your bright and shiny shoes. Yet men pushed and shoved for those seats, for those who didn’t get them had to stand, and standing on the Long Island’s swaying, lurching coaches wasn’t easy.

Particularly because one might have to stand for quite a long time. Even when it was running on time, the Long Island Rail Road was slow—incredibly slow. And the railroad seemed almost never to be running on time. There were days, in fact, on which, because of equipment malfunction in the LIRR’s main Pennsylvania Station terminal, every Long Island train was late. There were days on which every Long Island train was hours late; some commuters couldn’t remember when last they had been on time.

Getting a seat was not total victory. Getting an end seat was what counted. Many of the LIRR seats had been designed for three people—but they had been designed half a century before, when people were smaller. There wasn’t enough room for three people. Sitting in even an end seat was indignity; it was sitting with your shoulder and thigh tight against a stranger’s shoulder and thigh, pressing into him at every lurch, pushing against him while opening a newspaper or reaching into a pocket for your train ticket, surreptitiously taking advantage of shifts in his position to gain an extra quarter inch of room for your leg or arm. But sitting in the middle was indignity doubled. The person sitting there was crushed from both sides, leaned into from both sides, without room to make an unrestricted movement of any kind. “Of all the things I hated about the Long Island Rail Road,” says one woman, “the worst was sitting in the middle on those seats. You’d have men pressing against you on both sides. They didn’t mean anything by it. Some of them were sleeping and lying all over you. But it made me feel dirty. Standing at rush hour—it was the same thing. There’d be men leaning all over you. But being stuck in the middle on those seats was worse. There was never a time it happened that I didn’t get off the train feeling dirty.” It was no wonder that the first two persons to reach the three-man seats took the two end positions, and that when a third arrived, invariably the one sitting on the outside, closest to the aisle, would, instead of politely sliding over to make room for the new man on the outside, stand up and let him by to take the middle seat, careful not to look him in the eye.

In winter, the trips were cold. Heating equipment half a century old and haphazardly maintained could not be expected to work well. Not that even modern, well-maintained equipment could have kept heated a coach in which it seemed that every other window either had a hole in it or could not be shut tightly. A reporter who took a thermometer onto a LIRR train one winter day—not by any means the coldest day of the winter—found that the temperature aboard was 29 degrees. Men who in home and office enjoyed temperature controlled to the precise degree, had to travel between home and office huddled shivering in their coats.

And winter was, perhaps, better than summer. The crush in the cars kept the temperature up, and in winter that was a help. In summer, it was not, and help was needed, since 70 percent of the LIRR’s ancient rolling stock did not have air-conditioning equipment. Men who tried frantically to open windows—one could watch them tug on them furiously every few minutes on a long summer ride home—found them stuck fast. A reporter who took a thermometer onto a jam-packed LIRR train one summer — not by any means the hottest day of the summer — found that the temperature aboard was 98 degrees. Men who would not have dreamed of living in a home or working in an office that was not air-conditioned, rode each day between home and office sweltering, the sweat forming in their armpits and crotches and running down their backs and legs.

Long Island Rail Road trains did not always run late. Sometimes they did not run at all. Year by year, as already old equipment grew older, the number of trains that simply broke down on the track increased. It was no longer unusual to see a train arrive in Jamaica being pushed along by another train. The number of trains that didn’t even make it out onto a track increased. By 1964, it was not unusual for the railroad to cancel ten trains per day. One train, the 7:45 a.m. from Babylon to Brooklyn, did not appear for 102 consecutive days; would-be passengers named it “the Phantom.”

Long Islanders’ lives were cushioned—approximately twenty-two hours out of every twenty-four—by all the material wonders the twentieth century could provide. For those other two hours—two hours that could with accuracy have been called “Robert Moses’ Two Hours,” for he had made them what they were—they lived like nineteenth-century Russian peasants.

There comes a time, H. L. Mencken said, when every normal man is tempted “to spit on his hands, haul up the black flag and begin slitting throats.” The LIRR’s conductors were not responsible for conditions on the railroad. The commuters knew that—rationally. But the conductors were a visible symbol of the railroad’s management on which the commuters could vent their frustration. Men normally rational found themselves snarling and cursing conductors, refusing to show them their tickets; as a result, men who would not have been able to conceive of themselves being arrested suddenly found themselves in that state. “Arrested!” as one reporter put it: “Portly, balding, mild-mannered, 53-year-old Seymour Cummins, district sales man-ager, commuter, family man. Seymour Cummins, of all people, being led off the train by two policemen, one on each arm, as his wife watched in disbelief.” By 1968, the year Robert Moses left power, commuters were, as one writer put it, “so . . . surly that the conductors occasionally choose, like prudent lion tamers, not to enter the cage.” One freezing evening, at Jamaica, while commuters huddled in downstairs waiting rooms because the waiting rooms near the tracks upstairs were unheated, a malfunctioning public-address system prevented them from hearing announcements of incoming trains. Storming upstairs in sudden senseless fury, 250 commuters began pounding on the glass walls of the announcer’s booth, trying to get at the terrified occupant—they had broken the glass when police arrived to pull them away. On another freezing night, a train broke down some miles from the nearest station. Its passengers got off and began throwing rocks at it. Similar incidents occurred again and again. One evening in Penn Station—with 150 rush-hour trains running late—a fifty-eight-year-old bank employee from Bayside, enraged because a conductor would not open the doors to let him on a train that had loaded but had been standing for close to half an hour on the platform, reached through the window to the engineer’s booth, grabbed something and refused to let go. And when the railroad police rushed up to pull him away, suddenly, as one police sergeant put it, “this place was wall-to-wall people, thousands of people”—pulling at the policemen, punching them. “It was a riot down there,” the sergeant said. “It was actually a riot.” And it was testimony to the rage to which conditions on New York’s railroads could drive men.

Actual physical violence was, of course, unusual, and therefore it is not in violence that the true toll of commuting on the Long Island Rail Road should be computed. It is in the norm—to which the violence is only occasional, violent punctuation—the norm that endures day after day, week after week, year after year, for tens of thousands of commuters (the LIRR carried 80,000 daily), that the toll of commuting should be computed. The true extent of this toll can perhaps be described in psychiatric terms. The chairman of the Nassau County Mental Health Board, in one of the first detailed studies of the subject, discovered a “commuter syndrome,” “a mild state of chronic stress resulting from internalized rage and frustration due to the uncertainty of disrupted schedules.” It was most serious in commuters who were “business executives, overly worrying, driving, ambitious and aggressive types… Such a person, who preserves his valuable time by living to a tight schedule, is tremendously vulnerable, psychologically speaking, to transportation failures.” But the commuter syndrome, the study found, was not present only in executives. Three out of every four commuters tested suffered from its symptoms.

Chronically.

But it did not take a psychiatrist to compute the toll. A layman could do it—by asking commuters in a relaxed setting—a cocktail party, perhaps—about commuting and then taking note of the contrast between the answers he gets from young men—or men recently moved to a new home on Long Island—and those he gets from older men.

A young man might say, as twenty-six-year-old Michael Liberman of Dix Hills did one evening, “People’s lives revolve around the railroad.
You can spend five hours a day on it, and then you’re just too tired to work.” He might say, as thirty-six-year-old Allen Siegal of Roslyn did one evening, “I think we’re out of our minds to do this. The trip home is worse than eight or nine hours at the office.” Men who have been commuting for years, however, generally do not go into detail. Nor do they complain much. Their standard reply—one so standard that the questioner can hear it a dozen times in a dozen conversations—appearing sincere, is: “Oh, you get used to it after a while.”

The implications of that reply should be considered.

“Get used to it!” Accept as part of your daily existence two or three—or more—hours sitting amid dirt, crammed against strangers, breathing foul air, sweating in summer, shivering in winter. Accept that you will be doing this for a substantial portion of every working day of your life, until you are old. “Get used to it!” One has to think about what those words, so casually uttered, really mean. One has to realize that the man uttering those words has accepted discomfort and exhaustion as a part—a substantial part—of the fabric of his life.
Accepting them so completely that he no longer really thinks about them—or about the amount of his life of which they are, day by day, robbing him. We learn to tolerate intolerable conditions. The numbness that is the defense against intolerable pain has set in—so firmly that many of the victims no longer even realize that the pain is pain.

Caro, pp. 935–9.

In Grand Central Station nearly took a train on track twenty eight for Boston because it was called the Puritan. Needed to go where there’s that kind of beauty.

Donleavy, N. pag.

You can go to Grand Central and pick up the 20th Century Limited for Chicago on Track 34.

Or you can meet that girl in the polo coat who is arriving at Penn Station from college in Vermont or Ohio or Philadelphia.
_Ibid._
q - Crime

There’s more wickedness in one block of New York City than there was in a square mile of Nineveh.
Lees, p. 291.

You can walk in the Native Quarter of Tangier with less danger than on Third Avenue of New York City on a Saturday night.
Burroughs, p. 475.

People start putting “no radio” signs on their car windows. It begins as a hopeful deterrent to theft and vandalism, but quickly degenerates into a shameless advertisement for self-pity. The first signs that appeared were professionally printed stickers by manufacturers of security devices. No Radio. I take it with me! was the logo of Benzi Box, one of the first such designs. Soon, though, the signs became homemade, personalized, and increasingly desperate. No radio gave way to No radio, you already got it and ultimately, Window broken three times, radio and spare gone. You got it all.

People coming home late at night in the upper East Eighties and Nineties are compelled to struggle with three Yale locks in order to get into apartments which they will subsequently find have been robbed. (1926)
Wilson, Earthquake, p. 122.

I have calculated that if the average New Yorker makes three excursions each day, then 3.3% of his or her waking existence is spent getting in and out of an apartment. There are not too many doors in New York with fewer than four locks. To add to the difficulty, American locks turn in the opposite way from European ones, and the reflexes of a lifetime have to be reversed.
Brook, p. 45.

A lockable chain welded to the door frame so it could also be locked from the outside. To do so, two fingers had to be inserted between door and frame and the what’s—it at the end of the chain inserted into the bit on—in other words, unless you have fingers the width of knitting needles, you can’t get the damn thing to work.
Ibid., p. 45.

Funny, isn’t it, how the life possessions of a man could vanish in Manhattan, just like that.
Barry, p. xiv.

The thief attempts to look “swell,” the tough glories in careless dirt. The thief is, in his way, an artist with his hands he can do something The tough can do nothing but talk and glories in his inactivity. The thief, on the other hand, is proud of his skill at the graft. Both the thief and the tough are unsentimental and hard; they both, however, believe in being “on the level” but in different ways. The thief, if he is a good thief, is “on the level” with his pals, and is consistent and honest in his attempt “to do” the respectable world. There is, as is so often said, honor among thieves. The tough, on the other hand, if he is a good tough, obeys the law; he is “on the level” in the ordinary sense. He thinks the grafter is a brute with low taste who violently attempts to get more out of the world than is necessary. What, asked the bum, is necessary further than a little booze and a lodging house in which to sleep? And you can get that much easy; and have all the rest of your time free for philosophy and sociability at the corner saloon. The thief, therefore, is ambitious and the tough is not, except as an artist in words.

[...]

One night I was walking down the Bowery with my friend, the ex-thief, when I met my friend, the tough. We all had a drink together, and it was amusing to see them eye each other, and watch to take the other at a disadvantage. There was a kind of hostile equality between them; but when a broken down grafter, who is now a bum, entered, he received the cold shoulder from both the thief and the bona fide bum. He had fallen away from one society and was only tolerated in the society into which he had dropped.

Hapgood, p. 49-50, 50-1.

Our imagination can no longer take refuge in the unknown. The disagreeable has become a cosmopolitan fact, and the transient dream of possible good nature in others has become quite a vanishing quantity, like the receding smile of the Cheshire cat.

Ibid., p. 193.

In the course of its imperialistic expansion the metropolis, as Patrick Geddes put it, becomes a megalopolis, concentrating upon bigness and abstract magnitude and the numerical fictions of finance; megalopolis becomes parasitopolis, dominated by those secondary pecuniary processes that live on the living; and parasitopolis gives way to patholopolis, the city that ceases effectively to function and so becomes the prey of all manner of diseases, physical, social, moral. Within such a town, graft and corruption are normal processes; the greater part of the population shares the animus of the criminal, applauds him when he “gets away with it,” and condones his crime when he is caught red-handed.

So every profession has its racket; every man his price. The tonsil snatcher and the ambulance chaser and the insurance fixer and the testimonial writer have their counterparts in the higher reaches of the professions. The more universal forms of dishonor become honorable, and graft and shakedowns, like the private toll exacted for automobile and marriage licenses, become so common that they even escape notice. Those who actively oppose these customary injustices and these systematic perversions of law and decency are looked upon as disappointed men who have set their own price too high. Force, fraud, lying, chicane, become commonplace; the law is enforced by illegal methods, the constitution protected by unconstitutional practices; vast businesses are conducted in “peace” by judicious connivance with armed thugs—now active strikebreakers—whose work proceeds under the amiable eyes of the very agents supposed to combat it. No one believes that the alternative to living with honor is to die with honor: it is easier, it is more comfortable, to live sordidly, accepting dishonor. In such a city, an honest man looms high. He is a lighthouse on a low and treacherous coast. To attain even a human level becomes, in this megalopolitan environment, an arduous, almost a superhuman, task.

Mumford, Modern, p. 46.

The more grim the subways became, the more graffiti those people scrawled on the cars, the more gold chains they snatched off girls' necks, the more old men they mugged, the more women they pushed in front of the trains.

They pushed that girl in front of the train
Took her to the doctor, sewed her arm on again
Grandmaster Flash, *Message."

If you fall asleep and travel to the end of the line, you will still have your wallet and your life.

Fluctuations in currency and all the balderdash about gold and silver standards amuse the chiselers. They explain that you can live in New York, and live pretty well, without money. You use slugs instead.

Slug manufacturing is an organized industry now, employing agents to peddle the disks from the Battery to 181st Street. The best markets are in midtown Manhattan along Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Avenues, and, of course Broadway. The chiselers pay ten cents for fifteen nickel-size slugs, and slightly more for the dime and quarter sizes. Sometimes the agents get into a trade war and the chiselers get bargain rates.

The Telephone Company is more heavily beslugged than any of the other corporations, because the chiselers spend the equivalent of hundreds of dollars a week on out-of-town telephones. No profit in it, but most chiselers are not native New Yorkers and it is a cheap way to keep in touch with the folks back home. It isn’t sentiment so much; they just do it for the fun of the thing. This winter one of the Telephone Company operatives caught a chiseler in an Eighth Avenue telephone booth passing the time of day with some of his pals in Sacramento, and it got into the newspapers. They found five pounds of assorted slugs on him. Once in a while the chiselers make local calls with a cent dipped in damp salt. The salt, it seems, makes the coin as thick as a nickel and, being a good conductor, established the necessary electrical contact. The chiseling guild claims credit for that discovery.

The life of a slug-manufacturer: Alan Campbell worked on a scale of dizzying, historic proportion manufacturing slugs by the millions over years and years, but remained a phantom, hidden behind layers of distributors. Unable to hunt him down, the transit system struggled to mount a defense. It deployed an army of police officers. It tinkered with turnstile mechanisms. Even the design of the token was changed over and over.

Living rent-controlled on Clinton Street in Brooklyn Heights, he read a pamphlet on how the ordinary, cheap No. 14 brass washer could be used to make dime phone calls. It was an epiphany. “You had to Scotch-tape over one side of the hole," he said. “The phone could defend itself against the washer if the hole went all the way through. The tape blocked the hole.”

He discovered a supply house in a loft near Chambers Street that sold fasteners, nuts and bolts, and, eureka, No. 14 washers. He bought loads. Around 1970—the year the fare increased from 20 to 30 cents, triggering a mad run on all available slug supplies—he was introduced to the reciprocating press, an industrial-strength hole puncher.

In the 70s, 2,000, 8,000, 10,000 slugs a day were being collected from turnstiles. By 1985, the turnstiles were collecting 13,000 slugs per day, roughly the equivalent of all public transit ridership in Kansas City.

Campbell sent his crew to peddle token slugs by the tens of thousands, churning them out from a new factory in Paterson, N.J., and depositing bags of slugs at self-storage places around Brooklyn.

In 1986, around the time the fare went to a dollar, the transit system took its boldest anti-slug action by switching to the bull’s-eye token, with an alloy center. The slug take in the turnstiles quickly dropped to about 400 per day, a 97 percent decrease, then gradually climbed back up.

Dwyer, pp. 226-8.

DANISH 25 ORE PIECE: works in 95% of all subway turnstiles. A very safe coin to use since it will not jam the turnstile. It is 5/1000th of an inch bigger than a token.

PORTUGUESE 50 CENTAVO PIECE: the average Portuguese Centavo Piece is 2/1000th of an inch smaller than a token.

JAMAICAN HALF PENNY, BAHAMA PENNY and AUSTRALIAN SCHILLING: these coins are 12/1000th to 15/1000th of an inch smaller than token. They work in about 80% of all turnstiles. We have also had good success with FRENCH FRANC PIECE (WWII issue), SPANISH 10 CENTAVO PIECE, NICARAGUAN 25 CENTAVO PIECE.

Hoffman, Steal Yourself, p. 92.

The thief routinely puts a slug in the slot so that your token cannot be inserted. With a deft motion of his sleek metal plunger he removes the slug and your token and pulls the turnstile back so that you can slide around the barrier onto the station. He can be found selling these tokens he steals when commuters are frustrated by the rush hour line at the one toll booth on the uptown side.

In 1969 alone the phone company estimated that over 10 million dollars worth of free calls were placed from New York City.

[Technology]

Hoffman, Steal Yourself, p 75.

By April 1971 Abbie Hoffman was being interviewed on New York City’s WNET-TV, channel 13, promoting Steal This Book. He read directly from his book into the camera: “This is going to be a public disservice announcement,” he told his viewers. “To make your own credit card numbers, the 1971 credit card consists of ten digits and a letter. The first seven digits comprise any New York City telephone number. The phone company will bill this number, so make sure the number you use is nonexistent or the number of a large corporation. The next three digits are the credit card code. For New York City it’s 021. The letter is based on the sixth digit of the phone number. If the sixth digit is one, then the letter is Q. If it’s a two, it’s A . . .” Hoffman went through the complete list and concluded, “For example, for New York, you would dial 581-6000-021-Z and Channel Thirteen would pick up the bill.” The host of the TV show quickly disclaimed responsibility for this idea. [Unrest]

Lapsley, N. pag.

Hoffman: “Until AT&T and the other corporations really become public services rather than power and profit gobblers, we’ll continue to rip them off every chance we get. If you want to discuss this further, call me up some time. Because of all the agencies claiming to have me under surveillance, it’s one of the fastest ways to speak directly to your government.”

Ibid.

The World’s First Phone Phreak Convention took place in New York City on July 29, 1972. The phreaks congregated in the basement ballroom of the Hotel Diplomat, a Times Square hotel that was developing a reputation for hosting rock ‘n’ roll shows and fringe political gatherings—Yippies, Communists, and Libertarians all had held conventions there. Alan Fierstein (“Al Bell”) of YIPL was the master of ceremonies, presiding over attractions that included a black-and-white film showing three simple ways to make free phone calls from pay telephones, a presentation on the black box for receiving free calls, and breakout sessions on building answering machines and blue boxes. Yippie founder Abbie Hoffman led a workshop on the legality of phone phreaking and exhorted the attendees to support the Captain Crunch defense fund. A spy from New York Telephone later reported to the FBI that some seventy-five people were in attendance. [Technology]

Ibid.

ON JUNE 21, 1975, John Draper did something a little bit stupid. That day he entered a telephone booth in New York City and dialed an 800 number in Oakland, California. While the call was going through he held a blue box up to the phone and pressed a button, sending a burst of 2,600 Hz down the line.

“Bleep!” said the blue box. “Kerchink!” responded the telephone network.

Draper pressed more buttons. Key pulse. 127 552 2155. Start. A few seconds later the telephone network rewarded him with what sounded like a bad imitation of Donald Duck talking to one of his nephews. If you squinted your ears and used your imagination you might think it sounded almost—almost—like two people talking.

Draper pressed another button and sent another quick blip of 2,600 Hz down the line. Donald Duck was replaced by the clear voices of two people talking about a work-related matter. Draper was now in the middle of their conversation, listening quietly. He eavesdropped for a few minutes and then hung up.

Draper had just used his blue box to hack into an internal telephone company service called verification.

Ibid.

It went, dee de de de de de de dup and then the operator came on and said, ‘New York.

Ibid.

Artist Ray Johnson used to walk around New York City clogging pay phones by inserting dimes covered in mustard. (cf. Warhol: “Ray Johnson, the artist, kept dipping dimes into the mustard we were using on our German frankfurters, then going out to drop the mustard-covered dimes into the telephone slot…” [Death])

Walrod, I Knew Jim Knew, p. 45.

Don’t you know the crime rate is going up, up, up, up, up
To live in this town you must be tough, tough, tough, tough, tough!
The Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

Daniel Rakowitz, who cut up his girlfriend and ground her bones into soup that he fed to homeless people in Tompkins Square Park.
Berrigan, E., p. 235.

Rakowitz, 31 roamed the East Village selling marijuana, carrying a live rooster and quoting Adolf Hitler’s “Mein Kampf.”

“Man Held...” N. pag.

At his subsequent sanity trials, like the repeated cannibalism charge, the district attorney went on about “the Rakowitz stare.” There is no Rakowitz stare—just a dull expression.

Patterson, “Butcher,” N. pag.

There was, clearly, blood on the moon hovering over the East Village. Something ominous was in the air.

The stabbings and stompings.

Donleavy, N. pag.

listening to the Terror through the wall

Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Cut through the tip of the park. Where the evening marauders are lurking. Swiftly to get you in headlocks or at knifepoint across the throat. If they don’t smash you first to the ground from behind. Look back.

Donleavy, N. pag.

His wife intends to keep his ashes in an urn and scatter them, a handful a day, from her tenth-floor balcony over the East River Drive; after he kills her, he considers feeding her into the kitchen disposal and packaging the long bones to hurl across the highway into the river, but instead he simply throws her out of the window onto the traffic.

Conrad, p. 308.

Since returning to New York William S. Burroughs has gradually equipped himself with a small arsenal of weapons that includes a cane, a tube of teargas, which can be released in an assailant’s face by depression of a plunger and is particularly effective in subway situations, and a blackjack. “I never go out of the house without all three on me,” he says pointedly. “I don’t feel dressed without them.”

It was a bitterly cold, icy December night as I ran up the Bowery from the phone box on the corner of Canal Street to the gates of the Bunker where William was waiting concernedly.

“If I’d known it was like this I wouldn’t have asked you out,” were his first words as he opened the metal gates. He was wearing a jaunty tweed jacket, brown suede shoes, light brown pants, shirt, tie and sweater. “I went out today,” he said on the way upstairs. “It’s on days like this that you really [opening the front door and ushering me in] get to appreciate the Bunker. All the heat you can use.” [Weather]

Bockris, Burroughs, p. 155.

BURROUGHS: Did you read about those young scoundrels who terrorized a train? We must get our cane brigade organized.

BOCKRIS: Bill and I have organized a cane fighters group. Everyone has a cane like this and we’re going to go on the subways. Three or four of us in the evening.
GINSBERG: New York City, 1980—the Cane Brigade! On my block everyone is armed with a staff or cane.
BURROUGHS: These are great, terrifically effective weapons.
BOCKRIS: There are many things you can do.
BURROUGHS: I'm ordering a blackjack for you. [Subway]

My eyes travel to the spectacle of Burroughs as he turns and says, "Guns are a part of my life. I was brought up around them." Suddenly in the middle of the meal, he walks calmly over to a storage area behind a small walk-in closet and re-emerges carrying a toy M-16. Posting himself in the middle of the room, some six feet away from the table, he snaps the thing up to his shoulder and carefully aims at the other end of the loft. "Yep! This is what they use," he states flatly—and for a moment I get a frozen flash of him, a close-up that knocks me out of my seat.

The last few days have been hectic and contained much violence. Hanging around a restaurant on the corner of the Bowery, I have participated in adventures one might expect of scenes from a Hollywood movie. Hoodlums and shady characters—Drug addicts, prostitutes, pimps, nickel and dim hustlers, Brooklyn mobsters, goof-ball addicts, odd types and Bowery bums.
Reay, p. 269.

Surely, Walt Whitman would have reveled in the scene: for here were human beings as lacking in misery and respectability as even the great poet could desire.
Hapgood, p. 137.

In a set of “Bad, Worse & Worst” jokes in a Betty comic hook, one entry read: “Bad: lost tooth; Worse: lost homework; Worst: lost in New York.”
Freeman, p. 336.

I don't even know why they have human police officers. They should just put animals out there patrolling the streets. Word up! Cause they’re worse than animals. It’s like they’re animals with a mind. [Unrest]
Courgois, p. 37.

“Brooklyn Youth...” p. 33.

The Gophers (Goofers) in Hell’s Kitchen: Such names as Newburgh Gallagher, Marty Brenna, Stumpy Mallarkey, Happy Jack Mullraney.
O’Connor, p. 164.
A murdered man lies below a target shape painted in the O of a gang’s name, ROYALS. [Textuality]
Sharpe, p. 294.

For six dollars a night, plus expenses, the detective agreed to show Reverend Parkhurst the seamy side of New York life. Naturally, they would need disguises.

The first night out on the town the three men stopped at Tom Summers’ Saloon at 33 Cherry Street, where they drank whiskey that tasted like embalming fluid and watched little girls buy booze at ten cents a pint to take home to their fathers. Next, they headed for a whorehouse at 342 Water Street, where painted women stood in the doorway soliciting trade. The next stop was another red-light house, where a young prostitute asked Parkhurst to dance.

On their next nocturnal trip the explorers headed for the Bowery and visited several brassy cabarets, known as concert gardens. Then they saw “tight houses,” where all women wore tights. Brothels were then classified by the nationalities of their inmates, so on Forsyth Street the three men visited a “German house.” Feeling better physically, Parkhurst demanded that Gardner “show me something worse.”

In Chinatown, northeast of what it now Foley Square, they watched a game of fan-tan and then paddled into the murky room of a nearby building, where they found a Chinese man, his Caucasian wife, and their eight-year-old son smoking opium. Next came a visit to the Negro district around Sullivan and West Houston Streets, called Coontown. Then Frenchtown on the southern fringe of Washington Square in Greenwich Village. Entire blocks consisted of houses of prostitution—of all kinds. Worst of all, to the sensitive Parkhurst, was a four-story brick house on West Third Street, called the Golden Rule Pleasure Club. There they were greeted by “Scotch Ann,” who bade them enter the basement. This was partitioned into small dens, each containing a table and a couple of chairs.

As Gardner described it: “In each room sat a youth, whose face was painted, eyebrows blackened, and whose airs were those of a young girl. Each person talked in a high falsetto voice, and called the others by women’s names.”[Sex] [Opium] Ellis, Darkness, pp. 425-7.

The gangster is the man of the city, with the city’s language and knowledge, with its queer and dishonest skills and its terrible daring. He’s a creature embroidered with myth, who inhabits “that dangerous and sad city of the imagination… He is under the obligation to succeed not because the means he employs are unlawful. In the deeper layers of modern consciousness all means are unlawful… one is punished for success.
Charyn, pp. 69- 70.

Like girlfriends, bikes are always getting stolen in New York. “If you go into a bookstore for ten minutes, you come out and your bike is gone,” said Mr. Eccles… “The bike pays for itself in three months if you compare it to subway fare,” he said. “One month, if you take taxis.”
Bushnell, N. pag.

Wear a casual fur on Avenue C and you’ll be totally misunderstood, maybe even assaulted—what was I thinking? … As the cab rolled up in front of a run-down redbrick walk-up, I was glad I had changed into my quilted black jacket, the perfect transitional outfit for traveling below 14th and back. A coat for all zip codes. You can’t tell what it costs unless you look carefully—at the inside.
Quan, p. 58.

Passing a Woolworth’s, she gripped my arm: “Let’s steal something,” she said, pulling me into the store, where at once there seemed a pressure of eyes, as though we were already under suspicion. “Come on. Don’t be chicken.”
Capote, p. 44.

You consider performing an act of inspired madcappery at her behest: stealing the hat from a policeman, or the handcuffs from one of the gay caballeros of Christopher Street. Maybe climb a lamppost and wave her scarf from the top.
McInerney, p. 67.

Then Richie, Richie said:
“Hey man let’s dress up like cops Think of what we could do!”
But something, something said “you better not”
Television, “Venus.”

They would shoplift from the local A&P grocery, or sometimes they would steal from Smilers.
Carter, p. 59.

Booster: a shoplifter who carries stuff out of stores between her legs.
Lyford, p. 71.

In 1999 Tom Sachs got his gallerist, Mary Boone, arrested for unlawful distribution of ammunition, possession of unlawful weapons, and resisting arrest. Sachs landed her in trouble with his Alvar Aalto glass vase filled with live bullets, which were given away as party favors in Hermès-style airsick baggies, and a gun cabinet, called Ace Boone Coon, stocked with his signature homemade handguns.
Walrod, p. 78.

Early one summer evening, there was a loud altercation directly across the street in the doorway of the Russian-Turkish Baths. Suddenly, one man picked up a chair and brought it down with tremendous force on the head of another man. The latter toppled and rolled down a dozen steps to the foot of the stoop, where he lay dead on the sidewalk in a great puddle of blood.
The three old ladies observed all this with aplomb and very little dismay, and long before the corpse was lugged away they had returned to their evening chat.
Later, after the handyman at the baths had hosed down the steps and sidewalks, the kids pre-empted the location for a rousing game of cops and robbers.
Binzen, N. pag.

Naked City

A loner married to his job, sleeping in his clothes next to a police radio, Weegee tacitly accepts the dadaist coupling of man and mechanism: Picabia’s mechanical portraits and Duchamp’s erosics of the machine.
Sharpe, p. 292.

When he goes to bed in his room across the street from police headquarters, the city murmurs to him from the police-approved shortwave radio beside his bed. Even in slumber he is responsive to her. He will sleep through fifteen unpromising police calls and leap out of bed at the promising sixteenth. In sickness and in health he will take his camera and ride off in search of new evidence that his city, even in her most drunken and disorderly and pathetic moments, is beautiful. [Sex] [Body] [Technology]
Weegee, Naked p. 6.

Loving the city, Weegee has been able to live with her in the utmost intimacy. When he goes to bed in his room across the street from police headquarters, the city murmurs to him from the police-approved shortwave radio beside his bed. Even in slumber he is responsive to her.
Ibid., p. 292.

From midnight to one o’clock, I listen to calls to the station houses about peeping Toms on the rooftops and fire escapes of nurses’ dormitories. [Voyeur]
Ibid., p. 292.

_Naked City:_ Weegee’s title suggests that he uses his lens to strip bare the behavior and emotions of New Yorkers, but it also alludes to the erotic appeal of looking at anything proposed as naked—a city, a street, or even a sidewalk, never mind naked violence, naked suffering, and naked truth. [Voyeur]
Ibid., pp. 292-3.

Wet, shimmering pavements, round-fendered cars reflect the light, misty halos around the lampposts.
Ibid., p. 293.

The city surrenders itself to Weegee at night because sleep relaxes its guard.
Conrad, p. 271.

Weegee understood the night to be an exact inversion of the working day. Rather than an uneventful intermission in consciousness, it has an agenda of its own. He dutifully audited its schedule on his police radio. Its crimes were a punctilious mimicry of diurnal routine.
Ibid., p. 271.

Between midnight and 1 a.m., the peeping toms would be out snooping.
Ibid., pp. 272-3.

Between 1 and 2, late-night delis would be held up.
Ibid., pp. 272-3.

Between 2 and 3 came the auto accidents and fires.
Ibid., pp. 272-3.

At 4 the bars closed, so the police would round up drunkards.
From 4 to 5 was the hour sacred to burglaries.

After 5 came the suicides of insomniac despairers.

Weegee adjusted himself to this nocturnal regime by starting his day at midnight. If he slept, he would leave the police radio playing by his bed. Its babble of accident and mayhem could then insert itself into his subconscious, transmitting directly from the city’s dream-life to his own. [Dream City]

He de glamorizes the night, cheapens its charm, using his flash to blast away shadows and eliminate subtle gradations of tone. In fact, in Weegee’s world of black and white, it’s often hard to tell if it even is night.

In his crime and accident scenes, detail litters the street like an old newspaper: gum spots, cigarette butts, awnings, railings, moldings, trash, and above all signs, letters, and words, rendered both trivial and oracular by the disasters occurring beneath them.

Weegee reglamorizes the night as a place of danger and bizarre coincidence, the Grim Reaper working from a script by O. Henry.

He is the Matthew Brady of the New York night.

There are no gray areas in Weegee’s photos.

Things are black and white, or more accurately, alive and dead, though it is sometimes hard to tell the difference.

Weegee opens Naked with a series of shots of people sleeping outdoors in the summer—we see the soles of their shoes, their outflung arms, their heads thrown toward us flat on the pavement. They resemble Riis’s sleepers and Weegee’s own corpses. There’s even one man who bridges the gap, stretched on the sidewalk in front of a funeral parlor.

Weegee likes his subjects to have “nice white, chalky faces.”

I catch New Yorkers with their masks off.

Bleached out by the flash, the flesh of his subjects seems like it has been soaking in the river for a few days; at its best it has that artificially lit whiteness we find in Hopper’s women.
Sharpe, p. 294.

It was Weegee's genius to make ordinary crime seem both exceptional and pervasive.
_Ibid._, p. 294.

If O. Henry killed off the refined literary flâneur, Weegee resurrects the figure in vulgar tabloid form.
_Ibid._, p. 295.

If we compare Weegee to his great contemporaries in London and Paris, Bill Brandt and Georges Brassai, he makes the former look static and stuffy, and the latter seem overly artistic and contrived.
_Ibid._, p. 296.

A 1942 photo shows cops covering up a body underneath a movie marquee that advertises the Irene Dunne film _The Joy of Living._
_Ibid._, p. 297.

Nocturnal urban theater at its finest, a good view of a bad thing.
_Ibid._, p. 297.

Face down on the sidewalk "the deceased," as the cops say, has hardly ceased bleeding, but the manhole cover just behind him reminds us where he is headed.
_Ibid._, p. 301.

There was a sudden drop in Murders and Fires (my two best sellers, my bread and butter).
_Weegee, Naked_, p. 11.

These are the men, women, and children on the sidewalks of New York... always rushing by... as if life itself depended on their reaching their destination... but always finding time to stop and look at a fire... murder... a woman about to jump off a ledge... also to look at the latest news is on the electric sign on the Times Building in Times Square... the latest baseball results pasted in windows of stores... and to listen to music coming out of phonograph stores.

They always want to know what paper I'm from and if the person is dead. They seem to be disappointed if they see a sign of life as the stretcher with the injured is carried before them.

The cops have their hands full at fires with the spectators, and have to watch out that they don't get injured by falling debris... high pressure hose lines break! When they have had their fill of the scene, they disappear as quickly as they came... in a terrific hurry...
_Ibid._, _Naked_ p. 34.

The surprising thing about New York families, living as they do in such crowded conditions, is that they still manage to crowd in pets like dogs, cats, parrots, which they always try to save at fires. At one fire, I saw a woman running out holding a cardboard box with a couple of snakes inside. I questioned her. (It was none of my business, but I'm curious about people)... she told me she was a dancer who used the snakes in her act. At fires in which persons are burned to death... the bodies are brought out wrapped in canvass bags... by firemen... while a police radio car will go to the nearest church, wake up the priest, who will rush to the scene in the cop's radio car and give the last rites. This always makes me cry... but what can I do... taking pictures is my job... and besides I'd rather take a picture of someone being rescued alive it makes a better picture. At fires I also make shots of the crowds watching the fires for the detectives and fire marshals who are always on the scene... on the look out for pyromaniacs ... jealous lovers ... thrill seekers ... disappointed would-be firemen who having failed in their examinations will start fires... Also at fires where there are rescues... different firemen will take credit for such rescues... my photos decide who did make the rescue and end all disputes.

_Ibid._, p. 52.

Someone rushed in and saved the Torah (Holy Scroll) from the synagogue... strange at fires holy objects seem to be immune to flames... God must watch over them. [Cosmics]

_Ibid._, p. 67.

A couple driven out from the burning tenement... I don’t know their names... but I did hear someone call him “Pincus”... so here they are right across the street from their burning tenement... it looks like Pincus had time to grab a woman’s dress... his best coat... but minus the pants.

_Ibid._, p. 71.

These are dead bodies... wrapped by firemen in “bodybags” The priest is giving the last rites to all that’s left of a mother and her two babies... besides the firemen... there are no spectators... it’s early morning... people are rushing to work... and can’t stop to look... they’d be late... and the boss will holler like hell...

_Ibid._, p. 72.

I cried when I took this picture. Mother and daughter cry and look up hopelessly as another daughter and her young baby are burning to death in the top floor of the tenement... firemen couldn’t reach them in time... on account of the stairway collapsing.

_Ibid._, p. 74.

People get bumped off... on the sidewalks of New York. The only unusual thing about these killings is that they are never solved. The guys are always neatly dressed... fall face up... with their pearl gray hats alongside of them. Some day I’ll follow one of these guys with a “pearl gray hat,” have my camera all set and get the actual killing... could be... I got the above statement with check from Life magazine. Twenty-five dollars was for the murder picture on the right... the other picture they bought was only a cheap murder, with not many bullets... so they only paid ten dollars for that.

_Ibid._, p. 78.

This happened in Little Italy. Detectives tried to question the people in the neighborhood... but they were all deaf... dumb... and blind... not having seen or heard anything.

_Ibid._, p. 79.

One looks out of the windows... talks about the weather with neighbor... or looks at a murder.

_Ibid._, p. 80.

This happened at eight o’clock on a Sunday night... People were rushing to the movies... there was a good double feature at Lowe’s Delancey Street... one being a gangster picture... a few blocks away... in the Essex Diner... a busy boy was pasting a sign in the window, “Chef’s
A man walked in... he wasn’t looking for any specials, he had a gun. And this was a stickup. He grabbed the money from the cash register and ran out. A cop saw him and gave chase. The holdup man hid behind a parked car and started firing at the cop. The policeman fired back and killed the bandit. Here’s the cop after the shooting... very nervous, for he might have hit some innocent passers by, giving the gun to the sergeant. The cop got a medal... the gunman got the bullets.

Ibid., p. 83.

This was a friendly game of Bocci, an Italian game very popular on the East Side and played on empty lots. An argument started and one of the players was shot and killed. The dead man’s wife arrived... and then she collapsed.

Ibid., p. 84.

A woman relative cried... but neighborhood dead-end kids enjoyed the show when a small-time racketeer was shot and killed... Here he is... as he was left in the gutter. He’s got a D.O.A. tied to his arm... that means Dead On Arrival.

Ibid., pp. 86-7.

It’s a lovely evening... the full moon is out. A car somehow or other drives off the pier into the river. The couples in the parked cars in “Lovers’ Lane,” as the pier is called, run out of the cars dressed in pajamas. Police boats arrive with powerful searchlights which illuminate the waters as other cops try to get a “bite” on the car. It is a long, trying job to locate the car in the river.

Ibid., p.88.

This man covered up with newspapers was killed in an auto accident. The driver of the car was arrested, but he put up such a terrific battle... cops had to put handcuffs on him.

Ibid., p. 89.

Bread delivery truck
... in collision with woman driver.

Ibid., p. 90.

Sudden death for one
... sudden shock for the other.

Ibid., p. 91.

This was a fashionable society funeral. The obituary had received almost a whole column in the New York Times. If was just like opening night at the opera. The cute Rolls Royces arrived with their invited guests. A mob of spectators stood on the sidewalk, watching and listening to the beautiful organ music coming from the church. The uniformed chauffeurs and the professional pallbearers were grouped in a huddle on the steps of the church... they were bored and kept asking what time it was... hoping that they would get it over with, as they had some bets to place on the day’s races with their bookies. The talk drifted on which tipster was best to follow in the papers. One of the pallbearers started cursing the New York Daily Mirror and their tipsters Joe and Asbestos, who daily give out tips in their comic strip, saying he was out over sixty dollars by following them, and that they were nothing but a couple of bastards who must be working for the bookies instead of the players. Across the street from the church, delivery men were bringing in baskets of chopped meat to the Hamburger Heaven for the dinner rush; the group on the steps broke up with the pallbearers and the chauffeurs hiding their racing forms and scratch sheets inside their coats. Then the casket came down the steps and was placed hurriedly inside the hearse. An auto driving by stopped to watch. "Oh, what a beautiful morning" was coming out of the radio, sung by a tenor with a pansy voice. Somehow the car got sandwiched in with the funeral procession and they all made a turn up Fifth Avenue.

[Ball at the Waldorf-Astoria. A gay time was had by all except the guy whose shoelaces became untied... and at the United Mine Workers' Ball in the Hotel Diplomat on west 43rd street. The young miners... liked the blues singer "Oh so much."

[At No. 267 Bowery, sandwiched in between Missions and quarter-a-night flop houses, is "Sammy's," the poor man's Stork Club. There is no cover charge nor cigarette girl, and a vending machine dispenses cigarettes. Neither is there a hat check girl. Patrons prefer to dance with their hats and coats on. But there is a lively floor show... the only saloon on the Bowery with a cabaret license.

As the customers arrive from uptown in cabs, they are greeted by a bunch of panhandlers who don't ask for the usual "got a nickel for a cup of coffee mister," but instead for a dime for a glass of beer... and get it too. Inside, the place is jammed with the uptown crowd mingling with the Bowery crowd and enjoying it. But towards midnight some odd types drop in for a quick one. There is a woman called "Pruneface," a man called "Horseface"... "Ethel" the queen of the Bowery who generally sports a pair of black eyes that nature did not give her, a man with a long white beard, who old timers say is looking all over the Bowery for the man who forty years ago stole his wife... they wonder when the two meet whether the wife-stealer will get beat up or thanked.

While I was there absorbing the atmosphere and drinks, a midget walked in... he was about three and a half feet. I invited him for a drink. He told me that he had just arrived from Los Angeles, where he had been working for a Brown & Williams Tobacco Co., walking the streets dressed as a penguin. The midget was flush and started buying me drinks. He proudly showed me his social security card, told me that he was thirty-seven years old, was single as the girls were only after money, that once in a while he got some affection, but had to pay for it... After the seventh round he got boisterous and offered to fight any man his size in the house. Sammy grabbed the midget and threw him out through the doorway which has a red neon sign saying "Thank you, call again," hollering at him not to ever come back again. Sammy's has a blacklist just like Billingsley's Stork Club uptown.

Sammy greets all his patrons at the door. I noticed he frisked some of the Bowery ones. He told me that they were the "bottle" babies and he could spot them by the bulge in their hip pockets. They would try to smuggle in a bottle of "smoke" into Sammy's place to drink in the washroom because if they drank out in the street or hallways the cruising patrol wagons would pick them up. Sammy is wise to all the tricks of the Bowery chiselers, but he is also a friend and always ready to lend a helping hand... lending money so a man can get cleaned up, food and a room while he is getting over a hangover. I know Sammy gave $100 without being asked for it for a woman in the neighborhood who died and there was no money for the funeral. He also takes care of his customers' valuables. I saw one woman at the bar give Sammy her wrist watch and thirty dollars to save for her till the following day, and I also saw him turn men away from his bar, telling them not to drink till their day off.

Sammy is known as the “Mayor of the Bowery” and his ambition is to become Mayor of New York City. And when that happy day arrives Sammy promises free drinks in every gin mill in town.

Introducing Norma, the star of Sammy’s Foolish Follies...shaking everything that nature gave her. . . and not getting much response from the Bowery playboy, on left. . . Norma’s ambition is to understudy Mae West. . . but that will be a sorry day on the Bowery. . . because who will understudy Norma?

But there is beauty along this street of forgotten men. . . it lies in the patterned black and gold along the trolley tracks where the morning sun breaks through.

Not so long ago I, too, used to walk on the Bowery, broke, “carrying the banner.” The sight of a bed with white sheets in a furniture store window, almost drove me crazy. God… a bed was the most desirable thing in world. In thee summer I would sleep in Bryant Park. . . But when it got colder I transferred over to the Municipal Lodging House. . . I saw this sign on wall there. A Sadist must have put it up. I laughed to myself. . . what Cash and Valuables. . . I didn’t have a nickel to my name. But I was a Free Soul. . . with no responsibilities.

Every morning the night’s “catch’ of persons arrested is brought down from the different police stations to Manhattan Police Headquarters where they are booked for their various crimes, fingerprinted, “mugged,” in the rogues gallery and then paraded in the police line where they are questioned by police officials on a platform with a strong light on their faces . . . as detectives in the darkened room study them... and make mental notes for future reference...The parade never ceases as the “Pie” wagons unload. I’ve photographed every one of importance from gangsters, deflated big shot racketeers, a President of the N. Y. Stock Exchange, a leader of Tammany Hall and even Father Divine, who kept muttering as he was booked, “Peace, brother, peace.” The men, women and children who commit murders always fascinate me... and I always ask them why they killed... the men claim self defense, the women seem to be in a daze... but as a rule frustrated love and jealousy are the cause... the kids are worried for fear the picture might not make the papers... I will say one thing for the men and women who kill... they are Ladies and Gentlemen cooperating with me so I will get a good shot of them... the ones that “cover” up their faces are the Fences... Fagins and jewel thieves... who start crying and pleading with me not to take their picture...as their poor mothers will see it in the newspapers and it will break their hearts...they should have thought of that before they went into the crime business...I disregard their pleas and crocodile tears...

The scum of the underworld arrives for the line-up... handcuffed to cops and detectives... These are a couple of hoodlums who went around holding up small store keepers... from the line-up the next stop is the court... then Sing Sing prison...
Ibid., p. 161.

The dead lie still... while the living cry...
Ibid., pp. 202-3.

Life's problems become too complicated for some people... so they jump into the river. Cops in cruising cars hear more than just what comes their radios... this cop hears a splash... he jumps out, takes off, his coat, his shoes, then his pants which he rolls up in a bundle to hide and also to protect his gun... places all of them on the edge of the pier... and jumps into the icy water in his shirt and underwear, cursing. After a rescue the cop always has to take the trip to the hospital along with the would-be suicide to get thawed out... they have equally good chances of catching pneumonia.

The radio cars cruising the water-front are well stocked for rescue work... they carry ropes... life preservers... everything except K-rations and a Bible.
Ibid., p. 216.

And fight... The best fights in town are on the sidewalks... they are free for the spectators to enjoy... that is till a cop arrives to break it up... but the cops always arrive when the fights are over. This was a little argument outside Madison Square Garden. It was a much better fight than one sees inside on Friday nights... I don't know what they were fighting about but I guess it was nothing trivial.
Ibid., p. 222.

A man was killed by a falling cornice. I was not a party to the tragedy, and again the inches counted heavily.
White, Here, p. 22.

A joint under the el on Third Avenue. I came off the bridge and ran down Third and stopped at this joint along the way. I don't remember the street because I was too tired to look, but I'll go back and check up again and find it. There's probably a thousand places like it, but I'll find it.
Spillane, p. 165.

I tucked the paper in my pocket and walked down to my car. The taxis and commuters were jamming traffic all the way downtown, and by the time I had crossed over to Third Avenue, it was nearly six o'clock. I didn't have a bit of trouble finding that hash house again. There was even a place to park right outside it. I went in and climbed on a stool and laid the paper down in front of me with the picture up. Down at the end Shorty was pushing crackers and soup over to another bum. He hadn't seen me yet.
Ibid., p. 169.

Somehow, I worked the heap across town without killing anybody and cut up Fifty-sixth Street.
Ibid., p. 223.

A lot of people like to run down the cops. They begin to think of them as human traffic lights, or two faces in a patrol car cruising down the street hoping some citizen will start some trouble. They forget that a cop has eyes and ears and can think. They forget that sometimes a cop on a beat likes it that way. The street is his. He knows everyone on it. He knows who and what they are and where they spend their time. He doesn't want to get pulled off it even for a promotion, because then he loses his friends and becomes chained to a desk or an impersonal case.

   Twice a radio car screamed its way south, the siren opening a swath down the center of the avenue.

   A cop went by, whistling under his slicker, his night club slapping his leg in rhythm to his step. It was ten minutes after ten then.

   From the roof there was a volley of shots that smashed into stone and ricocheted across the sky. Some didn't ricochet. A shrill scream testified to that.
Search a city's slums or shabbiest streets and you will find its fashionable beginnings.
Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. 20

Those who love a city, in its profoundest sense, become the shame of that city, the détraqués, the paupers.
Jones, Modernism, p. 185.

People on the streets of New York who give money to beggars are often people who have very little themselves.
Haring, Journals, p. 134.

Ten-cent men sleep under thousand-dollar trees.
Ellis, p. 532.

New York in 1932 was half-completed skyscrapers, work on them long since halted for the lack of funds, that glared down on the city from glassless windows. It was housewives scavenging for vegetables under pushcarts. It was crowds gathering at garbage dumps in Riverside Park and swarming onto them every time a new load was deposited, digging through the piles with sticks or hands and hope of finding bits of food. New York was the soup kitchens operated from the back of army trucks in Times Square. It was the men, some of them wearing chesterfield coats and Hamburg's, who lined up at soup kitchens with drooping shoulders and eyes that never looked up from the sidewalk. New York was the breadline, "the worm that walks like a man."
Caro, p. 323.

Subways were truly for sleeping, and when patrolmen walked along station platforms rapping on souls, the men lying there arose without a protest, carefully gathering their pallets of newspapers, shuffled onto a train and rode to the next station, with a spread their papers down again.
Ibid., p. 323.

His hair is long, his feet are hard and gritty
He spends his love walking the streets of New York City
He's almost dead from breathing on air pollution
He tried to vote but to him there's no solution
Living just enough, just enough for the city
Wonder, "Living for the City."

Groucho Marx said he knew things were bad when the pigeons started feeding the people in Central Park.
Ellis, p. 533.

Louis Mumford on the Gashouse District: "Their tracery of iron, against an occasional clear lemon-green sky at sunrise was one of the most pleasant aesthetic elements in the new order." [Color]

Thomas Wolfe on the Gashouse District: "As they walked away through the powerful ugliness and devastation of that district, with its wasteland rusts and rubbish, its slim-like streets of rickety tenement and shabby brick, its vast raw thrust of tank, glazed glass and factory building, and at length its clean, cold, flashing strength and joy of waters—a district scarred by that horror of unutterable desolation and ugliness and at the same time lifted by a powerful rude exultancy of light and sky and sweep and water, such as is found only in America, and for which there is yet no language—as they walked away along a street, the blue wicked shells of empty bottles began to explode on the pavements all around them."

Gas, leaking from the tanks, made the neighborhood a pesthole.

A vital component of New York’s modernity, its heterogeneous, polyglot immigrant population, did not sparkle at night; for many, it furnished the darkness against which the lights were lit.

Sharpe, p. 156.

If by day poor or unsightly sections called out for social reform, by night the city was a purified world of light, simplified into a spectacular pattern, interspersed with now-unimportant blanks. [Light]

What a mélange in the starlight. Mothers, graybeards, lively young girls, exhausted sweatshop fathers, young consumptive coughers and spitters, all of us snored and groaned there side by side, on newspapers or mattresses. We slept in pants and undershirt, heaped like corpses. The city reared about us.

Sharpe, p. 162.

Broken glass everywhere
People pissin’ on the stairs, you know they just don’t care
I can’t take the smell, can’t take the noise
Got no money to move out, I guess I got no choice
Rats in the front room, roaches in the back
Junkies in the alley with a baseball bat
I tried to get away but I couldn’t get far Cause a man with a tow truck repossessed my car

Don’t push me cause I’m close to the edge
I’m trying not to lose my head
It’s like a jungle sometimes
It makes me wonder how I keep from going under Grandmaster Flash, “The Message”

That street was like a dismal gash, endless, with us at the bottom of it filling it from side to side, advancing from sorrow to sorrow, toward an end that is never in sight, the end of all the streets in the world.

There were no cars or carriages, only people and more people.

Céline, p. 554.

I never saw a child anywhere on the Bowery, which must have been an indication of something.

The dark and infamous “Lung Block” stood as late as 1933. Of one of its buildings, known as the “Ink Pot,” Ernest Poole wrote: “Rooms here have held death ready and waiting for years. Upon the third floor, looking down into the court, is a room with two little closets behind it. In one of these a blind Scotchman slept and took the Plague in '94. His wife and his fifteen-year-old son both drank, and the home grew as squalid as the tenement itself. He died in the hospital. Only a few month later the Plague fastened again. Slowly his little daughter grew used to the fever, the coughing, the long sleepless nights... At last she, too died. The mother and son then moved away. But in this room the germs lived on... they can live two years in darkness. Then one year later, in October, a Jew rented this same room. He was taken ill and died in the summer. The room was rented again in the Autumn by a German and his wife. She had the Plague already, and died. Then an Irish family came in. The father was a hard, steady worker... But six months later he took the Plague. He died in 1901. This is only the record of one room in seven years."

But the city for me, in my time, has been flecked with these shadows of disaster in the guise of decayed mortals who stared at me out of hollow eyes in the midst of the utmost gayety. You turn a corner laughing amid scenes of enthusiasm and activity, perhaps, and here comes despair along, hooded and hollow-eyed, accusing you of undue levity. You dine at your table, serene in your moderate prosperity, and in looks wan, thin-lipped, and pale, asking how can you eat when she is as she is. You feel the health and vigor of your body, warmly clad, and lo, here comes illness or weakness, thin and pining, and with cough or sigh or halting step, cries: “See how I suffer—and you—you have health!” Weakness confronts strength, poverty wealth, health sickness, courage cowardice, fortune the very depths of misfortune, and they know each other not—or defy each other. Of a truth, they either despise or fear, the one the other.

Dreiser, p. 167.

I remember seeing once, in the rush of the Christmas trade in New York City a few years ago, a score of these decidedly shabby and broken brethren carrying signs for the edification, allurement and information of the Christmas trade. They were strung out along Sixth Avenue from Twenty-third to Fourteenth Streets, and the messages which their billboards carried were various. I noticed that in the budding gayety of the time these men were practically hopeless, dull and gray. The air was fairly crackling with the suggestion of interest and happiness for some. People were hurrying hither and thither, eager about their purchases. There were great van-loads of toys and fineries constantly being moved and transferred. Life seemed to say: “This is the season of gifts and affection,” but obviously meant nothing to these men.

Ibid., p. 264.

You should have seen that Brooklyn Broadway! Instead of sky, above us thundered the elevated subway. The pavement was pitted with such potholes that if a wheel had done down into one of them it would have stayed there forever. Lots of slums, with boarded-up windows, alternated with blocks of burned-out buildings.

Lobos, p. 166.

He used to panhandle on the corner. Sometimes I take the train myself. I’d give him a quarter. A year before he was a company vice president down on Wall Street. But deep down in the back of his eyes you could see that he was from Michigan, just a poor lost kid in the big city.
Lonely dignified ragpickers from Hudson Street supping soup without a word to anybody, with black fingers, woe.

The scene is the side door of a bakery, once located at Ninth Street and Broadway, and now moved to Tenth and Broadway, the line extending toward the west and Fifth Avenue, where it was formerly to the east and Fourth Avenue. It is composed of the usual shabby figures, men of all ages, from fifteen or younger to seventy. The line is not allowed to form before eleven o'clock, and at this hour perhaps a single figure will shamble around the corner and halt on the edge of the sidewalk. Then others, for though they appear to come slowly, some dubiously, they all arrive one at a time. Haste is seldom manifest in the approach. Figures appear from every direction, limping slowly, slouching stupidly, or standing with assumed or real indifference, until the end of the line is reached when they take their places and wait.
Dreiser, p. 130.

I'm in a cold wet city that is gasping for water in the worst way in its history and yet water makes some people miserable, the ones huddled in the barely recessed doors around City Hall under wet sleeping bags. It recently became illegal to be homeless in this area after the civic center and stock exchange and department stores close up at night.
Wojnarowicz, p. 243.

Panning down to the sidewalk there's an ugly old homeless bag lady holding a whip and she cracks it at the pigeons who ignore it as they continue to peck and fight hungrily over the remains of the hot dogs and the police car disappears into an underground parking lot.
Ellis, Psycho, p. 5.

When the curtain of night rises on Riverside and reveals Grant's Tomb in misty vagueness at the end of a green vista, the site is rarely for those who sleep in the expensive caravansaries along the Drive, and most often for the sleepers on the benches. It is the men who sleep on the benches in Morningside Park that are the first to wonder at the dark front of poplars holding desperate defense against the charging line of daylight, and over the poplars the huge, squat octagon of St. John's buttressed chapels. [Timeline]
Strunsky, p. 705.

The panhandler is a telephone pole in the eyes of the law.
Blomley, p. 88.

The winter of 1948 was a harsh one for me. At night the city streets became even more deserted with only a few to be seen on 42nd Street. Shoulder lunched against the cold. I went from doorway to doorway, to restaurants and subway entrances, and along the sides of great gray stone buildings seeking shelter from the cold. I lived in cafeterias and slept in all-night movie theaters, trying to say away the cops on their beats who were angry at being out in the cold and were looking for any excuse to pick up a man and hurry him to the nearest station house. I'd walk the underground tunnels down around Penn Station, into the station restrooms, nodding on toilet seats, sometimes writing. I was looking to pick up someone who had money or wanted sex and was willing to pay for it, anxious only for a place to sleep and take a bath, shave, obtain clean clothing and food.

Sometimes I’d roll a stray drunk, maybe steal a suitcase, always looking for a good take and ready to make a dollar at anything so I could make it till morning and a cheap movie. I was staying awake on Benzedrine and somehow maintaining a junk habit, just managing to keep straight enough so as not to collapse completely. I only wanted a place to live or die in out of the cold; not found to be a corpse crouched in a doorway. I did want to die and felt like I was dying—could observe death feeding on me. I saw it in the pallor of my skin and the patches of oozing sores on my face; in the tiny red flecks in the whites of my eyes; in the way my skull showed through at the temples; in the smell from my crotch and from my dirty bleeding feet.

Huncke, pp. 97-98.

He abandoned soap, abandoned the seasons, lived upon the concrete tracks of lower New York as if they were the props of a stage production.
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 81.

He has fallen asleep sitting on his stoop. His hands loosely hold a brown paper bag that is tightly twisted around a beer can.
Lee, p. 49.

An image of yourself curled up on the sidewalk next to a heat vent with the other bums.
McInerney, p. 89.

At Sheridan Square a ragged figure is tearing posters off the utility poles. He claws at the paper with his fingernails and then stomps it under his feet.
Ibid., p. 160.

By the time you reach Canal Street, you think that you will never make it home. You look for taxis. A bum is sleeping under the awning of a shuttered shop. As you pass he raises his head and says, “God bless you and forgive your sins.” You wait for the cadge but it doesn’t come. You wish he hadn’t said anything.
Ibid., p. 180.

A typical airshaft. As usual, it is closed at both ends. It is two feet ten inches wide, forty-eight feet long, and seventy-two feet high. Forty-two windows open upon it, the sole source of light and air to the rooms... The baby’s bathtub is hung outside of the window because the room are so small that there is no place to keep it inside. The shaft is only a little wider than the tub... The sunlight seldom penetrates below the fifth floor in these shafts. There is never a circulation of air.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 424.

Plaster constantly sifts down in all the rooms of the place... I feel cold inside as I think of the next tomorrow.
Reay, p. 269.

Others like her are being pushed and jostled the whole length of this crowded section. They are being nudged and admired as well as sought and schemed for. Whatever affections or attachments they have will be manifesting themselves to-night, as may be seen by the little expenditures they themselves are making. A goldfish of transparent paste or a half pound of candy, a cheap gold-plated stickpin, brooch or ring, or a handkerchief, collar or necktie bought of one of the many pushcart men, tell the story plainly enough. Sympathy, love, affection and passion are running their errant ways among this vast unspoken horde no less than among the more pretentious and well-remembered of the world.

And the homes to which they are hurrying, the places which are dignified by that title, but which here should have another name! Thousands upon thousands of them are turning into entry ways, the gloom or dirtiness or poverty of which should bar them from the steps of any human being. Up the dark stairways they are pouring into tier upon tier of human hives, in some instances not less than seven stories high and, of course, without an elevator, and by grimy landings they are sorted out and at last distributed each into his own cranny. Small, dark one-, two- and three-room apartments, where yet on this Christmas evening, one, and sometimes three, four and five are still at work sewing pants, making flowers, curling feathers, or doing any other of a hundred tenement tasks to help out the income supplied by the one or two who work out. Miserable one- and two-room spaces where ignorance and poverty and sickness, rather than greed or immorality, have made veritable pens out of what would ordinarily be bad enough. Many hundreds or thousands of others there are where thrift and shrewdness are making the best of very unfortunate conditions, and a hundred or two where actual abundance prevails. These are the homes. Let us enter.

Dreiser, p. 280.

Eleventh Avenue is dirty and desolate... On the west side of the avenue and lining the cross streets are machine sops, gas tanks, abattoirs, breweries, warehouses, piano factories, and coal and lumber yards whose barges cluster around the nearby piers. Sixty years ago this avenue, in contrast to the fair farm land upon which the rest of the district grew up, was a stretch of barren and rocky shore, ending in the flat unhealthy desolation of the Great Kill Swamp. Land in such a deserted neighborhood was cheap and little sought for, and permission to use it was reality given to the Hudson River Railroad. Today the franchise, still continued under its old conditions, is an anomaly. All day and night, to and from the Central's yard at Thirtieth Street, long freight trains pass hourly through the heterogeneous mass of trucks, pedestrians, and playing children; and though they now go slowly and a flagman stands at every corner, "Death Avenue" undoubtedly deserves its name. [Nature]

Goldmark, p. 4.

No, it is terrible to be poor in New York.
Ford, America, p. 181.
s - Unrest

Anger was the real zeitgeist in New York. Everyone was angry. Schmitz, pp. 270-1.

The streets
reverberating, empty are rivers of darkness pouring into the sea and the sky threadbare is the new flag that flares over the city.

If there was a production of the city, and social relations it is a production and reproduction of human beings by human beings, rather than the production of objects. The city has a history; it is the work of the history, that is, of clearly defined people and groups to accomplish this oeuvre, in historical conditions.

Gigantic chaos.
Reitano, p. 131.

Full of subtle, and not-so-subtle, acts of brutality.
Amin, p. 105.

Ethnic foment in NYC: Not a whirlpool but a perpetual thunderstorm.
Reitano, p. 131.

The unguarded back is as primitive an invitation as a bared throat.
Bladford, p. 156.

A social collage where the conjoining glue is mainly the knife and mutual exploitation and hatred.

Army tanks crack Fifth Avenue’s manhole covers. Now tanks and canons must detour around them.
Berger, New York, p. 10.

The great city is thoroughly fed up with soldiers unless they are nicely massed into pretty formations.
Conrad, p. 194.

The Dewey Arch at Fifth Avenue and Twenty-fourth street, erected in 1899 was aligned with the Washington Arch, thus converting the lower stretch of Fifth Avenue into a “triumphal” thoroughfare of a type frequently found in Europe.
Black, N. pag.

Riots, vandalism of seats and throwing of debris became forms of reaction to unpopular fight decisions.
Talbot, p. 58.
For many generations New York had taken no heed of war, save as a thing that happened far away, that affected prices and supplied the newspapers with exciting headlines and pictures. The New Yorkers felt that war in their own land was an impossible thing... They saw war as they saw history, through an iridescent mist, deodorized, scented indeed, with all its essential cruelties tactfully hidden away. They cheered the flag by habit and tradition, they despised other nations, and whenever there was an international difficulty they were intensely patriotic, that is to say, they were ardently against any native politician who did not say, threaten, and do harsh and uncompromising things to the antagonist people.

Wells, pp. 181–2.

Wall St. Bombing

Before the Wall Street bombing, flyers were found in a nearby mailbox with hand-stamped red lettering reading:

REMEMBER
WE WILL NOT TOLERATE ANY LONGER
FREE THE POLITICAL PRISONERS OR IT WILL BE SURE DEATH FOR ALL OF YOU.
AMERICAN ANARCHIST FIGHTERS

Greenburg, p. 9.

You have shown no pity to us! We will do likewise. We will dynamite you! — Anarchist warning, 1919.

Davis, Buda, p. 1.

On a warm September day in 1920, a few months after the arrest of his comrades Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (“the best friends I have in America”), a vengeful Italian immigrant anarchist named Mario Buda parked his horse-drawn wagon near the corner of Wall and Broad streets, next to the new federal Assay Office and directly across from J.P. Morgan and Company. The Morgan partners, including the great Thomas Lamont and Dwight Morrow (Charles Lindbergh’s future father-in-law), were discussing weighty financial matters in a lower-floor conference room. Perhaps Buda tipped his cap in the direction of the unsuspecting robber barons before he nonchalantly climbed down and disappeared unnoticed into the lunchtime crowd. A few blocks away, a startled letter-carrier found strange, crudely printed leaflets warning: “Free the Political Prisoners or it Will Be Sure Death for All of You!” They were signed: “American Anarchist Fighters.”

Buda, aka “Mike Boda,” was a veteran supporter of Luigi Galleani, anarchist theorist and editor of Cronaca Sovversiva (“Subversive Chronicle”) which the Department of Justice in 1918 had condemned as “the most dangerous newspaper in this country.” The Galleanisti (probably never more than 50 or 60 hardcore activists) were chief suspects in various dynamite plots, including the notorious Preparedness Day bombing in San Francisco in 1916 (for which union organizers Tom Mooney and Warren Billings were framed) and the letter bombs sent to prominent members of the Wilson administration as well as J.P. Morgan and John D. Rockefeller in June 1919. The Cronaca Sowersiva reading circles that met in the shadows of Paterson silk factories and Youngstown steel mills—not unlike certain contemporary Quran study groups in gritty neighborhoods of Brooklyn and south London—were lightning rods for immigrant alienation; an alienation that grew into rage in the face of wartime anti-foreign hysteria, which resulted in the so-called Palmer Raids in 1919 against radicals of all denominations. When Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer signed Galleani’s deportation order in February 1919, anonymous flyers appeared in New England factories promising to “annihilate” the deporters “in blood and fire.”

As Buda, who had appointed himself the avenging angel of the imprisoned and deported anarchists, made his escape from Wall Street, the bells of nearby Trinity Church began to toll noon. Before they had stopped, the wagon packed with high explosive (probably blasting gelatin stolen from a tunnel construction site) and iron slugs erupted in a huge ball of fire, leaving a large crater in Wall Street. Windows exploded in the faces of office workers, pedestrians were mowed down by metal shrapnel or scythed by shards of glass, building awnings and parked cars caught fire, and a suffocating cloud of smoke and debris enshrouded Wall Street. Skyscrapers quickly emptied. Panicked crowds fled past crumpled bodies on the sidewalks, some of them writhing in agony. On the treeless street, green leaves bearing presidents’ portraits—some of the estimated $80,000 in cash abandoned by terrified or wounded bank messengers—fluttered with each choking gust of wind and ash. No one knew whether more explosions would follow, and frightened authorities suspended trading at the Stock Exchange for the first time in history.

An attack on Wall Street, of course, was immediately construed as a national emergency. One hundred regular soldiers, rifles loaded and bayonets fixed, were sent quickly from Governor’s Island to guard the badly damaged Assay Office and adjacent Sub treasury, while America’s chief sleuth, William Flynn, the head of the (federal) Bureau of Investigation, was dispatched from Washington on the first available train. Over the next few days, the NYPD’s Detective Bureau assembled the grotesque remains of an “infernal machine”: a horse’s head, some severed hoofs, and the twisted metal of a wagon axle. Anarchists, the IWW, and the new-fangled Bolshevik all automatically became suspect and the New York Times soon screamed “Red Plot Seen in Blast.” While police and federal investigators focused on ‘celebrity’ Reds such as labor-organizer Carlo Tresca, Buda quietly made his way home to Italy. (It is unknown whether other Galleanisti participated in the organization of the bombing or whether Buda was an astonishing one-man show.)

Meanwhile, the coroner was counting 40 dead (some mangled beyond recognition), with more than 200 injured including Equitable Trust’s president Alvin Krech and J. P. Morgan Jr’s son Junius. Joseph P. Kennedy, walking in the street, was badly shaken but unharmed. Buda was undoubtedly disappointed when he learned that “Jack” Morgan himself was away in Scotland at his hunting lodge, and that his partners Lamont and Morrow were unscathed. Nonetheless, a poor immigrant with some stolen dynamite, a pile of scrap metal, and an old horse had managed to bring unprecedented terror to the inner sanctum of American capitalism.

Ibid., pp. 1-3.

Thirty of the noonday crowd were killed and one hundred wounded. Scars of the explosion are still visible on near-by buildings. Occurring during a period of anti-radical hysteria, the disaster was said by some to have been a protest dynamiting of this important financial corner. Others held that the wagon had belonged to an explosives company and had been using a prohibited route when its load of dynamite was accidentally discharged. Neither theory was ever proved.

Some said the Wall Street blast gave off a bluish white glare.
Others described it as a white ball of fire emitting acrid yellow flames that changed color, spat tongues of green flame, and soared skyward in a pillar of thick brown smoke. Higher and higher soared the smoke, darkening from brown to black and flattening mushroom-like above the nearby skyscrapers.

Ellis, p. 516.

The philosophy of survival acquired by the hardened inmates of New York who, unconsciously, where ever they be, seem to be preparing themselves for that inevitable shock, never long and coming: it may be a Wall Street explosion, a mere fire at a subway, filled with smoke, screens, and terror, or a cast-iron manhole lid hurtling into the ether.

Reisenberg, p. 77.

The roar of the explosion bounced from building to building like a cannonball rolling free in the hold of a foundering ship.

Ellis, p. 516.

Like the eye of a hurricane, an ominous hush followed the first roar. Then people screamed.

Ibid., p. 516.

Iron fragments zinged through the air. They gashed pedestrian’s arms and smashed legs and crushed skulls. The shower of metal was followed by a shower of glass, cascading onto the pavement. The blast knocked out windowpanes within a half-mile radius. A man walking along John Street, five blocks north, was felled by a four-inch length of pipe crashing on the base of his neck. Fatally stricken girls stiffened, sagged, and slumped to the pavement. Blood seeped from them and spread fanlike over the concrete. Up from the street leaped a fountain of flame that clawed the facades of buildings on both sides of Wall Street. Desks caught fire. Office workers suddenly found their hair flaming torches. People in offices as high the sixth floor were badly burned.

Ibid., p. 516.

Human bodies will all at last be torn apart by the city’s stresses.
Conrad, p. 308.

On June 10, 1910, J..J. Gallagher, a disgruntled dock worker, attempted to assassinate William Jay Gaynor, New York’s mayor, as he boarded a German ocean liner in Hoboken, for a planned trip to Europe.
Gallagher shot him through the neck. Gaynor survived, but the bullet stayed in his throat, slowly robbing him of the ability to speak. He died just a few days later on his trip to Europe—one that was meant to let him rest and get stronger. He became the second mayor of New York to die in office.

DeArment, p. 124.
On October 3, 1914, a bomb exploded in St. Patrick’s Cathedral. On November 11, the anniversary of the Haymarket executions, the Bronx Courthouse was bombed.

Fronc, p. 145.

In the early morning hours of Sunday, July 30, 1916, a massive explosion shattered thousands of windows throughout Lower Manhattan, and some as far north as Times Square. The rumble was felt as close as Jersey City and as far away as Philadelphia. Millions of tons of war materials and explosives, stored on Black Tom Island in New York harbor, exploded. Investigators initially blamed spontaneous combustion; the search, however, conducted in large measure by the New York City Police Department’s bomb squad, eventually zeroed in on Michael Kristoff, a citizen of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Ibid., pp. 145-6.

1933: a tear gas bomb is dropped into the ventilating system of the New York Stock Exchange.

WPA Guide, p. 84.

Communism, Old Left

Radio station WEVD, founded in 1927 as a memorial to Socialist leader, Eugene V. Debs.

Federal Writers, p. 298.

The Daily Worker, official organ of the Communist Party of the United States, occupies an important place among New York’s labor newspapers. Many well-informed persons outside the labor movement now find it necessary or desirable to supplement their reading of the regulation newspapers with a perusal of the Daily Worker in order to obtain a balanced and comprehensive view of current affairs. [Media]

Ibid., p. 308.

Children were devoted newspaper readers, including the Communist Daily Worker.

Freeman, p. 55.

The real-life Mafia connections of Teamsters Union President Jimmy Hoffa, and the cinematic portrayal of longshoremen’s union corruption by the Mafia in the movie adaption of Budd Schulberg’s novel On The Waterfront, helped bring this aspect of organized crime most sharply into the public consciousness. In an era when private-sector labor unions enrolled many more Americans than they do now, and America’s obsessive fear of illegal drugs had not yet taken hold, people cared more about the corruption of unions than they did about gangsters merely killing gangsters, or supplying prostitution or gambling opportunities to those who wanted them.

Ibid., 118.

Some Bowery Men were Wobblies who organized as they roamed, who talked and fought for the world of ‘one big union’ with no bosses or cops, the world of the “big rock-candy mountain.”

I remember down-and-out parties of cheese and crackers, and jug wine. At one such gathering I was asked, quite seriously, if I was a Stalinist or a Trotskyite. I guessed right and claimed allegiance to the Trotsky camp.
Lesueur, N. pag.

And in a grim and industrial loft on the Bowery, Anarchist Club meetings were held on Saturday afternoons; they were solemn, earnest, somehow touching to me—it was as though its downtrodden members believed that their utopian flights of fancy may someday materialize.
Ibid.

Fitzgerald dated the beginning of this “most expensive orgy in history” from the May Day riots in 1919, when the police charged demonstrators in Madison Square; its end was the stock-market crash of October 1929.

“May Day” begins by disestablishing New York as a place of work and consecrating the city to pleasure. Provincial capitalists gather there “to buy for their women furs . . . and bags of golden mesh and varicolored slippers.” Those who can’t afford such trinkets dream of them: working girls spend their lunch hours window-shopping on Fifth Avenue, fancying themselves the purchasers of jewelry, feather fans, silk gowns, and strings of pearls. A floral triumph greets the troops returning from the war. Merchants and clerks forget “their bickerings and figurings” to watch the parade. As well as this welcome to the carousing troops, the city houses other festivities—a fraternity dance at Delmonico’s or the sordid revels at which Gordon Sterrett meets Jewel Hudson (who’d made a career for herself out of showing a good time to the soldiers back from France). Political outrage, when the mob besieges the offices of a left-wing paper, is, like pleasure, fueled by drink.
Ibid., p. 194.

Machine guns mounted on the roof of S. Klein on Union Square and pointed into the crowd of 5,000 for the demonstration of the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. [Commodity] [Department Store]

Alfred Kazin described a typical night at Union Square this way:
“The place boiling as usual, with crowds lined up at the frankfurter stands and gawking at the fur models who in a lighted corner window perched above the square walked round and round like burlesque queens.…
There was always a crowd in Union Square; the place itself felt like a crowd through which you had to keep pushing to get anywhere.” Often Gorky and de Kooning, after a late night spent talking about painting, would stroll through the square and observe the scene—what Kazin described as an “eternally milling circle of radicals in argument.”
Stevens & Swan, pp. 111-2.

As they dived back into the massed throng in the Square, a Soviet flag was run up on a flagpole over the Stars and Stripes. Police told the Communists to reverse the sequence, declaring that no one would be allowed to speak until Old Glory fluttered over the Soviet banner.
Ellis, p. 538.

1930 Union Square Communist riot: 35,000 gather for jobs and housing. Police brutality ensued. The Communists were pleased. To them, the riot was “a great success” because it showed how oppressive capitalist governments really were.
Reitano, p. 143.

An array of leftist rallies held at Madison Square Garden in the 1940s.
Freeman, p. 55.

The Communist Party was active in Harlem where a major rent strike was waged in 1934.
Reitano, p. 143.

Forty thousand people came out on May 1, 1946 to support the first May Day parade since before Pearl Harbor. It took the marchers four hours to enter Union Square.
Freeman, p. 56.

At the end of World War II, in the New York-area CIO the Communists and their allies dominated the leadership of the UE, TWU, NMU, Furriers, American Communications Association, UOPWA, UPW, Shoe Workers, and Furniture Workers, and controlled Local 65 and most of the department store locals of the RWDSU. In the AFL they led locals of bakers, building service workers, and jewelry workers, the painters union district council, and Local 6 of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees (which had well over twenty thousand members). Also some leaders of the unaffiliated International Association of Machinists worked with the Communists.
Ibid., pp. 60-1.

The Meat Cutters began to “decommunize” the Furriers.
Ibid., p. 89.

The motley rabble of soldiers, marines, and hangers-on which hunts the Bolsheviks down Sixth Avenue is ironically called a “procession.”
Conrad, p. 194.

The Communist Party still had their offices on the eighth floor of 33 Union Square West in 1967-1968 when Andy Warhol moved his Factory to the building. The Factory was on the sixth floor, where Warhol was shot.
Pomerance, p. 159

In 1913 the illuminati of the Village addressed their fellows as “Comrade,” by 1927 they were more likely to go round giving each other the Fascist salute.
Irwin, p. 120.

A Moscow paper published pictures of holes dug in Broadway by repairmen, the captions declaring that the pits were caused by “bombings” and “riots.”
Ellis, p. 536.

He noticed that many an idealistic socialist ceased to be a socialist as soon as he became rich. All the prophets about him became business men, and left the poor man alone.
Hapgood, p. 284.
The so-called “intellectual” Jews of Canal and Grand Streets are, as a rule, very happy. They sit around and drink tea and emit large and important ideas. They react vigorously—otherwise kick—against American conditions, sometimes wisely, but always amusingly. And they enjoy it. Ibid., p. 298.

Inside the dream factory, the torment continued. Up close, the lights in the windows were not diamonds or dollar signs but electric meters measuring the human cost of the inhuman spectacle. Sharpe, p. 230.

The 1920s were at least as post-Marxist as anti-Marxist. Remember this was the first age of the media, of book clubs, best-sellers, and record charts, of radios and talking pictures; by the end of the decade, one in every three Americans owned a radio and record player, three out of four went to the movies at least once a week, and virtually no one was out of reach of advertising’s voice. Whatever the moderns apathy toward conventional politics, they were altogether alert to the bewildering array of cultural artifacts and phenomena that a full-blown consumer society throws into the hustling stakes of history. This was the first generation to grasp the supremacy to see that mass culture would acquire, to realize that, in the late-capitalist or consumer society America was becoming, there might not be distant classes as Marx had explicated them in his studies of early capitalism a half-century earlier; instead of a clear distinction or face-off between the oppressor and the oppressed, there might be only a handy-dandy exchange between the metropolitans termed “suckers” and “racketeers.” And a consumer society, this generation sought everyone, willingly or unwittingly gets to play the “sucker” one moment and the “racketeer” the next. There are no classes in the shrewdly apolitical political vision, just people more or less deceived. Tricksters and impersonators appeared nightly as top Broadway entertainment; in mongrel Manhattan, con games were culture. [Commodity] [Media] [Technology] [Crime]

Douglas, Honesty, p. 20.

Even among those [artists] who were not card-carrying communists, the prevailing sentiment was left-wing. According to Isamu Noguchi, artists were such pariahs in American society that they instinctively sided with anyone else perceived as an underdog. Communism had the added appeal of defining artists as workers, thus providing them the legitimacy that they sought but could not attain in American society. Stevens & Swan, p. 111.

Labor, Work

Manhattan Island, with deep rivers all around it, seems an almost ideal scene for a great city revolution, but I doubt very much that there is any revolutionary spirit in its proletariat. Some mysterious enchantment holds its workers to their extraordinary uncomfortable life; they apparently get a vague sort of delight out of the great spectacle that they are no party of. The New York workman patronizes fellow workmen from the provinces even more heavily than the Wall Street magnate patronizes country mortgage-sharks. He is excessively proud of his citizenship in the great metropolis, through it all brings him is an upper berth in a dog kennel. Riding along the elevated on the East Side and gaping into the windows of the so-called human habitations that stretch on either hand, I often wonder what process of reasoning impels, say, a bricklayer or a truck driver to spend his days in such vile hutches. True enough, he is paid a few dollars more a week in New York than he would receive anywhere else, but he gets little more use out of them than an honest bank teller. In almost any other large American city he would have a much better house to live in, and better food; in the smaller towns his advantage would be very considerable. Moreover, his chance of lifting himself out of slavery to some measure of economic independence and autonomy would be greater anywhere else; if it is hard for the American workman everywhere to establish a business of his own, it is triply hard in New York, where rents are killingly high and only so much capital is required to launch a business that only Jews can raise it. Nevertheless, the poor idiot hangs on to his coop, dazzled by the wealth and splendor on display all around him. His susceptibility to this lure makes me question his capacity for revolution. He is too stupid and poltroonish for it, and he has too much respect for money. It is this respect for money in the proletariat, in fact, that chiefly safeguards and buttresses capitalism in America. It is secure among us because Americans venerate it too much to attack it.

Mencken, Chrestomathy, p. 182.

The poor sindicalist city scaffolded all over with cries and hurrahing.

Workmen are red and yellow.
Arce, pp. 20-1.

A visitor wandering the streets of mid-twentieth-century New York would have had no trouble discerning the social centrality of its working class.
Freeman, p. xiii.

On September 24, 1945, barely three weeks after the end of World War II, the main business districts of New York City ground to a halt. For a week over a million-and-a-half workers milled around the streets or stayed home. Mail and railway express delivery halted, and federal tax collections fell by eight million dollars a day. This estimated one hundred million dollar loss to the economy stemmed from a strike by fifteen thousand elevator operators, doormen, porters, firemen, and maintenance workers employed in commercial buildings.
Ibid., p. 3.

Hundreds of thousands of blue-collar workers, executives, clerical workers, mailmen, deliverymen, and tax collectors could not or would not walk up dozens of flights of steps to reach their shops or offices. Ibid., p. 3.

New York strikes during the year after the war included a weeklong walkout by ten thousand painters; a four-week strike by seven thousand members of the American Communications Association that disrupted telegraph communication into and out of the city; a 14-day strike against the Brooklyn-based Mergenthaler Co., the largest maker of linotype equipment in the country; and a series of trucking strikes culminating in a September 1946 walkout by twelve thousand Teamsters that led to empty grocery store shelves and factory closings... Sprinkled among these clashes were a myriad of smaller confrontations: a strike of Times Square motion picture projectionists, a lockout of thirty Newspaper Guild members at Billboard magazine, a walkout by eight hundred Brooklyn and Manhattan bakers.

_Ibid.,_ p. 4.

An air of unreality hung over the city. Incidents took on a staccato, dream quality; sharply etched, touched with hysteria, cockeyed.

_Ibid.,_ pp. 5-6.

All the signs were that it would be the supreme city of the Western world, or even the world as a whole.

_Ibid.,_ p. 7.

In a city where the largest, most advanced warships and passenger liners in the world regularly docked, fish still got delivered to the Fulton Fish Market in sail-powered boats. In a city where sophisticated defense electronics got designed and built, St. Patrick's Cathedral and Bellevue Hospital still operated on DC current. In a city where preliminary work for atomic fission had been done, potbellied stoves were being sold for home heating, and ice blocks were delivered for home refrigeration.

_Ibid.,_ p. 7.

A visitor to Manhattan seeing the tall office buildings dwarfing all other structures, and passing no huge steel mills with blast furnaces belching fire and smoke as in Chicago or Pittsburgh, or giant automobile factories as in Detroit, or long cotton mills as in New England or the South, might easily conclude that New York was mainly a region of white-collar workers supported by wholesale trade and banking.

_Ibid.,_ p. 8.

New York was a non-Fordist city during the age of Ford.

_Ibid.,_ p. 15.

To get on that subway on the hot mornings in summer. To devote your whole life to keeping stock, or making phone calls, or selling or buying. To suffer fifty weeks of the year for the sake of a two-week vacation, when all you really desire is to be outdoors, with your shirt off. And always to have to get ahead of the next fella.

_Ibid.,_ p. 19.

The images of the emergence of mass society in New York were not of workers on an assembly line but of rows and rows of clerical workers engaged in seemingly mindless, interchangeable, soul-deadening labor.

_Ibid.,_ p. 21.

In the 1940s it was almost impossible to look out of a skyscraper window and not see men engaged in physical labor, be it pushing racks of clothes in the garment district, floating railroad cars across the harbor, or maneuvering trucks full of printed material, toys, or machine tools through the congested streets of Manhattan. When financiers and lawyers and marketing men left their offices they rubbed shoulders in the streets and subways with the secretaries and clerks md elevator operators with whom they shared their buildings and the furriers and typographers and waitresses and warehousemen who worked nearby.

Even in these gloomy ravines of sweaty armpits pushing trolleys of pink and blue dresses through this dingy garment district.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Just blocks from Wall Street, where paper symbols of property-securities, bonds, and commodity futures—were traded, there were wholesale markets for butter, eggs, cheese, tea, coffee, and spices where not just the ownership of those goods but the goods themselves were exchanged. As the postwar era dawned, the sounds of tugboats and the smell of freshly-roasted coffee beans still penetrated the corridors where bankers and businessmen accumulated money and power on a scale unsurpassed anywhere in the world.

Freeman, p. 22.

In some respects the Kramdens and Nortons were distinctly New Yorkers. Where else did neighbors visit one another via the fire escape?

A secret route, a private connection between two floors and two souls. The fire escape is theirs; others use the building's staircase.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 211.

The roster of New York unions has a Whitmanesque quality to it: there are four locals of Airline Dispatchers; eleven of Barbers and Beauty Culturists; eleven of Boilermakers; forty-two of Carpenters; one of Commercial Artists and three of Coopers; one each of Dental Technicians, Diamond Workers, Firemen, Foremen, and Funeral Chauffeurs; thirty-eight of Hod Carriers, Building and Common Laborers (including the Hose Wreckers and the Curb Setters); twenty-five of Machinists; fifty-three of Railway and Steamship Clerks; one each of Screen Publicists, Seltzer Water Workers, Sightseeing Guides, and Theater Ushers; six of Upholsterers; and one of Vending Machine Service Workers.

Freeman, p. 35.

When members of the International Association of Machinists voted to strike against the E.W. Bliss Projectile Company in Brooklyn at the end of April 1911, every union member and all but one non-union worker joined the walkout. The issue was the company's refusal to adopt the eight-hour workday. The lone holdout was Harry Gorrie, a thirty-years old machinist who lived not far from the Bliss plant on 53rd Street. Gorrie's decision enraged his fellow workers. For several days the strikers merely argued with him, but after about a week he was surrounded by a jeering, threatening mob, on his walks to and from work. He sought and was granted police protection.

By May 10, Gorrie's slow treks from his home to the factory and back, accompanied by mounted police and patrolmen, attracted crowds of men and women who pelted the group with bits of street rubble and refuse. Gorrie seemed nonplussed as he walked along, calmly smoking a pipe and occasionally chatting with the patrolmen by his side, which naturally further inflamed the crowd. The air was thick with hurled projectiles and invective.

Carlebach, p. 5.
The city is peculiarly constructed to absorb almost anything that comes along without inflicting the event on its inhabitants; so that every event is, in a sense, optional, and the inhabitant is in the happy position of being able to choose his spectacle and so conserve his soul.

White, Here, p. 22.

Kipling in 1892: "We lingered in New York till the city felt so homelike that it seemed wrong to leave it. And further, the more we studied it, the more grotesquely bad it grew—bad in its paving, bad in its streets, bad in its street-police."

Javits, p. 111.

A woman in a fur coat lying on the sidewalk, daring the police to attack her.

Freeman, p. 51.

Burly, white-capped sailors battling policemen before an audience of hundreds.

Ibid., p. 51.

Police wagons inching their way forward through crowds of financial workers trying to get to work.

Ibid., p. 51.

Co-op City was the Vietnam of the nonprofit cooperative housing movement.

Ibid., p. 119.

The move in the 1950s from manual unloading of ships to containerization: "Clean it may be, interesting it isn’t," said one longshoreman.

Ibid., p. 164.

When ships began docking at New Jersey piers far from Manhattan, and staying only a day instead of the better part of a week, many sailors stopped going into the city at all, depriving it of a presence that went back to colonial days. The ships chandlers, rope works, and saloons that had lined the shores of Brooklyn and Manhattan since the days of Melville disappeared.

Ibid., p. 164.

An I. M. Pei-designed convention center, a palace of meeting and selling filled with men and women in smart suits, replaced what had been a major freight handling center, where longshoremen, teamsters, and railroad men held sway.

Ibid., p. 293.

Almost completely missing were ordinary working people.

Ibid., p. 304.

On September 7, 1981, some 200,000 New Yorkers marched in the city's first Labor Day parade in thirteen years. Four thousand air traffic controllers led a seven-hour procession up Fifth Avenue.

Ibid., p. 306.
On June 30, 1998, 40,000 construction workers, protesting the use of a non-union firm to build a subway communications center, blocked Madison Avenue. To many mid-town regulars, the construction workers seemed an alien presence. A New York magazine editor, commissioning an article about the demonstration, described them as "an invading army," an odd description for a group which probably had a higher proportion of native New Yorkers and in-city residents than the advertising, media, and corporate executives working along Madison Avenue whose lives they momentarily disrupted. A full-page article in the New York Post, headlined "Hunk Heaven," treated the protesters as sexual exotica. "In a neighborhood dominated by men in suits who usually confine themselves to loosening their tie at the end of the day," the paper commented, "the sight of guys ripping off wet muscle shirts or stuffing flannel shirts in torn jean pockets was something of a revelation."

The white light of new money, radiating from Wall Street, made other economic groupings look pale, difficult to discern. New York financiers did not have to have any relationship with working-class New York to exert economic and political power. Economically, they depended on global markets, not local production. Politically, their national influence rested not, as in the past, on political parties or coalitions that required attention to the interests of varied bases, but on direct ties to the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Bank.

When World War II ended, New Yorkers took for granted the sight of manual workers and labor protests in the heaven if they opposed what labor stood for and how it acted. By the late 1990s, many Manhattanites were startled by the mere presence of protesting workers.

By the 1990s, the tenor and trajectory of New York increasingly derived from its position as a global city connected to markets and tastemakers throughout the world, while its own toiling majority receded into the background.

I am returning one day from a serious inspection of the small stores and shops of the neighborhood. As I near my door I am preceded up the street by three grimly coal-heavers, evidently returning from work in an immense coal-yard in Eleventh Avenue.

Dreiser, p. 189.

The street, with its mass of life, lingers in this condition until six o’clock, when the great shops and factories turn loose their horde of workers. Then into the glare of these electric-lighted streets the army of shop girls and boys begins to pour. Here is a spectacle interesting and provocative of thought at all seasons, but trebly so on this particular evening. It is a shabby throng at best, commonplace in garb and physical appearance, but rich in the qualities of youth and enthusiasm, than which the world holds nothing more valuable.

Office workers were darting into delicatessens to pick up groceries or prepared foods for their suppers before returning to the tall characterless white-brick apartment buildings where they occupy a room or two.

Brook, p. 4.

The dark, oppressive underworld that supported these towers was to be found not so much in their basements as in grimy industrial towns across the United States, where ten and twelve hour days of toil sustained the extravagance of a Chrysler Building or a Rockefeller Center.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 107.

Uprising of the 20,000 in September 1909; precursor to Triangle Shirtwaist fire.

Reitano, p. 122.

In the wake of the Triangle fire, angry cries were heard to blow up City Hall.

Ibid., p. 123.

On one block I see the windows through which scores of young women once leapt to their deaths, fire driving them from factory floor to the cool of the open air; their hair held in place with ribbons of flame as they fell. I new their names: Jennie, Rose, Essie, Annie... How quiet this place seems now, the screams of that hour followed by years of silence. College students run by without thinking. Sometimes, someone else who remembers places white roses on the sidewalk.

Brooks, p. 5.

Small girls jumping out windows from the Triangle Waist Factory. “Life nets? What good were life nets? The little ones went right through the life nets and the pavement, too. Nobody could hold a life net when those girls from the ninth floor came down.” A trio of girls landed on one net, it broke, and the firemen holding its edges were jerked in on the mangled bodies. The sky seemed to rain flesh. Spectators winced at the sound of bodies hitting the ground. Now fire trucks dared not move closer for fear of running over the dying. People standing on the sidewalk twisted damp fingers together as they watched the death of a pair of lovers. Suddenly silhouetted against the glare in a ninth-story window stood a man and girl. Their clothing was stitched with flames. They kissed. Then, entwining their arms about each other, they stepped into eternity. [Apocalypse]

Ellis, p. 492.

“The screams were getting worse. I looked up and saw the whole elevator shaft getting red with fire... It was horrible. They kept coming down from the flaming floors above. Some of their clothing was burning as they fell. I could see streaks of fire coming down like flaming rockets.”

Drehle, p. 154.

One girl tried to keep her body upright. Until the very instance she touched the sidewalk, she was trying to balance herself.

Ibid., p. 157.

When two young women jumped together, they tore the life net like “a dog jumping though a paper hoop.” Before the firemen could move the ruined device, another girl’s body flashed on to it.

Ibid., p. 157.
When they came down one at a time we could have helped. When they came down entwined with one another, it was impossible.

When the first jumper lurched into the thin air, a net was ordered open to catch the others. They caught one girl: “She was tipped out onto the sidewalk... I lifted her up when they tipped it, and I said, ‘Now, go right across the street.’ She walked ten feet, but it was liken an automatic motion. Probably six feet—and dropped.”

An ambulance driver ran his vehicle up on the sidewalk, hoping that the jumpers might land on the roof of the ambulance and thus break their falls.

Bodies fell with such force that at least one crashed through the glass bricks of a basement skylight set in the sidewalk.

The first ten shocked me.

The last body fell at 4:57 P.M. he dress snagged on a steel hook on the sixth floor. For a moment she hung there grotesquely until her clothing burned and tore away and she dropped to the sidewalk.

Referring to the queue outside the morgue after the Triangle fire, an angry police officer ordered his men to purge the line of ghouls and thrill seekers. “What do they think this is,” he grumbled, “the Eden Musée?” That was the city’s most popular silent movie house. [Cinema] [Spectacle]

Often some executives will deliberately leave scraps tottering temptingly on the edge of desks to test the charwomen’s adherence to rules.
Talese, p. 35.

Up until one o’clock, typewriters chatter, jacketless people sweat, columns of figures lengthen on paper.
Mayakovsky, America, p. 49.

There is in it, in its enormity, a disproportion of effort. Too much energy, too much money.
Corbusier, p. 100.

All that money represents hours of work, work turned into noise and wind. Those sterile labors eat into the economy of the country. Those fruitless labors are the hours of daily work devoted to paying for that noise and wind. [Sound] [Air]

The fabulous machinery of skyscrapers, telephones, the press, all of that is used to produce wind and to chain men to a hard destiny.
Leon Trotsky: "New York, a city of capitalist automatism."
Goldenberg, p. 7.

Trotsky wanted to live in a "workers district," so he moved his family into an $18-per-month apartment in the Bronx at 1522 Vyse Avenue, near 172nd Street, just east of Crotona Park. But in his autobiography Trotsky gave 164th Street as the location (he made no distinction between East and West).
Ibid., p. 7.

During these ten years New York raised itself into the sky; but the Soviets in Moscow denounced the skyscraper as "capitalist." A denaturing of the objects in question.
Corbusier, p. 58.

The Liberal Press at 80 Fourth Avenue. The printers were all of the anarchist-pacifist persuasion and fond of anything involving poetry and art.
Myers, p. 27.

The Algonquin Hotel has labor troubles; when waiters walk off the job at 1 o'clock as the three dining rooms are filling up with luncheon patrons, men at the Algonquin's Round Table, including playwright George S. Kaufman, don waiters' white jackets, the women (including actress Ina Claire) put on frilly aprons, and they all go to work serving lunch to the other patrons.
Trager, p. 472.

Mad Bomber
Terror in the Age of Eisenhower.
Greenburg, p. 81.

At 7:55 on the evening of December 2, 1956, as the epic narrative of War and Peace begins to unfold on the screen of Brooklyn's Paramount Theater, there is no mistaking the sudden and violent explosion that rips through the rear of the auditorium for anything remotely connected to the evening's movie presentation. In a blinding moment of fierce light, smoke, and fire, a powerful device has detonated at precisely the moment determined by a simple timing mechanism within. Panic begins to envelop the room, and, as War and Peace continues without pause, patrons begin rushing for the exits.
Ibid., p. xi.

Shortly after noon on November 18, 1940, an employee of the Consolidated Edison Company, in one of a maze of Con Ed buildings located within the West Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Street city blocks, has come across a curious sight while on break from one of his duties. A small wooden toolbox has been left on a second-story windowsill, containing a length of iron pipe about 4½ inches long, neatly capped on each side. There is a sheet of paper wrapped around the pipe that reads, "CON EDISON CROOKS. THIS IS FOR YOU. THERE IS NO SHORTAGE OF POWDER BOYS." In the pipe is a Parke-Davis throat lozenge.
Ibid., pp. 1-3.
On July 4, 1940, a suitcase containing sixteen sticks of dynamite has been found at the British Pavilion of the World’s Fair. While being examined on the outskirts of the fairgrounds, the container explodes, killing two bomb squad detectives and critically injuring two other police officers on the scene. Though the explosion is felt throughout the 1,260-acre park, most of the holiday throng mistakes the blast for a rather raucous feature of the patriotic celebration. [World’s Fair 1939]

On September 24, 1941, traffic in and around the area of Nineteenth Street between Fourth Avenue and Irving Place is disrupted by the discovery of a strange object in the roadway. Crammed into a red wool sock is a contraption similar in construction and appearance to the pipe bomb found the previous November on the Con Ed windowsill. Once again, there is an inexplicable throat lozenge included. Ibid., p. 9.

Metesky uses throat lozenges in his bombs as timing devices. By applying varying amounts of water to a disc that has been meticulously filed down to a prescribed thickness, he can predict, with some accuracy, the time it takes for the disc to melt. A spoonful of water, for example, will disintegrate the disc in half an hour, while two to three drops will take several days. As the lozenge dissolves, it brings the fusing wires into contact, thus detonating the bomb. Ibid., p. 41.

On August 27, 1951 at 9pm he sets off another bomb in Grand Central, this time in a telephone booth. Ibid., p. 43.

On November 28, 1951 a small explosion rips through several coin-operated parcel lockers on the southbound mezzanine of the IRT subway station located at Union Square on Fourth Avenue and Fourteenth Street. Ibid., p. 40.

An explosive device found in the 15th row at the Paramount theater at Broadway and 43rd St. after a showing of Hitchcock’s The Wrong Man, is taken from the theater in a steel mesh envelope to a waiting transport vehicle, where it is whisked, under motorcycle escort, through the streets of Manhattan to the beachfront of Fort Tilden, where the device is placed in a hole dug in the sand and detonated. Ibid., p. 118.

He buys an admission ticket shortly after the theater opens in the morning, about 10:00 a.m., possibly the fiftieth patron. He has nothing in his hands, for his bomb is in one pocket of his coat and an ordinary cheap jackknife in another.

This shadowy figure sits in an empty section of the orchestra, away from other persons. In the darkness of the show, he reaches to the seat next to him, slits the bottom with his knife, and slides in both the bomb and the knife (presumably so if anything goes wrong and he is searched before he leaves the theater, the knife will not be found on him).

Then he moves to another section of the theater and watches the show. As the theater fills up, and the early customers begin to leave— and the time for the explosion draws near—the machinist gets up, tags along behind someone who is leaving, and vanishes.

Ibid., pp. 50-1.

On December 8, 1952, Metesky’s second bomb at the Lexington Theater explodes and, for the first time, a patron is injured. A woman, innocently watching MGM’s song and dance film production of Everything I Have Is Yours, is struck with shards of metal and debris that causes several deep lacerations on her feet and legs.

Ibid., p. 51.

By the start of 1953, Metesky begins to experiment with flashlight bulbs and batteries. He discontinues the use of throat lozenge discs as timing devices.

Ibid., p. 51.

The afternoon of March 10, 1953, Metesky sneaks into Radio City Music Hall. At a voluble moment of the movie presentation, The Story of Three Loves, when he is certain that all eyes will be fixed on the screen, he removes a pocketknife from his overcoat and rips a hole into the undercushion of the seat next to him. At an awkward slant, he reaches underneath and, with a dexterous backhanded scoop, thrusts the bomb and the knife into the gap, where he leaves both. A few moments later he is headed out of the auditorium and toward the lobby.

As Metesky reached the exit doors of the Radio City auditorium, his bomb explodes much earlier than planned. The blast—a “funny” sound—echoes off the eighty-four-foot ceilings and through the hall. “It sounded like a rocket. It went zzzzz—BANG!” recalled Metesky. Realizing what had happened and beginning to hear the harried sounds of confusion, if not panic, behind him, he rushes from the theater. As he passes through the lobby, Metesky is detained by the sudden grasp of an usher who catches hold of his arm. He freezes in near panic.

“We’re sorry about this sir. We regret the inconvenience.”

Eyes squinting with quizzical amazement, Metesky frees himself from the usher’s grip and nervously informs him that he is fine but that he still wishes to leave. Foisting a free movie pass into his hand, the man urges him to please come back at a later date and promises that it will never happen again. As Metesky exits Radio City Music Hall, the wailing sound of police cars converging on the building has already begun. He smiles and whispers to himself, If I come back, it’ll happen again alright.

Ibid., p. 53.

Metesky returns to Radio City Music Hall—this time with injurious results. During a 1954 preholiday viewing of Bing Crosby’s White Christmas, a “crude, homemade time bomb” rips through a seat cushion in row 14 of the orchestra level, sending a concussive sound through the auditorium, “as if a big electric bulb had been broken.” The capacity of audience of 6,200 that has crammed into the orchestra level as well as three balconies of the theater are confused and panicked by the commotion, and four patrons receive an array of puncture wounds and contusions that require a trip to the hospital for treatment. “All seats were taken and there were a number of standees in the auditorium, while a line numbering about a thousand stretched through the lobby and into the street,” wrote the Herald Tribune.

Ibid., pp. 57-8.

Weeks after the second Radio City bombing, thirty New York police officers and bomb squad detectives again rush to the 8th Avenue Port Authority bus terminal, where a bomb has detonated in a telephone booth, driving metal fragments and debris through a pedestrian corridor, startling throngs of weekend bus travelers. A Port Authority attendant and Navy veteran, in the process of checking the lights in the “suburban concourse” telephone booths, throws himself facedown on the ground. Upon hearing the blast, he regains his composure, rises, and contacts the authorities.

Ibid., p. 58.

A blast in the lower level men’s washroom of Grand Central terminal on March 16, 1953, timed precisely for the start of the heavily traveled rush-hour, slams fragments of iron and debris into several porcelain fixtures, causing extensive damage, sending three commuters to the hospital for treatment of shock and bruises. The explosion echoes throughout the depot, causing hundreds to rush toward the sound in a “fervor of excitement,” prompting the washroom attendant to complain, “My ears are still deaf.”

Ibid., p. 57.

On January 11, 1955, he strikes Penn Station during the evening rush hour, blowing a 2-inch gouge into a concrete wall, sending clouds of smoke billowing from the lower-level of the terminal. As detectives cordon off the surrounding area and conduct a detailed search for fragments and additional devices, he places a telephone call to the switchboard operator of Grand Central Station, warning that a bomb has been placed in a coin-operated locker on the south side of the building and that it will detonate in 15 minutes. A frenzied team of 30 additional officers rush to the scene and conduct a painstaking search, turning up nothing.

Ibid., p. 60.

In October, a man is slightly injured as a bomb explodes in the 12th row of the Paramount theater in Times Square during an evening showing of Blind Alley, and in December, emergency crews disperse a large crowd of rush-hour commuters in Grand Central terminal who gather for a look after an explosion rips through the upper level in the main men’s lavatory.

Ibid., p. 64.

On February 21, 1956, a 74-year-old porter named Lloyd Hill, who is working on the lower-level of Penn Station, is informed by a young man that there is a clog in the toilet in the men’s washroom. Shortly before 4 o’clock in the afternoon, as he applies a plunger to the obstruction, the fixture explodes, firing shards of metal and porcelain in every direction—and into Hill’s head and legs. “The whole inside of the booth was wrecked. People were running in every direction, scared. So was I,” reported one witness. “The porter must’ve been seriously hurt. He was bleeding all over. I could see blood on his face, hands, arms and legs as police arrived.”

Ibid., p. 65.

By the end of the summer 1956, Metesky strikes an IRT subway train, a telephone booth at Macy’s in Herald Square, and the RCA building in Rockefeller Center. He will later admit to planting several other bombs in 1956 that apparently failed to detonate and were ultimately on account of—including one in the Empire State building—which, as far as anyone knows, could still be unceremoniously launched into a little noticed cranny of the 37-million cubic foot structure a half-century later. [Empire State Building]

Ibid., p. 66.

On the afternoon of August 4th, a security guard at The RCA Building stumbles upon what he thinks to be a harmless length of pipe that could be put to good use. He gives the pipe to another guard who is near the end of his shift. That guard carries the pipe with him all that evening throughout his guard duties and during the bus ride home after work. Upon arriving at his house in New Jersey, he removes from his pocket the length of pipe, puts it on the kitchen table and goes to bed. At precisely 6:00 AM, he is awakened by what he describes as a sound “like two cars coming together.” Rushing into the kitchen, fighting the pungent smoke, he witnesses what his wife would later describe as “a mess... like an atomic bomb hit it.”

Ibid., p. 67.

In newspapers around the city, words such as “GHOULS,” “JUSTICE,” “YELLOW PRESS,” and “CON. EDISON CO,” appear in obtrusive stories beneath headlines such as “DO YOU RECOGNIZE THIS WRITING?” [Textuality]

Ibid., p. 77.

A faceless man driven by a desire to have the power of life and death over others.

Ibid., p. 77.

What this man really needs is love.

Ibid., p. 77.

The public begins to withdraw into a cocoon of fear.

Ibid., p. 80.

Train stations, bus terminals, and movie theaters, all favorite targets of the Bomber, report dramatic reductions in patronage, and a comparable drop in local retail activity marks an overall sense that people have begun to avoid the city.

Ibid., p. 80.

He seems like a ghost, but he has to be made of flesh and blood. He has been born, he has a mother and father, he eats and sleeps and walks and talks. He lives somewhere. Somewhere people know him, see his face, hear his voice... he has a name. Probably thousands of people in and around New York have had some fleeting contact with him at one time or another. He sits next to people on subways and buses. He strolls past them on sidewalks. He rubs elbows with them in stores... he patently does exist.

Beginning in early December, a flood of anonymous and malicious telephone calls forward into theaters, department stores, air terminals, office buildings, schools, newspapers, subway stations, police precincts, and even an army base. The calls are placed by a variety of deep-voiced males, harsh-sounding women, and squeaky-pitched teenagers, each informing bewildered call recipients of planted bombs and pending explosions... In the final weeks of 1956, the targets of the hoax calls and imitation pipe bombs include such locations as a crowded-to-capacity Madison Square Garden, a bustling Grand Central terminal, Yankee Stadium, the Coliseum, the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, and even the Egyptian consulate on Park Avenue.

The face might have be that of a successful political candidate or winner of a Nobel Prize... smiling... no, not smiling: beaming... He shouts cheerful greetings to the crowds who gather... Under one arm he carries a neatly wrapped brown-paper parcel containing a change of underwear. It is as though he is going on a vacation. He seems to be enjoying every minute of it.

The notorious and often quoted phrase “remanded to Bellevue for observation” is decreed by New York judges more than 1,500 times each year by the late 1950s.

Abbie Hoffman begins adopting the name “George Metesky” as a public front to his various theatrics. In August 1967, Hoffman organizes a demonstration at the New York Stock Exchange, where he and a group of others throw fistfuls of dollar bills onto the trading room floor in an effort to disrupt the flow of business and to make a comment on the futility of capitalism. When apprehended and cited for the act, Hoffman and each of his accomplices identify themselves as “George Metesky,” to the puzzlement of police and Exchange security.

Hoffman offers several “how to live free in New York” handbooks and one, Fuck The System, is published under the Metsky pseudonym. It isn’t until 1971, when Hoffman’s Steal This Book comes out with very similar style and content, that conjecture over the authorship of the first booklet is settled.

Abbie Hoffman attempts to make contact with Metsky at Matteawan at various times in the late 1960s in an effort to identify with and take up the cause of mental health abuses. Conservative in his political views and sharing nothing in common with Hoffman’s leftist antics, Metsky wants no part of the man and rebuffs his attempts at communication. “He is known as the Eisenhower of psychotics,” says a lawyer who works on the Metsky case. Metsky’s traditional beliefs could not have been more diametrically opposed to those of Hoffman’s, and the possibility of either successfully working with the other is remote.

The first time you may have seen me was in the gallery of the New York Stock Exchange, hurling money on the brokers below. Of course, you didn’t actually see me because no photographs of the incident exist: newsmen are not allowed to enter the sacred temple of commerce.
It all began with a simple telephone call to the Stock Exchange. I arranged for a tour, giving one of my favorite pseudonyms, George Metesky, the notorious Mad Bomber of Manhattan. Then I scraped together three hundred dollars which I changed into crispy one-dollar bills, rounded up fifteen free spirits, which in those days just took a few phone calls, and off we went to Wall Street.

We didn’t call the press; at that time we really had no notion of anything called a media event... We just took our places in line with the tourists, although our manner of dress did make us a little conspicuous. ...We started clowning, kissing and hugging, and eating money... I passed out money to freaks and tourists alike, then all at once we ran to the railing and began tossing out the bills. Pandemonium. The sacred electronic ticker tape, the heartbeat of the Western world, stopped cold. Stockbrokers scrambled over the floor like worried mice, scurrying after the money. Greed had burst through the business-as-usual façade.

It lasted five minutes as most. The guards quickly ushered us out with a stern warning and the ticker tape started up again. [Media]

Hoffman, Autobiography, pp. 100-1.

On a steamy summer morning—Aug. 24, 1967—about a dozen young men and women led by James Fourrat and Abbie Hoffman entered the visitors’ entrance to the New York Stock Exchange at 20 Broad Street. (The trading floor gallery had been open to visitors since 1939.) They waited while a member of the security staff approached; the group had previously phoned the exchange and asked for a tour, but the guards became nervous about the way that some in the group were dressed.

Still, the group went up to the visitors’ gallery, two stories above the busy trading floor. They snaked their way past exhibits showing the virtues of the industrial revolution and the development of modern capitalism. As they turned the corner, they encountered a horde of reporters and cameras.

This made exchange officials nervous. John Whighton, the captain of the exchange’s security force, told the group that no demonstration of any kind would be tolerated. Whighton asked the group for a name, and Fourrat said: “George Metesky,” and identified his group as ESSO, the East Side Service Organization (the first a reference to New York’s “Mad Bomber” from the 1950s, the second to the successor to Rockefeller’s Standard Oil). The guard wrote “George Metesky and friends” on a pad, and escorted the group up to the railing directly above the trading floor.

Immediately, the group of pranksters began throwing handfuls of one-dollar bills over the railing, laughing the entire time. (The exact number of bills is a matter of dispute; Hoffman later wrote that it was 300, while others said no more than 30 or 40 were thrown.)

Some of the brokers, clerks and stock runners below laughed and waved; others jeered angrily and shook their fists. The bills barely had time to land on the ground before guards began removing the group from the building, but news photos had been taken and the Stock Exchange “happening” quickly slid into iconic status.

Once outside, the activists formed a circle, holding hands and chanting “Free! Free!” At one point, Hoffman stood in the center of the circle and lit the edge of a $5 bill while grinning madly, but an NYSE runner grabbed it from him, stamped on it, and said: “You’re disgusting.”

If the prank accomplished nothing else, it helped cement Hoffman’s reputation as one of America’s most outlandish and creative protestors. Along with Jerry Rubin and others, Hoffman had founded the Youth International Party earlier that year, and the “Yippie” movement quickly became a prominent part of America’s counterculture.

The event was not the first political assault on Wall Street, and certainly not the most violent. At noon on Sept. 16, 1920, a bomb in a horse-drawn carriage exploded near the Wall Street office of J.P. Morgan & Co., ultimately killing 38 people and wounding hundreds. Trading at the NYSE stopped for the rest of the day; although no one was ever charged with the crime, authorities suspected Italian anarchists as having been responsible.

The Yippie prank obviously had less impact. Don Charles, a photographer who shot the event for The New York Times, today has no particular recollection of the event, and says that in his mind, the Yippie demonstrations at the following year’s Democratic convention in Chicago stood out more.

Still, Hoffman would later boast of his NYSE exploit: “In the minds of millions of teenagers the stock market had just crashed.”

Perhaps. Although Hoffman was speaking largely of a symbolic crash, the Dow Jones industrial average did in fact finish that week down 24.97 points, at 894.07. And in 1967 the market began one of the most sustained bear periods in its history.

Of course, no one would attribute that bear market directly to the Yippets’ intervention. The U.S. economy began to suffer under the weight of spending on the Vietnam War and Great Society programs, and the stock market’s lackluster performance reflected that economic stagnation.

The event did appear to have one direct effect: officials moved to insure that nothing like it could occur again. Some three months later, the NYSE installed bulletproof glass panels, 1-3/16 inches thick, around the visitors’ gallery, as well as a metal grillwork ceiling. An exchange spokesman told the New York Times at the time that it was for “reasons of security.

“The Day,” N. pag.

Showering money on the Wall Street brokers was the TV-age version of driving the money changers from the temple.

Metesky could be seen as a precursor to the 1960s militant, neo-anarchist organizations and finally, to the Unabomber.

Greenburg, p. 243.

Motherfuckers / Weather Underground

A common local political chant was, “U.S. out of the Lower East Side.”

Miller, “Habitation,” p. 137.

The Motherfuckers described themselves as a kind of politicized street gang, but in the media they were known only as “a group with a certain unprintable name.”

McMillan, pp. 532-41.

“We are the ultimate Horror Show,” read one. “Hideous Hair & Dangerous Drugs . . . Armed Love striking terror into the vacant hearts of the plastic Mother & pig-faced Father.”

Ibid., pp. 532-41.
The Motherfuckers were the downright dirtiest, skuzziest, and loudest group of people I’d ever laid eyes on.
Stern, p. 22.

“They lived like gutter rats,” Abbie Hoffman once recalled.” Journalist Thai Jones ... quipped that although the Motherfuckers “referred to themselves as ‘a street gang with analysis’ . . . they seemed to emphasize the street gang part.” Yippie Stewart Albert... put the difference between the Diggers and the Motherfuckers this way: “In the West Coast, there were flower children. In the East Coast, there were weed children. They just grew out of the sidewalk.” [Street] [Nature] McMillan, pp. 532-41.

In 1967, during a New York City garbage strike, they carried piles of stinking, festering trash uptown on the subway and dumped it on the steps and in the fountain of Lincoln Center. “WE PROPOSE A CULTURAL EXCHANGE,” they declared in an accompanying leaflet: “garbage for garbage.” (cf. “Upon learning that the Spanish Pavilion had hired some nonunion workers, the Teamsters prevented garbage collectors from picking up the pavilion’s trash. The Spaniards threatened to dump the trash into the Unisphere’s fountain if it was not collected, with the Teamsters saying they would then retrieve the garbage from the fountain and throw it back into the pavilion.” [World’s Fair 1964])

Ibid., pp. 532-41.

In 1969, the Motherfuckers cut the fences at Woodstock, helping to turn it into a free concert for hundreds of thousands.
Ibid., pp. 532-41.

Postbeat, postbiker, would-be Hells Angels with manifestos . . . deploying direct action against strategy, extravagance against tedium. Ibid., pp. 532-41.

After Solanas shot Andy Warhol in June 1968, the Motherfuckers staged a street performance on her behalf in Washington Square Park. Morea drew up an accompanying leaflet, wherein he described Warhol as a “nonman shot by the reality of his dreams,” and lionized Solanas as a “cultural assassin—a tough chick with a bop cap and a thirty-eight.” “America’s white plastic cathedral is ready to burn,” Morea concluded. “Valerie is ours and the Sweet Assassin lives. SCUM in exile.”

I put the question bluntly: How could you rationalize supporting Valerie Solanas?

“Rationalize? I didn’t rationalize anything,” Ben says. “I Loved Valerie and I loathed Andy Warhol, so that’s all there was to it.” A few seconds later he shrugs and adds, “I mean, I didn’t want to shoot him.” But then he doubles back again. “Andy Warhol ruined art.”
Ibid., pp. 532-41.

Our idea was, if you’re gonna pick up a machine gun, it shouldn’t be plastic.
Ibid., pp. 532-41.

Against the vapid spaciness of “flower power” we proclaimed the need for “Armed Love.” Our rhetoric was inflammatory and often violent. Neumann, pp. 104-12.
In becoming a Motherfucker I renounced my commitment to ordered discourse, the traffic in abstractions, respect for explanations, the demand for coherence, and the subordination of impulse and emotion—all of which I thought of as characteristic of a life committed to reason.
I grew fierce in my scorn for theory. I felt most alive when running in the streets with no thoughts in my head but where the cops were and how to avoid them. But my apostasy was never complete. As the Mafia don longs for respectability, as the dealer in prostitutes and drugs can be the staunchest proponent of family values, so I, the rebellious child of reason, longed for the respectable cloak of rationality and pledged allegiance to reason even as I plunged headlong into the irrational.
Ibid., pp. 141-6.

Down Fifty-ninth Street, revolutionary banners... black flags. The crowd of eight to ten thousand breaks into a mad stampede—they realize they have the streets! Fearful drivers roll up their windows. Traffic is halted on the busiest street in the city!

When Secretary of State Dean Rusk came to town to speak to some war hawk assemblage at the Waldorf-Astoria, we rallied at 57th Street and Seventh Avenue, ready to “bring the war home.” Plastic bags filled with cow’s blood flew through the night air. Tape recordings of battle sounds screamed above the crowds.

Abbie Hoffman: “Typically American, we had no ideology.”
Ibid., p. 100.

The Army recruiting center in Times Square was plastered with stickers: SEE CANADA NOW.
Ibid., p. 109

Stop signs on street corners now read STOP WAR.
Ibid., p. 109.

Hundreds crowded the lobby of the Daily News smoking grass and passing out leaflets to employees that began, “Dear Fellow Members of the Communist Conspiracy.”
Ibid., p. 109

A tree was planted in the center of St. Marx Place while 5,000 celebrators danced to rock music.
Ibid., p. 109.

Midnight artists snuck into subway stations and painted huge murals on the walls.
Ibid., 109.

Naked people ran through churches.
Ibid., p. 109.

Panhandlers worked the streets for hours, took the change the collected to the nearest bank and scattered it on the floor.
Ibid., p. 109.

A giant yellow Submarine mysteriously kept appearing in tow-away zones.
The house at 18 West 11th Street exploded on March 6, 1970 at 11:55 a.m. when it was used as a bomb factory for the Weather Underground. Three bomb makers, Theodore Gold, Diana Oughton and Terry Robbins were killed. Two others, Kathy Boudin and Cathlyn Wilkerson, escaped and remained fugitives for more than a decade. The first was the daughter of the civil liberties lawyer Leonard Boudin, the second the daughter of James P. Wilkerson, the owner of the house at No. 18.

The house... and those surrounding it, beautifully matched four-story town houses of Federal design, were built in the 1840's by Henry Brevoort Jr. and were known as the Brevoort Row. Early in the 20th century, No. 18 was owned by Charles Merrill, a founder of Merrill Lynch & Company. His son, the poet James Merrill, was born there.

In 1930, Charles Merrill sold the building to Howard Dietz, a successful Broadway lyricist and a movie executive. Merrill followed up with a note saying that he hoped the new owner would enjoy "the little house on heaven street." Dietz lived there lavishly with each of his three wives. When he gave a party, sometimes for as many as 250, all the furniture was placed in a van, which was parked on the street until the guests finished "dancing in the dark," as Dietz phrased it in his most famous song.

James Wilkerson, an advertising executive, bought the house in 1963 and moved in with his second wife, Audrey. He continued the high style of living to which the house had become accustomed. The dwelling had 10 rooms, including a double-size drawing room, a paneled library, where the owner kept his valuable collection of sculptured birds, and a sauna. He restored antique furniture in the subbasement workroom. The house still had the original mantles on its fireplaces and was filled with Hepplewhite furniture. In the garden was a fountain with a mirror behind it.

In 1964, Mr. Wilkerson celebrated his 50th birthday with a masked ball for 90 people, dancing to an orchestra until 2 a.m. Among the guests were two daughters from his first marriage, Ann and Cathy.

Further down the street, Susan Wager, a neighbor, was in her kitchen. "I felt my house tremble," she said. "It was like an earthquake."

She rushed to No. 18 and saw two grime-covered young women coming out of the downstairs door. One, Cathy Wilkerson, was naked. The other, Kathy Boudin, was partly clad in jeans. The assumption was that their clothes were torn off in the blast.

Mrs. Wager took them back to her house, gave them fresh clothes and offered them the use of a shower. Then she went back into the street to see what was happening. By the time she returned home, the two women had left, one wearing Mrs. Wager’s favorite boots and coat. She never saw the women again. "I thought they were in an accident," Ms. Wager said. "I never thought they could have been responsible."

By the time I arrived, the street was swarming with firemen, policemen and sightseers. Seeing the smoke pour out of No. 18, we felt that our house would also be destroyed. That afternoon, each tenant in our building was allowed to make one quick trip inside and rescue items of property. In our apartment, the walls creaked, as if a ship had been torpedoed and was about to sink beneath the sea. None of the tenants of No. 16 ever spent a night in that house again.

On the evening news, there was a picture of a red tricycle and the suggestion that a child might be missing in the explosion. It was Ethan’s tricycle. It had been in the lobby of the building and the fireman had put it outside. Our upstairs neighbor, a playwright, rescued his tax forms, a Picasso drawing and a tin of truffles. His top hat and tails, worn for openings at the opera, were never recovered.

Devastated by the explosion, the splendid house at No. 18 had been reduced to shattered walls and windows. Mr. Hoffman’s living room wall had a huge hole torn in it. His desk had fallen into the rubble next door.

Eventually, Hugh Hardy, the architect, and Francis Mason, then an executive at Steuben Glass, bought the land. Mr. Hardy designed a startlingly modern structure. After considerable debate, the radical design was finally approved by the Landmarks Commission. The Hardys and the Masons planned to turn the new house into a two-family dwelling. But as time passed, the two couples changed their minds and put the property back on the market.

For eight years, the plot remained vacant. Then, in 1978, it was sold to David and Norma Langworthy, a wealthy Philadelphia couple. They used Mr. Hardy’s design for the exterior, with a facade jutting out toward the street. They moved in the following year, and Mrs. Langworthy remained after her husband’s death in 1994.

Inside, the new one-family house has two levels, with perspective-distorting angles and open spaces allowing for dramatic views. The former bomb factory is now a laundry room. Nowhere is there a hint of the building’s past.

The signature touch is a Paddington bear in the jutting window. Its costume is changed according to the weather. On rainy days, Paddington wears a raincoat. During a storm, he switches to snow wear. For the first day of school, he is decked out in his schoolboy outfit. By special request, one day two bears appeared in the window dressed as a bride and groom; on cue, a neighborhood doctor fell to his knees on the sidewalk and proposed to his girlfriend.

Every March 6, people place flowers around the tree in front of the building.

It took nine days of collecting body parts to determine how many persons had died in the blast. Fingerprint records were required to identify the corpses of Theodore Gold, a leader of the 1968 Columbia University student protests, and Diana Oughton, the organizer of the 1969 SDS national convention.

“Weather Underground,” N. pag.

The problem with the hippies was that there developed a hostility within the counterculture itself, between those who had, like, the equivalent of a trust fund versus those who had to live by their wits. It’s true, for instance, that blacks were somewhat resentful of the hippies by the Summer of Love, 1967, because their perception was that these kids were drawing paisley swirls on their Sam Flax writing pads, burning incense, and taking acid, but those kids could get out of there any time they wanted to.

They could go back home. They could call their mom and say, “Get me outta here.” Whereas someone who was raised in a project on Columbia Street and was hanging out on the edge of Tompkins Square Park can’t escape. Those kids don’t have anyplace to go. They can’t go back to Great Neck, they can’t go back to Connecticut. They can’t go back to boarding school in Baltimore. They’re trapped. [Suburbs]
We have marched on Wall Street (Feb. 10). We have changed it to War Street.

"DIE YUPPIE SCUM" was everywhere, as was the upside-down, cocktail glass graffiti of the anarchist band Missing Foundation.
Schmitz pp. 270-1.

Anti-Semitism, Nazi

Mayor La Guardia receives a small package December 8 containing a live .22-caliber long cartridge and a note, signed with a crayoned swastika, reading, “You will get this if you continue to attack the German Nazi Party.” The mayor is punched in the face and knocked down on the steps of City Hall.
Trager, p. 506.

When the mayor visits the White House to keep an appointment, President Roosevelt extends his right arm and says, “Heil Fiorello;” La Guardia, also extending his right arm, replies, “Heil, Franklin.”
Ibid., 506.

City garment workers jeer at Jewish communists with shouts of “Heil, Hitler!”
Trager, p. 513.

“Restricted building” and “good building,” both euphemisms for a building that does not allow Jews.
Gross, p. 10.

Did you ever notice...what a Jewy-looking thing the Singer Tower is when it’s lit up?
Sharpe, p. 187.

Public interest in New York Hospital found expression in an unusual way in 1938 when more than one hundred donors of all denominations contributed a total of one thousand dollars for the removal of swastika designs from the 325-foot chimney. The ancient symbol that had been given a new significance by Chancellor Hitler’s rise to power in Germany was replaced by Greek crosses.

With “Don’t buy meat” as their watchword and “Don’t sell meat” as their battle-cry, the indignant housewives succeeded last week in putting out of business for the time being some 1,500 of the 2,000 Jewish butcher-shops in the greater city. Armed with milk-bottles of kerosene, bands of women and children would descend upon such shops as had the temerity to keep open, maul the proprietor, drench his stock with oil, and often, if the police did not appear in time, wreck his place. Sometimes a courageous butcher armed his family with horsewhips to repel the invaders, while others, possessed of finer generalship, met the combination of kerosene and femininity with streams of water from the hose.
“Topics,” p. 798

A Jewish butcher was accused of selling meat to Italians.
Police who were trying to rescue the butchers were assaulted by slabs of liver.
Reitano, p. 119.

The kosher meat riots were followed by America's most extensive episode of anti-Semitic violence. Irish factory workers threw water, wood, nails, and iron bolts from windows.
Ibid., p. 120.

Several Nazi propaganda agencies maintained headquarters in Yorkville. The German-American Bund and its official paper, Deutscher Weckruf und Beobachter, which under the leadership of Fritz Kuhn directed Nazi work throughout the country, had their national offices at 178 East Eighty-fifth Street. The German-American Business league, in the same building, published directories of firms to be patronized by Nazi adherents. The Nazis occasionally paraded through Yorkville in their uniforms, which were of three kinds: black trousers, white shirts with swastika armbands, and black caps, for the rank and file members; olive-drab military uniforms, for the guards; and imported regulation German uniforms for the storm troops. In the spring of 1938 the Yorkville Casino was the arena of a bloody fight between Nazi sympathizers and a group of people who were members of the American Legion.

Nazi propaganda was disseminated by a Nazi agent, whose luxurious apartment at 305 Riverside Drive was decorated with a portrait of Hitler.
Ellis, p. 559.

The German Central Book Store, 218 East Eighty-fourth Street, was stocked with German books banned by Hitler.

February 1934, Second Avenue: "The room about fifteen feet by twenty, was a detailed reproduction of a Berlin Storm Troop cellar... I counted twenty-two uniformed men. Brown shirts, breeches, boots, Sam Browne belts with pistol holsters. Their Troop Fuehrer faced them. He lifted his arm half-way, elbow close to his side, palm out and clipped "Heil Hitler."
Diehl, p. 4.

A huge swastika sewn atop of an America flag: "This is the flag we shall carry through the streets of New York when we wipe them clean of the Jewish scum."
Ibid., 4.

309 E. 92nd St.: Headquarters for Paul Manger's Gau-USA, a precursor to the American Bund. Meetings were held in a back from and Nazi paraphernalia could be seen in the window.
Ibid., 5.

Heinz Spanknoebel invited his fellow Nazis for an evening cruise around Manhattan Island on the German steamer SS Resolute. Decked out in full uniform, they hoisted their steins and belted out "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles” with the New York skyline and Statue of Liberty serving as background. [Monument]
_Ibid._, 8.

In October 1939, a Nazi flag made its way across East 86th Street during the German Day Parade.
_Ibid._, 9.

During the 1930s, if you went into a tavern in Yorkville and weren’t pro-Hitler, you’d be given a hard time.
_Ibid._, 10.

Fritz Kuhn, the president of the Amerikadeutscher Volksbund aka The Bund: “Like the German Führer, he regarded himself as a great man, a man chosen to unify his racial brothers in America. He was rarely out of uniform. His black leather jack boots apparently glued to his six-foot frame, his thinning hair slicked back over his broad head, his legs, apart, and his thumbs fixed in his Sam Browne belt, Kuhn loudly proclaimed himself the American Führer.”
_Ibid._, 13.

The Bund had their own tailor in Queens who custom made Nazi uniforms.
_Ibid._, 13.

Camp Siegfried in Yaphank, Long Island. A forty-four acre Nazi recruiting and training center. At the Yaphank station, a small army of uniformed children greeted hundreds of Bundists coming from Penn Station; together they marched through the town of Brookhaven, swastikas waving as an eighteen-piece tuba-led band played Die Spielmannszug. Strains of Wagner drifted through the air. On the lawn grew a giant swastika made of bright red salvia and boxwood.
_Ibid._, 14.

At Camp Siegfried: On more than one Sunday parading with the Brown Shirts were a group of Black Shirts, pro-Italian Fascists.
Neuss, N. pag.

February 20, 1939: more than 20,000 Nazi sympathizers attended a rally at Madison Square Garden.
Diehl, p. 20.

Yorkville temporarily closed its movie houses lest people think they were showing German movies.
_Ibid._, 78.

In December of 1941, an underwater anti-submarine net was strung two miles below the Narrows, from Norton’s Pont on the western edge of Coney Island to Hoffman Island, a merchant marine training center off Staten Island, in hopes of preventing U-boats from entering the harbor.
_Ibid._, 86.

German U-boat subs were grounded on Rockaway beach.
_Ibid._, 87.

U-boat Commander Reinhard Hardegen drove his submarine past the carnival lights of Coney Island’s Wonder Wheel and the Parachute Jump, keeping clear of land as it neared lower New York Bay. He pressed on, urged by the need to reach New York City. It was 10 o’clock when the U-boat approached the area south of Manhattan just beyond the Narrows. Hartigan wrote “I cannot describe the feeling with words but it was unbelievably beautiful and great... and for the first time in this war a German soldier looked upon the coast of the USA.”

Hartigan wondered, “What form the life of the city was taking at that hour... Were the Broadway shows just getting out? Were the jazz clubs just getting started? Were the newsboys hocking the last editions—or the first?” In his imagination he fantasize how clever would it be to walk around Times Square and tip his hat to passersby. (cf. Goldenberg: “Cold War Radar-guided Nike missiles that once surrounded the city...” [Media]) [Coney Island]

Ibid., 87-8.

German submarines sowed mines around Sandy Hook in the path of outbound ships, so 16 tugs were outfitted as minesweepers. Working in pairs, they found exploded floating mines.

Ellis, p. 505.

A statue symbolizing Germany was one of twelve figures decorating the sixth-floor façade of the Customhouse just south of Bowling Green. A sculptor was hired to chip the imperial eagle from the breastplate of this Valkyrie.

Ibid., 505.

Dachshunds, a breed of dogs well liked by Germans, were kicked on the sidewalks of New York and renamed liberty pups. Sauerkraut became liberty cabbage. German measles were liberty measles. The Bank of Germany at First Avenue and Seventy-fourth Street changed its name to the Bank of Europe.

Ibid., 505.

At Rockefeller Center, the entrance to the Palazzo D’Italia was deprived of its coat of arms, and Italian sculptor Attilio Piccirilli’s cartouche depicting commerce and industry above the entrance to 636 Fifth Avenue was covered with wooden planks. The work had the misfortune of being cast in 1936, when Mussolini came into power.

Ibid., 78.

Romano Mussolini, son of Benito, sang “Over The Rainbow” and “Summertime” with his jazz quartet at Town Hall.

N. cit.

Meir Kahane: “A .22 for every Jew.”

Moorhouse, p. 116.

Many “Russian” entrepreneurs were Jewish immigrants who chose not to broadcast their religious affiliation.

Peretti, p. 17.

Jew merchants will give away matzoh balls and gefilte fish to anyone they see with afros

Last Poets, “Revolution.”

GUARD: Sorry, hippies are not allowed in the Stock Exchange.

ACTOR: But we’re not hippies, we’re Jewish. Should we tell the press you kept Jews out of Wall Street?

I distinctly heard it. He muttered under his breath, "Jew." ... Wh—

How am I a paran—? Well, I pick up on those kind o' things. You know, I was having lunch with some guys from NBC, so I said... uh, "Did you eat yet or what?" and Tom Christie said, "No, didchoo?" Not, did you, didchoo eat? Jew? No, not did you eat, but Jew eat? Jew. You get it? Jew eat?

Right, right, so g-get back to what we were discussing, the failure of the country to get behind New York City is— is anti-Semitism.

Max, the city is terribly worried.

But the—I’m not discussing politics or economics. This is foreskin.

No, no, no, Max, that’s a very convenient out. Every time some group disagrees with you it’s because of anti-Semitism.

Don’t you see? The rest of the country looks upon New York like we’re—we’re left-wing Communist, Jewish, homosexual, pornographers. I think of us that way, sometimes, and I—I live here.

Max, if we lived in California, we could play outdoors every day, in the sun.

Sun is bad for yuh. Everything our parents said was good is bad.

Sun, milk, red meat, college...

You’re what Grammy Hall would call a real Jew.

Yeah, well... you— She hates Jews. She thinks that they just make money, but let me tell yuh, I mean, she’s the one yeah, is she ever. I’m tellin’ yuh.

This intellectual vividness New York owes partly to the presence of an immense Jewish population, partly to the absence of a Governing Middle Class. I don’t like Jews. I make the statement quite advisedly and not without tact—for, if I don’t like Jews and still make the statement that the arts flourish in New York largely because of its Jewish population, the assertion may be regarded as more accurate than if I were dealing with people whom I liked and to whom in consequence I might be suspected of handing out large spoonfuls of apple-sauce. Apart from that whether I like Jews or not can be of no importance to any one.

And the fact of their artistic helpfulness is incontestable... at any rate as regards the plastic arts and the art of the Theatre. Jews in New York buy a great many pictures; they buy probably the greater part of the sculpture that is sold and the more recondite theatre—the less recondite also I daresay—exists solely by the suffrage, the subsidy or the attendance, of the rich or the poor Jew. The present theatrical season has not been a good one: one might indeed say that it has been pretty rotten. I at least have seen only one play that I have not been slightly ashamed of having gone to. But that is merely temporary. Two years ago I saw here more interesting plays in one month than in either London or Paris during two years and no doubt when I get forcibly taken to the play in New York this autumn the balance will again have redressed itself in favor of New York.

I don’t indeed profess to be a haunter of playhouses; I never, indeed, go to one unless I am more or less forcibly taken—but that makes me a fair judge of the state of the more “advanced” theatre in any place in which I happen to be: The people who say to me: “Oh, you must go to So-and-So” and who take tickets and lead me to it are of a class whose enthusiasms are not roused by the theatre of commerce. Thus on the whole the Dybbuk in Hebrew was about the only play in New York last season that was incontestably worth being dragged to, and I was duly dragged to it by an enthusiastic young lady, not a Jewess.

That may stand as a symbol for certain sides of the artistic life of New York. There you have an amazing new art—or, if you prefer it, an amazing development of an old art; it is subsidized by richish Jews, supported amazingly by the poorer Jewish population, and produces the only play to which a young Christian enthusiast can drag an elderly and case-hardened, foreign non-enthusiast with some chance of finding her choice approved.

How it may be with literature I do not so exactly know. At any rate the only people I have found in New York—and I have not found them anywhere else at all who really loved books with a real, passionate, yearning love that transcended their attention to all other terrestrial manifestations were Jews—and the only people who subsidized young writers during their early non-lucrative years. But rich Jews seem to do this automatically all the world over. Rich Christians never will, though poor ones will be found to do so.

Obviously this Israelite support of the arts would not suffice in itself to make New York the art center that it is or is becoming; the majority of the support that the arts here receives is Gentile enough all right . . . but that support would hardly suffice to maintain a very vigorous artistic life in this city without the Jewish addition. It makes the difference between hardly supportable indigence and just bearable comfort.

Ford, America, pp. 127-30.

Prison

For beneath its futuristic trappings, Escape from New York embodied a notion dating back to the mid-nineteenth century, when New York City was limited to Manhattan, isolated by wide rivers from mainland United States and even from its sister city, Brooklyn. It was easy for Americans of the time to consider the city as a place apart, a narrow, confined island whose strange and different ways were often unfathomable to the rest of the country. The notion was diluted somewhat in the twentieth century, when Manhattan was laced to the larger world by dozens of rail and road crossings, and the city itself redefined as an enormous, five-borough metropolis but it has retained a residual power in the American imagination. Escape from New York would bring the old vision back to life with a vengeance: Manhattan as nothing less, literally or figuratively, than America's Devil's Island.

The film's prologue describes the city's conversion into the federal government's penal colony in the late 1980s, conveniently eliding all social or economic detail to focus instead on topography: the distinctive shape of Manhattan now outlined by a bright green line indicating a high "containment wall" that, as if quarantining a virus, has finally rid the nation of its offshore anomaly. The great river crossings, the bridges and tunnels that allowed the metropolis to transcend its geography, have literally been subverted—mined with explosives—in order to restore the city to its nineteenth-century boundaries.

The film then surveys the dark jungle that the city has become: its buildings vandalized and burned, its nighttime streets filled with "crazies" who come up from the subway, and its population a throng of criminal gangs, wreaking havoc under the supremely violent Duke of New York (Isaac Hayes). At times, the place portrayed hardly resembles New York at all: the climactic escape takes place on the “69th Street Bridge”; power is provided by pumping crude oil from deposits beneath the island; and the exterior scenes take place on ruined blocks that look nothing like Manhattan—for the good reason that they were shot in downtown St. Louis, in an area that had been recently ravaged by fire. Yet at other times the film plays off the audience’s shivery recognition of the city’s landmarks: the World Trade Center, now a hulking ruin toward which Snake Plissken (Kurt Russell) glides his sailplane; Central Park, now a jungle clearing where inmates gather for monthly food drop-offs; the Statue of Liberty, now the island’s security post. In its way, the film offers a kind of inverted tribute to the sheer iconic status of New York. As Carpenter surely appreciated, a film titled “Escape from St. Louis” would hardly draw much of a crowd.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 379.

A sort of apotheosis appeared in John Carpenter’s Escape from New York (1981), in which the city has become a maximum-security prison by default. The last honest folk having abandoned the place, the authorities have merely locked it up, permitting the scum within to rule themselves, with the understanding that they will before long kill one another off. The story may have been a futuristic action-adventure, but for most Americans the premise was strict naturalism, with the sole exception of the locks, which ought by rights to have been in place. Aside from the matter of actual violence, drugs, and squalor, there was the fact that in the 1970s New York City was not a part of the United States at all. It was an offshore interzone with no shopping malls, few major chains, very few born-again Christians who had not been sent there on a mission, no golf courses, no subdivisions.

Sante, “My Lost City,” N. pag.

Whereas the spaces of the elderly, childish New York are gardens, even if they’re rubble-strewn vacant lots or tenement courtyards bedecked with dripping laundry, those of the new New York are jails. The shadows cast by the El in the streets beneath construct a caging lattice of light; the steel tiers of Rockefeller Center as it rises are a penitentiary. The girders trap the steelworkers inside a system of endless repetition, allotting to each a see-through cell in which to labor. The El projects an illusory prison of barred shadows; Rockefeller Center rearing in the air is a diagrammatic, conceptual prison.

Conrad, p. 172.

But the street has been killed and the city made into a madhouse. Le Corbusier, p. 188.

Women’s prison that looms high and is folded in silence as the night itself—at sunset their windows look like oranges.

Kerouac, Lonesome, pp. 116-17.

Anxiety flavors the coffee at Riker’s.

McDarrah, p. 10.

Riker’s Island out there on the grey East River. Charlie said three quarters of it was made from subway excavations.

Donleavy, N. pag.
They don't tape niggas in the bullpen no more 'cause a' AIDS. You don't even get raped on Riker's no more.

Courgois, p. 38.

East chilling wind bursting out of the crosstown streets. Blown over Brooklyn. Through the bars of all the institutions. Where the imprisoned troubled eyes stare.

Donleavy, N. pag.

In 1970, inmates mounted protests against horrific prison conditions in five jails in three boroughs involving thirty-two hostages. The first riot occurred in August at the Tombs, where inmates held three guards hostage for seven hours and controlled the facilities. The riots were organized by two radical groups—the Black Panther Party and the Puerto Rican Lords. As they ignited mattresses, clothing, and furniture, the prisoners declared their intention “to burn ourselves out of here.”

Reitano, p. 184.

The Tombs, a decaying dungeon in its early forties, a structure suffering from every ill known to the building trades, a shaky keep about to be added to the city’s memories.

Reisenberg, p. 102.

I would not get arrested in New York. I try not to get arrested in New York because Puerto Ricans disappear in the system in New York.

N. cit.

Stonewall

The Stonewall Inn takes its name from the autobiography of “Mary Casal,” The Stone Wall, published in 1930, a rare American book to depict lesbian love at that time.

Carter, p. 8.

The bar’s first name, in the 1930s, was Bonnie’s Stone Wall, which soon gained a reputation as one “of the more notorious tearooms in the Village. By the 1940s, its name had been changed to the more bucolic-sounding Bonnie’s Stonewall Inn, and by the 1960s it had been changed again to the Stonewall Inn Restaurant. It was the former stonewall Inn Restaurant that, in 1967, having sat vacant for some time after a fire gutted it, metamorphosed into the gay club the Stonewall Inn.

Ibid., p. 8.

The Stonewall is reopened after the fire by mobsters.

Ibid., p. 67.

Most of the men are wearing outer jackets. They aren’t wearing so much leather or denim … some men wear top hats.

Ibid., p. 70.

The lighting is dim throughout… the darkness creates a cavern-like feel. Smoky air fills the bar.

Ibid., p. 72.
The men like to wear perfumes, such as Tabu and Ambush, both marketed to women, whose aromas give the place a rich, saturated atmosphere.
Ibid., p. 72.

If the Tenth of Always is like a little parish church, the Stonewall is like St. Peter’s in Rome… It is big in its scope...
Ibid., p. 77.

It is possible to buy any known substance available in capsule form. All the hairdressers are into Desbutols, Desoxyn mixed with Nembutol.
Ibid., p. 81.

Ibid., pp. 85-7.

The raid begins at 1:00 A.M. on a summer Saturday morning.
Ibid., p. 143.

The arrival of the cops and the blare of the lights transforms the scene from one of festivity to sadness. The jukeboxes fall silent, and the shimmering go-go boys leave their cages to put on their street clothes.
Ibid., p. 139.

The transvestites put up a great resistance, refusing to go into the Stonewall’s bathrooms to be “examined.”
Ibid., p. 140.

A couple of drag queens dance by themselves to a Stevie Wonder tune on the jukebox.
Ibid., p. 141.

When did you ever see a fag fight back?
Ibid., p. 143.

Grumbling could be heard among the limp wristed set.
Ibid., p. 143.

More and more people start to mill around the front.
Ibid., p. 144.

Ostentatious drag queens walking in twos and threes down Christopher towards the bar, shrieking little sentences.
Ibid., p. 144.

It is a hot, seething night. A real New York summer night.
Ibid., p. 144.

What’s going on? Is something going to happen? Why is this taking so long?
Ibid., p. 144.

The drag queens kind of chant and skitter along. It’s entertaining.
Ibid., p. 144.
The crowd on Christopher Street continues to grow as the club’s ejected patrons reach the pavement where they are joined by a considerable number of tourists who, having come to the Village on a Friday night looking for excitement, find it for free on the street.

We all figured that the Black Panthers were going to start the revolution.

One young man swishes by the detective posted at the door. “Hello there, fella!”

Wrists are limp, hair is primped.

No one knows this is going to turn into a riot.

Some of the men ejected from the bar throw their arms up and out in a V shape as if they are performers making a grand entrance on a stage.

Noticing the crowd’s skittish hilarity, he pauses to peer up at the moon. It’s full.

The first prisoners to be loaded inside the paddy wagon are members of the Mafia, who are brought out of the club one by one.

Everyone hears the cry that reverberates through the night air “Gay Power!”

The idea seems too unreal, too radical, to be taken seriously, and the newly heard slogan soon dissolves into giggles.

Someone begins to sing “We Shall Overcome” and a few in the crowd start singing along. But after a few verses this, too, seems too dignified to be taken seriously by a bunch of homosexuals, who begin to camp on the solemn lyrics.

A police officer shoves one of the transvestites, who turns and smacks the officer over the head with her purse.

“Nobody’s going to fuck around with me. I ain’t going to take this shit,” a guy in a dark red t-shirt shouts, dancing in and out of the crowd.

A “beefy, good-sized, typical New York butch” loses her mind in the streets of the West Village—kicking, cursing, screaming, and fighting. It is the moment when the scene becomes explosive.

All four tires of a police car are slashed.

A cobblestone is hauled, landing on the trunk of a police car with a terrible screech.

The gay throng makes a useful discovery: a large stack of new bricks at a construction site on Seventh Avenue South.

Coins are thrown at the policemen, making pinging sounds as they hit the pavement and the Stonewall Inn’s windows.

Shouts of “Pigs!” and “Faggot cops!” fill the night air.

Pennies and dimes. Nickels were the next thing to be thrown. Followed by quarters.

A glass bottle was lobbed.

And then another one came flying through the dark air. And another.

On the ground, a worm’s eye view. Looking at legs.

Inside the Stonewall, the cops barricade themselves using the club’s tables against the doors.

It is silent and dark and dank and strongly smells of beer.

The fey beings have suddenly and inexplicably metamorphosed into raging tigers.

The officers, who fought in Africa and Sicily in World War II are still shaking an hour later. “Believe me, I’ve never seen anything like it.”

I’m sick of being told I’m sick.

Inside the Stonewall, bricks are felt pounding the door. The floor shudders at each blow.
The police trapped inside peer through peepholes into the street. “Where are the reinforcements?” “I don’t know. There must be some mix-up.”

Pieces of paper are stuff into cracks at the bottom of the plywood inside the Stonewall’s window and cigarette lighters are held up to them.

A parking meter is dug up out of the ground and is used as battering ram on the Inn’s doors.

The attack on the police creates as cacophony as the sounds of glass shattering up and down the street is mixed with the pounding of the parking meter on the doors, while cries of “Liberate bar!” fill the air.

Breaking bottles are thrown at demonstrators from apartment dwellers along Grove Street who want to get some sleep.

“ We’re the pink panthers!”

A mad Negro queen whirls like a dervish with a twisted piece of metal in her hand and breaks the remaining windows.

The doors begin to give.

The night reverberates again with the boom of the parking meter on the Stonewall’s doors.

In the park across the street, several people quietly and methodically pour liquid into empty Coke bottles.

The flames are blue and have little yellow tips.

Everybody is really perspiring—I mean really sweating.

People are crying. People are cut up.

A policewoman escapes through a vent up to the roof.

The detectives locate a fire hose, but can’t see where to aim it, wedging the hose through a crack in the door. It sends out a weak stream.
One of the kids shouts, “Grab it! Grab his cock!”

The door is broken down, and the kids systematically dump refuse from waste cans into the Wall, squirt it with lighter fluid, and ignite it. Huge flashes of flame and billows of smoke.

Kids line up in a Rockette lines, kicking their legs up at the police.

“The girls in blue” and “Lily Law.”

The protests continue into the night. Angry gay men set fires in trash cans and beak store windows, screaming “Gay power! Gay power!”

Well, this is boring. All we’re doing is running around the block, here. We’ve done it ten times now and it’s dull. Let’s do something else.

So we sort of vanished.

Christopher Street is empty. The sky is very dark, there is a terrific moon, and the Village is eerily quiet.

Morning comes to Christopher Street, diamondlike glass all over.

Incredible. The fucking queens rioted.

After the Stonewall riots, the Mafia owners were doing their best to attract customers back inside by giving away free soft drinks.

The day after the riots was the hottest June 28th in New York City history.

He looked up and saw red sparks falling from on high, through the night air, as in a gentle rainfall.

Lesbian black and Latina prisoners at the Women’s House of Detention were setting toilet paper on fire and dropping it from their cell windows in support of the rioters.

Harlem Riot
The gathering of crowds, the rise of looting and its relapse.

Sunday night is an ordinary one in Harlem, but hot: windows are wide open, the sidewalks are full of men and women, strolling or idling; children play on the streets, mothers wheel their babies. Ibid., 4.

Many persons smile when their pictures are taken. Ibid., 5.

A bottle is thrown toward the hospital and falls on the sidewalk. Other bottles follow. Ibid., 5.

Of 40 liquor stores in the district, 30 are cleaned out completely with not a bottle left in place. Ibid., 5.

Favorite articles of loot are: food-groceries, meats, fruits, vegetables; clothing-fur coats, sweaters, suits, corsets, dresses; furnishings, rugs, linoleums, lamps, mattresses radios, second-hand chairs and coffee tables; and liquor and jewelry. Ibid., 6.

Every piece of furniture, even cheap pictures hanging on the wall, is carried off (except for a torn sofa left standing on the sidewalk). Ibid., 6.

When the riot begins, Negro store-owners place signs reading “Colored” in their windows. These stores are left intact, although others nearby, owned by whites, are totally destroyed. Negro stores without signs in the window are also generally not molested. “Wherever somebody had told the mob this was a Negro place, they leave it alone. Sometimes a brick is thrown into the window before the word got around, but that is as far as it went. Despite the broken window, not a thing is touched, not a box out of place.” Ibid., 8.

Lights are on in all the apartment houses. People sit in windows watching.
_Ibid._, 9.

Better-dressed members of the middle class.
_Ibid._, 9.

More _substantial_ residents.
_Ibid._, 9.

Children do much of the food looting. Three boys about 10 years old load their arms with shoes from the shelves of a store. Other children take clothing, cheap candies, and toys.
_Ibid._, 10.

At 6 a.m. the kids come out to search within the rubble. I see one little boy with a handful of candy bars and a penny whistle.
_Ibid._, 10.

Women take: dresses, hats, sweaters, fur coats, corsets, jewelry, small pieces of furniture, mattresses, blankets, linen, children's clothes, milk, groceries, meat, fruit, vegetables, and household furnishings such as lamps and electric bulbs.

Boys and older men take: food, meat, suits, hats, shoes, luggage, jewelry, carpets, furniture, typewriters, radios, musical instruments, liquors, and goods from pawnshops; some boys try to make off with automobiles.

The fact that electric light bulbs are listed under women and girls does not mean men or children did not take any, but that the only instances mentioned in the press were of women.
_Ibid._, 10.

Children do not take cases of liquor.
_Ibid._, pp. 10-11.

Women do not take penny whistles.
_Ibid._, 11.

Girls do not take men’s suits.
_Ibid._, 11.

One man is arrested for stealing two pairs of ladies' silk hose.
_Ibid._, 11.

In looting, each person takes what he or she had wants but is denied or limited in obtaining. The poorer classes protest against property because they have been denied it, and against authority because that is the constant and palpable instrument of denial and suppression; and, of course, the Negroes protest against whites because the most pervasive and omnipresent fact of Negro life is a denial of the status and privileges of whites.
_Ibid._, 11.

A person wants something, say, grapes. Assume the grapes are denied him. But he still wants them. What can he do?
_Ibid._, 11.
"The grapes are sour anyway, I don’t really want them."
Ibid., 12.

There is every reason for believing that young Negro girls are as frustrated racially and sexually as young Negro boys.
Ibid., 12.

If we have exact measures of the bitterness, and know the strength or weakness of inhibiting factors, we will be able to predict just when another riot will occur.
Ibid., 12.

Frustration is fairly common in normal times, and the resentment accumulates.
Ibid., 14.

For the most part, people are stealing food, for they were hungry.
Ibid., 15.

The increased distance between the Negro’s goal and reality induced by wartime conditions.
Ibid., 16.

He is a servant in the Navy.
Ibid., 16.

And, a crowning indignity, he is not even allowed to give his blood.
Ibid., 16.

He must wait until all the white passengers are accommodated before he can get transportation. He may even hold his tongue when he is forced to get out of the bus in which he is seated in order to make room for white passengers.
Ibid., 17.

Violent and unreasoning reprisals.
Ibid., 17.

Rumor will not spread in Harlem that penguins have killed an Eskimo thief, because no one is concerned with the matter.
Ibid., 19.

Older women taking armfuls of loot and come back for more.
Ibid., 22.

Unless police are around, there is often no rush about looting.
Ibid., 22.

Women while ransacking a clothing store, stopping to judge the size of dresses.
Ibid., 22.

In one grocery a teen-aged boy stands behind the counter passing out articles of food to a small crowd of people waiting almost as if they had been customers.
Ibid., 22.
The riot as a colored man's New Year. As on any holiday, people got drunk, made noises, and had a good time.

After the looting, many new suits, hats and shoes were in evidence.

Negro boys who put on stolen dress coats, silk hats, and blond wigs, dancing in the street.

One old man says, "It's a disgrace. We should pay for the goods."

Homosexual or effeminate factors are also involved.

Some boys even make threats at stores that had escaped the damage: "You'll get yours yet" is often hurled at these storekeepers.

I'm glad they got that highway robber. You can go in to buy a container of milk and one time it's 14 cents and a few minutes later it's 18.

The rioters' excessive mutilation of manikins: Clothing store dummies are stripped naked and thrown onto the sidewalk, arms, legs and heads are sometimes broken off, and the body is often kicked around (The Amsterdam News, catching something of this meaning, referring in a picture caption to the "raped" dummies).

Most of the white merchants in Harlem are Jews. Although most of the land is owned by white Christians—banks, insurance companies, estates and churches the fact is that the landlord agents are, for the most part, Jews. It is they who have the unpleasant task of collecting rents, refusing repairs, keeping expenses down for the landlords, and even bringing about evictions. Similarly, the Jews predominate among the principals of the public schools in Harlem. On them is the onus of having to discipline children.

Men and women in Harlem wait for garbage trucks to arrive at city dumps and scavenge for food; they compete with dogs and cats for the contents of garbage cans.
Trager, p. 458.

The mantle of being sub-human savages unworthy of being treated as human beings.
Orlansky, p. 4.

The gathering of crowds, the rise of looting and its relapse.

Ota Benga
Ota Benga was brought from the Belgian Congo in 1904 by noted African explorer Samuel Verner Phillip salong with other pygmies and displayed in an exhibit in the 1904 St. Louis World’s Fair. Ota Benga (or “Bi”, which means “friend” in his language) was born in 1881. Although he was referred to as a boy he had been married twice. His first wife had been captured by a hostile tribe and his second wife died by a snake bite.

Bradford, p. 208.

Phillips described Ota as “an extremely interesting little fellow.”

Ibid., p. xix.

For two miserable, tumultuous weeks in 1906, Ota Benga, a 23-year-old pygmy from the Belgian Congo, was put on display at what was then called the New York Zoological Society in the Bronx. The public, appalled and entertained in equal measure, flocked to the primate house, where Benga could be observed playing with Dahong, the zoo’s orangutan, beneath a sign that read in part, “Height 4 feet 11 inches. Weight 103 pounds. Exhibited each afternoon during September.”

It was agreed that Benga would live and hunt in a forest of several hundred acres, apart from the exhibit area. He was displayed before as many as 40,000 spectators a day. Facing protests from newspapers and black clergymen, the zoo’s director allowed Benga to leave his cage and wander freely around the zoo during then day, then return to the primate house at night.

Goldenberg, pp. 21-2.

At one point, he got hold of a knife and flourished it around the park, another time he produced a fracas after being denied a soda from the soda fountain. Finally, after fabricating a small bow and arrows and shooting at obnoxious park visitors he had to leave the park for good.

Ibid., pp. 21-2.

After his park experience, several institutions tried to help him. He was placed in Virginia Theological Seminary and College but quit school to work in a tobacco factory. According to Hornaday (who probably had evolutionary racist views) “he did not possess the power of learning.” Moving to Lynchburg, Virginia, he changed his name to Otto Bingo and presented himself as a gentleman from New York. Growing homesick, hostile, and despondent Benga borrowed a revolver, and shot himself in the heart, ending his life in 1916.

Bradford, pp. 208.

Ota did nothing particularly unusual that first day on exhibit at New York Zoological Park. Still, it was more interesting to watch him drink soda than to see Hannibal the lion tear raw steak. It was so engrossing to see him shoot his arrows—he rarely missed—the crowds forgot all about the hour when the seals were scheduled to be fed.

How did the pygmy like sleeping in the Monkey House, people wondered? How did he feel about living at the zoo? Next day the Times editorialized: “It is probably a good thing that Benga does not think very deeply. If he did it isn’t likely that he was very proud of himself when he woke in the morning and found himself under the same roof with the orangutans and the monkeys, for that is really where he is.”
Ota, that first day, was locked into his enclosure, except when his keepers let him out. When he was let out of the Monkey House the crowd stayed glued to him, and a keeper stayed close by.

After wandering, Ota settled back indoors into his hammock. The crowd loved it. He resumed weaving his mats and caps, then shot his arrows again. If he missed the children made faces at him. Ota made faces back, and the crowd loved that. Day one, and he was already a sensation.

Overnight Director Hornaday made a few last minute additions and refinements. Saturday had been dress rehearsal. The real show was about to begin.

On Sunday, September 9, thousands “took the Subway, the elevated, and the surface cars to the New York Zoological Park, in the Bronx...” according to the Times.

There was always a crowd before the cage, most of the time roaring with laughter, and from almost every corner of the garden could be heard the question: “Where is the pygmy?” And the answer was, “In the monkey house.”

There was a more elaborate setting in the Monkey House than had been prepared the day before. Bones were now scattered around the cage to increase the impression of savagery and danger. In addition, Director Hornaday had posted a sign on the enclosure:

Dohong [an orangutan], was admitted into the enclosure. The orangutan imitated the man. The man imitated the monkey. They hugged, let go, flopped into each other’s arms. Dohong snatched the woven straw cap off Ota’s head and placed it on his own. Ota snatched it back. He picked the monkey up and let him drop, then turned his back to walk away. Dohong jumped up on his shoulders to hold him back. Ota shrugged him off, turned again to walk away. Dohong grabbed an ankle with one arm. Ota took big, limping steps around the cage, shackled to the ape. The crowd hooted and applauded. Dohong and Ota hugged. If Hornaday had thought to supply them with canes and Derby hats, they might have obliged with an old soft-shoe.

Children squealed with delight. To adults there was a more serious side to the display. Something about the boundary condition of being human was exemplified in that cage. Somewhere man shaded into non-man. Perhaps if they looked hard enough the moment of transition might be seen.

If Saturday’s exhibit had somehow been too subtle, Sunday’s entertainment compensated. To a generation raised on talk of that absentee star of evolution, the Missing Link, the point of Dohong and Ota dispporting in the Monkey House was obvious. “... the pygmy was not much taller than the orangutan,” reported the Times, “and one had a good opportunity to study their points of resemblance. Their heads are much alike, and both grin in the same way when pleased.”

Day two of the Pygmy at the Zoo already contained the first whisper of controversy. In response to a Times reporter, Director Hornaday admitted men were not, as a rule, exhibited.

In European zoos, but saw no reason to apologize: the pygmy was completely comfortable in the Monkey House. Hornaday claimed he had the full support of the Zoological Society in what he was doing.
The press in general seemed willing to indulge Hornaday, asking a few easily deflected questions now and then to maintain a semblance of balance and fair play. The entrance of the black community into the matter of the pygmy in the zoo lent it an entirely new dimension.

Rev. R. S. MacArthur of the Calvary Baptist Church was an unsmiling face in the light-hearted crowd at the zoo on September 9. “The person responsible for this exhibition,” he said, “degrades himself as much as he does the African. Instead of making a beast of this little fellow we should be putting him in school for the development of such powers as God gave him... We send our missionaries to Africa to Christianize the people and then we bring one here to brutalize him.” Dr. Gilbert of the Mount Olivet Baptist Church vowed that “he and other pastors would join with Dr. MacArthur in seeing to it that the Bushman was released from the monkey cage and put elsewhere.”

Meanwhile Ota Benga was given what the crowd was led to think of as his first pair of shoes. According to the Times, “He seemed to like the shoes very much. Over and over again the crowd laughed at him as he sat in mute admiration of them.” Did he object to the crowd laughing at him? “He has grown used to the crowd laughing, has discovered that they laugh at everything he does. If he wonders why he does not show it.”

On Sunday, September 16, forty thousand visitors roamed the New York Zoological Park. The zoo was becoming a draw on the order of magnitude of Coney Island. The sudden surge in interest, as the Times attested, was entirely attributable to Ota Benga:

“Nearly every man, woman, and child of this crowd made for the monkey house to see the star attraction in the park—the wild man from Africa. They chased him about the grounds all day, howling, jeering and yelling. Some of them poked him in the ribs, others tripped him up, all laughed at him.”

When the crowds cornered Ota, the reporter added, “they asked him how he liked America,” to which he was heard to answer, “Me no like America; me like St. Louis.”

Ibid., pp. 170-88.

The zoo routinely filed photographs of all its animals, but there was no filing category for human beings. Filing the pictures of Ota Benga posed a problem; as in the matter of racial identity Ota defied prevailing labels. The solution was to photograph him holding a baby chimpanzee. Archivists then filed the picture under the label reserved for monkeys; the pretense was that the chimp was the subject, the pygmy nothing more than background.

The chimp averts its gaze, content to be cradled in Ota’s right arm. Ota’s expression remains constant through all the pictures taken in what was probably a single sitting. He is calm—almost too calm. There is the suggestion of sadness, a hint of resignation, and something more: Ota, who had been the object of so much scrutiny, is not merely being seen in these photos, he is seeing. He is seeing back, seeing the camera, the cameraman, and the whole civilization that seems, in his gaze, to be arrayed directly behind them. [Photography]

Ibid., p. 188.

African American

The 1900 riot: “On a hot August night, an African American woman waited for her boyfriend, Arthur Harris, at 41st Street and Eighth Avenue, in a racially mixed, rough neighborhood. When a plainclothes policeman accused her of soliciting, Harris, unaware that the white man was a cop. rushed to her defense. In the ensuing fight, the policeman was mortally wounded with Harris’ penknife. Word quickly spread that a black man, newly arrived from the South had killed a white cop... Mobs of whites surged through the streets of the West Side, from the 20s to the 30s, attacking any blacks in sight, dragging them off streetcars and pulling them out of their homes... Only one white youth was arrested.”

Reitano, p. 114

1905 San Juan Hill riot was sparked by the rare conviction of an Irish policeman for killing a black night-watchman.

Ibid., p. 115

On July 4, 1910, after Jack Johnson defeated Jim Jeffries (the “Great White Hope”), angry white gangs roamed the city seeking revenge. All along the West Side, blacks were assaulted and their homes set afire... Calls went out for a lunching.

Ibid., pp. 116-7.

Marcus Garvey demanded that a capital “N” be sued for the word Negro. In 1929, this spelling revision was accepted by the NYC Board of Education and the New York Times “ in recognition of racial self-respect for those who have been for generations in the lower case.”

Ibid., p. 138.

Adam Clayton Powell took on Con Ed by threatening to have all Harlemites turn off the electricity one night a week. Next his followers flooded the New York Telephone Company with phone calls that tied up all the lines. Both companies quickly capitulated and slowly started hiring blacks.

Ibid., p. 149.

In 1939 Powell’s group descended upon the World’s Fair offices at the Empire State Building where Broadway chorus girls, Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, and other prominent figures joined the picket lines and won blacks six hundred World’s Fair jobs. [World’s Fair 1939] [Empire State Building]

Ibid., p. 149.

In 1968, Columbia’s few African American students formed a Students Afro-American Society (SAS) who opposed Moses’ building of a gym on public land on Morningside Heights. They took over a college building, holding three administrators hostage. Police swarmed, attacking students with nightsticks and blackjacks, beating injured persons already on stretchers, and dragging people on the ground or down concrete stairs by their hair. Students in dorms retaliated by throwing down bottles and plants. The confrontation was one of the worst in U.S. history and “The Battle for Morningside Heights” became symbolic of student protests nationwide. [Robert Moses]

Ibid., p. 175.

In April of 1969, two hundred minority students seize CCNY’’s south campus, proclaiming it the “University of Harlem.”

Ibid., p. 176.

The Brooklyn slum of Brownsville went up in flames in 1970 and again in 1971. Fires of garbage piled high in the streets and fires set in local stores reflected desperation turned to rage. The riot of May 7, 1971 logged one hundred fires, fifty burned-out buildings, and scores of injuries.

During the 1977 Worlds Series, the camera in the Goodyear Blimp showed a night panorama of Yankee Stadium and, maybe half a mile away, an anonymous building on fire. Head announcer Howard Cosell started shouting, “What’s wrong with these people? Why are they doing this to themselves?”

_Berman, N.Y. Calling_, p. 19.

On September 15, 1980, sixty people occupied Harlem’s Sydenham Hospital, renamed it Fort Sydenham, and hung Mayor Koch in effigy.

_Reitano_, p. 194.

On a freezing January 21, 1987 (MLK’s birthday), Sharpton and five thousand people marched down Fifth Avenue for a “Day of Outrage.”

_Ibid._, p. 196.

In August 1987, Yusef Hawkins, a sixteen-year-old African American male, was shot dead when attacked by a gang of ten to thirty youths in the predominantly Italian American community of Bensonhurst, Brooklyn. Accompanying friends to view a secondhand car, Hawkins was mistaken for another black male who was purportedly dating a local white female. Bensonhurst residents greeted marchers with cries of “Niggers go home,” pointed obscenities, mocking renditions of calypso songs, and watermelons held up as symbols of contempt. Taunts of “Central Park” were met with counter-taunts of “Howard Beach.” Conflict continued for weeks as Sharpton organized more “Days of Outrage.” An attempt by seventy-five hundred protestors to cross the Brooklyn Bridge ended in a major confrontation with the police. Shapton warned that the city would “Burn” if the defendants were set free and, during one march, he was stabbed in the chest.

_Ibid._, p. 198.

July 1992 Washington Heights riots in response to a 24 year old Dominican immigrant was killed by a policeman in the lobby of a building where he had sought refuge from pursuit. For six days, young men set fire to cars and looted stores. They were met by police in riot gear who made many arrests and foiled an attempt to stop traffic on the George Washington Bridge.

On September 16, 1992, ten thousand off-duty police officers rallied at City Hall and stopped traffic on the Brooklyn Bridge for an hour. They stomped on cars, jumped barricades and used offensive language regarding Dinkins, including “nigger” and other epithets and profanity.

_Ibid._, p. 203.

A West Indian woman who had lived in Gotham for decades decided to spend her weekends seeing what it was like to “be some other ethnicity…” Accordingly, she attended as many ethnic events as she could—the Puerto Rican and the St. Patrick’s Day parades on Fifth Avenue, the Dominican Day parade in Washington Heights, and African American festival in Harlem, an Asian celebration in Flushing, Queens, a Russian event in Brighton Beach and the West Indian American Carnival Day parade on Eastern Parkway in Brooklyn. Proud of her adventures, she asked, “Where else are you going to be able to do all that but in New York?” [World City]

Giuliani’s Street Crime Unit (SCU) became the police department’s “commandos,” their slogan, “We own the night,” acquired loaded implications for communities of color.
_Ibid._, p. 217.

The men from the tactical patrol force sent to the scene are members of a group of about 200 handpicked men, all over six feet tall, all trained in judo and all under 30 years of age. The force was organized in 1958 as a roving unit that could be dispatched to danger areas.
_Furer_, p. 133.

In 1906, a so-called Italian squad, the first incarnation of the bomb squad, had been formed as an arm of the New York City Police Department for the sole purpose of protecting the Italian immigrants of the city from the extortionist methods of a clandestine underworld cartel calling itself the Black Hand, a group of ex-cons and outlaws that preyed on immigrant populations.
_Greenburg_, p. 6.

A Haitian immigrant, Abner Louima, was brutally sodomized with a toilet plunger handle by a cop in a Brooklyn police station on August 9, 1997. In response, 7,000 people marched across the Brooklyn Bridge in another Sharpton “Day of Outrage.” Signs depicted Giuliani as “Ghouliani,” “Crueliani,” and “Brutaliani.” The _Times_ called the Louima case “a civic trauma.”
_Reitano_, p. 218.

On February 4, 1999, an unarmed West African immigrant named Amadou Diallo was killed in the entrance to his Bronx apartment house. Mistaking him for a rapist and his wallet for a gun, four SCU cops fired forty-one bullets at Diallo, nineteen of which met their mark. 1200 people were arrested at protests in March of 1999. Giuliani dismissed the protests as “silly” and the protestors as the “worst elements of society.”
_Ibid._, pp. 219-20.

The slums are the easiest to destroy, while the thick-walled armories, prisons, banks and churches are the hardest.
_Talese_, p. 114.

The high-rise complex called Morningside Gardens in Morningside Heights was built by David Rockefeller whose central strategy was to create a barricade to shield the Acropolis of America—as it was envisioned—from Harlem.
_Glanz_, p. 18.

The hot summer of ‘89 when _Do The Right Thing_ came out and people were in the mood to kill.
_Schmitz_ p. 272.

It’s time for them to go to work at Sal’s Famous Pizzeria in the heart of Black Brooklyn.
_Lee_, p. 2.
Mookie stares at the gold "brass knuckles" rings Radio Raheem wears on each hand. Spelled out across the rings are the words "LOVE" on the right hand and "HATE" on the left hand.
Ibid., p. 45.

Either dem Koreans are geniuses or we Blacks are dumb.
Ibid., p. 36.

The infamous Michael Stewart choke hold.
Ibid., p. 80

VOICES OF MOB
THEY KILLED HIM
THEY KILLED RADIO RAHEEM
IT'S MURDER
DID IT AGAIN
JUST LIKE THEY DID MICHAEL STEWART MURDER
ELEANOR BUMPERS MURDER
IT'S NOT SAFE
NOT EVEN IN OUR OWN NEIGHBORHOOD
IT'S NOT SAFE
NEVER WAS NEVER WILL BE
Ibid., p. 81.

All hell breaks loose. The dam has been unplugged, broke. The rage of a people has been unleashed, a fury. A lone garbage can thrown through the air has released a tidal wave of frustration.
Ibid., p. 82.

Look at those Korean motherfuckers across the street. I betcha they haven't been a year off da motherfucking boat before they opened up their own place. A motherfucking year off the motherfucking boat and got a good business in our neighborhood occupying a building that had been boarded up for longer than I care to remember and I've been here a long time.
Ibid., p. 35.

I don't wanna be here, they don't want us here. We should stay in our own neighborhood, stay in Bensonhurst.
Ibid., p 50.

Dago, wop, garlic-breath, guinea, pizza-slinging, spaghetti-bending, Vic Damone, Perry Como, Luciano Pavarotti, Sole Mio, nonsinging motherfucker.
You slant-eyed, me-no-speak-American, own every fruit and vegetable stand in New York, Reverend Moon, Summer Olympics '88, Korean kick-boxing bastard.
Goya bean-eating, fifteen in a car, thirty in an apartment, pointed shoes, red-wearing, Menudo, meda-med Puerto Rican cocksucker.
It’s cheap, I got a good price for you, Mayor Koch, “How I’m doing,” chocolate-egg-cream-drinking, bagel and lox, B’nai B’rith asshole. [Speech]

Ibid., pp. 43-4.

When you come in Sal’s Famous Pizzeria, no music. No rap, no music. Capisce? Understand?... This is a place of business. Extra cheese is two dollars.

Ibid., p. 47.

1991 Crown Heights riots, when a car driven by a Hasidic Jew jumped the curb and killed a seven-year-old Guyanese boy. The rioting continued for two days and nights. Only blacks were arrested.

Reitano, p. 203.

It was that deep worry that lives in the base of the skull of every resident of Park Avenue south of Ninety-sixth Street—a black youth, tall, rangy, wearing white sneakers.

Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 16.

Riot

1900-18, Tongs waged three lethal wars against each other in Chinatown.

Reitano, p. 117.

1932 rent riot in the Bronx.

Ibid., p. 143.

1943 taxi strike: drivers swooped through the streets around Times Square, the Pennsylvania Railroad terminal, and lower Broadway, attacking scabs, vandalizing their cabs, setting vehicles afire. 500 young Communists staged a sympathy march.

Ibid., p. 145.

July 7, 1967, as reported in the New York Times: “At times, amidst the scenes of riot and destruction that made parts of the city look like a battlefield, there was an almost carnival atmosphere.”

Hahne, p. 43.

1968 Transit Worker’s Union strike, lasting twelve days: 35,000 bus and subway workers. Thousands of New Yorkers walked to work, but hundreds of thousands more could not get to work at all, including 65 percent of garment district workers. The Times deemed it the biggest disruption since the 1863 draft riots. An effigy of Lindsay was burned.

Reitano, p. 171.

Dropped thousands of cardboard cluster bombs on the Park Avenue headquarters of the company that made the real ones,

Berman, Solid, p. 320.

People from the area run up and down the streets from group to group. Refuse baskets are set afire and Molotov cocktail bombs, bottles filled with gasoline, are thrown into the streets.

Furer, p. 132.
The shooting death of four antiwar protestors by National Guardsmen at Ohio's Kent State University inspired a Wall Street antiwar rally by a thousand college and high school students on May 8, 1970. In a counterdemonstration, two hundred construction workers attacked the students with fists, pipes, tools, and hard hats. On what became known as "Blood Friday," ten thousand spectators witnessed construction workers taking over the steps of Federal Hall while waving U.S. flags and singing "God Bless America." Descending on City Hall, the men demanded that officials raise the flag, which was flying at half-mast in memory of the students killed at Kent State. Lindsay was burned in effigy and vilified as the "Red Mayor."

Reitano, p. 185.

Newsday headline, Friday, February 7, 1964: "Beatles Flying In: Riot Squad Ready."

Samuel, p. 23.
In the eighteen months from the beginning of season one in April 1964 and end of season two in October 1965, a bevy of key events related to the two major sources of conflict in the mid-1960s—civil rights and the Vietnam War—took place. While fairgoers munched on their Bel-Gem waffles and rode Avis’s Antique Car Ride at a top speed of six miles per hour, thousands were marching (and a few dying) in Mississippi to register black voters during the Freedom Summer of 1964. Other seminal milestones of the civil rights movement—the assassination of Malcolm X in February 1965, the Selma to Montgomery marches the following month, and the Watts riots in August—were also happening as “peace through understanding” reigned in Flushing Meadows. Similarly, the amazing string of civil rights laws that were signed by LBJ during the run of the Fair—the Civil Rights Act in July 1964, the Voting Rights Act in August 1965, and affirmative action the next month—stood in stark contrast to Moses’s city-state in Queens where America’s “Negro problem” did not exist and time appeared to stand still. The Vietnam problem too was rapidly becoming a nightmare as global harmony, or at least Moses’s version of it, ruled at the Fair. From the Tonkin Gulf Resolution in August 1964 to Operation Rolling Thunder in March 1965 and the start of “search and destroy” missions in June of that year, Vietnam was top of mind for most Americans exactly at the time when millions were gathering in Flushing Meadows in celebration of international brotherhood. As more troops were sent to Southeast Asia throughout 1964 and 1965, students and organizations such as the Students for a Democratic Society marched and “sat-in” in protest of the escalation of the war. Against the backdrop of all this conflict and social unrest, Robert Moses created a space that was essentially free from the turmoil of the mid-1960s.

While change, uncertainty, and angst reigned outside the fairgrounds, the world inside Robert Moses’s tightly controlled universe (patrolled by thousands of Pinkerton guards) remained known and safe. A few groups tried to use the Fair as a stage to voice their concerns, most successfully on opening day, but Moses and his World’s Fair Corporation [WFC] adeptly used the law and, when that failed, good old muscle to keep protesters at bay. For the overwhelming majority of visitors, the Fair’s conservative tone was thus not a liability, as critics have argued, but a key asset, contributing heavily to its tremendous popularity. Rattled by immense cultural upheaval—racial unrest; an escalating, unpopular war; increasingly fuzzy gender roles; and a growing, unprecedented divide along generational lines—American visitors in particular found the Fair’s postwar swagger and bravado to be a welcome anchor providing stability and ballast. The Fair’s imaginary universe looked backward as much as forward, offering visitors a bridge over the troubled waters of the times. (Guy Lombardo, a personal favorite of Robert Moses, headed the unofficial house band at the Fair.)

The postwar world may have had its anxieties, but, after twenty years, they were known, familiar, and contained, the Fair told visitors, whereas the post-postwar world represented completely uncharted territory that the nation appeared unprepared to navigate. And by bypassing the uninviting near future for a more palatable far-distant one, the Fair offered its millions of visitors hope and confidence that utopia or something like it was not an entirely lost cause.

In short, the American Dream was still very much alive in these 646 acres of land in Queens, an oasis of faith and optimism. Heavily inspired by Walt Disney, whose theme park in Anaheim had been open for a decade by 1964 (and who wanted to open his second park on the Fair’s site after its run), Moses thus sought and succeeded in creating a safe bubble that was virtually free from worldly concerns in order to make the event a popular success. As the quintessential fantasy world that offered visitors refuge from the often less-than-magical realities of everyday life, the Magic Kingdom provided an ideal blueprint for Moses to follow in building his own interpretation of the happiest place on earth.

Chaos may have reigned in the WPC’s boardrooms and in the offices of elected officials, but precious little of it could be detected on the fairgrounds. “Any hint of inequality, conflict, or injustice was excluded from the social purview of the Fair,” observes Morris Dickstein, an accurate assessment of the protective cocoon that was Flushing Meadows. Within its grounds, foreign nations sang in harmony, corporations existed to produce things that made life better, and, most important, the, future looked brighter than ever. The same formula of success that had proved so reliable the past couple of decades—science and technology—would lead America to an even more abundant promised land, this one made up of limitless energy, computerized efficiency, and push-button convenience. The make-believe universe of the 1964-65 New York World’s Fair was, in short, the final gasp of American innocence, the last time and place in which the harsh realities of the mid-1960s could be ignored on such a large scale.

Ibid., pp. xvii-iii.

Moses rages at the press, the “assorted dyspeptics, grouches, grumblers, hit-and-run writers and talkers who hit broadly that our Fair will be artless, boycotted, funless, foodless, constipated, strangled and tasteless.”

Caro, p. 1101.

Opening day, five months after the JFK assassination, would be the only one in which the contained universe of the Fair would be disrupted by the outside world in any significant way. Hundreds of sit-ins were scattered about the Fair. Groups of demonstrators—chanting slogans, singing songs, and sitting in front of pavilion entrances—had gathered at dozens of different locations on the grounds... Opening day was a day in which President Johnson came to the world of fantasy and encountered the world of fact.

Samuel, p. 33.

Dialing the numbers 1-9-6-4 on a special telephone, the president gave the go-ahead for a clock to begin the year’s countdown to the Fair’s opening. In typical Fair fashion, however, the publicity stunt did not go smoothly when a bus ran over a cable and the five hundred guests at the fairgrounds to hear the president’s message had to wait for it to be retransmitted, this time on tape. “It’s reassuring... that this is not the hot line to Moscow,” an official said. Two days before the Fair opened, people realized that the clock had miscalculated the countdown.

Ibid., p. 28.
Moses said that he would not consider the Fair to be a success unless the three most powerful organizations in the world—the U.S. government, the Vatican, and General Motors—took part.

Ibid., p. xx.

“Into the gap left by the departing Communists,” Moses said in 1962 after the Soviets announced they would not make a return to Flushing Meadow, “the saints have come marching in.” Eight pavilions on seven acres was devoted to religion. All major Christian faiths invited to participate: There would be a Protestant and Orthodox Center, a Christian Science Pavilion, a Greek Orthodox Church exhibit, a Christian Life Convention pavilion, and of course the Vatican Pavilion. (The 1939 Fair had just one faith-based pavilion, the Temple of Religion)

Ibid., p. 22.

Everyone one of the major religions was represented at the Fair, save one, and Jewish leaders were increasingly perturbed by the absence of any representation of their faith.

Caro, p. 1101.

A federal judge ruled that although the WFC could maintain its ban on picketing, it would be legal for handbills to be passed out on the grounds. The WTC protested saying it would “convert the fairgrounds into an ideological battlefield.”

Samuel, p. 36.

Groups of demonstrators—chanting slogans, singing songs, and sitting in front of pavilion entrances—had gathered at dozens of different locations on the grounds. “Bearded and untidy, the seats of their pants muddied from sitting on the soggy ground, the pickets repelled and fascinated the fairgoers,” a New York Times reporter wrote.

Ibid., p. 34.

James Farmer, National Director of CORE, stopped at the Louisiana Pavilion, to which he carried a three-foot electric cattle prod and a sign saying that such a device was used on Negroes in that state... Farmer and Bayard Rustin were arrested at the New York State pavilion, the latter having led a march of about 300 people in front of the building and barricading it.

Ibid., p. 34.

Farmer’s goal at the Fair was to publicize what he referred to as “the melancholy contrast between the idealized, fantasy world of the Fair and the real world of brutality, prejudice, and violence in which the American Negro is forced to live.”

Ibid., p. 34.

The beer company / did not hire Blacks or Puerto Ricans, / so my father joined the picket line / at the Schaefer Beer Pavilion, New York World’s Fair, / amid the crowds glaring with canine hostility.

Espada, N. pag.

A worker at the Wisconsin Pavilion, nineteen-year-old Michael Cohen arrived at the Fair’s gates with a bunch of signs with slogans like “All Hands Off Vietnam.” Cohen was stopped by Pinkerton guards and his permanent pass taken away. Undeterred, Cohen paid the $2.50 regular admission fee and went to work.

Samuel, p. 78.

The New York Times: "The Fair was a gayer place after the protestors had departed."

N. cit.

If every Negro in New York cruised over the Fair in his fan-jet plane and ran out of fuel the World would really learn something about the affluent society.

O’Hara, p. 480.

During the World’s Fair time, the mayor didn’t want there to be a gay image to the city so he closed virtually all the bars. It felt to me, like where as gays used to cruise rather furtive way on Greenwich Avenue, they were now coming down Christopher Street and moving further and further down towards the water.

Carter, Stonewall, p. 37.

Louisiana’s pavilion featured a minstrel-style show called “America, Be Seated” which was picketed by CORE as a planned “stall-in” (inspired by the ever growing number of “sit-ins” that were taking place) by having two thousand cars “run out of gas” on Moses’ new highways leading to the Fair. “We’re going to block every street that can get you anywhere near the World’s Fair and give New York the biggest traffic jam it’s ever had.” The automobiles failed to appear.

The major flaw of the protest was that it was left up to each volunteer to choose the time and place where he or she would stall and then how to deal with the inevitable arrival of the police and tow trucks. The lack of a coordinated plan of attack discouraged most would-be stalkers, as did a court injunction declaring the protest illegal, the disagreeable weather, and the simple fact that many had reservations about possibly never seeing their cars again. Fearing the worst, however, the city mobilized an army of wreckers, which had waited patiently on the Triborough Bridge and the Grand Central Parkway and scooped up the dozen or so cars that “did run out of gas.” A helicopter capable of lifting a car hovered above, a clear sign that city officials believed the stall-in might indeed ruin the day. [Congestion] [Density]

Samuel, p. 35.

We are happy here facing the multiscreens of the IBM Pavilion. We pay a lot for our entertainment. All right roll over.

O’Hara, p. 481.

Chrysler’s puppet show which included a song called “Dem Parts.” In the number four purple puppets sang to the tune of “Dem Bones” (a well-known minstrel song), the lyrics went:
Dem nuts, dem bolts, dem pistons;
Dem rings, dem rods, dem gaskets;
Dem plugs, dem lugs, dem clutch plates
All of dem made of steel.

Chrysler insisted that the number was color free. “There’s no reference at all to human beings or race,” a company spokesman insisted, but the NAACP disagreed, threatening demonstrations at the pavilion and a boycott against Chrysler dealerships in the NYC area if the song was not changed or dropped. Just two days later, Chrysler not only agreed to change all mentions of “dem” to “them” and any “de” to “the” but also agreed to change the color of the puppets from purple to yellow.

Samuel, p. 77.

The Society for the Prevention of Negroes Getting Everything (SPONGE) showed up. SPONGE consisted of high school students who wore Confederate caps and carried signs of support for Alabama governor George Wallace.

Ibid., p. 76.

Picketers carried signs saying “End Apartheid at the Fair” and “African Pavilions Built with Lily White Labor.”

Ibid., p. 27.

GM’s Futurama: 19 of 38 hosts and hostesses were black. Ford was pleased as punch to claim that 26 of its 200 greeters were black, and Du Pont was equally happy that visitors would notice that 8 of its 45 hosts and hostesses were black. GE considered its hiring of 10 black hostesses out of a total of 110 at its Progressland exhibit such a progressive step that the company proudly made it known in its in-house magazine for employees and shareholders.

Ibid., p. 37.

There was, of course, not a single Negro or Puerto Rican on the Fair’s 200-person administrative staff.

Caro, p. 1101.

Right before opening day, the owner of an employment agency, Mrs. Claire Gaber, had placed a newspaper ad seeking “blue-eyed blondes” to work at the Fair.

Ibid., p. 77.

Wanting to maximize the Fair’s profits in order to build his dream park after the event (and probably dreading the scenario of thousands of poor African American and Puerto Rico children invading Flushing Meadows), Moses was determined to make kids in groups pay the full price.

Ibid., p. 23.

Upon learning that the Spanish Pavilion had hired some nonunion workers, the Teamsters prevented garbage collectors from picking up the pavilion’s trash. The Spaniards threatened to dump the trash into the Unisphere’s fountain if it was not collected, with the Teamsters saying they would then retrieve the garbage from the fountain and throw it back into the pavilion. (cf. Motherfuckers dumping trash into Lincoln Center fountain: “garbage for garbage.” [Unrest])
The Malaysians were spending more on just window washing in 1964 than their entire maintenance budget, making them wonder if they would be able to afford to be back in 1965. Huge pavilion lawns in the International Area were going unmowed, untrimmed, unwatered, and unweeded, the costs of landscaping upkeep simply too dear. Run-ins with unions were making it difficult for the Moroccans to keep their air conditioning running properly, and the Spaniards’ garbage situation was even worse.

The Japanese artisans—the only foreign group of construction workers at the Fair—could not understand why they had to stop working at 3:30 in the afternoon as well as collaborate with an American team, as labor rules mandated. To get ready for their visit, the artisans had spent six months learning English, eating American food, and getting familiar with New York City by reading The New York Times every day, but nothing could prepare them for the city’s very un-Zen-like union regulations. The American workmen were equally thrown by the Japanese’ more improvisational approach to construction. Stones for the pavilion were pre-numbered for easy assembly on the site, and the Japanese foreman’s sudden decision to interchange number 7 with number 43 did not go over well with union workers trained to think of architectural plans as the gospel. It took two hours and much persuasion for the Americans to agree to swap the two stones.

Rather than “peace through understanding,” the tit-for-tat gamesmanship between the Jews and the Arabs was resulting in violence, a small-scale foreshadowing of the Six-Day War just two years away. In response to the Arabs’ handing out of leaflets urging visitors to not buy “Israel war bonds,” the Jews one day set up a table near them offering kosher bologna sandwiches and Israeli beer.” The Arabs did not take the Jews up on the free lunch.

The WFC made it clear that the clause of a 1864 land deed between NYC and the Mohawk Indians stating that the latter had unfettered access to the area “to cut bulrushes,” the tribe could get into the Fair anytime free of charge:

> “Ye Indians hath reserved Liberty to cut bulrushes for them and their heyers for ever in any place within ye Tract,” the deed said, the tract being “all Meadows, feeding marshes, woodes, underwoodes, waters and ponds... scittuate upon ye North Shore of Long Island known by ye name of fflushing within Queens County.”

Even this deal, written a couple of centuries before the area became a valley of ashes, caused dissent however. One Princess Sun Tamo of the Matinnecocks promptly came forth to argue that it was her tribe, not the Mohawks, who had the legal right for free admission to the Fair. Experts in Indian history supported her claim, and it was agreed that the Mohawks, like everyone else except the Matinnecocks would have to fork over two bucks if they wanted to experience the greatest event in history. Would any aspect of the Fair reflect its theme of “peace through understanding”?

Feeling guilty about the Indians was a sixties thing in New York.
A number of efforts were made to turn the entire Fair into much more of a multilingual event in order to turn it into a true “global holiday.” A year before the Fair opened, a New York-based group, the International Committee for Breaking the Language Barrier, called for some sort of system to assist non-English-speaking visitors “to facilitate and promote communication among people speaking different languages.” Through signs and language, the group imagined, the upcoming world’s Fair would be the perfect opportunity to break down some of the barriers that unnecessarily separated citizens of the world. Esperanto associations too urged speakers of the world language to visit the Fair in order to put a “non-native tongue” in greater circulation. “Vizitu la Novjorkan Mond Foiron!” exclaimed Esperantists in a pamphlet sent to fellow speakers of the artificial language, urging them, “Come to the Fair!” The state railways of Germany and Austria as well as the Netherlands' tourism information service were already promoting themselves in Esperanto, giving its proponents hope that the language was beginning to become a legitimate option for millions of travelers around the world.

Samuel, p. 162.

Peter Lyle, a nineteen-year-old cashier at one of the Brass Rail snack stands was spending his downtime reading four volumes of Winston Churchill's History of the English-Speaking Peoples.

Ibid., p. 50.

Seven people were injured when a Glide-a-Ride bus hit the General Foods arch near the ground’s entrance. The hospital on the fairground was unfinished at the time.

Ibid., p. 45.

A Pinkerton guard was run over by one of Ford’s 144 automatic convertibles.

Ibid., p. 45.

A few of Times Square’s most visible panhandlers had moved their operations to Flushing Meadows, working the gates near the main entrance and the boardwalk that visitors had to cross after pouring out of or into the IRT subway. A blind man who had been raising money for an “eye transplant” for more than a decade in midtown Manhattan was doing gangbusters business at the Fair finding happy visitors heading back to the city relatively easy picking. Not too surprisingly, pickpockets and confidence men were active at the Fair, moving to where the action was.

Ibid., p. 39.

Even before opening day, things were disappearing from some of the buildings. Sudan had lost a large, decorated ostrich egg, while Hong Kong was losing twelve foot-long spears. Most puzzling was the disappearance of a stuffed, seven-foot, fifty-four pound white marlin from the Long Island Rail Road exhibit.

Ibid., p. 44.

In the 1930s, with capitalism in crisis, world’s fairs were assigned the grander cultural role to shore up Americans’ faith in a consumer-based society. The 1934 Century of Progress exposition in Chicago not only reminded Americans of our past accomplishments but also sent a strong message that the popular value of thrift was not in the best long-term interests of either the nation or the individual. Although President Roosevelt backed the Century of Progress as a form of economic (and psychological) recovery, private corporations, most notably General Motors and Ford, championed the somewhat damaged idea that spending money was the essence of the American way. Other American fairs of the 1930s, that is, San Diego (1935-36), Dallas (1936), Cleveland (1936-37), and San Francisco (1939-40), carried similar ideological themes, but it was the 1939-40 New York World’s Fair that most enthusiastically celebrated the American way of life steeped in consumerism and rebutted the pessimism of the Great Depression. Tubular chairs, nylon, and television all made their debut in 1939 in New York, just a few of the “products of tomorrow” that would lead us to a better, happier future.

With a board of directors dominated by business leaders and an all-star team of industrial designers including Walter Dorwin Teague, Norman Bel Geddes, Raymond Loewy, and Henry Dreyfus, commerce was clearly at the core of the 1939-40 Fair. All the major carmakers and an assortment of other large companies, including AT&T, Kodak, RCA, U.S. Steel, and Westinghouse, exhibited at the Fair, a re-coming out of sorts for big business that had been largely blamed for the Depression. GM’s Futurama ride, designed by Geddes, not only offered visitors a peek into a utopian world of 1960 but also correctly predicted that much of tomorrow would be brought to us by corporate America. It was thus virtually inevitable that the 1964-65 New York World’s Fair would not just continue along this trajectory of consumerism but, given the postwar American experience, exponentially advance it. The Fair was grounded in commerce from the get-go, dependent on the blessings of local businessmen for it to move from idea to reality. This Fair, even more than previous ones, would embrace the promise of science and technology to make our lives easier and more fulfilling.

The commercial nature of the Fair trickled down from its leader, Robert Moses, who, viewing the event as a business opportunity for the city, filled his board of directors with men of industry. From Moses’s perspective, it was also essential that the Fair itself be profitable in order for the WFC to pay back the bonds it had borrowed, to silence the many critics, and, most important, to pave the way for the realization of his ultimate dream—a world-class park in Queens, perhaps even carrying his name.

Business, not political differences or social inequities, would define the 1964-65 New York World’s Fair, offering both visitors and exhibitors a strong sense of comfort surrounded by the familiar and friendly ideology of American free enterprise and the fruits of the marketplace. Long before opening day, it was already apparent that commerce at the Fair would crush almost everything else in its path. As soon as the WFC moved into its headquarters in the Empire State Building, in fact, critics came out of the journalistic woodwork to voice their concerns about the Fair becoming a yearlong advertisement for exhibitors and for the idea of business itself. Some were simply concerned that the commercial aspects of the Fair would make the event less than an entertaining affair.

A full four years before opening day, for example, Robert Fontaine of Atlantic Monthly predicted, “The place will be cluttered with the latest color TV sets, the newest in prefabricated houses, the finest dynamos available, and, quite possibly, a machine that can take all the available statistics and come out with an answer to the effect that these are precisely the things the Fair should have exhibited.” Fontaine also anticipated that the typical fairgoer would be exiting the grounds “haggard and bored, his arms weighed down with pamphlets and brightly printed books of statistics.” By late 1963, it was quite clear that the type of scenario Fontaine imagined was not too much of an exaggeration. Even some Fair officials had been taken aback by the overt commercialism of the event as it took shape. “We have to crack down on this,” one staffer observed as it became clear that corporate pavilions would dominate the Fair’s landscape. “It’s beginning to look like a bazaar.”

Writing for The Nation in November of that year, C. Gervin Hayden described the Fair that was rapidly taking shape as “646 acres of mammoth ads, corporate images and soft-sell” and “the biggest array of wallet-tempting sales messages of the decade.” Hayden added, “U.S. industry has seized upon the New York Fair as a rare marketing opportunity, masquerading as a public-service endeavor [but] becom[ing] a hard-nosed, profit-oriented business operation.” Other journalists were struck by the Fair’s evolution as a pure, unadulterated exercise in marketing. “The Fair offers an unmatched opportunity for on-the-spot consumer research and product exposure, and the business exhibitors are making the most of it,” a writer for Business Week observed a month before opening day. True to form, Ford was doing consumer research at the Fair even before it opened, hiring four hundred people to try out its Magic Skyway to make sure it was up to snuff.

Hard proof that business ruled the Fair roost were the swank, exclusive executive lounges hidden in most of the corporate pavilions. Filled with wall-to-wall deep-pile carpet, recessed lighting, station wagon-size stereophonic cabinetry, and more martinis than in a James Bond movie, executive lounges at the Fair resembled bachelor pads for men in gray flannel suits. Ford had three such hideaways, including one ultra-plush lounge just for company officers and directors and their guests featuring Ford vinyl-coated fabrics on the furnishings and a chef imported from the Four Seasons in New York. The Tower of Light Pavilion, which represented 150 private utility companies, had two lounges that separated employees like military clubs did for officers and noncoms. For company brass and VIPs there was the Kite and Key Club, equipped with rosewood paneling, dining and bar facilities, and a one-way mirror to view the hoi polloi on the outside. In their lounge, however, utility-company worker bees were treated to not much more than a soft-drink vending machine. Although they ranged in amenities and appointments, companies kept hush-hush about these rooms because they contradicted the democratic spirit of the Fair, symbols of the vast inequalities and discrimination across class, racial, and gender lines in business and virtually every other sphere of life around the world. Interestingly, executive lounges at the 1939-40 New York World’s Fair were even bigger and more ornate, as there was no central private club for entertaining as there was at the 1964-65 Fair. Corporate members and individuals gained access to the exclusive Terrace Club for $3,750 to $12,500 and $1,250, respectively, a pricey but affordable option for those sponsors wanting to do some private entertaining at the Fair.

Not as beautiful as the Columbia Exposition’s White City in Chicago in 1893, not as progressive as the St. Louis World’s Fair in 1904, and not as optimistic as the 1939-40 New York World’s Fair, the 1964-65 Fair is considered, in short, the ugly duckling (or perhaps Ugly American) of global expositions. Overshadowed by its financial losses, European no-shows, heavy commercial orientation, and, above all, the looming and rather sinister presence of its president, Robert Moses, the Fair has been summarily dismissed by critics as the world’s Fair that permanently put an end to major world’s fairs.

_Ibid._, p. xiv.

This new Fair, executives believed, represented an unprecedented opportunity to build goodwill among tens of millions of consumers from all around the world, a promotional vehicle that promised to pay dividends for decades.

_Ibid._, p. xx.

With corporate America more powerful than ever in the mid-1960s and consumer culture at an all-time high, the 1964-65 New York World’s Fair would make all previous expositions pale in comparison in terms of their commercial nature.

_Ibid._, p. xx.

Although the Fair was officially about “peace through understanding,” it was really mostly about dollars and cents.

_Ibid._, p. 11.

Corporate America was committed to protecting its huge investment, and was not about to let this great opportunity to make a favorable impression among a global audience of consumers slip away.

_Ibid._, p. 64.

In fairs on the scale of the present one at Flushing Meadows, the free-enterprise system mirrors itself as flatteringly and seductively as it knows how. Neither permanence nor restraint hobbles a project whose aim is an artful fantasy in which individual products are not nearly so important as the spectacular packaging of the business idea itself.

_Ibid._, p. 94.

From the moment you enter Flushing Meadows, you become a fetus in the bulging womb of commerce, suspended in an amniotic fluid of ballyhoo and gimmickry. You are disoriented and cushioned, and thus made porous to the seepage of advertising copy which is the sole reason for the Fair... The Fair is only nominally a gathering of nations. In fact it is a promotional orgy for American business.

_Ibid._, p. 95.

America indeed appears to have turned a corner, with large corporations taking the charge in defining our national identity and social values as charismatic visionary political leadership waned.

_Ibid._, p. 96.

This Fair, like virtually all past ones would be almost entirely disposable.

_Ibid._, p. 96.

One visitor from Albany, New York, however, was more critical, considering the Fair to be steeped in “crass commercialism.” “The pretty showcases containing overpriced products and hack commercials in the form of vapid ditties and sterile exhibits do not, I hope, portray our future for the next 25 years,” he griped. Another observer simply thought it was odd and a little disturbing that the Fair “omitted Russia, all central Europe and most of Asia, while including Clairol, General Cigar, Mastro Pizza, Johnson’s Wax and Seven-Up.”
With commerce the common denominator or Esperanto of the Fair, national pavilions tended to take on the appearance of corporations and vice versa. Because the exhibits of the Big 3 automakers dwarfed the displays of many nations, in fact, Time referred to their pavilions as “the sovereign republics of Ford, Chrysler, and General Motors.”

Ironically, religious and state exhibits had been actively sought to lessen the grounds’ resemblance to the world’s largest shopping center, but, as some noted at the time, these exhibitors too were much about selling.

Some foreign pavilions did not represent the character of the nations whose names they take and that they are, in fact, little more than merchandise bazaars.

The Lake Amusement Area was also intended to serve as a way to balance out the heavy representation of industry at the Fair. Because little actual amusement could be found in the area, however, a result of Moses’s insistence that everything at the Fair be as inoffensive as his billboard-free parkways, corporations took on the role as lead entertainer.

As the Fair took shape as the ultimate trade show, American businesses spent a huge amount of money—a total of three hundred million dollars—on their exhibits. “We couldn’t afford not to spend,” one executive remarked. “You can’t look cheap.” Cheap was the last thing some corporations looked. GM’s exhibit cost more than fifty million dollars, Ford’s thirty million, GE’s fifteen million, AT&T’s fifteen million, Chrysler’s twelve million, NCR’s three million, and Singer’s two million.

Having a presence at the Fair not only suggested that a company was forward thinking, research oriented, and public minded but also represented a rare chance to relate to consumers when they were in a festive mood. “Where else could we get the undivided attention of a captive audience of 74 million people?” asked Steven Van Voorbis, manager of GE’s Progressland.

In the “Fair within the Fair,” some 175 exhibitors displayed fashions, furnishings and foods, and the center’s hyperconsumerism, over the top even for the Fair, was not lost on critics. Time, one of the pavilion’s harsher critics, considered the Better Living Center a “trap,” where “predator salesmen claw for the jugular.” [Commodity]

If this is Futurama architecture, many a sensitive youth of today may flatly refuse to take the trip into the twenty-first century.
It was no coincidence then that industry’s most powerful marketing tool—television—would heavily shape fairgoers’ experience. Almost twenty years of television had forever changed how entertainment, and thus world’s fairs, would be presented and consumed.

Ibid., p. 98.

The public no longer had the wide-eyed wonder when it came to world’s fairs. “They’ve seen it all on television,” explained one exhibit manager.

Ibid., p. 123.

In his 1980 essay “Within the Context of No Context,” George W.S. Trow, who had worked at the Fair, wrote: ‘What was the Fair? It was the world of television but taken seriously... At the Fair, one could see the world of television impersonating the world of history. It was the world of television, but they wouldn’t let you in on the joke.’

Davidson, N. pag.

“Once he commences a ride or tour, he is systematically fed an entertaining, and hopefully convincing, sales message,” The Nation observed, with visitors traveling through time and space by conveyor belts and hydraulic lifts and then deposited near the exit, cogs in a literal entertainment machine. The impact of television—arguably the most important technological innovation of the second half of the twentieth century—on the Fair experience could be rivaled only by the most important technological innovation of the first half of the century: Henry Ford’s assembly line.

Samuel, p. 98.

Futuramas took a trip to the moon, relaxed under the ocean at an aquatic resort, visited a jungle in which trees were knocked down like toothpicks, and cruised through a desert where crops thrived in soil irrigated by desalted seawater and machines planted and harvested crops by remote control.

Ibid., p. 107.

Its City of Tomorrow, which channeled Le Corbusier’s Radiant City, was all about transportation (midtown airports amid super skyscrapers, high-speed bus-trains, moving sidewalks, underground freight-conveyor belts), a utopian metropolis with no slums or parking problems.

Ibid., p. 108.

Curved, finned, corporate Tomorrowland, as presented at the 1964 World’s Fair was over before it began.

N. cit.

The Cab of Tomorrow driver said he would keep the meter running just to find out how much it would cost to take a taxi around the world.

Samuel, p. 30.

At the Coca-Cola Pavilion, an employee had started to pose as a Disney animatronic, amazing crowds as a colleague pressed a button to supposedly make her smile and another to get her to take a drink from a bottle of Coke. “That’s the most lifelike figure I’ve seen at any of the exhibits,” one delighted visitor exclaimed.

Samuel, p. 51.
GE asked Walt Disney to go back to his workshop to make the figures in the Carousel of Progress more realistic, not wanting last year’s model of animatronic figures for its Magic Skyway ride.
Ibid., p. 65.

Walt Disney was sixty-three when the Fair opened and would die a year after the exposition closed.
Ibid., p. xv.

It was “Plastics Day” at the Fair, when the construction material in all its chemical splendor was honored, as were the men who made it possible.
Ibid., p. 164.

Eight Fiberglas dinosaurs floated down the Hudson River on a barge in October, headed to their ultimate destination in the Sinclair Oil exhibit.
Ibid., p. 29.

A 12-year-old boy who had been reported missing for nine days from his home on Long Island, was discovered on the grounds, having spent the entire time there quite happily living off change he plucked out of the Fair’s numerous fountains. “I slept in the Gas Pavilion for three nights, four nights in the Continental Insurance Pavilion, one night at Coca-Cola and one night in the Johnson’s Wax Theater.”
Ibid., p. 39.

The theaters themselves were a tribute to the versatility of chemistry, made up of a bevy of Du Pont-branded materials including a Tedlar roof, Delrin doorknobs, Antron and Fabrilite seats, Dacron fire hoses, Zytel hinges, Mylar stage curtains, Hylene foam undercoating, and Nylon carpets.
Ibid., p. 168.

The piece de résistance was when the Du Pont chorus sang “The Happy Plastics Family,” something that occurred, rather amazingly, forty cheery times a day.

Inside the next room, we watched as one of the craftsmen manipulated the shop’s huge Vac-u-Form machine. Originally specially built for the 1964 World’s Fair, the room-sized contraption turns large sheets of anonymous plastic in three-dimensional walls, columns, carriages, trees, statues, or anything else that can be imagined and sculpted.
Groce, p. 47.

For twelve months Flushing Meadows was turned into what may very well have been the most culturally diverse place on earth.
Samuel, p. 162.

At the Belgian Village, a visitor might have mistaken twentieth-century Flushing Meadows for eighteenth-century Antwerp. The village was actually designed in 1930 and shown in Antwerp, constructed for the 1933-34 Chicago World’s Fair and then again in Brussels in 1958 for its Fair, described as “a meticulous copy of a walled Flemish village as it might have appeared in 1800.” “Picturesque Belgium,” as it was also called, consisted of no less than a hundred houses, a replica of the fifteenth-century Gothic church of saint Nicolas in Antwerp, a town hall with an underground rathskeller, forty shops, a canal, and an arched stone bridge. The owner, taking a loss of two million dollars on the project had been talking with Hugh Hefner about putting a Playboy Club in the town hall, planning to dress up the Bunnies in medieval Flemish costumes à la Breughel.

Ibid., pp. 43-4.

At the Hong Kong Pavilion, one could have a custom-made tweed or brocade suit jacket, or dress measured, sewn, and delivered in twenty-four hours, something Macy’s or Gimbels sure couldn’t do. [Department Store] [Commodity] [Fashion]

Ibid., p. 105.

Immediately upon their arrival at JFK Airport, the Burundis promptly laid down on the escalator, having no familiarity with stairs at all much less moving ones. [Technology]

Ibid., p. 160.

The Africans were particularly intrigued by Jack LaLanne’s exercise show on television. [Body in the City]

Ibid., p. 160.

All twenty-two of the Burundis slept in a single room just as they would have back at home.

Ibid., p. 160.

The Africans insisted on maintaining their habit of drinking a quart of beer with every meal—including breakfast—although they found the American version weak compared with their own banana-based brew.

Ibid., p. 160.

Ethnic food at the Fair: the pineapple turnovers at Hawaii’s pavilion were more Betty Crocker than King Kamehameha. [Food]

Ibid., p. 153.

Walter Carlson in The New York Times: “What is a World’s Fair? It’s being able to sit in the Caribbean outdoor restaurant sipping a tall mai tai while listening to a calypso singer on the stage, while outside a bagpipe band skirls by and across the street Mexican Indians swing upside down from a 114-foot pole in a prayer for rain.”

Ibid., p. 163.

The Lowenbrau Gardens brought over eleven young, titled women to work as barmaids in its replica of an eighteenth-century Bavarian hamlet complete with Alpine chalets. The nine baronesses and two countesses from Munich, some of whose families had dated back to the ninth century, hauled beer steins to thirsty commoners in the open-air café, proud to serve as cultural ambassadors before returning home to their privileged lives.

Ibid., p. 51.

Many of the African women dancers could be seen continually tugging at their halter tops, not used to wearing such an article of clothing back home.

Ibid., p. 154.
As for Korea and Japan, much attention was paid to the selection of the “girls” who worked in the Indonesian pavilion’s restaurant, with President Sukarno personally choosing them and even advising them on their behavior (“I do not want you to wiggle around with tight skirts,” the president made perfectly clear).
Ibid., p. 153.

All or virtually all of the major expositions of the past had offered entertainment charged with sexuality appropriate to the time. At Chicago’s World’s Columbian Exposition of 1893, for example, Little Egypt did her danse du ventre in the Streets of Cairo Area of that Fair, the first time belly dancing was so widely seen in the United States. Dancing girls appeared at the racy Streets of Seville exhibit of the 1904 St. Louis Fair, Sally Rand did her famous fan dance at Chicago’s 1933 Century of Progress, and six years later, Gypsy Rose Lee performed her “Streets of Paris” burlesque at the 1939-40 New York Fair.

Such naughty doings, however, would have no place at all at Moses’s Fair. Despite the youth-driven revolutions in both entertainment and sexuality that lay just around the cultural corner, and the fact that strip clubs were a very popular form of entertainment for men at the time, Moses insisted that amusements at the Fair be “free of honky-tonk,” reflecting his clear bias toward middle-class, family-oriented values and his distaste for any form of grit.” Like his highways and this former ash dump, it appeared, Moses wanted his Fair clean and pure, to minimize the effects of actual human occupancy and physicality. A bemused writer for Atlantic Monthly poked fun at Moses’s insistence that there be “no strip-teasers, no razzle-dazzle and whoop-dee-do” and that “a husband will not have to leave his wife and children for ten minutes to see any of the features.” (The rumor was that Moses even made the puppets in the “Les Poupees de Paris” show wear bras.) Poletti reinforced the WFC’s official position, telling the media that the Fair would have “plenty of amusement … but no belly dancers,” referring to Little Egypt’s scandalous (and very popular) performance. Not wanting to be seen as a prude or party pooper, Moses argued that he simply wanted to raise the bar of entertainment at the Fair. “We are not against gaiety,” he said in March 1962. “We shall inaugurate many new inventions infinitely more diverting than whiskered women, tattooed giants and nudes on ice—such as worldwide color television. Spotting an opportunity, some Manhattan nightclub operators began talking about adding stripteasers to close what Newsweek, mocking the “gap”-drenched rhetoric of the cold war, referred to as the Fair’s “nudity gap.”

In the place of such a gap, what gradually emerged was a genre of entertainment that was highly theatrical and sensational yet decidedly free from eroticism or even sensuality. With Flushing Meadows on the shore, much of the entertainment was planned to be watery, just like at the 1939-40 Fair. In addition to commissioning a “Dancing Waters” show, the WFC hired the folks from Radio City Music Hall to produce “Wonderworld,” a musical extravaganza in the amphitheater on Flushing Meadows Lake. Other amusements included “Ice-Travaganza” (an ice show created and performed by Olympic skating star Dick Button in the New York City Pavilion), a Ringling Brothers circus, and a wax museum, which included not only the figures of Cleopatra, Dr. Kildare, Lady Godiva, the Beatles, Superman, and Jesus but also another cultural icon—Robert Moses. Moses had another idea of how to make the Fair squeaky clean and wholesome as apple pie, free from the sinful trappings of the carnival: old-time religion. Moses ensured that considerable space—eight pavilions on seven acres—was devoted to religion, covering his bases by inviting all major Christian faiths to participate. The decision to make religion a significant presence at the Fair was in some ways a curious one, as the Supreme Court had just banned official prayer in public schools, deeming it a violation of the First Amendment’s guarantee to separate church and state. With the Fair a public event (but run by a private corporation), a strong religious and specifically Christian orientation could have been construed as somewhat inappropriate. Regardless of the way the cultural winds were blowing, religion would be heavily represented at the Fair, contributing to its overall conservative tone.

Ibid., pp. 20-2.

A film of a passion play at the Protestant and Orthodox Center, was set in a circus where Christ, as a mime or clown, was crucified in a Punch and Judy show. “It’s fine, but I can’t understand it,” said one viewer.

Ibid., p. 52.

Moses occasionally referred to the Fair as “Flushing Meadow [sic] University,” once claiming that visitors would “get a well-rounded education for the entrance price of second rate movies.” As he argued to critics who thought the Fair was low-brow and pure fluff, “This is the opportunity of millions to obtain wisdom without pain.” It was obvious to all that the Fair desperately needed more business in the evening if it was going to turn a profit, but nearly naked women was apparently not the answer.

Ibid., p. 75.

Mid-1960s hipsters considered the event in Queens totally Squaresville.

Ibid., p. 62.

Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians, a personal favorite of Robert Moses, symbolized the decidedly “square” entertainment offerings at the Fair.

Ibid., p. 67.

In preparation for its visitors—twenty-seven million finally attended, less than anticipated—there had been months of crackdowns, cleanups, and security measures anticipating political demonstrations. A campaign to control gay bars had already begun in January when the Fawn in Greenwich Village was closed by the police. Reacting to this closing by police department undercover agents, known as “actors,” the New York Times on January 17 ran a front-page story headed “Growth of Overt Homosexuality in City Provokes Wide Concern,” which addressed “the city’s most sensitive open secret—the presence of what is probably the greatest homosexual population in the world and its increasing openness.”

Frank O’Hara was quick to report to John Ashbery in Paris on the article / debate about which was keeping dinner parties in Manhattan animated that winter: “You may be interested to know that the New York Times had a front page (and a full page continuation inside) story on how New York is the world center of homosexuality, with somewhere between 100,000 and 600,000 of THEM prowling the areaways of Fair Gotham. Kind of exciting, isn’t it? It also explains how they identify one another by a fraction of a second longer look than normal people give. I’ll keep you informed. I think it was all triggered by the closing of The Fawn, a charming little dancing boîte on Christopher Street near the Hudson River which the police used to like to visit even more than the fags (three times a night, and with blinders on) until obviously someone wouldn't pay them off anymore. Adieu, petit faune!"

By mid-April repressive measures were stepped up. O'Hara wrote irately to Rivers, who was in London as an informal artist-in-residence at the Slade School of Fine Arts: "In preparation for the World's Fair New York has been undergoing a horrible cleanup (I wonder what they think people are really coming to NYC for, anyway?). All the queer bars except one are already closed, four movie theatres have been closed (small ones) for showing unlicensed films like Jack Smith's Flaming Creatures and Genet's Chant d'amour (Jonas Mekas has been arrested twice, once for each)... Lots of committees are springing up to protest all this, everything from a lawyers committee, a free speech committee to protest the closing of coffee houses which have non-profit poetry readings (Allen and I read for this one), and one Diane has started to protest all this plus the new zoning laws which are driving artists out of their lofts... The Fair itself, or its preparations are too ridiculous and boring to go into, except for the amusing fact that [Robert] Moses flies over it in a helicopter every day to inspect progress. And CORE has promised to totally stop traffic the first day by lying down on the highway. I hope they do."

Gooch, pp. 423-4.

The Better Living Center: Juxtaposed against works by John Singer Sargent, Edward Hopper, and Jackson Pollock, was an actual tractor-trailer truck filled with groceries, a ninety-day supply of food for the average family, to be precise.

Samuel, pp. 113-4.

Spain's world-class art collection, much of it from the Prado Museum in Madrid, was immensely popular, all the more so because of the pavilion's sixty female guides, all wearing Balenciaga.

Ibid., p. 147.

A design critic saw the architectural grab bag of the Fair as a metaphor for something much bigger and more important, believing that "its inability to send me home exploding with ideas is a real indication of the decline of the nation."

Ibid., p. 42.

The Panorama of the City of New York, the world's largest (a half acre) three-dimensional model that featured every structure, bridge, highway, and park of the city." One could (and still can in what is now the Queens Museum of Art) pick out one's home, school, or workplace, with binoculars for rent to make it a little easier. Besides the narration by announcer deluxe Lowell Thomas and the ability for the scale (one inch to one hundred feet) model to go from day to night and back again, one could take a seven-minute helicopter ride over the mini-city, skimming over the panorama by just two feet. The model, which had taken Richard Lester of Lester Associates two years and the city six hundred thousand dollars to create, was not just an amazing piece of design but also without question a monument to Robert Moses's career. One could not look more than a few feet without bumping into something Moses had built, a fact that surely did not go unnoticed by the seventy-five-year-old man.

Ibid., p. 137.
In March 1962, it became clear that the Vatican would go all out for the New York Fair when, after the pope met with Francis Cardinal Spellman, the archbishop of New York and future president of the pavilion, it agreed to exhibit two of its most prized statues, Michelangelo’s Pietà and the Good Shepherd. The Carrara marble Pietà, which depicts the body of the dead Jesus in the arms of the Virgin Mary after the Crucifixion, had never left the Basilica of St. Peter in Vatican City in the 465 years since its completion, whereas the Good Shepherd, residing in the Lateran Museum, was believed to be the earliest representation of a beardless Christ. Although the coup made WFC staffers jump for joy (the corporation immediately predicted the Pietà would be the single largest draw at the Fair), the pope’s rather bold decision did not go over well with the Italian artistic community, who feared the three thousand-pound statue might get damaged and resented their cultural icons even temporarily leaving the country.

A few days after the announcement, a group of Florentine artists drove a truck carrying a plaster cast of the Pietà through their city, claiming it was the real thing that they had hijacked to keep it in the country. The clever hoax fooled more than a few Florentines and served as the start of a long global debate over whether the statue should be brought to New York. Many people, including the director of the Fogg Art Museum in Boston, were firmly against it leaving its native turf, agreeing with many Italians that the masterpiece should not be treated like an animatronic Abe Lincoln.

Ignoring the party poopers, the WFC tried to parlay their winnings by beginning negotiations with the Louvre to bring over Da Vinci’s Mona Lisa, while a Greek newspaper proposed that Praxiteles’s Hermes Carrying the Infant Dionysius, a prized statue standing in south Greece’s Olympia Museum, be sent to the Fair. (A reader of the newspaper agreed, thinking that the average American would be much more impressed by Hermes than “the chick-peas of Santorini or the prunes from Skopelos.”) Although Greek archaeologists made it clear that the risk of shipping the twenty-three hundred-year-old statue overseas was too great, Fair officials would not give up on the piece, urging the Greek ministry to bring it over and sweetening the deal by not only guaranteeing its safety but also offering four million dollars in shared revenues. Neither the Mona Lisa or Hermes would make it to Flushing Meadows, however, turning the Pietà into that much more of the crown jewel of the Fair.

Ibid., pp. 144–5.

Insured for six million dollars, the fragile Pietà arrived at the Vatican Pavilion on loan from St. Peter’s in a special waterproof, floatable crate designed to free itself from a sinking ship. Art News published an editorial protesting the transport in February 1964. O’Hara, always slightly more amused than hysterical on most public issues, wrote in “Poem”: “when the cartoon / of a pietà / begins to resemble Ava Gardner / in Mexico / you know you’re here.”

Gooch, p. 425.

Fair officials decided not to accept the offer from a wealthy Catholic Manhattanite to keep the Pietà in his Fifth Avenue apartment before heading to Flushing.

Samuel, p. 144.

A new base was designed for better visibility and Broadway stage designer Jo Mielziner was hired to build, in effect, a set for the star of the Fair. Mielziner, whose credits included Annie Get Your Gun and A Streetcar Named Desire, sprinkled hundreds of dark-blue flickering votive candles around the Pietà and had Gregorian chants played over the speakers, attempts perhaps to make the bulletproof glass in front of it and armed guards around it a little less obtrusive. Most visitors rode past the sculpture on a conveyer belt moving at two miles per hour and then were invited to purchase Pietà souvenirs—medals, rosaries, charms, and miniatures—from the Vatican’s gift shop.

The Fair exposed Michangelo’s Pietà to millions and popularized the Belgian waffle.

Robert Moses had an idea how to increase traffic at the Fair: have the Weather Bureau take a more “positive” approach in its forecasts for the area. Rather than saying there was a “20 per cent chance of precipitation,” Moses asked Anthony F. Tancreto, head of the New York division of the bureau, in a letter, why not say there was an “80 per cent chance of Fair weather.” Amazingly, and as a testament to the power Moses wielded, the bureau agreed to use the phrase “variable sunshine” in place of “variable cloudiness.” The God-like Moses could, it appeared, even change the weather.

Like all architectural symbols of world’s fairs since 1889, the Unisphere aspired to match the grandeur of Alexandre-Gustave Eiffel’s tower, a losing proposition but one that Fair presidents, including Moses, could not resist. The grandson of Eiffel was even invited to attend the Unisphere’s pedestal ceremony, an attempt to try to link the two icons, but few then or now likely confused the one in Paris for the one in Queens, despite the latter’s use of the most advanced technology available. [Simulacrum]

Roger M. Blough is credited with determining the Unisphere’s height, this decision made by less than scientific methods. Looking out his window one day, he saw a twelve-story redbrick building and decided on the spot that that was how tall the globe should be.

NYC appropriated the Unisphere as a universal code to let visitors know how to get to the Fair. “Orange-and-blue Unisphere directional signs have broken out like German measles all over town.”

The Unisphere, was, appropriately enough, also a 140-foot corporate logo. A two million-dollar “gift” to the Fair, U.S. Steel insisted that anytime the Unisphere was depicted, a line saying “Presented by United States Steel” had to be included.

Although it was without a doubt a marketing coup, the Unisphere too was less than warmly received by architectural critics, especially when compared to the Atomium of the 1958 Brussels Fair, the Space Needle at Seattle in 1961, or, for that matter, Sir Joseph Paxton’s Crystal Palace in London in 1851 or Alexandre-Gustave Eiffel’s tower in Paris.
in 1889. “The Unisphere is a bore,” said Horace Sutton, “and a commercial bore at that.”

Ibid., p. 100.

The Unisphere was described by Newsweek as “the world’s biggest birdcage.”

Ibid., p. 18.

Moses said that the Unisphere was “certainly distasteful to lovers of abstract art.”

Ibid., p. 18.

The first season was a financial disaster. Because of its disappointing numbers and the cloud of conflict that continually hovered over the grounds, it would have been easy to judge the first season (and the enterprise as a whole) a dismal failure.

Ibid., p. 59.

On the last day of the Fair’s first season in October, the crowd scooped up bargains galore, as exhibitors slashed their prices on merchandise.

Ibid., p. 57.

Despite the hundreds of extra security personnel assigned to the grounds on the final day, a significant number of visitors were determined to take home a literal piece of the Fair. Flowers and shrubbery—including the chrysanthemums that had just been planted for the new park—were ripped up and countless souvenirs taken, even the black plastic “You Are Here” tags on the outdoor maps. Vandals too struck the fairgrounds, with signs torn down from buildings and trash cans dumped into fountains. More than a few tipsy men wandered into the Unisphere pool, too good of a photo op to miss out on as anarchy reigned. Flags were taken from the United Nations Pavilion and, somehow, a few twenty-foot flagpoles. Booty accumulated at the Fair’s gates, as guards took away visitors’ pickins. Adding to the chaos of the last day was when two cars of a train ride at the Long Island Railroad Pavilion toppled over, sending three adults and four children to the ground’s Atomedic hospital. Time described the last day’s happenings as a “scene straight out of a Federico Fellini film,” bookending the chaos of the first day. The Fair was going out just like it came in.”

Ibid., pp. 88.

On October 16, 1965, the day before the exposition closed, VIPs gathered in Flushing Meadows to put the 1964-65 New York World’s Fair into their own time machine. Just ten feet south of where a similar ceremony occurred a quarter century earlier, guests signed their names in a special book that was then put into a time capsule to be opened in five thousand years. The capsule was a replica of the one buried in 1940, when officials of that Fair along with executives from the Westinghouse Electric Corporation buried circa 1930s artifacts and microfilmed records to document their time and place for the benefit of those individuals finding themselves in Queens in the seventieth century. Such things as a woman’s hat, a slide rule, and an assortment of newspaper and magazine articles describing the (mostly sorry) state of world affairs at the turn of the decade were sunk into a fifty-foot steel shaft, not to be opened until the year 6939. Dozens of experts also deemed that the Lord’s Prayer (in three hundred languages), a newsreel of a Miami fashion show, and a copy of the book Gone with the Wind were worth preserving for five thousand years. The location (in longitude and latitude) and a description of the time capsule’s contents were recorded in a Book of Records, hundreds of copies of which were scattered around the world to help humans (or others) in five millennia find the thing and decipher what was inside.

Time Capsule II, also sponsored by Westinghouse, included twice as much material as the first, reflecting how much had occurred over the past twenty-five years. “In a quarter of a century,” stated Westinghouse in its brochure for Time Capsule II, “man split the atom, danced the twist, ran the four-minute mile, scaled Mt. Everest, fought another World War and began to probe space and the seas.” The eighty-plus items were selected by a fourteen-person committee led by Dr. Leonard Carmichael, vice president of research and exploration for the National Geographic Society, with input solicited from fairgoers.

Included in the seven-and-a-half-foot-long, torpedo-shaped, three hundred-pound metal (a new “super” alloy called Kromarc) capsule were such recent innovations as a few credit cards, a bikini, contact lenses, birth control pills, tranquilizers, a plastic heart valve, a pack of filter cigarettes, an electric toothbrush, and a heat shield from Apollo 7. The arts too were represented, with such items as photographs of an Andrew Wyeth painting (Wyeth was a member of the selection committee) and Henry Moore sculpture, a microfilmed book by Ernest Hemingway and poetry by Dylan Thomas and Robert Frost, and a tape of a Danny Kaye television show. Records by the Beatles, Joan Baez, and Thelonious Monk were also part of the capsule—progressive music by artists that the WFC never considered inviting to the Fair because they were, ironically, a bit too ahead of their time. Photographs of important cultural figures of the 1940s and 1950s, including the rather odd triumvirate of Joe DiMaggio, Errol Flynn, and Adolf Hitler, were also tossed in the airtight glass envelope within the capsule. A photo of Robert Moses, who would definitely qualify as an important cultural figure of the last generation (or two), was, interestingly, not slipped into the capsule, an indication perhaps of his sullied reputation or, conversely, a sign that he and others knew that his legacy was already ensured.

Ibid., pp. 190-1.

As the committee and others pondered which buildings to save, a colossal yard sale was soon under way, with pavilion managers unloading everything they could not or did not want to carry out with them come mid-October. The sell-off, taking place via both auctions and set prices and listed in an eighty-page catalog, was nothing less than the largest sale of surplus goods since the end of World War II when huge supplies of military equipment were auctioned off. The variety of things (and creatures) for sale was startling, reflecting the almost psychedelic experience that was the Fair.

The New York Roman Catholic Archdiocese, a little oddly, got dibs on the RCA color TVs scattered around the Fair. Borden, the dairy company, was pleased as punch to score the world’s largest cheese (cheddar, weighing it at 34,591 pounds and 14.5 feet long), from the Wisconsin Pavilion, which would soon be the star of a traveling “cheesemobile” show. The Spaniards were hawking a sixteenth-century painted wood sculpture of the Virgin Mary for $11,590, while the Filipinos were auctioning twelve hand-carved acacia-wood panels depicting the history of their country, something that had taken thirty workers more than a year to construct. Guinea was looking to unload its voodoo tom-toms, native spears, and, somewhat anachronistically, a forty-ton air conditioner, while Florida was asking $50,000 for its trained porpoise, Smokey, who could not only play basketball but also extinguish fires by spitting. Montana had some interesting items up for grabs—a 300-foot-long boardwalk, 56-foot-long bathroom, and three live elk ($500 per, corral extra), as did Mississippi, which was trying to find a new home for its $7,000 paddle wheeler. A Beatles fan in Cleveland had grabbed the Fab Four replicas from the Fair’s wax museum for $6,000, with the equally lifelike Charles de Gaulle headed to the big-time, Ripley’s Believe It or Not on Broadway. Caroline Kennedy, who adored the Fair on both of her two visits, was going to be the lucky recipient of Coca-Cola’s electronically croaking bullfrog courtesy of the company. Walt Disney’s robotic dog from GE’s Carousel of Progress, which Caroline also loved, was going to—where else? Disneyland, along with its animatronic kin: Illinois’s Abe Lincoln, Ford’s cavemen, and, of course, Pepsi’s “It’s a Small World” puppets.

With costs to demolish larger buildings running from $100,000 to $300,000, most exhibitors were offering their buildings to anyone who would pay for the cost of moving them and restoring the grounds they sat on. U.S. Rubber offered its giant tire Ferris wheel to the city, adding that it would give it away to the first taker if the city did not want it. By August, some inquiries had been made for specific items, but no one seemed to be in the market for a whole building, except for the Spanish Pavilion, the crown jewel of the architecture at the Fair. Mobile, Alabama, was interested in the pavilion, as was the New York State Arts Council and the New York Trade Board, the latter wanting to keep the building on the present site. No one really knew what to do with AMF’s seven-car, dual-track Monorail that had carried so many happy (and air-conditioned) fairgoers over the grounds. Clearly, the most innovative proposal for it came from Councilman O’Dwyer, who suggested that the city take the thing and use it as a form of mass transit running crosstown at both Forty-second and Thirty-fourth Streets. Rumor was that the Monorail, which had cost $5.5 million to build, could be scooped up by the first taker for just a million bucks.

Ibid., pp. 81-2.

One day after the Fair locked its gates, wreckers had already started taking down the Ford and RCA Pavilions, a vivid reminder that the clock was ticking on all the other buildings on the grounds. Pavilion operators had ninety days after the Fair closed to get their buildings off the site one way or another, their contracts with the WFC specified. With at least a baker’s dozen exhibitors having gone belly up, however, it looked like the WFC or the city was going to have to pick up some of the demolition tab.

There was no doubt the much praised Spanish Pavilion would survive, with St. Louis mayor A. J. Cervantes keen on locating it on a bank of the Mississippi River near the recently completed Gateway Arch and sports stadium. The $2.7 million needed to move the building was being raised from private sources, although Mobile (like St. Louis ruled by Spain for a time in the late eighteenth century, hence its interest in it) was not giving up on its bid. St. Louis, partly because it had hosted the 1904 World’s Fair, won the prize, however. Mayor Cervantes, whose Hispanic heritage certainly didn’t hurt in swaying the Spaniards, toured the pavilion with a delegation of no fewer than ninety-two people in January 1966 before it was dismantled, shipped, and reconstructed in the Gateway City, where it remains today as the lobby of the Marriott Pavilion Hotel.
Councilman O’Dwyer’s proposal to move the Monorail to midtown Manhattan was apparently a little too ahead of its time, with the airborne people mover purchased by a wrecking company that was now trying to unload the thing, noting in its advertising that it was “used just two summer seasons.” Some other pavilions were able to avoid the wrecking ball by finding a good home somewhere in the world. A ski resort in Jamestown, New York, bought the Austrian Pavilion for use as a lodge for just $3,000, whereas Japan’s Pavilion, stone wall and all, was given to Manhattanville College of the Sacred Heart in Purchase, New York, for use as an Asian studies center.

Indonesia was packing up its pagoda-style building and taking it back to Jakarta, whereas the Danish Pavilion’s next home would be in a Westport, Connecticut, shopping center as the “Danish House,” a Danish-themed store and restaurant. Although the price of the pavilion was a bargain at $40,000 given that the building originally cost more than $1 million, it cost another $500,000 to dismantle, truck, and rebuild it. The Christian Science Pavilion was headed to Poway, California, via the Panama Canal, to be born again as a church, a real steal at $79,000, and the Mormon Pavilion still serves the faithful as a church in Plainview, Long Island. Wreckers took down the Vatican Pavilion but not before the Pietà and Good Shepherd statues were carefully packed up and shipped back to Rome. Thankfully, there was no need to cash in the $6 million insurance policy on the Pietà, which arrived safely back home at St. Peter’s Basilica in November, unlikely to ever leave again.

Some corporate pavilions or parts of them made it out of Flushing Meadows in one piece. After the city approved the acquisition of the New York State Pavilion but rejected the U.S. Rubber Ferris wheel, the company planned to move the giant tire to its Allen Park, Michigan, headquarters, but it ended up being bought by a Lake George, New York, amusement park operator (who also snagged a few of the fifty-four-passenger Greyhound Glide-a-Ride trams). The Johnson Wax Pavilion did return to its corporate headquarters in Racine, Wisconsin, where it now functions as S. C. Johnson’s Golden Rondelle Theater, whereas Coca-Cola’s carillon now chimes for visitors to Stone Mountain Park near Atlanta. Thailand’s eighteenth-century Buddhist shrine was taken apart for reassembly in Montreal at Expo 67, and in March, U.S. Steel donated $100,000 to make its Unisphere a permanent part of Flushing Meadows Park.

The Unisphere lives on not just as the primary architectural symbol of the Fair but, along with the Brooklyn Bridge, Guggenheim Museum, and Washington Square Arch, as one of what can be considered second-tier New York City icons. It may be less recognizable than the city’s Big 3—the Empire State Building, Chrysler Building, and Statue of Liberty—but it is at least as durable, ensuring its long-term survival as a cultural icon.

A couple of other corporate pavilions were converted into mobile exhibits after the Fair by marketers wanting to get more bang from their promotional buck. Clairol put a smaller, transportable version of its Color Carousel on the road in March 1966, wanting to leverage the popularity of the pavilion that had drawn two million women over the two seasons. Retrofitted into two huge vans, the Carousel stopped at shopping centers in eighteen cities across the country, where four thousand women a day got personal consultations from the company’s color advisers. Knowing the publicity mileage it got when its huge plastic dinosaurs floated to the fairgrounds on a barge down the Hudson River, Sinclair also sent a scaled-down version of its exhibit on a shopping center tour from New York that ended with a five-day prehistoric stand in Miami.
Wrecking of the grounds and salvage operations continued throughout 1966, with Moses hoping to turn the refurbished park over to the city by the end of that year. Although his Fair had lost versus made millions, Moses still had designs to, as he put it in March, “make the post-Fair park the greatest park in the center of the greatest city.” Moses was now going to use $3 million in TBTA funds—less than half of what he had originally planned—to convert the grounds for public use, justifying the controversial expenditure by claiming that the Fair was leaving a legacy of $225 million in permanent improvements, including roads, remaining structures, and park amenities.

The physical legacy of the Fair would indeed stretch significantly beyond the 646-acre site itself because of the new and improved highways that Moses had built to handle the expected traffic. Just as following the 1939–40 Fair, in fact, there was an increased demand for housing in Queens, as residents of both the city and Long Island “discovered” the borough and its great roads. Knowing many commuters would love the location, location, location, builders again rushed to construct new housing near the grounds, with homes and apartment complexes squeezed into already fairly dense bedroom communities like Bayside and Douglaston. “Say what you will about the Fair,” gushed one builder, Skee Taubin of the aptly named Trylon Realty Corporation, “it left us with a terrific highway system.”

Disco made a stab at turning Flushing Meadows into a permanent theme park after the Fair, but naturally Moses refused to give up the site as the planned future home of his great public park. Disney packed up his ride along with his animatronic Lincoln and Carousel of Progress and shipped them to Anaheim, his company ultimately creating replicas of all three for Disney World, which opened in 1971.

Moses consistently and freely admitted that the “main attraction” would actually come after the Fair, when Flushing Meadows Park would be considered the most important park in the city, or as he described it, “a new sort of super Central Park.”

Isaac Asimov, the famous writer of science fiction (and “science fact,” he liked to make clear), too mused about what both life and a world’s Fair in the year 2014 might be like. In fifty years, Asimov predicted, underground homes like the one at the 1964–65 Fair would be common, “free from the vicissitudes of weather.” And with most of us living beneath the surface of the earth, the scientist happily concluded, “less space [would be] wasted on actual human occupancy.” Asimov went even further by proposing that people would be living not only underground in 2014 but underwater as well. “The 2014 World’s Fair will have exhibits in the deep sea with bathyscaphe liners carrying men and supplies across and into the abyss,” he prophesied. And just as living underground would make weather irrelevant, living under the sea would have its side benefits as well. “Underwater housing will have its attractions to those who like water sports,” the esteemed scientist wrote in all seriousness.

Robert Moses: “We rivaled the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World. We evolved Renaissance, Louis XIV, Tudor, Jacobian, Jeffersonian, Victorian, General Grant, Bogart, Sanford White, Nervi, Bauhaus, Lloyd...
Wright, Baroque, Rococo, Igloor, Ankhor Wat, Animated Typewriters, Frozen Music and the ecstasies of Viennese pastry cook.”
Ibid., p. 87.

One day during the winter of 1964–65, the mayor of New York City found himself driving along the Long Island Expressway. Passing the deserted fairgrounds, Mayor Wagner found the site depressing, as debris swirled around what he later likened to “some ghost town on Mars.” The Unisphere was capped with ice.
Ibid., p. 61.
Beneath the haze stirred up by the winds stirred up by the winds, the urban island, a sea in the middle of the sea, lifts up the skyscrapers over Wall Street, sinks down at Greenwich, then rises again to the crests of Midtown, quietly passes over Central Park and finally undulates off into the distance beyond Harlem. A wave of verticals. Its agitation is momentarily arrested by vision. The gigantic mass is immobilized before the eyes. It is transformed into a texturology in which extremes coincide—extremes of ambition and degradation, brutal oppositions of races and styles, contrasts between yesterday’s buildings, already transformed into trash cans, and today’s urban irruptions that block out its space. Unlike Rome, New York has never learned the art of growing old by playing on all its pasts. Its present invents itself, from hour to hour, in the act of throwing away its previous accomplishments and challenging the future. A city composed of paroxysmal places in monumental reliefs. The spectator can read in it a universe that is constantly exploding. In it are inscribed the architectural figures of the coincidatio oppositorum formerly drawn in miniatures and mystical textures. On this stage of concrete, steel and glass, cut out between two oceans (the Atlantic and the American) by a frigid body of water, the tallest letters in the world compose a gigantic rhetoric of excess in both expenditure and production.

To what erotics of knowledge does the ecstasy of reading such a cosmos belong? Having taken a voluptuous pleasure in it, I wonder what is the source of this pleasure of “seeing the whole,” of looking down on, totalizing the most immoderate of human texts. To be lifted to the summit of the World Trade Center is to be lifted out of the city’s grasp. One’s body is no longer clasped by the streets that turn and return it according to an anonymous law; nor is it possessed, whether as player or played, by the rumble of so many differences and by the nervousness of New York traffic. When one goes up there, he leaves behind the mass that carries off and mixes up in itself any identity of authors or spectators. An Icarus flying above these waters, he can ignore the devices of Daedalus in mobile and endless labyrinths far below. His elevation transfigures him into a voyeur. It puts him at a distance. It transforms the bewitching world by which one was “possessed” into a text that lies before one’s eyes. It allows one to read it, to be a solar Eye, looking down like a god. The exaltation of a scopic and gnostic drive: the fiction of knowledge is related to this lust to be a viewpoint and nothing more.

Must one finally fall back into the dark space where crowds move back and forth, crowds that, though visible from on high, are themselves unable to see down below? An Icarian fall. On the 110th floor, a poster, sphinx-like, addresses an enigmatic message to the pedestrian who is for an instant transformed into a visionary: It’s hard to be down when you’re up.

The desire to see the city preceded the means of satisfying it. Medieval or Renaissance painters represented the city as seen in a perspective that no eye had yet enjoyed. This fiction already made the medieval spectator into a celestial eye. It created gods. Have things changed since technical procedures have organized an “all-seeing power”? The totalizing eye imagined by the painters of earlier times lives on in our achievements. The same scopic drive haunts users of architectural productions by materializing today the utopia that yesterday was only painted. The 1370 foot high tower that serves as a prow for Manhattan continues to construct the fiction that creates readers, makes the complexity of the city readable, and immobilizes its opaque mobility in a transparent text.

Is the immense texturology spread out before one's eyes anything more than a representation, an optical artifact? It is the analogue of the facsimile produced, through a projection that is a way of keeping aloof, by the space planner urbanist, city planner or cartographer. The panorama-city is a "theoretical" (that is, visual) simulacrum, in short a picture, whose condition of possibility is an oblivion and a misunderstanding of practices. The voyeur-god created by this fiction, who, like Schreber's God, knows only cadavers, must disentangle himself from the murky intertwining daily behaviors and make himself alien to them.

The ordinary practitioners of the city live "down below," below the thresholds at which visibility begins. They walk—an elementary form of this experience of the city; they are walkers, Wandermänner, whose bodies follow the thick and thins of an urban "text" they write without being able to read it. These practitioners make use of spaces that cannot be seen; their knowledge of them is as blind as that of lovers in each other's arms. The paths that correspond in this intertwining, unrecognized poems in which each body is an element signed by many others, elude legibility. It is as though the practices organizing a bustling city were characterized by their blindness. The networks of these moving, intersecting writings compose a manifold story that has neither author nor spectator, shaped out of fragments of trajectories and alterations of spaces: in relation to representations, it remains daily and indefinitely other.

Escaping the imaginary totalizations produced by the eye, the everyday has a certain strangeness that does not surface, or whose surface is only its upper limit, outlining itself against the visible. Within this ensemble, I shall try to locate the practices that are foreign to the "geometrical" or "geographical" space of visual, panoptic, or theoretical constructions. These practices of space refer to a specific form of operations ("ways of operating"), to "another spatiality (an anthropological, poetic, and mythic experience of space), and to an opaque and blind mobility characteristic of the bustling city. A migrational, or metaphorical, city thus slips into the clear text of the planned and readable city. [Panorama] [Antiquity] [Textuality] [Voyeur] [Simulacrum] [Grid] de Certeau, pp. 91-4.

Immortality is conferred in devious and unexpected ways. If you're an architect, there's always hope. The latest switch in architectural immortality has come with the remake of King Kong. The producers have been running a full-page ad announcing that their first full-page ad was so popular—with 25,000 requests for full-color reprints—that they are working around the clock to fill orders. The ad shows King Kong breaking up airplanes with his right hand and clutching whoever plays Fay Wray in his left hand, standing astride—and this is the point—not the Empire State Building, as in the original film, but the World Trade Center towers.

The Empire State Building, of course, is a star in its own right, with an enduring romantic charisma. Somehow it implies every cherished legend of New York glamour, from the glittering speakeasy era to the suave luxe of the 1970s. It is genuinely immortal. By contrast, and as a symbol of the city, the World Trade Center towers are consummately uninspiring. And whether the producers of the film are aware of it or not, the change they have made is fraught with cultural and aesthetic implications.
Today's tall buildings are not stars. They are impersonally impressive at best, giant nomenclatures at worst. Another movie, The Towering Inferno, for example, was not about a building you could recognize or cherish. This was simply a large object to which catastrophe happened.

I could offer an intellectually seductive explanation of the change, with dithyrambs about the antihero and the anti-symbol and how our vision of men and monuments has been altered. This is a populist age in the arts, led, of course, by the elite, and we are tearing down symbols (symbolically) and elevating the ordinary with determined reversals of good and bad and beautiful and ugly. It is a vision that can be hopelessly counterproductive, or it can provide some rich dividends in much more complex and sophisticated ways of seeing life and the world. Anti-art is true to our times.

But the real reason for the change in the tall building is far more down to earth. It is just as rooted in culture and history, but it is less an act of philosophy than an expression of profitable pragmatism. It is a truism that today's tall building is strictly the product of economic calculations, tempered by codes and the law. Those boxy flattops that have replaced slender spires to jar the skyline and the viewer (architects and city fathers would be surprised at the amount of public concern over a city's skyline) represent the best buy in structural space.

Corporate growth and computerizing are also prime contributing factors. Today's huge corporations require huge floor areas in stacks; no builder is going to offer them a tapered tower. And no one could care less about a skyscraper version of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus a favorite conceit of the 1920s. Status is conferred by sheer size and the comparative quality and solidity of materials and fittings. The business of America may be business, as Coolidge said, but it has also become its art.

This phenomenon has been reinforced uncannily by the modernist architectural aesthetic. The 20th-century architectural revolution claimed the higher beauty of utility over ornament; it endorsed the look of the machine product as an artistic end. It enshrined the functional aesthetic. But it is an awfully short and dangerous step from the kind of expert and delicate adjustments that turn utility into art, and from the recognition of those adjustments to the most ordinary solution, or the least design for the money.

This deterioration is sanctioned, in a sense, by the modernist "less is more" philosophy. At its finest, less is more, and the finest is limited to a few men, such as Mies van der Rohe. Mies's work is magnificent, with a stripped, subtle, hard-edged and demanding beauty that is going to symbolize the 20th century for the rest of time. It is also poorly understood and badly knocked off. Even so, the glass box vernacular that grew out of his style is some of the best "background" architecture in history.

But this is an arcane and specialized aesthetic—it was undoubtedly easier for the popes to buy the overt grandeur of Borromini. Business clients rarely understand or want it. They are pursuing sleek space-profit formulas and effective technological solutions that no longer aspire to the kind of moving artistic greatness in the timeless and spiritual sense that architecture, and particularly the big building, has always held a primary concern. (Try standing in front of a Hawksmoor building in London without this visceral hit.) Objectively, the skyscraper's immense, efficient and impersonal blandness is a perfectly accurate picture of much of the architectural art of our age.
So dull, so prosaic, in fact, are most of today's ambitious big buildings that New Yorkers now value, for their quite accidental aesthetics, the staggered shapes of the setback buildings required by law until the early 1960s. The zoning code was changed then to encourage straight-sided towers, something architects had pushed for in the name of both architectural and civic art. Now the "wedding cakes" add the interest of eccentric form, at least, to the speculative norm. Their outlines also define a style and a time and a place, a combination of which art and culture are made.

Smoothing their new buildings into sheer, boxy slabs; giving them flat, sheared-off tops instead of spires or pinnacles; and setting them on broad, plaza-like open spaces would convert the old, thickly carved city into an airy, enlightened landscape. We need not speculate on how the mighty Kong would have reacted to this rationalized city; we have explicit evidence in the 1976 remake of King Kong, produced by Dino De Laurentiis.

From the start, the new Kong failed to establish Cooper's imaginative parallel between Manhattan and Skull Island: it begins not on the New York waterfront, but aboard an oil-exploration vessel off Indonesia. And no sooner has the film reached New York than it commits the crucial error that Cooper wisely avoided: it exhibits Kong in a stadium, whose wide open space instantly destroys any sense of crowding or oppression that might motivate a thousand-foot climb. In fact, the entire city that this Kong passes through is virtually deserted, having been conveniently "evacuated." Nothing could be farther from the first film's feeling of intense, panicky compression as Kong moved through the crowded city streets. Palpably devoid of urban excitement, the updated "adventure" comes to its dreary climax when Kong finally reaches the twin towers of the World Trade Center. These buildings had, of course, supplanted the Empire State as tallest in the world (only to be supplanted themselves by Chicago's Sears Tower), and thus formed the likeliest Manhattan site for the new Kong's climactic climb. But what an uninspiring sight greets the big ape upon his arrival! The cold, empty plaza at the base of the towers—thin, desolate, vast—actually dwarfs the creature, intended to seem so ferociously large. Worse still, it offers no motivation at all for his formidable ascent. 'Where are the madding crowds and canyon-like streets that might propel him to the airier, more kingly precincts above? What lonely grandeur will he achieve up there that he cannot find below?'

When Kong actually does start climbing (if only to fulfill expectations established forty-three years before), the sheer, unbroken shape of the World Trade Center's tower makes his effort seem almost absurd. The sight of the original Kong rising up the side of the Empire State, for all its spirit of fantasy, struck a deeply plausible note: the building's stepped-back shape was, at heart, made for ascent—if not by humans, then by something like a three-story ape. But in place of the Empire State's mountain-like, masonry surface, Kong now faces a smooth, metal-sheathed slab, unbroken from top to bottom, endlessly vertical. After watching Kong's attempt to somehow shimmy up this thousand-foot pole, we face a sight no less silly at its top. In the original film, Kong clung precariously to the Empire State's mooring mast, a narrow, vertiginous perch piercing the clouds and sky, where one false step meant doom. The flat tops of the twin towers, by contrast, offer nothing to grab on to—almost nothing to do at all, in fact, except jump from one tower to another, which the great creature inevitably proceeds to do. Atop the second identically large, flat surface, he is forced to stand like a dummy while helicopter gunships open fire. Some effort has to be made, in fact, to ensure that Kong actually falls over the side, rather than simply plops down on this football field of a roof. (In the original film, by contrast, it felt like a sheer act of will, a scary balancing act, for Kong to remain on his narrow roost, reaching out in vain at the circling planes.)

But fall he does, to a final indignity. The huge plaza below swallows up Kong's body and again makes him seem almost puny; the crowd that has gathered for this most remarkable of sights scarcely fills half the space. Kong's body sits like the centerpiece of a party whose guests mill about aimlessly; how different from the original film's rushing crowds and traffic on 34th Street, the dead Kong interrupting the massive urban superflux with his even more massive presence! Even in death, the original implied, Kong belonged up in the sky, not among the thick crowds below from whom he sought so hard to escape. In this last shot of the remake, on the other hand, neither "Beauty" nor aerial gunships seem to have done in the Beast so much as the cool, rational planning of postwar architecture.

Neither the Empire State Building nor the World Trade Center, needless to say, were designed to have a giant ape climb their sides; both were simply large commercial structures, filled with rentable office space. But there is something revealing in the way that the shape of the Empire State lent itself to the film—in fact, in some ineffable way, became itself, found its essential identity—through the story of King Kong. The shape of the Trade Center, in contrast, fought the story all the way. The producers of the remake turned inevitably to the World Trade Center as the tallest building in New York, but the Trade Center itself seemed to have forgotten why it was tallest. The whole significance of height, its power to impress in more than an abstract, statistical sense—number of stories, distance from sidewalk to roof—had been lost in the interim. The placement of an open plaza at the base of the buildings, meanwhile, removed the extremes of density (at their bottom) and openness (at their top) that gave the old towers their drama, making them, in Vincent Scully's words, "not salubrious but sublime." It was hardly surprising that New York's newer office buildings offered so little to the fantasies of the movie city—or to fantasies of any sort.

Sanders, Celluloid, pp. 100-2.

In 1986, lawyers for Turner Broadcasting, which had acquired the rights to the original film, along with scores of other classics soon to be violated by "colorization," tried to stop the Empire State from using any Kong imagery in their promotions without first paying a permission fee—a move the building's lawyers countered by employing nameless gorillas in promotions whose taglines went conspicuously Kongless. The building's owners knew they could not lose in such a battle of icons, confident that tourists and consumers would reliably supply the suppressed premise of this media enthymeme: if there is a gorilla (or, rather, man in a gorilla suit) in or around the Empire State Building, then, name or no name—trademark or no trademark—that gorilla must be King Kong. It was as if Turner had tried to trademark the name of a bearded fat man in a red suit between Thanksgiving and New Year's Eve.

Kingwell, p. 166.

The towers of the mammoth World Trade Center rise aggressively over everything else, gleaming like new-minted money—the architecture of power.
The World Trade Center, the very top of it emerging into a dim sunlight of rising dawn, it was framed by crossbars of metal on top of the far warehouse roof and it was like some kinda vision in all of this.

Wojnarowicz, p. 125.

The initial scheme for the World Trade Center was located along the East River, extending from the financial district to the South Street Seaport.

Goldenberg, 28.

Why has the World Trade Center in New York got two towers? All Manhattan's great buildings are always content to confront each other in a competitive verticality, from which there results an architectural panorama that is the image of the capitalist system: a pyramidal jungle, every building on the offensive against every other. The system itself can be spotted in the famous image we have of New York on arriving by sea. This image has changed completely in a few years. The effigy of the capitalist system has passed from the pyramid to the punch card. The buildings are no longer obelisks, but trustingly stand next to one another like the columns of a statistical graph. This new architecture no longer embodies a competitive system, but a countable one where competition has disappeared in favour of correlation. (New York is the only city in the world to have retraced, throughout the entire length and breadth of its history, the contemporary form of the capitalist system in this way, instantaneously changing according to this system. No European city has ever done this.) This architectural graphism belongs to the monopoly: the World Trade Center’s two towers are perfect parallelepipeds, four hundred metres high on a square base; they are perfectly balanced and blind communicating vessels. The fact that there are two identical towers signifies the end of all competition, the end of every original reference. Paradoxically, if there were only one, the WTC would not embody the monopoly, since we have seen that it becomes stable in a dual form. For the sign to remain pure it must become its own double: this doubling of the sign really put an end to what it designated. Every Andy Warhol does this: the multiple replicas of Marilyn Monroe’s face are of course at the same time the death of the original and the end of representation. The two towers of the WTC are the visible sign of the closure of a system in the vertigo of doubling, while the other skyscrapers are each the original moment of a system—continually surpassing itself in the crisis and the challenge.

This doubling, this replication, inspires a particular fascination. However high they are and however much higher than all the others, the two towers nevertheless signify an arrested verticality. They ignore the other buildings, they are not of the same race, they no longer challenge them nor compare themselves to them; the two towers reflect one another and reach their highest point in the prestige of similitude. They echo the idea of the model they are for one another, and their semi-detached altitude no longer has a transcendent value, but only signifies that the commutative strategy of the model will now historically prevail over the heart of the system itself (as New York truly is), over the traditional strategy of competition. The buildings of the Rockefeller Center also mirror their glass and steel façades in one another, in the city’s infinite specularity. The towers are themselves blind and no longer have a façade. Every reference to habitat, to the façade as ‘face’, to the interior and exterior, that we still find even in the Chase Manhattan Bank or in the most daring mirror buildings from the sixties has been erased. At the same moment that the rhetoric of verticality is disappearing, so too is the rhetoric of the mirror. There now remains only a series based on the binary code, as if architecture, in the image of the system, proceeded only by means of an unchanging genetic code, a definitive model.

The “bathtub”: The rows of the stubby snouts were noticeably wavy, reflecting great irregularities in the wall. It had been constructed as the foundation wall in 1967 and 1968, the first part of the World Trade Center to be built, using what was then a fancy new method that involved squirting concrete into a deep trench with no wooden planks inside to smooth up the sides. When the concrete hardened and the soil was scoured away from what would be the Trade Center’s basement, the huge wall looked as if it had been born ancient. The soil and stones of Lower Manhattan clung to it, and had left it with an imprint of the island’s subsurface textures, a crude version of casting bronze with wax. Some of the bumps were as big as a kitchen table. Men with jackhammers had to stand on them and chip them away. Most of the textures remained, and they didn’t matter much: the wall’s main function was to seal the basement against the terrific pressure of soil soaked with groundwater fed by the Hudson River. And if the wall was not especially pretty, it would soon be covered up with more elegant structures and never seen.

Glanz, p. 3.

At the 1939 World’s Fair, the International Chamber of Commerce built a new exhibit dedicated to “world peace through trade” and called it the World Trade Center… In 1946, a new state agency initiated by the head of the International Chamber of Commerce was named the World Trade Corporation slated with expanding international trade. Governor Dewey said that the assignment now was to build a permanent World Trade Center in New York. [World’s Fair 1939]

New York Times headline, November 1946: “PLANS ARE TABLED FOR TRADE CENTER,” a project that would have covered ten blocks in Manhattan, with twenty-one buildings and plenty of underground parking, and would have been loosely modeled on the seven-hundred-year-old Leipzig Fair in Germany.

The first written mention of the World Trade and Finance Center appears in May of 1959, nearly two decades since the concept had made its debut at the New York World’s Fair.

In its inception, The World Trade Center was measured against The Pentagon as a metric of immensity.

When the proposal to move the WTC from the East Side to the lower West Side became public in 1962, the shop owners at Radio Row could possibly not imagine what lay ahead of them. Radio Row was not merely business for the shop merchants who owned stores, it was their livelihoods—for some, generations of a past stretching back to the 1920s—and the WTC took that away from these small businessmen and their families.

Oscar Nadel, came from a family of Eastern European Jews and lived in the Lower East Side. He opened his first shop, “Oscars Radio Shop”, in 1925, a year before TV was invented. He was known as the king of Cortlandt Street and the whole area of Radio Row meant everything to him. He refused to give in to the political powers behind the WTC and there was no way he would allow his shop to be demolished. The Port Authority planned to raze the whole area especially Washington, West Broadway, Fulton, Dey, Cortlandt and Greenwich street, and that meant the end of Radio Row. Therefore, to oppose this proposal, Nadel with the other merchants formed a Downtown West Small Business Survival Committee, which stood up to Tobin for its rights... In 1962, Tobin offered Nadel a spot for a radio shop in the World Trade Center, but Nadel turned the offer down. He wanted Radio Row, not the World Trade Center... Why did the Port Authority need to wipe them out and create an artificial version of the same thing? It might not prime the international trading markets, but Nadel himself was already selling Sonys and Blaupunks alongside his RCA Victors and Sylvanias; places like World Happiness and American Machine Tool Export, inside the north terminal building, were moving products around the world; and Walter Nussbaum, one of the original merchants on Radio Row, was selling cut-rate German wine at $1.09 a bottle. (“When Low in Spirits” was the slogan at Nussbaum’s.)

Ibid., p. 71

Yamasaki was a Japanese-American who grew up in a slum two miles from the Seattle fairgrounds... In his application to be the architect for the World Trade Center, he said it would be big and unmistakable, yet intimate and humane.

Ibid., pp. 89, 101.

Early sketches for WTC: There was a triplet of slim towers slightly staggered, reaching just above the height of the nearby Woolworth Building. The team tried a cluster of four identical towers erected face-to-face in a tight square, like the legs of a stool. Then two long, thick, slablike buildings, running parallel to the shoreline and enclosing, like hedgerows, a modest-size duo of towers. There was even a single, monstrous, bulky tower of a huge raided pedestal that may have represented the ultimate parking garage.

Ibid., p. 105.

“A whole bunch of little buildings,” Tozzoli would say. “Bullshit. That’ll never get anywhere.” Now here was an interesting predicament for an architect whose reputation had been built on jewel box-size buildings that celebrated the human scale. No one had previously mentioned that Yamasaki was supposed to design the world’s tallest building.

Ibid., p. 106.

The model shop constructed mockups of the Empire State Building, the Chrysler Building, and the city’s other tallest towers, so whatever Yamasaki and his team now came up with, it could be compared directly to what Tozzoli and Levy made clear was the competition... “Yama, I have something to tell you. President Kennedy is going to put a man on the moon. You’re going to figure out a way to build me the tallest buildings in the world.”... No one had even contemplated this possibility: a model so tall that it could not stand upright in the drafting room. Jerry Karn tried to lower the plywood base. That didn’t work. The architects started looking up at the tiles of the drop ceiling. Herman grabbed a small ladder and, struggling to control his laughter, he punched out tow of the tiles. Karn moved the base so that the twins did not bump into the meal braces that held the tiles. Then the behemoths were finally moved into place. “It fits,” Herman announced, to a rousing round of applause.

Yamasaki was afraid of heights... Narrow windows meant Yamasaki, and the office workers in the towers, could approach a window and have the security of being able to rest arms against two vertical barriers. “The narrow windows, they give me none, if any, sense of acrophobia.” The result of these compulsions was a façade of extraordinary monotony. Ibid., pp. 109-10.

Its two towers are scheduled to be 1350 feet high. But at that height they will so thoroughly foul up TV reception that the Port Authority has agreed to top them out with new TV broadcasting facilities. By the time antennas are added, the North Tower, according to one TV expert, will be close to 1700 feet high... 800 feet taller than anything else in the immediate area. This means, according to the Federal Aviation Administration, that air traffic patterns will have to change, landing approaches will have to be altered, minimum altitudes in the area will be affected. The total potential hazard is staggering. No wonder airline pilots feel the risk is unjustified. Unfortunately, we rarely recognize how serious these problems are until it’s too late to do anything. But in this case, there’s still time. The problem can be solved by keeping the height of the Trade Center at 900 feet. Valenti, p. 21.

The most famous and distinguishing feature about New York City’s landmark skyscrapers had been their most visible spot: their tops. The decorative turrets atop the Woolworth Building; the floodlit stainless steel spire that caps the Chrysler Building. But Yamasaki wanted a flat, square top to his flat, square tower. Glanz, p. 110.

Five thousand years stand between the World Trade Center, now rising in lower Manhattan, and the Great Pyramid of Cheops at Giza in Egypt. [Antiquity]
Ibid., p. 176.

Critics of WTC’s design: so plain that they could have been the shipping boxes for the Chrysler and Empire State Buildings.
Ibid., p. 116.

“You don’t need to make them that big.”
Ibid., p. 120.

WTC’s pinstripes: Wall Street meets the Yankees.
Ibid., p. 120.

WTC’s engineering akin to stiff tubes. Even after all the masonry and cross-bracing was stripped away, the structure would be ten times stiffer than a traditional structure.
Ibid., p. 121.

The Port Authority appropriates a line from Walt Whitman for the WTC press release: “high growth of iron, slender, strong, light, splendidly uprising toward clear skies…” They then added: “...captured with succinct eloquence the structural characteristics and spirit of the twin 110-story towers.”
Ibid., p. 123.

The dirt taken out of the foundation for WTC was used as landfill to make Battery Park City.
Ibid., p. 170.

Battery Park City was not much more than a weed-and-gravel-filled plot where pools of rainwater would freeze over in the winter.
Ibid., p. 216.

Even in an 80-mile-per-hour gale, the very top of the Empire State Building swayed less than four inches. The flexible, lightweight design of the twin towers would allow them to sway several feet at the top, and possibly much more.
Ibid., p. 141.

The WTC’s ability to sway in wind was tested in a simulated room on wheels in Eugene, Oregon. The room shifted back and forth with extraordinary gracefulness, almost as if it really swaying in a breeze off the Atlantic Ocean. The testing took two weeks. Each eight-hour day, the participants would become seasick. They would recover at home, come in the next morning, and get sick again.
Ibid., pp. 142-3.

The Port Authority was not ready to accept the Eugene results so they redid the experiment by swinging a huge packing crate—made to look like an office inside—from cables inside one of the Lincoln Tunnel’s ventilation towers.
Ibid., p. 144.

Wind vortices that gave the structure a rhythmic, side-to-side shove as they spun away, one after the other, like eddies around a blade of grass in a stream.
Imagine a giant finger reaching down from the sky and pushing the top of the Empire State Building sideways a foot or so, and then letting go. The building would spring back and sway from side to side in about eight seconds. But the swaying would quickly stop, because all that brickwork and old concrete and tile and the masonry walls inside would creak and rub together like arthritic joints and put a brake on the motion. If there was one thing the sleek twin towers were not, it was creaky—a push from the giant finger, and one of those towers would spring back and forth again and again and again.

But how were they going to make steel towers creaky?

No longer true twins, the north tower's core would run east-west, and the south tower's north-south. The change would discourage the towers from dancing in unison.

Who's afraid of big, bad buildings? Everyone, because there are so many things about gigantism that we just don't know. The gamble of triumph or tragedy at this scale—and ultimately it is a gamble—demands an extraordinary payoff. The Trade Center towers could be the start of a new skyscraper age or the biggest tombstones in the world.

Petit walked across the void. Eight times.

George "Human Fly" Willig's mother was in the Empire State Building when it was struck by the B-52 bomber in July 1945.

All of a sudden—after Willig and Petit—the towers were not looking like mere aluminum boxes anymore. They had become supersized toys to go with New York's supersized ego. Like the Eiffel Tower—which at first had been condemned as a "gigantic black factory chimney, its barbarous mass overwhelming and humiliating all our monuments," and then was printed on the 200-franc bank note—something fundamental had changed.

I do know that from my standpoint, it seems that without proper supervision, without being accountable to anybody in the city of New York, to build the largest buildings in the world the method of construction which has not been tested and tried and proved appropriate, subjects the city of New York to the possibility of a major physical disaster. It may never happen; it probably will never happen. But that there should be such—the remotest possibility of such a thing is, in my opinion, ridiculous. And the city should insist that there be no such risk.

This type of building has never been tried on the scale before, and there is a chance, he alluded that it might collapse or fall.
\[ (\text{amplitude})_{\text{wrc}} \]
\[ \frac{\text{____}^{\text{____}}}{\text{____}^{\text{____}}} = 2.67 \]
\[ (\text{amplitude})_{\text{ess}} \]

Simply the effort to manufacture the hundreds of thousands of pieces for the World Trade Center, before they were assembled in Lower Manhattan, would take years and involve dozens of factories across the country. This mammoth scale was beyond anything ever attempted in a high-rise project. It would be likened, at one time or another, to the Pyramids, the Panama Canal, the Brooklyn Bridge, the Apollo space program, and the effort to build an atomic bomb in World War II. More than 200,000 pieces of steel for the Trade Center were already being fabricated in more than a dozen cities around the country, from Seattle to Gainesville, Virginia. The Trade Center would call for 3,000 miles of electrical wiring, 425,000 cubic yards of concrete for the floors, 2.2 million square feet of aluminum cladding for the tower facades, seven thousand plumbing fixtures, 170 miles of connecting pipe, forty thousand doors, and 43,600 windows. There would be almost six acres of marble and a $1,547,800 tandem of automated window washers designed to crawl up and down the face of the towers.

It seemed that an entire nation had been mobilized to build the World Trade Center.

One panel, for instance, was marked: PONYA A-251-92-95. Decoded, that meant the panel would span three floors, from the ninety-second to the ninety-fifth, in the north tower, also called tower A. The faces of each building were numbered from 1 through 4, clockwise starting with the north, so the first digit of 251 meant that this one would go on the east face. Finally, there were a total of fifty-nine columns per side, and this was number 51. Because the numbers on the east face started on the northern edge and went south (once again in the clockwise sense), the designated column would end up about thirty feet from the tower’s southeast corner. PONYA, of course, stood for Port of New York Authority. (cf. Koolhaas and Kingswell’s Mechanized construction of the [Empire State Building].)

The astonishing attempt to suspend the long-buried Hudson Tubes in the air as the dig went right past them and commuter trains continued to rumble inside. The tubes had not seen the light of day since they were completed in 1909.

Nonelective intestinal surgery on a cosmic scale.

The biggest ditch in Manhattan.

The top twenty or thirty feet of the soil held ballast from the European ships that would jettison stones before picking up cargo from the trip back.
Workers dug up cannonballs, animal carcasses, a goat’s horn, clay pipes, oyster shells, the muzzle of a cannon, a Portuguese fishing gaffe, a century-old bedroom slipper, ancient bottles, and a time capsule from the cornerstone of the Washington market containing some old newspapers and the cards of some of the produce sellers at the market. [Palimpsest]

For the entire construction, a Port Authority helicopter hovered at 1,350 feet, the height of the Tower Buildings.

During the construction, studies showed that exposure to asbestos was linked to cancer. In April 1979, a CBS crew showed up and used the rising north tower as the backdrop for a news report on the dangers of loose asbestos. Tobin ordered an abrupt switch to a non-asbestos-containing material, an untested new product. Wind-driven rains stripped the material from the steel, rust flaked off and took the fireproofing with it. The building was built without proper fire protection on the steel girders.

“In this great project of yours, how do you propose to fight a fire on the high floors?”
“If your fire chief was really good, he would simply drive up the steps into the plaza and put the ladders up there.”

Point number three on the list of WTC design features (1964):
3. THE BUILDING HAVE BEEN INVESTIGATED AND FOUND TO BE SAFE IN AN ASSUMED COLLISION WITH A LARGE JET AIRLINER TRAVELING AT 600 MILES PER HOUR. ANALYSIS INDICATED THAT SUCH COLLISION WOULD RESULT IN ONLY LOCAL DAMAGE WHICH COULD NOT CAUSE COLLAPSE OR SUBSTANTIAL DAMAGE TO THE BUILDING AND WOULD NOT ENDANGER THE LIVES AND SAFETY OF OCCUPANTS NOT IN THE IMMEDIATE AREA OF IMPACT.

Transforming the towers from high-rise innovations to experiments-in-the-sky.

New Yorker cartoon just after WTC opened: “For once,” said a disgruntled-looking man in a hard hat to a coworker as they stood atop the north tower during its construction, “let’s start the say without you telling me there’s a taller one going up in Chicago.” The World Trade Center remained the tallest building in the world for only two and a half years. The Sears Tower took the crown a month after the Port Authority held its formal dedication ceremony.

“The Untied Nations of Commerce”

Record-setting parking garages.
Gleaming metal.
_Ibid._, p. 113.

Steel balloons.
_Ibid._, p. 118.

General Motors Gothic.

A port without water.
_Ibid._, p. 40

Others blamed the twin towers for killing migrating birds.
_Ibid._, p. 216.

The tenant list now had almost nothing to do with the importing and exporting of goods—financial firms dominated. The Twin Towers were just enormous office buildings with sweeping views, and they did not pretend to be anything else.

In the 1970s, The Port Authority teamed up with the United Nations for an exhibit of goods manufactured in Third World countries, with the intention of kicking off the World Trade Mart, the showplace that had been proposed in 1961—a throwback modeled after the first World Trade Center at the 1939 World’s Fair.
_Ibid._, p. 216.

The construction site became plagued with bomb threats, and just 30 minutes after one of them was phoned in, a huge explosion at the foot of the south tower blowout windows along Liberty Street and sent flames shooting 100 feet into the air. Men scattered and some jumped from the steel.
_Ibid._, p. 203.

More than forty fires had been reported at the Trade Center. Most have been small affairs, but often times the towers and acted like chimneys, as the smoke rose through ducts and shelves dozens of floors above the spot where the fire was taking place. Fire experts called the phenomenon the stack effect.
_Ibid._, p. 208.

A list of fire weaknesses: the lightweight floors, the large open spaces across which a fire could quickly spread, the substandard fireproofing on the steel, and, worst of all, no automated sprinklers. “The bottom line is that it is not a place I would want to be in a fire,” he told her.
_Ibid._, p. 209.

The Port Authority is exempt from city building codes.
_Ibid._, p. 209.

The coat hooks on the bathroom stall doors were installed a tad lower than usual to prevent thieves from reaching over the top and grabbing coats or handbags.
_Ibid._, p. 209.
On the 95th floor Huntington thought the views were superb. On the most routine day, he could sit at his desk and watch the land and sea mutate as the light from the sky turned from noontime intensity to dusk. In the summer, each approaching thunderstorm was a marvel, the angry gray clouds and sheets of rain moving ever so slowly across the horizon. In the winter, Huntington watched snowfall upward, carried by the wind. On some days he could see giant ice flows moving slowly down the Hudson. When the fog or low cloud cover had settled over New York, Huntington and his staff would be left there alone, towering over an infinite meadow of soft, gray cotton spread out below his deck. The only evidence that they were a top one of the world’s greatest concentrations of humanity came from the silvery spires of the Empire State and Chrysler buildings and the suspension towers of the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge, glinting above the clouds.

Ibid., pp. 210-1.

Irene Humphries, a file clerk, was at her desk one windy spring day, feeling a bit nauseated, Humphries stood up and walked to the bathroom, hoping to gain her composure once there, she heard a creaking noise, as it from the hold of the ship that was being thrown around and rough sea. The building was making noise. Water was sloshing back-and-forth in the toilets. The twin towers, as these early tenants learned, we’re so tall that wind the wind in the New York Harper started to blow, it whipped up whitecaps—and not just in the harbor.

Ibid., p. 211.

Candice Tevere came into the World Trade Center to apply for a job at Fiduciary, but she never made it to the interview. As soon as she stepped into the cattle-car-size express elevators, she felt uneasy. The doors closed, and with fifty or so people standing around her, she could not lean against any wall. Then the elevator started to move. It was impossible to tell just how fast, but it felt to Tevere as if she were on a supersonic jet. As soon as she reached the seventy-eighth-floor sky lobby, Tevere said to herself, “That’s it. This is nuts.” She rode back down and then went home. Two days later, a staff member at Fiduciary called, urging her to give it another try. Tevere did go back. And she did take a job. But she could never step into one of those express elevators without a friend or colleague by her side. While the elevator was moving, she would keep her mind occupied by looking through her purse. She never left the building for lunch.

The strategy worked fine until one Friday morning. As usual, she had a girlfriend by her side, ready for that uncomfortable ride into the sky. But then, midway up, the elevator just stopped. It sat there for one hour and fifty-five minutes. “How many people are in the elevator?” the security guards kept asking through the intercom. “Why? So that the papers will know that twenty-two of us in here died on Friday the thirteenth?” one man yelled back.

Tevere stayed calm until the firefighters arrived, took the side wall off the elevator, set up a plank, and then told everyone there to walk across the plank to the next elevator. “I am not going over,” Tevere said, convinced she would fall. “Just look at me, just walk to me,” the firefighter replied. “Just don’t look down.”

It was not long before Huntington started to hear about his employees’ fears. So, with his usual panache, he decided to show them how unconcerned he was. One day, as dozens of people on the ninety-fourth floor watched with puzzlement, Huntington turned toward the nearest window and started running across the floor. He finally turned his shoulder, pushed himself off the ground like a football player.
throwing a flying block, and slammed his side into the window glass. Thankfully, he bounced back. (cf. "Elevator sickness: "The resulting movement of the organs, and the accompanying pressure of such organs against other parts more rigidly attached to the frame, is the cause of discomfort." [Body in the City])

Ibid., pp. 211-2.

Death by compression of the riders in the elevator at the World Trade Center.
Conrad, p. 322.

In 1974 and 1975, events that seemed to step from movie screens into reality began turning the World Trade Center into a famously scary place to work. It began with The Towering Inferno. Late in 1974, advertisements for the movie, starring McQueen as a grumpy-faced Fire Department battalion chief, starting running across the nation: "One minute you’re attending a party atop the world’s tallest skyscraper. The next, you’re trapped with 294 other guests in the middle of a fiery hell... No way down. No way out."

The plot: a fire starts in a utility closet on the eighty-first floor of a 138-story skyscraper and then quickly spreads upward. The automated fire alarm fails and the security staff does not respond quickly to hints that something might be wrong. By the time firefighters arrive, hundreds of partygoers, including the mayor, the building’s developer, the architect, and many other dignitaries, are trapped in an opulent penthouse ballroom. Shoddy fireproofing-duct holes did not have proper “fire-stopping” components—the lack of a working sprinkler system, and a blocked fire stair combine to doom many of the people in the tower. The building’s developer repeatedly assures anyone who will listen that no fire could threaten his tower. “I don’t believe you are familiar with the many modern safety systems we have designed into this building. We have got them all,” William Holden, playing the developer, says. But the message of the movie was clear: “If you had to cut costs,” Paul Newman as the architect asks the developer, “why didn’t you cut floors instead of corners?”

Although the acting was mediocre, the special effects were nothing short of thrilling. Vincent Canby of the New York Times called it “this year’s best end-of-the-world movie.” Among the many truly awful scenes were burning victims tumbling from windows, an elevator filled with panicked partiers that caught fire and then fell, a helicopter crashing and exploding as it attempted a rooftop rescue. In other words, it was a World Trade Center tenant’s worst nightmare.

The New York City Fire Department loved the film so much so that Fire Commissioner John T. O’Hagan was there for the gala Times Square screening in December 1974, with six fire engines outside as his escort. McQueen ended the film by looking over at victims laid out in body bags and telling the architect, “One of these days, they are going to kill ten thousand in one of these fire traps. And I am going to keep eating smoke and bringing out bodies until somebody asks us how to build them.” The firefighters cheered. [Apocalypse]

Ibid., pp. 212-3.

Oswald Adorno, a tall, somewhat chubby nineteen-year-old kid from the Bronx who held a nighttime job as a World Trade Center custodian—his unenviable assignment was washing the buildings’ ceilings and walls—decided to become an arsonist. Angry that he had too many floors to clean, Adorno started by setting a fire on the eleventh floor of the north tower, down the hall from Rick Boody’s office. He lit it just before midnight on February 13, 1975, inside a closet filled with telephone switching equipment and filing cabinets filled with paper. Another custodian happened to pass by and hear a crackling sound as the fire burned.

New York City Fire Department captain Harold Kull soon led his men into what could only be described as a towering inferno. As it happened, the room also held a large supply of alcohol-based duplicating fluid for mimeograph machines; feeding on all the combustibles in the room, the blaze was already out of control. There was another reason the fire spread so quickly. For anyone who knew nothing of the longstanding problems with fireproofing at the Trade Center, this unexpected factor would be shocking: just as in the make-believe tower where Steve McQueen did the firefighting, the “firestopping” at the World Trade Center was missing. A foot-wide hole between the floors allowed hot gases to snake upward, sending fires all the way to the seventeenth floor, while burning embers dropped down the hole, igniting fires all the way to the ninth floor. Kull concentrated on the eleventh floor, which he said “was like fighting a blowtorch,” so hot that all of his men got their necks and ears burned. A second and then a third alarm had to be called, ultimately drawing 132 firefighters to the north tower.

It would be three hours before the last of the fire was out. The damage would take weeks to repair—the southeast corner of the eleventh floor was little more than a charred shell—but the impact of the fire would be permanent. After assuring the New York City Fire Department that the fire-protection systems in the twin towers were first rate, the Port Authority now had to contend with clear evidence to the contrary. “Had the building been occupied, and given the stack action that exists in this 110-story building,” Fire Commissioner O’Hagan later wrote, “the rescue problem would have been tremendous.”

Adorno was not finished with his mischief. “More fires,” a man said in an anonymous call to the Port Authority security desk, unless the maintenance workers received a promised raise. Adorno then waited three months. Over the night of Monday, May 19, 1975, he set seven fires, this time in the south tower, on the twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth floors. He was arrested one day later.

When O’Sullivan looked at security at the Trade Center, he found one vulnerability after another. Explosive charges could be placed at key locations in the power system. Chemical or biological agents could be dropped into the coolant system. The Hudson River water intake could be blown up. Someone might even try to infiltrate the large and vulnerable subterranean realms of the World Trade Center site, he said. One threat in particular was troubling to him. There was no control at all over access to the underground, two-thousand-car parking garage. “A time bomb-laden vehicle could be driven into the WTC and parked in the public parking area,” O’Sullivan wrote. “The driver could then exit via elevator into the WTC and proceed with his business unnoticed. At a predetermined time, the bomb could be exploded in the basement. The Assistant Deputy Director of the FBI thinks this is a very likely scenario for the WTC and has described it graphically in conversations with OSP staff.” Many groups might try such an attack, the report continued, but “extremist Muslims pose an especially disturbing threat to the Trade Center. They are not deterred by typical security measures and they have little regard for inflicting large numbers of innocent casualties, as evidenced by their heinous attacks on American and French installations overseas.”
Ibid., p. 227.

On Friday, February 26, 1993, Ramzi Yousef and a Jordanian friend, Eyad Ismoil, drove a yellow Ryder van into Lower Manhattan, and pulled into the public parking garage beneath the World Trade Center around noon. They parked on the underground B-2 level. Yousef ignited the 20-foot fuse, and fled. Twelve minutes later, at 12:17:37 pm, the bomb exploded in the underground garage. The bomb opened a 98-foot wide hole through four sublevels of concrete. Initial news reports indicated a main transformer may have blown, not realizing a bomb had exploded in the basement.

The bomb instantly cut off the World Trade Center’s main electrical power line, knocking out the emergency lighting system. The bomb caused smoke to rise up to the 93rd floor of both towers, including through the stairwells which were not pressurized. With thick smoke filling the stairwells, evacuation was difficult for building occupants and led to many smoke inhalation injuries. Hundreds were trapped in elevators in the towers when the power was cut, including a group of 17 kindergartners, on their way down from the South Tower observation deck, who were trapped between the 35th and 36th floors for five hours.

Also as a result of the loss of power most of New York City’s radio and television stations lost their over-the-air broadcast signal for almost a week, with television stations only being able to broadcast via cable and satellite via a microwave hookup between the stations. Telephone service for much of Lower Manhattan was also disrupted.

In a notebook, handwritten in Arabic: the idea was not just to bomb the World Trade Center, but to knock it down. “Break and destroy the enemies of Allah,” Nosair wrote. “And this by means of destroying [and] exploding the structure of their civilized pillars such as the touristic infrastructure which they are proud of and their high world buildings.
Ibid., p. 228.

A rocket ship flies between the Twin Towers.
Valenti, p. 31.

Against the backdrop of the 1980s New York City sky an airplane flies ostensibly through two buildings that resemble the Twin Towers.
Ibid., p. 32.

A squadron of military aircraft fly by the Twin Towers and bomb the main theater district of Broadway.
Ibid., p. 36.

On May 2, 1968, one of the radio merchants who was displaced by the World Trade Center ran a nearly full page ad showing an artist rendering of a large commercial airliner, flying due south, a fraction of a second before it rammed the offices in the upper stories of the north tower, which stood directly in its path. The ad, titled “The Mountain comes to Manhattan,” suggested the towers posed a danger for commercial aviation and pointed out that the north tower’s proposed television mast, for example, would be some 800 feet taller than anything else in the immediate vicinity. "The total potential hazard is staggering," said the ad.

Glanz, p. 175

"We built these towers," he said once to me, deliriously tramping around Washington Square charging Japanese tourists a buck or two to take his picture. "Me and Bird, and Jimi Hendrix built these fucking towers," pointing up over SoHo at World Trade. [Downtown]

Kopasz, p. 245.
w - Light

Blackout

No colors, no neon, nothing to read, just a vast blackness pricked with lights.
Finney, p. 162.

Countless people were trapped in elevators like hamsters in cages. Brox, p. 239.

Those riding on escalators glided down more and more slowly, until, at last, they were scarcely moving at all.
Ibid., p. 239.

All the stoplights failed.
Ibid., p. 239.

Some native New Yorkers walked across the bridges—flashlights and transistors in hand—for the first time in their lives.
Ibid., p. 239.

It was possible to have a quiet drink and walk though imaginary red lights.
Talese, p. 43.

It was a dark town of stopped clocks, warm beer, soft butter and intimate candlelit conversations in saloons without television.
Ibid., p. 43.

It would be said of that night that it was easier to cross the Atlantic to Cairo than to get from Manhattan to Brooklyn.
Brox, p. 239.

200 blind workers, who knew every inch of the place by touch, led seventy sighted workers down the steps and safely onto Broadway.
Talese, p. 43.

High above the city, airplanes lost their ground orientation and were unable to land. “It was a beautiful night,” recalled one pilot. “You could see a million miles.”
Brox, p. 240.

The true quiet of the world felt strange, as if the darkness had somehow smudged away the horns and the other noises of the traffic.
Ibid., p. 241.

If the city’s skies were entirely dark, about 2,000 stars would be visible to the naked eye. But such a complete view of the heavens has been visible only once in recent years.
Mittlebach, p. 3.

Stacked up in the right order, carving light and space in a bold new way, a few million office lights were worth far more than a bunch of stars, any night of the week—especially when the innumerable lights had made the paltry stars invisible.
Sharpe, p. 231.

The moonlight broke upon the city's domes.
McKay, "Song," p. 46.

The borrowed light of the moon is enough for sissy.

Maybe the moon was, as Charles Reznikoff said, "only another street-light."
Sharpe, p. 217.

Night was truly night again, just as in the Middle Ages, and, also as in the Middle Ages, light became precious once more. People struck match after match to light their way down flights of stairs: two matches, carefully tended, we're enough to light the distance between one floor and the next. "Walking down 18 flights to the lobby, we used exactly 36 matches."
Brox, p. 242.

There was a general increase in light pollution and this must have meant that street name signs were more visible at night. The "thick veil of night" that had lain over the English-speaking cities of the world in the 19th century, and which had given rise to potently grotesque English literature from Dickens to the "city mystery" novels to the early urban detective novel, had been largely dispelled by the 1920s.
Haden, p. 61.

The moonlight lay on the streets like thick snow, and we had a curious, persistent feeling that we were leaving footprints in it. Something was odd about buildings and corners in this beautiful light. The city presented a tilted aspect, and even our fellow pedestrians, chattering with implacable cheerfulness, appeared foreshortened as they passed; they made us think of people running downhill. It was a block more before we understood: The shadows, for once, all fell in the same direction—away from the easterly, all-illuminating moon... We were in a night forest, and, for a change, home lay not merely uptown but north.
Brox, p. 242.

Without that moon, the night would've been very different. Air tragedy, it was said, have been averted because its light, along with that made possible by auxiliary power in the main control towers at the airports, was enough for pilots to already in descent to see by. The previous night, rainstorms had soaked the region, and clouds had covered the moon and stars. Had the lights gone out then, there surely would have been more than one disaster.
Ibid., pp. 242-3.

In the writing of it later, no one waxed poetic about the moon on the buildings.
Ibid., p. 248.

The lost hours eventually faded into a strange dream full of quirky things, though there were moments that would be intensely remembered afterward—of lighting grease pencils to see by, or being given coffee and pastries by transit workers while waiting in a darkened subway car, of the sheen of the moonlight on the side of a skyscraper.
Here, above, cracks in the buildings are filled with battered moonlight.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 582.

All the way back to New York, we kept hoping the blackout would still be going on when we got there. We couldn’t go through any tunnels—the radio was saying they couldn’t ventilate them without electricity—and when we got to the bridge, we couldn’t see any lights on the whole Manhattan skyline, just car headlights. The moon was full and it was all like a big party somehow—we drove through the Village and everybody was dancing around, lighting candles. There were no traffic lights on, so of course everything moved very slowly—the buses were just creeping. People in suits and briefcases were sleeping in doorways, because all the hotels were booked solid, and Governor Rockefeller had to open the armories up.

There were cute National Guard soldiers around helping people up out of the stuck subways and I thought that down there must be the worst place to be—the only thing that could ruin a beautiful idea like this. It was the biggest, most Pop happening of the sixties, really—it involved everybody.

After driving around a little, we went over to Ondine and then on to Le Club where we stayed until the lights started going on around four. Then all around the city things started coming to life like the Sleeping Beauty castle.

Warhol, POPism, p. 173.

There were no lights all the way up Fifth Avenue, throughout Greenwich Village, in the fog and rain of Harlem, or along the crooked, narrow streets of Chinatown. On the East Side, shades were drawn over the seventh candles and the windows. Millions breathed in the dark, sitting in living rooms or standing at the sink or an entry halls, on the dance floor or by their workstations. Although there was no order for quiet, few spoke above a whisper.

Brox, p. 224.

In the relative hush, suddenly a million little things were in danger of perishing. Damp glass greenhouses were beginning to cool down. At the Bronx and Central Park zoos, the men, working without sleep, stuffed blankets between the bars in the small-mammals house, where diminutive, heat-sensitive lemurs, flying squirrels, and small monkeys began their nocturnal peregrinations. The reptile house presented a different problem, since no one was willing to try to wrap a cobra in a blanket. Small particle propane gas heaters were taken into warm the cold-blooded vipers, anacondas, iguanas, caymans, crocodiles and their ilk. It may have been too cold for iguanas, but the temperature outside was just perfect for storing blood.

Ibid., p. 241.

Time and task were both disorienting, for if you were to remove everything from our lives that depends on electricity to function, homes and offices would become no more than the chambers and passages of limestone caves—simple shelter from wind and rain, far less useful than the first homes at Plymouth Plantation or a wigwam. No way to keep out the cold, or heat, for long. No way to preserve food, or to cook it. The things that define us, quiet as rock outcrops—the dumb screens and dials, the senseless clicks of on-off switches—without their purpose, they lose the measure of their beauty, and we are left alone in the dark with countless useless things. Skyscrapers take on a geological sheen, and the stars resemble those of ancient times.

Yet unlike in ancient times, people were accustomed to giving into long night. For most, the dark wasn't restful; it simply felt as if the world had stopped and everyone and everything were suspended in amber, especially after the novelty of the first hour wore off. For as long as no one had any idea at all how long the helplessness would go on, there was no future, and no knowing the future. After a few hours, theaters canceled their scheduled performances, and people ran out of pocket money. They were lined up outside phone booths waiting to call home, but what could they say other then they were somewhere? This night became known as "the night of the long night," and it was particularly long for those trying to sleep in hotel lobbies or on office floors; in barber chairs or on cots in banquet rooms; curled up in hallways are sprawled on subway stairs or benches in train stations.

The pale sliver of the new moon set before the lights went out at 9:34 PM, so there was no consoling light reflecting off the skyscrapers, nothing but the torch on the Statue of Liberty to relieve the blackness.

_Ibid._, p. 247.

Midtown Manhattan was divided for a while last night–half-blaze, half-black–as the island's vital center became an odd patchwork of darkness and light. The contrasts were everywhere and sometimes they seemed inexplicable: at points there was light east but none west, or light north but none south, or light low but none high. Either you had it or you didn't, and there was a world of difference to be traversed from one curbstone to the next. Like the moon, Broadway had a light side and a dark side for a while. A man moving down the main stem from upper Manhattan had a margin of light to his right but he glanced eastward into thick blackness, like the blackness of a rainforest on a moonless night. Whiplash winds and driving rain with hail made it a rather eerie scene. Pedestrians huddled under movie marquees for semi-shelter, dashing out in clusters for the few taxis that came along. The march of lighted street lamps on Forty-second Street from the Hudson River ended abruptly on the west side of Fifth Avenue and there were no more lighted posts along the street to the East River. The Chrysler Building, all dark, was a silent silhouette stabbing the cloud cover and its top was snuffed from sight by rolling mists.

At Turtle Bay, the United Nations glass secretariat was a slab of ghostly gray, except for a spine of yellow emergency lights running up the middle.

The zone of light and the zone of darkness fell in eccentric patterns over the broad waist of mid-Manhattan. In spots, where the blackness was almost palpable, a man felt he could reach out and scoop in handfuls of it. The north face of the City at the end of Central Park was alight. Nearer Times Square, a hotel's swinging door swung into darkness. A moving sign wrote in the night. The silhouette of a basketball player went right on dribbling across the animated electric board on Seventh Avenue at Forty-sixth Street. Hurrying pedestrians below stamped boot prints on the hail-speckled pavement.

The Great White Way suffered a kind of electrical schizophrenia. On the east side of Times Square, film shows failed in the Criterion Theater. Hundreds of patrons sat in darkness for half an hour before leaving and getting then money back. The Victoria Theater’s patrons on the west side of Broadway did not know that anything unusual had happened. A film called Brewster McCloud continued to unreel there.

The blackout left the wax museum on the west side alight, but it hit the marquee and screen at Lowe’s State I and II, stopping Love Story.

The spiral of light on the “Pure Wool” sign in Times Square cast its glow throughout the emergency, but opposite it the swirl of neon smoke curling from the yards-long Kent cigarette blacked out—no smoking.

Power is distributed to the city on a checkerboard grid, and many people and places found that they were sitting on the black squares. At first, dwellers untouched by the failure gazed out at buildings a few yards away, where the only light was the occasional gleam of a match or a cigarette lighter. The contrasts softened later. Instead chunks of brightness and blackness in the moonless night, there were towers of light next to others emitting only the warm, dim glow of candlelight.

The temperature—weather beacon atop the Mutual of New York Tower functioned during the power-out but it seemed to be subject to mild electrical fits. At 9:50 p.m. it flashed the right time, but it gave the temperature as 3:30 (instead of 30 degrees).

Above Fiftieth Street, places that didn’t need any were prodigal with light. A deserted Daitch-Shopwell supermarket was day-bright with fluorescent candles. In a store nearby, sun lamps kept bagels hot. The first word continued to chase the last word around the electric sign that spins along the brim of the hatbox entrance to the Paramount Theater at Columbus Circle.

An M104 bus moving along East Forty-second Street, headlights slicing the darkness, seemed a fitting symbol of the crisis. The fluorescent tubes in its front half were on but others were out and the rear of the bus was shadowed. Rain fell in twisting sheets in the light-cones of auto headlamps.

A curious and especially inconvenient combination of dark and light affected the Commodore Hotel. The closed and empty shops along its street level were ablaze, but the hotel’s face was otherwise entirely dark, from lobby to roof. Guests were stranded high in their hotel rooms. Some could look down and see cops with flashlights directing traffic, the rapid motions creating quick-fading coils of light.

Tad’s on Forty-second Street was all dark inside, but steaks were kept sizzling over the charcoal pit. Plumes of fire sent big orange streaks flashing across the frosted window, making the place look from the outside as if it were being gutted by fire.

The façade of Grand Central Terminal was lighted, including the red and blue face of its clock, but across the street a Horn and Hardart Automat, with an “Open All Night” sign in its window, closed during the blackout.

Across the way, in the terminal, blackness prevailed for a time in the passages. As some newsmen groped to interview bemused passengers, the lights for television cameras pierced the dark interior. To cover a blackout for television, you’ve got to have plenty of light. [Grid]

Philips, pp. 45–8.

During the blackout, aboard one train, a man who called himself Lord Echo got everybody to join him in calypso songs; two hours later astonished rescuers found 50 passengers dancing in the aisles.

Lofland, p. 170.
Sometime after three in the morning, in section after section of the city, signs of a world coming to life again registered in little whirrings and tickings, faint and then full.
Brox, p. 245.

The police blamed widespread use of air-conditioners for the 1965 blackout. The New York Times: “The heavy drain of air-conditioners was said to be a major cause of these local failures.”
Basile, p. 228.

The following day, the headline of an Italian newspaper read: “New York Cancelled by Darkness.”
Brox, p. 245.

WWII Blackout, Brownout, Eclipse

Christmas tree sans lights in Madison Square 1942: carolers sang out beneath it in a forestlike darkness.
Caldwell, p. 279.

In Foley Square the thirty-two story Federal Building had a pyramidal roof covered with gold leaf; because this glinted on moonlit nights, black paint was daubed onto it.
Ellis, Darkness, p. 559.

At the Navy’s request, Times Square signs, including the news ‘Zipper’ on the Times Tower, are extinguished at night above street level (although the man in the Camel cigarette sign will continue throughout the war to emit rings of Con Ed steam as the man dons a uniform, changed periodically to vary his service). People have drawn blackout curtains to minimize the light that silhouettes merchant ships leaving the port of New York for Europe.
Trager, p. 532.

At 10:33, air-raid sirens pierce through the chaotic drone of Times Square, bringing the usual tangle of traffic to a complete stop and sending drivers, passengers, and pedestrians alike for the cover of designated bomb shelters. “With horns silenced and other noises stilled, an eerie quiet settles on the streets, deserted except for policemen and a few defense workers,” says the New York Times. “It lasts until the first wailing note of the all-clear was heard at 10:43 A.M. and then within seconds the city bustles back to life and New Yorkers go about their affairs as if nothing unusual had happened.”
Greenburg, pp. 48-9.

The cloud of manmade darkness that has hovered over various parts of the metropolitan area during the last few weeks settled last night upon eight square miles of the lower Bronx, where 935,000 persons cooperated in the latest blackout drill. In a night so bright that the moon coated countless apartment house windows with silvery luster, nearly one-fifth of the borough showed what it could do in case the dread drone of enemy places sounded overhead.
Trager, p. 532.

Blackout precautions: any lamp visible from outdoors had to beam downward. Anyone living above the fifteenth floor of a skyscraper with lights visible from the sea had to douse them or hide them behind blackout curtains. Streetlights had crews daubing their globes with black paint to block light.
   Caldwell, p. 278.

People don’t realize it but, when they move around in the dark their speech is softer. The roar of traffic had dulled: a third of the city’s cabs were off the streets, grounded when their drivers volunteered or drafted. [Sound]
   Ibid., p. 278.

Traffic lights were covered in metal masks with narrow slits for the red and green signals to show through… Car and taxi headlights wore hoods or “eyelids” so that the light they cast would shine down… Light bulbs in trolleys and subways were dipped in black paint with just their necks exposed.
   Diehl, p. 121.

Dimout unlit signs appeared, made of quarter-sized sequins stitched onto painted block letters (these made their debut and survived into the 1980s, reaching their tawdry best when the sequins began falling off).
   Caldwell, p. 6.

When the all clear was sounded at 9:50 P.M. and the lights came on, they had been doused long enough to give people’s eyes time to adjust to the dark. Chemical changes in the retina had not yet occurred. In Times Square, almost immediately after the drill, voices rose above the noise of traffic starting up, and dance music leaked out of nightclubs. Crowds poured out of the entryways and up the subway stairs and moved steadily along the streets once more. As the lights came on in hotels and shop windows in traffic lamps winked red and green through the rain, the crowd cheered.
   Brox, p. 225.

It left the Empire State Building girdled with two thin belts of light.
   Conrad, p. 257.

In 1973, Richard Nixon called for the dimming of nonessential lighting such as advertisements and all decorative Christmas lights, both public and private, including the lights in New York City’s Times Square. “It’s very sad to be a party to darkening a city so renowned for its lights—it’s just heartbreaking,” the municipal service administrator for New York City commented. “But it has a psychological effect, because it’s difficult to get someone to turn down his thermostat if he sees lights blazing in a public space.”
   Brox, p. 252.

After the 1973 oil embargo, American industry crashed; giant firms like GM, whose names had always defined the Square, lowered their profiles and put their fire signs out. Huge billboard niches went dark, and empty spaces opened up in the Square that no one had ever seen… In Times Square: the swimming fish in the Wrigley sign, the peanuts that endlessly tumbled from a Planters bag, and the glowing Sunkist sunburst all froze into stillness and went dark. The Camel billboard, now unlit, nevertheless still puffed out his five-foot smoke rings (actually heating steam), which floated out over the darkened square. Outside, the hulking buildings shouldered themselves broodingly into a space once made airy and ebullient by moving lights. [Advertising]
Caldwell. p. 278.

In the city's diurnal power tide comes a low, after the main factory motors have slowed and thousands of machines are off. With daylight saving there is a longer slump before the normal nighttime current is turned on. The giant power units idle for a while.
Reisenberg, p. 99.

The physical paraphernalia of light, from the lamppost to the gasworks or the power plant, became permanent daytime reminders that a visual newfound land was being charted every evening.
Sharpe, p. 2.

The external change in the city itself was profound. Within the darkened alleyways of the financial district, people lost their sense of day and night: just as they lost the occasional glimpse of the sky which makes the worst routine bearable. In the new subways they lost even the sight of the sun over the roof tops of Manhattan, which had once been theirs from the ramshackle elevated roads. Nature in its most simple form, the wonder of the morning and the night, was missing from the metropolitan routine.
Mumford, Empire, p. 32.

This great crucible of modernity was plunged into darkness by a total eclipse of the sun in January 1925. Some 10 million people in New York and New England saw the eclipse on that day. Lovecraft recalled the eclipse in a letter of 1932: "In 1925 (when I was in New York) some of us tramped up into the cold of northern Yonkers to see the January eclipse."
Haden, p. 150.

ECLIPSE PUTS CITY IN DARK AND MILLIONS WATCH IN AWE... WIPING OUT OF SUN STRIKES GAZERS AS THREAT FROM SKIES
NY Evening News, N. pag.

January 1925 looking across at the city's towering black monolith-like skyscrapers, from the height of a raised aqueduct, and seeing New York as if it were a sunken city risen from the bottom of the ocean, with semi-darkness all around and the brightest stars shining suddenly above.

Night

The city after dark is a snare, a canvas, a foreign land, a fantasy, a stage.
Sharpe, p. 32.

City often entered by night.
Reisenberg, p. 205.

I have been one acquainted with the night.
Sharpe, p. 29.

Now the nights of one period are not the nights of another.
Neither are the nights of one city the nights of another.

To banish night so that artifice could reign supreme.

The moral laxities of the dark.
Strunsky, p. 698.

The decked-out city of night ostentatiously burned its candle at both ends.
Sharpe, p. 2.

In the country the darkness of night is friendly and familiar, but in a city, with its blaze of lights, it is unnatural, hostile and menacing. It is like a monstrous vulture that hovers, biding its time.

“Daytime” activities—the constant construction and demolition; the influx of immigrants, industries, and capital.

A nocturnal semiotic arsenal that no other city could match.

The proliferation of skyscrapers began to change the topography of the city itself, as their lights broke the ceiling of darkness that in cities had hovered at the five-story level since the Middle Ages.

Public and private experiences shade into each other; even the most dreamy nocturne hints at the brassy world it renounces, while even the brightest lights may become mirrors to the secret desires of anonymous crowds or hidden observers.

Names of paintings with nocturnal themes: Sunday Night on 40th Street; Stars on Sixth Avenue; 3 a.m. in the Sun Office; Police Station Lodgers–Madison Street; Easter Eve, Washington Square; Sunset On West 23rd Street Night on the El Train; Night Windows; Nocturne in Grey and Gold: Chelsea Snow.

The light-driven editing of the nocturnal landscape after 1900 effectively dematerialized the night city, destroying any sense of depth or perspective. It became a self-canceling concatenation of messages, an “ethereal abstraction” that in its sheer size and complexity transcended the human capacity for comprehension. Whereas the natural sublime dwarfed and chastened human spectators, and the technological sublime exalted the human mastery of natural forces, this “unintended” electrical sublime of commercial light managed to tear viewers in both directions at once. In so doing, it created a “disembodied spectacle with an alluring promise of personal transformation” that “urged the viewer to merge the scintillating landscape into the self.”
You have traveled in the course of the night from the meticulous to the slime.
McInerney, p. 3.

Streetlight

Night is abolished.
Still, p. 297.

I raise my head and look at the deserted street below—the pools of light under the street lamps, the tops of the parked cars, the square patterns of the cracks in the sidewalk—and there is a cleanliness and orderliness to things.
Conroy, p. 175.

Everything is stripped naked by the dispassionate glare. The glare is everywhere, and nowhere a shadow. Each building stands there like a dumbfounded fool with wide-open mouth, and sends forth the glare of brass trumpets and the whining rumble of orchestrations. Inside is a cloud of smoke and the dark figures of the people. The people eat, drink and smoke. [Reflection] [Glass]

In its glare, my shadow is vividly cast on the wet pavement.
Ellis, Psycho, p 163.

Although the rectangles of light on the cobblestones are far from regular, their repetition invokes a kind of urban talisman.
Rock, p. 287.

And the lamps of the city prick my eyes.
Lowell, p. 36.

Second Avenue, south of 14th Street, was deserted after sundown. One of the few sources of illumination, was the row of spotlights shining down on the sidewalk from the East River Savings Bank branch between 6th and 7th streets.
Berman, Calling, p. 27.

Nights, after the lighting-fixture and restaurant-supply stores have rolled down their metal sliding doors, the avenue is deserted, lit only by the thin yellow glow of streetlights and of traffic slowly making its way downtown.
Lawson, N. pag.

Watching the illumination of the streetlamps progress up Fifth Avenue, he commented, "Probably there is a man at a switchboard somewhere, but the effect is like destiny, and regularly each night, like the stars, we have the lighting up of the Avenue."
Sharpe, p. 130.

Appearances are deceptive—and Fifth Avenue is so imperfectly lighted.
Ibid., p. 164.
The glow of street lights punctuates the growing darkness, and the city seems to flat in silence in the shimmer of light reflected on the wet pavement.

Rock, p. xix.

Blue light from outside angles through the large windows to spill on the waxed wooden floor.

Conroy, p. 44.

just a faint light over the sill coming in through the curtains from a streetlamp

Wojnarowicz, p. 185.

The Caddy floats over the downtown streets. You can tell you are moving only by the passage of lights across the tinted windows. Some of the lights have dim halos and others spill crystalline shards into the night.

McInerney, p. 172.

Looking up through the limo’s sunroof, spacing on the sweeping patterns spotlights are making on the black buildings above and around us.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 164.

Electricity

The old 19th century gaslight had made everything at night seem as if lit by a gauzy and romantic twilight.

Haden, p. 62.

Straight scream of electric arcs.

Galwey, p. 420.

The dirty night gay light height and rope.

Roche p. 405.

Electric lights glare against a huge zodiac sketched upon a poster.

Jolas, p. 473.

Electrification is a symptom of violent mobility.

Conrad, p. 131.

Electricity is New York’s protest against the demoded restrictions of night.

Ibid., p. 132.

The electrified city abolishes the difference between day and night.

Ibid., p. 77.

The city’s electrification is explained by the pornography and pathology of metaphor: lust, Dalí exclaims, keeps the buildings alight and warm. [City as Body]

Ibid., p. 146.
You get dressed thanks to electricity, on the streets there is electricity, the buildings are bathed in electricity.
Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 47.

manufactured light
Sharpe, p. 9.

Lights flicker from the opposite loft Dylan, “Visions.”

near the base of this building there appears a semi-circular assortment of lights:
“pneumatics of lights”
“chains red light”
“rack of lamps”
— adjoining a sign for — an “American dish”

Unlike sunlight, limelight has, more or less, the qualities of neon. Sunlight has been around for at least a few billion years, while a neon light lasts a few months or, used sparingly, a few years.
Mueller, p. 256.

I remember walking at night in Chelsea with Bill during the depression, and his pointing out to me on the pavement the dispersed compositions—spots and cracks and bits of wrappers and reflections of neon-light—neon-signs were few then.
Denby, p. 2.

the sins of streets are hidden in a mist / Pale yellow, shot with topaz, amethyst.
Hall, p. 622.

the neon shapes / that float and swell and glare / down the gray avenue between the eyes

The secrets of the night are simultaneously pried open and clamped shut by the tireless ubiquity of electric light. As the light renders public everything it touches, it confers on it an unsought stage presence, indifferently bestowing significance in all directions.
Sharpe, p. 282.

The city was one long banner of light that sparkled and scintillated in the crisp night air, paling even to insignificance a moon of harvest splendor.

Objects that are dark by day incandesce at night. In the afternoon the Singer tower is a gray smudge; in the evening it wears a cap of electricity.
Conrad, p. 243.
The incandescence of its lights, its fancied liquidity.
\textit{Ibid.}, p. 74.

The harsh jazz of the jagged skylines is muted by a velvet curtain of darkness painted with a silver river and bespangled with innumerable points of lights.
Sharpe, p. 201.

Little dots and glimmers of light in the tall buildings ahead.
Donleavy, N. pag.

The rain in Lola’s hair reflected a thousand lights, each one shimmering separately on its deep-toned background.
Spillane, p. 311.

the glimmer of a young girl’s platinum blonde hair
Federal Writers, p. 292.

Spurning the grimy pavements with their feet, the sun making rainbows on their vigorous hair.
Atkinson, p. 40.

The symbolic instant of light coming up in a face as the coin is dropped in the subway slot and the turnstile jerks.
Federal Writers, p. 422.

Sit looking through this polished window at the lights changing. In this cathedral of a city. Where the skyscraper organ pipes trumpet.
Donleavy, N. pag.

In the dim light of one bare bulb hanging from a rusted tin ceiling, the old Mee Heung Chow main Corporation, on Mott Street, was quiet.
Kinkead, p. 17.

New York’s subway cars and subway stations use left-hand threads in the electric-light bases. This discourages bulb snatchers from going after them for home use.

In that fleeting moment when the road cut out of the rock opens mirage-like onto the New York skyline before disappearing into the neon unreality of the Lincoln Tunnel.
Maffi, p. 19.

Androgynous girls manipulate electrical switches of morning stars!

The night was dark, the air dry and cold. The whole city was lighted up. If you have not seen it, you cannot know or imagine what it is like. You must have had it sweep over you. Then you begin to understand why Americans have become proud of themselves in the last twenty years... The sky is decked out. It is a Milky Way come down to earth; you are in it. Each window, each person, is a light in the sky. At the same time a perspective is established by the arrangement of the thousand lights of each skyscraper; it forms itself more in your mind than in the darkness perforated by illimitable fires. The stars are part of it also—the real stars—but sparkling quietly in the distance.
Corbusier, p. 90.

It really is white, and there really is a feeling that it’s brighter than day on it, since it’s light all day, but this road is as bright as day and, what’s more, it’s against the background of darkest night. The light of the street lamps, the light of the darting advertisements, the light of the glowing window displays and the window panes of the never-closing shops, the light from lamps illuminating the huge daubed posters, the light bursting out from the doors of cinemas and theatres as they open, the racing light from the cars and elevated transport, the light from underground trains flashing under your feet in the window panes along the pavements, the light of publicity messages in the sky.

Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 52.

On each floor a single bare 22-watt circular fluorescent tube, known as the Landlord’s Halo, radiated a feeble tubercular-blue glow upon the walls, which were Rental Unit Green.

Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 17.

It’s so cold in Tower that everything—the air, the sounds revolving around us, the racks of CDs—feels white, snowed in. People pass by, moving on to the next register, and the high-set fluorescent lighting that renders everyone flat and pale and washed out.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 98.

The Astor Library closed at sundown because it had no artificial light.

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 90.

Thousands work there under artificial light.

Reisenberg, p. 17.

The sliver of artificial light on Broadway, deep down among the cold, blank, moonlit buildings, is an electric sunrise, proceeding in the opposite direction from the actual dawn, which first catches the peaks of the buildings and only later—if at all—reaches the gouged crevasses of the streets.

Conrad, p. 81.

My hole is warm and full of light, Yes, full of light. I doubt if there is a brighter spot in all New York than this hole of mine, and I do not exclude Broadway. Or the Empire State Building on a photographer’s dream night...

Sharpe, pp. 304–5.

Outside, more light, some of it artificial, opens up the city.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 193.

Light, light and light. You can read a newspaper, and what’s more you can read your neighbour’s—and in a foreign language, too. It’s bright in the restaurants and in the theatre centre. It’s clean on the main streets and in the places where the bosses or the aspiring bosses live.

Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 52.
The trip to New York only took thirty minutes, and as they flew around the glazed fluorescent curves of the Holland Tunnel, a false promise of daylight around each bend drew them on.
O’Connell, p. 295.

The gleam of the overhead bulbs is as steady as the sun in a cloudless sky.
Philips, p. 6.

The city’s light is votive offering, not commercial enticement.
Conrad, p. 73.

The lighting-up of cities boldly advertised their advance into the future.
Ibid., p. 131.

The light burns out at the foot of 23rd Street, 22nd Street, 21st, 20th, 19th.

The slow lights of barges.
Wojnarowicz, p. 133.

The lights on the bridges went off, and so did the red light in the lantern of the lighthouse at the north end of Welfare Island.
Maxwell, p. 3.

Shadows, Sun, Daylight

Seeing things from such a steep height that faces are obscured and objects supplanted by the shadows they cast.
Conrad, p. 105.

Buildings sliced across, sometimes half eliminated by the disposition of light.
Ibid., p. 83.

The “second life” of shadow and vagrant movement.
Kozloff, n. pag.

He sat on the line where the sun and the shade met.
Hapgood, p. 151.

During the day if it got too hot in the sun he would go to the shady side of the street and though it was warm he was still able to wear his coat.
Hollander, p. 164.

All afternoon the shadows have been building
A city of their own within the streets
Tomlinson, p. 137.

The shadows on the mirror-like streets, the dark mass of the overhanging buildings, overpowered perhaps, their imminent imagination and moved it for the first time with a touch of the sublime which makes the whole world forgetful.
Hapgood, pp. 369-71.
The vicinity of Broadway and Manhattan Street, where the enormous Black iron arch of the Subway viaduct casts its shadow all over the cars that run west to Fort Lee Ferry and north to Fort George and south into the deserted regions of lower Broadway.

Strunsky, p. 703.

Look back and see a thin shaft of light, ethereal, tremulous, almost of faery, and that pillar of light will be Broadway canon between its brick walls still clad in shadow.

Ibid., p. 705.

Festoons of sun pulverizing shadows.

Przybos, p. 328.

The utilitarian imperative which covers blocks with sunless tenements and no less sunless apartment houses, makes night and day indistinguishable under the overhanging scarps of lower Manhattan.

Federal Writers, p. 12.

Sunlight drifts over New Jersey cliffs illuminates sparse architecture and great warehouses and piers and ships all shapeless from the blinding show making it all look like India with orange postal card skies and you expect a huge herd of cows to be flat-walking over the river surface—where’s the Taj Mahal!?

Wojnarowicz, p. 33.

The sunlight, dazzling and beautiful, almost unreal against the shady streets of Brooklyn Heights.

Ibid., p. 28.

A man can live a fairly complete life in New York without having to go out into God’s clean sunlight at all.

Walker, p. 41.

Sunlit yearnings of Ultraist Lucifers crystallize electric charges!

The slanting yellow light on 125th Street.

The sun rose behind the Gowanus Parkway lighting the oil filmed water of the Gowanus Canal and the red bricks of the Project.

O’Connell, p. 294.

ozone stalagmites / deposits of light

A dim light came from windows crusted with dirt.

Campbell, Darkness, p. 93.

Gray light and sense of tension.

McDarrah, Artist’s, p. 10.

That part of the loft always held a kind of awe for me. Plus it being a kind of underworld sort of light with an enormous shaftway window that always appeared like an aquarium. I was never sure what time of the day it was, although after a while one could tell the time according to the subtle and soothing tranquil light in the space.
   Tucker, p. 194.

dim lights from tree-filled building, grainy light like a film made of New York traffic Expressway sounds
   Wojnarowicz, p. 111.

the dim light from the courtyard windows easing across the surface of the wall
   Ibid., p. 160.

The light leaves the flat roofs of the ghetto along the river.

When black clouds cap the city and light blazes along its canyons, a daytime lighting load is suddenly superimposed on the industrial demand.
   Reisenberg, p. 98.

Traffic Lights

The traffic lights cause vertigo.
   Corbusier, p. 101.

Wait for the red light to change.
   Donleavy, N. pag.

Uselessly clicking from green to red, red to green.
   Finney, p. 115.

Green yellow and red. And a breeze blows my dreams abandoned down the street.
   Donleavy, N. pag.

Red lights are now seen as street ornaments, a year-round extension of Christmas decorations, rather than as instruction.
   Brook, p. 144.

Color is the scream emitted by expiring light.
   Conrad, p. 239.

neon blinking traffic light
   Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Guessing the rhythm of the changing traffic lights correctly, catching the crest of the “green wave.”
   Lobas, Taxi From Hell, p. 32.

Traffic signals in New York are rough guidelines.
   Hamann, p. 35.

They set down their feet, they walk green, red; green, red Every two minutes, the green lights of the numerous traffic signals go off, and the red lights come on. Within two minutes, the green signal again lights up on the traffic lights, while the side roads are barred by the red lights on the street corners.
Sharpe, p. 336.

Red light. Bell.
A block deep four ranks of cars wait at the grade crossing, fenders in taillights, mudguards scraping mudguards, motors purring hot, exhausts reeking, cars from Babylon and Jamaica, cars from Montauk, Port Jefferson, Patchogue, limousines from Long Beach, Far Rockaway, roadsters from Great Neck... cars full of asters and wet bathingsuits, sunsgined necks, mouths sticky from sodas and hotdawgs... cars dusted with pollen of ragweed and goldenrod.
Green light. Motors race, gears screech into first. The cars space out, flow in a long ribbon along the ghostly cement road, between blackwindowed blocks of concrete factories, between bright slabbened colors of signboards towards the glow over the city that stands up incredibly into the night sky like the glow of a great lit tent, like the yellow tall bulk of a tentshow.
Dos Passos, p. 217.

The electric lights on lampposts come on at night and go off during the day: thus they mark and regulate night and day. The attached traffic and pedestrian light signals likewise regulate traffic, telling one to go, or to wait before going. These signals consist of two colors, red (dark) and green (light), with the transitional blinking yellow. “Without rigid adherence to predictable routines a large compact society would scarcely be able to maintain itself. The clock and the traffic signal are symbolic of the basis of the social order in the urban world.”
Wirth, p. 74.

The taxis and private cars fluttering about like jeweled flies.
Dreiser, p. 3.

Varied, layered tones mount gradually from traffic-torn streaks of light at street level.
Sharpe, p. 125.

seeing two bright spherical yellow lights like car headlights anchored on jersey cliffs sending vertical lines of light, gold breathin' light across the surface of the dark rolling river, like two railroad track lines laid out into some hobo’s heaven
Wojnarowicz, p. 118.

Three colored lights passed overhead, very high up and in the cluster, blinking. There were also lights strung through the park at intervals, and on East End Avenue, where taxicabs cruise up and down with their roof lights on. Nobody wanted them. As if they had never in their life shot through a red light, the taxis stopped at Eighty-third Street, and again at Eighty-fourth, and went on when the light turned green. East End Ave. was as quiet as the grave. So were the side streets.
Josephy, pp. 400-1.

Any New Yorker fairly sound in mind and limb will step without a tremor into the most frightening whirlpool of traffic rather than wait a few seconds for the lights to change in his favor. At the three or four intersections where pedestrian lights have been installed, and the lights flash out Walk or Don’t Walk, the crossers-over wriggle under the restraining arms of the policemen stationed there to save their lives, and dart like snakes between the onrushing cars. A movie short taken at any busy corner would show how deep-rooted is this particular form of our madness. It seems to be considered a little shameful to wait till it’s legal to cross.

Atkinson, p. 22.

I don’t want to live in a city where the only cultural advantage is that you can make a right turn on a red light.

Allen, Annie Hall, N. pag.

Color

The frenetic vermilion or vitriolic yellow of Coney Island, the silvery alarm of electricity shining from the Brooklyn Bridge, or the sulphurous effulgence which burns inside skyscrapers.

Conrad, p. 133.

Coney Island is carnal vermilion and acidulous neon lemon: colors are the siren’s blandishments.

Ibid., p. 239.

“I used the intact purity of the vermillion,” Stella said, “to accentuate the carnal frenzy of the new bacchanal and all the acidity of the lemon yellow for the dazzling lights storming all around.”

Sharpe, p. 193.

Behind the red crosses that mark the hospitals and the green globes of the police stations, shifts change.

Caldwell, p. 2.

Great gold and scarlet streets.

Dreiser, p. 7.

The pavement is white, the figures black.

Conrad, p. 105.

I Saw the Figure Five in Gold (1928)

Charles Demuth

Among the rain and lights
I saw the figure 5 in gold on a red firetruck moving tense unheeded to gong clangs siren howls
and wheels rumbling through the dark city.

Williams, “Great Figure,” p. 174.
The river was smooth, sleek as a bluesteel gunbarrel. The shadows between the wharves and the buildings were powdery like washingblue. Masts fringed the river; smoke purple chocolatecolor fleshpink climbed into light.
Dos Passos, p. 125.

Color enters in violently whenever money is involved. To call, you cry out; to cry out effectively in the uproar of the crowd, you use signs colored red, yellow, green, and blue. Magic incantation on Broadway.
Corbusier, p. 110.

Oranges blazed on the carts; calico was for sale, clocks, sweet potatoes, herrings, poeted geraniums and galoshes.
Gold, p. 16.

Tool & Die Works red and Subway 1-Beam green and Restaurant Exhaust-Fan Duct Lint gray.
Wolfe, Painted, p. 82.

hum-colored cabs
Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 8.

On a particularly deformed strip of the low Sixties around Second Avenue there is a building that’s constructed of a material which cannot be identified. It’s a color between that of a dead salmon and a dead rat.
Remick, p. 320.

The colors of the neighborhood lighten as limestone replaces brownstone.
Hawes, N. pag.

The Hell Gate section of the Triborough Bridge was a necklace of sickly-green incandescent pearls.
Davis-Goff, p. 175.

A bright green spot moved swiftly down the East River late yesterday afternoon. The spot—a light, minty green—covered an area much larger than a tennis court. Borne along by ebb-tide currents, it slid under the Queensboro Bridge, swirled past the United Nations and Bellevue Hospital on its course to Wall Street and the harbor.
Philips, p. 41.

In the spring morning it seemed that every ash barrel was green-wreathed with spinach. [Garbage]
Cowley, p. 49.

New York’s landscape is red, brick red or brownstone red. Manhattan spring is red.
Jones, Dynamite, p. 176.

The rose-red of sunrise, of infant day, the fiery blood-shot red of the setting sun, flushing towers spires with crimson. But this rose glow soon fades to gray. To me this is a gray city, massively gray, abstruse, elusive. At moments it is a clear gray, understandable, friendly. It has one mood today and another tomorrow. The one who seeks its colors may walk from an avenue into a side street and find the spectrum swiftly change. New York is a palette on which all colors appear sharply by turns and then they go. But it’s dominant note, at least, at last, is gray.

Reisenberg, p. 189.

The tints of color in the passing throngs. Fanning themselves with the cool riches on sale.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Screen changes suddenly into luminous colors of every description. The new moon tumbles down. A planet burns rose against a poster for United States Rubber.

Jolas, p. 472.
x - Air

Air Conditioning

Summer of 1948—last summer before air conditioning.
Caldwell, p. 279.

The introduction of residential air-conditioners tended to close up windows, especially in summer; television offered spectacles more distracting than any real sidewalk view; and automobiles, rather than subways, buses, or walking, became an increasingly common means of transport, even in much of New York. Life moved away from the window, away from the stoop, away from the street, as middle-class city dwellers withdrew into secure, climate-controlled interiors.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 233.

We shall have to change the habits of a lifetime when domestic air-conditioning arrives… And how blessedly silent the interior will be! It may vibrate as a ten-ton truck rumbles by, but of the clatter of garbage cans, the backfire of a passing car, the din and bustle of the street—not a vestige. Like dirt amid germs, the din and bustle of the street will be filtered out. [Sound] “Air Conditioning,” p. 11.

In terms of the way it changed the ecology of the city, the invention of the air conditioner is to the twentieth century what the elevator was to the nineteenth.
N. cit.

In the days before residential air-conditioning became common, summer life in the city naturally gravitated toward open windows, or to outdoor spaces like fire escapes.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 233.

The 1950s idea of cool: “The demise of city night life, done in by television and suburbamism: a bland affront to unrestrained human nature, a nature stripped of the ‘heat’ of natural passion. The wan gentility of an East Side art movie theater had replaced late, hot nights of dancing. In 1955 Gilbert Millstein writes: ‘Maybe it’s all these new buildings breeding more of these cool Brooks Brothers cats. They’re too cool’” He refers to the totally air-conditioned skyscrapers then turning Manhattan’s grubby Sixth Avenue into a gentrified Avenue of the Americas where businessmen in suits could fancy that they were hip.
Ackerman, p. 150.

The air shaft: a primitive attempt at air conditioning.
Reisenberg, p. 139.

The city’s first centrally air-conditioned apartment house is completed at 23 East 83rd Street. Air is drawn in at the roof and circulated through the interior ductwork.
Trager, p. 512.

In 1936, 400 Park Avenue becomes the city’s (and the nation’s) first apartment house to have every room air conditioned.
Ibid., p. 499.
Tiffany & Co.'s store on the southeast corner is the first fully air-conditioned store of any kind.

Macy's installs air-conditioning in 1929.
Whitaker, p. 102.

New York's ice age is brought to a close not by reformers but by inventors. In the spring of 1916, the city's newspapers began carrying large ads for the Domelre electric refrigerator. Promoted as "The Electric Iceman," it promised to deliver "no ice—just cold." Domelre and its successors would not become a basic feature of most New York homes for several decades, but by 1950 the iceman had become as much a relic of a long-ago age as the blacksmith and the lamplighter.
O'Donnell, N. pag.

Air conditioning and soundproofing guarantee that nothing that smells of earth remains to destroy your illusion of flight.
Conrad, p. 264.

In May of 1925, the Rivoli movie theater just north of Times Square becomes the first air conditioned theater, refrigerated with "mountains of ozone."
Ackerman, p. 48.

The Rivoli had "a novel feature... 'olfactory music,' or a system of atomizers which spray perfume—oriental, clover, new-mown hay—and in accord with the orchestra, the screen and the stage settings literally imbue one's senses with the atmosphere of the play."
Basile, p. 111

Roxy's understanding of Fantastic Technology inspires a further intensification of his metaphor: questioning the conventional use of the air-conditioning system—ventilation and cooling—he realizes that this would only add chill to the sunset. With the same maniacal logic that characterized his earlier visions, Roxy then considers adding hallucinogenic gases to the atmosphere of his theater, so that synthetic ecstasy can reinforce the fabricated sunset. A small dose of laughing gas would put the 6,200 visitors in a euphoric mood, hyper-receptive to the activity on the stage. His lawyers dissuade him, but for a short period Roxy actually injects ozone—the therapeutic O3 molecule with its "pungent refreshing odor" and "exhilarating influence"—into the air-conditioning system of his theater. Combining super-time with super-health, Roxy defines the definitive formula of the metropolitan resort with his slogan, "A visit to Radio City Music Hall is as good as a month in the Country." [Cinema]
Koolhaas, pp. 210-1.

A long foyer led to six sets of bronze-trimmed doors. Passing through them, patrons entered a grand rotunda. (Roxy threatened to fire any of his ushers who referred to it as "the lobby.") [Cinema]
Miller, Supreme, p. 272.

"Fifteen degrees cooler inside," said a sign in letters encrusted in icicles.
N. cit.
The air-cooling requires a careful and scientific arrangement of all pipes and ducts so that drafts along the floor may not discomfort ankles in sheer silk stockings or other drafts be felt by sensitive heads and throats.
N. cit.

Instead of offering melodramas and air-conditioning alone. For a price, a hot and weary pedestrian would be permitted to sit comfortably in the cool darkness. If this appears too unexciting, the theatre could introduce sound effects such as the splashing of a fountain or the trilling of a mountain stream. There might even be a musical accompaniment and, even, if the theatre was generous and enterprising, appropriate pictures: an ice-breaker at work, Niagara Falls in midwinter, last year’s blizzard, yesterday’s mob at Coney Island.
Milo,. N. pag.

Spent air conditioning fluid from Rockefeller Center is used to build bombs during WWII.
N. cit.

Carrier’s “Igloo of Tomorrow” at the 1939 World’s Fair. Scantily clad women (“snow bunnies”) shoveled manufactured slush in 90 degree heat. Carrier closed the igloo for the season with the arrival by dog-sled of the fur-clad Mayokok family, who ostensibly planned to “hibernate” there until the Fair reopened in 1940... The exhibition received its greatest publicity on August 23, 1939, when the company gathered seven hundred hay fever sufferers in the igloo to demonstrate the therapeutic value of air-conditioning. As reported in the August 24 New York Times, allergists selected eighteen sneezers for a demonstration of how to enhance the “air-conditioning function” of their noses. Said the Times: “The contestants could not sneeze in the Carrier Building, so the contest took place outdoors.”
Ackerman, p. 101.

Haven’t we accomplished air-conditioning indoors? All we have to do is to accomplish the same thing on a larger scale outdoors. What are we waiting for?
N. cit.

The outline of a far-reaching plan for a gigantic artificial climate center that would assemble in one spot all the mineral and thermal waters of the world, and would enable the people of New York to enjoy the advantages of all the world’s exclusive Summer resorts and spas... The artificial climate center would also contain medical baths of all kinds—hot air, electrical vapor, etc... It also was proposed “to create an artificial beach of fine sand n the verge of a vast pool, warmed by an artificial sun and atmosphere, the whole establishment to be situated in the city itself, close to the main thoroughfare and open all the year around.”

In this “climate paradise for the millions” the visitor would be able to bask in the sunshine of an “artificial Florida,” or breathe the dry air of Arizona and New Mexico, or enjoy the benefits of the seashore or mountain tops of Carlsbad, Saratoga Springs or other famous spas in various parts of the world. While the climate would be manufactured artificially, with the proper requirements of humidity, air pressure, ultra-violet radiation and temperature, the natural mineral waters of the world’s spas would be available in bottles.
An igloo far greater than any ever built by Eskimos, with a temperature cooler inside than out and with the "aurora borealis" glowing on schedule on the ceiling of the dome, while outside the sun beats down on a simulated snow exterior, will squat as part of the exhibit of the Carrier Corporation, maker of air-conditioning equipment... Two 80-foot thermometers, one reminding the World's Fair visitors of the temperature out of doors and the other indicating the comfort afforded in the air-conditioned interior, will flank the igloo.

"70-Foot Igloo," p. 25.

A refrigerating engineer invents the phrase "weather manufacturing" for this process; technically, it is "air conditioning."
Curci, n,pag.

Making climate to order was begun originally as a means of assuring quality of goods, not for the Summer comfort of humanity. Then it occurred to industrialists that if employee had the atmosphere of a perfect day about them always they would have clearer minds, be affected less by fatigue during the afternoon, make fewer mistakes and reduce accidents. So in the last five years the theatrical interests, taking up the idea, have been remaking climate Indoors both Summer and Winter, to their own great advantage and the comfort of the public. They have been paid in increased attendance. It is an open secret that one large New York motion picture theatre which last year installed a $50,000 air-cooling plant charged it off as paid for at the end of the Summer season through the increased attendance.
Ibid.

To manufacture weather at home, in the office or on a train, there must be a way of handling the atmosphere as if it were a tangible fabric.
N. cit.

A revolutionary possibility is suggested by the fact that efficient operation of an air-conditioning system in a building implies the permanently closed window.
Talman, p. 4.

The finial-towered profile of Lower Manhattan, crowned with the aeries of corporate chairmen, was obliterated by the advent of air conditioning: thick, fat buildings, harboring vast interior reaches for the bulk corporate population, were possible. In contrast, the RCA Building was planned on the notion that no occupant should sit more than twenty-seven feet from a window and that air conditioning was provided by opening the window.
White, Physical, p. 74.

The slenderness that made these towers so elegant necessitated their smallish office floors, limited in size by the requirement (in those pre-air-conditioning days) to have every desk no more than twenty-eight feet from an operable window.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 133.

In 1902... air conditioning was in operation, making one Brooklyn printing plant owner very happy. Fluctuations in heat and humidity in his plant had caused the dimensions of the printing paper to keep altering slightly, enough to ensure a misalignment of the colored inks. The new air conditioning machine created a stable environment and aligned four-color printing became possible. All thanks to the new employee, Willis Carrier, at the Buffalo Forge Company, who started on a salary of only $10.00 per week.

Bellis, p. 12

Minetta Brook, Minetta Lane. NYU thought to put Minetta Brook to work for air-conditioning but the stream was found to be temperamental, not to be counted on in rainless periods.

Berger, New York, p. 7.

The air-conditioning is spotty. Sometimes the windows are open, driving the stale and fetid air around in an illusion of cooling. When the air-conditioning works, it is worse. You walk from steambath to refrigerator, as if changing continents, and your perspiration seems to freeze within your shirt, a phenomenon previously known only to Antarctic explorers.

Gopnik, p. 192.

A rush of cool air greeted me; and though the day was one of the hottest of late June, I shivered as I crossed the threshold into a large apartment whose rich and tasteful decoration surprised me in this nest of squalor and seediness.

Lovecraft, Magic, pp. 29-34.

Last weekend, the Long Island Expressway smouldered with traffic jams and anyone who couldn’t talk about “going out to the beach” crawled into some Manhattan corner and turned on the air conditioner.

Bladford, p. 12.

Breathed with air conditioning and jammed with heat-producing machines.

Talbot, p. 17.

My first direct contact with an air-conditioner came only in the sixties, when I was living in the Chelsea Hotel. The so-called management sent up a machine on casters which rather aimlessly cooled and sometimes heated the air, relying, as it did, on pitchers of water that one had to pour into it. On the initial filling, it would spray water all over the room, so one had to face it toward the bathroom rather than the bed.

On any given summer afternoon, you can stroll down any residential street and be dripped upon by someone’s condensation (A/C Pee).

Ibid., p. 2.

Look up; most of the windows are occupied by droning metal posteriors. Surrounding you is an unmistakable, comforting hum that issues from battalions of compressors.

Ibid., p. 2.

In the cool September nights, the noise of air conditioners extinguished for another year, windows thrown open to catch the breeze from the Hudson River.

Blandford, p. 32.
The air around us, the atmosphere that just sits here, is filled with us. Intimacy and anonymity, the two New York poles between which our lives endlessly oscillate, continue to produce their own kind of field. We live in it. We can’t ride the light. There isn’t really any light to ride. But we can share the air.
Gopnik, p. 314.

New York restaurants now have a new thing—they don’t sell their food, they sell their atmosphere. They say, “How dare you say we don’t have good food, when we never said we had good food. We have good atmosphere.” They caught on that what people really care about is changing their atmosphere for a couple of hours. That’s why they can get away with just selling their atmosphere with a minimum of actual food. Pretty soon when food prices go really up, they’ll be selling only atmosphere. If people are really all that hungry, they can bring food with them when they go out to dinner, but otherwise, instead of “going out to dinner” they’ll just be “going out to atmosphere.” [Food]
Ibid., p. 159.

The air in our shop and luncheon room is changed every eight minutes; in our kitchen it is changed ever four minutes.
Grimes, p. 215.

That solid gold air is there to stay, and if its superheated values continue to rise as anticipated in the coming half century Manhattan could someday replace Fort Knox.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 55.

In some parts of New York City the air is worth nearly a dollar a whiff.
Talese, p. 86.

“Everybody is buying light and air these days,” Mr. Kyle said.
Ibid., p. 91.

William James’s perception of “the air [as] itself an object” was translated in the 1920s into the commodification of the air as a marketable product, as radio frequencies, airplanes, and skyscrapers.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 434.

For once the air has been cold but scrubbed clean.
Bladford, p. 11.

Matisse said, “New York has the clear, saline air of Venice.”
McDarrah, p. 9.

The night paints inhaling smoke and semen.
Gooch, p. 195.

Hot, full of tinkle and perfume and smoke.
Dos Passos, p. 28.

Does he breathe as yet the intoxicating, perfumed vapor, or only the common outer air?
Irwin, p. 226.

Savoring the airy weight of the environment itself, and not least, its variable influences on the body.
Manhattan’s heavy air... shadowing the explicit acts, daring desires, and unconscious mediations of a multitude of night wanderers.
Peretti, p. 6.

The air in the air shaft lies dead, a column of vitiated gas, dank below, but slightly less poisonous than its upper, richer strata. Dull gray calcimine, chipping off, falls to the bottom like last year’s unmeltable snow.
Reisenberg, p. 139.

I happen to like New York, I happen to like this town / I like the city air, I like to drink of it
Porter, “I Happen to Like New York.”

We think as little about air as we do about water.
Atkinson, p. 227.

Moving slowly sweating a lot
I am pushed by a gentle breeze outside the Paradise Bar on St. Marks Place
O’Hara, Collected, p. 336.

Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt still lives in vast splendour low down on Fifth Avenue, though the surrounding skyscrapers blow such draughts down her chimneys that many of her sitting-rooms have become impossible.
Beaton, New York, p. 291.

New York buses have sliding windows that do not open in summer because of air conditioning and cannot be opened in winter because of heating.
Bladford, p. 111.

At every intersection a fresh breeze from Twelfth Avenue, a concrete bank of the Hudson River, refreshed horse and rider, cooled the hot black engine that gave warning hoots behind them.
Puzo, p. 4.

The gorge above Broadway is spotted with gigantic, glittering snowflakes, laced with white streamers that weave and intertwine as though moved by the invisible hands of the People of the Air.
Irwin, p. 41.

“I didn’t want to paint anymore, so I thought that the way to finish off painting for me would be to have a painting that floats,” Warhol said to his friends. “So I invented the floating silver rectangle that you fill up with helium and let out of your window.”

Warhol had been interested in weightlessness since 1964, when he approached Billy Klüver about designing a floating light bulb, perhaps in homage to the Jasper Johns’s drawing of a light bulb that Warhol bought in 1960. Klüver was the ideal person to think about weightlessness, for he was trained as an engineer, worked in collaboration with artists, and understood what was technologically possible.
Klüver determined that it would be impossible to create a light bulb that floated, but he came up with an alternative plan, using a material called ScotchPak that had been recently developed by Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing. An extremely thin silver material, it could be sealed with the use of an inexpensive heat machine. The interior could be filled with helium. Andy loved the idea. It reminded him of a balloon, and ScotchPak was inexpensive (50 cents for 20 inches, and in bulk he could get 700 yards for $400). He bought a secondhand heat machine and was ready to produce his farewell work.

On October 4, 1965, while Pontus Hulten was visiting New York to plan the Warhol retrospective in Stockholm, a group of people gathered at the Factory and played with the possibilities of creating a huge silver balloon. Warhol thought of it as a farewell to art. Equipped with his omnipresent tape recorder, Andy interviewed Billy Klüver, who said, “I’m an engineer in the daytime, making Infinite Sculpture for Stockholm using land design.” Pontus Hulten held the ScotchPak while Billy Klüver cut it and helped seal it. Then they took the freight elevator to the roof and filled the silver tube with helium. Warhol asked what the floating sculptures should be called. Pontus Hulten suggested calling them “superstar,” and Andy said the sculpture should be as big as the roof, “as big as Elvis?”

The first Silver Cloud was a forty-foot tubular balloon that looked like a snake. Andy grew excited about the process, peppering the conversation with exclamations about its beauty. “Oh, look at it, it’s right out of a movie. With the movies everything is called Up-Up movies, Up art.”

The wind was light that day, Billy Linich shot several photographs, and then with bells ringing in the background, Warhol released the silver form into the air. As it floated up, Warhol wondered if people might take it as a delegation for Pope Paul VI, who was arriving down the street at the United Nations that afternoon at 3:40 to declare, “No more war, never again war!” Then as a helicopter went overhead, Warhol grew afraid it would cause a wreck. Most of all he was afraid the police were going to come and investigate. Maybe, he suggested, it would be wise to have a remote control for the silver balloon. Far outweighing his anxiety was the sheer exhilaration of the event. “It is the first art sent into space,” Pontus Hulten said to him. Of all the Happenings that Hulten had seen, he added, “I think this is the only thing that ever really happened.”

Andy returned to the Factory and telephoned Genevieve Charbon to tell her that the launching was “one of the most exciting things that ever happened. Up to God, all the way up.”

Watson, Factory, pp. 244-5.

Tying down loose space.
Franck and Stevens, p. 1.

Ceremonies for the opening of Jones Beach State Park are disrupted by a sudden windstorm that drives sand into Robert Moses and Governor Al Smith’s eyes. Temperatures on that day—August 4—are well below normal at 70 degrees.
Trager, p. 779.

The wind was out of the southeast and smelled of the sea, fifteen miles away on the other side of Long Beach and Far Rockaway.
Maxwell, p. 15.
I take a look to see how the trees of Central Park are coping with all these violent gusts. By now the wind is furious, bending the trees backward and sending whirlwinds of leaves in the air. A sight to behold.

Maffi, p. 60.

City stir—wind on eardrum—
Gammel, p. 232.

The river wind lifts yesterday’s paper the length of a block.
NPA, p. 52.

Newspapers revolving and winging in corners of carriages.
Conrad, p. 232.

In the narrow chasms between the buildings, a kind of adventurist wind hums through the chimneys, tears down signs and grumbles about them, attempts to knock you off your feet, and then flees, unpunished and uncaught, for miles through the ten avenues that slice across Manhattan from the ocean to the Hudson.

Mayakovsky, America, p. 47.

Walk east crosstown. Wind biting and raising whorls of grit and paper scraps. See the sky blown blue somewhere far out over Flushing. As a little boy I thought it was some strange big toilet bowl. Where giants took their craps.

Donleavy, N. pag.

East chilling wind bursting out of the crosstown streets. Blown over Brooklyn.

Ibid.

The shrill mountain wind, moaning outside the windows of a skyscraper room.

N. cit.

Suddenly it’s warm out, and there’s a big wind blowing. The wind is soft. It makes the Bronx feel like a Caribbean island.

Trebay, p. 158.

Breezes blow in the little park when no breezes seem to stir in the hot streets.

Atkinson, p. 215.

New York’s sometime fierce crosstown winds are emblematic of the world city as a cyclonic zone, drawing in so many different currents.

McCourt, p. 75.

A sunny, windy day on the lower East Side of New York. The year is 1942.

Conroy, p. 167.

The river was dirty and coming towards me in the wind, a smooth chest trembling with sweat.

Wojnarowicz, p. 137.

Now just windy noise clashing with silence of night, big tin sheets banging in the wind and dense burnt breezes flowing from shattered windows and twisted roofs, the stars above, the winter still riding over the mouth of the structure, ships still passing ominously in the darkness, lights of the Jersey cliffs burning and winking, a huge cigar-like cloud of steam tilting from the lip of a factory smokestack, the neon red cup of coffee dripping continuously there against the snow-covered rocks of the coast.

Things change when the air changes.

In the very middle of the city, we can feel the fluid of life to be present. We know the space beyond Staten Island hill is no more filled with the elixir than the air about the buildings.

Rosenfeld, p. 471.

If you’ve got a scratch, deluge yourself in iodine: the New York air is chock full of all kinds of muck that will make sties grow, and cause any scratches to swell up and fester. It’s the air that is lived off by millions who have nothing and are unable to go away anywhere.

[Body in the City]

Mayakovsky, America, p. 56.

Breathing fetid air I whiff boozy bourbon emanating from the Brevoort’s riotously noisy basement room behind a window opened.

[Smell]

Later, we wandered toward Fifth Avenue, where there was a parade. The flags in the wind, the thump of military bands and military feet, seemed to have nothing to do with war, but to be, rather, a fanfare arranged in my personal honor.

Capote, p. 43.

The air above ground wasn’t very clean, but it smelled like a million bucks after the fog in the Zero Zero.

Spillane, p. 220.

Dirt, Soot, Dust

When Mount Pinatubo erupted in the Philippines in 1991, the volcano spewed particles into the atmosphere, causing unusually red sunsets in NYC for more than a year.

Mittlebach, p. 6.

Much of the dust around New York has come from volcanoes and may stay in the air under suspension for as long as three to six years. New Yorkers, without realizing it, have been breathing dust from the Krakatoa volcano in the East Indies in the form of minute crystals carried in the upper currents of air.

Besides humidity there is a great amount of dust in the atmosphere of the city, and since each drop of rain contains a speck of dust as its core, it is best to photograph the city right after a rain.

[Photography]

Reisenberg, p. 213.
The air is filled with a pungent smoke, and crowds of black specks whirl in the sudden gusts of wind as the waif create a blaze from the bonfire of wooden boxes on which matting and newspapers are piled.

N. cit.

Soot and smoke that spread a coat of gritty grime, confined to windowsills in the winter, over walls and furniture.

Caro, p. 557.

After crossing Lafayette Street roaring with trucks and delivery wagons there is a taste of dust in her mouth, particles of grit crunch between her teeth.

Dos Passos, pp. 240-41.

Dull daily labor cloaks the people in dust.

Lichtenstein, p. 513.

The blackface disguise of city soot.

Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. 16

I have noticed that others object to a slight quaver of air, when I have a perfectly clear and rational conviction that the air is foul.

Hapgood, p. 192.

Anxiety floats in the mote-filled air of the lofts.

McDarragh, Artist's World, p. 10.

New world. Soot lies smearing the soles of my feet.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Smoke into the metallic mauve metropolis.

intersecting spirals of "clear smoke" and "dark smoke"

The deluging rains appeared to be confined to the Middle West and the Northwest, while at New York the sky simply grew thicker and seemed to squeeze out moisture in the form of watery dust.

Serviss, p. 96.

Moisture that condenses by heat changes on windows, which smear the contours of object and people.

Kozloff, n. pag.

The dirt and grime of the train windows.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Smoke from garbage dumps.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Up Fifth Avenue. Through the flood of yellow cabs. Folk waiting. Doormen’s whistles blowing. People stepping in under the canopies. In thunder wind and lightning. Flashing up the underside of the leaves in the park. The whole city washed clean. Dust and grime down the sewers. All ready for a brand new layer.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Cyclones of ecstatic dust and ashes whirl crusaders from hallucinatory citadels of shattered glass and evacuate craters
Loy, p. 509.

There is, I suppose, a good deal of soft coal still being used, and what has been used during past times of stress seems indelibly to have left a film over the white buildings and even to have taken the edge off the very clearness of the air. The buildings round the Woolworth Tower, seen even from the distance towards Sandy Hook, have no longer their pristine whiteness; they have rather the gray bones that have been long exposed to the air.

Ford, America, p. 52.

Future indoor environments will exclude outdoor noises as well as outdoor dust.

N. cit.

The murk of Queens, the smoky, sullen air interferes with sight and the sun’s nimbus is smoggily discolored.

Conrad, p. 82.

During the heavy smog of 1953, schools closed, flights were cancelled at La Guardia, two ferryboats collided in the harbor; the Yonkers ferry service was suspended; and a rash of rear-end collisions littered the city’s highways. Hospitals were deluged with New Yorkers suffering from respiratory illnesses.

Javits, pp. 111-12.

Private cars, jalopies, Rolls-Royces, and ten-ton trucks, cover the city with carbon monoxide gas. Thousands of taxi cabs records and from their exhaust.

Reisenberg, p. 69.

I’m immortalizing your exhaust, Avenue A bus.

Ginsberg, Collected, p. 744.

Lest we leave back conclusions and weighing this phase of transportation in our process city, the daily dose of carbon monoxide is slight. People, now and then, get a rarefied spiritual as they passed behind a bus; they only gasping cough. It may be, and the wisdom of a divine providence, that’s just occasional gassing of the civilians is beneficial, if not preparatory; a gratis germicidal immunizing treatment, abating bad breath, relieving, and maybe even curing, dangerous deep-seeded complaints. We know that medicine employs lethal drugs, and proper doses for curative ends. Carbon monoxide, given in just the right New York proportions, maybe a great unappreciated blessing bestowed upon us citizens by the age of internal combustion. Auto clotting is now known as “motor play, “tomorrow the disease maybe called “motor and Jesus, “with recommended bleeding into mechanical parks. In another month the traffic doctors made declare it “power paralysis, “calling for amputation before the new production jobs plug the city’s arteries, bringing it to a stop.
Reisenberg, pp. 69-70.

Whirlwinds of dust and newspaper.

The value of polluted Manhattan air is another curiosity that will go down in history.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 53.

The Chrysler Building’s one-time stainless steel begins to dull under coatings of city soot, its tin gargoyles, taken from some mythical five-and-ten, mellow to a bluish hue.
Reisenberg, p. 95.

Sky, Fog, Clouds

I have learned to love its sky. In the low-roofed cities of Europe, the sky crawls along the ground and seems tamed. The beauty of the New York sky comes from its being raised so far about our heads by the skyscrapers. Pure and lonely as a wild beast, it stands guard and watches over the city. And it isn’t just a local protection: you feel that it stretches right out over the whole of America; it is the whole world’s sky.
Sartre, We Have Only This Life to Live, p. 123.

Today the sky is so blue it burns.
Brainard, p. 414.

The sky is still above, breathing heaving Washington Square. The city bounces—horizontals and verticals—vertiginously.
Jones, Modernism, p. 224.

Across Park Avenue the flameblue sky is barred with the red girder cage of a new building.
Dos Passos, p. 185.

“Am absolute pip of a day. Look at that blue sky! The clouds! Seventh Street! Look how vivid the colors are!”
Conroy, p. 167.

East Fortieth Street is filled with gigantic, new gray-and-black buildings—if the sky is blue on any day, there is no way to see it.
Hecht, p. 320.

Underlit by the city, the sky is an eerie muddy purple.
O’Connell, p. 295.

Triangles press against the sky, carving it into a dramatic vault.
Rock, p. 370.

The Statue of Liberty was unveiled in thick fog in 1886.
Hawes, N. pag.
Fog in February 1925 embroils the harbor again in sick and guilty fantasy. It blots out the view (nothing can be seen more than “six feet from the window”) and makes of it a phantasmagoria. Crane is kept awake by an assembling orchestra of tormentors, a bedlam of “bells, grunts, whistles, screams and groans of all the river and harbor buoys,” which persuade him that he’s at “the mouth of hell.”

Conrad, p. 234.

Fog’s rollin’ in off the East River bank / Like a shroud it covers Bleecker Street / Fills the alleys where men sleep
Simon & Garfunkel, “Bleecker Street.”

This impenetrable cloudiness settles over New York City like a Grand Bank fog. It imposes ignorance, invites fantasy. That is why there is less information and more misinformation about the history of America’s largest city than about any other important place in the so-called civilized world.

New York has a special interest for me when it is wrapped in fog. Then it behaves very much like a blind person. I once crossed from Jersey City to Manhattan in a dense fog. The ferry-boat felt its way cautiously through the river traffic. More timid than a blind man, its horn brayed incessantly. Fog-bound, surrounded by menacing, unseen craft and dangers, it halted every now and then as a blind man halts at a crowded thoroughfare crossing, tapping his cane, tense and anxious.
Keller, p. 296.

The tan fog of particulate dooky lay low ‘tween the high clouds and barren skyline cenotaphs of New York City.
Sanders, Beatnik , p. 135.

Clouds spoil our European skies. Compared with the immense skies of America and their thick clouds, our little fleecy skies and little fleecy clouds resemble our fleecy thoughts, which are never thoughts of wide open spaces… In Paris, the sky never takes off. It doesn’t soar above us. It remains caught up in the backdrop of sickly buildings, all living in each other’s shade, as though it were a little piece of private property. It is not, as here in the great capital New York, the vertiginous glass façade reflecting each building to the others. Europe has never been a continent. You can see that by its skies. As soon as you set foot in America, you feel the presence of an entire continent—space there is the very form of thought.
Baudrillard, Simulcra, pp. 61-74.

As long cigar shaped clouds sneak over from Hoboken. The storm heading north east across Patchogue, the Hamptons and Sag Harbour.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Cigar of land sitting in the East River.
Donleavy, N. pag.

The sun rose somewhere in the middle of Queens, the exact moment of its appearance shrouded in uncertainty because of a cloud bank.
Maxwell, “Over the River,” p. 3.

On a cloudy morning the sky-scaper district becomes a pattern of slate-colored silhouettes of an ashes-of-roses background.
Irwin, p. 17.

The afternoon was gorgeous, with a sky clarified and starkened by white clouds. The 19th century cast-iron buildings were thrown into handsome relief.

Trebay, p. 78.

A dark April afternoon in Washington Square, pulling New York after us over every portal into strange apartments, through the soft nights.

A gray, grainy vista onto an unmade bed in a room in Queens.

Harris, Diary, p. 63.

Rain

New York in the rain is an extraordinary place.

Wolitzer, N. pag.

There are fewer suicides in New York when it rains.

Talese, p. 16.

A street full of thunder smells of lightening.

ve Poljanski, p. 365.

At Broadway and 110th, the windshield wipers screech as they toss the rain from the glass.

Cook, p. 25.

The cheap rain swings the tinfoil leaves against the bensonhurst wind

Beyond to the northwest a shining head of clouds soared blooming compactly like a cauliflower. Oh if it would only rain. As the thought came to her there was a low growl of thunder above the din of building and traffic. Oh if it would only rain.

Dos Passos, p. 185.

Rain smears the light and washes the long straight lines of the buildings into streaky tears.

Conrad, p. 81.

Alone at night
in the wet city

Imagine a day on Centre Street, overcast and threatening rain; a day though which shuffles flickering tramps like wicks that are dying.

Barnes, p. 305.

the cheap rain
lacquers the pavement

Dahlberg, p. 529.

There were black spots of rain on the sidewalk and I saw him walking briskly through the crowd wearing a tan raincoat over his inevitable brown get-up; I noted with a shock that he was carrying a light cane. This was his afternoon walk, this hurry along with his stick through the gathering rain, and as I was not to meet him for an hour it seemed an intrusion to happen upon him engrossed in his private life.

_{Fitzgerald, Lost, p. 106.}_

As soon as a little rain drizzles down, the lifeless street suddenly turns into a forest of waving hands.

_{Lobas, p. 132.}_

Gentleman with high-piled turban in Times Square cutting through wind-blown rain yesterday with plastic cover protecting the turban.

_{Berger, New York, p. 284.}_

The rain that came down about 10 o’clock temporarily scattered the ravenous crowd but by midnight they had returned... Fifth Avenue was wet and like a mirror of reflections and shadows. It was chilly and unfriendly.

_{Hapgood, pp. 369-71.}_

A slate sky sagging between the tall buildings was spatting the pavements with fiftycent pieces. Men were running to cover with their straw hats under their coats. Two girls had made hoods of newspaper over their summer bonnets. The rain advanced down the street in a solid sheet glimmering, swishing, beating newspapers flat, prancing in silver nipples along the asphalt, striping windows, putting shine on the paint of streetcars and taxicabs. Above Fourteenth there was no rain, the air was sultry.

_{Dos Passos, p. 207.}_

Lightning flickered along the staring rows of dead windows. The rain seethed along the pavements, against storewindows, on brownstone steps... He walked on through Brooklyn. Obsession of all the bed in all the pigeonhole bedrooms, tangled sleepers twisted and strangled like the roots of potbound plants. Obsession of feet creaking on the stairs of lodginghouses, hands fumbling at doorknobs. Obsession of pounding temples and solitary bodies rigid on their beds...

“Golly I’m wet,” Jimmy Herf said aloud. As far as he could see the street stretched empty in the rain between ranks of dead windows studded here and there with violet knobs of arclights. Desperately he walked on.

_{Ibid., pp. 235-6.}_

A metallic cock against a rain-bleared window, with the stormy sky and the smudged downtown towers outside.

_{Conrad, p. 175.}_

Rain could fall onto the stage through perforated pipes and would then be siphoned into a trough and disposed of; steam, fog, and clouds could be exhaled from nozzles in the floor.

_{Ibid., p. 262.}_

The falling water serves to give the entire landscape a certain allure that it doesn’t have when the pavement is dry and the umbrellas are rolled tight in closets. Flowers planted on the meridians of Park Avenue open up and drink, their color ratcheted up to new brightness. Central Park starts to look pastoral, and the water flooding along the gutters on Fifth Avenue creates a Joycean “riverrun past Eve and Adam” effect, or a very least, a pleasing gurgling noise. The rain is like a cleansing sorbet between courses, those courses being spring and summer.
Wolitzer, N. pag.

New York in the rain gives a sense of limited possibilities. New York is largely about limitlessness, and that’s why we live here, but it can also be exhausting. When the weather in the city is good, you’re expected to partake of all the urban delights available... However, when the weather is bad, you are left within the confines of a sub-city, a smaller, wetter version of New York.
Ibid.

New York in the rain: the vision of blurry taxi lights up and down
Lexington Avenue at rush hour, the view of lightning flaring up over Midtown at night, the kid of manageable drizzle that isn’t quite umbrella-worthy, but also can’t quite be ignored.
Ibid.

A heavy summer rainstorm had emptied the sidewalks of Greenwich Village. Shortly after 8:00 p.m., the dark rain clouds gave way to a faint image of the twin towers of the World Trade Center.
Duneier, p. 100.

The storm never quite seems to break, and it’s unsettling. I fiddle about with the papers and books on my desk, try to get some reading done while sitting on the couch, and peer down the street from my fifth-floor window “a New York State of mind,” as Billy Joel would say.
I finally decide to go up onto the roof and watch the battle being waged between the wind and a mass of black clouds (how fascinating, these New York roofs, early in the morning or late in the evening or, at moments like this, when the city skyline takes on the semblance of a storm-tossed sailing ship).
Maffi, p. 60.

The rain began at nine in the morning. Most New Yorkers welcomed it. It had been a dry spring, warm for May, and the big drops splattered down on the pavements and cobblestone streets like some harsh benediction. It was the season’s first thunderstorm. It came from the north, down the funnel of the Hudson Valley, announcing itself in the city with a low rumbling and quick flashes of light... Gutters backed up and made miniature lakes at the curbs.
Bales, p. 1.

The light is fading now beneath a curtain of rain and cloud.
Maffi, p. 71.

In 1950 during a drought, municipal authorities, abreast of scientific developments, hired a rain-maker to seed clouds above the upstate watershed. A large Park Avenue hotel, built on a site where years earlier a brewery had stood with a spring-fed well, brought in a dowser from rural New England, who located the well with his divining-rod. As a result, the hotel was able to restore air-conditioning to the residents whose baths continued to be rationed.
Morris, Incredible, p. 355.
During the long drought in the summer of 1953 I was in the city on a broiling August day. As I walked through the streets I saw fire hydrants pouring forth great streams of precious water. Not giving showers to children, not giving a cooling bath or drink to tired or exhausted people. Just flowing, and the water running in rivers into the sewers. Nobody seemed to notice, much less be indignant or try to turn off the water. Along Broadway at about seven o’clock one evening the water from an open hydrant was up to the hub caps of the parked cars. People looked at the rushing stream at the curb and smiled. It looked so nice and cool.

Atkinson, p. 228.

Divining rods won’t find leaks through twenty inches of pavement.
Berger, New York, p. 77.

When it rains in Manhattan, automobile traffic is slow, dates are broken and, in hotel lobbies, people slump behind newspapers or walk aimlessly about with no place to sit, nobody to talk to, nothing to do.
Talese, p. 15.

Rain ruins the mascara on the eyes of fashion models who cannot find cabs.
Ibid., p. 16.

The only recorded instance of rain on Sutton Place occurred when a scene from a big budget movie was being shot in the vicinity and the script called for inclement weather. The moment the powerful Hollywood director yelled “Cut!” the rain stopped. [Technology]
Leibowitz, p. 102.

The moisture collected on all exposed surfaces—on the roofs, the walls, the pavements—until its quantity became sufficient to form little rills, which sought the gutters, and there gathered force and volume. Presently the streams became large enough to create a noise of flowing water that attracted the attention of the anxious watchers at the open windows. Then cries of dismay arose. If the water had been visible it would not have been terrible.
Serviss, p. 62

And, in the rain, the theme is blue, the blue of gray thunderclouds, the metallic nimbus of rain, and the stamp of white. Usually after a hot spell, late in a midsummer afternoon, blue smoke-like threatening clouds, split by flashes of purple fire punctuated by hard salvos, roll over the dark and lit-up city. The sides of tall buildings on Forty-second Street reflect the lightnings and amplify the crashes. The heat grows momentarily more oppressive. Winds gratefully cool, then eddy through the chasms. People run, and when New Yorkers run en masse, the site is terrifying. Comes the refreshing deluge, and close and terrifying the bolts, amid sheets of pelting water splashing noisily against glistening walls, cascading into streets far down the overflowing sidewalks, washing out choked sewers, flooding basements.
Reisenberg, pp. 189-90.

I pass out again into gleaming streets after spit rain—what a whirlpool I am—they want my corpse to shave and dangle forth.
Jones, Modernism, p. 224.
In the summer it rains—sudden summer rain that hammers against the windowpanes and causes the ailanthus to stagger and shiver in gratitude for having enough water for once in its life. What a change in the weather, as the heavy breathless summer lifts to reveal a new world of freedom—free air, free movement, clean streets and clean roofs and easy sleep. Bianca stares at the rain as it streams down the glass of the window. One drop survives the battering and rolls, all in one place, down the pane.

Brennan, "Bianca," p. 32.

Certain strong winds cause the rain to sweep up the side of a skyscraper from bottom to top instead of from the top down. Windows designed for the natural fall of rain were found to be insufficient. It was necessary to modify them.

Corbusier, Cathedral, p. 66.

Rain streaking through the spheres of lampposts, making the sidewalks and streets and especially the curbsides boil and foam while taxis sail through it all.

Wojnarowicz, p. 147.

The first thing is that no New Yorker wants to pay any attention to rain. We consider rain a nuisance and something to be ignored as much as possible. Most New Yorkers refuse to carry umbrellas, except in a real downpour. Whereas an Englishman considers an umbrella a part of his sartorial make-up and takes one along daily with the pessimistic certainty that there will be rain, the New Yorker will leap into the street while the first drops are already falling and dodge from doorway to doorway in the hope that it is all a mistake. New Yorkers never say, "Well, after all, we need rain." Need rain? What for? The reservoirs may be showing mud at the bottom of their storage beds, crops all over the country may be wilting on stalk and vine, but if rain falls in the City, the New Yorker considers it a personal insult and complains about the dreadful weather.

Atkinson, p. 21.

It's a scary thought that the entire rainfall of New York for a year is not enough to supply New York City with water for one day.

Ibid., p. 225.

A rainy city below. See the Hudson River and the stony steep ridge of the Palisades. And north past a peek of Central Park and over all the Harlem crazy streets. To the sad unsung gothic splendours of the Bronx.

Donleavy, N. pag.

In rain, or when there are mists floating around, it is still more beautiful; the rain becomes golden water; the skyscrapers vanish halfway up, and nothing more can be seen but the haloes of their cupolas suspended in a colored mist...

Berman, Town, p. 124.

The rain starts coming down harder. You wonder if you own an umbrella. You've left so many in taxis. Usually, by the time the first raindrop hits the street, there are men on every corner selling umbrellas. Where do they come from, you have often wondered, and where do they go when it's not raining? You imagine these umbrella peddlers huddled around powerful radios waiting for the very latest from the National Weather Service, or maybe sleeping in dingy hotel rooms with their arms hanging out the windows, ready to wake at the first touch of precipitation. Maybe they have a deal with the taxi companies, you think, to pick up all the left-behind umbrellas for next to nothing. The city's economy is made up of strange, subterranean circuits that are as mysterious to you as the grids of wire and pipe under the streets. At the moment, though, you see no umbrella vendors whatsoever.
McInerney, p. 86.

It is still raining. Getting a cab is a long shot. Knots of people on every corner wave their arms at the passing traffic. You walk down Seventh to the bus stop, where some twenty souls huddle in the shelter. A bus packed with grim faces goes by and doesn't stop.
Ibid., p. 86.

I hit New York in the middle of a rainstorm and drove straight to my apartment to change my clothes and down a bottle of beer. As soon as I finished I grabbed a quick bite in a luncheonette and headed back toward the office. The rain was still coming down when I found a parking space two blocks away, so I hopped a cab to save my only remaining suit.
Spillane, p. 182.

It was raining harder than before, slanting down against the sidewalk, driving people into the welcome shelter of the buildings. Cars were going past, their windshield wipers moving like agitated bugs, the drivers crouched forward over the wheels peering ahead intently. I backed out of the garage, turned around and cut over to Broadway, following the main stem downtown. The Village should have been crammed with tourists and regulars, but the curbs were empty and even the taxis were backed up behind their hack stands. Once in a while someone would make a dash for another saloon or run to the subway kiosk with a newspaper over his head, but if life was to be found in the Village this night, it would be found under a roof somewhere.
Ibid. p. 182.

The wind picked up and began throwing the rain around. The few pedestrians left on the sidewalks were huddled under marquees or bellowing for cabs that didn't stop. Every time I stopped for a red light I could see the pale blur of the faces behind the glass store fronts, the water running down making them waver eerily. All with that same blank look of the trapped when nothing can be done to help.
Ibid. 295.

The rain had turned into a steady drizzle that left a slick on the pavement and deadened the evening crowd.
Ibid. 185.

There was still a threat of rain in the air. Overhead the clouds were gray and ruffled, a thick, damp blanket that cut the tops off the bigger buildings and promised to squat down on the smaller ones. From the river a chill wind drove in a wave of mist that covered everything with tiny wet globules. Umbrellas were furled, ready to be opened any instant; passengers waiting for buses or standing along the curb whistling at taxis carried raincoats or else eyed the weather apprehensively.
Ibid. 186.
Every winter there’s a subversive theoretical cyclone de Torre, “Mental,” p. 460.

Wintertime in New York town / The wind blowing snow around / Walk around with nowhere to go / Somebody could freeze right to the bone / I froze right to the bone / New York Times said it was the coldest winter in seventeen years / I didn’t feel so cold then.
Dylan, “Talkin’ New York.”

Bob Dylan: “You could sit on a bar stool and look out the windows to the snowy streets and see heavy people going by, David Amram bundled up.”
Strausbaugh, p. vii

In midwinter in New York Mei-Lan-Fang introduced his traditional Oriental art to large groups of delighted Occidentals; ten thousand fish, including an eel four feel long, were removed from the Central Park reservoir; Babe Ruth signed a contract with Col. Ruppert to play ball with the Yankees for two more years at a salary of $160,000; the Europa came into port with an ocean record; Webster Hall, on East Eleventh Street, the scene of so many radical balls, burned down; Mrs.
Patrick Campbell lectured on Beautiful Speech and the Art of Acting; Anthony Mortelito stabbed the head keeper at Auburn Prison seven times with crude, improvised knife; William Howard Taft died; La Argentinita presented the authentic beauty of Spanish dancing to an unappreciative Broadway audience; Charles Schwab’s historic Riverside Drive chateau was sold to an apartment-house builder; the Havemeyer collection of paintings and art objects was opened to the public at the Metropolitan Museum; four thousand persons, trying to get into the Natural History Museum to see a showing of a film developing the Einstein theory of relativity, overturned cases, broke windows and doors, and injured one another; a “modernistic” Childs restaurant was opened on Lexington Avenue; Maurice Chevalier sang Dits-moi, ma mere; the news-reel at the Embassy, a moving picture theater, informed the public pictorially that Sydney Franklin, a Brooklyn boy turned matador, had been gored by a savage bull in the Plaza de Toros at Madrid; the planet Pluto was discovered; Toscanini conducted the Philharmonic Society in the Bacchanale from Tannhärzer, the Ride of the Valkyries, and the Traumarsch from Götterdämmerung (this last in commemoration of the death of Frau Cosima Wagner) in so superb a manner that hoary-headed music lovers searched their memories in vain for comparisons; Marc Connelly gave God back to the world in The Green Pastures; forty thousand communists, gathered peacefully in Union Square, were trampled down in Cossack fashion by the horses of the mounted police, while children were knocked over the head with clubs; a jury of twelve men was unable to agree concerning the pornographic aspects of a play entitled The Pleasure Man by the ebullient Mae West and as a consequence the defendant regained her precarious liberty; and in an Italian restaurant on Macdougal Street ten canaries, accompanying a performance over the radio, sang in lusty unison the Overture to William Tell and negotiated the high notes in the sextet from Lucia.

The social life of the metropolis also continued. In mid-winter in New York, as in other capitals of the world, a great many dinner, theater, and luncheon parties were given. Guests were invited to formal and informal dances to observe prize-fighting, wrestling, dance marathons, and six-day bicycle races. There were musical entertainments and extended yachting parties which embraced cruises to the West Indies or even to the Pacific, by way of the Canal and the glamour of Panama City. In these respects, perhaps, New York lie did not differ to any great extent from the of other great cities during the season, but in another respect, the matter of cocktail parties, since the laws were passed prohibiting the sale of liquor, it could be said that more were held in one day in Manhattan than in a month elsewhere. A many with an extensive acquaintance, therefore, could drink steadily in New York from the beginning of cocktail time until eleven in the evening without any more expense than that entailed by car- or cab-fare.

Van Vechten, pp. 170-2.

A certain kind of winter evening—six-thirty in the Seventies, say, already dark and bitter with a wind off the river, when I would be walking very fast toward a bus and would look into the bright windows of brownstones and see cooks working in clean kitchens and imagine women lighting candles on the floor above and beautiful children being bathed on the floor above that.

J. and I went up to a street in Harlem just as the winter sky was turning black. Darkened windows with thin bands of watchful light above the sills. Inside, the halls were dark and empty, filled only with the scent of dust.

roaring winter dusks of Brooklyn
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

At night in the cold winter moonlight, around 1943, the city pageantry was of a benign sort. Adolescents were sleeping and the treat was only in the landscape, aesthetic. Dirty slush in the gutters, a lost black overshoe, a pair of white panties, perhaps thrown from a passing car. Murderous dissipation went with the music, inseparable, skin and bone.

Snow

It’s the day before February 17th it is not snowing yet but it is dark and may snow yet dreary February of the exhaustion from parties and the exceptional desire for spring which the ballet alone, by extending its run, has made bearable

O’Hara, p. 257.

Trucks are salting the streets.
Christopher, p. 203.

It was beginning to snow. The flakes are gildedged where they pass the streetlamp. Through the plate glass the Cosmopolitan Cafè full of blue and green opal rifts of smoke looks like a muddy aquarium: faces blob whitely round the tales like illassorted fishes. Umbrellas begin to bob in clusters up the snowmottled street. The orator turns up his collar and walks briskly east along Houston, holding the muddy soapbox away from his trousers.
Dos Passos, p. 255.

The sky above the cardboard buildings is a vault of beaten lead. It would be less raw if it would snow.

Ibid., p. 262.

It was a snowy night on the Staten Island ferry as O'Hara traveled in the wintry dark to the reading.

Gooch, p. 386.

I remember seeing Auden that winter, on Second Avenue, near St. Mark's Place, shuffling through the snow in his bedroom slippers.

Lesueur, N. pag.

Men in the snow who profit from nature's inclemency by signing on to clear the streets.

Conrad, p. 182.

When day breaks after a heavy snowfall, Manhattan wakes up to the clanging of shovels on sidewalks and the spatter of salt on newly cleared and shiny concrete. By 11 o'clock as luminous snowbanks line the roads, the neighborhood creeps out to inspect the wonder left behind by the dark night.

Bladford, pp. 111-2.

A taxi driver, inspired by the first snowfall brushing its gleaming strands along the lamppost and lighted windows, says, "Let's make believe we're in a gondola—I'll sing to you." He does, in full Sicilian voice and olive-oil quavers.

Feininger, New York, p. 72.

There is nothing like a good snowfall to make a New Yorker feel pleased with life. Nothing cheers like the thought of all those wheels turning helplessly out in the suburbs, that land of watered lawns and summer pools. Here in the white, hushed city, everything the heart desires is but a shuffle away along those sidewalks which shopkeepers and doormen are required by law to keep spanking clean.

Bladford, p. 112.

A glimmer appears through the transom overhead, where someone is lighting the night. It sends a thrill of possibility through the watchers. On the old hats and peaked shoulders snow is piling. It gathers in little heaps and curves, and no one brushes it off. In the center of the crowd the warmth and steam melt it and water trickles off hat-rims and down noses, which the owners cannot reach to scratch. On the outer rim the piles remain unmelted. Those who cannot get in the center, lower their heads to the weather and bend their forms.

Dreiser, p. 229.

Winter days in a great city bring some peculiar sights. If it snows, the streets are at once a slushy mess, and the transaction of business is, to a certain extent, a hardship. In its first flakes it is picturesque; the air is filled with flying feathers and the sky lowery with somber clouds. Later comes the slush and dirt, and not infrequently bitter cold. The city rings with the grind and squeak of cold-bitten vehicles, and men and women, the vast tide of humanity which fills its streets, hurry to and fro so as to be through with the work or need that keeps them out of doors.
But these men are a bit of dramatic color in the city’s life, whatever their sufferings. To seem them following in droves through the bitter winter streets the great wagons which haul the snow away is fascinating, at times pitiful. I have seen old men with white beards and uncut snowy hair shoveling snow into a truck. I have seen long, lean, red hands protruding from undersized coat sleeves, doing the same thing. I have seen anemic benchers and consumptives following along illy clad but shoveling weakly in the snow and cold.

Dreiser, p. 233.

Snow had fallen and the city was transformed. The bumps and excrescences of the streets—cars, skips, trash-cans, dogs—had been evened out. The white blanket was the great unifier, obliterating all distinctions of color and putting the brakes on the pace of the city. Traffic did move, but slowly, with headlights picking out the fat white flakes that continued to fall.

Brook, p. 93.

Blizzards are an invitation to anarchy. When the city breaks down, and a blizzard inevitably shreds all the routines of getting about, it’s a joy to see it with its guard down. The mechanisms of bustle and traffic are snagged. The webs of communication fray or snap as buses break down, stations are closed, and the airports shut down for two days. The inhabitants of the city gleefully take possession once again, stepping onto the quiet streets, walking unchallenged down the middle of a road that would normally be clotted with traffic. On the cross streets cars are stuck, and there’s a whirring of tyres skating ineffectually over hard-packed snow that turns to ice as the rubber compresses it. Fluffy clouds of breath rise from the scarved heads of helpers trying to push a recalcitrant car away from the kerb. A gust of wind drives a few flakes onto the tongue as one opens one’s mouth to speak or breath, and a delicious freshness invades the moist caverns of mouth and throat. There’s laughter too at the prospect of the disruption to come. Offices will close early or not open at all; the radio waves the next morning will be thick with lists of school closures.

Ibid., pp. 93-4.

Gray snow, which matches the sky, is falling.
The gray snow, as soon as it has fallen, begins rising in exhalations.
Wilson, “Thoughts,” p. 476.

Don’t forget that a low-ceilinged town is quite different from a high-ceilinged city like New York, all cluttered up with bricks and mortar and hideous glass skyscrapers. New York is really quite meager in a snowstorm.
Vreeland, DV, p. 171.

A snowfall sparks sudden crackling flashes from the third rail of the El tracks.
Conrad, p. 132.

Snow on the elevated train roaring past down the street. Enter here. Warm and comforting. Snow melting inside my shoe.
Donleavy, N. pag.
New York’s lovely weather hurts my forehead here where clean snow is sitting, wetly round my ears. Berrigan, p. 740.

It was the night of the great snowstorm. The streets of New York, even in the dark, were vaguely white, but there was nothing vague about the depth of the snow for those persons unfortunate enough to wade about in it, nor was there any doubt in the minds of the three men in the café of a little hotel near Washington Square that it was comfortable to be where they were. Hapgood, p. 205.

Space heaters in the Chrysler Building’s steeply sloping roof to stop the formation of mid-winter ice which could slide off into Lexington Avenue with lethal results. Moorhouse, p. 52.

Pennsylvania Station: “They seemed to bring with them the smell of the snow falling in Seventh Avenue. Or perhaps the other people who had entered before them had done it, bringing it with them in their lungs and exhaling it, filling the arcade with a stale chill like that which might lie unwinded and spent upon the cold plains of infinity itself. In it the bright and serried shop windows had a fixed and insomniac glare like the eyes of people drugged with coffee, sitting up with a strange corpse.

In the rotunda, where the people appeared as small and intent as ants, the smell and sense of snow still lingered, though high now among the steel girders, spent and vitiated too and filled here with a weary and ceaseless murmuring, like the voices of pilgrims upon the infinite plain, like the voices of all the travelers who had ever passed through it quiring and ceaseless as lost children.” Faulkner, p. 609.

A freezing wind descends upon the city from the north. A change in the weather. Maybe even snow. I realize it has gotten late and start walking faster. The north wind blows its way along the streets and the odd snowflake drifts groundward: the evening is beginning to take on a spectral note. Over the next few days the city will change face. It will be bathed in a new light, in new tonalities, sounds and scenarios. It will be bewitching and cruel. The whiteness of the snow and ice will make outlines and volumes stand out, and it will cover and erase. But in the freeze it will also expose men and things... Maffi, p. 86.

My first snowfall. I kind of liked it. The first day the snow’s very pretty, a blanket of coconut flakes sprinkled over awnings and cars. But then it gets all grimy and hardens to ice on curbs, in puddles, on stoops. Barnet, p. 226.

With this snow cleansed air and a fresh change of people. Donleavy, N. pag.

Traffic crawling through the deepening snow. Abandoned cars little mounds of white. Ibid.
Snow had been falling. After the snow came rain, then frost. I stood at my window and looked out at Broadway. The passersby half walked, half slipped. Cars moved slowly. The sky above the roofs shone violet without a moon, without stars, and even though it was eight o’clock in the evening, the light and emptiness reminded me of dawn. The stores were deserted. For a moment, I had the feeling I was in Warsaw.

Singer, p. 279.

I stood at the window for what must have been half an hour, watching the big flakes whirl past the glass, watching Central Park turn into an etching as the black branches loaded up with white, watching the humps and depressions that marked paths and streets level off and disappear.

Finney, pp. 115-6.

Nothing moved outside now but the snow in the wind, and the silence was complete. Staring down into Central Park, I wondered suddenly if it had also snowed in January 1882.

The air was sharp in my lungs, and snowflakes occasionally caught in my lashes, momentarily blurring the streetlamps just ahead, already misty in the swirls of snow around them.

Ibid, p. 121.

If Mayor Wagner won’t allow private cars on Manhattan because of the snow, I will probably never see her again.

O’Hara, p. 393.

The blizzardy wind made the banner flap over sidewalks so thick with snow that pants legs were whitened to the middle of the shins. It was sieving downward on East 10th near Avenue B, obliterating footprints in a few seconds, and one’s attention was turned from the mystery of the city to the mystery above the city.

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 485.

For hours John walked the snow, crisscrossing all the streets from Houston to 12th and First Avenue to C. He who never felt down was feeling a rare gulch of total depression.

Ibid., p. 497.

East Side snow slush. Brown rivulets of frosty-freeze surge over the curbs, wherefrom strange bubbles slowly rise amidst a flotage of straws, dog dook, can lids, wrappers, plus, sunken as in quicksand, a slashed chair of wettened plaid, its stuffing the color of a dirty old football, covered with sooty white, and at the curb’s edge: rows of dingy tan tire tracks like zippers on a vast spattered cloth.

Ibid., p. 498.

The ground is white with snow.

It’s morning, of New Year’s Eve, 1968, & clean
City air is alive with snow, its quiet
Driving. I am 33.

Berrigan, p. 163.
When it first starts to snow, the round tops of the garbage cans become dramatically white before anything else gets the notion. If you look down on the sidewalks from above, the tops appear to be white holes punched out of the still-dark pavement.

Binzen, N. pag.

Cold

Battling the city's itchy flames, which rage even during winter, Weegee's firemen change into anthropoid icicles. As they aim their hoses, stalactites harden on their helmets and the collars of their uniforms.

Conrad, p. 291.

This happens in January on a brilliant, cold afternoon.

Trebay, p. 5.

I walked on Madison and it was cold in the shade and warm in the sun. (Tuesday, October 29, 1985)

Warhol, Diaries, p. 688.

He covers his fields like a fine mist, he's in his home in New York City, he's behind me, it's wet and cold but I like it, like the way it numbs my fingers, makes them white and red at the knuckles.

Wojnarowicz, p. 200.

Shivering the air has crept behind the next street corner.

Parland, p. 346.

Rawness, sunshiny rawness down the end streets of the city.

Jackson, Empire, p. 679.

crossing Saint Mark's Place face cold in air tonight when that girlish someone waving from a bicycle turned me back on.

Berrigan, p. 148.

Heating, Radiator

It is wonderfully hot in New York in winter. Temperatures of 75 and 80°F are not uncommon. Outside, of course, it is miserably cold. But after November, the outdoors is merely something one crosses en route to some other indoors.

Bladford, p. 111.

It is divisive, this heat. People who work in warm offices and go home to warm apartments meet only those who exist in similarly warm boxes. In winter, the middle classes hibernate.

Ibid., p. 111.

It's freezing and the heat's not coming up.

Warhol, Diaries, p. 536.
The boiler was broken and it was freezing in there. And I want to take the key away from those two bathrooms outside my office because every other minute somebody’s going in and out and I can’t stand it, the constant production of peeing all day. (Wednesday, November 7, 1984)

Ibid., p. 613.

And there’s a radiologist in the building next door to me. He just bought a million-dollar machine and they had to knock a wall out to get it in, and I keep wondering if the radium stuff can get to me, because we share steam heat. Everybody says the machines are “foolproof.” (Thursday, April 11, 1985)

Ibid., p. 641.

Spring

Spring excited us. The sky was blue over our ghetto. The sidewalks sparkled, the air was fresh.

Gold, p. 16.

It’s showing signs of spring. A heavy rain the like of that washes the winter away. Won’t be long now till we’re scalding fried eggs on every street corner.

Donleavy, N. pag.

It’s just another April almost morning, St. Mark’s Place

Berrigan, p. 488.

This morning, as predicted by the WQXR weather bulletins, there was precipitation and the wind chill factor eased. In short, it has been wet and warm. With the last vestiges of yellow-stained snow and grime encrusted ice washed away some weeks ago now, the denizens of West 86th Street have emerged from hiding to greet their corner of the world.

[Radio]

Bladford, p. 28.

Spring in New York is as attractive as spring anywhere else, but her appearance has a peculiar effect on the inhabitants of Manhattan Island. Every true Englishman returns to England to enjoy the English spring, but when the buds begin to burst and the birds begin to warble and trill in New York parks every real New Yorker longs to travel. Hamish then was quite within the tradition when, strolling up Madison Avenue on a heavenly spring day, he was filled with nostalgia for the countries he did not belong in. The Sheffield plate and Georgian silver in one window, the Venetian glass in a second, the Russian samovars in a third, and the Czechoslovakian peasant blouses in a fourth, made him sign in turn for Mayfair, the Grand Canal, the Kremlin, and the Moldau, and it occurred to him that he should immediately book his passage to one of these places.

Van Vechten, p. 237.

It was in the spring and there was a heady, vernal fragrance from Central Park, for in New York the advance of the seasons is not forgotten but intensified. Autumn thunderstorms, leaf fires, the primeval stillness that comes after a heavy snowfall and the randy smells of April all seem magnified by the paving’s of the greatest city in the world.
As I watched Frank and Larry heading toward Broadway and Tenth Street, with Frank resolutely leading the way, I suddenly became aware of the weather. It was especially beautiful, almost balmy, and since it was still the shank of the evening and I felt horny—nice weather always had that effect on me when I was younger—I saw no reason why I shouldn’t go cruising.

Lesueur, p. 298.

Walking uptown in the mauve eight o’clocks of early summer evenings and looking at things, Lowestoft tureens in Fifty-seventh Street windows, people in evening clothes trying to get taxis, the trees just coming into full leaf, the lambent air all the sweet promises of money and summer.

And so this year there was no spring. One moment it was chilly and then over night the limp, humid heat of summer sank into the city.
Bladford, p. 28.

Summer

Summer in New York is a season passed in hell.
Conrad, p. 291.

On the first hot, humid day of summer, when the air is so wet that it almost is impossible to breathe and the sun turns tinted hair a faint shade of orange, the ladies of New York vanish from its streets. They linger in air-conditioned apartments and scurry between icy stores where they do battle over skimpy T-shirts in which they will later freeze. The sound of their summer greeting is of high-heeled shoes clicking impatiently across marble floors and white patent bags snapping shut.
Bladford, p. 181.

With daylight saving, daylight dining begins, and an orchestra plays the March from Aida at night in the Lewisohn Stadium. Everybody is sunburnt. Those who must remain in the city think only of trying to keep cool. Sweat pours from the forehead, neck, waist, temples and arms, as in a steam-room; and several times a day the shirt must be changed. Children lie naked in the streets, waiting for the watercarts to come past and spray them. Journalists fry eggs on the pavement. People go to the cinema not so much to see the film as to feel the violent chill of the air-conditioned movie-houses (and very likely to come out with pneumonia). Another cold bath is drawn; even the ice-cream no longer tastes cool, and there is nothing for it but to leap from the window. Every Saturday and Sunday, eight hundred thousand people come to bathe at Coney Island, reached by subway in half an hour.

I went to Coney Island with Jean Cocteau one night. It was as if we had arrived at Constantinople—the electric bulbs silhouetting the minarets, domes and turrets, illuminating the skeletons of the scenic railways and Eiffel Towers. The passengers on the roller-coasters, rending the air with their concerted screams, were so many muezzins calling the azan. Cocteau, like many great personalities, manages to create a world of his own wherever he goes, so vivid and personal that those with him can share the surprises of his impressions; and one wondered why the popcorn had never been put to use as confetti before, and why one had not realised that it must have been he who designed the waxwork booths of magic and squalour combined, the backgrounds of the “quicktime” photographers and the unique architecture of the “Haunted House.”

Beaton, New York, p. 41.

It is a hot day. The citizens of the biggest city in the world suffer with the heat-jitters. In tenement windows tired wives rest their stout elbows on pillows and stare blankly at the raucous elevated trains. High-priced blossoms in the show-windows of Fifth Avenue florists are shriveled. Subway guards, sweating in their heavy blue coats, mutter surly curses and push people into the hot cars.

It takes ten beers to quench one’s thirst. The damp, insistent heat has placed blue lines beneath the eyes of subway passengers. The flags on the skyscrapers are slack; there is no breeze.

Drowsy citizens stand in wet garments beneath the most popular thermometer in town—the giant in front of the Pulitzer Building on Park Row—and watch, fascinated, while the mercury climbs inexorably into the nineties. The asphalt in the streets is so soft that heels leave their marks in it. When two people meet one is almost certain to inquire, inanely, “Is it hot enough for you?”

Summer has the city in a stranglehold.
Mitchell, p. 183.

High heat creates irrational solutions: linen suits that collapse into deep wrinkles when one bends an arm or a knee, and men’s straw hats as stiff as matzohs, which, like some kind of hard yellow flower, bloom annually all over the city on a certain sacred date—June 1st or so. Those hats dig deep pink creases around men’s foreheads, and the wrinkled suits, which are supposedly cooler, have to be pulled down and up and sidewise to make room for the body within.

For the first time in the recorded history of the Temperate Zone, architects began erecting buildings without chimneys. It is cheaper to buy steam than to make it.
Granick, p. 58.

Mean rooftops, fire escapes, and untenanted windows. The most that can be hoped for from outside is a cooling breeze to make one’s imprisonment more bearable.
Conrad, p. 103.

They sit on a fire escape, trying to keep still, trying to find a cool spot in the shade. No one says a word.
Lee, N. pag.

Summer malaise in deserted neighborhoods.
Roche, p. 404.

In the heat, the residents take their lives outdoors. Washing is strung on fire escapes or across the courtyard between buildings. A fat woman uses her windowsill as a patio. The window is equipped with a sagging grate, into which one of her pudgy arms just fits. Its purpose is to repel intruders, but she’s pressing against it from inside, employing it as an alfresco room for socializing, as she’s seen doing with a neighbor who pauses on the stoop. She’s an adipose overspill from inside the house, as are the plants in window boxes in another of these photographs. The room within seems to be a summer garden, a seething hothouse where things grow so riotously that they spread across the sill and send roots trailing into the street to tease the pavement. The people clustered round the stoop have annexed the street as a gregarious sitting room. The children playing with dolls and comic books domesticate the pavement, erecting there a fantasy house which, to accommodate the camera, is transparent. One of the girls wears a toy stethoscope and is supplying medical services to the dolls.

Sunshine makes him restless.
Bladford, p. 28.

New York was exceedingly hot that summer of 1943. The heat had settled down over the city in a huge blanket. The days were long and humid, and nobody was any more active than was absolutely necessary.

Huncke, p. 60.

and I am sweating a lot by now and thinking of leaning on the john door in the 5 SPOT while she whispered a song along the keyboard to Mal Waldron and everyone and I stopped breathing

O’Hara, p. 325.

By three o’clock when the hot and smoggy air hangs over the corner, his ices starts to melt, running down his boots and into the road.
Bladford, p. 29.

And tell me what street / Compares with Mott Street / In July?
Rodgers & Hart, “Manhattan.”

The old, now defunct Greyhound terminal off Times Square, the acme, the crown jewel, of all the vile bus stations, and especially hellish now because of the foul air and stultifying heat of the city in midsummer.
Lesueur, p. 13.

Pausing to check the temperature at Hudnut’s giant thermometer.
Finney, p. 267.

Midsummer New Yorks waiting for the rain / The window, the trees, the park, the building / The whole world’s shaking, shaking, shaking

Ono, “Midsummer.”

The sun already hot simmers slantily on the pavements, on plateglass, on dustmarbled enameled signs. Men’s and women’s faces as they pass her are rumpled and gray like pillows that have been too much slept on.

Dos Passos, pp. 240-1.

I am sitting at the moment in a stifling hotel room in 90-degree heat, halfway down an air shaft, in midtown. No air moves in or out of the room, yet I am curiously affected by emanations from the immediate surroundings.
White, Here, p. 19.
He finds New York alluring on summer Sunday afternoons, over-ripe, as if all sorts of funny fruits were going to fall into your hands.
Conrad, p. 197.

"New York has been like a blazing furnace for the last two days," Crane reports in June 1923. Yet the temperature vouchsafes him "the intense and interesting spectacle of the streets."
Conrad, p. 228.

A hot sun shining in slits along the crosstown streets.
Donleavy, N. pag.

In the dead of this stifling June night in the back of the taxi it hits me that I'm still wearing the bloody raincoat.
Ellis, Psycho, p. 218.

A burning Broadway movie house happens to be playing The Heat's On, a 1943 Mae West musical.
N. cit.

Weegee sought out people being treated for sunburn or heat exhaustion under the boardwalk at Coney Island—casualties of the city's grilling.
Conrad, p. 291.

The heat hit us like a blast from a furnace. The air was dead... The town smelled like rotten eggs. [Smell]
Ibid., p. 291.

The heat afflicting New York sours and rots it. At the same time, it's an agency of benefit. It cauterizes, immunizes, insures the city. Heat disintegrates but also disinfects. Cooking its inhabitants, the sweltering city leaves them with that unfeeling rind which is the existential bravado of the 1940s: they become, as New York already is, hard-boiled. Hard-boiling is a torture of matter, a chemical inducement of molecular disorder, altering a physical state from liquid to solid. It's an experiment that can preserve by a calculated selfextermination.
Conrad, p. 294.

On August 13, 1975, at 3:00 PM, the temperature on Fourteenth Street and Eighth Avenue was ninety-four degrees—the humidity 85 percent. On the exact same date and same time the temperature on Seventy-third Street and Fifth Avenue was a balmy seventy-one degrees—the humidity a comfortable 40 percent. I know, because I was there.
Leibowitz, p. 102

The heat jiggles along every street,
Reverberates from the scorching pavement,
Hot brick walls, stone walls and side walks—
Runs everywhere
With licking-hot, laughing tongues
Driven by the sun.
Harris, L., p. 532.

Summer is the great equalizer; there is no way to buy stage presence or a sense of theatre and that, after all, is what street life is about—it's a gigantic theater without walls.
The Block begins to awake from its slumber, ready to deal once again with the heat of the hottest day of the year.

In summer the magic people come out to play on the streets. The worthy ones, bankers, businessmen, middle-aged sturdies, are shut away behind the throb of air-conditioning, off in the country, gone to Europe or Colorado. This is the special time that young and old come out of hiding to live out their fantasies on hot, hard sidewalks from which they have no escape.

This morning's sunshine came down the street bright and fresh.

Suddenly the city is covered in chairs.

And as the life of the summer streets hums and bustles through the image of dusk, it is possible to pretend, just for a second, that Manhattan is indeed some far away island where all is harmony.

Even though the white-hot sun is gone, nonetheless the heat is still stifling. And in a peculiar, funny sort of way, it's worse. You expect it to be hot during the light of day when the sun is beating down on the cement and tar, but at night it should be considerably cooler; well, not tonight, it's hot. WE'VE SEEN throughout the day are now coping with the night-time heat, plus it's humid as shit. Everyone is outside, sitting on stoops, on cars and you know the kids are playing, running up and down the block. Now it's the hottest night of the year.

The plentiful inhabitants of the Lower East Side sit on the shady side of their disheveled streets and make no unessential motions. No breezes stir.

Watch the New York ladies when forced momentarily into the stifling air. Feet swell in ungenerous shoes that were bought in another of those icy stores. Hair sags, faces draw. Linen skirts crumpled from damp taxi rides, they still try to maintain a perfection that is beyond reason. Steps never slacken, bodies rigidly deny the very existence of languor. They run the obstacle course in full dress. All is armour. Ungracious anger becomes a shield.

A May or June moon will be hanging like a burnished sliver disc between the high walls aloft.

The windows were rolled down to air out the sweltering cab. It was 80 degrees and the heat bounced off the concrete and mingled lushly with the exhaust fumes.
New York can render you invisible, it can seem oppressive beyond endurance. In the summer especially, with the heat, already in the 90s, amplified by high humidity and the stifling air trapped by the buildings and the street tarmac softening underfoot.

Brook, p. 16.

He cantered through the hot summer night, his desert a city of stone.

Puzo, p. 3.

perfect in the hot humid morning on my way to work

O’Hara, p. 325.

Oh, yes, today the streets are also melting.

Kapralov, p. 88.

It was the close of summer. The great mountain and lake areas to the north of New York were pouring down their thousands into the hot, sun-parched city.

Dreiser, p. 100.

Oh boy, it’s now ninety-six degrees and still rising. Not a single leaf moves above us, not one pigeon, not one squirrel. The dogs lie ominously quiet, perhaps they are already boiled. Even the concrete of our chess tables is hot. The tall cans of Rolling Rock which we buy at the Arab bodega on Avenue A become undrinkable in exactly seven minutes.

Kapralov, p. 87.

At the corner of Third Avenue he stopped and stood shivering in the hot afternoon sunlight, sweat running down behind his ears.

Dos Passos, p. 158.

A South African gentleman once told me that New York in August was hotter than any place he knew in Africa, yet people here dressed for a northern city. He had wanted to wear shorts but feared that he would be arrested for indecent exposure.

It is widely believed that in the summer rich people leave New York to go to Southampton because the weather is cooler there. This is not true. What actually happens is that in the summer the cooler weather leaves New York and goes to Southampton because it doesn’t want to stay in New York with a lot of underpaid writers and Puerto Ricans.

Leibowitz, p. 102.

apartments all heat-roached and sticky with summer weather

Wojnarowicz, p. 25.

Anybody can insult New York with complete impunity. No New Yorker ever resents it. “We have no local pride. Say to us, “You have, without doubt, the vilest climate on earth,” and New Yorkers will eagerly agree. “You just can’t believe how hot it was here last summer,” we will tell you. “It broke all records. We were all gasping like grounded fish. It was terrible!”

Atkinson, p. 18.
Visibility and climate affect each other in ratios of loveliness.
Kozloff, n. pag.

In the summer, there is somehow a lightening of earnestness.
Atkinson, p. 214.

On some nights New York is as hot as Bangkok. The whole continent seems to have moved from its place and slid nearer the equator, the bitter gray Atlantic to have become green and tropical, and the people, thronging the streets, barbaric fellahin.
Bellow, Victim, N. pag.

The summer of 1912 in Brooklyn: serene.
N. cit.

Right now, folks, we’re gonna suspend the narrative and show how people are coping with the oppressive heat.

People are taking cold showers.
Sticking faces in ice-cold, water-filled sinks.
Heads stuck in refrigerators.
A wife tells her husband, “Hell no, I’m not cooking. It’s too hot. The kitchen is closed.”

Men downing six-packs of ice-cold brew.
Faces stuck directly in front of fans.
A young kid cracks an egg on Sal’s Cadillac. The moment the egg hits the car hood it starts to cook.

And how can I forget the papers, the newspaper headlines.
New York Post: “A SCORCHER”
New York Daily News: “2 HOT 4 U?”
New York Newsday: “OH BOY! BAKED APPLE”
New York Times: “RECORD HEATWAVE HITS CITY”
Lee, N. pag.

Entering New York Harbor for the first time, Duchamp recalled being dumbfounded by the heat: “I thought there must be a fire somewhere.”
Marquis, p. 109

I walk though the luminous humidity

Humidifiers go day and night to counter the effect of tropical central heating.
Bladford, p. 11.

It is a trite but true observation of the weatherman that humidity makes more difference to humanity than does torridity. The high percentage of moisture in the air induces a depressed and languid feeling in Summer. There can be no satisfactory lowering of a room’s temperature for human comfort unless this humid factor is considered.
N. cit.

The night was oppressive... one of those New York summer evening when even the walls seem to sweat...
Sullivan, 1001, p. 64.

How slow the city is in summer.
Barnes, New York, p. 22.
Soughing swamp breathings
In the pestilential city.
Harris “City Heat,” p. 532.

I walk up the muggy street beginning to sun and have a hamburger and a malted and buy an ugly NEW WORLD WRITING to see what the poets in Ghana are doing these days
O’Hara, p. 325.

The city perspires through opened hydrants.
Conrad, p. 291.

Escape from the heat... these tenement people opened up the water hydrant... placed a barrel over it... and got cooled off. But a cop came around and shut the hydrant off... As soon as the cop leaves... the hydrant will be opened up again.
Weegee, Naked, pp. 110-1.

Fetid heat of August with fecundity at play.
Depero, “Coney Island,” p. 422.

The first “heat wave” of the season had arrived and everyone was thinking of the Decoration Day week-end. The thermometer in New York City went to 85 the preceding afternoon and there were one death and one prostration.
Morley, Morley’s NY, p. 208.

Everybody had noticed the excessive humidity of the dense air.
Every solid object that the hands came in contact with in the darkness was wet, as if a thick fog had condensed upon it. This supersaturation of the air (a principal cause of the difficulty experienced in breathing) led to a result which would quickly have been foreseen if people could have had the use of their eyes, but which, coming on invisibly, produced a panic fear when at last its presence was strikingly forced upon the attention.
Serviss, p. 61.

Double parked. In the humid afternoon. Taxis squeal by as doormen’s whistles blow. A haze covering the sky. To make more thunder clouds collect in the west.
Donleavy, N. pag.

From out the city
Oozes forth
A sticky, cloying, stinking thickness,
Sucked to the surface
By the sun.
Harris “City Heat,”p. 533.

Things are hot. It’s summer on the streets of New York.
Bladford, p. 117.

Fall

It is a street with trees that in the summer make cool patterns on the pavement; but now the leaves were yellowed and mostly down, and the rain had made them slippery, they skidded underfoot.
Autumn in New York, why does it seem so inviting?
Autumn in New York, it spells the thrill of first knighting
Glittering crowds and shimmering clouds in canyons of steel
They’re making me feel, I’m home

Its autumn in New York that brings the promise of new love
Autumn in New York is often mingled with pain
Dreamers with empty hands, may sigh for exotic lands
Its autumn in New York, its good to live it again

Autumn in New York, the gleaming rooftops at sundown
Autumn in New York, it lifts you up when you’re run down
Jaded rous and gay divorces who lunch at the Ritz
Will tell you that its divine

This autumn in New York transforms the slums into Mayfair Autumn in New York, you’ll need no castle in Spain Lovers that bless the dark on benches in Central Park Greet autumn in New York, its good to live it again
Duke, “Autumn in NY.”

“April in Paris” is a fiction, but “Autumn in New York,” by the same songwriter, is a glorious fact.
Gopnik, p. 73.

River-watching along the eastern edge of Manhattan can be a desultory pleasure these autumn days, especially toward evening when the sky is changing and the wind coming off the water is often strong and cool.
Philips, p. 125.

October’s in the air, in the Indian Summer sun of door.
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 105.

this October sixth, in New York City during the nineteen eighties

Weather

In New York there are certain wonderful seasons in which this feeling grows to a lyrical intensity. One of these are those first tender days of Spring when lovely girls and women seem suddenly to burst out of the pavements like flowers: all at once the street is peopled with them, walking along with a proud, undulant rhythm of breasts and buttocks and a look of passionate tenderness on their faces. Another season is early Autumn, in October, when the city begins to take on a magnificent flash and sparkle: there are swift whippings of bright wind, a flare of bitter leaves, the smell of frost and harvest in the air; after the enervation of Summer, the place awakens to an electric vitality, the beautiful women have come back from Europe or from the summer resorts, and the air is charged with exultancy and joy.

Finally, there is a wonderful, secret thrill of some impending ecstasy on a frozen Winter’s night. On one of these nights of frozen silence when the cold is so intense that it numbs one’s flesh, and the sky above the city flashes with one deep jewelry of cold stars, the whole city, no matter how ugly its parts may be, becomes a proud, passionate, Northern place: everything about it seems to soar up with an aspirant, vertical, glittering magnificence to meet the stars. One hears the hoarse notes of the great ships in the river, and one remembers suddenly the princely girdle of proud, potent tides that bind the city, and suddenly New York blazes like a magnificent jewel in its fit setting of sea, and earth, and stars.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 569.

Above all, there is the sky; pervading all these activities is the weather. The sharp crystalline days of early autumn, with intense blue sky and a few curls of cloud, drifting through space like the little jets of steam that were once such characteristic outlets of the older skyscrapers: the splendors of sunset on the waters, over the Palisades, crossing the Brooklyn Ferry, looking toward the Jersey shore from the Brooklyn Bridge; the swift, whiplike changes from heat to cold, from fog to clarity, from the sharp jeweled contours of Bellini to the soft tones of Whistler and Fuller. Occasionally, too, the sulphurous hell of the dog days, to whip up appetite for the dank clouds in the west and the brave crackle of lightning and the drenching showers. At the other extreme the benignity and quiet of a city quenched by snow: the jingle of sleighbells in the 1890's, the cold flash of electricity on the elevated tracks twenty years later.

No matter how great the confusion on the surface, beneath it all, in the rocks themselves is order: no matter how shifty man's top layer, the foundations are solid. If the streets are dingy, there is the dazzle of the sky itself: if the alleys and yards are foul, heavy with ancient dirt, with the effluvia of the sewers or the factories, there is the sanative taste of salt in the first wind that blows from the Atlantic. The cold sea fog in spring, sweeping inland in the mid-afternoon, calls one to the ocean as imperatively as the proud, deep-throated roar of the steamer, claiming the channel as she passes out to sea. So the ocean and the sky and the rivers hold the city in their grip, even while the people, like busy ants in the cracks and crevices, are unconscious of these more primal presences, save when they read a report in the morning paper, and reach for an umbrella, an overcoat, a fan.

Mumford, Empire, pp. 28-9.

The city of New York is difficult to describe save in terms of paradox, and so, perhaps, it is more satisfactory, for those who may, to instinctively feel the metropolis rather than to attempt to comprehend her. Not infrequently some of the balmiest days of the year there fall in January and February. Buds are nearly ready to burst on the boughs of the trees in the Park, and the birds are tempted to return from the south. The temperature become so impressive that electric fans and filmy garments are sought from store-closets, but no sooner have they been discovered than a passing and perverse breeze ushers in another week of winter. Snow or rain or sun may follow: there is no means of determining by precedent. Some of the coldest days in the year are likely to happen in June or July. It is strange that Americans have never adopted the English habit of carrying umbrellas, for New York is quite able to produce a cloud-burst out of the sky on the most clement day. When, however, the sun shines in New York, be it warm or cold, the heart is happy, and it is probable that the sun shines more often there than in any other capital of the world.

Van Vechten, p. 137.
In all weathers, in all seasons, at all times of day or night, the island from whatever point of observation, is a thing of wonder and delight. In the early morning it shines and glistens in the dazzling sun; its walls giving back white effulgence in marvellous contrast to the blueness of an habitually cloudless sky, and the deeper note of constantly agitated waters.

Henderson, pp. 17-8.

And the weather—hot or cold, stormy or clear—is viewed askance, not as a meteorological phenomenon, but as a hindrance to the morning commute.

Mittlebach, p. 1.

We shall have perfect control of the atmosphere, so that there will be no need of going to Florida in the winter or to Canada in the summer. We shall have all varieties to order in our big buildings of Manhattan.

Koolhaas, p. 91.

The city manufactures its own alternative seasons indoors.

Conrad, p. 77.

New York City is on the track of almost every major weather system in North America. We are blasted by frigid winter air from Canada, struck by coastal storms from North Carolina, parched by heat waves from the Midwest, and even bombarded by hurricanes that start off of the coast of Africa.

Mittlebach, p. 7.

Watched Hurricane Gloria all morning on TV because there was nothing else to watch. For some reason they decided to cancel the Today Show and everything to bring constant storm updates and they made it sound so horrible. But then it never really hit New York. (Friday, September 27, 1985)

Warhol, Diaries, p. 681.

As an unseasonably warm day became evening, a wind blew in from the north carrying spooky gray clouds across the hangnail moon. The temperature dropped with the barometer, and the sudden change made people giddy.

Trebay, p. 291.

Awnings begin to disappear from city apartment houses as building managers find it hard to find men to put them up in the spring and take them down in the fall.

Trager, p. 537.

David Tudor and I took a taxi down town. He was going to Macy’s; I was going on to West Broadway and Prince where I get my hair cut. After David Tudor got out, I began talking with the driver about the weather. The relative merits of the Old Farmers’ Almanac and the newspapers came up. The driver said they were developing rockets that would raise the weather man’s predictions from 50 to 55 per cent accuracy. I said I thought the Almanac starting from a consideration of planets and their movements, rather than from winds and theirs, got a better start since the x-quantities involved were not so physically close to the results being predicted. The driver said he’d had an operation some years before and that while his flesh was dead and numb, before the wound healed, he was able to predict weather changes by the pain he felt in the scar, that when the flesh lost its numbness and was, so to speak, back to normal, he could no longer know in advance anything about changes in weather.

The pace of this city is forged in its chilled seasons—rushing and bustling, invigorated by the challenge of a harsh climate and harsher people. It would make sense for New York to live on two time clocks—one for the urgency of its winter months, another for the stupor of its heat. It is, however, part of its tradition to make no allowances for weather. For those who can afford heat and air-conditioning, protection from its reality, weather simply does not happen. It is a rude noise made at a polite dinner table.

Bladford, p. 182.

Its climate is a scandal.

Maffi, p. 75.

The blind were forgotten in this big city of Conversation about The Weather.

Talese, p. 43.

There was an earthquake Sunday night at 8:40 in New York. And we had one last year, too. It’s really scary. I thought Manhattan was built on the stuff that wouldn’t have it. (Monday, April 23, 1984)

Warhol, Diaries, p. 568.

Generally speaking, the weather is better on the East Side thank on the West Side. All in all, the weather is considered this arrangement satisfactory except for the problem posed by the better buildings on Central Park West. The problem was solved by means of a trade-off with certain buildings in the East Seventies that are largely populated by beyond-their-means airline stewardesses and the proprietors of leather boutiques. Thus the San Remo and the Dakota receive weather appropriate to their architecture and airline stewardesses and the proprietors of letter boutiques are perhaps are among those who most fully understand the meaning of the term “fair weather friend.”

Leibowitz, p. 102.

This city, with its quivering prismatic lights, changes face, as the hours change with the sun and stars; snow, rain, smoke, and the pluming of steam waved by the wind.

Reisenberg, p. 28.

A significant change in our climate to one of a very different rainfall or temperature would have a dramatic effect on all our social structures.

Crosby, p. 9.

It is neither hot nor cold nor damp, there is only one latitude left, the latitude of pleasure.

Morand, p 192.
Death

I once stood within a few feet of one of the city’s most tragic suicides. I was walking through East Forty-sixth Street, having crossed Vanderbilt from Madison. It was high tide in the wave of self-destruction; 1,595 was the official tally for that year of 1932. A noon-hour crowd filled the Midtown streets. The copper-red sun shone through the blue humid air. For a moment the summertime city hushed, one of those pauses and its roar more imaginary than real. Then, all of a sudden, piercing shrieks volleyed from high office windows. I jerked upward. The cries came from the blanched faces of a great gallery of office girls, sitting at open windows. A gray figure, arms and waved legs waving, were involved in grotesque somersaults. I jumped backward. The body missed me and cleared two young women, a matter of inches—they fell from fright. A worn-thin suit hit the sidewalk near the curb, landing with a bone cracking thud. It flattened as if filled with a huge lump of subsiding putty. A stream of sluggish blood oozed from under its matted gray hair. The cries stopped; a crowd pressed close, whistle screeched. Then, ghastly afterthought, his raffish hat, an old straw skimmer, circled gaily to the street, landing near the bleeding head.

Reisenberg, p. 50.

In May 1947, LIFE magazine devoted a full page to a picture taken by a photography student named Robert Wiles. The photograph is extraordinary in several ways—not least because it remains, seven decades later, one of the most famous portraits of suicide ever made. The woman in the photo was 23-year-old Evelyn McHale. Not much is known of her life, or of her final hours, although countless people have put enormous effort into uncovering as much about the troubled, attractive California native as they possibly could. In Wiles’ photo, Evelyn (it doesn’t feel right to refer to her as “Ms. McHale”) looks for all the world as if she’s resting, or napping, rather than lying dead amid shattered glass and twisted steel. Everything about her pose—her gloved hand clutching her necklace; her gently crossed ankles; her right hand with its gracefully curved fingers—suggests that she is momentarily quiet, perhaps thinking of her plans for later in the day, or daydreaming of her beau.

For its part, LIFE magazine captioned the picture with language that veers strikingly from the poetic to the elemental: “At the bottom of Empire State Building the body of Evelyn McHale reposes calmly in grotesque bier her falling body punched into the top of a car.”

A single paragraph, meanwhile, describing how the scene came about is at-once unsentimental and elegiac:

On May Day, just after leaving her fiancé, 23-year-old Evelyn McHale wrote a note. “He is much better off without me. . . . I wouldn’t make a good wife for anybody,” she wrote. Then she crossed it out. She went to the observation platform of the Empire State Building. Through the mist she gazed at the street, 86 floors below. Then she jumped. In her desperate determination she leaped clear of the setbacks and hit a United Nations limousine parked at the curb. Across the street photography student Robert Wiles heard an explosive crash. Just four minutes after Evelyn McHale’s death Wiles got this picture of death’s violence and its composure. [Photography]

Cosgrove, N. pag.

Death by suicide was another morbid theme that haunted Warhol, who now sought photographs of people in the act of or shortly after killing themselves. His friends scoured magazines and newspapers for him and came up with pictures that led to paintings such as 1947 White. The image derives from a 1947 photograph of a young model who had jumped from the eighty-sixth floor of the Empire State building, landing on a car. (The artists' source was a tearsheet from the January 18, 1963, New York regional edition of Life, which featured a brief history of the Empire State Building the photograph first appeared in the April 12, 1947, issue of the magazine.) She lies as if in repose atop the crumpled roof of the automobile, her gloved hands raised gracefully toward her unblemished face. Only the bunched stockings at her ankles provide a clue to the violence of her demise.
Bourdon, p. 154.

One day, a woman bustling off to a meeting in midtown is struck by the errant arm of an elderly man who has jumped from the building above her. She crumples to the ground but survives. You hear stories about debris falling, she notes, but you never hear about people falling.
Brooks, p. 58.

And my short wave says there's someone ready to jump down on Fifth and Fiftieth. If the snow stays and gets any deeper they'll be a lot more. They go out the windows like pop corn off a red hot pan. Happens every time there's a blizzard.
Donleavy, N. pag.

There was much talk of suicide. A favorite joke concerned a hotel clerk who asked guests if they wanted a room for sleeping or jumping.
Ellis, pp. 533-4.

This jumper could be a prospective customer. Who may have to be cleaned off the street. Unless he's on the sixteenth floor of a doll's house. Might get embedded in the roof of a car. Or land on five pedestrians.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Consumption by one of these oblivious elements can seem a mercy: the purpose of the city's rivers is to wash away the biologically unequal despairers who drown themselves there.
Conrad, p. 182.

Final Exit is a handbook for anyone wishing to commit suicide. This was sent to me by a Mr. Hofsess who, some years ago, came to New York, like the rest of us, in the hope of ruling the world.
Crisp, p. 122.

One week a visitor sets out to claim a world record, scaling five city bridges in four hours. He's climbed in public before in other places, he's famous for it. He chooses to begin his challenge here with the most celebrated of the group, an elegant but unforgiving structure that claimed its own designer before the last stone was set in place a hundred or some years earlier. this time, it's no contest, the climber loses his footing soon after he starts up and slips downward, his glide impossible to arrest.
No one records the fall itself, but there's a picture in the paper of the empty alleyway where he landed. [Bridge]
Brooks, pp. 59-60.

A million strangled deaths of trapped souls.
Depero, “Coney Island,” p. 422.

Barbara Stanwyck lay strangled on her bed on Sutton Place while the BMT rumbled over the Queensboro Bridge.
McCourt, p. 21.

Sauntering down Broadway in the spring, he feels death near and, knowing it’s not good to lie dead in the street, hurriedly buys a ticket for a movie and quietly seats himself inside to await his fatal seizure.

Come and get it before it is too late. This seems like a death-wish city.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 18.

Here, even the sky is dead.
Sharpe, p. 335.

The skyscrapers seem like tall gravestones.
Torres-Padilla, p. 44.

Go ahead, bite the Big Apple, don’t mind the maggots.
Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

It was an amazing city, so far-flung, so beautiful, so dead.
Dreiser, p. 1.

Do corpses walk around on Broadway?
Singer, p. 283.

Interviewer: When did you start with the “Death” series?
Andy Warhol: ... I realized that everything I was doing must have been Death. It was Christmas or Labor Day, a holiday, and every time you turned on the radio they said something like, “Four million are going to die.” That started it. But when you see a gruesome picture over and over again, it doesn’t really have any effect.
Swenson, p. 19.

When President Kennedy was shot that fall, I heard the news over the radio while I was alone painting in my studio. I don’t think I missed a stroke. I wanted to know what was going on out there, but that was the extent of my reaction.

It seemed like no matter how hard you tried, you couldn’t get away from the thing. I rounded up a bunch of people and got them to come over and we all went out to one of the Berlin bars on 86th Street for dinner. But it didn’t work, everyone was acting too depressed. David Bourdon was sitting across from Susi Gablik, the art critic, and John Quinn, the playwright, and he was moaning over and over, “But Jackie was the most glamorous First lady we’ll ever get...” Sam Wagstaff, down from the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford, tried to console him, and Ray Johnson, the artist, kept dipping dimes into the mustard we were using on our German frankfurters, then going out to drop the mustard-covered dimes into the telephone slot. (cf. Walrod: “Artist Ray Johnson used to walk around New York City clogging pay phones by inserting dimes covered in mustard.” [Crime])
Warhol, POPism, p. 78.
The assassination of J.F.K: At Stuyvesant Station on 14th Street taxis were beginning to stop in the middle of the street. People stepped from the sidewalks to crowd around them, demanding the drivers turn up their radios. Pay phone circuits went dead. There was shouting, there was weeping, there was anger, there was disbelief. [Technology] [Crime] Sanders, Beatnik, p. 411.

Lee Harvey Oswald lived in New York—first on East 92 Street in Manhattan, later on Sheridan Avenue and then East 179th Street in the Bronx—from August 1952 to January 1954, leaving for New Orleans almost a decade before the Kennedy assassination. Goldenberg, pp. 25-6.

In 1899, America’s first auto fatality occurred when a sixty-eight-year-old real estate broker, named Henry H. Bliss, was knocked down as he stepped off a southbound streetcar at Central Park West and Seventy-fourth Street. Ellis, p. 461.

On December 13, 1931, Winston Churchill was hit by a taxi and kept at Lenox Hill Hospital for nearly a month with a sprained shoulder and cuts to his nose and forehead. Ashton, p. 95.

The 1962 Macy’s Thanksgiving Day parade. Sprawled in the street, undergoing inflation from the helium cylinders, Father Christmas could be an accident victim in need of artificial resuscitation. [Surrealism] Conrad, p. 274.

Run one of the buses into a clothes shed, keep the motor going for little while, and all of the passengers, and anyone else remaining within, will croak, as we call it. The shiny conveyances powered by heavy motors—“See the Wonder City of New York”—spill toxic fumes among us people. Reisenberg, p. 69.

Architect Louis Kahn died of a heart attack in a men’s bathroom at Penn Station in 1974. Walrod, p. 46.

First Bunny died, then John Latouche, then Jackson Pollock. But is the earth as full as life was full, of them? O’Hara, p. 257.

The old man lay dead, and in dying he had bequeathed a problem. For he was not only an old man but an excessively fat man and, try as they might, his undertakers saw no way to get him out of the door of his tiny Gay Street apartment.

They might have taken him out the window and down the fire escape, but the landlord refused to allow such an undignified exit. “The old man,” he said, “always came in and out like a gentleman in the 30 years he lived here. He’ll go out for the last time, too, like a gentleman.” And a mason was ordered to cut a hole in the wall. Wilcock, p. 142.
A salesman dies after plunging thirteen stories through a floor-to-ceiling plate-glass window. He had just signed off on a multi-million-dollar business deal. The last time we saw him, someone on the scene noted, he was laughing.

Brooks, p. 61.

The city resurrects its dead as authoritarian bogies on pedestals.

Conrad, p. 318.

City of expectant undertakers open all night.

Reisenberg, p. 203.

All the undertakers we know live on Park Avenue.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Manhattan’s Charities Pier was known as Misery Lane because that was where the bodies were put whenever disaster struck.

Drehle, p. 1.

In a city which is constantly devouring itself, it was oddly satisfying to be standing about in a place that had been deliberately entombed, yet preserved. It had the stillness and dignity of a crypt, and the tree of us wandered slowly around, letting its anachronistic charm seep in.

Brook, p. 138.

There is quite a market for granite, much in demand by stone-cutters and monument dealers who buy granite for graveyard markers. When we made room for the Standard Oil Building at 26 Broadway, we found a stone weighing nineteen tons at a height of 250 feet. I could never understand why any man ever wanted a stone like that way up there. That stone went to a number of graves.

lunch on the tombs of the Trinity churchyard

In Woodlawn Cemetery, not far from the water lies a teenager, George Spence Millet (1894–1909) who, as his monument explains, “Lost life by stab in falling on ink eraser, evading six young women trying to give him birthday kisses in office of Metropolitan Life Building.”

Culbertson, p. 193.

The urban dead in a Jewish cemetery in Queens. The only irregularity in this silent city must be ascribed to wayward nature: the wintry trees branch at random, in contrast with the mapped placement of the graves.

Conrad, p. 252.

Damon Runyon’s son hired a plane and decanted Runyon’s remains above Times Square.

Ibid., p. 285.

Yesterday afternoon, while laborers were engaged in uprooting trees at the new entrance to Central Park, corner of Eighty-fifth street and Eighth avenue, they discovered, fourteen inches beneath the surface, a black rosewood coffin, richly mounted and in a state of good preservation. On the lid was a plate with the engraving, “Margaret McIntay, died February, 1852, aged sixteen years, three months and fourteen days. Within the coffin was the body of a woman, decayed almost to a skeleton. At a short distance from the spot another coffin was found, enclosing the body of a negro, decomposed beyond recognition. This land was dug up five years ago, when the trees were planted there, and no such coffins were there at the time.

Maffi, pp. 24–5.

Chase National Bank maintains a crematory at 11 Broad St. for burning bond issues. A single burning may see a single bond issue of, say, $200,000,000 go into a sub-basement gas furnace in a single day. Special chimneys that carry off the smoke and charred ends of the bond and coupon burning are covered with wire, but there are cases where bonds only slightly charred have worked through, lifted by heat, and have been offered for payment by people who found them.

Bank customers who know about the crematories sometimes ask—and get—permission to burn diaries or other possessions in them. Chase even burned a whole batch of custom shirt bands once for a rich patron who didn’t want them to get into circulation after he died.

Conrad, p. 223.

Wall Street is a pyramidal burial ground, exhibiting the monuments which the millionaires have erected as their cenotaphs. [Ancient]

[Classical]

Diehl, p. 161.

Grant’s Tomb is less indispensable to New York than the West Side Highway. [Robert Moses]

Funereal entrances of the Empire State Building (the largest skyscraper, which has since been dethroned by Rockefeller Center)… The black of polished stones, the walls faced with dark, gleaming slabs.

Corbusier, p. 155.

Cemeteries were not off-limits, as owners were urged to give up the heavy metal chains and bronze posts surrounding their family plots during WWII for ammunition.

Ibid., p. 155.

St. Mark’s Church in-the-Bouwerie, whose Stones hold in tight grip one wooden leg & all of Peter Stuyvesant’s bones?

Berrigan, p. 537.

Rows of caskets bearing the bodies of fallen American soldiers have become an all too familiar sight beneath the high vaulted ceilings of the Forty-third Street entrance to Grand Central during World War II. The terminal has been used by the military as a stop-over point from which grieving families can retrieve their loved ones and then continue the final journey home.

Drone of cars along Astoria Boulevard. Barren landscape of headstones. Patches of grey dead grass. A single mausoleum on a rise of hill. Die slowly so I can see where my own life is going to end. Drop suddenly in your tracks and no telling where they might shove you.

Donleavy, N. pag.
... grabbing, giving, sighing, dying, just so they could be buried in one of those awful cemetery cities beyond Long Island City.

McDarrah, Beat, p. 3.

You don’t have to practice parapsychology; or even be especially imaginative, to feel the presence of the dead in New York. For all the development this city has sustained over the last several hundred years, much of New York remains old, by American standards anyway. Half our compatriots live in homes built since 1970, but 90 percent of New Yorkers live in homes built before that year, according to the Census Bureau’s New York housing survey. More remarkable, more than 40 percent of us live in homes constructed before 1930, and nearly 18 percent in homes built before 1920.

Wherever we live, others have probably lived before us. They ate their dinners in our dining rooms, slept in our bedrooms, read the newspaper in our living rooms. They gave parties, listened to the radio on winter evenings, worried about the latest stock market crash, or war. They invented strange new candies and tallied their inheritances and celebrated their anniversaries.

Our relationship to these people is complicated. On one hand, we share intimate space with them, trespassing where their most private moments occurred, removed from them by a few thin coats of paint. On the other hand, they are dead strangers. [Supernatural] [Metaphysical] [Ghost]

Ghosts. There are ghosts in New York. Someday I’ll be one of them.

Goodman, Secret City, p. 9.

Subterranean

Rumors of Manhattan’s subterranean network surface occasionally like vapors: I’ve heard tales of Central Park caverns large enough to hold platoons, of tunnels beneath the West Side Highway where people engage in strange sexual acts.

N. cit.

Con Edison workers rising up out of the sewer at Forty-fifth Street.

I think of the construction workers as undertakers, digging down beneath the temporary holes in the skyline where buildings, like people, have departed. [Death]

N. cit.

The plumes of steam from the city’s heating plant, spouting at varying intervals from the underworld, are the only signs, on a Sunday, that Wall Street is not part of a long forgotten, dead city.

Beaton, New York, p. 17.

The catacombed city in exile even burrows beneath the foundation of its upper half: thieves use the vaulted sewers as a runway for speedy escapes.

Reisenberg, p. 85.
He emerges from an opening under the edge of one of the sidewalks and nervously begins to scale the faces of the buildings.

The underneath of New York, the American metropolis par excellence, is the most disconcerting of all. Much the same has already been said of London and Paris, as the works of Dickens and Gissing, and Sue, Hugo, and Zola testify—and Walter Benjamin consider the Parisian passages and Métro stations as places providing access to the collective unconscious. But Europe, steeped in its past as it is, really holds no surprises, what with its archaeological remains, its ruins, crypts, and vaults, its underground canals and sewers, the whole repertoire of gothic and romantic, realist and surrealistic. What does surprise is the singular and often unappreciated fact that the underneath of the city like New York is overwhelmingly present, too. Maffi, p. 25.

The further down you go, the weirder people get, and I mean real weird. There are people down there, man, I swear they have webbed feet... Can’t hardly see them at times, they’re so sneaky. They make strange noises and sounds, like trains, but they are not trains; they are communicating with each other. They said I could stay but that I could only be allowed to go back up with their permission. I ran from that place man, and I ain’t never going back. They’re the mole people. Toth, p. 21.

Underground, they live often in groups, as if huddled like prehistoric man against the elements—as well as against the rats, human creditors, and the dark... there are communities of families, runaways, homosexuals, and diverse independent individuals. Ibid., p. 38.

The best feature of this time was the freshwater. The “Tears of Allah,” as Bernard named them, pulsed from a broken pipe twenty feet overhead and fell in one seamless curtain to the floor. The pipe went unrepaired for five years, during which time they provided an away oasis for the tunnel dwellers. Ibid., p. 99.

You notice that it is never totally black in his tunnel during daylight hours. Grates allow light through, always enough to see something ... “And there is peace in the dark,” he says.” I sit here at night at the fire with a pot of tea and just the solitude of the tunnel. I think what I’ve discovered down here is that what one really seeks in life is peace of mind.” Ibid., p. 105.

Flimsy little saplings growing spontaneously where light filters down from above, lovingly look after cats and dogs, moving furnished rooms, tunnel-born children who reach adulthood already at the age of five or six, group set of organize themselves for survival and resistance to attacks, individuals who spend the whole day anxiously looking for and preparing food, a mysterious population living in the darkest depths of these labyrinthian tunnels that now communicates solely, and cries and grunts, and the voluntary network of information and mutual assistance. Maffi, p. 33.
It so happened that just to one side of my bench there was a big hole in the sidewalk, something like the Métro at home. That hole seemed propitious, so vast, with a stairway all of pink marble inside it. I’d seen quite a few people from the street disappear into it and come out again. It was in that underground vault that they answered the call of nature. I caught on right away. The hall where the business was done was likewise of marble. A kind of swimming pool, filled only with filtered, moribund light, which fell on the forms of unbuttoned men surrounded by their smells, red in the face from the effect of expelling their stinking feces with barbarous noises in front of everybody.

Céline, p. 168.

The obsession with what lies underneath the surface is peculiarly American, on a par with the obsession with what lies outside. Yet while the outside represents everything that is extraneous to the American way of life (the “alien,” the “foreigner,” and the “menace from outer space,” to use the terminology of mass cultural products, often so effective at unveiling the hidden dynamics of the society), the underneath is a far more disturbing dimension. This is because it acknowledges and openly declares that the threat (or, putting it more mildly, the sense of unease) comes from within — from something that is inside, buried in the labyrinthian tunnels of the past or the compressed layers of the present.

Maffi, p. 25.

The cavernous stations, dark, dirty, some desolate, some uncomfortably crowded, go by monotonously. The haunted quality of the neglected streets above reaches down into this long, seemingly never-ending tunnel.

Bladford, p. 178.

Town moles seem to be a little slow in trying the new gray-tiled and generously lighted tunnel that leads out of the new Socony-Mobil Tower to Grand Central terminal, to the Commodore, the Chanin and Chrysler Buildings, to the crosstown shuttle the Graybar, the Post Office, the Biltmore and—if you know the old route—clear up to the Roosevelt ant Forty-sixth Street.

On a rainy day, a knowing mole might work his way from Forty-first Street and Third Avenue all the way to Forty-sixth and Madison without feeling a drop. The first leg would take him through the Socony-Mobil concourse. The Warren to Grand Central was dug primarily to drain off the thousands who will work in that building; to keep them from flooding into Forty-second Street rush-hour traffic.

Berger, New York, p. 205.

Another time I walked through an underground section of the New York Public Library on Forty-second Street that carried steam pipes and was sufficiently remote from the rest of the library that employees who lived in boardinghouses and did their laundry in sinks in the library basement hung it in the tunnel to dry.

Wilkinson, p. 137.

Depths of disconcerting extent, tunnels, pipes and subway tangles lie under Bryant Park. The immense holes, as in lower row of drilled-out teeth, are filled with concreted steel, and are wired with copper nerves of enormous power.

Reisenberg, p. 183.
However high above the city we may rise, we can only see the above-ground levels of that logic. The guts and wires, the piping and phone lines and electric cables—also the subways and tunnels and underground passages—that make the city work, the hidden veins and arteries of urban life, remain concealed. The skin of concrete is largely unbroken, and so the essence of the city's genius invisible... Attempts to read the world from above always fail, then, and not least because we must, at some point, return to the ground. More important, our desires for transcendence cannot ever completely outstrip the material circumstances of their arousal. The tall building points up, inviting us to the sublimity of its summit. But it always stops at some point in the sky, cannot actually reach the heavens it indicates. Moreover, human desire being what it is, every tall building is also an invitation for another taller one to supplant it at this other summit, the abstract title of "world's tallest building." Tallness strains and collapses in the same moment.

Kingwell, p. 53.

Cosmic

Ginsberg’s vision while reading Blake in East Harlem, summer 1948: "The afternoon sunlight through the window takes on an extraordinary clarity. Silhouetted against the bright living light of the sky he sees the grimy rooftops of Harlem." It is the first time he looks carefully at the pressed metal cornices with their ornamental consoles and entablatures; he understand what human intelligence has gone into their creation, five decades before so that they can stand there "like buttresses in eternity!"

Everywhere he notices evidence of a living hand, even in the arrangement of bricks, and he is aware that each brick has been placed there by someone, that people build the entire vast city placing each stone and manufacturing each cornice and window-frame."

Miles, p. 99.

Holy New York
Ginsberg, p. 134.

Mohammedan angels staggering on tenement roofs illuminated
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 9.

the skyscrapers standing in the long streets like endless Jehovahs
Ibid., p. 84.

Perhaps those aren’t pushful cabs jockeying and tooting in the streets beneath us on the earth but angels silently going about their salvific business above us in the sky, logically revolving within the orbits fixed for them by the celestial grid.

Conrad, p. 121.

He imagines himself roller-skating down the streets into the sky, using the buildings as a launching pad, up the Flatiron Building, scooting across the cables of the Brooklyn Bridge.

Ibid., p. 187.

The lights on the Brooklyn Bridge at night resemble galaxies of falling stars, and the tops of the skyscrapers, stranded in the air by fog beneath, are like flaming meteorites held momentarily motionless in their tracks. A new DIVINITY makes itself immanent on the bridge, and a form of worship artists for it: a cult of fire and of the dynamo which is a demiurge, a tireless manufacturer of life.

_Ibid._, p. 133.

Four ballerinas in leap in concert from the dingy sidewalk against a discolored wall, watched by amazed children. They are visions in orbit through the city.

The nymphs who once fluttered down onto the city from the sky have returned to midair and live there in celibate clausturation.

_Ibid._, p. 175.

Once the city is geared for and goaded to transport itself into the future, its buildings begin to resent their anchorage to the earth.

_Ibid._, p. 257.

Firbank calls a skyscraper under construction on Fifth Avenue “a fifty-five story clouds’ rest.”

_Ibid._, p. 204.

The terrestrial city is a sunless underworld, impounding the condemned; the aerial city celestially abandons earth and the curse of materiality. The anti-gravitational city, whirling off into regions of scientific surmise, is no longer a mere city. It’s an alternative world, a small planet.

_Ibid._, p. 260.

What Freddy did when he got inside was go and take a bath. The apartment was stuffed with stage props and collage things—gold fabric covering bare brick walls, a Tintoretto-like eighteenth-century baroque heaven scene on the ceiling, a picture of some ballerinas framed with a toilet seat, a photograph of Orion the Witch of Bleecker Street, a portable wall of postage stamps, and so forth. After his bath, Freddy put Mozart’s _Coronation_ Mass on the hi-fi. He said he had a new ballet to do and he needed to be alone. He herded the people there out of the room. As the record got to the ‘Sanctus,’ he danced out the open window with a leap so huge he was carried halfway down the block onto Cornelia Street five stories below.

_Warhol, POPism_, pp. 107-8.

One night, I was walking with Billy Name and Freddy on the Lower East Side. There was no wind, but it was very cold, it was winter. We came to a group of buildings that were being razed. One of them was a church. There was sort of an altar place you could just make out in the rubble. Freddy rushed across the street into a store that was still open and bought a penny candle, came back and took all his clothes off, lit the candle, and danced through the set for the life of the candle.

_Ibid._, pp. 74-5.

On some winter afternoon, cross to the New Jersey Shore and between five and six take the Cortlandt Street Ferry back to Manhattan. At that hour and season it is already dark, but the offices are not yet closed; every window blazes with electric lights from which the mists have filtered our of the garishness. The distinction between buildings has disappeared now; only the sky-line wavers faintly against the glare beyond. The rest is just windows—by thousand and thousands. It all seems one enormous structure, a palace beyond human imagination for splendor and height and extent. A primitive man, magicked onto the Cortlandt Street Ferry at this hour would fall on his knees, believing that he saw the Heavenly City.
Irwin, p. 20.

From the Staten Island Ferry, Manhattan gleams like a mystic fantasy, the ideal image of a religious dream, the white fingers of the slender towers stretching in supplication towards the sky.
Conrad, p. 73.

One ship brings a group of thirty whirling dervishes to Ellis Island. Their religion forbids them to eat any food over which the shadow of an infidel had passed. To them all the cooks, waiters, and helpers on Ellis Island are infidels, so the dervishes refuse to eat.
Ellis, p. 34.

Two drunks in "May Day" stagger into the Biltmore and are sped skyward by the elevator. When they arrive at the top floor, they instruct the operator to have another story built on. One urges him "Higher," the other calls out "Heaven."
Conrad, p. 195.

Probably by 1982, transportation lines will operate hourly air ships between New York and Heaven itself.
Chase, p. 13.

Ronald Firbank was writing a novel set there at the time of his death in 1926, though he had never visited the city. His ignorance of it seemed to him a positive qualification, and he assured his publisher that New York would "be the New Jerusalem before I have done with it!"
Conrad, p. 198.

New Jersey is next door to the New Jerusalem.
Sharpe, p. 228.

An Arab entrepreneur on the Lower West Side who peddles "holy earth" from the Battery as a direct importation from Jerusalem.
Conrad, p. 69.

Heaven on Earth Bldg near the Williamsburg Bridge
O'Hara, p. 371.

Streetlights explode into stars, and Sixth Avenue becomes galactic.
Conrad, p. 81.

23rd Street runs into heaven.
Patchen, p. 53.

The philosopher H. B. Alexander devises a thematic scheme for the buildings that interpret the setback tiers as the stages by which man remounts to godliness. The steps induct the eye through the successive phases which Alexander calls "experience, understanding, magnanimity, prophecy."
Conrad, p. 261.
The cosmological aspiration of the elevator shaft, where man's vertical strife aims to free himself from want, from subjugation to material necessity, and from ethical ignorance.

N. cit.

Climbing the staircase in Radio City Music Hall also re-enacts an ascent to paradise, which the movies have made electrically recoverable.

Conrad, p. 261.

Up close, the skyscrapers are crass and hectoring. From afar they undergo a picturesque death as bodies to be reborn as spirits: their material fabrication melted into a thing unreal.

Ibid., p. 73.

It was something which was completely new and nearly fairy-tale-like for a European in those days.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 106.

Pervading ill, suspended between the layers of the skin, like the distillate of ruddy smoke, is the secondary sexual sweat—public, Orphic, mammalian—a heavy incense smuggled in by night on velvet pads of musk. No one is immune, not even the Mongoloid idiot. It washed over you like the brush and passage of camisole breasts. In a light rain it makes an invisible ethereal mud. It is of every hour, even when rabbits are boiled to a stew. It glistens in the tubes, the follicles, the papillaries. As the earth slowly wheels, the stoops and banisters turn and the children with them; in the murky haze of sultry nights all that is terrene, volupt and fatidical hums like a zither. A heavy wheel plated with fodder and feather-beds, with little sweet-oil lamps and drops of pure animal sweat. All goes round and round, creaking, lumbering, whimpering sometimes, but round and round and round. Then, if you become very still, standing on a stoop, for instance, and carefully think no thoughts, a myopic, bestial clarity besets your vision. There is a wheel, there are spokes, and there is a hub. And in the center of the hub there is—exactly nothing. It is where the great goes, and the axle. And you are there, in the center of nothingness, sentient, fully expanded, whirring with the whirl of planetary wheels. Everything becomes alive and meaningful, even yesterday's snot which clings to the door knob. Everything sags and droops, is mossed with wear and care; everything has been looked at thousands of times, rubbed and caressed by the occipital eye.

Miller, Sexus, pp. 535-7.

In 1908 he sets out on a hopeful religious quest in the streets, but is disappointed. He has been asked by a newspaper to provide a drawing of the head of Christ. He goes for a walk, scrutinizing "the face of each Jew I met to see some Christlike traits," searching for divinity in the crowd. He finds no one who qualifies for the role.

Conrad, p. 94.

We put out an anonymous leaflet telling people to ether at St. Mark's Place at 9 P.M., to wait for a signal from God.

Hoffman, Autobiography, p. 104

We bought two pounds of magnesium which we packed in coffee tins and put on the roofs around St. Mark's Place. Then we rigged the cans with delay fuses by shoving lighted cigarettes in match packs. Once done, we raced down to the streets where people were milling around, waiting for God. All of a sudden the whole sky lit up with a huge blast of exploding magnesium.

New York builds apartments even in its churches. Thus, Broadway Temple at 174th Street and Broadway is an apartment house-church or church-apartment house, whichever you please, and so is the Calvary Baptist on 57th Street between Sixth and Seventh Avenues.

Josephy, pp. 224-25.

Next to the steeple of St. Mark’s Church a skywriting plane traces an arabesque of smoke. Of course, the plane is far above and beyond the church, but they share the same two-dimensional space, and contest it. The elegant tapering spire is contradicted by the writhing coil of smoke. The tower is mottled and spotted by age; in contrast with its endurance, the smoke wraps itself into the shape of a spring, a device for storing energy, which is doomed to exhaustion and will, when emitted, soon evaporate. Both building and machine have proclamations to make: the age of faith here meets the age of advertising.

In the pre-dawn of Manhattan the doormen and night watchmen—hovering in front of their buildings, sitting on the loading docks, leaning against alley gates, wispy cigarette smoke curling from their mouths into an ink sky—could be spectral sentinels of another world.

Goodman, Secret, p. 9.

It is impossible to measure the miraculous; comets cannot be calipered. Try to stretch a sentence so as to turn a fourth dimension, attempt to make a stubborn paragraph reflect the things you feel but cannot see. All such speculations lead to bedlam. But the subject, the city, is here, and so are the people and the times.

In a city where sphinxes occupy the information booths, where secrets of the future are sold with a cup of tea, where guides get lost, where policemen commit murders and padres put out fires, nothing, however fantastical, is beyond the reach of being.

Reisenberg, p. 97.

And, in the last hour of night, not a moonlit night, but a blue-black night clear as the road to eternity, showing nonillions of suns, mighty stars that marked the infinite directions, I am is the brain-defying question: what lies beyond the end, the final star? On such a night, cold, hard, when pavements ring and the city sleeps, I think if New York is being no more real than is the pattern overhead.

Darkness to mute harsh actuality: observing the Brooklyn Bridge at dusk when the “bold outlines” of the buildings will be softened. If you adopt the right point of vantage and if the weather concurs, the headquarters of Mammon can be seen evanescing into a New Jerusalem, purging itself of cupidity, casting off solidity. The Woolworth Building, thus atmospherically gilded and pardoned, becomes a “Cathedral of Commerce,” soaring “like a battlement of the paradise of a God which St. John beheld.” [Commodity] [Bridge]

Conrad, p. 72.
The Lincoln Tunnel: hell with tiled walls.
Roth, p. 98.

A metropolis forever in the making,
Lindner, p. 107.

The illuminated numerals 666 appear atop 666 Fifth Ave. in 1958.
Trager, p. 620.

Lewis Mumford called New York his Walden Pond.
Miller, Supreme, p. 443.

To return to New York is to repossess it.
Brook, p. 16.

It is a good city to leave, for in your absence it will continue to live and breathe and grow, and, in its altered state, like a body in which most of the cells have been replaced, it will be ready for you when, as you surely will, you return.

A sense of still-here pervades even the bits that are long-standing. To stand in Fairway on a Saturday afternoon, where the olive-oil tasting goes on alongside the search for monster boxes of All, or to walk through the meatpacking district, now decarcassed, where the twenty-somethings send each other—what, exactly, I don’t know—billet-doux of the newer kind, is to see a world of engagement, of brief exchanges, of bumping into, something that certainly feels necessary and urgent, not indulgent and nostalgic. Every time I take a taxi home from La Guardia, I don’t feel anything like nostalgia (as I must admit I do when the cab from the airport turns toward Paris) but rather wonder, relief—relief that it’s still there, that I will be there soon, delivered from the netherworld of other places, my flat feet solidly on the flat ground.
Gopnik, pp. 294-5.

McKim, Mead and White instilling a sense of permanence to New York, the desire to endure.
Hawes, N. pag.
New York replaced by another city.
Sante, "My Lost City," N. pag.

“What a ruin it will make!,” H.G. Wells is reported to have said upon first seeing the skyline of Manhattan.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 388

In this ruined city, there are only landmarks.
Ibid., p. 388.

New York is scenic only in an emergency.
Conrad, p. 257.

Manhattan is an accumulation of disasters that never happen.
Koolhaas, p. 27.

The city as magnificent catastrophe.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 7.

Le Corbusier: “A hundred times I have thought, New York is a catastrophe, and fifty times: it is a beautiful catastrophe.”
Corbuiser, p. 90.

What will be the end of this carnival? If historical precedent counts for anything, it will go on to catastrophe. But what sort of catastrophe? I hesitate to venture a prophecy... The thing simply cannot last. If it does not end by catastrophe, then it will end by becoming stale, which is to say, dull.
Mencken, Chrestomathy, p. 189.

The apocalypse Oldenburg imagines for New York is an appetitive luxury. The intersection of Canal Street and Broadway—which is the putative site where the atom bomb will be dropped—is a premature funeral pile of concrete. The block would be so crushingly heavy that it would subside through the pavement and crush the subway tunnels underneath. But for Oldenburg this disaster is a soft, edible expiry, a delicious molten death. He first thought of the concrete slab as a pat of butter. Its sinking through the street, foreknowing the end of New York, would be the butter’s trickling and seeping into the crevices of a hot baked potato.
Conrad, p. 320.

Films in which New York City is damaged, destroyed, or otherwise devastated: King Kong (1933) — destroyed by a giant monster rampage; Five (1951) — destroyed by nuclear weapons; When Worlds Collide (1951) — destroyed by multiple natural disasters; Invasion U.S.A. (1952) — destroyed by a nuclear war; Captive Women (1952) — unknown cause of destruction of the city; The Beast from 20,000 Fathoms (1953) — destroyed by a giant monster rampage; Earth vs. the Flying Saucers (1956) — destroyed by an alien invasion; The World, the Flesh and the Devil (1959) — the city was not destroyed, but it was abandoned from a "radioactive disease"; The Day the Sky Exploded (1961) — destroyed by multiple natural disasters; Fail-Safe (1964) — destroyed by nuclear war and plane crashes; Destroy All Monsters (1968) — destroyed by Godzilla.

All dwellers in cities must live with the stubborn fact of annihilation; in New York the fact is somewhat more concentrated because of the concentration of the city itself, and because, of all targets, New York has a certain clear priority. In the mind of whatever perverted dreamer might loose the lightning, New York must hold a steady, irresistible charm.

White, Here, p. 54.

Mass hysteria is a terrible force, yet New Yorkers seem always to escape it by some tiny margin: they sit in stalled subways without claustrophobia, they extricate themselves from panic situations by some lucky wisecrack, they meet confusion and congestion with patience and grit—a sort of perpetual muddling through. Every facility is inadequate—the hospitals and schools and playgrounds are overcrowded, the express highways are feverish, the unimproved highways and bridges are bottlenecks; there is not enough air and not enough light, and there is usually either too much heat or too little. But the city makes up for its hazards and its deficiencies by supplying its citizens with massive doses of a supplementary vitamin—the sense of belonging to something unique, cosmopolitan, mighty and unparalleled.

The subtlest change is something people don’t speak much about but that is in everyone’s mind. The city, for the first time in its long history, is destructible.

Nothing’s worked, so let’s get right to Armageddon.
McNeil, p. 256.

This is not hell, but the street.
Lorca, Collected, p. 123.

Tongues of flame crackle from Broadway, and the theater district is a scorching hell.
Conrad, p. 73.

To plunge into the streets is like Dante's descent into Hades.
Ibid., p. 260.

Brooklyn is a seething cauldron which fuels the war machine.
Ibid., p. 136

Futurism makes an inferno of New York.
Ibid., p. 136.

Lower Manhattan is a furnace of crimson flames, from which there is no escape. Cars, railways, ferries, all have ceased, and never a light lights the way of the distracted fugitives in the dusky confusion but the light of burning... Dust and black smoke come pouring into the street, and are presently shot with red flame.
Wells, pp. 210–1.

Utterly empty, a vast open terrain. Block after block—how many?—six? eight? a dozen?—entire blocks of the city without a building left standing. There are streets and curbing and sidewalks and light poles and nothing else. The eerie grid of a city is spread out before him, lit by the chemical yellow of the street lamps. Here and there are traces of rubble and slag. The earth looks like concrete, except that it rolls down this way... and up that way... the hills and dales of the Bronx... reduced to asphalt, concrete, and cinders ... in a ghastly yellow gloaming.
Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 83.

Many of the buildings appear deserted or semi-deserted. Many have stained marble facades and steps. The streets are narrow. A park...is a twisted tangle of roots and vines and misshapen trees.
Burroughs, p. 1745.

He sees smoky air, smells the gassy fumes, sees the harried thousands charging through the narrow streets.
Atkinson, p. 263.

At a corner they look up Broadway, narrow and scorched as if a fire has gutted it.
O'Connell, p. 141.

Skyscrapers shake in laughter and fall down

The tower of St. Paul's in lower Manhattan looks as if its vertebral column has snapped, leaving its separate levels knocking about independently of each other; the arches of the Brooklyn Bridge tilt giddily to one side; the Municipal Building seems about to teeter forward into the crevasse of a street; and the structures flanking the Telephone Building dash themselves insensible on its sides.
Conrad, p. 128.

She grips my arm, whispering, "The Plaza Hotel is gone!"

Finney, p. 141.

We dream through the saffron glow of a contaminated sunset, fearsomely prescient in our imaginings, seeing red-beaked cormorants and green-clawed vultures with jagged wings wheeling over a spread of ragged ruins.

A single flight of planes no bigger than a wedge of geese ends this island fantasy, burns the towers, crumbles the bridges, turns the underground passages into lethal chambers, cremates the millions. The intimation of mortality is part of New York now: in the sound of jets overhead, in the black headlines of the latest edition.

White, Here, p. 54.

Airships sail along, smashing up the city as a child will shatter its cities of brick and card. Below, they leave ruins and blazing conflagrations and heaped and scattered dead: men, women and children mix together as though they are no more than Moors, or Zulus, or Chinese.

Ibid., pp. 182–3.

In the gaps between skyscrapers, full of blazing ore, where the steel of trains came clattering by, an aeroplane falls with a final roar into the fluid oozing from the sun’s hurt eye.

Mayakovsky, “Great Big,” p. 505.

An avaricious dragon coils round the Woolworth Building flaps its scaly wings, while albino alligators frolic in the sewers beneath Rector Street.

A pencil sketch of the Woolworth Building traces the course of the apparently foundering skyscraper as it crumples through the air.

Ibid., p. 128.

When daybreak comes we zoom through New Jersey with the great cloud of Metropolitan New York rising before us in the snowy distance. Dean has a sweater wrapped around his ears to keep warm. He says we are a band of Arabs coming to blow up New York.

Kerouac, Road, p. 117.

It is hard to believe the enormity of these ruins. They go on and on, block after block, mile after mile, year after year. Some blocks seem almost intact, with live people—but the look around the corner, and there is no corner.

Berman, Calling, p. 19.

Buildings disappear overnight in the city, like black rhinos from the African savanna. In the morning only a smoking pile of brick and mortar is left, the skin and bones.

O’Connell, p. 299.
Upon waking, New York is startled by seeing, in huge red letters, on every blank wall, on the bare flanks of towering sky-scrapers, on the lofty stations of aeroplane lines, on bill-boards, fences, advertising-boards along suburban roads, in the Subway stations, and fluttering from strings of kites over the city, the following announcement:

THE WORLD IS TO BE DROWNED!
Save Yourselves While It Is Yet Time!
Drop Your Business: It Is of No Consequence!
Build Arks: It Is Your Only Salvation!
The Earth Is Going To Plunge into a Watery Nebula: There Is No Escape!
Hundreds of Millions Will Be Drowned: You Have Only a Few Months To Get Ready!

When New York recovers from its first astonishment over the extraordinary posters, it indulges in a loud laugh. New York laughs a whole day and night at the warning red letters. They are the talk of the town. People joke about them in cafés, clubs, at home, in the streets, in the offices, in the exchanges, in the street-cars, on the Elevated, in the Subways. Crowds gather on corners to watch the flapping posters aloft on the kite lines. The afternoon newspapers issue specials which are all about the coming flood, and everywhere one hears the cry of the newsboys: "Extra-a-a! Drowning of a Thousand Million people! Predicts the End of the World!" On their editorial pages the papers are careful to discount the scare lines, and terrific pictures, that cover the front sheets, with humorous jibes at the author of the formidable prediction.

Serviss, p. 18.

It begins with the skeleton tower itself, which has only once or twice been exceeded in height by the famous structures of the era of skyscrapers. In some places the granite skin is in situ, but almost everywhere it has been stripped off, probably by the tremendous waves which sweep over it as the flood attains its first thousand feet of elevation. There are no living forms, except a few curiously shaped phosphorescent creatures of no great size, which scurry away out of the beam of the search-light. There is no trace of the millions of beings who have been swallowed up in this vast grave. The soil of Madison Square has evidently been washed away, for no signs of the trees which have once shaded it are seen, and a reddish ooze has begun to collect upon the exposed rocks. All around are the shattered ruins of other great buildings, some, like the Metropolitan tower, retain their steel skeletons, while others tumble down, lying half-buried in the ooze.

Finding nothing of great interest in this neighborhood they turn the course of the bell northward, passing everywhere over interminable ruins, and as soon as they begin to skirt the ridge of Morningside Heights, the huge form of the cathedral of St. John falls within the circle of projected light. It is unroofed, and some of the walls have fallen, but some of the immense arches retain their upright position. Here, for the first time, they encounter the real giants of the submarine depths. One creature, which seems to be the unresisted master of this kingdom of phosphorescent life, appears to have exceeded in strangeness the utmost descriptive powers of all those who look upon it, for their written accounts are filled with jaculations, and are more or less inconsistent with one another. The reader gathers from them, however, the general impression that it makes upon their astonished minds.

Avoiding the neighborhood of the cathedral, they steer the bell down the former course of the Hudson, but afterward venture once more over the drowned city until they arrive at the site of the great station of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which they find completely unroofed. They sink the bell into the vast space where the tunnels enter from underneath the old river bed, and again they have a startling experience. Something huge, elongated, spotted, and provided with expanding claw-like limbs, slowly withdraws as their light streams upon the reddish ooze covering the great station floor. This nondescript animal retreats backward into the mouth of a tunnel. They endeavor, cautiously, to follow it, turning a magnifying window in its direction, and obtain a startling view of its glaring eyes, but the creature hastens its retreat, and the last glimpse they have is of a grotesque head, which throws out piercing rays of green fire as it passes deeper into the tunnel.

They are terror-stricken now, and pushing the propellers to their utmost, they flee toward the site of the Metropolitan Tower. On their way, although for a time they pass over the course of the East River, they see no signs of the great bridges except the partly demolished but yet beautiful towers of the oldest of them, which had been constructed of heavy granite blocks.

Ibid., pp. 369-70.

The actual drowning of New York cannot happen until the Hudson and the East River should become so swollen that the water will stand above the level of the highest buildings, and turn the whole region round about, as far as the Orange hills, the Ramapo Mountains, the Highlands, and the Housatonic hills, into an inland sea.

Ibid., p. 116.

In this unearthly light, many tall structures of the metropolis, which had as yet escaped the effects of undermining by the rushing torrents in the streets, tower dimly toward the sky, shedding streams of water from every cornice. Most of the buildings of only six or eight stories have already been submerged, with the exception of those that stand on the high grounds in the upper part of the island, and about Spuyten Duyvil.

In the towers and upper stories of the lofty buildings still standing in the hecrows of unfortunates assemble, gazing with horror at the spectacles around them, and wringing their hands in helpless despair. When the light brightens they can see below them the angry water, creeping every instant closer to their places of refuge, beaten into foam by the terrible downpour, and sometimes, moved by a mysterious impulse, rising in sweeping waves which threaten to carry everything before them. Every few minutes one of the great structures sways, cracks, crumbles, and goes down into the seething flood, the cries of the lost souls being swallowed up in the thunder of the fall. And when this occurs within sight of neighboring towers yet intact, men and women can be seen, some with children in their arms, madly throwing themselves from windows and ledges, seeking quick death now that hope is no more!

Strange and terrible scenes are enacted in the neighborhood of what had been the water-fronts. Most of the vessels moored there have been virtually wrecked by the earlier invasion of the sea. Some have been driven upon the shore, others have careened and been swamped at their wharves. But a few have succeeded in cutting loose in time to get fairly afloat. Some try to go out to sea, but are wrecked by running against obstacles, or by being swept over the Jersey flats. Some meet their end by crashing into the submerged pedestal of the Statue of Liberty. Others steer up the course of the Hudson River, which has become a narrow sea, filled with floating and tossing debris of every sort, and all landmarks being invisible, the luckless navigators lose their way, and perish, either through collisions with other vessels, or by driving upon a rocky shore.

The fate of the gigantic building containing the offices of the municipal government, which stand near the ancient City Hall, and which have been the culminating achievement of the famous epoch of "sky-scrapers," is a thing so singular, and at the same time dramatic, that in a narrative dealing with less extraordinary events than we are obliged to record, it would appear altogether incredible. With its twoscore lofty stories, and its massive base, this wonderful structure rises above the lower quarter of the city, and dominates it, like a veritable Tower of Babel, made to defy the flood. Many thousands of people evidently regard it in that very light, and they have fled from all quarters, as soon as the great downpour begins, to find refuge within its mountainous flanks. There are men—clerks, merchants, brokers from the downtown offices—and women and children from neighboring tenements.

Ibid., pp. 133-4.

In the middle of the night, at New York, hundreds of thousands simultaneously awake with a feeling of suffocation. They struggle for breath as if they have suddenly been plunged into a steam bath. The air is hot, heavy, and terribly oppressive. The throwing open of windows brings no relief. The outer air is as stifling as that within. It is so dark that, on looking out, one cannot see his own doorsteps. The arc-lamps in the street flicker with an ineffective blue gleam which sheds no illumination round about. House lights, when turned on, look like tiny candles inclosed in thick blue globes. Frightened men and women stumble around in the gloom of their chambers trying to dress themselves. Cries and exclamations ring from room to room; children wail; hysterical mothers run wildly hither and thither, seeking their little ones. Many faint, partly through terror and partly from the difficulty of breathing. Sick persons, seized with a terrible oppression of the chest, gasping, never rising from their beds.

At every window, and in every doorway, throughout the vast city, invisible heads and forms are crowded, making their presence known by their voices—distracted householders strive to peer through the strange darkness, and to find out the cause of these terrifying phenomena. Some manage to get a faint glimpse of their watches by holding them close against lamps, and thus note the time. It is two o'clock in the morning. Neighbors, unseen, call to one another, but get little comfort from the replies.

Ibid., pp. 57-8.

Just at the time when the waters have mounted to the eighteenth story of the beleaguered Municipal Building, a sudden change occurs in these currents. They sweep westward with resistless force, and the Uncle Sam is carried directly over the drowned city. First she encounters the cables of the Manhattan Bridge, strikes them near the western tower, and, swinging round, wrenches the tower itself from its foundations and hurls it beneath the waters.

Then she rushes on, riding with the turbid flood high above the buried roofs, finding no other obstruction in her way until she approaches the Municipal Building, which is stoutly resisting the push of the waves.

Those who are near the windows and on the balconies, on the eastern side of the building, see the great battleship coming out of the gray gloom like some diluvian monster, and before they can comprehend what it is, it crashes, prow on, into the steel-ribbed walls, driving them in as if they had been the armored sides of an enemy. So tremendous is the momentum of the striking mass that the huge vessel passes, like a projectile, through walls and floors and partitions. But as she emerges in the central court the whole vast structure comes thundering down upon her, and ship and building together sink beneath the boiling waves. But out of the awful tangle of steel girders, that whips the air and the water as if some terrible spidery life yet clings to them, by one of those miracles of chance which defy all the laws of probability and reason, a small boat of levium, that belongs to the Uncle Sam, is cast forth, and floats away, half submerged but unsinkable; and clinging to its thwarts, struggles for breath, insane with terror, are two men, the sole survivors of all those thousands.

Ibid., pp 204-5.

Night is now beginning once more to drop an obscuring curtain over the scene, and under that curtain the last throes of drowning New York are hidden. When the sun again faintly illuminates the western hemisphere, the whole Atlantic seaboard is buried under the sea.

Ibid., p. 141.

As the light becomes stronger, he says, "Steer toward New York. I wish to see if the last of the tall buildings on the upper heights have gone under."

Ibid., p. 143.

Where New York had stood nothing is visible but an expanse of turbid and rushing water.

Ibid., p. 144.

A tremendous bolt, which seems to have entered the Pennsylvania tunnel on the Jersey side, follows the rails under the river, throwing two trains from the track, and, emerging in the great station in the heexpands into a rose-colored sphere, which explodes with an awful report, and blows the great roof to pieces. And yet, although the fragments are scattered a dozen blocks away, hundreds of persons who are in the stations suffer no other injury than such as resulted from being flung violently to the floor, or against the walls.

Ibid., p. 45.

Others make their way to the roofs, persuaded that the flood is already inundating the basements and the lower stories of their dwellings.

Ibid., p. 62.

Alarm deepens into terror when the time for the tide to ebb arrives and there is no ebbing. On the contrary, the water continues to rise. The government observer at the Highlands telephones that Sandy Hook is submerged. Soon it is known that Coney Island, Rockaway, and all the seaside places along the south shore of Long Island are under water. The mighty current pours in through the Narrows with the velocity of a mill-race. The Hudson, set backward on its course, rushes northward with a raging bore at its head that swells higher until it licks the feet of the rock chimneys of the Palisades.

Ibid., p. 67.

Out over the incredible mausoleum of civilization they peer. Now and again they fortify their vision by recourse to the telescope. Nowhere, as he says, is any slightest sign of life to be discerned. Nowhere a thread of smoke rises; nowhere a sound echoes upward. Dead lies the city, between its rivers, whereon now no sail glints in the sunlight, no tug puffs vehemently with plumy jets of steam, no liner idles at anchor or noses its slow course out to sea. The Jersey shore, the Palisades, the Bronx and Long Island all lay buried in dense forests of conifers and oak, with only here and there some skeleton mockery of a steel structure jutting through. The islands in the harbor, too, are thickly overgrown. On Ellis, no sign of the immigrant station remains. Castle William is quite gone. And with a gasp of dismay and pain, she points out the fact that no longer Liberty holds her bronze torch aloft. Save for a black, misshapen mass protruding through the tree-tops, the huge gift of France is no more. Fringing the water-front, all the way round, the mournful remains of the docks and piers lie in a mere sodden jumble of decay, with an occasional hulk sunk alongside. Even over these wrecks of liners, vegetation is growing rank and green. All the wooden ships, barges and schooners have utterly vanished. The sun, declining, shoots a broad glory all across the sky. Purple and gold and crimson lie the light-bands over the breast of the Hudson. Dark blue the shadows stream across the ruined city with its crowding forests, its blank-staring windows and sagging walls, its thousands of gaping vacancies, where wood and stone and brick have crumbled down—the city where once the tides of human life had ebbed and flowed, roaring restlessly. High overhead drifts a few rosy clouds, part of that changeless nature which alone does not repel or mystify these two beleaguered waifs, these chance survivors, this man, this woman, left alone together by the hand of fate.

People who expected at any moment to feel the water pitilessly rising about them look out of their windows, and are astonished to see only tiny rivulets which are already shriveling out of sight in the gutters. In a few minutes there is no running water left, although the dampness on the walls and walks show how great the humidity of the air has been.

Serviss, p 63.

“...The Titanic was unsinkable—yet she went down; our skyscrapers are unburnable—yet we shall have a skyscraper disaster that will stagger humanity.‖—Alfred Ludwig, NYC Chief Buildings Inspector, 1911.

Glanz, pp. 129-30.

For the first time in its history, it could not be seen; it could not be heard; it made no sign. As far as any outward indication of its existence was concerned the mighty capital had ceased to be.

Ibid., p. 60.
That's how all New York anecdotes seem to end: "It was a nightmare."
Klosterman, p. 39.
Postscript

It is a miracle that New York works at all. The whole thing is implausible. Every time the residents brush their teeth, millions of gallons of water must be drawn from the Catskills and the hills of Westchester. When a young man in Manhattan writes a letter to his girl in Brooklyn, the love message gets blown to her through a pneumatic tube—pfft—just like that. The subterranean system of telephone cables, power lines, steam pipes, gas mains and sewer pipes is reason enough to abandon the island to the gods and the weevils. Every time an incision is made in the pavement, the noisy surgeons expose ganglia that are tangled beyond belief. By rights New York should have destroyed itself long ago, from panic or fire or rioting or failure of some vital supply line in its circulatory system or from some deep labyrinthine short circuit. Long ago the city should have experienced an insoluble traffic snarl at some impossible bottleneck. It should have perished of hunger when food lines failed for a few days. It should have been wiped out by a plague starting in its slums or carried in by ships’ rats. It should have been overwhelmed by the sea that licks at it on every side. The workers in its myriad cells should have succumbed to nerves, from the fearful pall of smoke-fog that drifts over every few days from Jersey, blotting out all light at noon and leaving the high offices suspended, men groping and depressed, and the sense of world’s end. It should have been touched in the head by the August heat and gone off its rocker.

White, Here is New York, p. 31.
THEORY
I look to theory when I realize that somebody has dedicated their entire life to a question I have only fleetingly considered.
I used to be an artist; then I became a poet; then a writer. Now when asked, I simply refer to myself as a word processor.
Writing should be as effortless as washing the dishes -- and as interesting.
Hunter S. Thompson retyped Hemingway & Fitzgerald novels. He said, "I just want to know what it feels like to write these words."
Obama regularly copies his speechwriter's work out in longhand on legal pads in pencil: "It helps organize my thoughts."
If you're not making art with the intention of having it copied, you're not really making art for the twenty-first century.
From producer to reproducer.
The internet is destroying literature (and it's a good thing).
"Plagiarism is necessary," Lautréamont insisted. "Progress implies it."
Authenticity is another form of artifice.
It is possible to be both inauthentic and sincere.
The moment you stand up in front of people, you are no longer authentic.
The telling of a true story is an unnatural act.
My writing is political writing; it just prefers to use someone else's politics.
I always had mixed feelings about being considered a poet. If Robert Lowell was a poet, I don't want to be a poet. If Robert Frost was a poet, I don't want to be a poet. If Socrates was a poet, I'll consider it.
Art dealer to Captain Beefheart: "You'll never be respected as an artist -- you'll always be a musician that paints. If you really want to be a painter, you have to stop doing music." Not long after, Captain Beefheart began referring to himself as a painter named Don Van Vliet.
A child could do what I do, but wouldn't dare to for fear of being called stupid.
Futurism made flesh, Barry Bonds is a lovechild of William S. Burroughs ("We ourselves are machines") and Andy Warhol ("I want to be a machine").

Reporter: How do you feel when you are greeted by a resounding chorus of boos when you step on the field?

Barry Bonds: I turn it into a symphony.
Gravitas is obsolete.
Boring & long-winded writings encourage a kind of effortless nonunderstanding, a language in which reading itself seems perfectly redundant.
"The internet is of no relevance at all to writing fiction, which expresses verities only found through observation & introspection," said Will Self.
Jonathan Franzen famously wrote portions of The Corrections wearing blinders and earplugs to reduce disruptions.
Jonathan Franzen is America's greatest novelist... of the 1950s.
The new memoir is our browser history.
Writers are becoming curators of language, a move similar to the emergence of the curator as artist in the visual arts.
Sampling and citation are but boutique forms of appropriation.
Remixing is often mistaken for appropriation.
Our poetry has eerily begun to resemble data trails.
Poetry is an evacuated and orphaned space, begging to be repurposed. The new poetry will look nothing like the old.
The internet is the greatest poem ever written, unreadable mostly because of its size.
An article in China Daily refers to a young worker who copied a dozen novels, signed his name, and published a collection of "his works."
Alphanumeric code, indistinguishable from writing, is the medium by which the internet has solidified its grip on literature.
Richard Prince recently took America's most valuable literary property, The Catcher in the Rye, and made drop-dead facsimiles of the first edition. Everywhere Salinger's name appeared, Prince substituted his. He sells a signed copy bearing the signature of "Richard Prince" for whatever Salinger's signed first edition is going for that day.
Contemporary writing is the evacuation of content.
The future of writing is the managing of emptiness.
The future of writing is pointing.
The future of writing is not writing.
The future of reading is not reading.
The human entity formerly known as "the reader."
John Cage and Morton Feldman in 1967. Feldman was complaining about being at the beach, annoyed by transistor radios “blaring out rock and roll,” and Cage responded, “You know how I adjusted to that problem of the radio in the environment? Very much as the primitive people adjusted to the animals which frightened them, and which, probably as you say, were intrusions. They drew pictures of them on their caves. And so I simply made a piece using radios. Now whenever I hear radios -- even a single one, not just twelve at a time, as you must have heard on the beach -- I think, well, they’re just playing my piece.”
Andy Warhol said, "My style was always to spread out, anyway, rather than move up. To me, the ladder of success was much more sideways than vertical."
Stasis is the new movement.
The writers' desk is beginning to resemble a laboratory or small business office rather than the contemplative study it once was.
A good poem is very boring. In a perfect world all sentences would have an overall sameness.
Start copying what you love. Copying, copying, copying. And at the end of the copy, you will find yourself.
On copying: It's not a bug. It's a feature.
Bob Dylan on appropriation: wussies & pussies complain about it.
The regulation of intellectual property is a euphemized form of corporate control -- and a futile one at that.
They spoke of the idea that in China, additional books are written and inserted into extant canons. There are ten Harry Potter books in the Chinese series as opposed to the seven penned by J.K. Rowling.
Individual creativity is a dogma of contemporary soft capitalism, rather than the domain of non-conformist artists: fiction is everywhere.
Toward the end of his life, Alexander Trocchi rewrote his early manuscripts in longhand and sold them to collectors as originals.
Ted Berrigan stole books by famous authors and forged their autographs. He then sold them back to the dealers he stole them from at greatly increased prices.
We don't need the new sentence. The old sentence reframed is good enough.
Today's plagiarism and copyright battles are to the 21st century what the obscenity trials were to the 20th.
At Tony Oursler's retrospective at the Williams College Museum of Art, upstairs, buried deep within the galleries, the artist had set up a microphone into which anyone could step up and speak. What they said would be broadcast into the entrance atrium of the museum. There were no restrictions on what you could say, only a small note reminding the speaker to be sensitive of others and a gentle suggestion to refrain from swearing. When it was my turn, I said in my clearest and most radio-like voice, "May I have your attention. May I have your attention. The museum is now closing. Please make your way to the exit. Thank you for visiting." Although it was hours away from closing time, I repeated the announcement again and saw in the video monitor that was provided, people streaming toward the exit. Again, I made my announcement. At once, a frantic, elderly guard came running up to me, grabbed my arm and said, "You're not allowed to say that!" When I told him that there was nothing prohibiting me from saying it, he again told me that I wasn't allowed. "Why?" I asked. "Because it's not true," he replied. "You must stop saying that right now." Of course I repeated my announcement once again. This poor man was really struggling with what to do with me. He knew that while I wasn't breaking any real laws, by questioning the institution's authority I was breaking an unwritten social contract.
There are no 'correct' readings. Only reproductions and possibilities.
Q: Why do you think practices of appropriation are much less acceptable to people in terms of the written word? Why is it a much bigger deal to plagiarize writing?

Jonathan Lethem: Literary criticism is too closely intertwined with newspaper journalism. So whereas other fields of art reception are successfully partitioned from the ethos of journalists, book reviewers are usually newspapermen who fancy themselves book reviewers. The field of book reviewing so totally overwhelms academic literary criticism in terms of influence, and journalists are of course obsessed with journalistic notions of plagiarism, sources, and inaccuracy. These standards migrate far too much in the realm of literary writing.
The problem isn't piracy. The problem is obscurity.
Being well-enough known to be pirated is a crowning achievement. Most artists want first and foremost to be loved and secondly to make history; money is a distant third.
Information is like a bank. Our job is to rob that bank.
I find the idea of recycling language to be politically and ecologically sustainable, one which promotes reuse and reconditioning as opposed to the manufacture and consumption of the new. It's an attitude that counteracts rampant global capitalist consumption by admitting that language is not able to be owned or possessed -- that it is a shared resource. So in this way, these ideas are more ideologically in line with marxist thought than anything else. Also, because of the sheer volume of language -- an ecosystem yielding limitless resources -- there's never a chance of scarcity; it's a landscape of abundance. Yet -- and this is where it gets interesting -- conceptual writing's obsession with the latest technology, the hoarding of language, its celebration of baroque excess and so forth, aligns it with often nefarious global capitalist tendencies. In addition, there's an imperialistic aspect of the movement; in terms of its internationalism, it's the first worldwide poetry movement since concrete poetry since both are predicated upon transnational uses of language (concrete poetry being visual, conceptual being unreadable). As a result, the movement is spreading rapidly around the globe, threatening to take on characteristics of a huge multinational monsters. All of these contradictions, I feel, are part of the discourse of conceptualism, which is an ideologically fluid movement embracing impurity and guilty pleasures, shunning received notions of purity, authenticity, or absolute claims of truth.
I’m not really a poet, but poetry was the only field open enough to accept my ideas, so I became a poet by default.
The poet as anti-hero.
Soliloquy was a book of every word I spoke for a week, from the moment I woke up on a Monday morning until the moment I went to sleep Sunday night. It was horrible, turning out to be 600 pages of gossip and pettiness. I lost many friends as a result. While some forgave me, many still will not speak to me some two decades later.
Listening to music has become literary, requiring typing and sorting; we select what we hear based on keywords.
We skim, parse, bookmark, copy, paste, forward, share, and spam. Reading is the last thing we do with language.
We spend much more time acquiring, cataloging and archiving our artifacts these days than we do actually engaging with them. The ways in which culture is distributed and archived has become profoundly more intriguing than the cultural artifact itself. As a result, we've experienced an inversion of consumption, preferring the bottles to the wine.
Interest has shifted from the object to the information.
People insist upon self-expression. I really am opposed to it. I don't think people should express themselves in that kind of way.
Shortly before he died, we were invited to dinner at Merce Cunningham's loft on Sixth Avenue. Upon entering, we were astonished to see numerous priceless works of art lining the walls. When we inquired "Is that...?" we were unceremoniously cut off and told that everything here is what you think it is. There were works by Johns, Rauschenberg, and even a little Duchamp Czech Check framed in a 70s plexiglass frame close the floor, covered in cooking grease, dust and cat piss. Over many valuable works of art were leaky skylights. During dinner we asked Merce what would happen if one of these works were damaged. He smiled and said, "But of course our friends would just make us another."
If you do something wrong for long enough people will eventually think of it as right.
Art is a license to do things wrong. The rest of the world tries to get it right. We revel in doing it wrong, not knowing, breaking things.
The necessity of bad transcription: working to make sure that the pages in the book matched the way the high-school typist had transcribed them, right down to the last spelling mistake. I wanted to do a "bad book," just the way I'd done "bad movies" and "bad art," because when you do something exactly wrong, you always turn up something, said Andy Warhol.
Exactly wrong.
The act of moving information from one place to another constitutes a significant cultural act in and of itself. Some of us call this poetry.
Toward a disengaged poetics: writing books without the need to have any relationship with the subject that we're writing about.
Paint-by-numbers writing: filling in the blanks.
Leaving the White House after the reading, Joe Reinstein, the deputy social security to the president, slung his arm around me, smiled, and said, "Well, we got the avant-garde into the White House."
Our writings are now identical to those which already exist. The only thing we do is claim them as our own. With that simple gesture, they become brand new.
I am a dumb writer, perhaps one of the dumbest that's ever lived. Whenever I have an idea, I question myself whether it is sufficiently dumb. I ask myself, is it possible that this, in any way, could be considered smart? If the answer is no, I proceed. I don't write anything new or original. I copy pre-existing texts and move information from one place to another.
Quantity, not quality. With larger numbers of things, judgment decreases & curiosity increases.
Words now function less for people than for expediting the interaction and concatenation of machines.
In China after I had finished giving a lengthy talk about appropriation, plagiarism, and writing in the digital age, an elderly woman in the audience raised her hand and asked, "But Professor Goldsmith. You didn't discuss your relationship to Longfellow."
Translation is the ultimate humanist gesture. Polite and reasonable, it is an overly cautious bridge builder. Always asking for permission, it begs understanding and friendship. It is optimistic yet provisional, pinning all hopes on a harmonious outcome. In the end, it always fails, for the discourse it sets forth is inevitably off-register; translation is an approximation of discourse.
Displacement is rude and insistent, an unwashed party crasher: uninvited and poorly behaved, refusing to leave. Displacement revels in disjunction, imposing its meaning, agenda, and mores on whatever situation it encounters. Not wishing to placate, it is uncompromising, knowing full well that through stubborn insistence, it will ultimately prevail. Displacement has all the time in the world. Beyond morals, self-appointed, and taking possession because it must, displacement acts simply -- and simply acts.
Unfortunately creative writing is very much alive. I'm doing my best to kill it.
Choice is authorship. Legitimate authorship.
The beauty of misfiling.
There is no museum or bookstore in the world better than our local Staples.
As Vanessa Place recently commented on the reported death of conceptual writing, "You know that it's on when it's declared over."
A new ecstasy of language has emerged, one of algorithmic rationality and machine worship; one intent on flattening difference: meaning and nonsense, code and poetry, ethics and morality, the necessary and the frivolous. Literature is now approaching the zero degree of blunt expediency -- a thrilling, almost Darwinian opportunism in action. Writing it appears, at this scale at least, is dead.
If I look at a Coca Cola bottle and then look at another Coca Cola bottle, I want to forget the first Coca Cola bottle in order to see the second Coca Cola bottle as being original. And it is original because it's in a different position in space and time. And light is shining on it differently so that no two Coca Cola bottles are the same.
Easy is the new difficult. It is difficult to be difficult, but it is even more difficult to be easy.
The reconception of art as networked power, not content, is the true death of the author.
At this point in time, it's hard to verify authenticity, singularity, or proper sources for anything. Instead, in our digital world all forms of culture have assumed the characteristics of dance music and versioning, where so many hands have touched and refined these products that we no longer know, nor care, who the author is -- or was.
At the Iowa Writer's Workshop recently, they were experiencing a crisis. The remoteness of the location traditionally offered the writer two choices: either look into thy heart or look to nature. But once they had the internet, they began looking into the screen, thereby able to escape the confines of their binaries.
Contemporary writing requires the expertise of a secretary crossed with the attitude of a pirate.
The idea of celebrities adopting art strategies. They are so bored with their "creative" acts that they're ready to be uncreative.
The recent durational performance pieces by Jay-Z, Tilda Swinton, and The National are making boring mainstream. Soon, we'll have to find another line of work.
Earlier this year I encouraged Shia LaBeouf to declare his retirement from public life and #stopcreating. It's true.
I had never heard of Shia LaBeouf until he started quoting me extensively on the web, claiming my words as his own, naming me as his collaborator.
Normally when these kind of scandals break what we see is a James Frey -- going out and apologizing; he’s shamed and everybody’s shamed. LaBeouf plagiarized and instead of apologizing, he decided to tap into the vast body of strategies around free culture that have been developed really over the last hundred years, and used that as a defense instead of a typical apology.
Today, we face what I will call the LaBeoufian moment: the limiting point at which all art based on questioning authorship is pointless.
In which Shia LaBeouf blames me for his breakdown. "I took [Clowes's] work and tried to adapt it into a film out of insecurity, a fear of my own ideas. I thought, 'Well, I have a right to do it because this postmodernist, Kenneth Goldsmith's idea of uncreative writing says so." I ran with that and found that it put me in a fucking corner."
But what must it become? What is art post-LaBeouf?
Just before the reading at the White House, Obama passed through the Green Room where we were sitting. He stopped, looked at us, pointed a finger and said smilingly, "You guys behave." Suddenly, the voice of god boomed, "Ladies and Gentlemen, the President of the United States." As he was about to take the stage, he turned heel, popped his head back into the room, stared at us, and said, "No. You guys are artists. Misbehave."
Nam June Paik said once that the internet is for everybody who doesn't live in New York City.
I always joke with my students that poetry couldn't possibly be as hard as they think it is, because if it were as hard as they thought it was, poets wouldn't do it. Really, they're the laziest, stupidest people I know. They became poets in part because they were demoted to that job, right? You should never tell your students to write what they know because, of course, they know nothing: they're poets! If they knew something, they'd be in that disciple actually doing it: they'd be in history or physics or math or business or whatever it is where they could excel, said Christian Bök.
Getting it wrong is a privilege that happens only after you get it right.
There is freedom on the margins. We've become interested in practices that exist on the edges of culture where there is little light, those which revel in the unpoliced freedom of what's permitted to happen in the shadows, where few people bother to look. Why would artists rush to the hot white center?
Auto-tune your next book of poems.
Two back-to-back readings. The first in Chicago. Met at the airport by limousine which drives me to a glamorous and crowded art venue where no one listens; chauffeured back to airport, all in one day. Superb pay. The next night, a reading at a tiny bar in the East Village. Took the subway there, ten engaged people in the audience. No pay. Turns out to be the best reading I’ve ever done.
Overwhelmed by so many requests to blurb books, I began a system of conceptual blurring. I say to an author, write or steal the blurb of your dreams and sign my name to it. I don’t wish to see it until I receive the book. That way, I can be surprised just like anyone else by what I’ve "written."
Love art. Hate the art world.
The art world is cleaved between the market and the academy. A third way: become your own self-invented institution.
When the art world can produce something as compelling as Twitter, we'll start paying attention to it again.
The gallery and museum world feels too slow, out of touch with the rest of culture, like an antiques market: highly priced, unique objects at a time when value is in the multiple, the many, the distributed, the democratic. In this way, the art world is quickly making itself irrelevant. Soon, no one will care.
To construct a career based on the ephemerality of the meme is at once thrilling and terrifying.
What if the poetic has left the poem in the same way that Elvis has left the building? Long after the limo pulled away, the audience was still in the arena, screaming for more, but poetry escaped out the back door and onto the internet, where it is taking on new forms that look nothing like poetry. Poetry as we know it -- the penning of sonnets or free verse on a printed page -- feels more akin to the practice of throwing pottery or weaving quilts, artisanal activities that continue in spite of their marginality and cultural irrelevance. Instead, meme culture is producing more extreme forms of modernism than modernism ever dreamed of.
Artists may be crazy or terribly uninformed about their practices, but they are never wrong.
When artists become accountable for ethics in their practice, they fall under the same scrutiny -- and are held to the same moral standards -- as politicians and bankers, a regrettable situation.
If I raised my kids the way I write my books, I'd have been thrown in jail long ago.
The moral weightlessness of art.
In the digital age, how odd that many prefer to still act like original geniuses instead of unoriginal geniuses.
Before going on the show, Stephen Colbert stopped into the green room to chat. His mother had recently passed away, and the night before, he went on the air and became so overwhelmed with emotion, that he couldn’t speak. So he just sat there in complete silence for what seemed like an eternity. When I mentioned how moving and how unusual his use of silence was, he stated how important it was to employ dead air in media. He recalled hearing an innovative radio show when he was a child that aired a full hour of dead silence, most likely as a prank. But it changed his life, he claimed, and he became dedicated to using silence in mainstream media. He then told me how much he enjoyed my book and the uncreative writing that was used to construct it. He paused for a moment, cocked his head, and said, referring to himself, "But that guy out there on the set is going to hate it."
Short attention span is the new silence.
Every word I say is stupid and false. All in all, I am a pseudo, said Marcel Duchamp Beckett in 1984 on Duchamp's readymades: "A writer could not do that."
I recently was in a public conversation with my dear friend Christian Bök. If I am the dumbest poet that's ever lived, then Christian is the smartest. His projects are very complicated, taking years to complete. During our talk, Christian went on at length about a project he's been working on for the past decade, one which involved basically giving himself a PhD in genetics. In order to compose two little poems, he had to learn to write computer programs which went through something like eight million combinations of possible letters before hitting on the right ones. And then he injected these poems into a strand of DNA, which was ultimately designed to outlive the extinguishing of the sun. The whole thing involves working with laboratories and has cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. Christian is super-articulate -- really more like a robot than a person -- and had the audience's head spinning. When it came my turn to speak, all I could muster was: "...and I transcribe traffic reports."
There's nothing that cannot be called "writing" no matter how much it might not look like "writing."
No matter how many times you say something, there's always someone hearing it for the first time.
What would a non-expressive poetry look like? A poetry of intellect rather than emotion?
All text is used, soiled, and worn. All language presenting itself as new is recycled. No word is virginal; no word is innocent.
Expressive, but not expressionistic.
Bertolt Brecht said, "I wish that they would graft an additional device onto the radio -- one that would make it possible to record and archive for all time, everything that can be communicated by radio. Later generations would then have the chance of seeing with amazement how an entire population -- by making it possible to say what they had to say to the whole world -- simultaneously made it possible for the whole world to see that they had absolutely nothing to say."
Any newspaper today is a collective work of art, a daily book of industrial man, an Arabian Night’s entertainment in which a thousand and one astonishing tales are being told by an anonymous narrator to an equally anonymous audience, said Marshall McLuhan over a half-century ago.
My muse is the fluorescent tube. It is cold and affectless; it is unflattering and functional; it is bland and neutral; it flattens all it touches; it is harsh, ugly, and unflattering; it is industrial and efficient; it is cheap and economical; it is ubiquitous, universal, and global; it is amoral; it has no agenda; it is past and it is present.
Like morality, politics seems an unavoidable condition when engaging in the reframing of language and discourse.
I was on the air on the morning after Obama was elected in 2008, from 9am to noon. I played Parliament’s 1976 five-minute long "Chocolate City" over and over again for an entire three hours without interruption.
Innovate only as a last resort.
In the digital world, the noun is obsolete. The noun is a relic of a predigital time when, if something could sit still for long enough, it would be granted taxonomical status: an apple wasn't an Apple, it was an apple. Digitally, nouns are often metaphors: a desktop is not a desktop; a folder is not a folder; a cloud is not a cloud; spam is not Spam. Nor are they stable. A page used to live on a shelf bound between covers. Today, that page is restless, morphing from one state to another: it is scanned, which is then inserted into a MS Word document, which is then PDF'd, which is then uploaded to file-sharing, which is then placed on mirrored servers, which is then downloaded, archived, or read -- sometimes printed out on paper, other times on an electronic platforms. That same file is shared, sold, bootlegged, and resold as faceless commodities, or ultimately stockpiled as click-bait. What do we call this artifact? I think we can only call it a verb. Since we can no longer name the product (noun), we can only articulate the process (verb). In a time of radical dematerialization, the verb does twice the work: text is both noun (text) and verb (to text). The noun is like a photograph and the verb is like a film; one is static, while the other able to capture the dynamism of today's cultural artifacts.
I love the idea of the cloud, but I hate the reality of it. The reality of it is nothing like what's been promised to us. Trusting the cloud is a mistake: it's too centralized, too easily blocked, too easily controlled. And it's privatized, owned, and administrated by someone other than you. There's the issue of politics. When I recently attended a conference in China, many of the presenters left their papers on the cloud -- Google Docs, to be specific. You know how this story ends: they got to China and there was no Google. Shit out of luck. Their cloud-based Gmail was also unavailable, as were the cloud lockers on which they had stored their rich media presentations. Don't trust the cloud. Use it, enjoy it, exploit it, but don't believe in it.
Writers try too hard to express themselves. We're working with loaded material. How can language -- any language -- be anything but expressive?
In a time when cultural materials are abundantly available on our networks, there is no turning back. Appropriation and plagiarism are here to stay. Our job is to do it smarter.
Choosing to be a poet is like choosing to have cancer. Why would anyone ever choose to be a poet?
I had gotten in the door when no one was looking. I was in there now and, there was nothing anybody from then on could do ever about it, said Bob Dylan.
INTERVIEWER: In an interview with Michael Palmer, he testifies that he prefers writing by hand over typing because the former is more intimate physical experience. How do you feel about doing everything by computer?

GOLDSMITH: I honestly think Palmer's statement is the most idiotic thing I've ever heard. He must be living in a cave.
Writing on an electronic platform is not only writing, but also doubles as archiving; the two processes are inseparable.
Against improvisation.
Writing without failure.
Against expression.
If the machine is built well, the resultant texts will sparkle.
Linearity is prescriptive; lineage is subjective.
After giving a reading in Los Angeles, another reader on the bill came up to me and exclaimed, "But you didn't write a word you spoke tonight!" It was true.
The author's biography, the back jacket copy, the publisher's list, the acknowledgments, the dedications, and the Library of Congress information -- are all more interesting than the part of the book that's supposed to be read.
Somehow during Christmastime in a small house crammed with extended family, reading the Sunday paper is acceptable, but reading a book is considered antisocial and rude. Many times I've been asked while reading, "Is everything alright?"
We have houses in America that are bereft of books, an appealing idea, if one assumes that all culture has migrated to the web and one need nothing more than a laptop to access everything that used to clutter up a living space. Yet most empty houses are just that: enormous echoey spaces where the main feature is an oversized television set surrounded by oversized furniture, inhabited by generally oversized people. Books were never removed because books never existed.
Driving down a Los Angeles boulevard, a billboard was legible from a half-mile away. It said one or two words. In Los Angeles, people are used to reading single words, very large at far distances, and passing by them very quickly. It's totally the opposite in New York where we get our information by reading a newspaper over somebody's shoulder in the subway.
Pointing at the best information trumps creating the best information.
Pre-loading -- constructing a flawless writing machine before the writing starts -- alleviates the burden of success or failure, mitigates the ego, and annuls the small-mindedness of authorship that invariably comes with more conventional modes of writing.
Many years ago, on the way to England to work on a museum project, I was seated in the plane next to a young man who was a classical lute player. We got to talking and I asked him what he was listening to on his Discman. He showed me the CD and began to talk about the music. It was a collection of a minor composer’s music played from transcriptions of broadsides that were sold on the street for pennies in the Middle Ages. The composer, however, was clever and included beautifully hand drawn images on his scores. Over the ages, they were framed and preserved, not so much because of the music, but because of how beautiful and distinctive they were as objects. While his peer's music -- printed and distributed in the same form without decoration -- vanished, this composer’s scores remain as the only examples of the genre. By default, they are now considered classics.
The internet makes us see how large the world really is. No matter how many times you say something, there's always someone hearing it for the first time. Sometimes we become self-conscious that we're saying the same thing over and over, repeating ourselves endlessly. But we need not worry. There's always a new audience.
When I began doing radio, I was told by the station manager that my on-air voice was too smooth, too professional sounding. He suggested that I add some "ums" and "uhs" during my mic breaks to sound more like an average person.
We don't really seem to believe that copyright exists, nor do we particularly care.
W.G. Sebald's advice to creative writing students: I encourage you to steal as much as you can. No one will ever notice.
Text by the square inch.
Not the line, sonnet, paragraph, or chapter, but the database.
Not the object, but the oeuvre.
How much did you say that paragraph weighed?
Contemporary writing is a practice that lies somewhere between constructing a Duchampian readymade and downloading an MP3.
Poetry is an underutilized resource waiting to be exploited. Because it has no remunerative value, it’s liberated from the orthodoxies that constrain just about every other art form. It’s one of the great liberties of our field -- perhaps one of the last artistic fields with this privilege. Poetry is akin to the position that conceptual art once held: radical in its production, distribution and democratization. As such, it is obliged to take chances, to be as experimental as it can be. Since it’s got nothing to lose, it stirs up passions and emotions that, say, visual art hasn’t in half a century. There’s still a fight. Why would anyone play it safe in poetry?
Life can only imitate the web, and the web itself is only a tissue of signs, a lost, infinitely remote imitation.
If you printed the internet, reading it would take 57,000 years, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week non-stop and if you read it for 10 minutes a night before bed, it would take 8,219,088 years.
If you printed the internet, it would be a book weighing 1.2 billion pounds, 10,000 feet tall.
If you printed the internet, it would require 45 million ink cartridges and a half a million liters of ink. If those liters were fuel, it would power a 747 for 18,000 miles -- a flight from New York to Tokyo, the long way around the globe.
If you printed the internet, you would need enough paper to cover half of Long Island (about 700 square miles).
If you printed the internet, you would have to sacrifice 40,000 trees, almost twice as many trees as there are in Central Park.
If you printed the internet from a single ink jet printer, it would take 3,805 years.
If everyone in the U.S. printed out a portion of the internet, it would take 6 minutes and 36 seconds.
If the ancient Babylonians started printing the internet in 1800 BCE, they would be done right about now.
We printed the entire fucking internet.
Secretly, what people hated most about Printing out the Internet was its democracy, that anyone could be an artist with a simple command + p.
When asked at the end of his life how it was being an artist, Jean Dubuffet said, "I feel like I've been on vacation for the past forty years."
When the machines take control, we passively -- and happily -- acquiesce.
The world is full of texts, more or less interesting; I do not wish to add any more.
When you challenge someone not to listen, they listen harder.
When you challenge someone not to read, they read closer.
When you say a text is unreadable, you guarantee yourself a readership.
When you claim to have a thinkership, you gain a readership.
Archiving is the new forgetting.
Archiving is the new publishing.
Archiving is the new folk art.
Self-plagiarism is the new plagiarism.
post-plagiarism = self-plagiarism.
Now that we've plagiarized everyone else, all that's left is to plagiarize ourselves.
There was no postmodernism. There was modernism. Then there was digital.
The pre-digital and post-digital. Those who got stuck on the wrong side of the wall.
There are things of great beauty in the world that are unique. I'm just not certain of their relevance.
Attribution is not a requirement of fair use.
No dear, poems will never play a direct role in popular revolution.
The new oppositionality is radical capitulation.
The avant-garde is strengthened, not self-annihilated, by incorporating the formulae of popular culture, fool. #21CENTURYSKILLS
The avant-garde is the new 1 percent.
Abundance is the new disjunction.
Copyright is so 20th century.
Captain Beefheart's response (1970/71) when a journalist asked what his music had to do with "the revolution'. "Well, when the record goes around once, that's one revolution. When the record goes around twice, that's two revolutions..."
If you want to make something new, don't too far beyond one simple idea.
The genius in Christian's Bök's "Xenotext" isn't in the text -- formally it's not a remarkable poem -- but in the process he used to construct it.
The voice hydrates the driest of texts.
All material is, in principle, usable by everyone, even without acknowledgement, without the preoccupations of literary property.
People buy more records than they can listen to. They stockpile what they want to find the time to hear. Use-time and exchange-time destroy one another, said Jacques Attali in 1985.
A poet has no recourse other than to write their own discourse.
Let us judge our literature by the machines we build, not by the products they make.
For poetry, there is no life outside the academy.
If everyone drinks the Kool Aid, it becomes real.
It's a mistake to mistake content for content.
No quality judgments. Things just are.
The Borgesian metric of infinity now seems hopelessly dated, a quaint relic of the 20th century, wedded to an equally dated idea of omniscience.
Whenever I have an idea, I question myself whether it is sufficiently dumb. I ask myself, is it possible that this, in any way, could be considered smart? If the answer is no, I proceed.
Dumb doesn't go out of fashion because it is never in fashion. Dumb is stalled and irredeemable. It's too twisted, too weird, too contradictory and takes too many turns of thought to be reduced to a slogan or ad campaign. No matter how dumb they may appear, ad campaigns are invested in being smart; at the end of the day, you need to communicate smartly in order to get someone to buy something. Dumb muddies the waters.
You get to dumb after going through smart. Smart is stupid because it stops at smart. Smart is a phase. Dumb is post-smart. Smart is finite, well-trod, formulaic, known. The world runs on smart. It's clearly not working.
I want to live in a world where the smartest thing you can do is the dumbest.
I want to live in a world where a fluorescent tube leaned up against wall is worth a million dollars.
Poetry is an occupational hazard.
Toward an authorless literature.
Transcription is hardly passive recycling.
Sometimes I feel that guys sitting in cubicles understand contemporary culture better than most curators and critics do.
Boredom, appropriation & repetition, are the new frontiers of creativity; they are creativity's last hope for reviving its tired self.
Words truly are cheap.
There is no necessity in poetry. There is no reason for it to be. It has no objective or goal. It's a hobby, it's a fake. It's nothing.
Ignore all inner voices. Instead, adopt voices and opinions that are not your own, thereby making them your own.
The Death of the Author. Finally killed by the internet.
Acting is plagiarism.
A contemporary poet is someone who doesn't write poems.
Originality is the most dangerous word in the advertiser's lexicon, said Rosser Reeves.
When I write an ad, I don't want you to tell me you find it creative, said David Oglivy.
Oglivy deplored creativity, a word he professed not to understand.
We're reading more now than ever, but differently, in ways that we previously weren't able to recognize as "reading."
A radical statement used to be a beginning, middle, and end, but not necessarily in that order. Now there are only fragments.
At the end of a concert at Carnegie Hall, Walter Damrosch asked Rachmaninoff what sublime thoughts had passed through his head as he stared out into the audience during the playing of his concerto. "I was counting the house," said Rachmaninoff.
Cy Twombly practiced drawing in the dark to make his lines less purposeful.
Mangle it, manhandle it, wrestle it. The more you process texts, the more they becomes yours.
At the radio interview, the host began reading something that was long and tedious. When he was done, he looked up at me and said, "Do you recognize that?" I paused for a moment and said, "No." He then stared at me and said, "It's from your book 'Day.'"
Subjectivity is over.
Organic is a artificial construct.
My dear Degas, one makes poetry not out of ideas but out of words, said Mallarmé.
My conceptual aesthetic does not serve my affect: it does not convey my feelings about this or that to the world.
The poet's role now is finding how best to absorb, recharge, & redistribute language that is already present.
John Cage used to say this his audience was perpetually students. He felt that as students, people have the time to engage with and try out ideas that, for a lack of a better word, we would term “countercultural.” But when they "grow up" and enter the "adult" world, such idealism is left behind when one is forced to deal with more practical matters.
I discovered that those who seldom dwell on their emotions know better than anyone else, just what an emotion is.
Most ideas that are successful are ludicrously simple. Successful ideas generally have the appearance of simplicity because they seem inevitable.
When he was sought out by a budding aesthetician a few years later, Duchamp memorably described his artistic goal: "To grasp things with the mind the way the penis is grasped by the vagina."
Creativity is about the most worn-out, abused concept that used to mean something remarkable, something that differentiated someone, something that made them special. It's a term that's been usurped and reduced to a base concept that has come to stand for the opposite of creativity: mediocre, middle-of-the-road, acceptable, unadventurous, and so forth -- so that creativity is no longer creative. What was once creative is now uncreative.
Calling a practice uncreative is to reenergize it, opening creativity up to a whole slew of strategies that are in no way acceptable to creativity as it's now known. These strategies include theft, plagiarism, mechanical processes, repetition. By employing these methods, uncreativity can actually breathe life into the moribund notion of creativity as we know it.
The effectiveness of a work is measured by the number of people who see it.
The beauty of radio is its off-switch. No matter what comes across the airwaves — no matter how annoying, absurd, or incongruous — you can always turn it off. The off-switch is a tool of empowerment for both broadcaster and listener. It allows the broadcaster to take chances; and it allows the listener to opt-out.
Andy Warhol said, when asked how he feels about his reviews: "I don't read them. I just measure the column inches."
I keep a poor sound system so I can simply hear music, not fidelity. I can't tell the difference between LPs, CDs, or MP3s.
One afternoon, UbuWeb received an email from the estate of John Cage with a cryptic note saying, "We know what you're doing." Wondering if this was a pre-cease & desist, I became perplexed and wondered how UbuWeb might continue to exist without the guiding light of Cage. I opened the Sound page and began scanning the endless lists of artists' names for his. I couldn't find it. I ran my eyes up and down & back and forth, still not able to find it. Finally, I did a search on the page and, at last, his name appeared. It was there the entire time, but surrounded by so many other stellar names, his seemed to fade into the texture of the page. It was then that I realized that if Cage's name was, indeed, removed, nobody would ever notice he was missing.
Later, I got to know the author of the cryptic note. When I asked her about it, she smiled and said, "We were just letting you know we were watching." When I asked her if she ever had any plans to sue UbuWeb, she shook her head and said, "No. Of course not. We don't have that kind of money."
One Friday afternoon, we received a proper DMCA takedown notice from a well-known literary agency acting on behalf of the estate of William S. Burroughs. In proper legal parlance, the agency claimed that UbuWeb was breaking copyright on the materials of William S. Burroughs and insisted that we remove the following materials. What followed was a list, pages and pages long, of every place where the name William S. Burroughs appeared on the site. Cited were everything from academic papers, which mentioned his name, to liner notes of a pop artist who claimed that one of his songs was composed using the Burroughs cut-up method. In short, what the agency had done was plug the words “William S. Burroughs” into the search engine and cut-and-pasted the entire list, claiming every instance as their property. The pièce de résistance was the final line on the takedown notice that, “Under penalty of perjury in a United States court of law, I state that the information contained in this notification is accurate.”

As it turns out, all the materials of Burroughs we hosted did not belong to his estate, rather the copyrights were all held by various record companies and presses that published the works.

I replied to the email saying that, while I understood their intentions, they were going about it in the wrong way. I received a meek reply from an intern telling me that she was very sorry, that she was just acting under orders from a higher-up, and that come Monday morning, she would resend a revised list.

On Monday morning the revised list came and it was pretty much the same. I wrote back, saying, please send this note to the Burroughs estate: "William wrote, 'Tristan Tzara said: 'Poetry is for everyone.' And André Breton called him a cop and expelled him from the movement. Say it again: 'Poetry is for everyone.'"

We never heard from the literary agency nor the estate again. To this day, the works of William S. Burroughs are represented on UbuWeb in their full glory.
Many years ago, we were given a digitized version of the legendary avant-garde magazine from the 1960s, Aspen. It's a magnificent collection. In it are represented all the major figures of the 1960s in various forms: films, postcards, broadsides, tabletop sculptures, flexidiscs, and so forth.

The New York Times wrote up Ubu's acquisition of it glowingly and asked Merce Cunningham how he felt about having his works on the site without his permission. Merce, addressing two MP3s of his on the site -- one interview and another spoken statement -- said that he was delighted. He claimed that the value of having his words available for educational purposes far outweighed any monetary value that the works would ever generate.

Several years later, after his death, I received a terribly nasty note from the Cunningham Foundation telling me that if I didn't remove those MP3s they would move to take legal action against us. I politely emailed them back, telling them of how Merce publically stated his delight of their inclusion on the site and sending them the press clip as evidence. They wrote back an even angrier note threatening me, this time even more strongly. I then wrote to the fellow who digitized the collection and asked him to check the copyright on the flexidiscs from which the MP3s were ripped. He did, telling me that in no uncertain terms, the copyright was, indeed, held by Aspen, not by Merce Cunningham. I sent the foundation the scans as evidence and never heard from them again.
A few months later, I had a similar complaint from Yoko Ono’s people about her Aspen flexidisc MP3s. Cheekily, I asked my man to check the copyrights on her, figuring I’d have my second victory in a row. He wrote back saying that the copyright was, in fact, held by Yoko Ono & John Lennon and not by Aspen. I wrote back to Ono’s people asking for permission to keep the MP3s up on the site, as they were an important part of an historical collection. They politely said they would ask Yoko. A day later they wrote back that she was delighted to have her work represented on UbuWeb. A second victory, achieved in a different way.
For many years, we have been collecting the works of Michael Snow -- his audio works, his writings and his films. At one point, we had about six or eight of his films up. One day we received an email from Michael Snow simply asking us to remove two of his films from the site but that it was okay to keep the rest. We saw this as a victory. Having four films of Michael Snow's with his permission beats a dozen without.
If we had to ask for permission, we wouldn't exist.
UbuWeb can be construed as the Robin Hood of the avant-garde, but instead of taking from one and giving to the other, we feel that in the end, we're giving to all.
UbuWeb is as much about the legal and social ramifications of its self-created distribution and archiving system as it is about the content hosted on the site. In a sense, the content takes care of itself; but keeping it up there has proved to be a trickier proposition. The socio-political maintenance of keeping free server space with unlimited bandwidth is a complicated dance, often interfered with by darts thrown at us by individuals calling foul-play on copyright infringement. Undeterred, we keep on: after nearly two decades years, we’re still going strong.
But by the time you read this, UbuWeb may be gone.
Never meant to be a permanent archive, Ubu could vanish for any number of reasons: our ISP pulls the plug, our university support dries up, or we simply grow tired of it.
Acquisition by a larger entity is impossible: nothing is for sale.
You might remember the climax of the film 24 Hour Party People (2002) where a large record conglomerate swoops in to buy the stubbornly independent Factory Records for millions of pounds. Factory head Tony Wilson produces a document sworn in blood stating that the bands own the rights to all their material; the record execs grin madly as they walk away with the Factory’s catalog for free. Wilson muses in the coda that, although it was financially worthless, Factory Records was a great success, a fantastic conceptual art project, full of integrity, one that never had to make a single compromise. UbuWeb is similar except unlike pop music, what we host has never made money.
The music of Jean Dubuffet. It's wonderful stuff: musique brut meets electronic music. Users of UbuWeb love the music of Jean Dubuffet. Later they find out that he's also a painter.
On UbuWeb, we host Julian Schnabel's little known country music album. It seems that while casting around for his next move after his brilliant career as a painter and before his even more brilliant career as a film director, he considered becoming a musician. It's a good thing he thought better of it.
While you won't find reproductions of Dalí's paintings on UbuWeb, you will find a 1967 recording of an advertisement he made for a bank.
UbuWeb stumbled into the avant-garde. We began as a repository for visual and concrete poetry. When sound came along, we began hosting files of sound poetry as well. But once we encoded the works of John Cage, we stumbled. Cage often read his poetry accompanied by aleatoric orchestral works, making it both sound poetry & twentieth-century classical. Throwing our hands up in the air, we had no choice but to simply call it “avant-garde," and we proceeded forward from there.
We really don't know what the avant-garde is. It changes every day.
When we began using the word “avant-garde,” it was still verboten, having been dropped during the 70s and 80s for its patriarchal and militaristic connotations. As time went on, it became an orphaned term, open for reinvestigation and reinterpretation. We picked it up, soiled it, made it impure.
On UbuWeb’s film section we feature the works of Samuel Beckett and Captain Beefheart. It’s hard to imagine any other place where both names appear -- certainly not in the music, literary, or art worlds -- but somehow it makes sense. You can’t imagine Captain Beefheart ever having existed if it weren’t for the influence of Samuel Beckett. This is the secret history of the avant-garde.
One day in the mail, I received the most wonderful book of visual poems. They were the most intricate and detailed pieces I'd ever seen: dense weavings of words that all added up to striking images. And as if that weren't enough, all of the poems doubled as autobiography, embedded with strange stories from the author's life. But perhaps the most incredible thing was that they were all made in an early version of Microsoft Word.

I corresponded with the poet, a man named David Daniels and was later lucky enough to meet him -- by then a craggy old man with a long, white beard -- and hear his story.

In the 1950s, he was an up-and-coming New York School Abstract Expressionist painter. Bound for stardom, one night at a party he said the wrong thing to de Kooning -- he wouldn't tell me any more details -- and was expelled from the group. Shattered, he dutifully obeyed and left New York, landing in Boston.

Lost and miserable, he drifted aimlessly though the streets of Boston, looking for a direction. Unable to find one, he decided to cast his life to the wind by simply saying "yes" to anything that anyone asked him. It turns out at that moment he was walking through Cambridge, when a young panhandler asked him, "Can you spare a dime?" David answered "Yes" and gave him the money. The panhandler looked at him again and asked, "Can you spare a quarter?" to which David responded in kind. This was followed by a request for a dollar and then five -- all which David handed over -- whereupon the fellow asked him if he could spend the night at his house. David acquiesced. Before long, David had a roommate. As word got out among the young panhandlers, dropouts, acid-heads, and hippies, David's house became a commune and remained one of the largest in Cambridge throughout the 1960s. Whoever needed a place to crash asked David, who always, true to his promise, responded "yes."

The house became a hub of activity, much of it illegal. When a prostitute asked him if she could turn tricks there, David said yes. Later, one of the many prostitutes who became fond of David asked her to marry him, he said yes. He also said yes when she asked him whether she could have his children.
Over the years, David found himself in the position of being a counselor to these young people, many of whom were MIT and Harvard dropouts. He would hold group therapy sessions, giving sage advice. He became a sort of a guru.

And over the years, he simply forgot about his art.

By the late 70s, the commune was breaking up. Drugs had taken their toll and at the dawn of the 80s, with the appearance of AIDS, there was further devastation. One day David got a call from one of the earliest members of the commune who, at this time, was residing on the West Coast, and was involved in computers. He suggested that David relocate to the Bay Area. It turns out that many of the communards, shaking off their 60s bohemianism, had migrated West and were evolving into Silicon Valley moguls. To express their gratitude to David for saying "yes," they purchased him a modest house in Oakland and gave him a life-long stipend. The only thing they required was that David restart his legendary group therapy sessions in the Bay Area, which he did. For nearly twenty years, he held these sessions in a East Bay warehouse for some of the most successful entrepreneurs in America.

But the silver lining was that, as a gift, they gave David a PC and Microsoft Word. While he had never touched a computer, he began intuitively experimenting with Word as way to write visual poetry. It was in this way that, decades later, David reconnected with being an artist. Ultimately, he mastered the Word program, turning it into a way to create visual poems. Over the years they evolved into baroque bodies of work that he worked on every day until his death just after the turn of the millennium.
UbuWeb hosts something called The 365 Days Project, a year's worth of outrageous MP3s that can be best described as celebrity gaffs, recordings of children screeching, how-to records, song-poems, propagandistic religious ditties, spoken word pieces, even ventriloquist acts. However, buried deep within The 365 Days Project are rare tracks by the legendary avant-gardist Nicolas Slonimsky, an early-twentieth century conductor, performer, and composer belting out advertisements and children's ditties on the piano in an off-key voice. UbuWeb had already been hosting historical recordings from the 1920s he conducted of Charles Ives, Carl Ruggles, and Edgard Varèse in our Sound section, yet nestled in amongst oddballs like Louis Farrakhan singing calypso or high school choir's renditions of “Fox On The Run,” Slominsky fit into both categories -- high and low -- equally well.
I'd rather shutter UbuWeb than ask for donations.
And yet . . . it could vanish any day. Beggars can't be choosers and we gladly take whatever is offered to us. We don't run on the most stable of servers or on the swiftest of machines; crashes eat into the archive on a periodic basis; sometimes the site as a whole goes down for days; occasionally the army of volunteers dwindles to a team of one.
A few years ago, UbuWeb's server was hacked. Although we never found out who did it or why, much damage was done and the site went dark for six months. During that time, some people thought that the site was gone forever, and as word got out about the hacking, some people began celebrating, particularly one listserv that was dedicated to avant-garde film (old-fashioned celluloid film, that is), where some members were relieved to see the site gone, perhaps indicating that the previous order of things had been miraculously restored. My attention was directed to their hostilities, which I read with great interest.

After reading their responses, I penned an open letter to the group, explaining, "Ubu is a provocation to your community to go ahead and do it right, do it better, to render Ubu obsolete. You have the tools, the resources, the artwork and the knowledge base to do it so much better than I'm doing it. I fell into this as Ubu has grown and am clearly not the best person to be representing experimental cinema. Ubu would love you to step in. Help to make it better. Or put us out of business by doing it the way it should be done."

The response was dead silence. No new site was built and the criticisms stopped; since that day, no further mention of UbuWeb has ever appeared on their list.

Over the course of the next few weeks, several of Ubu's worst critics on the listserv wrote asking whether their films could be included on our site.
If it doesn't exist on the internet, it doesn't exist.
If it isn't free, it doesn't exist.
Copyright is over. If you want it.
Breaking the law.
If you think you shouldn't do it, you must do it.
Creative Commons is another form of copyright.
While UbuWeb may be legally wrong, it is morally right.
Plagiarism is the sincerest form of flattery.
Adorno was so wrong in so many ways that it's fascinating. He's a relic of a sort of romantic modernism that has absolutely no bearing in today's world. Of course, I'm a devoted modernist, but my modernism is an impure one, a messy one, a revisionist one. Adorno would've hated that.
Internet es el poema más grande jamás escrito. Ilegible, debido a su tamaño.
In the 80s, when I began transitioning from the visual art world to poetry, I was listening to a lot of rap. And when I started looking into poetry, I was sort of shocked that none of it rhymed at a time when rhyming and word play was slathered all over culture. The tradition of text art, too, looked staid and uptight, dry and philosophical. Rhyme seemed to be a way out of all that.
Back in the early 90s, I was working in my studio on Houston St. with the window open. In those days, people were still playing music on the streets from oversized ghetto blasters balanced on their shoulders and, more often than not, playing hip hop. From outside the window came an array of sheer white noise, which quickly morphed into what sounded like the electronic whooshes of musique concrète. I was stunned and rushed over to see what was going on. But by the time I got there, the noise had changed again, this time into light Daisy Age beats. It took me a few minutes to realize that what I was hearing was a noisy break in what was a rare and unique moment for experimental hip hop; a moment that passed quickly once gangsta rap took over.
Radio is background, not foreground. You are always doing something while listening -- with one ear -- to the radio. With the exception of drivers, nobody sits by the radio and just listens. Along with drivers, artists are the best listeners. Artists' hands and eyes are busy, but their ears are wide open. As a result, visual artists know more about music than anyone else on the planet.
After a drawing class, nothing was ever the same again. A car was no longer simply a car; instead it was a complex amalgamation of line, color, and form.
After reading Gertrude Stein, language was never the same again. Words were no longer simply words; instead they were complex amalgamations of meaning, sound, and shape.
Every time we read Gertrude Stein, we have to learn to read all over again.
The sheer scope, variety, and seeming endlessness of Napster was mind-boggling: you never knew what you were going to find and how much of it was going to be there. It was as if every record store, flea market, and charity shop in the world had been connected by a searchable database and had flung their doors open, begging you to walk away with as much as you could carry for free.
One of the first things that struck me about Napster was how damn impure (read: eclectic) people's tastes were. Whilst browsing another user's files, I was stunned find John Cage MP3s alphabetically snuggled up next to, say, Mariah Carey files in the same directory. Everyone has guilty pleasures, however, never before have they been so exposed -- and celebrated -- this publically. While such impure impulses have always existed in the avant-garde, they've pretty much remained hidden.
We find that many people downloading MP3s from UbuWeb have no interest in the historical context; instead, the site is seen as a vast resource of "cool" and "weird" sounds to remix or throw into dance mixes. It's been reported that samples from Bruce Nauman's mantric chant, "Get Out of My Mind, Get Out of This Room" on Ubu has been recently been mixed with beats and is somewhat the rage with unwitting partiers on dance floors in São Paulo.
A few nights ago at home, after putting the kids to bed, I was parked in front of the computer sipping bourbon. My wife asked me what I was doing. I told her I was going record shopping. As I glanced at my screen, ten discs I would’ve killed for way back when were streaming down to my living room for free.
If it can't be shared, it doesn't exist.
écriture mécanique
A few summers ago, we went to see Pietro Sparta, a very successful art dealer living in the tiny French town of Chagny. He had a beautiful industrial space and a stable comprised of internationally known conceptual artists. After seeing his shows, we went to a cafe for drinks and he told us how he ended up in this unique situation. His father, a communist sympathizer, was thrown out of Sicily for his politics and he found factory work in Chagny. While there, one of his sons died and was buried in the town. According to Sicilian tradition, a family can never leave the place where the son is buried, hence Chagny became the Sparta's new home. Pietro got interested in contemporary art by reading glossy art magazines procured from the newsstand in Chagny. He became obsessed and started corresponding with the artists. Before long, when in France, the artists came to see Sparta. He soon won their trust and began holding modest exhibitions. The artists were so impressed by his sincerity and devotion for art that they began showing their best work with him. Little by little his reputation grew until he was able to buy the factory that his father worked in when he first came to town and convert it into a spacious and gorgeous gallery. Today, he still lives in Chagny and his father, now retired, maintains the numerous and luscious plantings on the former factory's grounds.
That same summer we met a French filmmaker who proclaimed that the paradigm was no longer “make it new,” suggesting instead that we need to focus on the ways that artifacts are distributed. In a time of pluralism where all activities hold equal interest, he said, what’s distinctive is how works find their way to out into the world.
Like quilting, archiving employs the obsessive stitching together of many small found pieces into a larger vision, a personal attempt at ordering a chaotic world.
When I was invited to read at the White House -- and pondering the downsides of the invitation -- I wondered aloud to a colleague whether if, asked by the G.W. Bush administration to read, would I have accepted? To which my colleague responded, "Kenny, you never would've been asked to read at the G.W. Bush White House."
Not only is writing melting into everything, but everything is melting into writing.
Recently, I witnessed a harrowing sight: the selling off piecemeal of Jackson Mac Low's library at a flea market near my house in New York City. One Sunday afternoon, while rambling through the market, I saw a bookstall and, leafing through the stacks of books, I saw incredible things: every book by Dick Higgins's legendary Something Else Press, yellowed flyers for early 1960s productions of The Living Theater, dozens of rare chapbooks by prominent avant-garde writers, delectable pieces of ephemera related to John Cage & Merce Cunningham, odd 45 rpm records of electronic music, and so forth. The entire history of New York's underground, it seemed, was there for sale. Curious, I asked the seller what was the story behind this trove and he told me that it belonged to a famous poet; evidently the poet's widow wanted to get rid of it all and he personally hauled 75 boxes of stuff down six flights of stairs from a Tribeca loft. Everything was insanely expensive, too dear for me to even consider buying. When I asked him where he arrived at such prices, he said he looked on the internet and priced them accordingly: he had no relationship to or knowledge of what he was selling. I could've bought Jackson's personal copy of Stanzas for Iris Lezak for $150. I demurred.
Well, I let it play itself as much as I can, but if it doesn't, then I interfere, said David Tudor.
Non-interventionist writing. The need to do less.
Write as if you were dying. At the same time, assume you write for an audience consisting solely of terminal patients. That is, after all, the case, said Anne Dillard.
There's something delectable about taking a dense book and turning it into bite-sized chunks.
When one selects parts of a text, one non-narrativizes it. When one removes context and explanatory notes, the text morphs from the utilitarian into the poetic.
In the Arcades Project, Benjamin didn't respect paragraphs. Every entry runs justified across the page in a block, regardless of its length.
Without knowing, I reread a book and took new notes. When I went to file the notes, I discovered that I had already read this book four years ago, but selected entirely different sections this time around. It's just that today, for whatever reasons, I was struck by an entirely different set of texts.
I cannot let doubt enter this project at this stage.
Undistinguished Speaker Series
My favorite books on my shelf are the ones that I can't read straight through like Finnegans Wake, The Making of Americans, The Arcades Project, or Boswell's Life of Johnson. I love how I can pick them up, open them at random and always be surprised -- I'll never know them. I love the idea that these books exist: their scale, scope, and ambition; the fact that they'll never go out of style, that they're timeless. They're always new to me. I wanted to write books just like these.
The graduate students in the reading group could only reference the page; time and again, they were unable to make the leap into life.
Often -- mostly unconsciously -- I'll model my identity of myself on some image that I've been pitched to by an advertisement. When I'm trying on clothes in a store, I will bring forth that image that I've seen in an ad and mentally insert myself and my image into it. It's all fantasy. I would say that an enormous part of my identity has been adopted from advertising. I very much live in this culture; how could I possibly ignore such powerful forces? Is it ideal? Probably not. Would I like not to be so swayed by the forces of advertising and consumerism? Of course, but I would be kidding myself if I didn't admit that this was a huge part of who I am as a member of this culture.
If my identity is really up for grabs and changeable by the minute -- as I believe it is -- it's important that my writing reflect this state of ever-shifting identity and subjectivity. That can mean adopting voices that aren't "mine," subjectivities that aren't "mine," political positions that aren't "mine," opinions that aren't "mine," words that aren't "mine," because in the end, I don't think that I can possibly define what's "mine" and what isn't.
At the afternoon poetry workshop with Michelle Obama. She was wearing a gorgeous beaded and sequined skirt, a skin-tight mauve tank top, and shiny, pea-green pumps when she got up on stage. The room was fraught with tension. After giving a very stiff, formal introduction, suddenly her entire body posture changed. She slumped her shoulders, puckered her lips, tousled her hair and said in a slangy, homegirl sort of voice, "Aw, c'mon, everybody! What are you so uptight about? Relax!
This is poetry, after all!"
That evening, with the President sitting five feet away from me, I read appropriated texts. Nobody flinched. I put together a short set featuring The Brooklyn Bridge, and presented three takes on it, including Whitman's "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry," Hart Crane's "To Brooklyn Bridge," finally finishing with an excerpt from my book Traffic, which is 24-hours worth of transcribed traffic reports from a local New York news radio station. The crowd, comprised of arts administrators, Democratic party donors, and various senators and mayors, respectfully sat through the "real" poetry -- the Whitman and Crane -- but when the uncreative texts appeared, the audience was noticeably more attentive, seemingly stunned that the quotidian language and familiar metaphors from their world -- congestion, infrastructure, gridlock -- could be framed somehow as poetry. It was a strange meeting of the avant-garde with the everyday, resulting in a realist poetry -- or should I say hyperrealist poetry -- that was instantly understood by all in the room; let's call it radical populism.
In the future, the best information managers will be the best poets.
I recall once having seen a restaging of an early Robert Wilson piece from the 1970s. It took four hours for two people to cross the stage; when they met in the middle, one of them raised their arm and stabbed the other. The actual stabbing itself took a good hour to complete. Because I volunteered to be bored, it was the most exciting thing I've ever seen.
I was taken aback by the rudeness of students who felt compelled to throw things at me -- wads of paper and ballpoint pens -- while I was reading appropriated texts. It's hard to imagine the other poets who were reading, say, Amiri Baraka or Thurston Moore being treated similarly. In fact, the thought of any of those poets being interrupted during their readings is simply inconceivable.
The feelings lingered: I was later chided and mocked by students, who called me “rude” and “sassy.” In response to them, I patiently explained that my practice is concerned with the equality of all words and is particularly focused upon the peripheral or paratextual parts of normative language. The reframing of regular speech as literature strips it of all its functionality and usefulness. By stressing its concrete and opaque qualities, we are able to alchemically transform unloved speech into valuable poetry. The utopian social, political, and spiritual dimension to my work is embodied in this radically democratic possibility.
Now you know what I do without ever having to have read a word of it.
I have a pet theory that in the twentieth century, writing adopted visual arts' crisis of representation as its own, hence precipitating modernist writing. I'm skeptical that writing went through a crisis of equal or even parallel magnitude to what happened to painting upon the invention of photography. As a technological determinist, I'm convinced that painting's crisis was authentic and necessary; but while the invention of the telegraph or typewriter altered writing in smaller and very interesting ways, it didn't challenge the essential nature of the project. So that's my justification as to why there have been two streams of writing -- mainstream and experimental -- whereas the art world since impressionism has been mostly focused on innovation, embracing experimentation. That said, for writing, the digital has forced a crisis of representation all of its own. When the predominant technology of our time is driven by and comprised entirely of alphanumeric language, the writer is forced to change direction and find new ways to use language.
But understanding could be achieved, perhaps, on a different level -- one of willful ignorance.
Trolling books glassy-eyed, head nodding, starting to fall asleep when some chunk of text jumps out of the page, shocking you into awareness.
After transcribing Soliloquy I've never heard language in quite the same way. Sometimes, when someone is speaking to me, I'll stop understanding what they're saying and instead begin to hear the formal qualities of their speech -- utterances, stumbling, and glottal sounds.
Words are no longer just for telling stories. Now language is digital and physical. It can be poured into any conceivable container: text typed into a Microsoft Word document can be parsed into a database, visually morphed in Photoshop, animated in Flash, pumped into online text-mangling engines, spammed to thousands of email addresses and imported into a sound editing program and spit out as music; the possibilities are endless.
Literature's insatiable thirst for authenticity and the self-centred lyric, qualities which are valued above others. Any work which challenges these presumptions is still outright dismissed.
After the reading, a young woman came up to me and told me that she had seen me lecture in a large MFA fiction writing class at Columbia. She said that everything I told the class went in one ear and out the other. All they cared about, including herself she said, was getting a half-million book contract when they graduated.
The idea of whether the book will survive is an uninteresting one, perhaps best left to the industry. What is crucial, though, is the idea that the effects of the digital are apparent in the writing, whether on paper or in pixels.
An emerging poet just put out what I feel to be perhaps the most important book of his generation. In the old days, this one book alone would've put him on the map. Now it's just another in a sea of Lulu publications and Facebook likes.
The translated cultural experience is skeletal at best and is always crass, a cartoon of an idea. Of course the best translations are always inferior to the original, and yet the act of translating can sometimes outweigh the translation itself. Think La Disparition into English, still sans the letter "e." Adair’s role as translator of A Void is, in my opinion, an act of authorship equal to Perec’s.
One night I found myself at a small dinner, surrounded by million-dollar novelists, their editors, publishers, and publicists. The conversation was mostly polite and forgettable. Toward the end of the evening, the conversation came around to me. “So you’re the guy who does the uncreative writing, right? What’s that all about?” As I began to answer, I noticed their attention flagging. An editor began checking his cellphone, one novelist glanced at her watch, the PR guy started yawning. Before long, my explanation was drowned out by, “Got an early morning meeting” and “Oh, it’s really been fun.” A few minutes later, I was alone at the table.

Upon returning home, I was dismayed, to say the least. Cheryl sympathetically listened and said, “Look at it this way. It’s as if Adam Sandler and a bunch of guys who produce his movies were at the dinner table with Godard and conversation came around to him, ‘... and what do you do again?’... ‘Oh yeah. Right. Gotta go.’"
John Cage said that his audience was always made up of students. He claimed that only students had the time to indulge in his utopian ideas, before graduating and having to wrestle with the "real world," leaving no more time for such indulgences. But, he said, not to worry. There were always a fresh supply of students coming up who would be interested in what he was doing.
Misunderstanding as understanding.
Misinterpretation as interpretation.
Vija Celmins's love of duplication. The way she considered copying a kind of spiritual act.
Sighting language by stringing together words according to their audio and/or phonetic combinations rather than by meaning.
A post-aesthetic writing, with increasingly non-literary emphases.
It is speculation to say that Fidget describes my body; instead it describes a body. That body is decidedly male but beyond that, it's a universalized body, one without emotion or feeling, a realm of pure description, which exists in no specific space. When I wrote the book, I wanted to create an anti-Beckettian idea of the body. In Beckett, the tramp in a ditch on the side of a road that struggles to turn over from his back to his belly is a metaphor for all of humanity's struggles. With Fidget, I wished to simply describe the body itself, to formalize it, making it closer to the motion studies of Muybridge; the body as a site of non-symbolic, pure movement.
Over the past ten years, my practice today has boiled down to simply retyping existing texts. I've thought about my practice in relation to Borges's Pierre Menard, but even Menard was more original than I am: he, independent of any knowledge of Don Quixote, reinvented Cervantes' masterpiece word for word. By contrast, I don't invent anything. I just keep rewriting the same book.
The act of transcription can't help but be personal and unique. One exercise I do with my students is to give them a short radio piece to transcribe. I make sure it's never anything too interesting, perhaps something about a budget or tax battle in Congress. The next week, fifteen students each bring in fifteen unique pieces of writing. It's amazing how different they are: what you hear as a pause and annotate as a comma, I hear as the end of a sentence and annotate as a period. Some students transcribe in the format of a script -- properly set in courier font -- others choose to transcribe the clip as a run-on paragraph. But even within those that go with the run-on paragraph format, while many use punctuation and capital letters, many don't, producing documents that feel more like Molly Bloom's soliloquy than hard transcription. Several students include glottal stops and stumbles, while others ignore them entirely. Others try to score cadences and volume using graphical notation. The varieties are endless.
Hard transcription.
Conceptual writing promises to live in the negative space of ordinary literature: to expose the conventionality of ordinary literature's form and language, and incorporate both into its own peculiar superstructure.
Relinquishing the burden of reading -- and thereby a readership -- we can begin to think of conceptual writing as a new Esperanto, a body of literature able to be understood by anyone without having to be saddled with the act of translation.
Even with a thousand different voices, the author becomes singular by their choice of material.
I want an art that offers no resistance, an art of pure pleasure, an art that is completely understandable by anyone viewing it, an art that doesn't leave you puzzled, an art that ties up every loose end, dots every i and crosses every t, an art that leaves nothing to chance, ensuring that the experience of engaging with this art will be the one that is wholly desired by the artist. I want an art that leaves no nagging questions, is insanely simple in its goals, and meets everyone of them unequivocally. I want an art where the philosophical questions posed in the work are answered in the experience of the work itself. I want an art that my mother can love.
As an artist, I was always suspect of the pressure placed upon the artist to be a genius. I wanted to find a way to be that would allow me to work without the onus of genius, hence I found writing, a space for unoriginality, normality. With the lower stakes, came the freedom not to be great.
The moment we shake our addiction to narrative and give up our strong-headed intent that language must say something "meaningful," we open ourselves up to different types of linguistic experience.
The world is transformed: suddenly, the newspaper is détourned into a novel; the stock tables become list poems.
Over lunch, Sheila Heti asked me, if I really wanted to, whether I could write a narrative short story or traditional book of fiction. I had to admit that, no, I could not.
Being empty of any meaning or intention other than fulfilling the instructions that it's a fulfillment of, the work is perfect by default.
It's a favorite method of encryption: chunking revolutionary documents inside a mess of JPEG or MP3 code and emailing it off as an "image" or a "song."
After a semester of studying uncreative writing, I never want to hear a student say that they have writer's block again.
In 2010 at Columbia University's "Rethinking Poetics" conference, the Mexican-American poet Mónica de la Torre, in the middle of her presentation, broke out, full on, for ten minutes entirely in Spanish, leaving all those who pay lip service to multilingualism and diversity angry because they couldn't understand what she was saying. De la Torre thereafter resumed her talk in English, never mentioning her intervention.
The conceptual work is grotesquely impregnable to skeptical attacks or deconstructive questioning.
I never wanted my books to be mistaken for poetry or fiction books; I wanted to write reference books. But instead of referring to something, they refer to nothing. I think of them as ‘pataphysical reference books.
Don't bookmark. Download.
Why I don't trust the cloud.
Like role-playing in an S&M club, conceptual writing is consensual.
A poet's career is rarely made on a single book, rather it's the long and slow accrual of publications, activities, community service, and so forth that firmly establish one's reputation.
These words might be mine. Or they might not. After living with them for so long, I can no longer tell the difference.
Copying-and-pasting words from elsewhere into my Word document: the moment I view them in my default font on my computer, they're suddenly "mine."
When artists are held to the sort of ethical and moral standards that politicians are, it’s a very dangerous situation for art.
If I have to stop to ponder whether what I’m working on can be construed as literature, I know I’m on the right track.
If collections of language are truly records of existence, one could argue that they are absolutely necessary demonstrations of culture.
I've always thought that No. Ill would age poorly, that the pop references would date very quickly. Thus far, that's been the case. But in 50 years, it'll be seen as a linguistic document of its time -- hazed with nostalgia for long-vanished culture -- and as such, very valuable.
The embrace of impurity permits second generations to freely reconcile opposites and break down binaries while maintaining the rigors & structures of first generations.
I made a recording of Wittgenstein's Zettel in German, a language I neither read nor understood. I so horribly mispronounced the words that even native German speakers who heard it couldn't recognize it as German. In this way, I was able to concretely demonstrate Wittgenstein's language games.
Everyone, absolutely everyone, was tape-recording everyone else. Machinery had already taken over people's sex lives -- dildos and all kinds of vibrators -- and now it was taking over their social lives, too, with tape recorders and Polaroids. Since I wasn't going out much and was home a lot on the mornings and evenings, I put in a lot of time on the phone gossiping and making trouble and getting ideas from people and trying to figure out what was happening -- and taping it all.
Soliloquy was more of an attempt at describing the difficulties of speech and the impossibility of communication, hence it's an anti-humanist statement. In it, we discover that one's normative babble is every bit as disjunctive as any modern or postmodern attempts to deconstruct language. By stripping speech of its non-referential elements, it permits us to isolate speech from its functionality, thus formalizing and defamiliarizing it. Best to admit that we will never understand one another, because how we say amounts to little more than white noise.
Misuses of language like homophonic translations and mondegreens as models of playful anarchy.
Question linguistic structures, question political structures.
Modernist purity had a peculiar shelf life. The only extant legacy of twelve-tone music is horror film soundtracks.
Writing in English gives you a great advantage in that everyone around the world can read your work, whereas the downside is that you generally can't read theirs. Many of my Scandinavian writer friends can't read the work of their peers in other Scandinavian countries, yet they can read my work. But I suppose that the good thing about conceptual writing is that it's not supposed to be read anyway. If you get the idea of what they're trying to do, you understand the book, regardless of the language in which it is written, thus circumventing problems of translation.
In my work, I try to use standard grammar and syntax wherever possible. I want my basic unit of writing to be deliberately uninteresting, prefabricated, or pre-determined so that it may more easily become an intrinsic part of the entire work. Using a common or readymade form repeatedly narrows the field of my works and limits the amount of choices that I need to make. In this way, the work writes and constructs itself with less of my authorial intervention.
I prefer email to handshakes, culture to nature, air-conditioning to gentle breezes, fluorescents to incandescents, and value artifice more than life itself.
We've needed to acquire a whole new skill set: we've become a master typists, exacting cut-and-pasters, and OCR demons. There's nothing we love more than transcription; we find few things more satisfying than collation.
It's a fact that in the United States, the primary reception of innovative literature happens in the university; there really is very little readership outside of the academy.
One of the great advantages I've had as a writer is the fact that I was schooled as a visual artist. When I became a writer, I didn't know the rules of writing, which made it easy for me to pursue my own vision as a writer. I see many of my peers, schooled for many years in the history & techniques of writing, struggling to unfetter themselves from this knowledge in order to be able to pursue a more innovative path. In this way, I consider my lack of education to be very fortunate.
I'm interested in ideas of writing that are so simple that they verge on stupidity and absurdity.
It's often been said that a writer writes the books that she wishes were in the world, but are not.
Displacement is modernism for the 21st century, a child of montage, psychogeography, and the objet trouvé.
I thought back to that child who could sight-read words backwards. I became obsessed with this idea and, with great effort, I began to do this constantly.
As I sit here writing this, just an arm's reach from where I'm sitting is the pantheon of writers I'm conversing with. I don't often reach for those books, but I constantly run my eyes over their spines, as if to seek permission or consolation during my own practice. These sorts of conversations are perhaps the most private and subjective moments of what I do. But they happen. All the time. In fact, I can't make a move without thinking how that move might fit into the narrative of my own work, as well as how it fits into the discourse I'm having with my artistic lineage which, in my case, stretches back 150 years.
I considered the idea of working for twenty years entirely in languages that I didn't know.
The writer's solitary lair is transformed into a networked alchemical laboratory, dedicated to the brute physicality of textual transference. The sensuality of copying gigabytes from one drive to another: the whirr of the drive, intellectual matter manifested as sound. The carnal excitement from supercomputing heat generated in the service of poetry.
The most resistant student always becomes the most devoted.
A pre-programmed automaton, the mirror employs no judgment or morals, indiscriminately displaying all that passes before it. Reflect something emotional, the mirror becomes emotional. Reflect something political, the mirror becomes political. Reflect something erotic, the mirror becomes erotic.
Displaced authorship solely consists of determining what the text will reflect. Reflect something emotional, you have written an emotional text. Reflect something political, you have written a political text. Reflect something erotic, you have written an erotic text. Mirrored writing is not writing: it is copying, moving, and reflecting. Editing is moving. Want to alter your text? Move it elsewhere.
The choice or machine that makes the poem sets the political agenda in motion, which is often times morally or politically reprehensible to the author. In retyping the every word of a day's copy of The New York Times, am I to exclude an unsavory editorial?
The weight of holding a book's worth of language in the clipboard waiting to be dumped: the magic is in the suspension.
I began to obsess on the amount of language being produced by individuals. What would happen if all that language were somehow materialized? I thought of the largest snowstorm we ever had in New York a few years ago. The sanitation department came around with a machine that transferred all the snow into dump trucks. The dump trucks then drove to the river and dumped the snow in the water, dissolving it. Would the dump trucks dump our language in the river too? Perhaps, in the same way that snow melts when put in water, they would find a way to liquidate our language, storing it in water towers atop loft buildings for future use.
If every word spoken daily in New York City were somehow to materialize as a snowflake, each day there would be a blizzard.
I dedicated myself to working four years exclusively on one project -- I did nothing else. Instead of becoming bored with the project, I became ever more fascinated by it. As a matter of fact, I was miserable for months after it ended.
We sympathize with the protagonist of a cartoon claiming to have transferred x amount of gigabytes, physically exhausted after a day of downloading. The simple act of moving information from one place to another today constitutes a significant cultural act in and of itself. I think it's fair to say that most of us spend hours each day shifting content into different containers. Some of us call this writing.
The act of listening has now become the act of archiving. We're more interested in accumulation and preservation than we are in what is being collected.
Real speech, when paid close attention to, forces us to realize how little one needs to do in order to write. Just paying attention to what is right under our noses is enough.
How fortunate we are to exist in the moneyless economy of poetry!
Now I've been working on a project for ten years. It only gets more fascinating as time goes on.
How to proceed after the deconstruction and pulverization of language that is the 20th century's legacy? Should we continue to pound language into ever smaller bits or should we take some other approach? The need to view language again as a whole -- syntactically and grammatically intact -- but to acknowledge the cracks in the surface of the reconstructed linguistic vessel. Therefore, in order to proceed, we need to employ a strategy of opposites -- unboring boring, uncreative creativity, unoriginal genius -- all methods of disorientation used in order to re-imagine our normative relationship to language.
I wanted to write a book that I would never be able to know. The approach I took was that of quantity. I'd collect so many words that each time I'd open my book, I'd be surprised by something that I had forgotten was there. What constitutes a big book? I looked on my bookshelf for clues. I found that any dictionary worth its salt was at least 600 pages, so with that in mind, I decided that I would write a 600 page book. I did. And in the end, the project was a failure. I got to know every word so well over the four years that it took to write it that I became bored by the book. I can't open a page and be surprised. Perhaps quantity was the wrong approach.
Some twenty years later, I now open the book and I can't remember a word of it.
Writing, like the new American business cycle, is unfolding today according to the logic of short-term efficiencies: agility, turnover, scale. Ever more scientific in means and pragmatic in its ends, the new writing seeks no other gradient but the one of least resistance: either the continuous predatory-stopgap activity of "efficient market theory" or the "fast cheap and out of control" breeder logic of self-regulating capital. In both cases, writers have discovered that they can fill niches far more quickly if their field of activity is cleared of any of the obstacles or drag associated with precious interiority or self-expression.
Theater and movies after Soliloquy are inevitably disappointing. I now hear the studied and stilted way that the actors speak. It's always too clean. Their thought and speech patterns are too directional, streamlined, and less complex than everyday speech. I find it increasingly hard to suspend disbelief.
If you listen to Beethoven, it's always the same, but if you listen to traffic, it's always different, said John Cage.
While waiting for the opera to begin, I had a heated discussion with Bruce Andrews. Bruce insisted that editing is the most important job of an poet. I disagreed and said that if the writer's parameters are "not editing," then different standards apply. We invent our own parameters to fit our own agendas.
Conceptual writing is the Switzerland of poetry. We're stuck in neutral.
Disposability, fluidity, and recycling: there's a sense that these words aren't meant for forever.
entartete sprache
When the machine takes control, we passively, and happily, acquiesce.
April 11, 1954. The most boring day of the twentieth century.
What we used to think was history -- kings and queens, treaties, inventions, big battles, beheadings, Caesar, Napoleon, Pontius Pilate, Columbus, William Jennings Bryan -- is only formal history and largely false. I'll put down the informal history of the shirt-sleeved multitude -- what they had to say about their jobs, love affairs, vittles, sprees, scrapes, and sorrows -- or I'll perish in the attempt.
When I started writing poetry, I realized how dull it was. I decided that instead of trying to make it more interesting, I would try to make it duller. And now that it's so dull, it's become interesting.
The grind of the scanner as it peels language off the page, thawing it, liberating it.
The endless cycle of textual fluidity: from imprisonment to emancipation, back to imprisonment, then freed once more. The balance between dormant text warehoused locally and active text in play on the web. Language in play. Language out of play. Language frozen. Language melted.
Art used to make me see the world differently, think about things in a new way -- it rarely does that for me anymore, but technology does that for me on a daily basis.
We now favor the slogan, while eschewing the paragraph.
Short attention span is the new avant-garde. Everyone complains that we can no longer intake huge chunks of text. I find that a reason to celebrate. Twitter is the revenge of modernism.
Poets think in short lines. Unless you’re Samuel Beckett, Twitter might be more difficult for novelists.
SHEILA HETI: People maybe steer clear of Twitter and social media because they don't want to be influenced by it. What do you think of these people?

KENNETH GOLDSMITH: I think they're idiots.
If you just ignore it, the internet will go away.
If you have nothing to write about turn on the TV and start transcribing.
This week's assignment: Please transcribe the internet.
It doesn't mean anything until it becomes a meme.
It's art that's irrelevant, not the avant-garde.
Plagiarist, trouble-maker, saboteur. Charges leveled against Brecht, all of which he considered titles of honor.
Humanism is really problematic on about a thousand levels.
Art is something that makes nothing happen
If you don't want it copied, don't put it on the web.
Where technology leads, literature follows.
Most ideas that are successful are ludicrously simple. Successful ideas have the appearance of simplicity because they seem inevitable.
Make something useful useless.
The Chicago Manual of Style doesn't offer guidelines for footnoting sources that are acknowledged to be plagiarized and yet cannot be traced.
Only an amateur answers his critics.
If you work on something a little bit every day, you end up with something that is massive.
Dare to be naive.
An intellectual says a simple thing in a hard way. An artist says a hard thing in a simple way.
The copyright and plagiarism battles are to the twenty-first century what the obscenity trials were to the twentieth.
Anyone who is interested in poetry is interested in it for the right reasons. Otherwise, they'd be out of their minds to stick around.
I am a fake. But not a lie.
Artists ask questions, and they don't give answers.
Artists make messes & leave it for others to clean up.
Do we really need another poem that describes the way light falls on your writing desk as a metaphor for your mother's cancer operation?
¡ABAJO LAS GALERÍAS, VIVAN LAS PAPELERÍAS!
If you admit plagiarism, it's fine. If you try to sneak it by, you get caught.
I am unoriginal; I just keep stealing, plundering, and robbing myself.
Drag is plagiarism.
Decriminalize plagiarism.
Plagiarism is, indeed, hip.
Christian Marclay on not clearing any permissions for The Clock:
"Technically it's illegal, but most would consider it fair use."
The Clock is both illegal and illegal, outlaw & legit.
If you make it good & interesting & not ridiculing or offensive, the creators of the original material will like it, said Christian Marclay about not clearing any permissions for The Clock.
Theorize your digital existence.
If it isn't self-conscious, don't trust it.
If it isn't pretentious, don't trust it.
If it isn't false, don't trust it.
When Picasso learned of Duchamp's death, he was heard to simply mutter, "He was wrong."
All the money in the world can't make a better book of poetry.
You have no idea how hard it is to be unoriginal.
I am not interested in good; I am interested in new -- even if this includes the possibility of its being evil.
Democracy is fine for YouTube, but it's generally a recipe for disaster when it comes to art.
The text of a newspaper is released from its paper prison of fonts and columns, its thousands of designs, corporate, political decisions, now flattened into an nonhierarchical expanse of sheer potentiality as a generic text document begging to be repurposed, dumped into a reconditioning machine and cast into a new form.
To be disappointed in government is to believe in government.
Syntax is the arrangement of the army.
The limits of the network are the limits of my world.
I'm everything you fear I am. And worse.
Far from being ‘authorless and nameless’, our texts are timestamped and indexed by the technology that created them.
Cruising the web for new language. The sexiness of the cursor as it sucks up words from anonymous web pages, like a stealth encounter. The dumping of those words, sticky with residual junk, back into the local environment; scrubbed with text soap, returned to their virginal state, filed away, ready to be reemployed.
Sculpting with text.
Data mining.
Sucking on words.
Our task is to simply mind the machines.
Barthes' “Death of the Author” revealed that authorship is a capitalist construct. It didn't stop authorship; it only showed its hollowness. Our consciousness is saturated by social media's fountain of text. Because of Barthes we are trained to read without regard to authorial intent. Meanwhile, new technology driven by capitalist logic again and again proves the postmodern tradition absurd.
Yes you can be copied but you can't be imitated.
Being distracted is the new paying attention.
There's a shitload of internet out there.
There are no more writings and no more writers because in the 21st century these have become data and metadata.
I began tire of the everyday. After all, the job of retyping the entire internet could go on forever.
A used discourse is better than a new one.
Plagiarize your plagiarizers. Bootleg your bootleggers. Pirate your pirates.
We fret too much over originality. Even if we do the same project as another artist, it can never be the same.
I really don't think that there's a stable or essential "me." I am an amalgamation of so many things: books I've read, movies I've seen, televisions shows I've watched, conversations I've had, songs I've sung, lovers I've loved. In fact, I'm a creation of so many people and so many ideas to the point where I feel that I've actually had very few original thoughts and ideas; to think that any of this was original would be blindingly egotistical. Sometimes I'll think that I've had an original thought or feeling and then, at 2 a.m. while watching an old movie on TV that I hadn't seen in many years, the protagonist will spout something that I had previously claimed as my own. In other words, I took his words (which, of course, weren't really "his words" at all), internalized them and made them my own. This happens all the time.
Changing a period to a comma in Wikipedia registers on the page’s history with the same magnitude as if you’ve deleted or added a paragraph. In this way -- through micro-maneuvers -- writing subtly, but definitely changes the world.
The gradual accumulation of words; a blizzard of the evanescent.
Over lunch at MoMA with Stephen Burt, I learned the difference between a lyrical and a conceptual approach to writing. The conversation came around to music and I expressed my preference for the LP, while he said he preferred the single. He said that he admired the idea of perfect craftsmanship that went into a single, the crisp lyrical quality, and the high stakes involved in compressing everything into an explosively compact format. I responded that I preferred the concept album and the idea that while there might be some dead moments, the brilliance of conceiving of a complete work outweighed the quality of its parts. Stephen preferred a Beatles song like “Taxman,” while I’d take the mess that is The White Album. Our different approaches to poetry have never been made so clear to me as they were that day.
When retyping a book, I often stop and ask myself if what I am doing is really writing. As I sit there, in front of the computer screen, punching keys, the answer is invariably yes.
Everything I'm saying has been said before by others. There is nothing new here, just remixes and rehashes of soiled ideas and well-worn theories.
I've stolen things that weren't mine and have made a career out of forgery and dishonesty. I'm proudly fraudulent. And it's served me well -- I highly recommend it as an artistic strategy. But really, don't take my word for it.
Screw
One Horny day
In the Life of America

WARNING: Sexual material of an adult nature. This literature is not intended for minors and under no circumstances are they to view it, posses it, or place orders for the merchandise offered herein.
JOIN FLESH GORDON AND HIS FRIENDS!!

Andrew Sarris, Village Voice VULGAR "DELIGHTFUL" Howard Kissell, Women’s Wear Daily
"QUITE AN ADVENTURE"
Archer Winsten,
New York Post
NOVEL & INGENIOUS
Kevin Sanders, ABC-TV "MOVIE OF THE MOMENT"
Ralph Sepulveda, Soho News
"DIRTY"
Vincent Canby,
New York Times
"A FRISKY, FEISTY TAKEOFF" Bob Salmaggi, WINS Radio
"FLESH GORDON IS A BRUTE"
Prince Precious, Planet Porno
Peter Locke & Jim Buckley Present
A MAMMOTH FILMS RELEASE FLESH GORDON
AN OUTRAGEOUS PARADOY OF YESTERYEARS’ SUPER HEROES!
NOT TO BE CONFUSED WITH THE ORIGINAL
"FLASH GORDON"

Starring: JASON WILLIAMS, SUZANNE EIELDS, JOSEPH HUDGINS, and WILLIAM HUNT Produced by HOWARD ZIEHM and WILLIAM OSCO Directed by HOWARD ZIEHM and MICHAEL BENVENISTE
Associate producer WALTER R. CICHI
Music by RALPH EERRARO and PETER TEVIS
Edited by ABBAS AMIN in METRO COLOR Rated X
FLESH GORDON BLASTS OFF WEDNESDAY AT A MAMMOTH SHOWCASE THEATER NEAR YOU MANHATTAN

APOLLO
42ST. BET 7&8TH ACADEMY
14 ST.
ALPINE
DYICKMAN ST. & BWAY
QUAD #3
13 ST. BET. 5 & 6
THALIA
95 ST. & BWAY
BRONX CIRCLE
BROOKLYN
NOSTRAND OASIS
RUGBY #1
SEAVIEW
QUEENS BOULEVARD
JACKSON HEIGHTS CASINO*
RICHMOND HILL CENTER
SUNNYSIDE COMMUNITY
QUEENS VILLAGE
LITTLE NECK
LITTLE NECK QUARTET #1 FLUSHING NASSAU BELAIR VALLEY STREAM
OCEANSIDE
OCEANSIDE
SALISBURY WESTBURY ROCKLAND
SPRING VALLEY
SUFFOLK
ART CINEMA
PORT JEFFERSON
CORAM
CORAM
GREENPORT
GREENPORT
HAMPION ARTS WESTHAMPTON WESTCHESTER
CINEMA #2
PEEKSILL
HAUPPAUGE
HAUPPAUGE
ISUP
ISLIP
UNDENHURST
LINDENHURST
SHIRLEY #1
SHIRLEY MAIN STREET
NEW ROCHELLE PARKWAY
MT. VERNON UPSTATE ACADEMY
NEW PALTZ
CINE #1
NEWBURGH
CINEMA 55
LA GRANGE
MONTECO MALL #2
MONTECO MALL
ORPHEUM
SAUGERTIES
NEW JERSEY
BAKER DOVER BERGEN MALL
PARAMUS
CIRCLE TWIN #2
BRICKTOWN
FIVE POINTS UNION
Hollywood
EAST ORANGE K CINEMA
RANDOLPH TOWNSHIP MADISON
MADISON
NEW PLAZA
LINDEN
PIX JERSEY CITY SAVOY*
ASBURY PARK
SAYREWOOD
PARLIN STRAND
HACKETTSTOWN TOWN
LAKewood
WAYNE MALL
WAYNE
WEST END
LONG BRANCH
*STARTS FRIDAY
Election year 1974 was a total joy for all those who favor freedom of the body and opposition to authoritarianism. I think voting is generally a wasted effort, since it's the usual Tweedledum and Tweedledee routine, and has as little significance as the person who belts you into the electric chair, and, as he tightens the strappings around your wrists, asks, "Are you comfortable?"

But Tweedledum and Tweedledee were different. From different fingerprints to the arch of their piss there were some differences. And that's true with the democratic process. After all the electoral sweep by the Democrats means that most of the law-and-order hypocrites have been dealt a severe blow. The Democrats are just as hypocritical, but on occasion are salvaged by some semblance of civility.

The biggest excitement of all was that SCREWs most hated man in the whole political process, Bill Cahn, the District Attorney for Nassau County, New York, was defeated. It's doubtful if this shell of a shit will ever be resurrected. Of course he's been cracked long before he fell from his high position, but even his pretentious constituency on Long Island finally grabbed hold of their sanity and threw this torn scumbag out. Bill Cahn is the calculatedly cunning and despotically dangerous barnacle on the hull of democracy who tied me into some alleged pedophilia ring on Long Island three years ago. The charges against me personally were dropped the year after I was handcuffed, but Bill Cahn tried to use me for political fodder in the same way that Joe McCarthy used Alger Hiss.

Bill Cahn's hatred of sex, in spite of his own grovelling and snivelling attempts at seducing 11- and 12-year-olds, was self-evident to every law enforcer. King Cahn, just like the King Kong who was shot off the heights of the Empire State Building, has now found his own worm's eye level. Cahn in fact used anti-SCREW TV spots to try to generate support for his sagging campaign. He held a copy of SCREW in his sweating palms (which are also hairy from excessive masturbation) and spewed forth anti-sex messages as the spittle drooled over his fat lower lip. Cahn also is a nocturnal pisser, and his underwear (which is rubber) is constantly filled with anal and penile deposits. Cahn, the darling of Morality in Media and baboon Father Hill's brigades of stupidity, was swept out of office and there was no joy in Mudville. As an example of this man's "integrity," of the 100 assistant D.A.'s who served in his office, 99 of them are registered Republicans. This Cro-Magnon man tried to keep his bailiwick safe against the inroads of sexual health and, instead, really only managed to keep it safe for the sexual puritans and the yahoo mentality. Bill Cahn's defeat is the victory of the democratic process.

SCREW, which has outlasted Nixon and killed J. Edgar Hoover, has done its ultimate final superior deed by cleansing the hemorrhoids of democracy, Bill Cahn, out of this nation's asshole.

The other great moments of this election include the victory of the new District Attorney, Robert Morgenthau, who bested Richard Kuh. Kuh, as you all know, is the man who harassed and finally persecuted Lenny Bruce in 1964 and, in a desperate effort to get some political support, busted three porn theatres six days before election time. His huge defeat indicates that the public has grown tired of this kind of obvious Machiavellian operation. In addition to Kuh's political castration, we applaud the defeat of Vito Battista, a man who gives the rodent family a proper spokesman. Battista is to elective government what athlete’s foot is to the shoe industry. His defeat, plus the election of lesbian and gay rights activist Elaine Nobel to the Massachusetts State House, indicates that even retarded and retrogressive America may finally be coming of age.

INSIDE THIS ISSUE

ONE HORNY DAY IN THE LIFE OF AMERICA:
SCREW presents the hot sex photos that Life refused to print in their special September 5, 1974 photo album]issue./Page 4

ONE NIGHT STAND WITH GOD: If the Deity deigned to deposit his Divine Dick in a dame ./Page 10

WICKED WINDY CITY:
Yes, there is sex in Chicago, and they show where it is.
Sex Scene/Page 13
Page 10

BRIGITTE BARDOT: And God created this woman to stay firm and fuckable at 40.
Sex Scene/Page 14

HOT HOUSEWIVES: Some salesmen get more than a foot in the door.
Smut From the Past/Page 16
Page 13

THE GARBAGE GIRL:
Honeysuckle throws her caution to the Windsorsians.
Diary/Page 17

MASOCHISTIC MS.: Feminist finds her rhetoric has a big hot hole in it.
My Scene/Page 18
Page 16

HARD-HEARTED HOOKERS: Personal accounts of pussies who pump for pay.
Fuckbooks/Page 21

BLOOD AND GORE

GALORE: Goldstein sops up sanguinary slop.
Dirty Diversions/Page 23
Page 17

PORNO FILM BUST: Candidate Kuh cracks down, but the reels keep rolling.
Naked City/Page 27

VIDEO VICE: Tape cassettes to titillate you from the boob tube.
Mail Order Madness/Page 33
SUPERMARKET OF SEX:
The most inviting classified ads in all the world.
Baubles and Balls/Page 36
Page 19
COMING NEXT WEEK
BONDAGE AND DISCI-PLINE SPECIAL: Classic illustrations of "Sweet Gwen-SCREW
THE WORLD’S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
Editor
Al Goldstein
Publisher
The Famous Jim Buckley
Managing Editor
Peter Brennan
Art Director
Joel Ponzan
Advertising Manager
Boyd Hunter
Associate Editor
Michael Clayton
Associate Art Director
Milton Zelman
Contributing Editors
Rocco Bonelli
Bruce David
J.J. Kane
John Milton
Michael Perkins
Production Manager
Peter Ogren
Editorial Assistants
Els Price
Sophia Tzimopoulos
Assistant Art Directors
S. Petretti
M.P. Swendsheit
Special Projects
Steve Heller
Subscriptions/Classifieds
Mike Levine
Communications
Marty Makuta
Contributing Writers
Lynda Crawford
Honeysuckle Divine
Abbie Hoffman
Steve Kraus
Dean Latimer
Fred Leslie
John Putnam
One horny day
in the life of America
LIFE Special Report
Or SCREW
September 6, 1974
Mr. John Loengard
Picture Editor
Time-Life Building
New York, N.Y. 10020
Dear Mr. Loengard:
The enclosed photos are an unsolicited contribution to the Life magazine special, On day in the life of America. All of the pictures were taken by our staff and free-lance photographers on September 5, 1974. We certainly hope you can use them and anxiously await your replay.
Sincerely,
Peter Brennan
Managing Editor
PB/st
cc: Simon Nathan
Michael Clayton
Joel Ponzan

Thursday, September 5, 1974 At 12:01 a.m., Eastern Daylight Time, just like the day before and the day after, about 2,078,000 Americans engaged in some form of sexual activity. Before the day would play itself out, another 17,536,000 Americans would find themselves on one end or the other of the sexual schtick. This was the 24-hour period that Life magazine had chosen in which "to show the essence of one day in the enormously complex life of America." On this day hundreds of crack photographers were working all over the country, "not on the coverage of stories, as such, but on finding ways to show the texture of the day—in both its ordinariness and its individuality." In an effort to help Life "catch ordinary people in the midst of their normal lives," SCREW sent out its own crack photographers. When the pictures came in, we sent them to Life with the above cover letter. They were summarily rejected. What follows on these pages is just a fragment of what Life left out of their special issue on September 5, 1974.
Although on that day more than 15 million photographs were taken around America, Life chose to completely ignore America's favorite and most pervasive activity—sex. Once again SCREW stands erect to correct the prudish purview of our pap pandering press.
America awakes

Bare bottoms rub against bed partners. In 10,000 bedrooms, a lone woman fingers herself. A commuter train rolls into Grand Central Station, a winsome secretary giving head to a nameless stock broker in the last seat of the last car. In the pre-dawn stillness of suburban homes, housewives, up to put on the coffee, look longingly at their sleeping husband's unusable hard-on. Time to get it on. This is September 5, 1974, the first day of the rest of your life.

Floyd Hunker and Joey Patino, roommates for the last six months, are awakened suddenly in their Washington, D.C. apartment by the sound of a thousand poppers exploding in the refrigerator.

Nunzio Carlucci

In Kansas City, dawn comes a little earlier than expected for Mr. and Mrs. John Smith in the Golden Crest Motel, who were "just looking for the ice machine."

In suburban Santa Ana, California, Eric Peterson, all night engineer for radio station KXFU, returns home at dawn to find his old army buddy has dropped in for an unexpected visit.

Enzo diBona

Peter Dvarackas

As the sun rises out of the Atlantic Ocean at 6:14, the first rays of light find Honeysuckle Divine in the process of checking out of her Manhattan hotel room.
In the bustling offices of SCREW magazine, managing editor Peter Brennan (foreground) conducts a high-pressure planning session as publisher Jim Buckley and editor Al Goldstein concentrate on material for upcoming consumer tests. Porno star Marc Stevens runs through a full dress rehearsal for a crucial scene from his latest epic, “Back Door Baby.”

Simon Nathan Carlo Fongool
As the long day drags on, not many of us find much satisfaction in what we do—as salaried pawns, people, peons, puppets. Some have dumb, even demeaning jobs, others are so bored they don’t even know they’re bored. But some, the lucky few, are able to indulge their libido with their livelihood. Sex is their business, what yanks them out of bed in the morn with a lecherous grin on their faces.

Steve Wickersman
At Spider Webb’s sTattoo Studio in Mt. Vernon, N.Y., a young artist by the name of “Shadow” inks a popular design on a customer’s cock. “That’s routine,” says the lady tattooist, “you should see the guys who want a swastika on their prostate gland.”

In Galveston, Texas, Jennifer Jawoski serves one of the many afternoon admirals who have made her plush apartment a regular port of call.

Don Angelo Firoe
Peter Brennan
Jimmy and Janeene run through one of the 36 live sex shows that they perform daily at Onon’s Oasis in downtown Detroit.
America eats

Americans refuel themselves at least three times a day, but this fetish for oral fulfillment is the least of our means of nourishment. Americans will eat more than 35 tons of hamburger and hot dogs today, but they'll also "eat" more than 11,536,000 genital organs.

Domenico Managgia
Natural food enthusiasts
Judy Kaplan and Marv Mendelson take time out from their studies at Boston University for a snack of organic belly button lint.

Salvatore Gazzangool
Over-the-road trucker Gary Cramford always stops at Buddy's Diner in Gainville, Georgia, when he gets the chance for his favorite breakfast of two scrambled, coffee, and a piece of tit.

Members of the Ladies Auxiliary of the Oak Park
Rotary Club in the affluent Chicago suburb get together for their regular Thursday afternoon luncheon.

Newlyweds Paul and Ginger
Barnett of Albuquerque, New Mexico, were going out to eat dinner tonight but decided to stay home and eat
each other instead.

Franco Morano
America plays

As the sun crept across the country, countless millions pursued craven courses without heed to any higher purpose than to have good ol' American fun. And as the bat of Night covered us with the wings of darkness, the tempo of the sexual tempest broke out from shore to shore like the gradual flare of the billion stars overhead.

Jimmy Connor and Vicki Rechin take a little motorcycle trip around their farm in Greenspoint, Vermont.

Tito Lazzara Howard (2nd from left) and Samantha (right rear) Nesbitt of Cincinnati, Ohio, invited over a few close friends to help celebrate their seventh wedding anniversary.

Rodney Masterson, a pre-med student at Tennessee State, passed up a freshman mixer to do some quiet research at home.

Vito Mannacchino
Most of us have been drenched with the idea that God is omniscient, omnipresent, omni-perfect, all-good, all-wonderful, all-everything. If He has all these divine attributes, God would have to be all-good in the sack because He would be omni-sexual, right?

If God did so deem to lay a mortal maiden, it would have to be a heavenly hump. One imagines that God would mix the omnipotent drink and choose the omni-perfect moment and whisper the omniscient words. All the woman would have to do is simply let it happen. She would not have to expend any energy, because God is self-sacrificing. After all, He redeemed mankind solely for the benefit of mankind, didn't He? Just imagine God, with His nimble fingers, miraculously and magically undressing the woman, and both of them throwing themselves on the crisp, spotless linens (God, of course, being all-clean), and the woman breathlessly awaiting the pleasure of an omni-perfect orgasm.

The woman that God gets right with would surely not have to concern herself with trying to arouse Him, since He is all-powerful. Once God got an erection, it would never diminish or cease—His Erection was, is and always will be. God would literally be omnipotent.

If the Deity deigned to deposit His Divine Dick in a dame, it might go something like this...

Going down on a woman, God would place His rigid penis into her and breathe heavily in her ear, murmuring all the while. Who knows to what incredible extent that would add to the woman’s sensational orgasm, since the last time God breathed like that, He created the universe. Then, God would begin His pelvic thrust, aware of the precise timing and pressure. As the climax would erupt, God, in His omniscience, would recognize the exact moment and simultaneously come. Happily, though, God would not be weary, being omnipotent and all. The persistence of God’s all-powerful, ever-erect penis would afford multitudinous orgasms for the woman.

God, of course, could go on for eternity, but unfortunately would have to stop, because of the woman’s all too human exhaustion. When finished, the woman would not have to boost God’s ego, mainly because He would already know how good He was/is. Besides, 2000 years of Christian adulation and adoration have taken care of all His ego needs.

All in all, the woman would be well-satisfied, being able to luxuriate in the knowledge that she had had the omni-perfect lay.

But how could such a holy roll in the hay come to be? It could happen like this:

GOD FUCKS GIRL

[Scene opens in a small bar. People are milling around. The music isn’t too loud. The talk is a sonorous murmur. Front door of bar opens. A man comes in. He’s wearing a black cape, sandals, an unevenly cut cardboard crown, has long hair and is carrying what appears to be a branch from a palm tree. Everyone in the small bar turns to watch, as he mumbles something to the bartender.]

THE BOSS [who we really know is God]: Sant Gria on the rocks, please. [Holds glass above his head, blesses it, genuflects and then leisurely sips. Notices a woman sitting alone, contentedly nursing her drink. After a moment's reluctance, The Boss strides over.] Are you alone, my child?
NOVEMBER 18, 1974 PAGE 11

WOMAN [feeling a little drunk and sarcastic]: What do you think, my son?
THE BOSS [euphoric, believing that the woman has spontaneously recognized him as God the Son]: How did you know?
WOMAN [with no idea who The Boss is, continues with sarcasm]: A little birdy told me.
THE BOSS [yelling excitedly]: Was he a dove? If he was, it was the Holy Spirit. [His excitement attracts the attention of the people at the bar. Becomes calm.] You know, of course, there are three of us [pause] or should I say there is three of us, since there's only one God and that's singular, but then there are three people and that should take a plural verb, but...
WOMAN: What are you doing in a get-up like that. Are you a contestant for "Let's Make a Deal"?
[The Boss looks bewildered.]
A WOMAN: Some people sure get their rocks off in strange ways.
THE BOSS [changing subject]: Can I buy you a drink?
WOMAN: I'll have a Bloody Mary. Thanks.
THE BOSS: Hey, watch who you're insulting.
WOMAN: It's a drink, idiot.
THE BOSS: Really? I didn't know she was getting into the act, too.
WOMAN: Are you going to buy it or are you going to keep prattling?
THE BOSS [rising]: Well, it is a surprise.
[Woman sneezes.]
THE BOSS [calling from bar]: God bless you, and I really mean that. [Comes back.]
WOMAN: Seriously, why the outfit?
THE BOSS: It's part of my cult.
WOMAN: Have anything to do with the Alice Cooper Band?
THE BOSS: Huh?
WOMAN: Forget it. [Buys next round and is getting progressively drunk. Lights up a J.] Want a toke?
THE BOSS: No, thanks. I have more insights than I can handle.
WOMAN [spitting out smoke]: Where are you
WOMAN [finally]: I'm not so sure.
THE BOSS: Come on. Don't tell me you're a prude. Besides, my mother has the copyright on virginity.
WOMAN: Man, you've got a set on you.
THE BOSS: Yeah, that's what I want you to see.
WOMAN [figures maybe he's a super-sleuth. Curiosity has the best of her.]: Where is your place?
THE BOSS: All over. Do you like Gothic or Modern?
WOMAN: Are you strung out?
THE BOSS: Naw. I went through that scene a while back. Come on.
Let’s go.
WOMAN [reluctantly]: I don’t even know your name.
THE BOSS: The Boss... [starts to explain the meaning, but woman hurries off to the bathroom.]
WOMAN [returning]: Sorry... dry heaves. [They leave bar. The Boss takes the end of his cape and dramatically flings it over his shoulder.
Readjusts crown.]
WOMAN: Which way?
THE BOSS: I’m a traditionalist. Let’s try Gothic. [They walk for about 15 minutes. The Boss stops at an imposing building.] WOMAN [horrified]: This is a church. THE BOSS: No sweat. Peter returned the key.
WOMAN: But...
[The Boss takes her hand and leads her inside. It is dimly lit and reeks of burning candles.]
WOMAN: I’m splitting. This isn’t for me. THE BOSS [soothingly]:
Relax. Nobody will bother us.
WOMAN: That’s what I’m afraid of. You’re beginning to bother me.
THE BOSS: I’ll show you my room. [Both tiptoe behind altar. The Boss swivels Bible and a slat in the altar opens.]
THE BOSS: Follow me, but be careful. The steps are narrow.
WOMAN [threading her way down slowly]: This is almost blasphemy.
THE BOSS: Hardly. This is my house.
WOMAN [earnestly]: Are you sure this isn’t "Candid Camera"?
[They enter a room. It is unusually decorated.] WOMAN [approaching picture of The Boss with candles blazing around it]: Are you that much in love with yourself?
THE BOSS [modestly]: It was a gift. Have a seat.
WOMAN [gingerly sits on velvet studio couch]: Got anything to drink?
THE BOSS: Water and wine.
WOMAN [grimacing]: No Scotch?
THE BOSS: Now that would be blasphemy.
WOMAN: All right. Wine, then. [Lights, up another joint.] You’re the strangest person I’ve ever met. THE BOSS: That’s the same thing they said in Jerusalem.
WOMAN: What’s your problem? THE BOSS: I was hung up, but once is enough. Want a bite? [Offers her what looks like a circular piece of cardboard.]
WOMAN: What is it?
THE BOSS: It was unleavened bread. Now, it’s me.
WOMAN [frightened, starts to get up]: I think I’d better get going.
THE BOSS: Come on. I’ve been desecrated enough.
WOMAN [almost hysterically]: You have a persecution complex, too?
THE BOSS [defensively]: No wonder.
WOMAN [finishing the roach of her J]: Got any more wine?
[The Boss gets her another glass.]
WOMAN: These are interesting goblets. [Capriciously] Want to roll in the hay?
THE BOSS: I had enough of that in the stall.
WOMAN [rubbing his belly]: I mean you want to get [The Boss kisses woman on the mouth with great passion. She responds vigorously.]

WOMAN: Let's get undressed. [Suddenly, she is stark naked. Frantically] What the hell's going on!

THE BOSS: Expedience. [He has slipped out of his clothes easily enough, but seems to be having some difficulty with a contraction around his loins.] This damn chastity belt is always getting tangled. [Manages to pry it loose.]

[Man reads herself on couch. The Boss leaves and returns with a glass of water. Begins to sprinkle water on her, chanting in Latin.]

WOMAN [unnerved]: Don't tell me you're one of those.

THE BOSS [with complete control over the situation]: Trust me.

[He finally lies next to woman. Much to her surprise, The Boss seems to know what he's doing and does not need to be encouraged. Her breathing becomes hard and strained. He's very busy on her body.]

WOMAN [with a wide grin on her face, she is about to have an orgasm, when The Boss abruptly stops. Moaning]: I was just about to come.

THE BOSS [with complete control over the situation]: Trust me.

[He finally lies next to woman. Much to her surprise, The Boss seems to know what he's doing and does not need to be encouraged. Her breathing becomes hard and strained. He's very busy on her body.]

WOMAN [with a wide grin on her face, she is about to have an orgasm, when The Boss abruptly stops. Moaning]: I was just about to come.

THE BOSS [with complete control over the situation]: Trust me.

[He finally lies next to woman. Much to her surprise, The Boss seems to know what he's doing and does not need to be encouraged. Her breathing becomes hard and strained. He's very busy on her body.]

WOMAN [with a wide grin on her face, she is about to have an orgasm, when The Boss abruptly stops. Moaning]: I was just about to come.

THE BOSS [with complete control over the situation]: Trust me.

[He finally lies next to woman. Much to her surprise, The Boss seems to know what he's doing and does not need to be encouraged. Her breathing becomes hard and strained. He's very busy on her body.]

WOMAN [with a wide grin on her face, she is about to have an orgasm, when The Boss abruptly stops. Moaning]: I was just about to come.

THE BOSS [with complete control over the situation]: Trust me.
scream]: I can't take it any more.
THE BOSS [offended]: What's up?
WOMAN [extremely grateful, but without the energy to go into it]: Thank you.
THE BOSS [magnanimously]: You're welcome. It's part of my philanthropic project.
WOMAN [mumbling]: Sounds heavenly. THE BOSS: Naturally.
[Woman becomes drowsy. The Boss gets restless.]
THE BOSS: We'd better get going. The ceremony will be starting.
WOMAN: Christ, so soon. [The Boss pulls her off the couch. They dress hurriedly.]
WOMAN [as they climb up the steps]: I'd like to see you again.
THE BOSS: It's a matter of faith. You gotta believe.
WOMAN: Anything you say. THE BOSS [pondering to himself]: Maybe this approach would work better. Sure beats those stupid loaves and fishes.
WOMAN: When can we get together? [They are walking outside church.
It is near dawn.] THE BOSS: Don't worry. I'll find you. You have to want to search me out, too.
WOMAN: Sure. Sure.
THE BOSS: We'll meet once more, either now or in your reward.
WOMAN: Anything. Just promise me. THE BOSS [gripping her shoulders emphatically]: I must be about my business.
WOMAN: You have to use the John now?
THE BOSS [hastening away]: Amen. [Next scene: Woman is standing on a soap box at the corner of Fifth Avenue and 50th Street. Crowd gathers.
]
WOMAN [sermonizing]: Jesus is love. Jesus is beauty. Come with Jesus. I did. Oh, did I. Jesus knows... Jesus... gives... Jesus....
SEXSCENE
Edited By Bruce David
Windy City Wickedness
BOURBON STREET DREAM WAY EXOTIC
606 THEATER CLUB
WEIRD HAROLD’S WAY: He lets his best customers try out the products on his cashier.

What's the worst thing that could happen to you short of death?
Answer: getting sent to Chicago. Nobody ever wants to go to Chicago. If forced to make a decision, Cleveland, Des Moines, Dubuque, and even Fargo, North Dakota, all come ahead of Chicago as a preferred place of residence. Only Chicago, of all the American cities, strikes a chord of universal rejection among our populace because, although it is as boring a city as Boise, Idaho, it is as big and ugly as New York. Some call Chicago the citadel of ennui. Others simply refer to it as the stupid city. Whatever your own opinion of this city might happen to be, one thing is sure: nobody has ever voluntarily gone to Chicago.

But is this bad P.R. really deserved? In response to a deep-rooted conviction that Chicago has been unfairly bad-mouthed, SCREW initiated a five-week in-depth survey of that city's night life. To our pleasant surprise we found that contrary to popular misconceptions, the sidewalks are not rolled up at nine o'clock. The sidewalks are made of concrete and could not possibly be rolled up. Also, after consulting a publication called Night Life in Chicago (free, except for postage, from 5418 W. Keeney Ave., Morton Grove, III. 60053), we discovered that there are a number of massage parlors (such as Weird Harold's shown here with Al and lovely masseuses), topless and bottomless bars, strip shows and what have you. If you ever are sent to Chicago, or if you live there now, Night Life in Chicago might serve as an excellent information guide.

Chicago, according to the guide, is not all that bad. We note, however, that Night Life in Chicago is produced out of town.

Giving Head
Robert Delford Brown, a pioneering erotic artist whose "happenings" during the 1960's kept him embroiled in hassles with the police, is currently holding a retrospective of his work at The Great Building Crack-Up (Gallery), 251 W. 13th Street. Included in the display, which Mr. Brown characterizes as a "burlesque of the linear view of life championed by western society for the past 600 years," are such extraordinary works as "Meat Show," "Out of Order Please Use the Toilet Down the Hall Across the Lobby," and "Orgasm Event." As with the photo seen here, "Giving Head," Robert Delford Brown's curious events tend to be whimsical concept pieces which tilt toward the visual pun.

More recently Mr. Brown has demonstrated the versatility of his particular vision and sense of the absurd with his First Annual Mr. Jesus Christ Contest (whose winners receive a one-way ticket to Jerusalem on Lufthansa Airlines via Frankfurt, Germany, six beautiful rose bushes to grow your own crown of thorns, and a lovely set of hammer and nails), as well as his continuing Great Building Crack-Up piece which involves the gallery itself. This latter piece, according to the artist, features the collision between a 19th century building "GIVING HEAD": If you laughed at this, go see the one at the gallery called "Out of Order Please Use the Toilet Down the Hall Across the Lobby."

and a 20th century building. In case you're wondering, the 13th Street art gallery received its name from the fact that it has a crack running through it as the result of pressure from an adjoining structure.
Beating a Dead Horse

Even a casual glance reveals what is unique about this young man. Obviously, he is standing there with his fingers shoved up his ass. But, as usual, the folks at Hustler magazine, from which this pic was taken (November 1974 issue) got it all wrong, writing that this man possessed an unusually large cock: "Consider for a minute the changes in your daily routine in order to sport around a 15" dong . . . first an additional ten minutes would have to be added to your shower time in order to give it the TLC and proper cleansing it needed. The increased length in shorts and swimming trunks to perhaps mid-calf should be considered. To say nothing of the danger involved in turning over in bed and possibly knocking out your bedmate." You can see, however, that the man's cock is about normal in length. Anything smaller would, indeed, be an acute embarrassment to its owner.

FAINT PRAISE: When
this guy gets an erection it drains so much blood from his head he passes out every time.

Pedophilia for Podiatrists

BLONDES HAVE MORE FUN: Even in an ad for kid's shoes, a fair-haired Fraulein stands out.

This is an ad for children's shoes taken from the German magazine Brigitte 101. The ad says that Elefanten T3 shoes for children now come in three widths. To demonstrate this they ran this photo of nude children also coming in three widths: thick, medium, and thin. You can order the shoes from the Elefanten Shoe Company. The ad does not mention where you can order the children.

Fuckably Forty

Recently Brigitte Bardot celebrated her 40th birthday and, as this photo from the September 26 issue of Stern clearly demonstrates, the sex goddess is holding together remarkably well. No noticeable sagging of the breasts, her belly as flat as you'll find on most women at 20, and a face that still exudes the passion of teenage lust. At 40, when most women have had their figures blitzed by degenerating cellular tissue, Bardot appears almost as if she had been preserved in wax. One point of curiosity: does anybody know if this photo marks the first time Bardot's muff has ever been published in a magazine?

BRIGITTE BARDOT: And God created this woman to stay firm and fuckable even unto forty.

Petty Gewirtz, who was referred to in an article entitled, "Sweet Savior Gets Nailed Again," which appeared in Screw no. 133, dated September 20, 1971, has denied the commission of the act attributed to him in that article. The editors regret having printed such statements.
A Real Game Pussy

Will it never end? Here is yet another entry in the slick girlie magazine sweepstakes, this one entitled, enigmatically, Game. Like its predecessors, Game is unable to compete editorially with such established quality tit magazines as Playboy, Penthouse and Out, but, unlike most of the other rags, it is able to compete with these prestigious leaders pictorially. The first issue of Game is cram-packed with five different photo spreads of five extremely lovely women, for a total of 33 pages of full-color pussy. Even at their inflationary $1.50 cover price, readers are likely to feel that this new publication is a bargain.

Considering the number and quality of the photos, it is a shame that the rest of the magazine is so uneven, with illustrations and articles ranging from good to pure shit. The cartoons, which can often serve as the real barometer of a publication's commitment to quality, are, unfortunately, very poor indeed. The success or failure of Game should answer the question of whether muff alone can sell a national magazine.

Sexcitements

LONDON—"It's all a mistake," said Sir Keith Joseph, dismayed by the furor he had created when he advocated a birth plan for Britain's poor. Sir Keith had urged greater birth control for the poor, charging that they in large measure were the cause of England's economic problems. But he now adds, "It is because the children to whom I was referring are born to unmarried or single parent teenage households, not because they are in socio-economic classes 4 and 5, that the children are at risk of becoming tragedies to themselves and society." Even so, the response among politicians, social workers, trade union leaders, and newspapers continued to be bitter, forcing Joseph's Conservative Party to back away from publicly supporting his sentiments. Previous to his statements Sir Keith Joseph was considered a serious contender for leadership of the Conservative Party but now, because of his plummeting public esteem, Heath seems likely to stay in command.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—According to state law, men are not entitled to alimony. That was the unanimous decision of five male judges of the Brooklyn Appellate Division, in response to a suit filed by Bertram Steinberg, 45, against his wife Dolores. A attorneys for Steinberg say that their client, now working a $100-a-week job for the Board of Education, lived with his wife and two children in a $125,000 mansion in Woodmere, Long Island. But, when his wife's affections began to cool toward him, Steinberg found himself pushed out of the family business and into the street. Steinberg's attorney, Gerald J. Tucker, says that Dolores admits to being worth more than $300,000 and that she and the two children are still living in the mansion. However, the appellate judges found that they had no legal right to award alimony to man although a "court may direct the husband to provide suitably for the support of the wife." The judges added, "We note that the Legislature has declined... to amend the law to permit the court to award alimony and counsel fees to a husband."

LOS ANGELES—Here's the follow-up on David Carradine's midnight Kung Fu raid on a lady's dress: Marie Kilty, in a $1.1 million suit filed in Superior Court, has charged that she is unable to sleep and is emotionally upset by her alleged encounter with the television Kung Fu star. It has been reported Carradine called Miss Kilty a "witch" when he jumped at her from his car last Sept. 15. Kilty charges that Carradine asked her to take her clothes off and, when she refused, he tried to take them off himself. The incident is alleged to have occurred on the same day Carradine smashed windows in a neighbor's house, leaving a trail of blood which was later followed to the actor's home in Laurel Canyon. According to the civil suit Miss Kilty refused Carradine's promise to pay her $100,000.

MONTEREY, CALIF.—A crowd of about 190 supporters hissed and shouted "Free Inez," when Inez Garcia was sentenced to serve five years to life by State Superior Court Judge Stanley Lawson. Mrs. Garcia, 30, and the mother of an 11-year-old son, was found guilty of shooting and killing the companion of a man who allegedly raped her last March 19 in Soledad, California. Mrs. Garcia had admitted searching for the two men who attacked her with a loaded rifle and shooting Miguel Jimenez, but defended her action on the theory that she was defending her virtue. During the course of the trial, Mrs. Garcia shocked the filled courtroom by announcing from the witness stand, "I killed the son of a bitch and I wish I had killed the other." Judge Lawson, taking note of Mrs. Garcia's supporters, said the U.S. is a "government by law and not a government by men." He also noted that Mrs. Garcia's victim had not had the opportunity to stand trial.
SMUT FROM THE PAST
By J. J. Kane

"Madre de Dios! Pero, I am only come to see you television!"

So exclaims our latest "lucky" Pierre, and who are we to doubt his word? Sure, a cynical view of the matter might maintain that this swarthy, moustachioed stud knew perfectly well what he was getting into, that in fact all the erotic incidents seen in these photos were staged and that the participants were even paid for their lewd labors. Maybe so, but we at SCREW know only too well that such shameless scenes of sexual exploitation unfold every day, and in real life, mind you.

The news media, of course, usually black out reports of such wanton acts of unpremeditated abandon, which goes a long way in explaining why you probably aren't aware that such things go on. We at SCREW have, over the years, received countless letters, phone calls and personal visits from repairmen, salesmen, mailmen, phone company workers, delivery boys, messengers and even Avon ladies who've related strange but true accounts of mad, horny housewives who prey upon unsuspecting callers. Often, the unwitting victims are drugged against their will and led to participate in acts of depravity as unbridled and senseless as the ones depicted here. It's a jungle out there, believe us, and anyone who thinks it isn't had better not go ringing any strange suburban doorbells—or he might find himself in the same plight as this reluctant Latin lover.

SCREW extends muchas gracias and ten smackers to Dick Young of Hollywood, California, for sending these scandalous shots our way. If you'd like to do your part in helping to make this column at least a modest success, send any old smut photos you may have in your possession to Nostalgia Dept, Milky Way Productions, Inc., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, NY 10011. If we run them here, you'll get ten bucks there, much to our mutual satisfactions. Just be sure to include your name and address, unless you're into giving smut away.

"A NEW WAVE IN POLISHED EROTICA."

-- Variety

"A VOYEUR'S FANTASY COME TRUE..."

STARK SEXUALITY OF IMPRESSIVE QUALITY...

AND YES, QUANTITY...

PERHAPS THE MOST SENSUOUS TREATMENT OF ON-SCREEN SEX TO DATE...

VALERIE MARRON GETS IT ON, TOGETHER, AND ALL WAYS... A SEX KITTEN WITH CLAWS, WHO GOES AT HER WORK OR PLEASURE WITH A DETERMINATION SO FIERCE AND EFFECTIVE THAT THE BOYS IN THE FRONT ROW WILL SIT UP AND HOLLER ‘B I N G O’”
Bob Salmaggi Wins
Starring GEORGINA SPELVIN,
HARRY REEMS and introducing
VALERIE MARRON
ON THE EAST SIDE
CINE MALIBU
59TH STREET & 2ND AVE
Wet
Rainbow
X
ON THE WEST SIDE
CAMEO
8TH AVE AT 44 STREET
10:30 • 12 • 1:30 • 3 • 4:30 • 6 • 7:30 • 9 • 10:30 :
IN THE VILLAGE
CINEMA VILLAGE
12TH STREET, EAST OF 5TH AVE
"THE FIRST SEX
FILM ABOUT LOVE"
-- Gay Talese
"EUREKA! THE REST AND MOST IMPORTANT EROTIC FILM
I’VE EVER SEEN!
IF IT DOESN’T TURN YOU ON, YOU’VE BEEN EMBALMED AND DON’T KNOW IT. IT’S THE SEX FILM I’VE BEEN WAITING TO SEE!
The memorable scenes are so many that I intend to see this movie a second and third time.
Al Goldstein
"SPARKLES IN ALL THE COLORS OF LOVE AND DESIRE.
SIZZLES WITH EXCITEMENT AND GOOD ACTING."
Lise Hoffmman / SWANK
100%
Screw’s highest rating
100 90 80 70 60 50 40 30 20 10
Dear Diary:

Well, I'm settled in Toronto. Canada seems so European. I just love it here. I'm at the hotel near the bus depot that I stayed at last time I was here. I've been resting up and I'll see about a job tomorrow. There's an ad in the newspaper for exotic dancers. I'll go and check it out tomorrow. In the meantime, I'm just going to relax and watch TV.

June 20, 1973

I got the job that was advertised in the newspaper. I start to work on Friday. It's a very nice theatre on Yonge Street. There's a day and a night shift. I'll be working the night shift from 6:00 p.m. to 12 midnight. Not bad. The place is packed day and night. They really do a good business. The girls even get to take off their g-strings. I should cool it. I'll take it slow and not do too many pussy tricks at first. I don't think they're ready for me in Canada, yet.

June 22, 1973

After my show today, I went into my dressing room and one girl was sobbing her heart out. All the girls were in an uproar because I blew out a match with my pussy and put powder in it and blew puffs of smoke into the air. The audience roared, of course, because it's something new for Canada. I knew that I shouldn't have done it. But I also knew that the audience would love it and I couldn't resist doing it. I never realized it would cause that girl to sob her heart out. A customer told me that the girl who was crying did a lot of leg spreading and showed more pussy than anyone else. I was the only one who did her act better than she did. I guess that's enough to bring on the tears. I felt so sorry for her. What a rotten business! I said that I wouldn't do it any more. All the girls were going to quit. They told the boss that I was disgusting. What a mess!

The only way to get along with these girls is to do a sweet, innocent act on stage and disappoint the audience. Then they'd like me much better but the poor audience has to suffer. Oh well, I should've known better. I'll get the old routine here, too. I can see that.

June 27, 1973

I calmed my act down and the girls are acting much nicer. The audience seems content to just look at a naked girl and see a few spreads. My pussy tricks aren't really needed, anyway. Why spoil them? Let them think it's a great treat just to see a girl spread her legs now and then.

There's a girl here from England who worked the Soho district there. The way she described it, it sounded like Baltimore. I'd like to go there and check it out sometime. She gave me her address over there. She's a very pretty, brown-eyed blonde. Judith is her name. I like her real well. She wants to go to New York to work so I gave her some names and addresses there. These girls are pretty nice up here. I think my first act was just too much of a shock for them.

June 29, 1973
The boss told me that since this is the weekend, I should do some pussy tricks. I brought in a candelabrum that holds three candles and at the end of my act, I blew them out with my pussy. Of course, the audience loves it. But alas, one of the girls in the dressing room told me if I did it again, she was going to mash my face in with a ball bat. I told her that the boss told me I could do it for the weekend and she told me she didn't care what the boss said. She said that I was nothing but garbage. Oh, brother! Well, that was the end of that. After the boss saw how upset it got the girls again, he told me not to do it.

June 30, 1973

The boss wanted me to work here another week but I told him there was no way. It's really a strain working around those girls. They just aren't ready for pussy tricks. It's not worth the aggravation. So, the boss said he could book me in Windsor, Ontario, at a friend's place. He said that he told the guy about my act and I would have no problems there.

It's really a shame. I like these girls but they just aren't conditioned enough for my type of act. It's simply beyond their emotional grasp. They're probably from nice families and haven't been around much. I don't really get angry at them because I understand them. But maybe Windsor is more progressive. It's right across the river from Detroit, Michigan, and I heard that the girls from Detroit let the audience eat their pussies on stage.

July 2, 1973

Well, Windsor is a surprise to say the least. I did my act tonight and the audience loved it but the boss is playing games with me. He was already told ahead of time about it so he knew what to expect. He told me he didn't like it and if I didn't tone it down, I couldn't work. I need the money so I decided to tone it down. I just get on stage and act like a virgin and the audience seems to understand. I hate to disappoint them but that's show biz. The worst part is that the boss has me advertised in the paper and has my picture in the lobby. I would feel terrible if anyone who knows me comes in and sees my virgin act. If I knew that I was going to have to act like a virgin, I would've never let them advertise me. It's false advertising to draw people in expecting to see my pussy tricks and they won't even let me spread my legs!

I have a room at the YWCA for only $12 a week. My salary will be $200 after the agent's fee so I can save some much needed money here. I think the boss is just keeping me here to torment me. But I have to put up with it. It'll be the same story anywhere else I go.

One of the strippers here is married to the guy who works the lights and music. Needless to say, she gets beautiful lights and music and I get lousy lights. If I even bend over, the guy will shut the lights off. They won't let me do a thing on stage except dance around. The boss told me the audio man's wife is hard to get along with but she treats me real nice. I think he was hoping I'd get into a fight with her. She's a very pretty girl and does a good act. She really has no reason to be jealous of me. She's a Scorpio and I get along with Scorpio women. They're sexy and they know it. They don't worry about me. They sense that I'm not as sexy as I appear on stage. My act is more comedy than sex, anyway. They know they're way ahead of me in the sex department.

There's a female impersonator here who does a body painting act. She even lets the audience paint her tits during her act. But I can't even bend over and show my pussy or they cut the lights on me. It's all very unfair but the audience seems to know what's going on.
The boss likes the female impersonator real well. I suspect he's a little on the homosexual side. He has a house way out somewhere and the girls can have free rooms there if they want. The only one who stays there is the female impersonator. The boss is a real weirdo at times.
The column that gives SCREW readers a chance to expose themselves in print. If you've got some wild sexual adventures, or unusual erotic tastes, why not share them with the world? Your anonymity can be protected, if that's your bag. But we would like a few details of your biography: your age, occupation, dirty habits— that kind of thing. Manuscripts should be typed (double-spaced) and at least 1,000 words in length. Writers will be paid upon publication. Send your tale to MY SCENE, Milky Way Productions, Inc., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, N.Y. 10011.

I've been laid by several ruthlessly aggressive men who have made fun of me and debased me in every way—men who have wanted to assert their dominance and who have treated me as simply their mindless slave.
And I've loved every minute of it!

Now, I'm not really a pervert. At least, I don't consider myself a pervert. I'm just a girl with what you might call a double identity, a sexual schizophrenic.

At college, other students respected me for being intelligent, independent, and good-looking at the same time. I was also known as sort of a resident feminist because I believed that women should be treated as equals to men in every way. I hated being outdone by men in classes, which is why, I guess, I tried to beat them all the time.
Everyone thought I had a terrific body, which was true, but the men also knew they couldn't lay any funny machismo lines on me because I are than just a dumb blonde. And I believed they respected me a hell of a lot more than they did dumb blondes. Besides, I'd learned karate and they knew it.

I had a big ego and it was being fed quite well. In short, I was perfectly satisfied with my life at school except for one very important thing: my deprived sexual appetite. You might also call it my deprieved sexual appetite because, you see, sexually I'm a masochist.
Sure, I balled a few guys on campus, but it was always as two equals.
The guys were nice and well-built, but I always felt something was missing when they screwed me. It just wasn't exciting enough.

Nightly, I would fantasize about being raped, about being part of a harem, and about being treated roughly and even cruelly by sexy, muscular studs. Although these fantasies thrilled me like you wouldn't believe, I never thought I could actually carry any of them out because, of course, I thought women should be on an equal footing with men in all respects including sex. Mentally, I hated the idea of women always having to assume the passive role in sexual encounters, and I absolutely deplored the idea of men taking advantage of women—the Slam-Bam-Thank-you-Ma'am routine. My ego was too swollen to tolerate anything which might put me in an even slightly degrading or humiliating situation.

So there was my enigma: just as Germaine Greer had the hots for her literary opponent, Norman Mailer, so I loved my enemies. My sexual and mental needs were in such direct conflict that I even thought about seeing a psychiatrist a few times to find out if he could alter my masochistic tendencies. But fortunately, I found a simple way out.

While I was downtown with some friends one day, we came upon a local underground newspaper. In the back were ads from people seeking partners for all types of sexual activities. We all laughed and joked about the ads, but I felt a secret thrill from reading them. In fact, I bought a copy of the newspaper later on when I was downtown by myself.

I never thought I'd have the guts to answer any of the ads until one evening when a group of us went out to dinner. I drank three glasses of wine and had smoked some dope earlier, so by the time I got home, I was the horniest motherfucking bitch in town.

Being so stoned and drunk gave me the nerve to call an ad that read: "I am looking for slaves who enjoy doing what they are told. Call Big Peter (phone number)."

Later that very night, I found myself at "Big Peter's" house. He was a very sexy, massively built man who I thought out-studied everyone on the college football team. After one drink together, Peter ordered, "Take off your blouse and show me your tits." I obeyed with pleasure. "Now you just act like my own little slave and do everything I say. And you let me do anything I want to do to you, you just have to take it! Understand?"

"Yes," I gulped, feeling a wildly sensuous tingle along my spine.

Peter cruelly ripped off my bra and bounced my tits around with his hands, laughing while I just stood there obediently.

Then Peter removed my skirt and slowly took down my panties until my pussy was exposed. His next order surprised me. He told me to go to the kitchen and get him a carrot! Well, I sort of had to hobble on my way since my panties were resting on my thighs, and Peter laughed again at the way he was humiliating me. I felt at once degraded and very sexually aroused. But as time went on, my lustful desires took over, and I enjoyed every sadistic thing Peter did to me.

After I retrieved the carrot, Peter threw me on the couch, spread my legs, and rammed the goddam carrot up my cunt! My whole body flushed with ecstasy!

My next "punishment" was a spanking. Peter said to me, "You bad*little slave! I'm going to teach you a lesson!" and then took me over his knee and whacked me a few times on my bare ass with his large hand.

Finally, Peter made me get on all fours on the floor (doggy style). He took off his pants and briefs and then planted his huge prick into my cunt. My hips gyrated with crazy, flaming pleasure while Peter grunted animalistically as he fucked and fucked until his warm, creamy fluid shot into my hole.

Well, that night I had the best and finest orgasm I'd ever had. Since then, I've seen Peter quite frequently as well as many other sexy and domineering men whose ads I've answered. Everything's great now. My horniness gets fantastically satisfied, and my ego is still preserved at school. Nobody on campus knows about my "extra-curricular" activities. However, I'm not quite the same feminist I used to be. Oh, I still believe in equal pay for equal work and all, but as far as sexual equality goes—well, it's a nice, decent idea, but so is being a nun. Sometimes I think all that hard-core feminists really need is just a good hot fuck.

Vikki Brecha is a dialectical materialism major at Lewis and Clark College in Portland, Oregon. She writes, "The story is true, and I'm not the least bit ashamed of it." announcing the opening of the ultimate exotic experience
THE TAJ MAJAL
new york
The experience of a lifetime is yours. Be excitingly bathed and soothed in erotic splendor. The sensuous magic touch of a beautiful harem princess making YOU, her maharajah, the most gratified man in the universe. Ad adventure into exotic luxury; champagne; our lotus petal whirlpool; YOU and a lovely harem goddess. Lovely passion flowers of the east are waiting to fulfill your every desire and command. "a tribute to the monument of love"

YOU ARE INVITED TO CELEBRATE WITH us the NEW YORK OPENING OF THE most Luxurious and erotic Palace of Pleasure ever to exist. Take an adventure through our sensuous Love Chambers. Roar into the CHAMBER OF THE RAGING TIGER where a love goddess will anoint the most sensitive areas of your body. She will bathe fondle und caress you, stimulating the raging beast deep within you. Be enraptured in the CHAMBER OF ENCHANTMENT by a harem beauty whose trained hands will stroke and smooth your yielding body until you explode with gratification. Have the burning nectar of passion drained from your being by a succulent Lotus Maiden in the splendor of the CHAMBER OF FLOWING LOVE. Reach unsurpassed delight with the seductive harem princess of your choice in the infamous intimately domed CHAMBER OF THE KAMA SUTRA. You will bask in unrelenting ecstasy, becoming totally fulfilled in the secret mystical arts of the ancients.

Open 24 hours a day,
7 days a week

REVEL IN THE INFINITE PINNACLE OF EROTIC PLEASURE, THE CHAMBER OF ONE THOUSAND MIRRORS. REFLECTING EVERY PARCHING MOVEMENT, EVERY DELICIOUS QUIVER. Be bathed by your slave girl in a refreshing waterfall bath. Take delight in your private champagne bar. Your slave will serve your every desire and whim, your most personal fantasies, your wildest desires. You are the Master, a prince, the most omnipotent Maharajah in the Palace of love.

The Taj Mahal
212-575-0280
10 WEST 46th ST.
(just off 5th avenue)
NEW YORK, N.Y.

TOKYO ROME LONDON

LET YOURSELF BE SWEPT OFF ON A MAGIC CARPET OF LUXURIOUS PLEASURES THROUGH THE RESPLendent SERVICES OFFERED TO YOU. Surround your being with a harem of young and vibrant love goddesses in our HAREM DEN. Choose one who will gratify your every want. Immerse yourself in our LOTUS PETAL WHIRLPOOL, enrich your body with rays of light glistening from sparkling rubies in our JEWELLED SUN ROOM. Indulge in exotic reverie 24 HOURS A DAY in the luxurious and exciting MAHARAJAH LOUNGE where your suppliant harem nymph will serve you complimentary drinks in a thrilling exotic atmosphere. Enjoy the convenience of FREE VALET SERVICE and an authentic KASHMIRIAN RESTAURANT on the premises serving tantalizing dishes to complete your incomparable journey through the East.

Major Credit Cards accepted

To assure the immediate service of your choice please call for an appointment.
Ladies of the Night by Susan Hall. With photographs by Bob Adelman.
Pocket Books, 630 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10020. $1.50.

Susan Hall is a romantic. At the close of an author's note introducing this book, she bops us with a point of view no different from that of a thousand other outsiders who have written about prostitution: "What follows is life among the condemned."

It's as if she refuses to see the facts of her research, which she says involved extensive conversations with prostitutes and candid observations of their lives. The subjects we have selected are representative of crucial aspects of the life. "Most of the conversations were held in the girls' working environment—the street, massage parlors, hotels, apartments and madams' houses. While we have chosen to structure the book in a hierarchy from the street girl to the high class girl, a prostitute's work is, in fact, fluid. In one day, a girl might work the street, a massage parlor and from a phone in her own apartment. An ambitious girl works when there is work. We have tried, in both the photographs and the text, to establish the girls as they live and to present them as they see themselves. The text is in the girls' own language, but shaped by our preoccupation with the costs and satisfactions of their way of life.

Despite their efforts to shape the text, they have achieved a remarkable authenticity with their method. The women who are their subjects speak with their own voices, and for the first time in such a book, actually come to life—bringing with them a vivid picture of the world of prostitution. Bob Adelman's photographs of the women aid enormously in this regard. There are dozens of photos, and many of them are nude shots—a few of them even action shots—of the women at work.

Cindy is a black streetwalker connected with a pimp and his "family" of girls. Her attitude toward her profession contradicts Susan Hall's assertion that she is among the condemned. "I like my work. It's not an ordinary office job. This business is exciting and it pays well."

Excitement seems to run a close second to money and laziness as a motivation for being in the life.

Naturally a streetwalker's point of view about her work is going to be more negative than a call girl's. She's on the front lines, with no more protection against cops, disease, freaks, weather, or her pimp than her own mother wit. Naturally too, her attitude about sex is different. Kitty might turn 20 to 50 tricks a night from her stand on Lexington around 49th.

It's sex with tricks that I hate. Sex is horrible. Just horrible. I used to be able to stand it, but now I close my eyes and keep thinking it's a dog fucking me. It's just disgusting. If I didn't have a strong mind, I would go off-crazy. I guess with girls sex is emotional and with men it's physical. A man can put it in a coke bottle and push in and out and come.

My guys have pretty straight tastes. If they want something stupid, I won't do it. Anything other than fucking is stupid. I'll suck them and they can get on me. If a guy says "Get on top of me," I say no. If I'm on top, he might be getting ready to come. I might stop and then have to start all over again. I won't let men touch me. I won't let them suck my titties. Hell, no.
Kitty passes on a lot of the tricks of her trade: Usually when I get a guy up to the apartment, I get the money and then I light a cigarette and put it in the ash-tray. When the cigarette burns out, I know the time is up.

I see about 50 guys a night—the price depends. One might spend 75, two might spend 25, and another 40. You don't always fuck. Sometimes you just french. But that makes your teeth rotten. If it drips and gets in your gums, your mouth rots.

Yet despite her feeling of revulsion for her tricks, when Kitty goes to her pimp "Daddy," it's sex she needs: Daddy is important to me, because I have to prove I can have a healthy sexual relationship. It's particularly important for a prostitute—after you've been with the animals.

In addition to tape-recording stories like Kitty's, Susan Hall bugged a massage parlor while a black girl named Sherry was working it, and recorded a typical dialogue between Sherry and her customers. A house was also bugged, and the conversations between prostitutes and customers (one of them a judge) are funny.

As the women rise higher in the echelons of the life, they seem less desperate, more like career women anywhere. There's Foxy, who works solely for a garment manufacturer, and takes a great deal of pride in pleasing her clients. There are madams like Diane and Pamela, who talk about their businesses in detail, and their stable of girls. (Included in Ladies of the Night is a Madam's Book—pictures of the girls a madam shows her customers.)

Hall and Adelman collaborated last year on the successful book about pimping, Gentleman of Leisure. Ladies of the Night is just as successful in rendering the language, business details, thoughts, feelings, motivations and sexuality of prostitutes on all levels. And Susan Hall's tendency toward romanticism is compensated for by the honesty of women like Amanda: Being in the business has improved my sex life. Anyone who says no is stupid. I'm hot-blooded and my life fulfills me. This certainly doesn't hold true for all prostitutes, but if lousy working conditions were separated from the act of fucking for money, it would be true for the majority.

CALDWELL

"You're dripping all over! Hurry up and eat it!"
Hail Caesar!*
CAESARS RETREAT
Come, visit our House of Roman Pleasures, where beautiful Toga Clad Goddesses will pamper and delight you, anointing your body with sensuous tingling lotions in an imperial manner. Be Roman Bathed in a golden whirlpool of champagne milk bubbles by your chosen slave girls. Hot exotic oils lovingly applied. Unwind in our large authentic Rock Sauna room. Needle Showers—Creamy Facials & Free Refreshments in the Gladiators Lounge. For Nero their is our famous Bacchanale in the majestic Circus Maximum Room. Let the Games Begin.

AIR CONDITIONED * LUXURIOUS PRIVATE ROOMS * STEREO * CABLE TV
219 East 46th Street
Open 24 Hours,
Monday thru Saturday
Sunday until 12 Midnight
758-6885
We honor
Major Credit Cards
*The Original
Most concepts of pornography contain the term "prurience." Prurience means causing an itch, and, in most cases, it's the sexual excitation that the laws are trying to prohibit. It's always struck me as strange that on one hand it's all right to whet and indulge our appetite for a McDonald's hamburger or a Baskin-Robbins ice cream, but if our genitalia become firm and moist and desirous of activation, society says, "No-no!"

THE TEXAS CHAIN SAW MASSACRE

This past week I've gone to several films, all containing R or GP ratings that permit them to be seen by most people. Once more the old self-evident duplicity—that in this country it's legal to fuck but illegal to show movies of people fucking and that it's illegal to kill but legal to show people killing—is given dramatic import by the films I viewed. None of them contained one iota of sperm or body sweat derived from coupling, but they do contain gobs of blood and remnants of brain tissue and generally resemble a butcher shop. The ugliest of these films, one brought to you by those people who brought you Frankenstein, is a lesson in mayhem called The Texas Chain Saw Massacre. When I got the press release for this garishly bloody movie, I should have been warned that this would be a film that evolved from the mentalities that turn out many of our porn films, where the human body is exploited for an espoused objective. Whether a fuck film is exploitive or not has never really concerned me, since I consider the objective of turning someone on acceptable. But when the exploitation deals with making us cower with fear or, as we walk home, check over our back, then I wonder what purpose the film serves. In no way do I want to censor any kind of film, but I personally find this kind frightening and even more demoralizing, in the fact that so many people find their needs served by this kind of gore:

A Volkswagen bus filled with five people traverses the Texas countryside. Two very delicious women, two wise guys, and a paraplegic in his chair. We don't know where they're going, where they've been, or why they're together. This is the usual mise-en-scene in porn movies introducing the people who'll soon be into mindless fucking. But this is a film that got an R rating because there is no sex. It just has brutality—brutality unlike any I've ever seen. Even a cultish film like Blood Feast does not contain the gallons of blood and guts that this one does. The moviemakers' lofty attempt to simulate a slaughter-

CHAIN SAW MISTAKE: When his pa told him to get rid of all the limbs around the place, he did.

house is so foppishly self-serving and without merit as to make even a slow public school class giggle to themselves. I watched about 40 minutes of the film and finally left when the executioner knocked down one of the guys with a mallet three times and started dismembering his body with a chain saw. Before that, he was interrupted by the guy's girlfriend, whom he impaled on a meat hook. Sicking as the film was, I found myself opening my frozen-closed eyes to peer at the screen and wonder "what will they show and how far will they go?" Walt Whitman's famous statement, "I contain multitudes," is surely operative for all of us because some dark side of our personality's needs are served by this kind of shit. What is irritating to me and to anyone with their head screwed on is the fact that society condones this kind of film and nobody will take a bust, while society would look askance if the people caressed, grabbed nipples and maybe went down on each other. To hit your buddy with a mallet and work him over with various sharp instruments are acts indicative of what make our military and patriotic gears grind our citizenry into increasingly small pieces.

THE NIGHT PORTER

The film which has been a controversial cause celebre in the sadistic sweepstakes is the AVCO-Embassy movie The Night Porter. Even trying to get to see the movie turned into an exercise in masochism. After weeks of trying, the PR head finally told my secretary that I’d be allowed in if I appeared at the Baronet Theatre the next Monday night. That was not so, since my name was not at the box office. Not wishing to pay, I decided to try again. This time I was promised admittance on Thursday night, but, once more, I was greeted with indifference. When a new red color came into my cheeks, a very nice manager at the theatre, feeling that I was either a sincere phony or a trampled bona fide critic, let me in. By the time I got into the theatre, 15 minutes late, the movie was into its Nazi re-creations. The theatre was packed with hip, chic East Side Bloomingdale’s refugees looking into the action with hungry anticipation of more outrages. Had they but known that the true epitome of their wants would be satisfied by The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, they would have fled from the heavily drenched symbolism and intellectual pretentiousness of Night Porter. The night before I’d gone into the Baronet, I had spent many hours trying to organize my records for the annual Internal Revenue audit, one more manifestation of society’s attempt to put me out of business. So, I was sleepy and the action on the screen induced slumber. When my neighbor woke me with an elbow, because I snore, I realized I was doomed never to see The Night Porter. So I fled into the night, wondering what AVCO-Embassy press agent mogul Ted Spiegel has reserved for me in the perilous future.

YET MORE VIOLENCE

During last week’s movie-jammed schedule, I saw three other films that dealt with violence. The first one, Murder on the Orient Express, is about a wretched scumbag who kidnaps the young daughter of a rich scion and then executes the helpless child. Many years later he gets his comeuppance, when 12 people comprising an informal jury methodically wreak havoc upon his body. It is not bloody, but rather intellectual, and a cast starring such heavies as Albert Finney, Lauren Bacall, Martin Balsam, Ingrid Bergman, Jacqueline Bisset, Sean Connery, John Gielgud, Anthony Perkins, Vanessa Redgrave, Richard Widmark, and Michael York is substantial. The problem is that it’s so substantial and so stagey that it’s boring.

Boredom is carried to an almost obscene level in The Odessa File, a film that does violence to the audience. It tries to devalue the totality of the Nazi menace and how, even in the Germany of today, Hitler's madmen continue working their cunning ways. The film on every level is so incredibly inept and pathetic that I'm amazed that Peter Locke didn't shoot it and that Jim Buckley isn't distributing it. What really made me squirm was not the film's sub-basement level of ability, but the critics' gentle tolerance of it. Only Rex Reed, whom I find more and more is my favorite movie critic, really went for — that film's jutting jugular.

I've always been against book-burning, but I'm starting to arouse my tired energies to support film-burning, and this would be the first fuel to save artistry in America. Never have so many people toiled for such a little flick, and never have so many people had their time wasted. Do not see this movie unless you think The Beverly Hillbillies are highbrow.

The last film I saw was Nada Gang, which is Claude Chabrol’s exploration into the motivations of violence in our weird society.

The Nada Gang is one of these precious pieces of pap that purveyors of pomp love imposing on the philosophically naive public. It’s very much like the film Z, which was so elementary in its delineation of good and bad guys that all you needed was the mustachioed villain to know who to boo. The Nada Gang at least attempts to comprehend some of the violence it shows and so is leagues ahead of such low-class manure as The Texas Chain Saw Massacre. But, because of the commitment to preordained points of view, the film is no more interesting than a Chinese agrarian play explaining the advantages of early plantings and the wisdom of Chairman Mao.
Introducing: the Ultimate Relaxation Plus Commodore Hotel Leisure Spa Lexington Ave. and 42nd Street New York City, N.Y. (212) 686-4345 Mezzanine Floor Open 7 Days • 24 Hours a Day Major Credit Cards COME WITH US, CHOOSE YOUR OWN TICKET ON AN EROTIC TRIP TO BLOW YOUR MIND: Come to the mysterious HOUSE OF THE GEISHA, in the surroundings of a Japanese house of pleasure. The soft arousing moods of the Orient will lead you and your own personal geisha into the subtly sensuous secrets of the Eastern arts of pleasure. In an atmosphere of Eastern decadence, experience the exotic SULTAN’S DEN. Your slave will pull back her veils and caress you with the most cherished oils of Arabia. Her trained hands will softly caress you and soothe you, enveloping you, possessing you in total bliss. Come to the CASBAH, a room of North African splendor, rich with the perfumes of the ancient pleasure palaces. Choose your harem and let them show you the languid, subtle touch of the Moorish maidens. The secret pleasures of Casa-blanca will be opened to you by women born to serve their demanding masters. Come to our WESTERN BORDEL-LO. Let your very own Wild West Girl show you the pleasures of the American West. Learn why the Erotic Trip Around the World

RELAXATION PLUS INTRODUCES FOR THE FIRST TIME ANYWHERE EVER, the secrets of erotic sensuality from around the world. Relaxation Plus, the original deluxe spa, has just created for you a totally new, totally unique environment of earthly pleasure, unlike anything you have ever seen before. We want to send you on the most mind-blowing trip you have ever imagined.

WE HAVE RE-DESIGNED EVERY ASPECT OF RELAXATION PLUS to let you experience a trip you will never forget—totally different erotic worlds, each one in its own atmosphere of sensuous ecstasy.

THIS WEEK ONLY, TO CELEBRATE OUR TRANSFORMATION, we invite you to come and see us and have a free drink, to share with us the incredible joys that can be yours. Our women of the world are carefully hand-selected from around the world, for you, the discerning man who knows the commonplace and wants to go beyond.

AT RELAXATION PLUS, EVERY LUXURIOUS SERVICE IS AVAILABLE, including sauna, whirlpool baths, sun room, bubble bath, hot towel treatment and facials, free valet service and our very own (Take Off) Lounge, where you can leisurely enjoy a complimentary drink before you take your trip.

THE 9 EROTIC WONDERS OF THE WORLD SCREWS HIGHEST RATING

Wset was really was wild, as she leads to new frontiers of bodily joy. Submit to the uninhibited delights of your personal Westworld.

Take a trip in space and time in our SPACESHIP. Come with your lunar maiden to a place you never lined could possibly exist. Lie back and let your expert superwoman show you the joys of the future, unknown to normal mortal man.

Come with us to the HALL OF CAESAR, in the opulent splendor of ancient Rome. Your seductive slave girl is at your mercy, ready to touch you, move you, anoint you, arousing you to unimagined heights of frenzied pleasure.

Wet and wild—that's what you'll be in the MYSTERIES OF THE DEEP. Your own specially trained mermaid will perform incredible feats as she shows you the joys of sensuous fulfillment. Only a true mermaid could know these deep secrets that she will share with you. Move with the wild primitive beat of the conga drum in our mystery-ous JUNGLE PARADISE. The sensuous headiness of the tropics will mix with the exotic charms of deepest Africa to lead you to new peaks of erotic delight. And the absolute ultimate, a room of infinite mirrors, the Infinity Room. The room Screw’s own Al Goldstein calls "the wildest room I’ve ever seen, in the most exciting, most luxurious place in town." The one and only mirrored room like it in the world, reflecting your every tremor and vibration.
COME ON OVER AND RE-E-A-LL-Y
RELAX
MURRAY HILL HEALTH STUDIO
Free yourself from worry and snares and peace and quiet will prevail ... . Escape into a private sanctuary where beautiful girls from around the world will fascinate you into feeling exquisite pleasure, free your mind from want, satisfy your desires, and make you smile with the 154 E. 33 St. or call
[212] 532-2334/5
Free Refreshments
Sauna Bath Privacy BETSST OF SCREW No. 5
ON SALE
LET ME SHOW YOU
HOW I COME!
I ENJOY RAISING
MY DRESS AND HAVING A MAN WATCH ME PLAY WITH MYSELF!
PLEASE SEND $1 OR $2 FOR A PERSONAL REPLY
AND A ROLL OF 8 PHOTOS
KAREN A. 7471 MELROSE AVE.
LOS ANGELES. CA 90046
Different & Exciting Adult Pleasures
any one - #1.
ILLUSTRATED BOOK
1 PHOTO SET
1 MOVIE
ALL THREE SPECIAL all three - $2
BOX 204 LA MESA CA. 92041
NEVER BE ALONE AGAIN!
5'4" TALL
INFLATABLE
LOVE PARTNER with LARGE BREASTS
37.23.36
Marilyn is the only doll that goes all the way! $39.95 value
NOW only
$20.00
THE only DOLL that COMES with VAGINA and PUBIC Hair! The bed-partner that doesn't talk back -- just obeys! You'll love her- She'll love you! She'll submit to every whim!

CRYSTAL IMPORTS
P.O. BOX 85097
Los Angeles, Ca. 90072
GUARANTEED SATISFACTION
FEMALE BESTIALTY
BEASTLY PLEASURES female with animals PENNY and HER DOG SEX WITH ANIMALS case history $3.00 EACH • SPECIAL OFFER—All 3 for $5.00 VALLEY BOOKS Box 1217. Spring Valley, Calif. 92077 50 FT 8MM STAG REEL SALE! SO THAT WE MAY SEND YOU OUR CATALOG! "TEASING TINA" "ALL NIGHT SUCKER" "SPANKER'S DELIGHT" ALL 3 PARTS & FREE VIEWER WITH FREE VIEWER $2 EA RUSED BY RETURN MAIL SANTA CO., BOX 86006, HOLLYWOOD, CALIF. 90072 SPECIAL MOVIE OFFER FOR HARDCORE COLLECTORS ONLY ANIMAL ACTION B/W 100' $5 B/W 200' $10 Color 200' $20 REG 8 SUPER 8 FILMCOM BOX 85147 HOLLYWOOD, CALIF. 90072 ROYAL SPA Featuring Superb European massage and relaxation in the Continental Manner by talented masseuses
Sauna Showers
45 West 55th Street
Telephone
(212)765-1559
SMALL PENIS?
ERECION PROBLEMS?
UNGIA-100, the pure natural laboratory blend designed to actually enlarge the penis and to induce and maintain multiple and long term erections. LINGA-100 allows a more intense and deeply satisfying male climax while developing sexual power, physical strength and mental alertness.
LINGA-100 was developed by top Swiss scientists involved in natural sex hormone research. Literally thousands of European men have experienced dramatic results.
Impotency over-come and increases in organ size of one to two inches were not uncommon. LINGUA-100 is perfect for the older men's problems. Average guys will really love the results. Studies reveal women definitely consider the penis as the real measure of the men. Let LINGA-100 increase your sexual power and size. Only $8.95 postpaid. Order now. UNITED MEDI-CAL SUPPLY, Box 7161, Dept. S-6, Burbank, CA 91510
SCREW IS MAKING ANOTHER MOVIE!!
SCREW is looking for a couple who are seeking to have a child.
SCREW would like to record the moment of conception for a film and for posterity (we will give you a copy of the entire film clip). In the interest of extending the boundaries of good taste, SCREW believes the filming of a child at birth has been done often enough and is passe.
BUT, what wonderful memories and what wonderful viewing a true act of love and life's conception could be for one and all! If you are earnestly planing to have a child but have not yet actually conceived, are relatively young and relatively good-looking and would be interested in performing this vital humanitarian gesture for a fee,
please call:
(212) 989-1660
and ask for Margie.
Around the clock
pleasure...
9 3
YOUR CHOICE OF 7 GIRLS
687-1730
SENSUAL BODY RUN
Victorian Studios
463 Lexington Ave. (between 45th and 46th) OPEN 24 HOURS EVERY DAY
NAKED CITY
Edited By Rocco Bonelli

The purpose of this column is to offer our readers an honest and complete guide to sex entertainment in New York. Besides porno movies, we regularly review burlesque shows, topless bars, and massage parlors. Our rating system is based on quality for your dollar. If you have any comments or complaints about any place listed here, please write to: Bonelli, Milky Way Productions, Inc., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, NY. 10011.

As we go to press news has reached us of what must be the first major New York City porno film bust in two years, since Deep Throat got confiscated at the World Theatre. Details are, as of yet, scarce, but this much we do know: on Wednesday, October 30th, the police raided and confiscated prints of films at three different theatres. The World, showing The Life and Times of Xaviera Hollander, the Capri, showing Love Bus, and the Lincoln Art, currently screening Lick-ity Split, were all hit by the guardians of civic decency. However, we wish to note that all three theatres—repeat, all three of the porno houses busted—report that business will continue as usual. Although prints were confiscated in the raid, all three theatres rushed in new copies of the same film. Still, in a fluid situation like this, it will be a good idea to call theatres to verify all programs.

What, exactly, is behind this massive bust? That's the question being asked by most porno theatre owners, who were surprised by this act of repression because of a prolonged period of relative quiet. It doesn't make sense to bust movies like Xaviera when a trip to the Times Square peep shows will reveal films of pedophilia and bestiality. So what gives?

The answer being given by the theatre owners is Manhattan District Attorney Kuh. This scumbag, the guy who busted Lenny Bruce ten years ago, is running scared for election this November. Originally, Kuh tried to win votes by playing down his previous role as an anti-smut crusader. But as polls continue to show him running behind his opponent, Kuh reverted to type with this last-minute gambit to get the votes. In the past Kuh has found that making obscenity busts has helped his career and it is believed he is hoping it will help him again. We hope his ploy fails but, whatever the case, the election will be settled by the time you read this.

Meanwhile, check these pages next issue for an update on the bust.

NEW PORN

WET RAINBOW is the most important sex film made to date, marking yet another breakthrough in the porn film genre. Featuring the acting talents of Harry Reems and Georgina Spelvin, this movie fuses a fine script with well-fleshed-out characters, direction, and camera work to transcend the limitations previously ascribed to the porn film genre.

The story is of a married couple that seeks to escape from the highly codified world of suburbia through sexual experimentation. But rather than presenting this situation in a superficial and simplistic way, we are shown real human beings floundering in areas they do not completely understand. Spelvin, as the wife, finds FLESH GORDON: The sci-fi sex spoof is dropping into neighborhood theatres all around town.

RATING KEY

Not recommended—you get the least for your money Reliable—you get what you pay for Recommended—you won’t go wrong here Highly Recommended—the best of its kind available herself turned on by the idea of a threesome and Reems, who has never turned in a better acting performance, suddenly finds himself threatened by his wife’s enthusiasm, thus giving us a layered movie of depth and texture.

But with all of the attention to story line, acting and what have you, the movie still manages to keep a sharp focus on the sex action, rating 100% on the Peter-Meter. Playing at the Cinema Village, 12th St. east of 5th Ave. (WA 4-3363), Cine Malibu, 59th St. at 2nd Ave. (759-4630), and the Cameo, 8th Ave. at 44th St. (246-9550). Admission $5.

THE FILTHIEST SHOW IN TOWN is a fairly well made hard-core sex spoof of TV’s Dating Game which features some quick paced directing, a reasonable script, some nice parodies, excellent acting, but, alas, a minimum of sexual activity. Although there are some nicely done hardcore sex scenes (especially the one with Harry Reems and Tina Russell, porn’s most beautiful starlet), they comprise a very short part of the overall movie. And they are additionally burdened by the fact that none of the couples appears to reach orgasm—there are no come scenes whatsoever in this flick.

The attempt of the director is clearly to go beyond the boundaries of the porno genre, but this has been done better by others. Goldstein not only hated the film, but moreover believes that it’s a re-release of a four-year-old movie under a new name. Playing at the Rialto I, 42nd St. at 7th Ave. (LO 5-9795). Admission $5.

PORTRAIT, the new Gerard Damiano movie, is a disappointment to those of us who look to Damiano for something more than a fuck and suck movie. But that is, in fact, what the old master has delivered, pure unadulterated hard-core screwing with little, if any, artistic pretensions and no attempt at story line. As such, we agree that it is well-handled and delivers the goods but, after Damiano’s past triumphs, we’re not sure that is enough.

The only really notable aspect of this film is the leading lady, Jody Maxwell, who will undoubtedly prove to be the most original cocksucker since Linda Lovelace. Jody Maxwell’s talent is that she can sing “How Much Is That Doggie in the Window” while giving head . . . She can also bark at the same time. We’re not sure that’s enough either and found this film very difficult to rate. It just missed getting two cocks, and Goldstein gave it only 70% on the Peter-Meter. Playing at the Circus Cinema, B’way at 49th St. (489-9290). Admission $5.

THE MINOR’S WIFE is actually the story of a number of extremely attractive wives living in a small mining town in West Germany, who spend most of their time cheating on their hard-working husbands. But, aside from the numerous attractive European women featured in this movie and some reasonably fast-paced editing and directing, the film fails to win its audience.

The main problem with this film seems to be that it was apparently shot with a soft-core market in mind and most of the hard-core looks like it was tacked on as an afterthought. Consequently the action during the sex scenes is disjointed, unconvincing, and never allows the audience enough time to identify with what is happening on the screen. Basically the sex scenes take too long to get started, end too quickly, and show too little. Indeed, the only sexual aspect of note in this drama are the female “splash scenes”—and that’s only because they are so unbelievable. “Splash scenes” are those parts of a porno movie that show a guy coming. For the female “splash scenes,” the women apparently doused with milk so that they could create the illusion of a female ejaculation. Peter-Metered at 52%. Playing at the Rialto II, corner of 42nd St. and 7th Ave. (565-8733). Admission $3.

LOVE BUS is a new and exciting film that offers solid acting performances with solid fuck and suck action, and a bevy of new and beautiful bodies. The story, which is not as implausible as most, is of an oversexed shrink who gets all his clients together for a trip up to the Gross hotel where they will spend a weekend of fun and games. But, along the way the bus breaks down and the sex takes place on and around the bus itself. Good photography combined with kinky sex (as in the scene where new porno star Rita Davis gets fist-fucked in the cunt up to the elbow by Jamie Gillis) make this movie an excellent dollar value. 90% on the Peter-Meter. Playing at the Capri Cinema, 8th Ave. at 45th St. (581-4444). Admission $5.

LICKITY SPLIT is another bus ride movie and a good one at that. Although the directing is uneven and there are times midway through the movie that might put you to sleep, the overall film, especially the final orgy on the bus, make this one of the better porno features of the season. And Linda Lovemore, the film's star, who gives deep throat (even better than Linda Lovelace, since she takes big cocks up to and including the balls), has to be counted as one of the best new cocksuckers on the sex horizon. Combined with good directing, acting and editing, this movie merits your attention.
3 SUPER XXX HITS
HARRY THE PLUMBER in WAYWARD MISTRESS BIGGEST ADULT SHOW
BARGAIN IN BROOKLYN
THE GOODNIGHT SHOW SELL & SELL
BKLYN PLAZA
COMPLETE NEW SHOW EVERY MONDAY
FLATBUSH AVE. & GRAND ARMY PLAZA 783-1050
LET ME PEOPLE
COME
E
E
E
A SEXUAL MUSICAL
EARL WISLSON JR. PHIL OESTERMAN
LET HIT PEOPLE
SCHILD & PRICES IUES.. WED . THURS. 7 30; SUN
3 S 7:30 $8.50. $7.50. $6 50. SS 50. FRI 8 SAT, 730 & 10:15 $9.50. $8 50, $7 50, $6 50. PHONE AND MAIL ORDERS ACCEPTED. Ecnl. self-addressed. stamped envelope & make check or MO. payable to LIBRA CO., P 0. Box 712. Cooper Station. NY. N.Y
10003 TICKETS ALSO AT TICKETRON.
TWO GALA PERFS. THANKSGIVING EVE. NOV. 27TH AT 7:30 & 10:15 PM $9.50, $8.50, $7.50 AND $8.50.
NO. PERFS. THANKSGIVING DAY
VILLAGE GATE BLEECKER & THOMPSON STS.
473-7270
473-3570
Best of Screw
Available Now
VOL II to Vol. V Smut From the Past
Volume II
On Sale
SEX SENSE SAVES YOU MONEY
Written, edited and compiled by John Milton, the Sex Industry's most informed and informing export. If you deal in the Russian Roulette industry of Mail Order Sex, SEX-SENSE is a must. Every issue of SEXSENSE is jam-packed with the kind of information a smart buyer needs to know.
Like who to send your money to—and who to avoid! Like w here to get the hottest stuff around. And the best quality. SEXSENSE tells you who's got the goods and who doesn't. SEXSENSE also reviews the latest in erotic books, magazines and products. You name it, SEXSENSE has it.
DEAR SIRS: Send me SEXSENSE, I can no longer be without this valuable tool and guide. Send me:
11 issues for only $9.95.
24 jam-packed issues for only $18.50.
MY NAME IS ADDRESS
CITY STATE & ZIP
Make check or money order payable to: Milky Way Productions, Inc.
Send coupon to: Milky Way Productions, Inc., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, N.Y. 10011.

and patronage. There has never been an orgy scene as well done as the bus orgy at this film’s conclusion. Goldstein gave it 90% on the Peter-Meter. Playing at the Lincoln Art, 225 W. 57th St. (JU 2-2333).
Admission $5.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF XAVIERA HOLLANDER, starring former Playboy bunny Samantha McLaren along with super cock stud John Holmes, is a movie that supposedly recounts the famous hooker’s life in the trade.
Directed by Larry Spangler (who also did The Soul of Nigger Charly for Paramount), this hardcore sex epic falls short of being the masterful kind of flick you might expect with such star billing. On the other hand, it still comes across as superior raunch entertainment and features a number of erotic and kinky sex scenes. But the beautiful Samantha McLaren should be reason enough for you to put this film on your "must-see" list. She handles her sex scenes well enough to help win this film 90% on the Peter-Meter. Playing at the World, 49th St. off 7th Ave. (CI 7-5747). Admission $5

HOLDOVER AND REVIVALS

These are the best of the long running or revival hard-core films now playing in New York.

FLESH GORDON is an outrageous sexual parody of the space adventurer of yesteryear. Produced by Howard Ziehm, the film is a hilarious blend of sex and science fiction. While the sexual action is strictly simulated, the X-rated extravaganza is loaded with bouncing tits, bare asses, and great looking chicks. The story, in brief, concerns the sexual misadventures of Flesh on the planet Porno. The Earth, it seems, is being attacked by erotic rays sent out by oversexed aliens that make it impossible for humans to do anything but fuck. A pleasant fantasy if there ever was one. Goldstein Peter-Metered it at 82%. Showing at 47 Showcase Theatres in the greater New York metropolitan area. In Manhattan playing at the Apollo 42nd St., 42nd St. bet. 7th & 8th Aves.
(565-2326), Alpine, Dyckman St. and B’way (LO 7-3587), Quad Cinema 3, 13th St. bet. 5th and 6th Aves. (255-8800), and the Thalia, 95th St. and B’way (AC 2-3370). Admission $3.

DEEP THROAT and THE DEVIL IN MISS JONES are both total rip-offs because they have been optically censored. Despite the fact that both movies originally received SCREWs top rating, we cannot recommend these censored softcore versions. There is absolutely no sex action to be found in either film. Playing at the Love Theatre, 125 W. 42nd St. (no phone), Avon 7, 7th Ave. and 48th St. (586-8355), and the Kips Bay, 2nd

RECOMMENDED FOR COUPLES

Regardless of what we may think of their current offerings from week to week, these are the cleanest, most comfortable movie theatres in New York which regularly show hard-core sex films. They’re all suitable places to take a chick, and the program is always reliable.

CAPRI CINEMA, 8th Ave. at 45th St.
(581-4444), admission $5.
CINE LIDO, 48th St. & B’way (757-4228), admission $5.
ORLEANS THEATRE, 241 W. 47th St. (757-3503), admission $5.
WORLD THEATRE, 49th St. off 7th Ave. (CI 7-5747), admission $5.

STAG MOVIES
These are the porno movie theatres that change their program every week or two. Hard-core films are widespread but not universal, so check the listings before you spend your cash.

AVON 7, 7th Ave. at 48th St. (586-8355), shows hard-core double features after they've played at the Hudson. The quality is usually dependable and there's always a program of loops too. Admission $5.

BRYANT, 138 W. 42nd St. (LO 5-8277), shows only soft-core films with simulated sex. And the quality of this soft-core is usually terrible. Admission $3.

CAMEO, 8th Ave. at 44th St. (246-9550), is a comfortable theatre that usually shows high quality hard-core movies. This is one of the better show places for 16mm entertainment. Admission $5.

CINEMA LUNA, 202 Canal St. at Mulberry (732-1344), is the only porn theatre in the Chinatown area. It usually offers a double feature of 16mm hard-core films of reliable quality. Admission $3.50.

DOLL, 7th Ave. at 48th St. (no phone), is a small theatre that shows crummy 16mm hard-core films. The program usually runs close to two hours. Admission $3.

EROS II, 8th Ave. at 45th St. (246-6696), usually shows a double feature of hard-core porn. It's a clean, comfortable theatre, and it's had some big name porno films on their second run. Admission $5.

HAREM, 249 W. 42nd St. (868-5585), is a dingy little theatre that tries to make up in quantity what it lacks in quality. The program usually includes three or four second-rate hard-core features. This theatre is open 24 hours a day. Admission $3 days, $5 nights.

HOLLYWOOD CINEMA, 775 8th Ave. at 47th St. (no phone), is a brand new theatre that's being completely mismanaged. No phone, no air conditioning, and the films are terrible old prints of 16mm hard-core. Admission $3.

HUDSON, 141 W. 44th St. (757-4198), is a huge old theatre that shows two hours of first-run fuck films and shorts. The coming attractions alone are enough to usually satisfy your appetite for sex. Admission $5.

INTIMATE MOVIES, 660 8th Ave. at 42nd St. (244-9317), is a small, uncomfortable theatre that shows low-quality hard-core 16mm sound movies. But the theatre is open 24 hours and the price is right: $1.50 mornings, $2 afternoons, $3 after 12 at night.

JOY 42nd St., 224 W. 42nd St. (695-3885), is a new theatre that shows old films. Most of the stuff consists of crummy 16mm hard-core. Admission $2 days, $4 evenings.

LOVE THEATRE, 42nd St. between 6th & 7th Aves. (no phone), usually shows hard-core second-run features after they have played at the Hudson. They also occasionally show soft-core versions of movies that have previously been released as hard-core. This is a clean, comfortable theatre but the quality is erratic. Prices vary with the program. Admission $5.

MET CINEMA, 14th St. at 3rd Ave. (673-4004), is a sleazy place, but it's the only hard-core. porno theatre for straights in downtown Manhattan. Its two-hour program consists of 35mm shorts. No plot, no fancy productions. Admission $3.
MIDTOWN CINEMA, B'way at 99th St. (AC 2-1200), usually shows two big-name hard-core features on their second run. In addition, the clean, comfortable surroundings make this theatre a good value for the money. Admission $3.

ODD THEATRE, 670 8th Ave. at 42nd St. (221-0985), is a small theatre that shows low quality 16mm hard-core sound movies. However, they are open 24 hours. Admission $2 days, $3 after 12 at night.

OLYMPIA THEATRE, 2515 Steinway St, Astoria, Queens (RA 6-2710), is a clean, comfortable theatre that usually shows a double feature of good quality second-run hard-core. Admission $4.

NOVEMBER 18, 1974 PAGE 29

PENN GARDEN CINEMA, 412 8th Ave. at 31st St (868-7072), shows a double rill of hard-core fuck films. It's a clean, dependable theatre. Admission $3.

j. RIALTO II, 205 W. 42nd St. at 7th Ave. 656-8733), is part of the Brandt soft-core main. The program usually includes two soft-core features with lots of fondling and female nudity, but no real sex. Admission $3.

RiVOLI, 8th Ave. at 50th St. (CI 5-3920), is a big old theatre that has seen better days. The program usually consists of two second-rate fuck films and shorts. Admission $5.

VICTORY, 42nd St. bet. 7th & 8th Aves. (565-2330), is a small theatre that shows soft-core exclusively. The quality of the films is low but the real problem with this theatre is that they occasionally sucker in tourists by showing movies that sound like high-quality hard-core films. Admission $2.

THEATRE

This is a listing of live theatres that feature a heavy emphasis on sex content. LET MY PEOPLE COME, written by Earl Wilson, Jr., offers insight into the sexual problems of our time, total nudity and excellent scripting. Although the sex action is soft-core, most of the play is a heavy turn-on. Especially the blowjob scene which celebrates the joys of a guy coming in his girlfriend's mouth. We urge you to see this show at the Village Gate, Bleecker St. at the corner of Thompson St. (473-7270). Admission varies according to day of performance and choice of seats. The minimum during the week is $5.50.

GAY MOVIES

As the gay capital of the western world, New York has a number of theatres that offer all male hard-core porn.

DAVID CINEMA, 238 W. 55th St. (247-9800), usually has a two-hour program that consists of a 16mm hard-core feature plus shorts. Admission $4.

EROS I, 732 8th Ave. near 46th St. (581-4594), is a small theatre that shows two 16mm hard-core features plus shorts. It's a two-hour program, but the feature films are usually on their second run. Admission $5.

55th ST. PLAYHOUSE, 55th St. between 6th & 7th Aves. (JU 6-4590), is a clean and comfortable theatre which usually shows hard-core films of good quality. The features are 16mm movies. Admission $5.

MINI-CINEMA, 7th Ave. at 48th St. (581-5988), is the only gay all-night theatre in town. Under new management, the theatre has had new and comfortable seats put in and currently shows two hour-and-a-half features. Admission $5.

JEWEL THEATRE, 3rd Ave. at 12th St. (260-1090), usually presents a two-hour program of first-run hard-core features and shorts. It's the only gay theatre in downtown Manhattan. Admission $3.
PARK-MILLER, 124 W. 43rd St. (279-3970), is the oldest, largest and most reliable of the gay porno theatres. Its two-hour program consists of a first-run hardcore feature and shorts. Admission $5.

KING’S CINEMA, 236 W. 50th St. (247-9785), is a sleazy theatre that usually shows a 16mm hard-core feature on its second run plus a program of shorts. Admission $5.

BURLESQUE
The art of stripping is alive and well in New York. At the moment you have your choice of several good shows.

BROADWAY BURLESK, 49th St. between B’way & 7th Ave. (765-3326), is a clean, comfortable place where every spectator gets a good view. The continuous show has its dull moments, but the girls are consistently sexy and show all. Admission $5.

FOLLIES BURLESQUE, B’way at 46th St (265-3929), has the best produced show in town, with a good selection of professional strippers and live bouncy music. The girls shed every stitch, although they spend a lot of time on the traditional teasing. The theatre itself is clean and comfortable. Note: do not be confused by the signs out front. The FOLLIES is upstairs, while, in the downstairs portion of the building, the GAIETY BURLESQUE has a homosexual show. Admission $5.

FUN CITY THEATRE, 113 W. 42nd St. at 6th Ave. (no phone), is actually a combination porno book shop, peep show, and strip joint. The burlesque takes place upstairs where two drab girls spend 15 minutes apiece entertaining the customers. The half-hour burlesque is followed by a half-hour of hard-core 16mm movies. Admission $4.

PSYCHEDELIC BURLESK, 670 8th Ave. at 42nd St. (565-8794), is not a comfortable place, but it’s kind of fun. The lively show includes a mixed bag of strippers plus a male-female couple who perform a simulated sex act. Admission $5. j, j, ROXY BURLESK, 244 W. 42nd St. (695-3885), is a big theatre with a small runway, so you sit up close if you want a good view. The two-hour show is slick and professional, although the girls may not be the greatest. Admission $5.

42nd ST. PLAYHOUSE, 417 W. 42nd St. (563-3135), is a big old theatre that has continuous burlesque from noon till 1 a.m. The girls are a real mixed bag, but you see a dozen of them in every show. Admission $4.

49th ST. BURLESK, 49th St. off B’way (245-9382), is a dingy little theatre with a cheaply produced show. Unless you sit in the very front, you can’t see a thing. The girls are usually second-rate and the atmosphere is nil. In between live shows they present old loops on a tiny screen. Admission $4.50.

TOPLESS BARS
These bars are usually open from noon til 4 a.m. and the minimum price for a drink at the bars runs around $2. By city law the girls have to wear pasties and g-strings, but that’s pretty minimal coverage.

ADAM & EVE BAR, 371 Lex. corner E. 41st St., is a small bar that features a continuous show from 12 noon to 4 a.m. The girls are generally attractive and on Saturday and Sunday nights the go-go dancers are replaced by strippers. In the evening hours the place tends to get jammed but afternoons are quiet, pleasant and intimate.

ANVIL BAR, 500 W. 14th St. off 10th Ave. (no phone), features topless go-go girls dancing on the bar—usually two or three at a time. The girls wear g-strings and often stick their pussies right up to your face. The bar’s hours are from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. weekdays only. Weekends and late evenings the bar turns gay.

CARNIVAL BAR, 146 W. 45th St., is nothing fancy, with one go-go dancer behind the bar. She may not be a cover girl, but she’s usually raunchy and there's a lot of chatter back and forth between the dancer and the customers. CLUB 45, 150 W. 45th St., is a small place with only one dancer who performs right on the bar. Only problem—they don’t have continuous performances.

49' er CAFE, 148 W. 49th St., has only one go-go dancer, but a whole flock of young girls serving up drinks behind the bar.

METROPOLE CAFE, 725 7th Ave. at 48th St., usually has two girls dancing and a third reclining languidly on a couch.

NOW! BIGGEST BURLESK VALUE IN N.Y.
GIRLS! GIRLS! GIRLS! GIRLS!
GIRLS! GIRLS! GIRLS! GIRLS!
CONTINUOUS DAILY
FROM 11:30 A.M.
TO MIDNIGHT
The NEW PRINCESS BURLESK
220 W.46th ST.—BET.B’WAY and 8th AVE.
8 GIRLS LIVE ON STAGE
Featuring THE BODY
BEAUTIFUL IN ALL ITS EYE-FILLING PERFECTION NO MOVIES
ALL LIVE
11:30A.M. to 1 P.M. $3.00
FOR $1.00 OFF ADMISSION PRICE
PRESENT THIS AD AT BOX-OFFICE WORLD PREMIERE
"APE OVER LOVE"
STARRING BARBIE HUGHES HARRY REEMS X for Ladies & Gentlemen over 21
"Rated 80% Mixed Combos" AL GOLDSTEIN WORLD PREMIERE Initiation Rites also A FULL LENGTH Bonus Surprise plus CRUSING SHORTS ALL MALE CAST PARK MILLER 43rd ST (BET 6th & B WAY) BR-9-3970 CONT 9:45 AM MID MID SHOW FBI A SAT NITE "IF YOU HAVEN'T SEEN A PORN MOVIE BEFORE, OR IF YOU HAVE ONLY ONE EROTIC MOVIE TO CATCH THIS YEAR - THIS IS THE ONE."
- Al Goldstein
"HAPPY HOOKER
MIDDLE AMERICA CAN IDENTIFY WITH."
- Howard Kissel
Women's Wear Daily
The Life & Times of a happy hooker {FUCK 'EM)
100 100
FROM PAVEMENT PRINCESS TO BEDROOM QUEEN INTRODUCING
SAMANTHA McLaren
AS XAVIERA Produced &
Directed by Larry G. Spangler
IN COLOR/ADULTS ONLY WORLD PREMIERE
WORLD 49th ST.
49th St. Between 6th and 7th Aves. • Opens 9:45 A.M. • CI 7-5747 LATE SHOW
EVERY NITE
Georgia Spelvin
SLEEPY HEAD
also Lip Smackers
IN COLOR
ADULTS ONLY
2X-RATED FILMS
I WANT TO SUCK YOU... into accepting a free gift! I'll send you a sizzling assortment of 3 Hard WANISH mags and 6 full COLOR photo sets, (a $10 value) FREE, to show you CAN get 'em. They're yours as our gift! Enclose $1 cash or stamps for postage and handling.
HALLMARK dept. SS Send now.
DRAWER B, BKLYN. N.Y. 11218
THE EROTIC FILMS of PETER de ROME
SEE ALL EIGHT NOW
plus JACK
THE JEWEL
3rd Ave-bet. 12th &
13th Sts. 260-1090
X
IN COLOR
ALL MALE CAST
MID. SHOW FRI. & SAT sex and the athletes
Mr. Jack the Stripper
Mr. Jock
Mr. Darnell
Mr. Johnny
Ramero
BIG SURPRISE
NEXT WEEK
X-RATED fire island
EROS1
732 8TH AVENUE
BET. 45 & 46 STREETS
581-4594 COLOR
NEW POLICY!
ADULT FILM BONANZA!
$1.99 at ALL times!
New Triple XXX Rated Show
Every Tues.
Orleans
47th St. (Bet. B'way & 8th)
Cont from 10AM 757-3503
From the producer of Deep Throat
& Devil in Miss Jones WORLD PREMIERE
X
GERARD DAMIANO'S PORTRAIT
also Exciting New Hostesses
X for Ladies & Gentlemen over 21
CIRCUS CINEMA
CONT
10AM
1AM
Broadway at 49th St / 489 9290
NATURAL HARD (ON DEMAND)
Try New Super Turn-On DIAKESRUTAN for a Natural Hard on Demand. Men 18 to 70 are able to have Natural Sex daily when days before they were impotent. This is not a phony pill, extension, strap or vacuum. DIAKESRUTAN is made from all natural ingredients, developed to aid in impotency, premature ejaculation-and with most individuals, it works.
Sand For DIAKESRUTAN-$5.00
M & M LAB.
324 SO. FIRST ST.
ALHAMBRA, CALIF. 91802
Grand Opening
ISIS
Six beautiful girls
to show you the secrets of the pharaohs.
Egyptian oil treatment
Sauna
Showers
Luxurious lounge
Free drink with ad
$2 discount with ad
(212) 661-3217
(212) 986-4230
behind the bar. The girls encourage the bar customers to hand them a buck or two in return for some special attention.

M&M LUNCH BAR, Little West 12th St. two blocks south of the ANVIL (no phone), is a small bar that has a counter in the back where a topless, g-string clad girl will poke her pussy in your face. Bar hours are from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m. during the week, closed weekends. ROBBIE'S MARDI GRAS, 731 7th Ave. at 48th St., is a more expensive place, with three girls dancing inside a circular bar. Their go-go dancers are the best looking anywhere, but they don't have much contact with the audience.

SHOWTIME BAR, 711 7th Ave. at 47th St., has two girls dancing and several others loitering around the bar waiting for you to buy them an overpriced drink. Heavy on the Spanish types. This place has a bad reputation as a clip joint.

SWINGERS BARS

This is a listing of bars that cater to devotees of group sex in the greater New York area. The bars mentioned here are usually rented for an evening by a swingers group and seldom open their doors before 9 p.m. Drinks usually cost $1.50 and none of the bars listed here will permit you to enter if you are not with a member of the opposite sex. Since the location of these bars and the days they are open are subject to change, you are advised to call before going.

MANIE O'ROURKE'S, 120 Raritan Ave. (Route 27), Highland Park, N.J. (201-791-1647), is a central Jersey bar (just outside of New Brunswick) that is being run by the folks at Our Gang. Open on Fridays only, beginning at 9 p.m. Dancing, four free drinks, buffet, enjoyed by 60 to 100 couples. Dress is casual and admission is $12 per couple.

THE CLIQUE LOUNGE, 1397 Jerusalem Ave., Merrick, L.I. (516-481-0220), is open only on Sunday night. Admission is $3 per couple and includes music, dancing, a buffet and parking.

R.J.N. CLUB LOUNGE, 5000 Brush Hollow Rd., Westbury, L.I. (516-785-5562), is a nice private club which is open only on Saturday nights, after 9.

The club features about 35 couples who range in age from 25 to 50. Admission is $5 per couple and includes music, dancing and buffet.

TIFFANY LOUNGE, Rt. 110 and Great Neck Road, Farmingdale, L.I. (516-298-0679), is open exclusively on Saturday nights and features live music and free buffet. This pleasant place attracts about 35 to 45 swinging couples with an average age of 30. Admission is $4 per couple.

YELLOW FRONT SALOON, 126 Main St., Fort Lee, N.J. (201-791-2256), is sponsored by Our Gang. Open on Saturday only, this bar features pleasant decor and dancing in the back room. Generally there are some 60 to 100 people present in an evening. Dress is casual and the admission, including four drinks and buffet, is $12 per couple.

GAY BATHS

This is a listing of the gay bath houses in New York City. At the moment there are no bath houses for straight couples.

BEACON BATHS, 227 E. 45th St. (687-0322), used to be cleaner and livelier but is becoming increasingly gloomy, attracting a primarily morose middle-aged clientele. The orgy room is pitch black, if you're into that sort of thing, and facilities are minimal. Prices start at $5.75.

CLUB BATHS, 24 1st Ave. bet. 1st and 2nd Sts. (673-3283), is in a shitty neighborhood but it's one of the better bath houses in fun city. Clean with a fancy decorative scheme, it occupies four floors and includes sauna, steam room, comfortable lounge and back yard patio for sun bathing. Prices start at $4.75.

EVERARD, 28 W. 28th St. (684-8935), the original one-and-only bath house in New York for many years, fell into disrepair and was gutted by a fire some time ago. It has since been nicely remodeled, is well-kept and reasonably clean, attracting a kinky cross-sectional clientele from every age group. It has three floors, includes a large sauna, steam room, and pool. Prices start at $4.75.

MAN'S COUNTRY, 28 W. 15th St. off Union Square (929-2220), is a spacious, well-equipped and clean bath house that occupies six full floors. It features a free disco, snack bar, steam room, sauna, dormitory, gym and pool table. The staff is friendly and the clientele horny and attractive. Lots of action on weekends. Lockers start at $4.75, private rooms $8.85. Major credit cards accepted.
SAUNA BATHS, 300 W. 58th St. (PL 5-6880), is a small place popular with the middle-aged after-work crowd on weekdays from 4 to 7 p.m. The main attraction is a cozy dormitory where "togetherness" is encouraged and can usually be counted on. Clean and well-attended, it has a few private rooms and mini-sauna. Lockers are $4.75.

ST. MARK'S BATHS, 6 St. Mark's Place (473-7929), is seedy, run-down and patronized mostly by flies. This is the last surviving relic of what the baths used to be like before gay consciousness. Prices are low because they wouldn't dare charge any higher.

MODEL STUDIOS

NOTICE: OUR RATINGS OF "MODEL STUDIOS" AND "HEALTH SPAS" ARE BASED ON PHYSICAL FACILITIES, COMFORT AND AMBIANCE ONLY—NOT ON THE AVAILABILITY OF SEX.

Model studios are not licensed to offer massage or body rubs, but many do. Basically, all these studios provide you with is a model of your choice and a private room. What you and the model do in the room is your own business. Prices range from $15 to $25 for a half-hour session, and the model expects a substantial tip for any extra favors.

HOUSE OF RELAXATION, 737 8th Ave. (no phone), is a hole in the wall that offers the bare minimums. All you get is a body rub in drab, unattractive surroundings. A minimum half-hour session is $12.

PINK PUSSY CAT, 200 E. 14th St. at 3rd Ave. (533-5719), is a small studio with three rooms that offer a reasonable amount of privacy and comfort. Black, white, Spanish and dominant models usually available. And the price is right at $15, with repeating customers being offered bonus sessions for free.

STUDIO ONE, 100 W. 43rd St. corner 6th Ave. (no phone), is a neat, clean and attractive place which features a racially mixed group of good-looking models. There are three rooms on the premises where you can get a body rub. A minimum 20-minute session is $10.

THE CATHOUSE, 200 W. 49th St., 2nd floor (581-7779), is a well-kept, comfortable studio. Its four session rooms are clean and offer excellent privacy. Sketching, body rubs and photography are available. The girls are usually polite and attractive. $20 a session.

VELVET TOUCH, 113 W. 42nd St., between 6th and 7th Aves. (221-6888), is an attractive studio which usually has seven girls on duty. The facilities include five nice, clean rooms, and a spacious, nicely kept lounge where customers can usually find free drinks (although this is not guaranteed because of the casual attitude of the management). Sessions start at $10 for half an hour.
HEALTH & LEISURE SPAS

All the places listed here are licensed by the city to offer either massage or baths. Generally, but not always, they are bigger and better-equipped than the model studios. The girls work mainly on tips and a generous tip is required for any special favors.

BEAVER STREET SPA, 18 Beaver St., over Fusco's Restaurant (943-2909), is a small but extremely well decorated spa located in the Wall Street area. Each of the four private rooms has been fully sound-proofed, contains a mirror, and is kept clean at all times. Showers, a sauna and a private locker room are also available on the premises, as is a lounge in which patrons can sip free champagne. The girls, who are courteous, pleasant and attractive, cater mostly to businessmen. A half-hour session costs $15.

CAESAR'S RETREAT, 219 E. 46th St. (758-6885), the first spa to win SCREW's four cock rating, is a plush, comfortable club with a Roman bath house theme. It offers a large sauna room, needle showers and nine large rooms which feature sunken whirlpool baths. Free liquid refreshments are served in an elegant and comfortable lounge. The toga-clad girls are very good-looking and well-trained to pamper you in every way possible. Elegant, friendly and reliable, they offer five different programs to suit your whims and your pocketbook. Prices start at $20 per session. Extras cost more.

8th AVENUE LEISURE SPA, 672 8th Ave. off 42nd St. (765-4660), is a small but clean spa that features attractive black models. Included on the premises are two semi-private whirlpool baths, a hot rock sauna, a steam bath and high pressure shower. A 30-minute minimum session costs $10.

EROS LEISURE & HEALTH SPA, 36 W. 34th St., 5th floor (564-2186), is a nice comfortable spa that features attractive girls, a sauna, two showers and free wine. There are six private rooms available, all of which are kept neat and clean. $23 a session.

FRENCH QUARTER, 737 8th Ave. between 46th & 47th Sts. (765-4661), specializes in attractive black models. They have a nice, clean lounge with a color TV, a steam room, whirlpool bath, sauna and shower. A minimum session is $10 for 30 minutes.

GALAXY 1, 127 E. 47th St., off Lex. Ave. (759-4792), is a drab and unappealing place. They feature four rooms, a sauna and a shower. The models are generally unappealing and the surroundings ill-kept. $15 a session.

KING OF CLUBS, 237 E. 53rd St. betw. 2nd & 3rd Aves. (421-2402), is a new club still in the process of being remodeled. At the moment, however, there are four clean private rooms ready for your pleasure, as well as a needle point shower and pleasant lounge, where free sangria and soda is served. This club also has a wide array of extremely attractive young women. Sessions start at $20.

LEXINGTON AVENUE SPA, 714 Lex. Ave. betw. 57th & 58th Sts. (355-8547), features a small sauna, shower and two clean rooms. The models are generally attractive and a $15 minimum session includes use of all facilities.

MALE CHAUVINIST CLUB, 140 E. 39th St. (689-7050), occupies two floors of a private East Side brownstone. Facilities include a lounge, recreation room, sauna, showers, baths and seven private massage rooms. However, lately this spa has been remiss in paying its bills for ads in SCREW and, consequently, we no longer feel that they can be considered reliable. Since they are functioning in an erratic manner we are unable to give an accurate review and are therefore pulling their rating. Let the SCREW reader beware.
MAN’S WORLD, 141 E. 45th St. betw. Lex. & 3rd Aves. (661-8690), is an attractive little club which offers four private rooms, a shower, sauna, and good-looking girls. The sauna is available to anyone for as long as they want, after they've had a minimum $20 session.

MIDDLE EARTH, 835 3rd Ave. at 51st St. (752-4644), has five private massage rooms, showers, and complimentary refreshments in a small but pleasant lounge. This is a clean and cozy studio that has a reputation for being reliable when dealing with their customers. The girls are generally attractive and the sessions, which start ?* $20, are a good dollar value.

MURRAY HILL HEALTH STUDIO, 154 E. 33rd St. betw. 3rd and Lex. Aves. (532-2334), is a homey and attractive spa situated in four floors of a brownstone. It features five private carpeted rooms with mirrors, a sauna, showers, and free drinks in the reception room. But the nicest thing about this place are the extremely pleasant and attractive interracial girls who attend the customers. Sessions start at $25.

OASIS HEALTH SPA, 1595 B’way, between 48th & 49th Sts. (582-5335), is a super posh leisure spa. They feature a large sauna, showers, pool table, a bar with free drinks and a large comfortable lounge with color TV, cigarette machine and jukebox. The centerpiece of this leisure spa is the ultra swank mirrored room which allows the customer to view the action from every conceivable direction. The mirrored room also features thick, lush carpeting and a private sauna and whirlpool bath. The price varies in accordance with what you want. A minimum session is $20 for a half-hour.

RELAXATION PLUS, 42nd St. & Lex. Ave. on the Mezzanine of the Commodore Hotel (686-4345), is an ultra-chic, elegant, clean establishment that is open 24 hours a day. Facilities include the Tiger’s Den Lounge (where free refreshments are served), a sauna, showers, a sun room, whirlpool baths, private air-conditioned massage rooms and free valet service. Of special interest is their magnificent new Infinity Room, which is covered with mirrors to give you the maximum in viewing pleasure. This spa supplies a special list of carefully constructed fantasies that you can act out with the girl of your choice. Prices start at $20. The best costs more but is worth it.

SPARTACUS SPA, 243 E. 53rd St. (759-1910), is a Grecian bath house that occupies two floors of an East Side brownstone. Its facilities include bath, showers, sauna and complimentary refreshments in the comfortable lounge. A wide range of services is offered: hot oil body rubs, body shampoos and lemon facials. The girls are always attractive, so you can't go wrong at this luxury spa. Prices range from $20 to $100 per session, depending on your choice of luxury services.

SPARTACUS II, 8 E. 36th St. (725-5650), is a well-equipped two-story spa with a large sauna, showers, private whirlpool baths, and a small room with exercise equipment. In addition there is a posh lounge which offers a pool table and computer ping pong. There is also a spacious men’s dressing room with lockers. The studio is licensed to offer massage and the lovely girls will also pamper you with hot oil rubs and lemon facials. Prices range from $20 to $100 per session, depending on your choice of luxury services.

VENUS TOUCH, 200 E. 59th St. off 3rd Ave. (751-8870), is a small but attractive club that offers a hot rock sauna, a needlepoint shower, four private rooms, and free liquid refreshment. There are usually five or six girls for you to choose from and they are all attractive and attentive. Sessions start at $15 for a half-hour.

VICTORIAN SPA, 463 Lexington Ave. at 45th St. (687-1730), offers sauna, showers and licensed massage. Its five private rooms are clean, cozy and comfortable. Hot oil body rubs are offered by attractive girls. $20 a session.

Giant Double Feature
LINOA LOVELACE
IN DEEP THROAT
X for ladies & Gentlemen over 21
LOVE 565-1590
125 W 42nd St.
Cont 9AM-3AM
AVON 7 586-8355
7th Ave & 48th St
Cont 9AM-3AM
CINEMART
Met Ave & 72 Rd
Forrest Hills
Cont 1PM 261-2244
KIPS BAY
2nd Ave & 31st St.
Cont fr. 11 AM 684-9361
FINE ARTS
Hempstead LI Cont fr
(516) 484-4925 12:30
RUGBY
Utica & Church Ave.
Bklyn 346 7807
Cont from 12:30 PM
THE COMING DOZEN & Suzy's House
X COLOR ADULTS ONLY
EROS 2
8th Ave. at 45th St.
Cont. 8:45 am-1am
246-6696 gaiety
MALE MIDNITE SHOW FRI. & SAT.
burlesk
201 W. 46th St. (At B'way)
265-9106
2 ALL MALE FILMS
SUNDAY HOT SUNDAY
FOUR GOES INTO ONE
plus NEW LIVE SHOW: LARRY CARTER and TODD
CONT. 10AM-MIDNIGHT LIVE SHOWS 1 • 3:30 • 5 • 1:30 • 10:30
NEW SHOW EVERY MONDAY
Black Pearl
Model Agency
The oldest & most famous Model agency in the U.S. of its kind, & known in Canada and Europe as the BEST organization in the world to feature Dominant & Docile BLACK EXOTIQUES for all races, presents our unique plan. You can have encounter sessions w/ our models in NYC or S. Calif, or our free lance models in other areas for S/M-B&D, Wrestling, enemas, etc. (Studio or Pvt. Apt.) You'll receive photos of Black Pearls in ALL MAJOR U.S. cities & Canada. (Your area.) Send $3 for sample photos & info to: Black Pearl Model Agency, Inc., 8440 Sunset Strip, Studio Suite 506, Hollywood, Calif. 90069.

Super Organ Powder

Is Your Penis Too Small?
Do You Go Soft Too Soon?
Can't Please Your Sex Partner?

SUPER ORGAN POWDER Guarantied to enlarge the penis and make it harder during sexual intercourse. A little rub on the penis gives it the feel of a wedge head and a large veined body...It makes it feel rigid, bumpy...It tickles the entire vaginal area and helps the penis reach areas of the vaginal that are left untouched by the human organ and will thrill the coldest woman without any harmful effects...Not aphrodisiacs.

Sent In Plain Wrapper
$5.00 Ounce — 3 Oz. $12.50

BETTY JO
P. O. Box 130, Oept. SJ, Gary, Ind. 40401

SUBSCRIBE TO SCREW

NEW! FROM HANGIN' TREE

CHICKEN HOUSE!

All Male

ORIGINAL THEATRE FEATURES!

NOW in 8mm COLOR!

'TALL TIMBER'
'LUNCH MEAT'
'MEN OF BIG SUR'

PLUS

'7 IN A BARN'

ALL ACTION

Must state 21

FREE ILLUSTRATED BROCHURE from:

HANGIN' TREE RANCH

PO Box 81988

San Diego, CA 92138
I Sucked It! I Swallowed It!
I Made Him
Put It In My MOUTH!
and loved every juicy lick
SAMPLE SUCK $2.00
JUICY SEX CREAMY MY MOUTH
ALL 4 SAMPLES $5.00 PHOTOS $4.00
B&W 200 $10.00 COLOR $17.00
ALL 4 B&W $30.00 COLOR $50.00
C.O.D.
O.K.!
send $3.00
PRIVATE PARTY, 7471 Melrose Ave.
Los Angeles, CA. 90046, Dept. SC
COME...WITH ME
Let me show you what I have—by myself, with my boyfriend & with my girlfriend
(1 go anyway you like—please specify).
Heavy action 200' b/w film $15.00
Heavy action in full color 28.50
Photo set (wet & wild!) 3.00
Toby Kelly, Apt. K-179
Box 505, Capitola, CA 95010
DANISH ACTION MOVIES
100 Ft. 8MM Full Length
RECEIVE THIS MOVIE PLUS
3 MORE FOR JUST $10.00
This Introductory Offer Limited
SO RUSH
NOW!
L.M.P.CO. BOX 85051
Hollywood, Calif. 9007
"finger game" 100
FT.
ONLY
$5.00 EACH
8MM Swedish Stags
Open & Willing (2 girls & 1 man)
Do It Again (1 man and 1 girl)
Kissing Cousins (2 gay girls)
Self Manipulation (1 girl)
ALL FOUR FILMS only $15.00
Essex Prod.
Box 2666
Van Nuys. Calif. 91401
GENITAL SIZE PROBLEMS
SOLVED IN 8 WEEKS Tested in thousands of medical case histories — endorsed by leading medical authorities. Write for free literature.
Penury Co., Timber Cove
Dept. 161 Jenner, CA 95450
50
ONLY $1.00
ORGY
PHOTOS
SHIPPED BY U.S.A. DEALER DANISH GROUP ACTION FROM THE PORNOGRAPHY
CAPITAL OF THE WORLD!
ACTION CO. BOX 69765, LOS ANGELES, CALIF. 90069
100' 8 MM MOVIES
SPECIAL
2 FOR 1 OFFER $3 EACH
THE BABYSITTER Mrs. Swanson's TEEN TRIO
WHAT LINDA WANTS (she gets) BIG JOHN BLUE
ALL 4 MOVIES $6
P.O. BOX 204 LA MESA, CALIF. 92041
ADULTS ONLY
Brand new far-out sex items, books, films and magazines for your pleasure. Send 50 cents for catalog and brochures and get one French Ticker Free.
Elias Sales Co. P.O. Box 350
New York, N.Y. 10036
TRADE-IN MOVIES
WHILE THEY LAST
8 for $10.00
HARD 8MM FILM TAKEN IN ON TRADE SUPPLY LIMITED -- ORDER NOW!!!
FILM EXCHANGE DEPT. SC4
BOX 85311, HOLLYWOOD, CALIF. 90072
PORNO BOOKS
INTRODUCTORY OFFER
ALL 3
ONLY $2
$1
EACH HOT SNATCH BLOW JOB
HAIRY GROOVE
ADULTS ONLY WORLD ROOM SERVICE
box 855 lemon grove ca.92045
200 FT. 8MM ORGY FILM
FULL LENGTH
$5. PART 1 TWO COUPLES
$5. PART 2 2 GIRLS, 1 MAN
$5. PART 3 MIXED GROUP
$5. PART 4 2 GIRLS
$5. PART 5 1 ME N& 1 GIRL
20 ALL FIVE ANITA S.
BOX 2666, VAN NUYS, CALIF. 91408
INTRODUCTORY OFFER
1. GANG BANG
(Group Actions)
3. LOVE MOVIE (Man & Woman)
2. HOT PANTS VIRGIN (Girl Alone)
4. WET LIPS
(Two Girls)
8MM B/W $1 EACH
ALL4 FILMS- $3
MONEY BACK GUARANTEE!
CINEMA FILMS 1617 N.ELCENTRO,HOLLYWOOD,CALIF.90028
PROSTITUTES
Available for whatever kind of sex you want. All areas listed where girls live. White, black, and Oriental. Girls are from all areas of U. S. Sign you are over 21 and not a law officer. Send $5 for lists to MARILYN - Box 1835- M-586
North Hollywood, CA 91604
MAGAZINE GRAB BAG Values to $5 each mag
SPECIAL up to $20 VALUE
4 MAGS $3
SPREAD LESBIAN GROUP SEX HARD ACTION
ROYAL Box 1502 Studio City, Cal. 91B04
200 Ft. 8MM
Full Length
Film COLOR ACTION
STAGS
USED FILM SALE
All films GUARANTEED in good condition
Receive 6 different color Shows
Plus special two girl surprise bonus
ALL FOR ONLY $20.00
EXCHANGE SERVICE
Box 2666, Van Nuys. Calif. 91401
as fm
AMERICAN SEXUAL FREEDOM MOVEMENT
SINGLES - COUPLES - SWINGERS - NUDISTS
DISCREET INTRODUCTIONS NATIONALLY SOMEONE FOR EVERYONE
Personal introductions
National Phone Service
Established 1967
All Over U.S.A.
Private Swinging Parties
Natl. Listing Service
Single Gals Free
SEND COUPON TODAY!
Yes, send me information on ASFM.
I enclose $1. for postage & handling.
I am a single couple.
ASFM DEPT. P-33
8235 Santa Monica Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90046
Name
Address
City State Zip
SUPER TURN-ON SEX PRODUCTS
Turn it on & keep it up. The most exotic of the erotic. New products to take you & your partner to the wildest peaks of sensual excitement. Every conceivable device & aid, incl. many from France, Scandinavia, Japan. Send $1.00 for intimately illustrated catalog (refundable with 1st order).
MAXON PRODUCTS, Dept. M 528
P.O. Box 40518, San Francisco, CA 94140
Four million U.S. women use ANIMALS AS SEX PARTNERS ANIMAGLS as Sex Partners See how they do it. Fully illustrated book $4.95 Film brochure included HOLLYWOOD SHOWCASE P.O. Box 353334, Los Angeles, Cal. 90035 8mm MOVIES 25¢ No. 1 WOMAN & BOY No. 2 GAY GIRLS No. 3 MAN & 2 GIRLS No. 4 2 COUPLES PLEASE SEND $1.00 FOR ALL 4 MOVIES EXPlicit ACION FEATURING COUPLES & GROUPS VIXEN PO. BOX 60835 LOS ANGELES. CALIF. 90060 GROUP A
CLASSICS 200 REG. 8 ONLY
#1 DEEP THROAT Thrills Features Linda Lovelace $5
#2 SMART ALEC Stars Candy Barr $5
#3 THE NUN Woman-Vibrator & Man $5
#4 THE HANDY MAN Plumber plugs her hole $5
ALL FOUR FILMS $15
ALL FOUR USED $10
IMPORTED AND DOMESTIC FILMS
NEW & USED
50% OFF
Tecni-Lab Box 27041
Hollywood, Calif. 90027
GROUP B IMPORTED
200 REG. & SUPER 8
#9 PUSSY PIRATE
Weird sex game $5
#10 ERIKA GETS IT UP
Woman & two guys $5
#11 THE DILDO
Little girl - Big dildo $5
#12 ANIMAL ANTICS
Woman & a horse $5
ALL FOUR FILMS $15
ALL FOUR USED $10
SHE'LL SEND YOU $20.00
OF HARD ACTION MAGAZINES
FREE!
BECOME ONE OF OUR SATISFIED CUSTOMERS AND ENJOY THE BEST IN HARD CORE VIEWING.
RECEIVE WHOLESALE
PRICE LIST AND DETAILS.
PLEASE ENCLOSE $1.00 P.P.
send to BOOK DEN 7471
MELROSE LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA 90046
SWINGERS HOT LINE
Names, address, phone numbers of swinging Girls, Guys & Couples in your area anxious to meet you.
DIAL TOLL FREE
800-231-6610
(or 713-661-5368)
SUSIE'S
SWEET MILK
MILK MADE HAS SOMETHING FOR EVERYBODY!
ESPECIALLY FOR: SUE-LILI-TED
SAMPLE
DRINK 2.00
UNIQUE
ONE OF A KIND MOVIE
B&W $10. - Color $16
PHOTOS (Great Ones) $5.00 per set Dept. 13.
CINEMA 8 • 6311 YUCCA ST., L.A. CALIF. 90028
FILM
50' HOT ACTION OR PHOTOS
8 GLOSSY 4"x5"
$1
MUST BE 21
INCLUDES EXPLICIT CLOUE-UPS Never Before offered in U.S.A.
GUARANTEED
State Your Choice
K. Lee
box 1046
Hollywood, Cal 90028
NOTHING LEFT TO IMAGINATION!
FREE! FREE!
16 still photos from our new movies for HARD CORE buyers. You'll come again!
(Send $1 for postage & handling.) Free catalog, too.
Studio City, Calif. 91604
MOVIE HOUSE
Box 1835- A-28
Studio City, Calif. 91604
FREE $10.00
WORTH OF HARD ACTION STAG MOVIES!!!
YOU'LL BE DELIGHTED WITH THE QUALITY OF OUR FILMS AND SERVICE OUR PROFIT LIES IN OUR FUTURE DEALINGS WITH YOU. CATALOG INCLUDED - ENCLOSE $1.00 FOR POSTAGE AND HANDLING
SAM TAVA FILMS, DEPT. SC4 BOX 85006, HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
FREE VIEWER
8 DIFFERENT MOVIES AND VIEWER
FOR ONLY
4.95 8mm color stags
ORGYS GROUPS
LMD
BOX 85051
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF. 90072
THE DIRTY DOG
SAMPLE $2
200 B/W $10 COLOR $16
SAPPHIRE
P.O. BOX 741 Dept. 13
No. HOLLYWOOD CALIF 91603
INSTANT SEX
I signify I am
21 by signing below & wish to receive brochures about GAY BONDAGE HETERO
OTHER (Specify)
Write to: XXX, INC. Dept. G-609
20251 Prairie/Chatsworth, Cal. 91311
Signature
Note: Include 50¢ for handling charges to cover mailing.
FOOT FETISH
If milady's toes turn you turgid you should contact Elmer Batters, dean of American legmen. $1.50 gets you succulent catalog of films, photos magazines, plus automatic membership in the ROYAL ORDER OF THE GARTER. Send $1.50 today to:
ELMER BATTERS, P.O. Box 1707
Dept. F-68
San Pedro, Calif. 90733
GIANT PHOTO SET!!
4 x5 Glossy - 12 Wild Photos per set
1. Lesbian Teacher
2. Coming in Copenhagen
3. Hot Pants - Car Hop
4. Sex for Young Girls
5. Nurse Rapes Patient
6. Sex Slaves
WILD & PARTY SITUATIONS
Intro Offer
$1.00 per Set or ALL 6 SETS
ONLY $5.00
danish photos co.
P.O. Box 2479
Tolua Lake, Cal. 91602
FREE!
FAMILY FUN ANYTHING GOES
BOTH SIZZLING
ILLUSTRATED BOOKS AND GIANT CATALOG
ENCLOSE $1
POSTAGE AND HANDLING
WHILE DADDY WATCHES
MOM AND HER KID
BOOK CLINIC, BOX 1512, LA MESA, CALIF. 92041
FREE
100's of HOT OFFERS
100's of PHOTOS
FREE IN YOUR MAILBOX
$5 SAVE MONEY 5$
Answering this ad is better than writing off for all the other stuff in this magazine!!

$1 POSTAGE & HANDLING

FILMS
PHOTOS
STAGS BOOKS
AIDS
GAGS

DIVERSE INDUSTRIES, INC. 7422 CC MELROSE, HOLLYWOOD, CALIF 90046

100 FT
8MM $5.00 ea.
400 FT. $15.00

Movies of Girls MAKING LOVE TO THEMSELVES!

Self Massage (Big Boobs)
Lesbian Sisters (Gay Action)
Playing With It (Uses Vibrators)
In My Panties (Nylons & Garters)

ALL 4 FILMS (400 ft. 8MM)

H. CUTT CO.
P.O. BOX 85311
Hollywood, Cal. 90072

SWEDISH

STYLE!!!

GROUP-SEX

MAGAZINES

64 LARGE PAGES

ONLY $1.00 EACH!

ALL 3 FOR $2.00!

CAL MAIL CO. BOX 35186
LOS ANGELES, CA. 90035

GROUP SEX

LES LASSES

SADO MASOCHISM

IMPROVE YOUR ORGASM & HERS

Double electronic vibrating balls with remote battery pack. Use "upfront" or "out back" (or both).

Wild! $19 to Svenson, Dept. C2
Box 505, Van Nuys, CA 91408
(Catalog $1, or free with order.)

women who are

ANIMAL LOVERS

FILM

100 8 MM

PHOTOS

4x4 SETS

WOMAN & DOG $5 $5
WOMAN & PONY $5 $5
BARNYARD BALL $5 $5

ALL 3 parts $10 $10

COLLECTORS CLUB, BOX 85417, HOLLYWOOD, CA 90072

BONDAGE!
Bondage pictures, devices and correspondence club. See - meet nude slave women! For club magazine and photo-illustrated brochures, send $3.00 to KARAVAL, Box 35719, Houston, Texas 77035 Dept. SW

MAN HUNGRY WOMEN
Name & address lists of women openly looking for men to love them. Up to 100 per list, each list different area. Includes description, often phone. Constantly revised & updated with new listings. $5 brings list for your area - or send stamped, addressed bus. size env. for area breakdown & fact sheet. PERSONALITY PLUS, Dept. P-1688 P.O. Box 55093, Sherman Oaks, Calif. 91413
MAILORDER MADNESS
By John Milton

John Milton covers the mail-order field as a service to SCREW readers. Companies wishing their products reviewed in his column should send merchandise and information to John Milton, Milky Way Productions, Inc., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, NY. 10011. Milton also edits SEXSENSE, a consumer sex newsletter which is available through Milky Way Productions, Inc., same address. Subscription rates: 24 issues, $18.50; trial subscription, 12 issues, $9.95.

VIDEO CASSETTES

A few readers have written to ask about sources for video cassettes of feature length film productions. We said we'd look around, and then up popped a source right under our noses: Dunn Management. Dunn has a catalog listing 392 feature films, both straight and porno. The catalog is for sale for $3, and can be obtained by writing to Dunn Management, Inc., 516 Fifth Ave., Suite 507, New York, N. Y. 10036. Among the porno films available are Dark Dreams, Flossie, Mona, Behind the Green Door, and Memories Within Miss Aggie. The majority of cassettes offered are straight, however, and include such blockbusters as Love Story, The Godfather, Billy Jack, Psycho, and many films from Hollywood's past. As for prices, Mona goes for $175, and The Godfather for $300—just to give you an idea of what you're getting into. Prices include postage and handling, and two weeks should be allowed for delivery.

According to Fred Leslie, president of Dunn, "All video cassettes are shipped on the 3/4" SONY cassette, standard. Other formats are available, at a slight additional cost. All video cassettes are guaranteed to be free from defects for a period of 30 days from purchase. All tapes are complete in every detail, and our prices are lower for this merchandise than any other outlet in the United States."

Unfortunately, we must add that we've had almost a dozen complaints about Dunn. Not enough yet to put him on our Dirty Dealers list (we also get recommendations for Dunn) but enough to advise: proceed with caution, and at your own risk. It might help if, when you order, you mention M.O.M. sent you.

HOT TAPES

No, we're not talking about Watergate (M.O.M. never bores you with politics, unless the subject is pornography) but about what we can only call "dirty talk" tapes. A company called Betty Adams, P.O. Box 1119, Fremont, Calif. 94538, offers reels, cassettes, and 8-track tapes for $10 each, or three for $25. Betty Adams also rents porno films, books and magazines.

Betty sent us a tape, but we don't have a recorder for it, so we can't tell about quality. All we can do is mention a few of Betty's selections. X-5, for instance, is described as "Sex Life of a Nympho Housewife—this is just a knock down drag out hard-core tale about two girls and the men they seduce just by accident." Betty also claims to have tapes (made with hidden microphones) of the Don Rickles Roasting at the Friars Club in Hollywood—not the clean television version, but one in which Johnny Carson, Ed Sullivan, Flip Wilson and so on get together to crack dirty jokes. Although we have no information on Betty Adams, her brochure goes to great length to insist on her honesty, even so far as pointing out that she needs customers, they don't need her.

MEDICINE SHOW

Step right up, suckers. A company in Florida called Medi-Chem, Inc. is waiting to take your money if you believe in pills and sprays to either revive your sexual vigor or keep your cock hard. W.C. Fields would have a field day with products like "Hard Time" which is hustled this way: "The secret, amazing formula of natural herbs that keeps males sexually potent into their late 80's." "Hard Time" sells for $10 per 20 capsules. "S-T-A Hard"—an aerosol spray made of Benzocaine-goes on the head of your cock before intercourse, and costs $6 for a half-ounce can. You may ask, if we're so skeptical about such products, why mention them here? Because we're serving the public, and there are a lot of people who believe in this gunk. If you're one of them, write to Medi-Chem, Inc., P.O. Box EG835, Melbourne, Fla. 32925. WHERE IS MONA?

MEMORIES WITHIN HER MAMMARY: Now you can watch Miss Aggie dig her tit on your own TV.

Mona was the first good feature-length hardcore porno film. When it came out in New York back in 1970, it caused a sensation. It was made by the team of Ziehm and Osco, responsible for the current hit. Flesh Gordon, played New York for about a year, and then disappeared. We believe this is one of the classic porno films, and would like to find it in 8mm. If you know a source, write to M.O.M. as a public service.

HOT BOOKS

Miss Jane Todd is a spinster school teacher of 45 when she comes to teach at Hillcrest Academy, an all-boys school. She is frightened of men and frigid sexually, but being the only female in school gives her an education she'd never dreamed of getting. Her first sexual experience had been when she was raped by a college professor at the age of 20. Even then she had heavy, melon-like tits which caused men to go mad with lust.

Jane felt his brutally thick penis entering her dry, untried cunt. The pain was so awful that she fainted for a moment, and when she came to, he was all the way inside her. It was too late to resist now. The damage was done, her hymen broken. All she could do was lie there sobbing, praying that it wouldn't last long.

"You frigid little bitch," he said, panting as he humped her. "You're dry. You don't even enjoy it. I pity you."

Jane watched in horror as Professor Graves fucked her. . . . She saw his enormously thick milky-white cock hammering in and out of her tiny passage. The pale shaft was stained with blood. . . .

Jane's adventures are recorded in Teacher's Three-Way Lessons by Erika Norman, Surrey House, Inc., 6314 River-dale St., San Diego, Calif. 92120. $1.95.

READERS' DEPARTMENT

Dear John,

Here's another outfit that should be on your Dirty Dealers list.

Apex Productions, Box 136, S-80103 Gavle 1, Sweden. About six months ago I responded to their ad and sent them a buck for brochures. I never heard from them so I sent them another dollar two months ago, explaining this was the second time, and still nothing. They've been advertising in SCREW and several other publications for some time.

Here's a dealer I'd like to recommend being put on your Safe Sellers list. D&G Book Service, Box 744, Albany, N.Y. 12201. I've placed several orders with him and his films are very good quality with quick service and very reasonable prices. I highly recommend him.

I'd like to make a suggestion concerning your reviews of porno films. How about a half page, similar to Consumer Reports magazine, where the current films are listed and readers can write in and give their rating. Not only would this be a good guide for your readers but it would let the filmmakers know what we like.
Very truly yours, R.S. Riverside, Calif. We like your last idea. If readers want to send in their votes for best porno series, best film in the series, etc., we’ll be happy to run the results. As for your complaint about the Swedish company, those brochures get seized by the U.S. Customs all the time, so it’s not necessarily the firm’s fault. As for D&G: we’re putting them on our Safe Sellers list.

Good news? Bad news? Information about Monal Write to M.O.M., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, N.Y. 10011.
FEELING TENSE AND UPTIGHT?
Relax at the Derby Club
10 Models of all nationalities to serve you privately 78 W. 47th St. upstairs
Open from 11 am to 11pm
Monday thru Saturday
ORGY
Two beautiful Lesbo lovers invite you to partake in their scene.
Call Debra & Lisa
(212) MU 9-8414
SCRUBDOWN
BY VANESSA
FOR THE TIRED, WEARY BUSINESS EXECUTIVE WHO WANTS THE APEX OF RELAXATION GIVEN IN A CONVENIENT MID-TOWN LOCATION IN COMPLETE PRIVACY WITH MAXIMUM COMFORT.
7 DAYS (212) 265-6187
The most unique experience of its kind performed by the most glamorous and experienced girl...
Laura 759-9616
Luxury & Privacy
Call Early or Late Weekends too BEST OF SCREW No. 5 ON SALE 12 to 2 AM OPPEN DAY SS ENGLISH THERAPY
An experience worth trying. An experience you'll never forget. Privacy.
Call (212) 249-4469
2 YOUNG NUDISTS ELISSA & MONICA
Elissa has won 3 Miss Nudist Camp contests, including Miss Nude Universe (held annually in Aspen, Colorado). As for Monica, to see her in the nude from 10 feet away is more erotic than going to bed with most ordinary girls. Did you ever see a girl with a behind so absolutely perfect, so overinviting, that you had to clench your fingers to keep from touching it, so irresistible that if you saw it in a picture, you would serenely bring it to your lips and kiss it, well that's Monica's behind. It's fascinating, it's nerve-shattering, and best of all it's for real. And accompanied by a muff that never ends, one can only say that her whole bottom is stupefying. But then, only such a bottom could ever hope to balance such a top. A top that adjective and verb turn feeble to describe.

Mon.-Sat. Total Privacy
11am to 11pm (212) 421-3758
WHY PAY MORE?
Let's face it! Money is scarce these days, so don't waste it on worthless experiences. Are you tired of crowded, impersonal parlors, and girls who loo, at you as just another dollar bill? Well, don't give up yet! We're the girls who will change your luck. We offer every man exactly what he craves for, and our one price is the lowest in town. We are attractive, friendly and considerate of your every need; and remember, you never have to tip or pay bullshit fees. Call our private apartment and you'll be glad you did.

Mon.-Fri. 12-8 (212) 532-8364
Attractive Girls Wanted
BEAUTIFUL YOUNG STARLET
Starring in a RATED X picture.
Needs partners to rehearse with.
For an appointment, call:
SALLY
(212) 679-4904
SEX IS A MANY SPLENDID THING HAVE THE ULTIMATE
With HONEY
"THE GREEK GODDESS" 582-0922
TRY IT!
You'll Like It!
Complete wardrobe for TV, enema sessions
B&D, French cultures, water sports.
Appt. Only
(212) 759-3159
Also Submissive Models
Your place or mine
French nurse sharing apartment with American nurse willing to have discreet gentleman callers.
Call Yvette
(212) 689-8420

BODYBUILDER
Muscular, Hard, Trim
5'10" 190 lbs.
47" chest
31" waist
Well Hung
FOR HIRE
(212) MP 5-0357

ERICA
For the Elite Sybarite
One Hour Vacation
...let me expertly pamper, bathe and anoint you. A surging feeling of enchantment will envelop you as my careassing hands persuade your body to relax..relax..relax. (212) PL9-9616
Exclusive private apt near Sutton Place.
Call Early or Late Weekends too

HEY BOYS RUSTY'S BACK!
You remember me—that 5 ft. tall bundle of wiggly dynamite? That's me—I'm the one with freckles and red red hair—all over! I'm still saucy and fresh, with a grin to melt an iceberg. If you know me, here's my new number. If not, come and see what the shouting's about.(212) 255-9121
My Home PHONE

PERFECT
PLAYMATE
I play by sunlight, moonlight or candlelight in my private brownstone near
Central Park. Call Marsha from Noon to 2 AM at
(212) 752-4173

IF IT CAN BE DONE,
I CAN DO IT!
Call LAURA
at
(212) 679-4055
THE WILD ONE WHIPS are my pleasure,
DOMINANCE is my GAME!
Call Greta
(212) OR 9-4055
YOUNG LADY
Age 22
never wears bra or panties. Love exhibitioning and whatever.
Call Peggy at (212)689-8102
Grand Opening
ISIS
Six beautiful girls to show you the secrets of the pharaohs.
Egyptian oil treatment
Sauna
Showers
Luxurious lounge
Free drink with ad
$2 discount with ad
(212) 661-3217
(212) 986-4230
LEISURE CLUB
Walk through our doors, it's a Man's World. Our beautiful hostesses from all over the world will make your visit here a delight. Relax in our lounge, enjoy our saunas, partake of pleasure in complete privacy. Convenient midtown location. Be a member or just enjoy.
Days, 11am to 4am
661-8690 661-1699
MAN'S WORLD 141 E. 45th St. 1st FLOOR
$5.00 discount with this ad

LENGTHEN YOUR PENIS
HANDI-STRETCH, the only new scientifically designed genital enhancer on the market today. Tones and firms lax penis muscles to produce longer, thicker, rock-hard erections on demand. HANDI-STRETCH helps promote genital circulation, increasing sex drive and making erections easier to get and maintain. HANDI-STRETCH aids proper development of the ejaculatory muscles to help control premature ejaculation, thus prolonging sexual enjoyment for both partners. With HANDI-STRETCH, results are fast and easy. Wear one hour a day. Completely adjustable and undetectable. Lightweight and comfortable. Lasts a lifetime, nothing else to buy. HANDI-STRETCH produces measurable results you can see. Order yours today for just $9.95 postpaid.
NATIONAL D1ST.
Box 1692, Dept. L
Hollywood, Calif. 90028

ORIGINAL SPANISH FLY
Made of ingredients similar to the kind used mainly in Veterinary Work—By Horse Breeders. One Drop Will Do. 1 OZ.
$3.00 — 2 OZ. $5.00
While It Lasts.

PROLONG TABLETS
Guaranteed to increase your Stay during Sexual Intercourse up to 30 percent. Just take 2 before you start. 60 $5.00.
(Not Aphrodisiacs)
SOLD BY MAIL ONLY ISSABELLA
6915 S0. VERNON AVENUE
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS 60637

Best of Screw
Vol. I1 to Vol. V
Available Now
KING of CLUBS
NEW YORK'S NEWEST LEISURE CLUB
Relax in the LOUNGE of KINGS
237 EAST 53rd STREET between 2nd and 3rd Avenues
NEW YORK CITY
421-2402 421-2403
OPEN 24 HOURS
MIRRORED ROOMS BODY RUB
SAUNA & SHOWER
INVITING PRIVATE SUITES
COMPLIMENTARY REFRESHMENTS
WOMEN INVITED BY APP'T.
GRAND OPENING
ENLARGE YOUR PENIS
VIM's 100% organic formula actually enlarges an underdeveloped or any size penis. Proven results. No embarrassing extensions, phony creams or gadgets. Get larger erections easily every time, also prolongs erection & intensifies sexual pleasure. VIM improves creative energy, muscle tone, and helps resist nervous depression, all crucial factors for complete sexual release. Improves general health, appearance & youthful vigor. Older men can rejuvenate their sex drive and overcome impotence. Every man deserves total sexual satisfaction. Don't you?
VIM comes postpaid plain wrapped for just $8.95. Delivery guaranteed. Order today.
MALE PERSONAL PRODUCTS
P.O. Box 285 Dept. 212
Hollywood, Calif. 90028
SEXUAL SELF CONTROL
Overcome Impotence and Premature
Ejaculation the Natural Way, with no Drugs or Gimmicks. Regain sexual assurance and improve your perform-ce via our method of biofeedback.
Send three dollars for our complete technique, to:
ALPHA
Box 1517
Radio City Station
New York, N.Y. 10019
Adult Greeting Cards
All New in Color
Each One Different
10 FOR ONLY
$6.00
Over 18 & Signature required
CASH, CHECK or M.O. to:
SANLEE
P.O. Box 560402
Miami, Florida 33156
GALS SWINGING GROUP
NOW ACCEPTS MEN!
Application $1
Jill Kane ACTION GROUP, Box 822-GR
MANVILLE NJ 08835
from Sweden COMPLETELY UNCENSORED
WHERE EVERYTHING IS LEGAL Films
Photos
Magazines
Only after seeing our FULL COLOR brochure will you believe the films, photos and publications we have for you. The local product can't compare! Yet U.S. customs, problems are cleverly avoided, and delivery is GUARANTEED. We have what you want, not what you've been accustomed to getting.
APEX PRODUCTIONS, Dept. T-766
Box 136 S-80103 GAVLE, 1. Sweden
PLEASE ENCLOSE $1 FOR POSTAGE a woman and a dog - different
COD'S OK
Send $3.00
for cost
Send $2.00 for full sample reel. Dept. 000
200 B&W $10 Color $16
UNIQUE, P.O. BOX 85037. LA., CA. 90072
CHILDREN'S LOVE
Sexational magazine in color $6 air mailed! List with all kind of rare sex - magazines - films $1. U.S. Postal M.O. or cash please. Clubex Facksc Stockholm 19, S-10432, Sweden.
ADULTS ONLY — BOOKS!
Unusual & bizarre adult books, magazines, photos, films! (MALE & FEMALE!) Latest imports! Fabulous new sex catalog — (explicit photos)! Plus large bargain book catalog, exciting brochures, groovy samples! RUSH 50¢ handling (AIR MAIL $11. State age.
CLIFTON'S, Box 1068-sc—a Saugus, Cal. 91351
S$ex Sense
Saves You Money
THE INSIDE STORY
Look, fella, if you've been around, you know that any parlor you walk into, by the time you're out it's cost you from $50 to $70.
It's not necessary.
Try Eros.
You can walk in and out for $23.00 total. No fooling — $23.00 total.
The girls are great, surroundings pleasant, sauna bath, showers, etc. It doesn't have to cost you a fortune to be happy.
Try us. I'm sure you won't be disappointed.
EROS
36 West 34th Street
5th floor
(212) 564-2186
BAUBLES AND BALLS
CLASSIFIED AD
RATES AND RULES
PERSONAL CLASSIFIED — 10¢ per word, minimum charge $3.00
Commercial Classifieds 25¢ per word, minimum charge $5.00
We do not accept any telephone numbers in the classified ads. You must provide the address for all replies to be sent directly to you.
We do not provide any box numbers, nor do we forward mail.
All ads take from two to three weeks to appear. If you wish to know what issue your ad will appear in, please provide a self-addressed, stamped envelope with your request. No tear sheets or checking copies are provided to classified advertisers.
Make checks payable to: MILKY WAY PRODUCTIONS, Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, N.Y.C. 10011.

NOTICE TO OUR CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS
Some victimless crimes between consenting adults are still against the law. Some day these laws will change and SCREW hopes to mar—shall such changes. UNTIL SUCH TIME AS PERSONAL LIBERTY EXISTS IN THE UNITED STATES, SCREW CANNOT ACCEPT PERSONAL ADS WHICH SOLICIT PERSONS TO BREAK THE LAW. YOUR ADS MUST BE PHRASED IN SUCH A WAY AS NOT TO COMPROMISE THE INTEGRITY OF SCREW OR THE INTEGRITY OF THE LAW, AS RIDICULOUS AND UNFAIR AS THAT LAW MAY BE.
ALL ADS MUST CONFORM TO EXISTING FEDERAL, STATE & LOCAL LAWS ON PORNOGRAPHY.
SCREW is still not accepting telephone numbers in personal ads.
It is impossible to investigate either these products or services as advertised in this newspaper.
Consequently, we are unable to vouch for the bona fide of an ad carried in our paper.
AS OF DECEMBER 1, 1974, SCREW Classified ad rates will be as follows:
Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!

ENLARGE YOUR PENIS! "Thicken" & "lengthen" it! New scientifically proven method. Information & sample s-t-r-e-t-c-h photos, $1. Therapeutic Products, 1619-S Lincoln Place, Brooklyn, NY 11233.

LOADS OF GALS want loads of guys, all areas! Pictures, names & addresses in introductory issue, only $1.40 pages plus special! Metrapala-S, Box 460, Cooper Sta., NYC 10003. Sexational!

WHITE MALE, 51, due to wife's long illness would like to meet woman, couples in same situation, where male is incapable & understand problem. Will be generous if desired, sincere reply only, up to 60. Send phone. Box 399, Times Sq. Sta., NYC, NY 10036.

MASTER PHOTOGRAPHER has nude 4x5 of top NY models. Sample, descriptive brochure. $2. S.A.S.E. F&R, PO Box 32, Mad. Sq. Sta., NYC 10010.

PHONEFUN Acquaintance Opportunities. "All" interests; national, monthly "Index." Codads, Box 31332-C, San Fran (Grooviness) Calif. 94131.

CAN'T RECEIVE MAIL or phone calls at home? Use our address/phone # as your own. Mail service $4 month. 24 hour phone service $10 month.
Inquire: Discreet Service, 152 W. 42 St., #504, NYC, NY 10036. Recommended by SCREW.

LIFESIZE LATEX squirting prick, $5.00. 12 socially redeeming come shots, sperm dripping from mouth, etc., $4.00. Five different sets, $15. 1975 porno calendar, $3. All items, $20. State age. Marathon Sales, Box 470, Gracie Sta., NY, NY 10028.

METROPOLITAN NYC: Male, gay, 50, 6'2'/j", 230#, loves hairy truck drivers, dig to make mad love, kiss & suck. Danny Tyler, 215 E. 29th St., NYC 10016.

LADIES ONE OR MORE: Young submissive male exhibitionist, professional masseur, 29, loves to be French slave to group of 4 or 5 horny gals. King, Box 266, Brooklyn, NY 11202.

ATTRACTIVE MALE, white rabbit, seeks bunnies who enjoy hippety-hop or lickety-split, pink-eye or cotton tail. Pen pals, too. Come one, come all. Box 397, Kenmore Sta., Boston, Mass.

GENUINE 13 1/2" COCK PHOTO. All-time biggest prick. 8x10" clear glossy print of handsome go-go kid's super huge cock, 7" around. Comes sealed, 1st class, with valuable brochure. $3 from Mort Sloan, Box 714, NYC, NY 10022.

SHY MALE DESIRES meeting friendly couple during week days, 9-5 your apt. to share pleasures of French culture, photos, movies, etc. Box 387, Midtown Sta., NY, NY 10018.

MALE, WHITE, 29, married, looking for female, white, 18-40 to have an extra affair with. Telephone #: Write: J.P., Box 199, Brooklyn, NY 11227.

WATER SPORTS! Attractive young male traveler, Colorado-based, wishes to meet attractive females for enemas, either give or take. Letters, too: I like to exchange information, stories, ideas, photographs. Whether enemas are your "thing" or just curious, write! Will send my name & photo by return mail. PO Box 2194, Colorado Springs, Colo. 80901.

VERY HANDSOME WHITE GUY, 34 yrs., sincere, discreet, serious, would like to meet woman over 50 (big tap pref) but will answer all. Write, send phone #: Paul, c/o Box 43, Bklyn, NY 11234.

HANDSOME, MUSCULAR Manhattan doctor, appearing younger than his 40 yrs., seeks very attractive female or couple to play doctor & nurse. Realize the ultimate in sexual ecstasy. Discretion assured. PO Box 166, Washington Br. Sta., NY, NY 10033.

WRITER SEeks TALENTED representational cartoonists to illus. far-out sex stories. Must enjoy sex comics & be shockproof. Will pay reasonable fee, or swap stories, films: Occupant, PO Box 1330, NY, NY 10019.

MASCULINE MALE WANTED by same. Must be 30 to 55, over 5'7", over 200 lbs., but not grossly obese. May be married or single, bisexual or homosexual, but if the latter you must feel that you simply prefer the company of another male rather than feeling homosexual per se; absolutely no fag types. I'm 29, a professional photographer, profoundly discreet, am 5'T", approximately 180 lbs., white, & live in Manhattan's East 60s. Albeit not poor, I'm the type who would rather be poor & live happily with someone in a Depression Era railroad shack than be wealthy & live alone in a penthouse on Sutton Place. The type of guy I'm seeking may be an executive on Wall St. or a ditch digger; a policeman or an ex-con. I've known them all. While not out to put a rope around a guy's neck, neither am I looking for a one-night stand. My only demand in answering this ad is that you enclose a snapshot with your letter—even if you must resort to one of those dreadful 25c machines—which I vow faithfully to return upon request. No photo, no reply. Boxholder, Box 326, NY, NY 10017.
SEEK FEMALES to service group of clean-cut, young, professional men at their leisure home in beautiful Adirondack mts. Year round; boating, skimobiling, parties. Reply with photo if possible to Box 6, Ho-Ho-Kus, NJ 07423.

VERY BLACK YOUNG WOMEN available for personal service. Mail $15 to: James, PO Box 7225, Phila., Pa. 19101. (Money orders only.)

MIAMI: DOMINANT MISTRESS needed, to train & discipline this docile slave boy. All natural, unnatural & erotic arts. Mild B&D, water sports, ponyboy, TV, OA, spanking, Fr., Gr., etc. Have available quarters with implements. I'm waiting to satisfy your personal fantasies. Please be my superior.

VIRGIN: I'VE NEVER HAD a shaved pussy. I am blond, handsome, very male & anxious to please the verticle lips. Photo. Box 397, Southport, Conn. 06490.

HANDSOME GUY, 30, seeks girl age 18-30 to share bed & board in 5-room apt. by Prospect Park. The address is 11-11 8th Ave., BKlyn, NY. Please write & send photo if possible. If calling, 9 to 2 pm is best on weekdays.

FOR MALES WITH GUSTO! (1) The "How To" of S&M. Specify light, medium, heavy. (2) "How To" Blow. (3) "How To" Shoot the Tube. (4) "How To" at the Tubs. Each meaty dialogue is priced at $2.00 You MUST state age with signature. The Cellar, PO Box 8572, Minneapolis, Minn. 55408.

BUSINESSMEN, EXECUTIVES, drop a line to Betty Cee & tell her what you want. Betty Cee can arrange it, if you are sincere. Couples, first timers welcomed. 152 W. 42 St., #504, NYC, NY 10036.

WE ARE TWO MALES seeking willing male to serve & service us together. We require sexual obedience, but no physical S&M. Also looking for gay friendship with right person. PO Box 436, Little Neck, NY 11363.

GOOD LOOKING GREEK MALE, 38, 5'8", 180, love French, with strong 8x2. Seeking white female, 20-40, single or housewife. Photo & phone please. P. Currie, The Vanderwerp, 224 E. 47th St. NY, NY.

KEEP YOUR PENPALS privates private today! Keep penpals from your door! Avoid unwanted visits & confrontations! Secure re-mailing assures privacy! Details from General, Box 867, Teaneck, NJ 07666.

SENSUAL HOUSEKEEPER WANTED! Experienced woman 21-50 to live in. Excellent salary, beautiful quarters. Cooking required. Must also sexually service (mutual) extremely good looking, well built "husband," late30s, mostly when "wife" is travelling. Photo, phone please. Box 662, FDR Sta., NY 10022.

DEAR MARRIED LADY, some straight talk. I'm Italian, tall, early 30s & good looking. After 7 years of marriage, frankly I'm bored& looking for a woman with a similar situation. Discretion a must. Daytime perfect. Write PO Box 8, Brooklyn, NY 11236.

BIZARRE & ESOTERIC wood working. B&D apparatus designed & finely hand-crafter to your specifications. Carpenter Shop, 1044 Beach 21st St., Far Rockaway, NY.

LONELY FEMALES. No need to be lonely any longer. Young attractive male wants to fulfill your dreams, whether it be passionate loving or just being treated like a woman. Send phone # to: PO Box 249, Wall St. Sta., NYC 10005.

VIRILE, MUSCULAR BI MALE available for 3somes. Have car & place. Adam, PO Box 39, Nanuet, NY 10954.

AS OF DECEMBER 1, 1974, SCREW Classified ad rates will be as follows: Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!
W/M, 28, 6'4", 190. Looking for well built guys, musclemen, bodybuilders. If you would enjoy having your body appreciated & given a free full body massage then write me. Muscles turn me on. Send photo & phone to R. Martinelli, Box 555, Wall St. Sta., NYC 10005.

THE NEW ISSUE OF MATURE is about to appear. Over 2,000 exciting ads, mostly of single swinging women, in every state of the USA & Canada. Great couples too! Send $4 for your copy. (The photos alone are worth the money.) Write: Mature, PO Box 352, Free-port, NY 11520.

WHITE MALE, 21, goodlooking, husky, hot mouth & ass need a strong, dominant man, 27-40, gay, straight or bi, who knows what he wants & how to take it. Please send descriptive letter & phone # if possible. PO Box 94, Fleetwood Sta., Mt Vernon, NY 10552.

WHEN WAS THE LAST TIME you came & really enjoyed it? I love making older men really satisfied. If your generous & want to meet a young white bi buy write soon. Older men say when. Box 221, Grand Cent. Sta., NY, NY 10017.

ATTRACTIVE YOUNG (27) white male, novice oral slave for males, females, groups. Write Rick Dubin, 26 7th Ave. So., NYC 10014.

SUBMISSIVE MASCULINE STUD would enjoy meeting wit male, female & couples. I'm always looking for new & exiting people to meet with. Am discrete & sincere. Tel # & mailing address please. Coming to NY soon.

SUPER DISCREET EXECUTIVE, young 28, handsome, Irish-Cherokee, well-traveled, well-educated. Interests include travel, outdoors, politics, music, writers, & people who have heads on their shoulders. Wish to meet straight appearing gay, straight or bi males with good personalities, looks, & who know what being discreet means for private get-togethers. Can travel. Your photo & phone gets mine. You won't be disappointed. Box 31104, Temple Hill, Maryland 20031.
STAY DOWNTOWN

No need to leave the Wall Street area because now, Beaver St. Spa can satisfy your every desire. We offer new European sauna and invigorating high pressure shower. Enjoy being catered to by our beautiful young hostesses. They can bring you up when the Dow Jones has you down. Call and ask about our special introductory rates.

Beaver St. Spa
18 Beaver Street
943-2909/open from 10AM to 8PM

SEX SENSE
Saves You Money
COME AND GET IT...
New York's loveliest hostesses are waiting to pamper & please you.
Come and enjoy a re-vitalizing needlepoint shower followed by a supremely satisfying rubdown in complete air conditioned privacy.

MIDDLE EARTH
835 Third Ave. Between 50th & 51st Streets (212) 752-4644
OPEN 24 HOURS 7 DAYS A WEEK
MAILING ADDRESS use your name our address to receive your mail—$4 per rho. Rm. 1104, 150 5th Ave., NYC 10011.

BEAUTIFUL MEXICAN GIRLS needing American boy-friends. Details: free. Mexico, Box 3876, EE, San Diego, Calif. 92103.

FREE FOLDER about sure fire swinging! 10 hottest questions! 68 subjects! How single guys score! Free! But dime stamp gets first class delivery. Living Institute, Box 3ER, Raritan, NJ 08876.

KODACOLOR PROCESSING. 12 Ex. $3.90, 20 Ex. $5.90. Ektachrome slides 20 Ex. $2, 36 Ex. $3. 8mm movies $4. Polaroid copies. Unbeatable quality. See the difference. S. Photo, Box 258-M, Syracuse, NY 13201.

WOMENS GROUP for gals who want to meet men, couples & other gals. National membership, no obligation. Write for free folder to Pam Mercer, Womans Group, Box 202SR, Flagtown, NJ 08821.

INSTANT ACTION: Tired of hasseling with your chick to suck you off? Check out heavy throat action with experienced head master. He guarantees a fantastic climax. Box 2381, NYC 10001.

RECENTLY DIVORCED ATTRACTIVE 23 yr. old woman wishes sincere friendship & love relationship with other women. Write Box 1037, GPO, Brooklyn, NY 11202. Send resume, phone #, & photo if possible. I will send same. Positively no men.

YOUNG MALE, 23, built to please, seeks woman of any age, couples possible. Let me know your desires. Phone & photo appreciated but not necessary. Tom, Box 150, Stratford, Conn. 06497.

MIAMI: ALL PASSIVE FEMALES with unnatural fantasies who enjoy being a subject to the stable of a most successful, tallented, gentle & understanding master, to release your frustrations & satisfy all personal, senseous, passionate fantasies of all arts & cultures, who enjoy mild disciplin, exhibitionist, fr., Gr., ponygirl, Photography, masturbation, water sports, TV, spanking, etc. Exiting impliments, private sessions & very discrete. This ad is for you honey. You'll be so exited & thrilled, you'll be back for more as others have. Send detailed letter & photo. Let me train you. You'll enjoy every minute. Shy, novie, flat chested pussycats very welcome. Don't delay, write for details. You'll be glad you did. Chuck R., PO Box 470812, Miami, Fla.

LEATHERMEN: I'm 21, goodlooking, husky, hot & hung & very interested in leather. I don't know anything about it, only that it turns me on. Any dominant leatherman, 27-39, please write & show me the way. Please send letter & phone if possible to: PO Box 94, Fleetwood Sta., Mt. Vernon, NY 10552.

SUPER STUD, 27, extremely good looking, very muscular, beautifully built, hung big & super thick, will completely satisfy any female. PO Box 661, NY, NY 10019.

DIGS FRAGRANT SMELLING PUSSY! Latin male, handsome, endowed, 26, loves to make love to & French & drink the nectar of all races of females. Box 442, Mahwah, NJ 07430.

LIKE TO RECEIVE unusual exotic photos & films? Featuring beautiful women being spanked on bare ass, humiliated, dominated, golden showered, etc. Write: Mature, PO Box 1959, Brooklyn, NY 11202.

WELL HUNG YOUNG MAN needs female who enjoys sucking a beautifully curved cock or who enjoys being teased by a talented tongue. Photo, phone appreciated. All ages, all races welcome. PO Box 109, East Elmhurst, Queens, NY 11369.

ATT: FAT LADIES. Brooklyn guy, 30, looking for heavy set lady for dates & possible marriage. Must love sex. Photo & phone will receive first considerations. This ad is no phony. Write: Tony Andreacchio, 1122 Blake Court, Brooklyn, NY 11235.

SICK OF HUSTLERS? Forwarding fees? Phonies? A new interracial group of warm, intelligent people is forming, and we need single females & couples who care more about personality than looks. PO Box 9614, Sta. "P", Columbus, Ohio 43206.

MY PRETTY YOUNG FACE & enormous jugs are waiting for you. Send SASE & $2. for cost of photo if you want one. A friend of mine has consented to my using his PO Box, so please use the following address: Boxholder, PO Box 193, GPO, NYC, NY 10001.

28, SLIM, ATTRACTIVE MALE, interested in meeting same getting into S/M. Prefer hippie, hung, leather. Photo, letter. 3-P, 495 West End, NYC 10024.

TOLEDO, OHIO W/M, 36, seeks intimate but casual relationship with women 18-45. Discression assured. Picture desired. Send phone & address to Danny, PO Box 2555, J Toledo, Ohio 43606.

HELP IVY LEAGUE STUD celebrate 19th birthday! Seeks women to blow out his candle. Write Andy, 411A Carmen Hall, Columbia U., NYC 10027.

OHIO: SWINGING BACHELOR desires to meet swinging bachelorette to explore the swinging scene, & make new contacts. This bachelor is 34 years old & participates in most phases, & will investigate the rest, discretion assured & expected. Send revealing photo (if possible) & phone ft. All answered. Write Occupant, PO Box 6142. Toledo, Ohio 43614.

BONDAGE ENTHUSIAST: Free literature on books, bondage devices, pictures, photos, movies, & correspondence with other bondage enthusiast: Write Castlegate, Box 1517, Charlotte, NC 28232.

DIRTIEST & SEXIEST ITEMS for sale by young actress. Send $3 for my color photograph, personal letter, price list: Tessa Singleton, 152 W. 42nd St., #504, NYC 10036.

FOOT AND SHOE FETISH: Desires girl with pretty feet. Goodlooking 26 yr. old male wishes to caress & pamper your feet & shoes in my erotic fantasy. Very generous to the right girl. Short term or long term interlude. Write Eddie, PO Box 46, Hartsdale, NY 10530.
GET SCREWED—Get names & addresses of close by hot gals & gays who want your meat on a sheet. Stamped, self addressed business envelope gets you a free sample. Exchange, PO Box 912R, Azusa, Calif. 91702.

I AM LOOKING for a submissive female who wishes to be the sexual slave of a dominant but understanding young master. If you are she, write to PO Box 270, Gracie Sta. E. 85 St., NYC. (We may never meet upon the street.)

SUPER EROTIC SCREWS & thrills, massage, French, etc. offered by tan skinned, handsome, Ivy League educated, clean, good humored executive, 26, to attractive females interested in dating &/or sex. Also seek swinging partner. Write Occupant, Box 1846, Grand Cent. Sta., NY, NY 10017.

"PHONE A GAL." Women eager for action, waiting for your call. Phone #s with names, addresses, descriptions $2. Fazekas, Dept. SP, Box 54, NYC, NY 10038.

A MORE FULFILLING SEX LIFE thru reading profusely illustrated books on lovemaking. The Joy of Sex, over 120 illustrations, $12.95. The Encyclopedia of Love & Sex, 265 vivid illustrations, $10.95. The Kama Sutra, original uncut 1833 version, authentic Kama Sutra lovemaking positions, $12.95. Dynamic Intercourse, with 185 rare & exciting sexual positions, $4.95. Mattsons, Box 73, Detroit, Mich. 48221.

MALE, 21, SEEKS FEMALE for intimate contact. Any race or age acceptable. Straight only. Send photo & phone # to: PO Box 21042, Woodhaven, NY 11421.

FATTIES WANTED: W/MALE, 49 yrs. old, 6' tall, 175 lbs., nice looking, wishes to meet fat females, 200to400lbs. The bigger the better, for daytime dates. French & Greek cultures. Send phone #.
Discretion assured. Prefer Long Island or nearby. Write: PO Box 253, Uniondale, NY 11553.

ENEMA LOVER, professional man, handsome, discreet, seeks women sharing this passion. Let me administer to you lovingly over my knees, or other erotic postures. Reply Box 81, Flushing. NY 11367.

GENEROUS BUSINESSMAN wants black or Spanish girl to entertain me weekday evenings at my NY hotel. Prefer quiet, pleasant girl, steady relationship. N.B. Freeman, 152 W. 42nd St., #504, NY, NY 10036.

SINCERE WHITE NYC LOVER wants mistress for fun, sex, pleasure. His age, 40, hers any age. Write so we can arrange date to meet. Marty Flamm, Room 918, 225 W. 34th St., NYC, NY 10001.

BORED? FRUSTRATED? Adventurous? Sincere? Consider a non-demanding, uncomplicated but meaningful casual affair or stimulating relationship.
Male college graduate, 29, mature, fun-loving, discreet, seeks a romantic, passionate sexy female (age & marital status unimportant) to share unselfish lovemaking & prolonged intimacy. Why not escape & find release while satisfying sensual, uninhibited pleasures to achieve mutual fulfillment? Let’s talk about erotic desires, suppressed fantasies, conventional or unusual experiences. Write, giving interests, full description & phone # to Don, Box 1068, NYC 10009.

FIREY CRAVING SOLOMA converses eroticly, intellectually, problems, etc. on phone. Excitingly odd, phone me, cha! 1 cha!! boom!! boom!! $25
- 14 half hours, 10:30-12 pm. Money orders only, inquiries GPO Box 2995, NYC 10001.

NOVICE SUBMISSIVE W/MALE, 22, seeks dominant attractive females 18-40. Interested in all forms of B/D, spankings, humiliation & anything you command me to do. All sexual desires & whims obeyed. All races & attractive lesbians welcome. No pros please. Force me to grovel at your command. Discretion expected & assured. Serious replies only please. Contact Tomn, Box 815, Downstairs, 167 W. 21 St., NYC, NY 10011.

As of December 1, 1974, SCREW classified ad rates will be as follows: Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!

SEE YOUR FANTASIES on film. Super 8 color with sound. We "shoot to order" Urscript. For info: U-Script, 324 So. 1st St. DP 1, Alhambra, Calif. 91802.

MY MOD-BOD MASTER: Your humble slave begs Your pardon! Sorry that my lowly ad displeased You, Sir! Does this retraction satisfy You, Sir, so that I may have the honour of kissing Your feet?!?! Hoping to hear from You with absolute & positive vibes, Sir! Anxiously awaiting—F.O.C.S.!

YOUNG MAN, 35, needs money desperately! Willing to do almost anything for good pay. NYC area only. Discreet! Write Marc Andrews, Downstairs, 167 W. 21 St., NYC 10011.

HANDSOME, GENEROUS GUY, 38, seeks servicemen in uniform, especially USN. Give age, brief description. You will be pleased. J. Hightower, 152 W. 42nd St., rm. 504, NY, NY 10036.

TALL, ATTRACTIVE, white male, 46, seeks woman for mutually enjoyable encounters. Discreet, understand, let's meet, talk—you decide. For fast reply give phone. Box 151, Ozone Park, NY 11417.

FIRST TIME EVER. Caucasian male, 34, attractive & personable, sincere & discreet. Wanting to learn to serve discreet mistress in a beautiful slave relationship. No rip offs! Phone or address & photo. Write L. Bruce, Downstairs, 167 W. 21 St., NY, NY 10011.

INSTRUCTION, TRAINING, correction. I am a skilled, 23-yr.-old white mistress seeking docile males, females, couples & T.C.Vs for strict yet understanding discipline. Your needs will be met with experienced precision. Write: Tracy Clark, 152 W. 42nd St., rm. 504, NYC 10036. Include return postage for reply.

WHITE MALE, age 48, looking for females of all ages. I love to suck cunt for hours. Please write Occupant, IBB, 2422 Prospect Ave., Bronx, NY 10458.

"WORSHIP LADIES FEET." Let me serve at your stocking feet. Free service, any age, race. Single white male age 26 is waiting. PO Box 695, Canal St. Sta., NYC 10013.

RUBBERS—Revolutionary designed, natural penis contour, tight fitting, tolerates vigorous action! Lubricated for instant use. 50 cents each. Mattsons, Box 73, Detroit, Mich. 48221.

MAN SEEKS SEX with women having large tits. Include photo & phone #. Write to PO Box 80, Island Park, LI, NY 11558.

EXCLUSIVE ADULT SOCIETY of Black Masters, Dominant Black Mistresses, Swingers. We have 'straight' black studs ready to swing with single females & couples who are looking for the Black Experience! Straight ahead screwing & chewing. Reach the 'highs' of eroticism. Single females free membership. Free info from: Absolute Productions, Box 987, Newark, NJ 07101.

SWINGING FRENCH Stewardess, 36-23-35, seeks discreet men for pleasure oriented dates in NY or other cities. Michelle Renee, Box 433, Lindenhurst, NY 11757.
FILTHY, DIRTY & RAUNCHY writing pads available from American Mother Phucker

Cards. What's on your mind? Say it with one of our pads. Four different styles in color. Homosexual, Perverted, Over-Sexed or Nasty? Just $2.35 each (includes postage), all 4 for $8. Box 635, Tiburon, Calif. 94920.

LIBERATION FROM IMPOTENCY. Regain sexual potency, virility, & sensuality. Adults Only. Send name, age, address, & $4 to Sag. Poplar, PO Box 129, Belmont, Calif. 94002.

MEET NEW SWINGERS before the holidays. Gals who swing with men! We are America's #1 personal-introduction swinging service. Stamp for free application: Jill Kane, Box 822-ZR, Manville, NJ 08835.

GOOD LOOKING, 35-yr.-old male, masculine, sincere, warm, understanding, wishes to hear from well-endowed straight or bi males & those who are thoroughly masculine & can lend a good presence to a relaxing evening. R.N.J., Box 421, Mad. Sq. Sta., NYC 10010.

SENSESENSE, written, edited & produced by John Milton, the mail order sex industry's most knowledgeable & honest reporter. Sex-Sense tells you where the hottest thing are & how to get them in a pungent newsletter format which gives you the info you need right at your fingertips. SexSense costs only $18.50 for a full 24-issue subscription. Or for a starter, $9.95 will get you into 11 issues. Send check or M.O. to: SexSense, PO Box 432, Old Chelsea Sta., NYC NY 10011.

A NEW & UNIQUE Correspondence Club has been formed for SM/BD-oriented aficionados! Straight, gay, bi, female, male, couples! Send free 25-50 word ad (10c per word over limit) plus self-addressed stamped #10 envelope (sase) for complimentary copy of The Rigid Bondage Roster. $1 plus 4"x9" sase for non-advertisers. Mail to PO Box 411, Dept. W, Church St. Sta., NY, NY 10008. State age—over 21 only. Code #s issued; first name confidential if requested.

PASSIONATE MAN, 25, lives & loves to beautifully make love to nice ladies endowed with full, voluptuous, kissable, caressable breasts. Send photo. Full details meeting your first letter. Box 847, NYC 10013.

WELL-TO-DO 49-YEAR-OLD guy seeks 18- to 26-year-old Manhattan girl who would like rent paid on her apartment or 18- to 26-year-old out-of-town gal who would like, exciting all-expense-paid weekends in NY— in return for friendly, intimate companionship. Recent photo a must! Box 564, FDR Sta., NY, NY 10022.

SENSESENSE—the most informative newsletter in the sex industry. Tells you what to buy, who the gyps are, the deliverers, the hottest stuff, the phonies. In other words, everything you ever wanted to buy in sex but were afraid of getting screwed out of. All that for only $18.50 for 24 info-packed issues. If you're short of cash, $9.95 will get you 11 copies to get your feet wet. Send check or M.O. to: Sex-Sense, PO Box 432, Old Chelsea Sta., NYC, NY 10011.

ATTENTION: Slim & slender studs!!! Why don't you groovy guys come out of your closets & submit your Mod-Bod to this delicious diet of restraint? Guaranteed equipment to turn you on to your wildest desires. How about it?—Chains galore! Wrist clamps, ankle straps, neck braces, tit snaps, ball belts, etc., etc. Cum & be very secure with a knowledgeable topman, 31, 6'1" tall, 150 thin lbs. Try out my bed of bondage or spread-eagled suspension! Young, serious & sincere studs only considered! Photo (not nude but tight Levis preferable) required for reply, plus personal statistics & desires! Write to: Mister B, Box 5M, 101 E. 16th St., NYC 10003! Your Master waits impatiently for your prompt reply—so write right now!!!

MALE, 30, seeks uninhibited female. I would like to improve my French & I need a good teacher. If you are a free-living female & enjoy lip service, then drop me a line & let's get together. Manhattan only. Photo requested. N.T., Box 501, NY, NY 10016.

IF YOU ARE A YOUNG WOMAN discipline devotee who might like to marry the right partner, please write to me. I want straight sex with plenty of give & take punishment. No smokers or pet lovers, please. Photo. Joe, PO Box 153, Belle Mead, NJ 08502.

MERRY SYPHILIS & HAPPY GONORRHEA says the American Mother Phucker Card Co. We've got the funniest, raunchiest Xmas greeting cards for you to send to your friends & enemies. 20 cards for $5 + 52c postage + 30c sales tax (Calif, residents) = $5.82. Box 635, Tiburon, Calif. 94920.

BLACK SWINGER, well hung, discreet, wants to meet white females & swinging couples for swinging sessions. No single males. Photo, phone gets reply. Occupant, PO Box 2968, GPO, NY, NY 10001.

SWINGING IS A BALL! Meet swingers, broadminded men, women & couples in every area who share your interests & desires. Free details & ads. The Barbaron, Box 57, Dunmore. Pa. 18512.

AS OF DECEMBER 1, 1974, SCREW Classified ad rates will be as follows: Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!

POLICEMEN, other uniformed men interested in dynamite massages, films, etc. Must be white, good looking, under 30. I am white male, 35, very discreet, generous. PO Box 953, Radio City Sta., NYC 10019.

WOMEN: WHITE MAN in 20s, very lonely, will fondle & suck your breasts. Other activities considered. Stamped envelope for reply. Send measurements & phone to: Box 847, Canal St. Sta., NYC.

BORED? LONELY? FRUSTRATED? Affair wanted by exciting, sincere, dynamic young handsome male fashion model & college student! Seeking company of older man for wonderful & fun times! Also, for the purpose of exchanging ideas & wisdom! Also, for Security!! Only a long lasting relation considered. Financial aid a must!! Kind & gentle only please. Write Steve Honeywell, 167 W. 21 St., NYC 10011.

PHILADELPHIA'S OWN B&D publication, with directory of dominant & docile ads concentrating on Phila. & nearby areas. Current issues now available. Write for free brochure. PO Box 2146, Phila., Pa. 19103.

RENT A DATE from 1 hr. anytown America. Date singles, couples, threesomes, straight, bi, gay & the unusuals, as per your unique needs. Send S.A.S.E. to Trustworthy, Box 1018, Flushing, NY 11352. (New P/T Renta-dates: send photo & resume.)

HORNY, YOUNG, HANDSOME male with beautiful shaped rod & lovely rounded rear seeks males for mutual pleasure. Looks & age are not as important as character. I'm financially well off & can travel anywhere at any time. Fred A., Box 232, Babylon, NY 11702.

MEN: REMEMBER your first hand job? Researcher needs your written account–age, circumstances, fantasies, techniques, reactions. Setting down the details can be a stimulating experience. Research Design, Box 2124, Loop Sta., Minneapolis, Minn. 55402.

RETIRED NAVY MAN, wholly discreet, well educated, seeking a lady, 35-50, preferably from Brooklyn, object: afternoon sex, since my wife is now sexless. Can't promise vintage champagne but other material goodies assured. Phone & photo please? Barry, Downstairs, 167 W. 21 St., NYC 10011.
MALE, 21, 6'4", 210 lbs., good looking. Seeks ladies only, 21-40 yrs. old. Will cater to absolutely any fetish. Lesbians preferred. Phone helps, all answered. Occupant, Box 161, Queens Village, NY 11429.

SUCCESSFUL NEW JERSEY business executive, 37 yrs. old, wants to meet young men 18-36 yrs. for any & all kinds of sex & friendship can be straight, married, athletes or students, you must be hung & goodlooking. I am very willing to help the right person. I am discreet & sincere. I am willing to learn all kinds of sex. Please write details, photo & phone for immed. reply. Write Boxholder, PO Box 59, Millburn, NJ 07041.

YORKVILLE. Bi male, 30, digs upper East Side. Looking for a male, under 30, to put me up, keep me warm Saturday nights. Mutual pleasure desired. No fats, queens or nuts. Am sincere. Send descriptive letter. Box 357, Bowling Green Sta., NYC 10004.

ADVANCED BONDAGE: W/M, 28, into advancee. Only serious female & males wanted with equipment & knowledge who can create my fantasy of total submission & restraining bondage. Occupant, PO Box 121, West Hempstead, NY 11552.

SEXY POLAROIDS of my wife, will exchange 1 for 1. No rip-off. J. Shepherd, 406 S. 2nd St., alhambra, Calif. 91802.

WILLING WIDOWER, 42, attractive, docile, affectionate, well built, secure. Seeks sensuous, imaginative couples, women & select men for uninhibited prolonged pleasures, erotic games. Please send phone, photo & describe interests. Radio City Sta., Box 324, NYC 10019.

WHITE MALE SEEKING bosomy gal(s), shy or exhibitionistic, interested in masturbation, voyeurism. No obligations other than passive watching. Prefer phone. Box 528, Central Sta., Jamaica, NY 11435.

BUSINESS MAN, 58 (no bald, no pot belly) seeks attractive working girl for a few hours of love weekly. Free rent furnished apt. available. Write: Occupant, 226 E. 29, 5G, NY, NY 10016.

MALE, WHITE, 29, 5'10", 160 lbs., sincere & fun loving. Wants to meet same with no hangups. Object mutual enjoyment while you vacation in the Florida Keys. Write: J.A., PO Box 1194, Marathon, Fla. 33050.

SENSUALITY SEEKER, attractive widower, cauc, 42, personable, built, seeks meetings with shapely women divorcees, marrieds & couples who crave sensual satisfaction of every variety. Radio City Sta. Box 324, NYC 10019.

JOCK STRAP LOVERS. If you're hung up on bulging jock straps, are masculine, with a good build, maybe a body exhibitionist, 20s to 40s, NYC area, why not groove with another trim jock fiend who's into them 24 hours a day. Think of your wildest jock fantasy & let's make that far our scene a reality together. No femmes or phonies. If you're into the scene as I am you'll know it. Letter describing your fantasies with photo & phone answered in kind promptly, hamilton, Box 774, Mad. Sq. Sta., NY, NY 10010.

WHITE MAN, 6'3", 185 lbs., wishes to correspond with single & married women. Frank sexy letters with photo & phone. Want to move to NY if any woman wants me for companion. Write Kenneth Strebbins, 042016 A-17, PO Box 221, Raiford, Fla. 32083.

AM NOT THE BEST conversationalist, nor the prettiest female, but have rather pretty figure, however all is not gold that glitters. I am simple, sincere, 40, discreet,seeking generous men for pleasure. Ms. Drake, Rm 504, 152 W. 42 St. NY, NY 10036.

TATTOOED COCK & BALLS, & I love to have them sucked by anyone. I love to perform Greek to anyone. I love threesomes & I love to watch, especially lesbians. I can be photographed, & have photographs for sale. Send photo & phone # to: PO Box 271, Darby, Pa. 19023. (Outside Phila.).

ASPIRING YOUNG MALE filmmaker seeks young woman to model in short porno film. Good pay. Send photo & phone. PO Box 32380, Jamaica. NY 11431.

SINGLES, MARRIEDS: Horny? Find out how a handsome, athletic bi white male can groove with his talented tongue. Thrills guaranteed. Open to all suggestions, but no hustlers. Wayne White, 152 W. 42nd St., Room 504, NYC, NY 10036.

METROPOLITAN N.Y.C.: Danny Tyler, gay, 50, 6'2", 235#, like to tongue kiss, make mad love & suck; wants to meet truck drivers & gay people East coast. Danny Tyler, 215 E. 29th St., NYC 10016.

Films

HOMEMADE MOVIES & Polaroids! My response has been overwhelming! No restrictions! 200' b/w $25, color $45 (Preferred), pics 6-8.00, 16-$20. We specialize in the unusual! Over 21. J.M.R., Box 791, Maitland, Fla.

STOP PAYING $25-$30! We have the very best color series on the market at $17.50! Catalogs $. Inquiries welcome. Over 21 only. D&G Book Service, Box 744, Albany, NY 12201.

REAL FUCK & SUCK FILMS. Real action that will suit the most particular erotic adult. All full length. Send $1 for brochure. We sell what we tell. Cut-Rate Service, 103 Market St., Phila., Pa. 19106.

NAUGHTY SLAVE GIRL receives punishment. Super 8mm color film of a real spanking. Send $15 money order to: A. Birnbaum, Box 246, Peter Stuyvesant Sta., NY, NY 10009. This film is definitely real.

AS OF DECEMBER 1, 1974, SCREW Classified ad rates will be as follows: Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!

Prisoner Exchange

5'9", 150LBS., WHITE, 27 yrs. and bi. Could really dig some mail. Moving to East Coast when I get out. Michael Ede, PO Box 530, Walla Walla, Wash. 99362.

LONESOME, SEXY LADIES. Want to talk about your secret desires? I'll understand & fulfill your dreams. John Deaton, #88133, PO Box 128, Stringtown, Ok. 74569.

I AM 34 YEARS OLD, and an inmate at the Correctional Institute at Somers, Conn. I would like to correspond with open minded people. Our mail is uncensored & unlimited. Photo exchange is possible. My appreciation & thanks. Daniel Harris, Jr., Box 100, Somers, Conn. 06071.

VERY HIP, OPEN MINDED, white, 26 yrs.
old, Sagittarian, doing time in Ohio for pot, would really dig to hear from together, open minded chicks. Let’s get it on. Now. Timothy Kalinowski, #82801, PO Box 56, Lebanon. Ohio 45036.

MARIJUANA SMUGGLER from San Francisco. Fifth year in Mexican prison for toting tons. 29 yrs old, 6’2”, It. brown hair, blue eyes. 4 yrs. college in US & Europe. Many interests. Mail not read. Michael Creamer, Carcel Municipal La Loma, Calles Mina y Monterrey, Nuevo Laredo, Tamaulipas, Mexico.

Help Wanted
WANTED: GIRLS, nonprofessional for adult films. Good pay. Send resume & photo to: PO Box 18112, Cincinnati, Ohio 45218.

Travel
NUDE BEACHES!!! Enjoy the exhilarating experience of public nudity. Rush only $10 for a copy of our new 1975 guide to public nude beaches in America, complete directions & full information—Maps included. Also available for only $10, our famous copyrighted guide to over 150 wide-open swinging nudist camps & clubs in 40 states plus Canada! Both guides only $15. We guarantee that your order will be shipped immediately within 24 hours of receipt in a plain wrapper, via Air Mail Special Delivery! Personal checks OK, we trust you! Our 2nd year as an honest advertiser in SCREW, the world’s greatest newspaper! Esalarr International, Box 2122, Dept. S-22, Carbondale, Ill. 62901.

Couples
TALL, ATTRACTIVE Caucasian male, 46, oral expert, will treat your woman while you’re present. No reciprocation necessary. No bi’s. For fast reply give phone #. A.S., Box 151, Ozone Park, NY 11417.

SWINGER’S HEAVEN: Club Aquarius, Long Island’s most beautiful clubroom invites you to have the time of your life every Sunday nite at the Clique Lounge, 1397 Jerusalem Ave., N. Merrick. Where new couples meet & make new friends. Music, dancing, hot buffet. Free parking & more. You have tried the rest, now try the very best. PO Box 363, Alden Manor, Floral Park, NY 11003.

DETROIT, CLEVELAND, Atlanta truck driver will meet white couples & singles for sex or conversation. Also interested in movies, photos, books, etc. PO Box 4602, Macon, Ga. 31208.

BEAUTIFUL YOUNG WHITE COUPLE desire to meet only young slim attractive couples to share pleasant experiences. No heavy couples need reply. Photo, phone. PO Box 306, Kearney, NJ 07032.

PETITE 21 YRS. BI blond hair girl seeks a female 18-35 for threesomes with my boyfriend, 40 yrs., and me, or me alone. We are very discreet & expect same. No kooks or way outs. Phone # a must. Photo if possible. D.B., Box 209, Brooklyn, NY 11228.

CALLING ALL GIRLS, Attractive couple, 29 & 30, seeking bisexual female for a mutually enjoyable threesome experience. Phone & photo a must. If interested reply immediately. Occupant, PO Box 348, Keyport, NJ 0775.

SEXY, ADORABLE, Married couple, white, late 20s, seeking erotic couples & bi ladies. Sensuality more important than your age. Photo, phone please. G. West, Box 90,161 E. Houston St., NY, NY 10002.

WHITE COUPLE, 38-44, desire single girls weekend or longer. Colored welcomed. Temporary home possible. Also white couples for oral pleasure only. Occupant, PO Box 412, Albany, NY 12201.

DISCREET, CLEANCUT, YOUNG, good-looking oriental male desires 3somes with cleancut couples as catalyst or active participant. Can be bi with right people. Males must be 35-50 over 200 solid pounds, preferably hairy. Phone # for fast connection. Only sincere people, no weirdos please. D. Cabal, Downstairs, 167 W. 21 St. NYC 10011.
INDIAN SWINGER forming swingers co-op limited to 10-15 couples & sincere females only, up to 45; straight, bi only. No S/M & B/D. Prospective members must be attractive, educated, cultures & discreet. International ethnic background preferred. No fees involved. Genuine ad. Send personal information, phone & photo to Box 2915, GPO, NYC 10001.

DISCREET SWINGING couples in Queens, Nassau, Suffolk. The new place to meet many other swinging couples is the intimate Tiffany Lounge, Route 110 & Great Neck Rd., Farmingdale, exit 32N on the Southern State Pkwy. Live music, free hot & cold buffet. Write PO Box 6, Commack, NY 11725 for info.

YOUNG EXPERIENCED MALE wants clean females especially over 40 & couples for swinging times. Send phone & photo. Ray, PO Box 557, Mad. Sq. Sta., NY, NY 10010.

ATTRACTIVE CAUCASIAN COUPLE, she 25, 5'9" tall, 130 lbs., he 28, 6'0" tall, 165 lbs. We enjoy photo fun & especially French loving. We seek attractive females to join us for 3somes & possibly introduce wife to bi. Like-minded couples please write also. Frank letter, revealing photo, phone receive same day response. Write: Occupant, PO Box 139, Brooklyn, NY 11222.

SPECTACULAR NEWS for swinging couples. Club Aquarius, Long Island’s most exciting Sunday-nite spot, will be opened on Friday nites also. Starting Fri. nite Nov. 22 we will be opened each & every Friday & Sunday nites. Live music, hot & cold buffet, free parking & fun loving people. Grand opening nite will be Friday Nov. 22. To be invited, write PO Box 363, Alden Manor, Floral Park, NY 11003. Include phone # for fast response.

EXPERIENCED WHITE COUPLE, both AC/DC, 41, unprejudiced, interested in couples & bi girls over 30. More interested in sincerity & intimacy than dimensions or size. Couples need not be bi to respond. Evening phone # necessary for prompt reply. No closet swingers please! Would like hearing from group party givers, promise to carry our share. Box 76, Brooklyn, NY 11208.

ATTRACTIVE NOVICE COUPLE seeks good looking bi female, for mutual enjoyment. She 20 & he 24. Phone & photo please. PO Box 221, 106B Nassau Ave., Bklyn, NY 11222.

WOMEN, 20 to 45. How about making it with two or three hip young Italian guys. Any scene OK. Any race, smokers welcome. Write: Brothers, Box 1386, LIC, NY 11101.

IT'S A REALLY GREAT FEELING when I meet another couple & we hit it off. Besides enjoying each other in bed we become friends'. I'm a young white bi guy who wants to break in some new couples to the great feeling of a threesome. You can be sure that I will be discreet & I expect the same. Box 221, Grand Cent. Sta., NYC, NY 10017.

WELL BUILT MALE, 6'2", 200 lbs., 28 yrs. old, has afternoons & evenings free, would like to meet with couples for threesomes. Also ladies who are bored with daytime housework & would like a well built male over to add a little something to that coffee brake, will meet to suit you, discretion assured, sincere ad. Write Occupant, Box 101, Howard Beach Sta., NY, NY 11414.

ATTRACTIVE W/M, warm, sensuous, 5'8", 160 lbs., bisexual, wishes contacts with white married couples. I'm 45 yrs. young, intelligent, clean, like music, books, nudism, sexy conversation. No B&D or S&M, drugs or pain. Box 272, Yorktown Hghts., NY 10598.

COUPLES & GALS, congenial gentleman gets pleasure out of pleasing you. Well endowed, clean, discrete, photo appreciated, phone expedites. Will travel to NYC & Capital District evenings or weekends. Occupant, Box 1721, Poughkeepsie, NY 12601. No single men or commercial gals.

BOB, CAROL, TED & ALICE
Are alive and well, hiding at N.Y.C.'s swingiest couples only nite spot. Music, Dancing, Buffet, Parking.
INFO: Box 527, NY, NY 10010
CALL: (212) 259-5015
(212) 761-6641

SWINGING COUPLES ONLY
"OUR GANG," New Jersey's swing- ingest couples club, invites you to meet, mix and match at our delight- ful weekly cocktail parties. Serving sophisticated couples since 1971
Please call (201) 791-2256

AS OF DECEMBER 1, 1974, SCREW Class!-fled ad rates will be as follows: Personal 15 cents per word ($3.50 minimum), Commercial 35 cents per word ($7.00 minimum). Dramatic increase in SCREW circulation makes this the best ad bargain ever!

ON FIFTH AVENUE, in the heart of Fun City to relax in complete privacy is not a dream. It is a reality at the 'Quiet Corner Salon' on 595 5th Avenue, entrance at 48th St., 5th floor.

HOT, SENSUOUS ITALIAN STUD. Name your pleasure. Call Manhattan info for Steven Callenti.

GIRLS! LOOKING for a job? Try us! CUSTumers are guarenteed. 113-25 Queens Blvd. at 76th Rd., Forest Hills, NY, suite 108.

GRAND OPENING
$5 discount with this ad
Personal attention and United Na- tion-cultures offering the apex of re- laxation and satisfaction, to make you feel brand new.
Phone for appointment
(212) 581-7876
(212)724-8591

RUB DOWNS
by ATTRACTIVE STUDENT OF MASSAGE
(212) 989-3014

TED & ALICE ARE LONELY
Bob & Carol Went Away
So why don't you come & spend an hour (or 2) with T&A. They say memories last forever & this one definitely will. They’re both young & eager to satisfy you so give us a whirl & see if you don’t agree. Call CH 9-9818 or LT 1-0789
GENTLEMEN
Enjoy a sensational new experience today with a beautiful model.
CALL LINDA
(212) 889-6993
Private East Side Apt.
MITCHELL
VERSATILE YOUNG MALE
TOP LEATHER MODEL
(212) 255-0180
FEMALES COUPLES FEMALES
MASCULINE MODEL
Young-Versatile
Enjoy a true experience Your place or mine! Call (212) 366-5084
Ask for MIKE
Brooklyn-Queens
L.I.-Staten Island
MARK IS BACK!!
Nude male modeling at its best Young, attractive & hung (hot, eager & hard) Had any lately? Have some with me! (You’ll love it)
Call after 3pm
(212) 260-8443
Your place or mine IF YOU’RE LOOKING . . . . for a most attractive model with the softest curves in town, please call me. My green eyes and blonde hair will delight you.
(212) PL 9-1912
Yvette
My place only
YOUNG MASCULINE MODEL
Well Built Body 6’3” 200 lbs.
18” arms
48” chest
31” waist
CALL VINCE
(212) 977-9499
ENJOY
DOMINANT - PASSIVE
Enjoy the dominant hand and demands of Dominatrix, or you have the dominant hand for passive females. All types of massages given and received.
(212) 799-0459

A CUT ABOVE

THE AVERAGE
Young Rugged Male
Powerful Build
6'2" 44" chest
BOB GANT (212) 831-8390

TIRED of the
"BIG RIP OFF"
Come spend one full hour with me in my private E. Side (50's) apt. (absolute delay, not a studio or parlor, no tipping necessary.) I'm pretty, sexy, white, 24 yrs old with a voluptuous
"37-23-36" figure (5'6")
Also available as Escort for lunch, dinner or parties.
My place or yours 11 a. m. - 1 a.m.
7 days
Barbara (212) 355-2279

HUNGRY HILDA
I'm 5'4" tall with strawberry blond hair and green eyes and a body to make a hard-hat cream in his pants. I'm young and fresh and full of love. I'm new at this game but I'm quick to learn. Young studs are fun, but I'm especially fond of older men.
Like wine, a good man improves with age.
So if you're a "dirty old man" (or would like to be), call me at home. I'm waiting for you.
HILDA (212) 685-7972

Rare
Pleasure With Paul
LT1-0789
BROOKLYN
OR STATEN ISLAND
Your residence or models' private apartment. Sensitivity and tender loving are our specialties. Call from your home or office.
(212) WH 6-5386
No English Lessons
(212) WH 6-5386

POSES NUDE JOE
[212] 362-9498

ANYTIME
FOR LADIES EXCLUSIVELY
Tense?
For the Ultimate in Relaxation With a Man...
(212) 878-7544
From 9AM On
TRY IT!
YOU'LL LIKE IT!
Ask for T.C.
Residential/Hotel
ELDORADO
Are you a lonely soul who longs for a little bit of love? Or just a man who dreams to leave the world behind?
Then come to me. My name is Candy, and I'll take you to the rainbow's end. I'm young and beautiful, tall, with long blond hair and a gorgeous body, and I'm bursting at the seams with an uncontrollable desire to be loved. So, unlock your chains, and find the key to your dreams, with me in my sky-high apartment.
(212) 279-7222
Mon.-Fri. Appt. only
FOR THE FAIR SEX ONLY TOMCAT
Escort Service & Personal Care for KITTENS
From 9 AM On
(212) US 8-7544
7 Days
RESIDENTIAL QUEENS AREA
YOUNG ITALIAN MODEL
Satisfaction Guaranteed
John (212) 268-7866
"I can't believe I ate the whole thing!"

TERRY

WITH THE HAIRLESS PUSSY

(212) 679-7373

WHAT YOU SEE

IS WHAT YOU GET

CALL AMELIA

(212) OR 9-7373

GREEK AND OLD FASHIONED

RELAX

Start or end your day with an old-fasion treatment. Two operators on duty

(212) Call Betty (212) 489-0465 265-3820

Hours: Monday to Friday 8am to 11 pm. Saturdays 8am to 6pm. No Sundays.

Candlelight Massage & Electrolysis Studio

120 W. 44th St. suite 1512

15th floor (betw. 6th & 7th Aves.)

Phones frequently out of order. If you can't reach us by phone just come up.

ANGELA IS ROUND AND SOFT

...just like a girl should be. I have long light brown hair and green cat eyes, and lots of curves to hold. But don't come to see me unless you ENJOY women. I kiss and cuddle, shake it and make it with so much lust—some men find me TOO sexy. I'm only 18 but I move and please like a grown up woman. I'm bilingual, and bisexual. If you'd like to meet me, all me. My private phone no....

(212) 685-7972

GIRLS WANTED NOW!

! you're hip and attractive, we need you now! Excellent, private environment with top executive clientele...for and with mellow people.

(212) 532-8242

NUDE MALE MODELS

GENO

(212) 677-7684

ERIC

(212) 691-2313

I'm living with my Aunt; she's shy but willing. Come join us for play and games.

CALL PATTI

(212) 0V 9-3915

FOXY CHICKS

Entertain out-of-town executives in plush penthouse suite.
Top Pay
CALL SANDY
(212) 490-1206
YOUR SATISFACTION IS OUR CONCERN FLIGHT 1 SPA ATTRACTIVE INSTRUCTRESS
ES WILL HOST YOU AND RELAX YOU WITH PLEASURE
MUSIC AND ATMOSPHERE
Maria,
Kathy,
Zina,
Juliette,
Cindy,
and Diana are anxious to please you.
113-25 Queens Blvd at 76th Rd.
Forest Hills, 2nd Flr, 783-2265
HANDSOME YOUNG MASSEUR available for private session
5'8" 22 yrs. old
150 lbs. waist 29" beautiful trim build versatile
Call ALEX
(212) 564-1093
anytime
Studio & Residential
THE EXECUTIVE PLACE for the discriminating gentleman
Let us make you forget your business worries. We will pamper you with our sensuous techniques so that you will enjoy the most delightful and gratifying experience you will ever have.
Phone for app’t 11 am to 10pm
(212) 685-3908
(212) 685-0192
Free Refreshments Served Attractive Models Wanted
NICOLE
I am cute, 19, waiting for your every whim. If you’re naughty I will punish or spank you...
But Definitely Please You.
Call me at my chambers:
(212) 421-2402
SEX is for sale anywhere.
But where can you lease love?
I'll show you.
Judy
(212) 683-0979
FLY BOB!! non-stop pleasure
in the company of a young, very handsomely endowed versatile, friendly guy
S81-0789
(flighttime is anytime!)
YOUNG NUDE ATHLETE
HANDSOME MALE STUDENT
6'1", 175lbs.
44" chest, 31" waist
POSES BARE-ASSED
(versatile)
Jess Nichols (212) 988-4268
HOW'S YOUR LOVE LIFE?
CALL JOY for TOTAL SATISFACTION LUSTY...BUSTY...SEXY 212-KT2-4428 TEENAGE SEDUCTRESS Don't let my giggling fool you, I'm really 19, and not the 15 I look. My name is Annie, and I love to use my innocent looks to blow the minds of older guys. I get off on the fantasy of making it with my father, and know that guys dig the trip too. Truthfully, I get off just about any fantasy with older men. I know how my youth affects them. Just thinking about it gets me so hot I could close my eyes, rub my nipples and touch myself between my legs till I feel I'm melting. That's fun, but nothing compared to how it feels with a guy who can appreciate innocent little me. Right, daddy? P.S. I have permission to stay up late.
ANNIE (212)532-8224 MAMA'S STEPPIN' OUT My name is Alice and I'm 23. Until last month I was just another house wife with two small children. Then came the divorce. Now it's me and my boys and an empty king size bed. Sure I've got to be mother and father to my kids— but what I miss most is the good sex our marriage had. I sure need a lot to keep me happy. If you'd like to help out a pretty blond mommy, call me at my private number
(212) 685-7971

DOMINEERING BITCH COMMANDS
YOU TO CALL NOW!!!

PAULA
(212) 689-8414

BEAUTIFUL STARLET
Talented in the ARTS of pleasure, would like to delight you with her EROTIC WONDER.
There's always an "Encore"
Call Electra at
(212) MU 9-8420

If you would like a delightful, discerning modeling appointment with a beautiful, sophisticated white model discriminating to your taste:
DIANA
(212)734-3087
Hotel Exclusively
Appropriate in Appearance
As Well As Service
"BOY NEXT DOOR"
I am 24, have blue eyes, brown hair, am 5' 11" and weigh 147 pounds. My body is lean, hard and well defined from hours in the gym and on a surf board.
Because of my good clean wholesome looks I have been billed as the "boy next door" in several underground flicks and have appeared in several publications. I am versatile and cooperative.
BRIAN - (212) 724-6689
You will be pleased!

PUZZLE on who to come with?
Let's play with it-
together.
(212) MU 9-3915
Ask for Miriam
HI, I'M NILA
If you like a girl who is very petite with small pointy breasts, a tiny, tiny waist and long, slender legs, then I'm for you. I am 5'4" tall and have long blonde hair and measure 34-21-34. Although I'm 19 yrs. old I look more like 15 yrs. old. The one thing that I require of a man is that he is gentle and loving. I don't like to rush. I like to be loved slowly and gently with tenderness and feeling. So if you are that kind of man that enjoys the slow, sensuous, more gratifying experience, then call me in my luxurious air-conditioned private apartment.
My private apt.
(212) 734-4288
Mon.-Sat.
11am-1 1pm
TONI
From Playgirl Studios of Florida
From Scandia and Resort Spa in New York City can now be reached at (212) 889-4748
It doesn't have to be hard to enjoy yourself with me.
Call Milly
(212)683-8182
HI, I'M WENDY
I am a young, 19-year-old Norwegian girl new in the big city. I am 5'6" tall & measure 38-24-36 & weigh a slim 118 pounds all perfectly proportioned. My great pleasure is to hold a man in my arms & press my large but firm breasts into his chest & savor the sensation of warm skin on warm skin. I yearn to be loved, to be kissed, to be caressed, to be completely consumed in passion & in turn reciprocate every pleasure twofold. In this modern world women seem to be ashamed of being a woman. I am different in that I love to be a woman & give pleasure to men that only a truly feminine woman can give. Doing this with no inhibitions & complete abandon fulfills a basic need in me. One thing you must know is that I love compliments, especially about my long, beautiful legs. It won't take you too long to convince me to wear my black, sheer stockings & sexy garter belt. They make me feel very sexy. So please call me in my private apartment & let me prove to you the way I am.

Air Conditioned
My Private Phone
(212) 861-2373
Mon. thru Sat.
11 am to 11pm

Private Lessons In Obedience & Dominance
Newest Leather Equipment
For Your Enjoyment
CALL IRMA
(212) 689-3915

MY NAME IS ORPHAN ANNIE
My sister and I need a daddy to take care of us. Come be our daddy for an hour.
Afternoon or evening
(212) VO 7-1393

MOTHER
&
19-YEAR-OLD DAUGHTER WILL PERFORM
Call Mrs. Russell for appointment at
(212) MU 3-0979

The Girl Next Door
My name is Nancy & I'm just like the girl next door. I dress like her & talk like her, but I sure don't act like her. I'm very young & sweet with the most perfect body you have ever seen. My breasts are very large & so firm that I don't even need a bra. But even more important than my beauty is my personality. I am by nature very gentle & loving & I enjoy being fonder & kissed all over my body, but it must be done lovingly & gently. So, if you are gentle & would like to meet the girl next door, call me in my very private luxurious air conditioned apartment, my private no.
(212) 734-4288
Mon. thru Sat.
11am to 11pm

SUBSCRIBE TO SCREW RANDY
A beautiful masculine body & handsome face, available for modeling.
Versatile & cooperative
(212) 874-5046

PASSIONATE GYPSY GIRL
My name is Mara and I am a beautiful young Hungarian girl. I have wild gypsy blood in me that courses thru my veins like molten lava igniting uncontrollable passions that only a man can satisfy. Whenever a man is near me my large breasts quiver with excitement and a moistness pervades my most intimate recesses. After a man has known my love no ordinary girl could ever suffice again. Call me in my private air-conditioned apartment and experience the absolute heights of eroticism.

My private apt.
(212) 734-4288
Mon.-Sat.
11am-11pm
BREAST MASSAGE
42-24-36
A super endowed, young, beautiful brunette would like to give you an "EXCITING & EROTIC" breast massage.
Call Judy for appointment
(212) MU 9-8102

THE NIGHT OWL
Come to my place for a late night interlude.
My place never closes.
You won’t be disappointed.
Call Marie
(212) 752-4173

GENTLEMEN
Let us pamper you with our sensuous techniques, so that every inch of you becomes a burning fire of anticipation and you will enjoy the ultimate delight that only our experienced hands and bodies can bestow upon you. We take pride in giving you the most gratifying experience you will ever have.
Phone us for appointment
11 a.m. to 11 p.m.
(212) 685-3908
(212)685-0192
Free Refreshments
Models Wanted
MALE MODEL
YOUNG ATHLETIC STUDENT
6'0" 165 Lbs.
Italian
Well Built
(212) MU 3-8646
EXCEPTIONAL
MALE MODEL
I'm an exceptionally groovy Scandinavian guy with a great physique and a warm smile you'll dig. Call me anytime. CHRISTIAN
(212) TR 3-2307
ATTRACTIVE, VOLUPTUOUS
LONG-HAIRED BRUNETTE to model at your studio, residence or hotel.
For refined, discriminating gentlemen only. (212)
Call Yvonne Adams 873-1141
ALL HAIL
THE COLONIC ARTIST
Enemas 8t Golden Showers for a truly pleasing TRIUMPH!
Mara (212) TN 7-1393
$9.00
LOVE ENCOUNTER
THE PINK PUSSY CAT
200 EAST 14th ST 533-5719
WITH THIS COUPON EVER WAKE UP FEELING LIKE A TIGER?
Just call Cleo for the purr-feet encounter between a man & a woman.
COMPLETE PRIVACY
249-9818
ARE YOU FED UP...
... with being rushed out and would like to stay in longer?
Call BARBARA at
(212) MU 3-8182
Two handsome, sensuous, freaky dudes into creative, imaginative scenes. Leather, discipline, water sports, fantasy exhibitionism.
Available together or separately BRAD & BART
(212) 691-2529
BEAUTIFUL, SENSUOUS & EXOTIC
Dark-Skinned Model Available as 1 your private hostess
2 your escort
3 your companion
Call (212) 765-7754
BARBARA
by appointment only hotels & residential
THE WHIP BITCH
"Different strokes for different folks"
Your desire is MY COMMAND!
CALL ZELDA
(212) OR 9-4120
If getting there is half the fun – then being there can be ALL the fun. Let's get together to have some fun.
Call STARR at
(212) TO 7-1366
TORTUOUS TEACHER is now in town!
A MUST at my place
Call me Mistress
(212) UN 7-1366
WHY GO OUT
HEN I CAN COME IN?
And climax your day with a complete and sensuous relaxation service. Ask about the various cultures.
Your Home or Hotel Exclusively call MICHELLE
(212) 992-6756
Beautiful, responsive, intelligent Black model would like the pleasure of your company.
Husband travels weekly, but generously approves my extracurricular activities. Call Wednesdays through Fridays, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.
(212) 889-6563
ABBY
I NEED A MAN
A man to hold in my arms and feel his strength throughout my whole body. This is my only wish in life. Living in the city is rough and sometimes when I see all the lonely people walking the street, I wish they were in my arms holding my warm back and caressing my firm buttocks. I want to help complete your night and never let you forget that there is a woman in the world that needs you. Call me, I'm waiting. My name is ECHO, and you can hear me calling you in your ear if you listen hard enough.
(212) MU 9-8420

SEXY SAMANTHA
I grew up in the West among rodeos and ranches... All that rough living just made me all the more determined to show men the joys of the other side of life...the sensuous and subtle pleasures of woman. Come relax with me. I can soothe away all your cares.
Call Mon-Sat., 11 AM - 11 PM.
(212)490-1206

GREENWICH VILLAGE GIRL
Things are different down in the Village. The pace is slower, success is less important than sensuality. And "Love" is a way of life. The kind of love I enjoy most is when I get together with a guy, get naked, and get down with him between the sheets. My boobs are large and firm, and my sensitive nipples come to life when you touch them. And my bush flames at contact with a hard, aroused man. I love to give pleasure, and share and excite. And to have all my openings explored and filled, to have my lust ignited, and to do the same. If you can dig where I'm at, and think we can groove together, call me at my pad. My name is Eva, and my number
(212) JE 2-8225

ELIZABETH ISA HORNY HOUSEWIFE
Women's Lib? Who needs it? Women were born to please men--so how could a real woman ever be unwilling to love? I've got a fire between my legs that just won't quit. Now don't get me wrong, my husband's great! In fact he taught me EVERYTHING--but he travels a lot and leaves me alone, hot, and frustrated. So while he's away--let's play. My name is Elizabeth, my number is (212)691-7803

WHY BE ALONE?
We have attractive girls available to be your escort for a fun night on the town. Why not make an appointment to see pictures of our girls. Also available: hostesses, strippers, belly dancers; for private parties.
PARTY TALENT
(212) 684-6590
5:30-10:30 PM
ADAM CRAIG
Young & Boyish
Versatile—Good Looking Smooth Swimmer's Body
25, 5'8", 130 lbs.
Greek & French Nude Modeling
Your Place or Mine
(212) 522-7427
SOUTH AMERICAN TEMPTRESS
My name is Laurita and I am a very sexy young girl from Venezuela. I am only 19 years old and stand 5'3" tall with a very petite figure of 34-21-34 and weigh 105 lbs. I have an exquisitely beautiful face with large, dreamy brown eyes set off by long, dark lashes. My figure is a work of art. My breasts are firmly rounded and up-thrusting as if asking to be loved and aroused. My waist is so small that a man can span it with his hands and my flat stomach only accentuates my femininely rounded hips. My tropical, Latin blood is hot with desire that needs satisfying continuously. Please call me in my luxurious East Side apartment and you will come again and again.
My private no. Mon.-Sat.
(212) 734-4258 11am-11pm
IRISH COLLEEN
Hi, my name is Maureen and I'm a little pixie from the Old Sod. I'm cute as a bug with a gorgeous, petite figure. I am 18 years old and have red hair, small pointy breasts tipped with ruby red nipples, a real tiny waist and long, exquisitely shaped legs. I really know how to please men. I'm very gentle and cuddly and if you are gentle and refined please call me in my private apartment and I'll show you what really made Ireland famous. Air conditioned.
My private apt. Mon.-Sat.
(212)734-4288 11am-11pm
Queens
Manhattan
CALL
JUDY & JO-ANN
They will!!! And they can. Can you?? Hotels, homes, offices.
Call (212) 249-9888
4PM till ?
Seven days
Japanese
Swedish
French
RECEPTIONIST
AND ATTRACTIVE GIRLS FOR NEW LEISURE SPA
Fantastic opportunity
Call
(212) 661-3217
days 10-12
FOR THE MOST VALUE
Visit us, Andrea and Judy. It will cost you less than most other places, and we're even worth more than some of our most expensive competition. Our love to please sets us apart from the others. We admit that if you make enough phone calls you'll find other places just as inexpensive as us. But nobody realizes better than we do that you visit us to feel good. We care, and enjoy using our attractive bodies to make YOU feel as good as you are capable of.
That's more than we can say for the hardened bitches. We're not going to make any claims we can't deliver on. You see enough of that in some of the other ads.
(212) 532-8225
Andrea & Judy Absolute Privacy AROUND THE CLOCK
SERVICE
Call ME when everyone else is sleeping. I love working late and you'll love my work.
ASK FOR RENEE
(212) 752-4173
IF IT FEELS GOOD ...
... then do it! Once if it overwhelms you, or twice if you're in the mood. What's important, though, is that you live for enjoyment, and enjoy to your potential. Sensual fulfillment is the last remaining barrier to total liberation. If you've got the urge to be with an uninhibited and truly alive young lady who enjoys her own pleasures so much that she can help YOU reach new heights, call me.
DORRIS
(212) 532-8224
Mon.-Sat. 11am to 10pm
YOUNG
NUDE MODELS
WANTED
... to service discerning executives. Must be beautiful and have a sweet disposition. Intelligence is also a requirement.
Five-day week, six-hour day. $500 a week minimum guaranteed. Excellent working conditions.
Air Conditioned
Call (212) 734-4258
Mon. thru Sat. 11am - 11pm
GROOVY YOUNG GAL
39-24-37
I'm a singer with a Rock Group and into interpretive dancing. Can you imagine the poses I can create? While we groove together.
For app't. call
CAROL at (212) PL 1-7737
HI, I'M TRICIA
I'm a gorgeous 19-year-old blue-eyed blonde with a body Venus herself would envy. I have a very petite figure with perfectly shaped pointed breasts that are tipped with erect ruby nipples. I have a very small waist and beautifully shaped hips and a flat stomach that leads to a pair of long, shapely legs. Between these legs lie the most intimate possession that a woman can give to a man. Beneath a covering of silky fur, two pink moist lips enclose my grotto of ecstasy. It has an aching need to be kissed, to be explored, to be entered, to be filled; and in return I would like to engulf your manhood and raise both of us to infinite heights of orgasmic delight. Please call me in my air-conditioned private apartment so that we can both enjoy a true sensual experience.
My private apt. Mon.-Sat. (212) 734-4288 11am-11pm
Girls Wanted
FOR HIGH CLASS
EAST SIDE STUDIO
Part Time / Full Time
Earn up to $1000 per week
Call Carl (212) 687-1730
or
J. R. (212) 752-4644
HI, I'M CHRISTINA
I come from Finland, the land of the midnight sun, where we have 6 months of daylight & 6 months of night. You can guess what we do on those long, long nights. Men who have tried a Finnish girl will swear that we are the best lovers in the world. We should be, we sure have enough time to practice. I'm a very beautiful, slim 19-year-old with natural red hair & silky, ivory colored skin that is a sensuous delight just to touch. Please call me in my very luxurious, air-conditioned apartment & I guarantee you that you will be a confirmed devotee of Finnish girls for the rest of your life.
Mon. thru Sat. 11am to 11pm
my private number (212) 734-4258
GOLDEN DREAMS BECOME GOLDEN SHOWERS as your fantasies come to life
CALL CONNIE
VO 7-1393
GENTLEMEN
Anything you do in life should be FIRST CLASS. For the best looking faces and services in town,
Call MS. CASTLE
(212) RH 1-2494
7 Days
We will accept hotel, residential and office calls in Manhattan exclusively.
GENTLEMEN
Anything you do in life should be FIRST CLASS. For the best looking faces and services in town,
Call MS. CASTLE
(212) RH 1-2494
7 Days
We will accept hotel, residential and office calls in Manhattan exclusively.
I'M A YOUNG
BEAUTIFUL BRUNETTE
39-24-37
A teacher in the arts of KAMA SUTRA looking for eager students. For a COMPLETELY satisfying lesson,
CALL DARLENE
(212) 679-4904
I'M JUST A SUCKER
When it comes to loving men, I go all soft inside. Maybe it's because my large breasts are oversensitive, and a man's touch just thrills me so. Or because my soft woman's mound moistens exquisitely just thinking of lying naked with a passionate man in me. Or my mouth, which feels empty without something hard and strong inside, pressing warmly as I surround it with knowing tongue and moist lips. There is one thing I dislike, though, and that's being alone. So why not keep me company?
You won't be sorry.
Call Betty (212) 255-9121
FLO
Where EVERYTHING and ANYTHING goes!
at your place...or mine
11 A.M. to 11 P.M.
(212) 582-4428
ORIENTAL FLOWER
I'm tiny and gentle, with large bouncy breasts, very unusual for an oriental girl. In China where I was born, women respect men and are taught to serve and please. If a shy oriental flower appeals to you, call me at (212) 691-7803
I AM CALLED YOSHI
Do you have an extra hour with nothing to do?
My Name is Jenny
And you can do it with me. My number is
(212) MU 8-5074
I'M TWILA
of the "anything that feels that good can't be bad" generation. My generation is also called by the name of natural—soft & downy hair, everywhere, that's all I wear; unhurried—the faster things move, the slower I like to take it; honest—when I come I really come & when I go I go free
—I'm supple & omnipresent all over; far out—not very, a phone call away.
Absolute Privacy Mon.-Sat.
(212) 421-3758 11am-11pm
LIBERAL ARTS STUDENT
Who is working her way through college, seeks the pleasure of your company.
DEBBIE
(212) 689-8102
BE NURSED INTO SUBMISSION
While shamefully imprisoned in my luxurious dungeon
Call Sultry
(212) 867-1366
ON YOUR KNEES
and worship this DEMANDING goddess—
Or suffer humility as ONLY I can give it!
Sabrina
(212) 867-1393
DOMINANT & DEGRADING
Enemas for pleasure
Golden showers for fun
CALL WANDA NOW
7 days
(212) OR 9-4904
SCOTT versatile young male french or greek poses evenings
(212) 249-8607
WANTED HIGH CLASS MODELS
For luxury clientele. Must be hip & intellectual. No experience required, will train. Excellent pay & working conditions.
(212) 421-3758
(212) 421-3719
(212) 421-3766
Mon.-Sat. 12-8
MEN
Young man available for your type of massage Come get it on
(212) 889-6252 (212) 889-6252
GROWING UP JEWISH
(in the Bronx) Listen, in my neighborhood, the mothers were all full of advice on how to make the boys like you. "Smile," they told me. "Dress nice, be sexy, but always a lady. And, always do your best to please." When I discovered sex, I added a few tricks of my own, in the back seats of Buicks before going home after high school dances. "What a wonderful girl, she's so good," the yentas would whisper as I walked past them. They should only know the half of it. Now I'm 20, living on Manhattan's East Side, and want to show the world that a full-bodied Jewish girl from the Bronx is the best there is.
Molly, till 11pm
(212) LE 2-8224
PASSIONATE PRINCESS...
I'm really not a princess, but I was a Homecoming Queen. I'd like to show you how I consoled football players when they were down. Visit my private apartment every day from 11 AM to 2 AM
(212) 889-0879
VERY HANDSOME YOUNG STUDENT
I'm 20, have a 29" waist, dark hair, trim build and very well hung. I love to please and am versatile. Ultra luxurious studio, midtown.
RON
My Private Phone (212) 541-5559
JULIE'S SCHOOL FOR EROTIC ENGLISH ENJOYMENT
(212) 683-8182
LIBERAL YOUNG COLLEGE GIRL available for modeling in her private apartment call SUZY at
(212) 679-4120
SMILE WHEN YOU THINK OF ME
I'm the one who liked you. I remembered your name, even noticed when you changed your cologne, and all the "special" little things you like to do. I know you're not in love with me, however often you love me, but do you mind if I pretend? My name is Betty and I speak ALL the Romance languages.
My Number Is
(212) 691-7803

WEST SIDE STORY
Have you had the feeling a miracle would happen? Well, now it has. A private apartment for you to relax in and unwind your weary day with a host of beautiful models to please and pamper you. Our prices are the lowest around, and our location? Right in the heart of the garment center, one short block from Penn Station. So now, you can have East Side elegance with West Side convenience. Call us, and you'll be glad you did.
(212) 279-7223
Mon.-Fri. Appt. only

PRETTY BLACK MS. will model in complete privacy of her residence 6 days 11 am to 9 pm (No Sundays)
(212) 369-6595

CANDY DOMINANT
$9.00 encounter
THE PINK PUSSY CAT
200 E. 14 St. 533-5719 (with ad)

SUSAN
New York State Licensed
40th & Madison
Attractive European masseuse, will relax you with a soothing reliable massage. Moderate prices. Respectable building. Also available for hotel guests of excellent standing.
(212) MU 4-3309
(212)274-1749
11:30-7:30 Mon.-Sat.

EDDIE
Fabulous French Model
Athletic Body
5'9" - 155 - 30" waist - 42" chest
Complete Satisfaction
Midtown 1pm-1am
(212)
565-5829
GROOVY RUGGED GUY
poses nude. Masculine, athletic physique. Versatile & cooperative. Phone evenings after 6 p.m.
BRAD
(212) 838-9054
ROB
(formerly of 24th & 2nd; recently of Boston)
RETURNS!
Friendly, easy-going guy, adaptable, experienced, receptive, offers complete sessions to "nice-type" men. Am good-looking male student, age 23, 150 lbs., cooperative and versatile. Yes, I have, out of necessity, set competitive rates, but I don't have $$ dollar signs $$ in my eyes and am not a robot.
MEN ONLY—CALL ANYTIME
ROB (212) 924-1632
HANDSOME,
ATHLETIC,
Well-Endowed
NUDE MODEL TIM
(212) PL 2-7914
"HONEYSUCKLE'S MONTHLY" bях mail $2. each
HI, I'M CINDY
I am a young, extremely beautiful 18-year-old girl new in the city. I have very long silky natural blonde hair that cascades over my firm pointy breasts. I have a face like an angel with beautiful big green eyes and a look of innocence and sweetness that would completely mislead you as to how sensuous I really am. I weigh a petite 110 lbs. and stand 5'5" tall with the perfect proportions of 35-22-35. As you can tell by my measurements I have a very small waist with flaring feminine hips. My real pride, however, is my long sexy legs and the silky golden down that nestles between them. I love to explore the ways of love, to savor the sensation of my nipples rubbing on a man's chest and his gentle caresses on every intimate part of my body. In this day and age women try to be something different from what they were born, but I am different. I revel in being a woman, I love feminine clothes, I love to be cuddled, I love to be told that I am beautiful, and I love to be protected. I think being a woman is the most wonderful thing in the world. So let me prove it to you by calling me in my private East Side apartment and making a date to visit me.
My private phone Mon.-Sat.
(212) 861-2373 11am-11pm
I specialize in pleasing
THE BUSY EXEC
One sensual hour of charisma with me will send your spirits soaring and leave you with a glowing sensation.
Call and discover the magic of charisma.
Lilli (212) PL9-5432
Out of Town, Welcome.
Luxurious East 50's privacy.
Call Early or Late • Weekends too.
24 hour doorman service.
SUBSCRIBE TO SCREW
WELL ENDOWED
GUY WILL POSE NUDE Versatile
RYDER
(212) 249-0733
WANTED
ATTRACTIVE MODELS
... for high-class clientele. Must also be intelligent and friendly.
Excellent working conditions
Call (212) 675-0779
18 YEARS OLD
GOING ON 16
We are in the age of youth & wholesomeness & it is my youth that makes my super thick bush seem so outrageous when laid out against a body so young & fair & it is my wholesomeness that makes my budding breasts divinely raised rings of red flesh I'm sure you don't want a 19-year-old going on 40, ex-street walker, held together by a black girdle & garter belt, but do desire someone who is so pure & tender that nobody believes she's a day over 16, even though she's 18. If I seem to be what you're looking for, call.
Mon.-Sat. 11am - 11pm
WAITING FOR YOU
In the bath, when the slippery hard soap bar slips through my hand and falls through my legs, I feel sensations that probably you could give me. After the shower I look in the mirror at my dripping breasts and wet curly hair and await your call. If you want not to be alone tonight—even for a little while—call me. I'm waiting for a man to love. My name is AQUA, and I'm dripping wet, waiting.
Call me at
(212) 679-4120
WOMEN ONLY PLEASE!

Sexy, athletic male, ready and willing to pose for you. I'm 24 years old, 6'2", and very eager to please. I've just the touch for a discriminating woman.
Call Paul
(212) 929-3839
WOMEN ONLY PLEASE!

11 a.m. - 11 p.m.
CRISTIAN
Versatile Young Male
Handsome, Trim Build
(212) 362-7526
"DYNAMIC DUO"
Two young and beautiful bisexual gals looking to please you, while they please each other.
SHARON & KAREN
For appointment call
(212) 679-4055
STOP!!!
YOU NEED LOOK NO FURTHER
If it’s the best your money can buy it’s waiting for you right here. You will enjoy the ultimate delight that only our tender but experienced hands and bodies can bestow upon you. Total satisfaction and relaxation are assured in beautiful private surroundings. Free refreshments served.

Phone for Appointment
11 a.m. to 11 p.m.
(212) 685-3908
(212) 685-0192
Models Wanted
NAUGHTY LADY
A hundred years ago I would have been called a "wicked woman," a "piece of baggage," a "tramp." Why? Because I love sex and I show it. I move and dress to please a man and I delight in bodily sensations. The sensuous warmth of skin on skin, hot breath panting, horny bodies pushing and straining, melding and fusing into one. I'm tall and slender, with perfect breasts and long blond hair and the sense to know where I belong. Right here, Loving You.
My name is Peg
My number is (212) 691-7803
I'M JUST A LONELY GIRL COME fill my hour of need.
Make me your doll.
Call me Barbie
PAGE 46 NOVEMBER 18, 1974

Just like Mommy used to do — over my knee for a warm gratifying enema.
Call NURSE NANCY
(212) OV 8-5074

EX-PLAYBOY BUNNY
tired of waiting on tables would like to wait on you.
Call JENNY
(212) MU 3-0979

LUST FOR LIFE
Does your body desire a vacation? Well I'm the ticket that will get you there. Cindy is my name and I'm just waiting to be explored, just yearning to be discovered. I'm a young woman, sweet and gentle, and in this cold world I've learned to love the ones who please me. Call me in my private East Side apt. and remember, my talents are only exceeded by my potential.
(212) 532-8363

BLACK STOCKING PARADE
Golden showers, colonic and enemas, 5" spike heels, leather, bondage. Submissive gals, mirrors, TV fetish clothes.
The range is immense
Call (212) 725-1803
Attractive ladies needed for work "HURRY BACK"
All this
What do
whips, belts,
collars, mask,
boots, leashes,
undies, wigs,
paddles, enemas bondage and more.
What do
I mean?
Call
(212)
PA 5-2389

Beginners welcome 11:30-10pm
THIS IS THE PLACE for THE MAN OF DISTINCTION Beautiful young models to serve you in complete privacy. Phone for appointment 11 am to 11 pm. (212) MU 5-0192
(212) MU 5-3908
Wigs and Sundries
DANA ESCORT SERVICE for the Executive
11AM to 11 PM.
(212) LT 2-4428
Beautiful Young French Girl
Hi, my name is Gigi & I enjoy being French & I enjoy it even more doing it. My warm, full, soft lips love to kiss, caress & engulf, while my pink, velvety tongue explores & probes every inch of hardness, until its loving ministrations are rewarded. Of course, while I'm doing this I would like to have the same loving care bestowed upon me. Feelings that are reciprocated are multiplied more than twofold. So if you want to enjoy an ultimate delight with an absolutely beautiful 19-yr.-old girl, call me in my luxurious air conditioned townhouse.
Mon. thru Sat. 11 am to 11 pm
my private no. (212) 734-4288
DOMINANT AND SUBMISSIVE FEMALES
Help 111718 out your innermost fantasies. Have fun in our daring, modern, fabulous female costumes. Enema experience, leather and all latest paraphernalia. Professionals, blue collar workers, actors, businessmen, etc. Enjoy our services by unleashing pent-up tensions and anxieties in the privacy of our fantasy land. Exclusive Manhattan location. Appt. only
(212) 799-8806
Special Treatment for our Regulars
LOVE BUG
That's the name my intimate acquaintances know me by, and I'm just burning to share my excesses of love and desire with you. Come pay me a visit and you can be my LOVE BUG!
Call after 11 AM.
(212) TV 9-0879
BRIGHT, ATTRACTIVE YOUNG GIRL
WANTED
for position in private apartment. Must be liberal and friendly. High earnings for a special girl. Call for interview—11 to 11.
(212) 685-7973
"GENTLEMEN"
Take time to enjoy a little diversion with me, Terri, a very pretty & lovely ex-airline hostess with the mostess. My private residence or your hotel.
(212) 595-4103
VIVA of Beverly Hills
I have the finest front lawn in Southern California. It's all embracing, dazzling, appetizing, and penetrating; Encircling you, alluring you, electrifying you, and melting you into unspeakable rapture and actions. But even this is but Dessert when compared to the rest of my repast. Mon.-Sat. 11AM-11PM (212) 421-3758
By appointment only
Models ad section closes Thursday at 6:00. Have your ads in early!
SEX MACHINE
Hi! I'm Liz, and I'm a real Manhattan doll, a satin doll. I love the good life and adore the good men. To get what I want, I've got to use what I've got. I ooze with sensuality and burn with passion. I'm a lady of the night, filled with unforsaken habits—a sex machine. Call me in my private luxury apartment. Come to me and I'll make you forget the rest.
(212) 279-7222
Mon.-Fri. Appt. only
ARE YOU NEW IN TOWN?
Don't go to the United Nations, come to me. I know all the cultures, in my private apartment.
LISA
(212) OR 9-4120
YOUNG HIGH SCHOOL TEACHER
Can't make out with students — available for extra-curricular activities after 3 p.m.
Call Miss Barton at
(212) MU 9-8414
MY NAME IS ALEXIS
... and I was born in romantic Greece. I don't understand how American girls can say "it hurts" when a lusty man wants to cuddle her fanny "in that special way." To me it's very exciting. If you think it's exciting too, call me at my private number. Mon.-Sat. 11 am-11pm
(212) 685-7972
TWO BEAUTIFUL YOUNG COLLEGE GIRLS
we are eager to please you—
alone or together.
Call (212) PL 1-7737
and ask for SANDEE or CANDEE
HI, I'M SHERRY
I'm a very sexy 18-yr.-old girl with the cutest face and figure you have ever seen.
My petite figure is accentuated by my breasts which are so perfectly shaped and firm that they look like they were sculpted out of the finest white marble. Their ruby tips stand out in anticipation of a man's soft caresses. My whole body was made for loving. Just the thought of a man's gentle hands touching my most intimate parts sends a tingling sensation up my spine until I can not wait any longer for the ultimate release. Please call me in my luxurious East Side apartment and we can explore heaven's delights together.
My private apt. Mon.-Sat.
(212) 861-2373 11am-11pm
DOUBLE EXCITEMENT
Turn on by watching Dianne and Melissa excite each other.
And for a real double treat—join them!
For an appointment, call
(212) 688-5074
IS IT TRUE?
What they say about Southern girls?
That they really ENJOY loving a man? Any man can tell, it's how she kisses, and the way her breasts quiver, the sweet sigh when you touch her. And afterwards, how she lingers to talk and touch and maybe love again. Too good to be true? Try me, I'll make you a believer. For some down-home eatin' call Terry at
(212) MU 5-7971
MONICA SWEET
(212) 759-8816 (212)759-8411
Screw
Your Friend
For Xmas
SCREW
You may think you’re unique in your depravity and decadence, but most of your friends are probably just as foul. So this is the time to share with them the most personal and unique gift of all. No, not a dose of the clap, but a subscription to SCREW!

Why? "Misery loves company" is one reason, but the real truth is that SCREW is the most emulated, loved, hated, and widely discussed newspaper since Christ first saw sunlight in the manure-filled stable in which he was born.

Send all your friends a SCREW subscription and we’ll include a very clever card saying that you thought low enough of them to give this truly unique gift. This is as personalized a memento of your affection as an embossed contraceptive.

Your friends will thrive on SCREW in the same way you do because they will learn (1) where the action is, (2) how to get into the action, (3) if the action is worthwhile, (4) if the action is meaningful, and (5) if the action is contagious.

In addition to getting your rocks off from these activities, you’ll also be reading the most irreverent and Rabelaisian newspaper permitted to be published in the world.

The most up-to-date sex paper your money can buy. On-the-spot coverage of every important sex event and happening.

Every issue of SCREW contains Mail Order Madness, the best known and most widely read sexual mail-order column in the business. Dirty Diversions, the revolutionary film review column by Al Goldstein, who developed the notorious Peter-Meter.

SCREW offers the most varied and talked-about personal column—Baubles and Balls—of any newspaper.

Rush your money for your own SCREW subscription and/or renewal, and for the most benevolent gift you can bestow upon your friends and enemies.

SCREW YOURSELF

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER: 11 issues for $9.95...
26 issues for...$17 via 3rd class mail or...$25 via 1st class mail.
52 issues for...$32 via 3rd class mail or...$47 via 1st class mail.
As a new subscriber, I am enclosing one buck extra ($1) for the following 25 word (10¢ per additional word) ad to appear in Baubles and Balls.
I certify by my signature that I am over 18
Make check or money order payable to: Milky Way Productions, Inc.

Mail to:
Subscription Dept., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, N.Y. 10011.
Name
Address Apt. No.
City State & Zip
All subscriptions mailed in plain brown envelope. Please allow several weeks for subscription to be processed. We cannot guarantee 3rd class delivery.

SCREW A FRIEND
SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER: 11 issues for $9.95...
26 issues for...$17 via 3rd class mail or...$25 via 1st class mail.
52 issues for...$32 via 3rd class mail or...$47 via 1st class mail.
Please send a gift subscription of SCREW to my friend:
Address Apt. No.
City State & Zip
I certify by my signature that
The person receiving the gift is over 18
Make check or money order payable to: Milky Way Productions, Inc.
Mail to:
Subscription Dept., P.O. Box 432, Old Chelsea Station, New York, N.Y. 10011.
All subscriptions mailed in plain brown envelope. Please allow several weeks for subscription to be processed. We cannot guarantee 3rd class delivery.
SPECIAL OFFER FOR SCREW READERS
Starting this week, for a limited time only, you now can enjoy some of the World’s Greatest Skin Flicks absolutely FREE during your Session at SPARTACUS SPA’s.
Imagine, You and Your Spartacus Girl alone in your Private Room—You’re watching Fantastic Flicks while she’s caressing You and anointing your body with precious Oils from the Orient.
Don’t miss out! Come in today, and ask for the Special Film Offer you read about in SCREW.

NEEDLE-ACTION SHOWERS SATISFYING BODY RUBS
MINERAL ROCK SAUNA RELAX IN COMPLETE PRIVACY
THE MOST FANTASTIC PLACES IN TOWN!

Come do your thing at the Spartacus Spa that suits your mood. Slip back into the past at Spartacus I, where our Victorian Town House awaits you. The Girls at Spartacus I will make you feel as if you were Diamond Jim himself. Escape into the future with the modern luxury of Spartacus II. Relax, and enjoy beautiful Girls that could turn-on James Bond. And, you don’t have to be Diamond Jim or Goldfinger to enjoy the Total Spartacus Experience. You’ll find that the cost is surprisingly low.
The atmosphere at Spartacus I & II may be different, but, you’ll find that both are totally dedicated to serving your every need. If you’re tired of chasing all over Town, and going to bed with a Magazine; If you’re tired of being ripped-off; If you want total safety and complete privacy; If you’re looking for Girls whose only desire is to serve you—not castrate you! Spartacus is the place for you!

SPARTACUS SPA’S . . . the Places you’ve always dreamed of.

SPARTACUS
OPEN 24 HOURS A DAY • 7 DAYS A WEEK • COMPLETELY AIR-CONDITIONED
MAJOR CREDIT CARDS
SCREW’S HIGHEST RATING
I
243 EAST 53rd STREET
(Between 2nd & 3rd Aves.)
759-1910
8 EAST 36th STREET
(Between Madison & 5th Aves.)
725-5650
II
The Idea Lecture (In Memory of David Antin)
There are a hundred of you just sitting here watching me type as I set up my laptop for this lecture.

Is there anything worse than watching somebody stare at their computer?

It’s not that much different when, often these days, you go to a concert and watch somebody mix on their laptop, which is as exciting as watching somebody check their email, which can be pretty exciting, except that they’re not checking their email—they’re staring at their laptop, and all you can see is the screen’s glow on their face.

But think of how much better it would be if that performer were actually checking their email while the music was streaming, and you could watch the whole thing on a screen projected behind them, how intimate and embarrassing and revealing it could be.

I remember when laptops were introduced as the only instrument on the stage in the concert hall.

It was around 1995 and I went to see a classical electronic music composer at a proper concert hall on Manhattan’s upper West Side and I swear, for nearly two hours, we stared at him staring at his laptop.

Perhaps the sounds were great—I can’t remember—but I do recall thinking that there was no need to have a human onstage for this music.

He was nothing great to look at either, a balding, middle-aged, overweight guy dressed in a tacky Hawaiian shirt.

That’s why it’s so important to realize that when you get up in front of people, you are always performing.

You need to be in costume, completely self-conscious and hyperaware of your presence.

There’s a feeling that one’s onstage presence should be truly authentic, but of course it’s anything but.

It’s an act.

If I was being authentic right now, you’d see me bitching at my kids, or paying my electric bill, and you certainly didn’t come here for that.

You came here to see me do my act—yes, poets do have acts—which is in some ways authentic, and in other ways completely artificial.

You are seeing me giving an ideal lecture by my ideal self.

I wish I could always be like this.

Rock musicians are really good at this.

Watch some videos of, say, Led Zeppelin or The Rolling Stones from the early seventies and you’ll see what I mean.

They’re so authentically inauthentic that they spawned legions of fans who imitated the authenticity of their style, resulting in an astonishingly convincing inauthentic authenticity.

And later on, even when it goes unauthentically authentic, it shifts, becoming newly authentically inauthentic.

I’m thinking of Nirvana’s grunge style, which reclaimed the dregs of Led Zeppelin’s artifice and turned it inside out, making it insincerely authentic.

But the grunge fans found no insincerity in it; by de-glamming, they reclaimed authenticity.

It’s terribly complicated.

But most poets, somehow, don’t bother with these gymnastics.
They feel the need to present an unchecked ‘real’ or ‘authentic’ self, so they get up in front of people in a stained t-shirt, ill-fitting jeans, and bad shoes, and mumble through their poems.

Perhaps you might think that they were being grunge devotees, or maybe anti-performative, but what they’re really doing is being lazy.

They’re neither authentic nor artificial; they’re just flat and unconsidered.

This is why I feel that if it’s not pretentious or self-conscious I don’t trust it.

But getting back to my sitting here and typing in front of you, it reminds me of my book Soliloquy, which consisted of every word I spoke for a week in 1997 from the moment I woke up on a Monday morning, until the moment I went to sleep the following Sunday night.

I transcribed it, completely unedited.

It was about four or five hundred pages long, and I said almost nothing of value.

It was really an exercise in humiliation.

The way I did it was with just a little microcassette recorder tucked into my pocket, that was connected to a voice-activated microphone, which I wore hidden in my shirt.

When I spoke, it recorded.

Around that same time, I had a related idea.

I wanted to connect my laptop to a screen in Times Square, so that everything I typed or did on my it for an entire year would be publicly displayed—emails I wrote, online banking statements I viewed, porn I watched, every time I self-Googled—although Google was not yet around, but you know what I mean—manuscripts
I was working on, and so forth.

That would’ve been the most intimate, revealing, humiliating, and risqué thing I could’ve done.

It never worked out.

I don’t think that it was technically possible at that time, and beyond that, no one in Times Square had any interest in some unknown, young poet livestreaming their life on the crossroads of the world.

Looking back on it, I was inspired by Felix Gonzalez-Torres’s poignant public art piece from around 1990, which was nothing more than a static black and white billboard-sized photograph of a bed that had just been slept in by two people, reputedly Gonzalez-Torres and his lover, both of whom later died of AIDS.

You could literally see the imprints of their heads on the pillows.

The idea was to bring the most intimate space,
the bedroom, into the most public space, the street.

There are some great documentary photographs of that piece.

One that sticks in my mind is what appears to be a crowded on-ramp to a bridge in the middle of rush hour.

Cars are stalled, the smog is dense, and there is this billboard of a just slept-in bed presiding over the whole affair.

It’s a better version of one of those billboards that you see on crowded highways that say, ‘If you lived here, you’d be home by now.’

So twenty years passed and in 2016, I decided to do Soliloquy again for its twentieth anniversary.

What would my regular speech look like twenty years down the line?

So much has changed in my life that would make for a completely new type of book.

So I tried and I failed.

First of all, the technology still had not yet arrived where you could just speak and everything you said would be automatically turned into text and posted on the web in real time, which was my dream.

Even today, when I speak to my phone, it kind of gets it right, but it mostly gets it wrong.

And because of the sensitive touch screen, it clicked off and much of what I said wasn’t actually recorded.

Finally, about five days into it, I realized that I had accidentally deleted all but one day.

The one day that was left was Tuesday, the day I see my therapist.

I secretly taped my therapy session.

Listening back to that day, the most interesting part was that one hour.

So after the project failed, I decided that I would go into my therapy session every Tuesday afternoon, secretly tape it, and transcribe exactly what I said as a new project.

I did that for about eight weeks, after which I thought it would be a good part of therapy to tell my therapist about what I had been doing.

As might be expected, he freaked out and accused me of treason, of exploiting an intimate and ephemeral space, all for an artwork.

But, I responded, that is exactly what I do in my artwork, to which he replied, yes, that is exactly your problem.

Writing on a mobile device is in some ways more, and in other ways less work than traditional transcription.

I can’t stand typing on a mobile keyboard because my fingers are too big and clumsy.

But it’s not much better when I speak into voice recognition, because I’ve got to go back in and correct it.

And beyond that, even if I’m speaking voice to text, I have to say the word ‘period’ when I want to end a sentence, the word ‘comma,’ when I want to put in a pause, and ‘new paragraph,’ when I want a line break.

Moreover, sometimes the phone understands ‘comma’ and ‘period’ and ‘question mark,’ but just as often it doesn’t.

So, if I’m asking a question like, ‘What time do you want to have lunch today question mark,’ I actually get a sentence back that says ‘What time do you want to have lunch today question mark’ and then I feel stupid when I’ve got to go back in and make the words ‘question mark’ into an actual question mark, to which my son, who is eleven, says to me: ‘But Dad, why do you use question marks when you type texts?’ which is a good question.

I find it very strange when people on social media post questions as statements, without question marks, and you know it’s a question but it appears to be a statement, which is very disconcerting.

In the future, people will simply stop using punctuation altogether.

Punctuation was one of the first things to be attacked by the modernists.

John Cage, who was an anarchist, saw syntax as the government of language, with the punctuation marks as policemen.

Adorno claimed that all sorts of authoritarian structures like traffic signals, were modeled on punctuation.

He felt exclamation points to be red lights; colons, green; and dashes yellow.

And Gertrude Stein felt that possessive apostrophes were, well, too possessive, strangling the letters they were attached to.

But the most extreme punctuation I ever encountered was by an American ultra-modernist writer—his name escapes me now—who, in the 1920s, wrote an entire novel where he inserted exclamation points in between each and every letter.
I remember that it was impossible to read.

I suspect that if you removed the exclamation points you’d find a conventional narrative, but of course nobody was going to do that.

I have no idea what he was trying to do, but I like to fantasize.

Wouldn’t it have been great if he took, say, a boring novel by a boring writer and simply inserted exclamation points in between each and every letter and published it under his own name?

There’s a great idea.

Somebody should actually do that with, say, a Jonathan Franzen novel.

That would make it so much more exciting—and so much more boring.

It reminds me of a piece by a composer I once knew who took a really thorny atonal Schoenberg composition, erased the notation for sharps and flats, then signed his own name to it.

When he played it back, it sounded exactly like new age music, blandly tonal and stupidly melodic.

With one simple gesture, he completely defanged Schoenberg.

I think that the guy who wrote the exclamation point book wanted to make people aware that language is material, that words have physical qualities as well as semantic ones—something we tend forget in day-to-day life.

He might’ve also been listening to the sound of technology—perhaps the noise of telegrams—and trying to track it onto literature.

In those days, when you wrote a telegram, all punctuation marks cost extra money except for STOP, which for some reason was free.

Telegrams became unpunctuated except for the STOP, which became a catchall punctuation mark: a comma, colon, semi-colon, dash, em dash, question mark, and period all in one.
It might’ve even become an exclamation point too.

People just wanted to save money and had no problem bending language in order to do so.

Maybe the guy who wrote the exclamation point book was saying fuck you to the telegram and fuck you to the cost of punctuation.

Remember, back then, words cost a lot of money to print.

Inadvertently, though, he triggered another expensive situation.

At a time when many books were hand-set with lead type, I’m sure that the shop setting the book didn’t have enough exclamation points to insert between each and every letter.

If you took, say, Ernest Hemingway’s A Farewell to Arms and inserted exclamation points in between each and every letter, you’d need 494,177 exclamation points.

And nobody had that many exclamation points.

What did they do? Did they buy more?

That would’ve been a shitload of money.

And then, what would they possibly do with them after they finished setting the book?

I imagine that they’d be hard to sell en masse.

Who needs nearly half a million lead exclamation points?

Maybe they sold them as scrap metal and melted them down and made new letters from them, the ones that everyone wanted instead of a bunch of exclamation points that no one wanted.

Which reminds me of when, a few years ago in the U.S., when gas prices hit the $5 mark and they didn’t have enough 5’s for their plastic price displays, so they started using S’s instead, which they had plenty of.

And when things got really desperate, they turned 2’s upside down and used them.
It always strikes me as strange that, still today, in most American gas stations, they have plastic letters for prices, not LED screens, where all letters and numbers are in perpetual supply.

Nobody ever runs out of LED letters.

Which reminds me of when ISIS destroyed the ancient city of Palmyra.

While the world watched in horror, one local guy, when asked about the devastation just shrugged and said, these stones have been knocked down so many times before.

We’ll just put them back together like they always have been.

It reminds me of letters and words.

All our words are used—ancient, and worn, stacked and demolished—then reassembled in both very new and very old ways.

There’s no need to create more; a giant freely circulating stockpile exists, so we really don’t need to worry about either paying outrageous prices for them or running out of words any time soon.

Today we have an endless supply of letters and numbers—we’re drowning in language—which can start to feel like an embarrassment of riches.

Sometimes, I feel guilty about how much language I consume, so guilty that I sometimes actually reuse notes in my notes app on my iPhone instead of making new ones.

I’ll just erase everything that’s on my current note and write new text into it.

Not because it’s easy—it takes a lot more work to delete old text; it would be much easier just tossing it out and cracking a new one—but because it feels more, what—ecological.

This is hard wired into me.

I was a kid during the energy crisis of the seventies, when we were not permitted to leave a room with a light on.
To this day, when I brush my teeth,
I turn the water on and off between rinses.

I know.

It’s crazy.

But it all somehow relates back to my need to cherish resources rather than to waste them, which is one of the reasons I prefer to use other people’s words rather than my own.

I’d rather recycle them.

Appropriation feels more ecologically sound than having to invent your own words anew each time.

And then when you’re done, you can toss them back into the recycle bin so someone else can use them once again.

Like the exclamation point guy who was listening to telegrams, I’m listening to the connections between modernism and the digital, between Twitter and the telegram.

So while the average bro trolling around on Twitter probably knows nor cares very little about modernism, he’s unconsciously hard-wired to it.

That’s funny to think about,
but just think of the way that URLs or hashtags look exactly like all those compound words in James Joyce’s Finnegans Wake.

Reading has always been a sort of parsing but hashtags take it to a new level.

Reading hashtags is a two-step process.

Because they have no spaces, you first have to mentally add them before you can read them.

When I see a hashtag, I parse it, breaking down an unfathomable-looking beast of a word into its constituent parts until it becomes legible, which is exactly the way
Joyce challenged us read his book.

We’ve learned to read long hashtags so well that at this point, we don’t even bother to capitalize the words in them anymore the way we once did.
Now small letters just run into one another.

It’s so strange to think that on the internet, in the twenty-first century, we’re reading the way James Joyce predicted we would eighty years ago.

While URLs and hashtags are airless, the web itself is full of gaps, riddled with holes.

We like to think that the web is instantaneous—and in some cases, such as fiber optics, I’m told it is—but for most of us, it’s really not.

Think of the interval between the time you dial someone on your phone and the time it takes to start ringing.

Or the interval between sending a text and getting a response.

Or the interval between clicking on a link, and when your web page actually loads.

Or the interval it takes for a video to buffer.

There’s even an ecology of interval signs: the loading symbol that looks like a white clock dial which ticks away in a circle, or that spinning beach ball of death when your browser is hung, or that little wristwatch, with its hands ticking away the time.

But my very favorite is those three bouncing dots you see when you text someone and someone is typing back at you.

It’s really creepy.

You’re actually feeling another person’s presence.

And you hang in that interval, trying to anticipate what is coming, already forming your own response to a text you haven’t even read yet.

It’s superanticipatory and very nineteenth-century.

We’ve all become mind-readers, soothsayers, and psychics.

The web has really become a giant electronic Ouija board.

Who knew that in the 21st century, the occult would be back?

But the web is just a mirror of what happens in real life.
Look at what’s happening here.

I’m feeling bad about speaking English to a hundred people for whom English is not their first language.

I’m really self-conscious of this so I’m trying my hardest to speak simply, slowly, and clearly so that you’ll be able to understand what I’m saying, but still, I’m not entirely sure you’re really understanding me.

There’s no way of knowing.

You appear to be understanding what I’m saying: you’re nodding your heads, and laughing at my bad jokes, so I think you’re getting some of it, but I’m not sure you’re getting all of it—at least the way I intend it.

But then again, even when I’m talking to other native English speakers, I sense that they’re not getting all of it exactly the way I intended it either.

In English, I constantly get embroiled in all sorts of fuck-ups, miscommunications, and misunderstandings.

I mean, you would think that the people I love most in the world—my family and my friends—would understand me.

In some ways they do, but in most ways they don’t.

Sometimes, they’re the ones that have the most trouble understanding me, and yet they speak the same language that I do.

If we don’t understand each other, how can I expect a roomful of strangers—for whom English is not their first language—to understand me as I intend it?

In fact, understanding exactly as I intend it never happens.

We’re better on the web in that anticipatory interval, but in real life, we still seem to be saddled with misunderstanding.

Can we see this as being good?
Can we see this moment—a poetry reading—as being a way of embracing our mutual misunderstanding?

After all, hasn’t misunderstanding or ambiguity been the hinge upon which art has swung?

There is no consensus, just interpretation, a conversation that takes disagreement, conflict, and misunderstanding as its basis, one in which we agree to disagree.

Can we extend this lesson into our lives, like this moment?

Could our lack of understanding be a demonstration of the power of poetry?

Instead of trying to solve it, can we learn to accept it and even embrace it?

Then misunderstanding ceases to be a problem and begins to be an opportunity.

This is what I’ve been trying to do with my work for many years, to misunderstand the language that it’s written in.

For years I would begin my readings in non-English speaking countries with a pre-prepared statement that had been translated into the language of the country in which I was reading.

It would start: ‘I am an American poet, and like many Americans, I speak only one language.

When asked to speak to you here, I figured that the last thing that your country (or the rest of the world) needed was more imported American culture (remember the Clash’s I’m So Bored With The U.S.A.).

So, I’ve decided to start my reading in your language, a language that I have never spoken or written.’

And then I would continue to read this longish statement in the worst Spanish or French or Norwegian that anyone’s ever heard, so that even the native speakers of that language couldn’t understand what was supposedly their own language.

I would finish the talk—still in their language—with: ‘I could continue and do the whole reading in your language but I think you get the point.’
After this rough beginning, you can better understand what I’m trying to do with my work: to approximate the utopian situation we find ourselves in at the moment, one of willful ignorance.

Sometimes, when I do a talk in a non-English speaking country, they hire a translator for simultaneous translation, which attempts to reduce the noise and mitigate the ambiguity, but in reality, translation inadvertently adds another sort of noise—the noise of approximation, which is another form of misunderstanding.

No matter how hard we try, we can’t win.

Yet here we are pretending that nothing is wrong.

But nothing is wrong.

When you appropriate someone else’s words, you intentionally misunderstand them.

For one early book, I appropriated the entire short story, “The Rocking Horse Winner,” by D.H. Lawrence, and published it as the last chapter of my book, only because the last syllable of the last word of the story fit in with my conceptual scheme.

To this day, I still haven’t read the story, and I have no plan to.

I took his story and did something he hadn’t intended with it.

It worked—at least, for me it did—and in this way, his story became my story.

Could we see appropriation as literary communism, an acknowledgment that no one owns words, that they are a shared resource?

When I copy other people’s words, I write in English as if it’s foreign to me, with ideas that I don’t invent and sentiments that I don’t share.

I often write things I disagree with, things that disgust me.

It’s really liberating.

No matter what you do with words, whether you write them or find them or steal them—they always mean something.
And depending on what you do with them—where you put them or how you frame them—they have different meanings.

As writers, we try too hard to make meaning, when the material we use is saturated with it.

Even the most abstract uses of language—phonemes and single letters—mean something. No matter how much we hack them or remix them, they still resonate with profound meaning.

Our job as writers is much easier than we think.

Soliloquy had a postscript that went: ‘If every word spoken in New York City daily were somehow to materialize as a snowflake, each day there would be a blizzard.’

I just love the idea of language accumulating, like snow.

Just before I wrote Soliloquy, there was a huge blizzard in New York, one of the worst ever, and when it snows in New York, what they do is they scoop up the snow, load it onto trucks and dump it into the river, where it dissolves, flowing back into the ocean.

And I thought, if speech was materialized as snow, at the end of every day, they would have to do a similar thing with language: they’d collect it, shovel it onto big trucks, and dump it into the river in order to make it melt away into the ocean, and start again the next day.

Which reminds me of Rabelais, and a story he told about a battlefield that was so cold that on the day of the battle, even the sounds of the battle froze and fell to the ground.

And there they lay all winter long until spring, when the frozen sounds began to melt.

And as they melted, the sounds were replayed, not in the order in which they were originally made, but in the order in which they melted.

It was a cacophony.

But certain people on this battlefield picked up these sounds before they melted and brought them into an ice cellar, where they remained frozen for centuries.
When they finally thawed, sounds were heard from six or seven hundred years ago.

Which reminds me of a very dear friend of mine who is a very successful painter and a very wealthy man.

When you make that kind of money, you trade paintings for wine.

But the problem is that he loves wine but his wife doesn’t drink, so his greatest joy is to invite friends over to his house where he starts taking out these incredible bottles, simply because he is just dying to share them with someone.

It’s just the most amazing thing.

And I remember him taking out a bottle of port from the early 1800s.

And it wasn’t the best port that I ever drank, but the idea that I was drinking a liquid from over 200 years ago was really incredible.

I find all of these things very fluid, rife with history.

I find the materiality of liquid, or the materiality of sound, or the materiality of language to be interchangeable, with words taking many forms.

Maybe this is why I love digital language so much.

I love the ways that the digital has liquidated language.

I’ve often thought that the metaphor of the water cycle describes the ways in which language moves through the digital ecosystem, from frozen, solid artifacts like AVIs, to flowing liquid states like torrents.

Sometimes they are slushy, partially frozen and partially melted, like when you’re simultaneously playing an MP3 while it’s seeding a torrent up to the cloud (even the metaphors we use to describe the digital ecosystem are atmospheric and weather-inspired).

I love the idea that like urine, we stream our media.

Like Dali’s watches, when an MP3 plays, it unfurls, melts, loosens, lessens, deflates, and softens.

But no matter how hot my computer gets, it never actually softens, nor does it sweat or wet itself.
I sometimes half expect to pick up my laptop after a long session and find a pool of liquid beneath it.

I’m disappointed to find that it’s bone dry.

It hates water and it hates grease.

Yet its surfaces are slathered with both: morsels of a croissant drop into the crevasses of my keyboard, ground into smaller crumbs each time I punch my keys; specks of saliva fling from my lips and land on my screen, drying there, waiting until I pick them off with my fingernails; desiccated sweat from the heels of my hands create ghostlike washes on either side of my trackpad; stray eyelashes fall between my arrow keys, devoured by my machine’s innards.

If you hold my Android up to the light in just the right way, you can see my swipe pattern, created by the grease from my finger that’s been run in the same shape so many times that it might as well have been channeled into stone.

From time to time, I wipe my pattern away but it reappears moments later, when I run my finger back over it to unlock my phone.

My device’s oleophobic layer sits atop gorilla glass.

Like my skin, it wears thin and dries out, losing its lubrication.

Buckled and cracked, brittle with age, and eaten away by the acidity of my sweat, my Android is in an eternally semi-nude state.

My finger no longer glides, it skitters, resisting my touch rather than courting it.

I reach for a tube of grease and a Q-tip, and with a circular motion, caress its surface.

Newly moistened, my finger glides across its surface like an ice dancer traversing the ice.

On hot summer evenings, driplets of sweat plunge from my brow onto my screen and slither over its rounded edges, saturating its ports.

Lifting my device, I notice my desk is wet.

I wipe it up, then wipe my brow.
My device and I are one.

I paw my keyboard until the letters wear off—always a’s, d’s, s’s, e’s, and t’s —never p’s, u’s, c’s or v’s.

If I continue pounding my machine at this rate,
I won’t have any letters at all, just bare, unadorned keys.

Desperate, I purchase a skin impregnated with a silky smooth lubricant for comfort and sensitivity, so thin, they say, that I won’t even know it’s there.

I unbox it.

Using both hands, I unfurl it over my keyboard, form fitting.

It is powdery and smells like latex.

The next day, I return it to Amazon.

When they ask me why, I tell them that typing feels like having safe sex.

Rust never sleeps.

Flesh to machine,

Pixel to paper, and back again.

I’ll never forget how astonished my grandfather was in the 1970s was when he first saw a fax, which he received from my grandmother who was traveling abroad.

He was stunned: how could someone’s handwriting he knew intimately—had received love letters from—dematerialize, get sent over the phone lines, then reappear as an identical facsimile of what used to arrive in the post in the morning, or on his pillow at night?

People say that technology makes us cold and separates us, but if my grandfather is any example, it’s anything but that.

His reaction to that primitive machine was hyperemotional.

Just think of all the invisible language, rife with emotion, flowing through this room right now—WIFI signals, text messages, radio waves, TV transmissions.

With every breath we take, the air is thick with language.
It’s a wonder we don’t choke on it.

There’s this great moment in the original Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory—the one with Gene Wilder—where Mike Teevee gets teleported from one side of the room to the other.

Willy Wonka explains it like this: ‘You photograph something and the photograph is split up into of millions tiny pieces, and they go whizzing through the air, and down to your TV set where they’re all put together again in the right order. If they can do it with a photograph, why can’t I do it with a bar of chocolate?’

Mike Teevee forces his way in front of the camera as his body disintegrates into millions of pieces—visualized as television static floating through the air—only to rematerialize in miniature on the other side.

I was trained as a sculptor and learned about transformative materiality in foundries and ceramics studios, where masses of liquids were alchemically transformed into imagistic solids.

Sometimes people ask me if I miss making sculpture and I tell them that the digital has the same physical qualities as stone.

When I’m hammering away on my keyboard all day, I might as well be chipping away at marble or pounding a piano.

When I’m really typing, judging by the flourishes my hands are making, I could be playing a Liszt sonata.

When I code HTML, with a mere keystroke, all that language somehow becomes image, exactly as it does when I post to Facebook.

It’s no different really than taking a pot out of a kiln.

Today, technology and writing are inseparable.

But while almost everybody writes on a computer, the effects of technology rarely show up in the actual writing itself.

Word processing programs crash all the time: you’re writing in mid-sentence and the machine hangs.

You force quit the program and then resume as though nothing had ever happened.

I’m always curious why hiccups like ‘recovered documents’ and ‘temporary files’ don’t make it into books.

Why doesn’t the bug become the literature?

How come you can’t buy paperback books at the airport that have glitches in them?

Most of our textual environment is glitch: wads of spam, miles of quoted text, or infinitely mirrored retweets, all born of the refractive platform upon which they are composed and distributed.

When we read and write on the network, they’re everywhere, but in our books, they’re nowhere.

It’s so different in other fields like music where technological errors are the basis for entire aesthetics.

I’m thinking of musique concrete, where tapes were manipulated, warped, and stretched to create new sounds.

It reminds me of one musician I knew who, back in the 70s, accidentally left her 8-Track copy of Led Zeppelin’s Zoso on his car’s dashboard, where it melted on a hot summer day.

Knowing it could only be played once, she made a recording of it, capturing a glorious wobbly version of ‘Black Dog,’ and an elongated ‘Stairway to Heaven,’ before it died.

Today, nobody would argue with the terms industrial or noise music.

But for some reason, we don’t have industrial writing.

Imagine hip hop without scratches, sampled music without samples, or autotuned pop without autotuning.

Then you have some idea of how literature sounds today.

So why the hesitation in writing?

I think it’s fear of language itself.

After all, unlike, say, an atonal piece of music or an abstract painting, writing is comprised entirely of language, the very material we use to communicate with one another.
Language is what makes up everything from business proposals to recipes to love letters.

We have so much trouble understanding each other using our own, normal language—why would we want to make it that much more difficult by purposely adding more noise?

Language is delicate and people get touchy when you fuck with it.

I think that’s why people err on the side of caution with words—even in literature, which is arguably a safer and less loaded linguistic realm than business, law, or love.

Interfering with language is breaking a societal taboo.

From childhood, everybody learned to write, and we all learned to write in the same way.

There were rules: there were right ways to spell, and wrong ways to spell.

There were proper uses of grammar and improper uses of grammar.

And there wasn’t a whole lot of room for leeway.

For most people, it never changed. Language stayed strictly functional.

But the strange thing is that the web has forced writing and books to change in unexpected ways.

Ten years ago, we heard that the web was going to kill books, but that turned out not to be true.

Now there are more books than ever and they’re more beautiful than ever.

I think people got tired of shitty PDFs.

I think people got tired of piles of pixels.

So, like painting did when the camera arrived, books had to take a turn in order to survive.

Their move was to become completely gorgeous, the sort of things that you have to have.
I go into a bookstore today and everything is unbelievably designed, printed on thick paper, and bound in the most luscious covers.

Even poetry books.

I mean, for years, poetry books were the ugliest things on the planet because they had to be made cheaply.

Their ugliness signified an anti-consumerism, a claim to a certain truth, a resistance which rebutted the idea of glossy culture.

But today, even philosophy books have been repackaged to be beautiful.

I’m thinking of a recent series of the selected works of Walter Benjamin, which are a rainbow-colored books with grainy, romantic black-and-white photos from the period on the cover—images of stainless steel fans, old fashioned cameras, and wet city streets shot at night.

The content is of course is the same.

But because of the web, the packaging is over the top.

And the weird thing is, that in spite of their good design, Benjamin doesn’t mean anything less than he did when he was swathed in ugly covers.

Good design didn’t hurt him one bit.

You wonder why this didn’t happen long ago?

Because the worst designed thing in the whole world—the web—made good design possible.

Paradoxically, the web has given us back the artifact.

So instead of asking what the web can do, it might be better to ask what it can’t do.

The web cannot produce a beautiful book.

The web cannot produce a thick piece of vinyl.

The web cannot produce a delicious locavore meal.

The web cannot produce a glazed piece of ceramics.
The web cannot produce a soft woven sweater.

And the web cannot produce a unique oil painting.

Yet.

And this is why painting continues to live.

The web keeps painting relevant for the exact reason that the web cannot make a painting.

Everyone says, ‘Oh, the web is destroying this, the web is destroying that…’ but for all it’s destroying, it’s also rekindling and reviving an entirely other set of cultural artifacts, making them more valuable precisely because the web can’t do them.

Just when we were supposed to be liberated from our objects, we’re drowning in them, getting swept away by the flow.

The web is flow; artifacts are islands in that stream.

There’s something sort of Zen about living in the flow, but there’s something, well, drifty and meaningless about it also.

The web is liquid; it flows through our fingers; there are no handles.

Amnesiac and ludic, the twenty-four hour cycle renders traditional markers of time obsolete; one day flows into the next; things float downstream—current events, catastrophes, deaths, obituaries, photos, politics, videos—only to be displaced by the next thing barreling down from upstream.

I’m often asked why I still publish books.

I think the reason is to stop the flow.

In order to make an argument, you need to freeze that flow for a moment, where you draw upon the past and speculate upon the future, in one crystalized present—a book.

Books become markers in that stream, which continues to flow about them.

But they feel solid,
like totems to which discourse can cling.

The idea that literature could be flow came from the surrealists.

I love their idea of automatic writing.

I want all writing to be automatic.

I want writing to be as easy as speaking.

I want writing to be as easy as washing the dishes.

I want writing to be as easy as looking at a web page.

I want writing to be as easy as thinking.

But the downside of flow is that it’s not that interesting.

But the best surrealist literature was not flow at all.

They went back and fine-tuned everything to produce very high-end literature.

They cheated in a lovely way.

I like the idea that you can actually go back in and make it a little bit better.

You need to adjust the signal-to-noise ratio in order to get decent literature.

So much literature is being produced by bots and algorithms these days.

One of the great mistakes that the new automatic writers make is to accept exactly what the machine produces.

Machines produce too many good ideas, which need be teased out and sorted.

Otherwise, you’re just reproducing flow.

So let’s talk about flow.

Speech is flow, but as a book,
Soliloquy was a marker in that stream.

I wrote that book in the third week of April of 1996.
Can anybody in this room remember exactly what they said, in the third week of April of 1996, or third week of April of 2006, or third week of April of 2016?

Even if you knew what you did, you have no idea of what you said.

But I remember everything that I did during that week.

Of course I don’t remember what happened the week before, and I don’t remember what happened the week after, but I remember everything from that one week because of what I said.

It was remarkable that through those words, today I can precisely conjure up events and emotions from over twenty years ago.

I think it was the most meaningful week of my entire life precisely because I captured it.

There have been traumatic weeks, and there have been great weeks, yet none of those have any meaning compared with that one week when I captured everything I spoke.

Which reminds me of a man I met a few years back in Berlin.

We were both at a conference speculating about the future of literature.

He was a university scientist working on building actual automatic writing programs, programs that could take sets of statistics and transform them into natural language.

So he would take things like the stats of a football game and write a program that churned it into a report for the newspaper, so believably written that you couldn’t tell that whole thing had been done by machine.

It was pretty amazing.

Then I spoke about my practice of automatic writing.

He listened and was completely puzzled.

Why would I want to do the opposite of what he was doing?

Why in the world would I want to write more like a machine?

As a scientist,
he was trying to solve a problem.

As an artist,
I was trying to create a problem.

And to him, that was just unbelievably weird.
Afterword

In early 2017, I was invited to be an artist in residence for a week at a small art school in Belgium. It was the 20th anniversary of my book Soliloquy, where I recorded everything I said for a week from the moment I woke up on Monday morning until the moment I went to sleep on Sunday night in 1996. The idea was for me to come to Belgium and for them to record everything I said during my week there. They intended to produce a book of it.

Early one morning, I stumbled off a plane—jetlagged and bleary—into a classroom filled with 100 students, where I was to give my keynote lecture. I hadn’t prepared a thing, and for the next hour or so, I just improvised, rambling about whatever came to me off the top of my head. It wasn’t bad, it wasn’t great; it was just sort of my standard act. The rest of the week continued on in this fashion. True to their word, they taped everything I said. And true to their word, they made a book of everything I spoke that week.

The resultant book was a lovely disaster. They got everything wrong. Because English was their second language, my words appeared completely unrecognizable to me, full of misspellings, errors, and invented language. It was an object lesson in the difficulties of translation, and it was made clear to me how, in spite of best intentions, mutual understanding across languages is nearly impossible.

The book was published by Het Balanseer. When I saw what they had produced, I got an idea: what would happen if I took the book and corrected it? Then they could publish another version of the book—a corrected edition, so to speak. So I spent this past summer correcting everything. But as I was doing that, I realized that much of what I had actually said, even in English, was less than perfect, full of overstatements, conjecture, and in some cases, plain lies. Then it hit me: here was that rare chance to correct the past, to perfect my words, to say what I had meant to say, rather than what I had actually said.

What you have in your hands is an idealized version of that bleary keynote I gave upon my arrival, hence the title “The Idea Lecture (In Memory of David Antin).”

As I was correcting my talk, it occurred to me that this process was similar to the way the poet and art critic David Antin (1932-2016) constructed his ‘talk poems.’ Antin, a great talker, would stand up before a crowd and just speak. He taped those talks, then went home and transcribed them, tweaking them slightly, arranging them on the page, and publishing them as poems. David felt that the simple act of speech constituted an act of poetry, a lesson I took to heart and into my own practice.

This lecture premiered at The Lovure auditorium as part of FIAC’s public programs in October, 2017. To give it, I loaded the talk into a teleprompter program on my laptop. The linebreaks in the piece are a result of the way the teleprompter program broke them up in order to facilitate the reading of the work. Although I have never written lineated verse, I love the idea that a computer lineated the verse for me.

This lecture, then, reads an awful lot like the way I talk, but it is truly nothing like the way I talk. As I said—or didn’t say—on that foggy morning in Belgium:

You are seeing me giving an ideal lecture by my ideal self.

I wish I could always be like this.
Kenneth Goldsmith
New York City, January 2018
Uncreative Writing
Introduction

In 1969, the conceptual artist Douglas Huebler wrote, "The world is full of objects, more or less interesting; I do not wish to add any more." I've come to embrace Huebler's ideas, though it might be retooled as: "The world is full of texts, more or less interesting; I do not wish to add any more." It seems an appropriate response to a new condition in writing today: faced with an unprecedented amount of available text, the problem is not needing to write more of it; instead, we must learn to negotiate the vast quantity that exists. How I make my way through this thicket of information -- how I manage it, how I parse it, how I organize and distribute it -- is what distinguishes my writing from yours.

The prominent literary critic Marjorie Perloff has recently begun using the term "unoriginal genius" to describe this tendency emerging in literature. Her idea is that due to changes brought on by technology and the internet, our notion of genius -- a romantic isolated figure -- is outdated. An updated notion of genius would have to center around one's mastery of information and its dissemination. Perloff has coined a term, "moving information," to signify both the act of pushing language around as well as the act of being emotionally moved by that process. She posits that today's writer resembles more a programmer than a tortured genius, brilliantly conceptualizing, constructing, executing and maintaining a writing machine.

Perloff's notion of "unoriginal genius" should not be seen merely as a theoretical conceit but rather as a realized writing practice, one that dates back to the early part of the twentieth century, embodying an ethos where the construction or conception of a text is as important as what the text says or does: Think, for example, of the collated, note-taking practice of Walter Benjamin's Arcades Project or the mathematically-driven constraint-based works by the Oulipo. Today, technology has exacerbated these mechanistic tendencies in writing (there are, for instance, several web-based versions of Raymond Queneau's 1961 laboriously hand-constructed Hundred Thousand Billion Poems), inciting younger writers to take their cues from the workings of technology and the web as ways of constructing literature. As a result, writers are exploring ways of writing that traditionally have been thought to be outside the scope of literary practice: word processing, databasing, recycling, appropriation, intentional plagiarism, identity ciphering, and intensive programming, but to name a few.

In 2007, Jonathan Lethem published a pro-plagiarism, plagiarized essay in Harper's entitled, "The Ecstasy of Influence: A Plagiarism." It's a lengthy defense and history of how ideas in literature have been shared, riffed, culled, reused, recycled, swiped, stolen, quoted, lifted, duplicated, gifted, appropriated, mimicked and pirated as for as long as literature has existed. In it, he reminds us of how gift-economies, open source cultures, and public commons have been vital for the creation of new works, with themes from older works forming the basis for new ones. Echoing the cries of free culture advocates such as Lawrence Lessig and Cory Doctorow, he eloquently rails against current copyright law as a threat to the lifeblood of creativity. From Martin Luther King Jr.'s sermons to Muddy Waters blues tunes, he showcases the rich fruits of shared culture. He even cites examples of what he had assumed were his own "original" thoughts, only later to realize -- usually by Googling -- that he had unconsciously absorbed someone else's ideas, which he then claimed as his own.
It's a great essay. Too bad he didn't "write" it. The punchline? Every word and idea was borrowed from somewhere else -- either appropriated in its entirety or rewritten by Lethem. Lethem's essay is an example of patchwriting, a way of weaving together various shards of other people's words into a tonally cohesive whole and presenting it as one's own. It's a trick that students use all the time rephrasing, say, a Wikipedia entry into their own words. And if they're caught, it's trouble: In academia, patchwriting is considered an offense equal to that of plagiarism. If Lethem submitted this as a senior thesis or dissertation chapter, he'd be shown the door. Yet few would argue that he hasn't constructed a brilliant work of art -- as well as writing a pointed essay -- entirely by using the words of others. It's the way in which he conceptualized and executed his writing machine -- surgically choosing what to borrow, arranging those words in a skillful way -- that wins us over. Lethem's piece is a self-reflexive, demonstrative work of unoriginal genius.

Lethem's provocation belies a trend amongst younger writers who take his exercise one step further by boldly appropriating the work of others without citation, disposing of the artful and seamless integration of Lethem's patchwriting. For them, the act of writing is literally moving language from one place to another, boldly proclaiming that context is the new content. While pastiche and collage have long been part and parcel of writing, with the rise of the internet, plagiaristic intensity has been raised to extreme levels. Over the past five years, we seen works such a retyping of Jack Kerouac's On The Road in its entirety, a page a day, every day on a blog for a year; an appropriation of the complete text of a day's copy of The New York Times published as a 900-page book; a list poem that is nothing more than reframing a listing of stores from a shopping mall directory into a poetic form; an impoverished writer who has taken every credit card application sent to him and bound them into an 800-page print-on-demand book so costly that even he can't afford a copy; a poet who has parsed the text of an entire 19th century book on grammar according to its own methods, even down to the book's index; a lawyer who re-presents the legal briefs of her day job as poetry in their entirety without changing a word; another writer who spends her days at the British Library copying down the first verse of Dante's Inferno from every English translation that the library possesses, one after another, page after page until she's exhausted the library's supply; a writing team who scoops status updates off of social networking sites and assigns them to names of deceased writers ("Jonathan Swift has got tix to the Wranglers game tonight"), creating an epic, never-ending work of poetry that rewrites itself as frequently as Facebook pages are updated; and an entire movement of writing called Flarf, that is based on grabbing the worst of Google search results: The more offensive, the more ridiculous, the more outrageous the better.

These writers are language hoarders; their projects are epic, mirroring the gargantuan scale of textuality on the internet. While the works often take an electronic form, there is always a paper version which is circulated in journals and zines, purchased by libraries and are received by, written about, and studied by readers of literature. While this new writing has an electronic gleam in its eyes, its results are distinctly analog, taking inspiration from radical modernist ideas and juicing them with twenty-first century technology.

Far from this "uncreative" literature being a nihilistic, begrudging acceptance -- or even an outright rejection -- of a presumed "technological enslavement," it is a writing imbued with celebration, its eyes ablaze with enthusiasm for the future, embracing this moment as one pregnant with possibility. This joy is evident in the writing itself, in which there are moments of unanticipated beauty, sometimes grammatical, some structural, many philosophical: The wonderful rhythms of repetition, the spectacle of the mundane reframed as literature, a reorientation to the poetics of time, and fresh perspectives on readerliness, but to name a few. And then there’s emotion: yes, emotion. But far from being coercive or persuasive, this writing delivers emotion obliquely and unpredictably, with sentiments expressed as a result of the writing process rather than by authorial intention.

These writers function more like programmers than traditional writers, taking Sol Lewitt’s famous dictum to heart: "When an artist uses a conceptual form of art, it means that all of the planning and decisions are made beforehand and the execution is a perfunctory affair. The idea becomes a machine that makes the art," raising new possibilities of what writing can be. Poet Craig Dworkin posits:

What would a non-expressive poetry look like? A poetry of intellect rather than emotion? One in which the substitutions at the heart of metaphor and image were replaced by the direct presentation of language itself, with "spontaneous overflow" supplanted by meticulous procedure and exhaustively logical process? In which the self-regard of the poet’s ego were turned back onto the self-reflexive language of the poem itself? So that the test of poetry were no longer whether it could have been done better (the question of the workshop), but whether it could conceivably have been done otherwise.

There’s been an explosion of writers employing strategies of copying and appropriation over the past few years with the computer encouraging writers to mimic its workings. When cutting and pasting are integral to the writing process, it’d be mad to imagine that writers wouldn’t exploit these functions in extreme ways that weren’t intended by their creators.

If we look back at the history of video art -- the last time mainstream technology collided with art practices -- we’ll find several precedents for such gestures. One that stands out is Nam June Paik’s 1965 “Magnet TV,” where the artist placed a huge horseshoe magnet atop a black and white television, eloquently turning a space previously reserved for Jack Benny and Ed Sullivan into loopy, organic abstractions. The gesture questioned the one-way flow of information: in Paik’s version of TV, you could control what you saw: Spin the magnet and the image changes with it. Up to that point, television’s mission was a delivery vehicle for entertainment and crystal clear communication. Yet a simple artist’s gesture upended television in ways that both users and producers were unaware, opening up entirely new vocabularies for the medium while deconstructing myths of power, politics and distribution which were embedded -- but hitherto invisible -- in the technology. The cut-and-paste function in computing is being exploited by writers like Paik’s magnet was for TV.

While home computers have been around for three decades and people have been cutting and pasting all that time, its the sheer penetration and saturation of broadband that makes the harvesting of masses of language easy and tempting. On a dialup, although it was possible to copy and paste words, in the beginning (gopherspace), texts were doled out one screen at a time. And even though it was text, the load time was still considerable. With broadband, the spigot runs 24/7.

By comparison, there was nothing native to the system of typewriting that encouraged the replication of texts. It was incredibly slow and laborious to do so. Later, after you finished writing, then you could make all the copies you wanted on a Xerox machine. As a result, there was a tremendous amount of twentieth-century post-writing print-based detournement: William S. Burroughs' cut-ups and fold-ins and Bob Cobbing's distressed mimeographed poems are prominent examples. The previous forms of borrowing in literature, collage and pastiche -- taking a word from here, a sentence from there -- were developed based on the amount of labor involved. Having to manually retype or hand-copy an entire book on a typewriter is one thing; cutting and pasting an entire book with three keystrokes -- select all / copy / paste -- is another.

These changes are now so ingrained in the ways that we think and act that science has a name for it: the third replicator. Susan Blackmore, a genetics historian who coined the term, claims that, "The first replicator was the gene -- the basis of biological evolution. The second was memes -- the basis of cultural evolution. I believe that what we are now seeing, in a vast technological explosion, is the birth of a third evolutionary process... There is a new kind of information: electronically processed binary information rather than memes. There is also a new kind of copying machinery: computers and servers rather than brains." Blackmore's statement brings to mind Christian Bök's prediction for the literary future:

We are probably the first generation of poets who can reasonably expect to write literature for a machinic audience of artificially intellectual peers. Is it not already evident by our presence at conferences on digital poetics that the poets of tomorrow are likely to resemble programmers, exalted, not because they can write great poems, but because they can build a small drone out of words to write great poems for us? If poetry already lacks any meaningful readership among our own anthropoid population, what have we to lose by writing poetry for a robotic culture that must inevitably succeed our own? If we want to commit an act of poetic innovation in an era of formal exhaustion, we may have to consider this heretofore unimagined, but nevertheless prohibited, option: writing poetry for inhuman readers, who do not yet exist, because such aliens, clones, or robots have not yet evolved to read it.

Clearly this is setting the stage for a literary revolution. Or is it? From the looks of it, most writing proceeds as if the internet had never happened. The literary world still gets regularly scandalized by age-old bouts of fraudulence, plagiarism and hoaxes in ways that would make, say, the art, music, computing, or science worlds chuckle with disbelief. It's hard to imagine the James Frey or J.T. Leroy scandals upsetting anybody familiar with the sophisticated, purposely fraudulent provocations of Jeff Koons or the re-photographing of advertisements by Richard Prince, who was awarded with a Guggenheim Museum retrospective for his plagiaristic tendencies. Koons and Prince began their careers by stating upfront that they were appropriating and intentionally "unoriginal," where as Frey and Leroy -- even after they were caught -- were still passing their works off as authentic, sincere and personal statements to an audience clearly craving such qualities in literature. The ensuing dance that always follows is comical. In Frey's case, Random House was sued and forced to pay out millions of dollars to readers who felt deceived. Subsequent printings of the book now include a disclaimer informing readers that what they are about to read is, in fact, a work of fiction.

Imagine all the pains that could have been avoided had Frey or Leroy taken a Koonsian tact from the outset and admitted that their strategy was one of embellishment, with a dash of inauthenticity, falseness, and unoriginality thrown in. But, no. Nearly a century ago, the art world put to rest conventional notions of originality and replication with the gestures of Marcel Duchamp’s readymades, Francis Picabia’s mechanical drawings, and Walter Benjamin’s oft-quoted essay "The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction." Since then, a parade of blue chip artists from Andy Warhol to Matthew Barney have taken these ideas to new levels, resulting in terribly complex ideas about identity, media, and culture. These, of course, have become part and parcel of mainstream art world discourse to the point where counter-reactions based on sincerity and representation have emerged. Similarly, in music, sampling -- entire tracks constructed from other tracks -- has become commonplace. From Napster to gaming, from karaoke to torrent files, the culture appears to be embracing the digital and all the complexity it entails -- with the exception of writing, which is still mostly wedded to promoting an authentic and stable identity at all costs.

I'm not saying that such writing should be discarded: Who hasn't been moved by a great memoir? Far from it. But I'm sensing is that literature -- infinite in its potential of ranges and expressions -- is in a rut, tending to hit the same note again and again, confining itself to the narrowest of spectrums, resulting in a practice that has fallen out of step and unable to take part in arguably the most vital and exciting cultural discourses of our time. I find this to be a profoundly sad moment -- and a great lost opportunity for literary creativity to revitalize itself in ways it hasn't imagined.

Perhaps one of the reasons writing is stuck might be the way creative writing is taught. In regard to the many sophisticated ideas concerning media, identity and sampling developed over the past century, books about how to be a creative writer have completely missed the boat, relying instead on wildly clichéd notions of what it means to be "creative." These books are peppered with advice like, "A creative writer is an exploiter, a ground-breaker. Creative writing allows you to chart your own course and boldly go where no one has gone before." Or, ignoring giants like de Certeau, Cage, and Warhol, they suggest that "Creative writing is liberation from the constraints of everyday life." In the early part of the twentieth century, Duchamp and composer Erik Satie both professed the desire to live without memory. For them, it was a way of being present to the wonders of the every day. Yet, it seems every book on creative writing insists that "Memory is often the primary source of imaginative experience." The how-to sections of these books strikes me as terribly unsophisticated, generally coercing us to prioritize the theatrical over the mundane as the basis for our writings: "Using the first-person point of view, explain how a 55-year old man feels on his wedding day. It is his first marriage." I prefer the ideas of Gertrude Stein who, writing in the third person, tells of her dissatisfaction with such techniques: "She experimented with everything in trying to describe. She tried a bit inventing words but she soon gave that up. The english language was her medium and with the english language the task was to be achieved, the problem solved. The use of fabricated words offended her, it was an escape into imitative emotionalism."

For the past several years, I've taught a class at the University of Pennsylvania called "Uncreative Writing." In it, students are penalized for showing any shred of originality and creativity. Instead, they are rewarded for plagiarism, identity theft, repurposing papers, patchwriting, sampling, plundering, and stealing. Not surprisingly, they thrive. Suddenly, what they've surreptitiously become expert at is brought out into the open and explored in a safe environment, reframed in terms of responsibility instead of recklessness.

We retype documents and transcribe audio clips. We make small changes Wikipedia pages (changing an "a" to an "an or inserting an extra space between words). We hold classes in chatrooms and entire semesters are spent exclusively in Second Life. Each semester, for their final paper, I have them purchase a term paper from an online paper mill and sign their name to it, surely the most forbidden action in all of academia. Each student then must get up and present the paper to the class as if they wrote it themselves, defending it from attacks by the other students. What paper did they choose? Is it possible to defend something you didn’t write? Something, perhaps, you don't agree with? Convince us. All of this, of course, is technology-driven. When the students arrive in class, they are told that they must have their laptops open and connected. You are smarter with a laptop connected to the internet than you are without one. Not surprisingly, they never don't know an answer.

And so we have a glimpse into the future. And after seeing what the spectacular results of this are, how completely engaged and democratic the classroom is, I am more convinced that I can never go back to a traditional classroom pedagogy. I learn more from them than they can ever learn from me. The role of the professor now is part party host, part traffic cop, full time enabler.

The secret: the suppression of self-expression is impossible. Even when we do something as seemingly "uncreative" as retyping a few pages, we express ourselves in a variety of ways. The act of choosing and reframing tells us as much about ourselves as our story about our mother’s cancer operation. It's just that we've never been taught to value such choices. After a semester of forcibly suppressing a student's "creativity" by making them plagiarize and transcribe, she will approach me with a sad face at the end of the semester, telling me how disappointed she was because, in fact, what we had accomplished was not uncreative at all; by not being "creative" she produced the most creative body of work writing in her life. By taking an opposite approach to creativity -- the most trite, overused, and ill-defined concept in a writer's training -- she had emerged renewed and rejuvenated, on fire and in love again with writing.

Having worked in advertising for many years as a "creative director," I can tell you that, despite what cultural pundits might say, creativity -- as its been defined by our culture with its endless parade of formulaic novels, memoirs and films -- is the thing to flee from, not only as a member of the "creative class" but also as a member of the "artistic class." Living in a time where technology is changing the rules of the game in every aspect of our lives, it’s time to question and tear down such clichés and lay them out of the floor in front of us, then reconstruct these smoldering embers into something new, something contemporary, something -- finally -- relevant.

Clearly, not everyone agrees. Recently after I finished giving a lecture at an Ivy League university, an elderly, well-known poet stood up in the back of the auditorium and, wagging his finger at me, accused me of nihilism and of robbing poetry of its joy. He upbraided me for knocking out the foundation from under the most hallowed of grounds, then tore into me with a line of questioning I've heard many times before: If everything can be transcribed and then presented as literature, then what makes one work better than another? If it’s a matter of simply cutting and pasting the entire internet into a Microsoft Word document, where does it end? Once we begin to accept all language as poetry by mere reframing, don’t we risk throwing any semblance of judgment and quality out the window? What happens to notions of authorship? How are careers and canons established and subsequently, how are they to be evaluated? Are we simply reenacting the death of the author, a figure such theories failed to kill the first time around? Will all texts in the future be authorless and nameless, written by machines for machines? Is the future of literature reducible to mere code?

Valid concerns, I think, for a man who emerged from the battles of the twentieth century victorious. The challenges to his generation were just as formidable. How did they convince traditionalists that disjunctive uses of language conveyed by exploded syntax and compound words could be equally expressive of human emotion as time-tested methods? Or that a story need not be told as strict narrative in order to convey its own logic and sense? And yet, against all odds, they persevered.

The twenty-first century, with its queries so different than that of the last, finds me responding from another angle. If it's a matter of simply cutting and pasting the entire internet into a Microsoft Word document, then what becomes important is what you -- the author -- decides to choose. Success lies in knowing what to include and -- more important -- what to leave out. If all language can be transformed into poetry by merely reframing -- an exciting possibility -- then s/he who reframes words in the most charged and convincing way will be judged as the best. I agree that the moment we throw judgment and quality out the window, we're in trouble. Democracy is fine for YouTube, but it's generally a recipe for disaster when it comes to art. While all words may be created equal -- and treated thusly -- the way in which they're assembled isn't; it's impossible to suspend judgment and folly to dismiss quality. Mimesis and replication doesn't eradicate authorship, rather it simply places new demands on authors who must take these new conditions into account as part and parcel of the landscape when conceiving of a work of art: if you don't want it copied, don't put it online.

Careers and canons won't be established in traditional ways. I'm not so sure that we'll still have careers in the same way we used to. Literary works might function the same way that memes do today on the web, spreading like wildfire for a short period, often unsigned and unauthored, only to be supplanted by the next ripple. While the author won't die, we might begin to view authorship in a more conceptual way: perhaps the best authors of the future will be ones who can write the best programs with which to manipulate, parse and distribute language-based practices. Even if, as Bök claims, poetry in the future will be written by machines for other machines to read, there will be, for the foreseeable future, someone behind the curtain inventing those drones; so that even if literature is reducible to mere code -- an intriguing idea -- the smartest minds behind them will be considered our greatest authors.

But wait. Here I am, hammering out original thoughts on unoriginality to convey to you, another human, about the future of literature. Although this book might be available electronically, I can't wait to wrap my hands around the paper version, making it "real" for me. Ironies abound. We're early in this game and I don't need to tell you how fast its evolving. I'm part of a bridge generation, raised on old media yet in love with and immersed in the new. A younger generation accepts these conditions as just another part of the world: they mix oil paint while Photoshopping and scour flea markets for vintage vinyl while listening their iPods. They don't feel the need to distinguish the way I do. I'm still blinded by the web. I can hardly believe it exists. At worst, my cyber-utopianism will sound as dated in a few years as jargon from the Summer of Love does today. Still, it's impossible to predict where it's all headed. But one thing is for certain: it's not going away. The arguments set forth in these pages will inevitably contain references to soon-to-be-obsolete software, discarded operating systems, and abandoned social networking empires, but the change in thinking and in doing from an analog way of writing has been made and there's no turning back.

This book is a loose collection of essays that attempts to map those territories, define terminologies, and create contexts -- both historic and contemporary -- in which these works can be situated and discussed. The first few chapters are more technically oriented, laying the groundwork, the how's, where's, and why's of uncreative writing. "Revenge of the Text," focuses on the rise of the web and the effect digital language has had upon the act of writing itself. The new conditions of abundance and quantity of words are noted and an ecosystem by which to manage it is proposed. "Language as Material" sets the stage for viewing words not only as semantically transparent vehicles of communication, but also emphasizes their formal and material properties, a transformation which is essential when writing in a digital environment. Two mid-twentieth century movements, Situationism and Concrete Poetry, are discussed in relation to contemporary ways of writing on the screen, on the page, and out on the streets. "Anticipating Instability" focuses on issues of contextualization in the digital environment and comments upon the fluidity and interchangeability between words and images. "Identity: An Expanded View" grapples with how the always-slippery subject of defining oneself has become even more complicated in the online environment, setting the stage for a post-identity literature in our global consumerist milieu. Finally, "Why Appropriation?" questions why collage and pastiche have long been acceptable methods of writing while appropriation has rarely been tested. It explores the rich history of appropriation in the visual arts and proposes ways to apply these precedents to literature.

Two essays read the work of two visual artists, Sol LeWitt and Andy Warhol, through the lens of uncreative writing. "Against Failure: The Infallible Processes of Sol LeWitt" maintains that uncreative writing can learn all it needs to know by studying the career of this master conceptual artist. Everything he did and the way he went about doing it can be elegantly applied to writing in the digital age. "The Unoriginal Genius of Andy Warhol" examines the work and life of Warhol as the single most important influence on uncreative writing, viewing his mechanistic tendencies and maniacal production as similar to the way we push digital words around today.

The next several essays show how uncreative writing can be put into practice. Generally focused around a single author or work, the essays demonstrate how that work is representative of a specific tendency in uncreative writing. "Toward An a-Ethics," for example, discusses a work by Vanessa Place, "Statement of Facts, which radically casts uncreative writing as an ethically weightless space, where transgressive and mechanistic impulses may be explored without consequence. Place enacts a documentary poetics, one that subjugates its own moral impulses to pre-inscribed ethical DNA that comes embedded in appropriated language. "Retyping On The Road" claims that the simple act of retyping a text is enough to constitute a work of literature, thereby raising the craft of the copyist to the same level as the author. It's a utopian critique of labor and value in the valueless space of poetic production. "Parsing the New Illegibility" says that the new writing might be best not read at all: it might be better to think about. Moving away from modernist notions of disjunction and deconstruction, difficulty is now defined by quantity (too much to read) rather than fragmentation (too shattered to read). "Seeding the Data Cloud" examines how short forms -- the telegraph, the newspaper headline and the bold-faced name -- have always gone hand-in-hand with media-based writing, and remarks upon how this impulse continues in the age of Twitter and social networking. "The Inventory and The Ambient" highlights the new and prominent role that archiving has taken on in the creation of literary works in an era where the way in which one manages information impacts upon the quality of one's writing.

"Uncreative Writing in the Classroom" is a short treatise on pedagogy and how the digital environment impacts the way we teach and learn writing in a university setting.

Finally, two short polemical manifesto-like pieces finish the book. "Provisional Language" articulates the new condition of language's debasement and temporality in the age of the web. It focuses on the way commercialization and commoditization of language have leveled words in an unprecedented way. "In Barry Bonds I See the Future of Poetry" accepts the inevitability that, soon, writing will become as chemically enhanced and altered as professional sports, acting and modeling are, to the point of being recognizable -- and thereby readable -- only to machines.

In 1959, the poet and artist Brion Gysin claimed that writing was fifty years behind painting. And he might still be right: in the art world since Impressionism, the avant-garde has been the mainstream. Innovation and risk-taking have been consistently rewarded. But in spite of the successes of modernism, literature has remained on two parallel tracks, the mainstream and the avant-garde, with the two rarely intersecting. Yet the conditions of digital culture have unexpectedly forced a collision, scrambling the once-sure footing of both camps. Suddenly, we all find ourselves in the same boat grappling with new questions concerning authorship, originality, and the way meaning is forged.

Revenge of the Text

There is a room in the Musée d'Orsay that I call the "room of possibilities." The museum is roughly set up chronologically, happily wending its way through the nineteenth century, until you hit this one room which is a group of painterly responses to the invention of the camera. In this room are about half a dozen proposals for the way painting could respond. One that sticks in my mind is a tromp o'eil solution where a figure is painted literally reaching out of the frame into the "viewer's space." Another incorporates three-dimensional objects atop the canvas. Great attempts, but as we all know, Impressionism -- and hence modernism -- won out. Writing is at such a juncture today.

With the rise of the web, writing has met its photography. By that I mean, writing has encountered a situation similar to what happened to painting upon the invention of photography, a technology so much better at doing what the art form had been trying to do, that in order to survive, the field had to alter its course radically. If photography was striving for sharp focus, painting was forced to go soft, hence Impressionism. It was a perfect analog to analog correspondence, for nowhere lurking beneath the surface of either painting, photography or film was a speck of language. Instead, it was image to image, thus setting the stage for an imagistic revolution.

Today, digital media has set the stage for a literary revolution. In 1974, Peter Bürger was still able to make the claim that "[B]ecause the advent of photography makes possible the precise mechanical reproduction of reality, the mimetic function of the fine arts withers. But the limits of this explanatory model become clear when one calls to mind that it cannot be transferred to literature. For in literature, there is no technical innovation that could have produced an effect comparable to that of photography in the fine arts."

Now there is.

If painting reacted to photography by going abstract, it seems unlikely that writing is doing the same in relation to the internet. It appears that writing's response is mimetic and replicative, primarily involving methods of distribution, while proposing new platforms of receivership and readership. Words very well might not be written to be read but rather to be shared, moved and manipulated.

***

I'm on my way back to New York from Europe and am gazing wearily at the map charting our plodding progress on the screen sunk into the seatback in front of me. The slick topographic world map is rendered three-dimensionally, showing the entire earth, half in darkness, half in light, with us -- represented as a small white aircraft -- making our way west. The screens change frequently, from graphical maps to a series of blue textual screens announcing our distance to destination, the time, the aircraft's speed, the outside air temperature, and so forth, all rendered in elegant white sans-serif type. Watching the plane chart its progress is ambient and relaxing as the beautiful renderings of oceanic plates and exotic names of small towns off the North Atlantic -- Gander, Glace Bay, Carbonear -- stream by.

Suddenly, as we approach landfall near Grand Banks off the coast of Newfoundland, my screen flickers and goes black. It stays that way for some time until it illuminates again, this time displaying generic white type on a black screen: the computer is rebooting and all those gorgeous graphics have been replaced by lines of DOS startup text. For a full five minutes, I watch line command descriptions of systems unfurling, fonts loading, and graphic packages decompressing. Finally, the screen goes blue and a progress bar and hourglass appear as the GUI loads, returning me back to the live map just as we hit landfall.

What we take to be graphics, sounds and motion in our screen world is merely a thin skin under which resides miles and miles of language. Occasionally, like on my flight, the skin is punctured and, like getting a glimpse under the hood, we see that our digital world -- our images, our film and video, our sound, our words, our information -- is powered by language. And all this binary information -- music, video, photographs, to name a few -- are completely comprised of language, miles and miles of alphanumeric code. If you need evidence of this, think of when you've mistakenly received a .jpg attachment in an email that has been rendered not as image, but as code that seems to go on forever. It's all words (though perhaps not in any order that we can understand): The basic material that has propelled writing since its stabilized form is now also what all media is created from.

Besides functionality, code also possesses literary value. If we frame that code and read it through the lens of literary criticism, we will find that the past hundred years of modernist and postmodernist writing has demonstrated the artistic value of similar seemingly arbitrary arrangements of letters.
Here’s a three lines of a .jpg opened in a text editor:

Of course a close reading of the text reveals very little, semantically or narratively. Instead, a conventional glance at the piece reveals a nonsensical collection of letters and symbols, literally a code that might be deciphered into something sensible.

Yet, what happens when sense is not foregrounded as being of primary importance? Instead, we need to ask other questions of the text. Below are three lines from a poem by Charles Bernstein called "Lift Off," written in 1979:

Intentionally bereft of literary tropes and conveyances of human emotion, Bernstein chooses to foreground the workings of a machine, rather than the sentiments of a human. In fact, the piece is what its title says it is: a transcription of everything lifted off a page with a correction tape from a manual typewriter. Bernstein's poem is, in some sense, code posing as a poem: a careful reading of it will reveal bits of words and the occasional full word that was erased. For example, you can see the word "Bruce" on the last line, possibly referring to Bruce Andrews, Bernstein's co-editor of journal LANGUAGE. But such attempts at reassembling won't get us too far: what we're left with are shards of language, comprised of errors from several unknown documents. In this way, Bernstein foregrounds the fragmentary nature of language, reminding us that even in this shattered state, all morphemes are prescribed with any number of references and contexts; in this case, the resultant text is a tissue of quotations drawn from a series of ghost writings.

Bernstein's poem comes at the end of a long line of modernist poetry and prose that sought to foreground the materiality of language while allowing varying levels of emotion or sense to come through while, throwing into question traditional notions of authorship. Stephane Mallarmé’s 1897 poem "Un coup de dés jamais n’abolira le hasard (A throw of the dice will never abolish chance)," is a poem whose words -- and their placement on the page -- have been subjected to chance, scattering stability, controlled authorship and prescribed ways of reading to the winds. Words are no longer primarily transparent content carriers but now their material quality must be considered as well. The page becomes a canvas, with the negative spaces between the words taking on as much import as the letters themselves. The text becomes active, begging us to perform it, employing the spaces as silences. Indeed, the author himself reiterates this by claiming that "The paper intervenes each time as an image." Mallarmé asks us to consider the act of reading -- whether silent or aloud -- as an act of decoding by actualizing and materializing the symbols (in this case letters) on a page.

Mallarmé’s letteristic materiality that inspires others to explore the same: whether it’s Gertrude Stein’s columns eye-tickling repetitions or Ezra Pound’s later Cantos, writers continued to treat words materially as the century progressed. Parts of Pound’s epic are filled with barely decipherable words, comprised of dozens of languages jammed together with annotations and references to non-existent footnotes:

chih, chih!
wo chih3 chih3
wo4-5 wo4-5 ch’o4-5 ch’o4-5 paltry yatter.

It’s a sound poem, a concrete poem and a lyrical poem all rolled into one. It’s both multilingual -- bits of Chinese mingle with the "patter" of English -- and non-lingual. Pound’s constellations hold the page like calligraphic strokes begging to be spoken aloud. This is active language, reminiscent of the sorts of tag clouds that you see today on web pages, language that begs to be interacted with, to be clicked on, to be highlighted and copied.

James Joyce’s thunderclaps are the ten one-hundred letter words scattered throughout Finnegans Wake, a 600 page book of compound words and neologisms, all of which look to the uninitiated like reams of nonsensical code:

bababadalgharaghtakamminaronnnonbronnronnionnohthrshonrdrruit

Spoken aloud, it’s the sound of thunder. This, of course, goes for the rest of The Wake, which upon first sight is one of the most disorienting books ever written in English. But hearing Joyce read / decode a portion of The Wake, most famously his own recording of the "Anna Livia Plurabelle" section is a revelation: it all makes sense, coming close to standard English, yet on the page it remains "code." Reading aloud is an act of decoding; taken one step further, the act of reading itself is an act of decoding, deciphering and unencryption.

Computer code, made up of numbers -- 1's and 0's -- is just code. It can’t possibly have any literary value. Or can it? The 20th century was brimming with number poems. Take this transcribed excerpt from a series called "Seven Numbers Poems" by British poet Neil Mills, published in 1971:

1,9
1,1,9
1,1,1,9 9
1,1,1,1,9
8,4
1,1,1,1,9
8,4
8,4

If you read it aloud, you’ll find it transformed from a seemingly random bunch of numbers into a complex and beautiful rhythmic poem. Mills states, "I believed that the meaning which emerged in the reading of poetry lay primarily in intonation and rhythm, and only secondarily in semantic content i.e. that what was important was how something was read, rather than what was said -- the human voice functioning as musical instrument."

The contemporary Japanese poet Shigeru Matsui, writes what he calls, "Pure Poems" and are closest to the alphanumeric binaries that we find in computer code. Begun in early 2001 and currently numbering in the hundreds, they are based on the 20x20 grid of a standard Japanese writing paper. Every "Pure Poem" consists of 400 characters, each a number from one to three. Originally written in Chinese script, which indicates the numbers 1, 2 and 3 with a single, a double, and triple dash accordingly, later poems are written with roman numerals.

1007~1103

When Matsui reads these poems aloud, they're absolutely precise and hypnotic to listen to.

Read through the lens of the above examples, a translation of a common computer icon graphic into its hex code, has literary value. Below is the code that's rendered into the "W" that you see in your web browser's address bar every time you load a Wikipedia page, called a "favicon":

```
000000000000 0001 0001 1010 0010 0001 0004 0128
000001000000 0016 0000 0028 0000 0010 0000 0020 000002000000 0001 0004 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 000003000000 0000 0000 0010 0000 0000 0000 0024
00000400004 3834 0084 c7c8 00c8 4748 0048 e8e9
000005000e9 6a69 0069 a8a9 00a9 2828 0028 fdfc
000006000fc 1819 0019 9898 0098 d9d8 00d8 5857
00000700057 7b7a 007a bab9 00b9 3a3c 003c 8888
00000800088 8888 8888 8888 288e be88 8888 8888
00000903b83 5788 8888 8888 7667 778e 8828 8888
00000a0d61f 7abd 8818 8888 467c 585f 8814 8188
00000b08b06 e8f7 88aa 8388 8b3b 88f3 88bd e988
00000c0a818 880c e841 c988 b328 6871 688e 958b
00000d0e9a48 5862 5884 7e81 3788 1ab4 5a84 3eeb
00000e03d86 dcb8 5cb8 8888 8888 8888 8888 8888
00000f0888 8888 8888 8888 8888 8888 8888 8888
000010000000 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 000013000000 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 0000 000013e *
```
A close reading of the favicon reveals an enormous amount of literary value rhythmically, visually and structurally, unfolding like a piece of minimalist music. The first column of numbers logically progresses in steps from 0000000 to 0000090 then takes a short derivation into 00000a0 - 00000f0 before picking back up to 0000100. Patterns occur in the horizontal lines as well, with minute variations on 1's, 0's 2's, 8's and 4's in the first four lines, before shifting over to combinations of numbers and letters in the middle section, only to be broken up by several 8888's in the mid to lower portion. Squint your eyes and you can almost discern the "W" embedded within the square of the code. Of course, this isn't poetry nor was it meant to be, rather it shows us that even seemingly meaningless and random sets of alphanumerics are infused with poetic qualities. While this language is primarily concerned with transforming from one state to another (from code to an icon), those same transformative qualities -- language acting upon more language -- is the foundation for much of the new writing.

There's a Flickr pool called "The Public Computer Errors Pool" which documents what I experienced on my flight times a hundred. It's a fascinating set of photos. You see a digital elevator button displaying a question mark instead of a number, ATMs in reboot mode, subway advertisement signs with "out of memory" error messages and flight arrival boards punctured by Windows desktops. My favorite is a larger-than-life size Mrs. Potato Head figurine at an amusement park holding a display with a blue DOS screen filled with cold white letters where clearly something more child-friendly should have been. This photo pool documents the puncturing of the interface covering language.

But don't take my word for it. You can easily create these textual ruptures on your computer. Take any MP3 file -- we'll use the prelude from Bach's "Cello Suite No. 1" -- and change the filename extension from .mp3 to .txt. Open the document in a text editor, you'll see gobs of nonsensical alphanumerics / language. Now, take any text -- let's say for the sake of consistencty, we take Bach's whole Wikipedia entry -- and paste it into the middle of that code. Then save it and rename the file with the .mp3 extension. If you double click it and open it your MP3 player, it'll play the file as usual, but when it hits the Wikipedia text, it coughs, glitches and spits for the duration of time it takes for the player to decode that bit of language before going back to the prelude. With these sorts of manipulations, we find ourselves in new territory: While many types of analog mash-ups were created in the pre-digital age -- such as the cutting up and gluing together of two separate LP halves or splicing magnetic tapes into collages -- there was no language acting upon other language to form such ruptures. With digital media, we're in squarely in the world of textual manipulation which not too long ago was almost the exclusive province of "writing" and "literature."

We can do the same thing with images. Let's take a .jpg of famous engraving from the title page of the 1623 First Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays and change the extension from .jpg to .txt. When we open it in a text editor, we'll see garbled code. Now let's insert his 93rd Sonnet into it, three times at somewhat equal intervals, and save the file and change the extension back to .jpg.

When we reopen it as an image, the effect that language had upon the image is clear: What we're experiencing for the first time is the ability of language to alter all media, be it images, video, music or text, something that represents a break with tradition and charts the path for new uses of language. Words are active and affective in concrete ways. You could say that this isn't writing and in the traditional sense, you'd be right. But this is where things get interesting: we aren't hammering away on typewriters; instead, focused all day on powerful machines with infinite possibilities, connected to networks with a number of equally infinite possibilities, the writer's role is being significantly challenged, expanded, and updated.
Quantity is the New Quality

Faced with an unprecedented amount of digital text, writing needs to redefine itself in order to adapt to the new environment of textual abundance. What do I mean by textual abundance? A recent study showed that "in 2008, the average American consumed 100,000 words of information in a single day. (By comparison, Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace was only 460,000 words long.) This doesn't mean we read 100,000 words a day – it means that 100,000 words cross our eyes and ears in a single 24-hour period."

I'm inspired by how these studies treat words materially. They're not concerned with what words mean but with how much they weigh. In fact, when media studies wanted to first quantify language, they used words as their metric, a practice which continues to this day:

In 1960, digital sources of information were non-existent. Broadcast television was analog, electronic technology used vacuum tubes rather than microchips, computers barely existed and were mainly used by the government and a few very large companies... The concept that we now know as bytes barely existed. Early efforts to size up the information economy therefore used words as the best barometer for understanding consumption of information.

Using words as a metric... [it is] estimated that 4,500 trillion words were "consumed" in 1980. We calculate that words consumed grew to 10,845 trillion words in 2008, which works out to about 100,000 words per American per day.

Of course, one can never know what all those words mean or if they have any use whatsoever, but for writers and artists -- who often specialize in seeing value in things that most people overlook -- this glut of language signifies a dramatic shift in their relationship to words. Since the dawn of media, we've had more on our plates than we could ever consume, but something has radically changed: never before has language had so much materiality -- fluidity, plasticity, malleability -- begging to be actively managed by the writer. Before digital language, words were almost always found imprisoned on a page. How different today when digitized language can be poured into any conceivable container: text typed into a Microsoft Word document can be parsed into a database, visually morphed in Photoshop, animated in Flash, pumped into online text-mangling engines, spammed to thousands of email addresses and imported into a sound editing program and spit out as music; the possibilities are endless.

In 1990, the Whitney Museum mounted a show called Image World, which speculated that due to television's complete rule and saturation that words would disappear from media, replaced by images. It seemed plausible at the time, with the rise of cable and satellite concurrent with the demise of print. The catalog decried the ubiquity and subsequent victory of images:

Every day... the average person is exposed to 1,600 ads.... the atmosphere is thick with messages. Every hour, every day, news, weather, traffic, business, consumer, cultural, and religious programming is broadcast on more than 1,200 network, cable, and public-access television channels. Television shows (60 Minutes) are constructed by like magazines, and newspapers (USA Today) emulate the structure of television. Successful magazine articles provide the plots for movies that manufacture related merchandise and then spin-off television series which, in turn, are novelized.

Similarly, in 1998 Mitchell Stevens published a book called The Rise of the Image, the Fall of the Word, which charts the fall of the printed word, beginning with Plato’s distrust of writing. Stevens, a great lover of print, saw the future as video: “Moving images use our senses more effectively than do black lines of types stacked on white pages.” Stevens is right, but what he couldn’t see was that in the future video would be comprised entirely of black lines of type.

The curators of Image World and Mitchell Stevens were blindsided by the web, a then-emerging text-based technology that would soon grow to challenge -- and overwhelm -- their claims of imagistic dominance. Even as the digital revolution grows more imagistic and motion-based (propelled by language), there’s been a huge increase in text-based forms from typing emails to writing blog posts, text-messaging, social networking status updates and Twitter blasts: we’re deeper in words than we’ve ever been.

Even Marshall McLuhan, who was so right about so many things predicting our digital world, got this one wrong. He, too, saw the coming of Image World and railed against the linearity of Gutenberg, predicting that we were headed to a return of an orally-based, sensual, tactile, multimedia world that would eradicate the narrow centuries of the textual prison. And in that, he was right: as the web grows, it becomes richer, more tactile, more intermediary. But McLuhan would still have to reckon the fact that these riches are ultimately driven by language in neat rows, programmed by even stricter bonds than any rhetorical form which preceded it.

But far from McLuhan’s prison of words in straight lines, the flip side of digital language is its malleability, language as putty, language to wrap your hands around, to caress, mold, strangle. The result is that digital language foregrounds its material aspect in ways that were hidden before.

A Textual Ecosystem

If we think of words as both carriers of semantic meaning and as material objects, it becomes clear that we need a way to manage it all, an ecosystem that can encompass language in its myriad forms. I’d like to propose such a system, taking as inspiration James Joyce’s famous meditation on the universal properties of water in the Ithaca episode of Ulysses.

When Joyce writes about the different forms that water can take, it reminds me of different forms that digital language can take. Speaking of the way water puddles and collects in “its variety of forms in loughs and bays and gulsps,” I am reminded of the process whereby data rains down from the network in small pieces when I use a bittorrent client, pooling in my download folder. When my download is complete, the data finds its “solidity in glaciers, icebergs, icefloes,” as a movie or music file. When Joyce speaks of water’s mutability from its liquid state into “vapour, mist, cloud, rain, sleet, snow, hail,” I am reminded of what happens when I join a network of torrents and I begin “seeding” and uploading to the data cloud, the file simultaneously constructing and deconstructing itself at the same time. The utopian rhetoric surrounding data flows -- "information wants to be free," for example -- is echoed by Joyce when he notes water’s democratic properties, how it is always “seeking its own level.” He acknowledges water’s double economic status in both "its climatic and commercial significance," just as we know that data is bought and sold, as well as given away. When Joyce speaks of water’s "weight and volume and density," I’m thrown back to the way in which words are used as quantifiers of information and activity, entities to be weighed and sorted. When he writes about the potential for water’s drama and catastrophe "its violence in seaquakes, waterspouts, artesian wells, eruptions, torrents, eddies, freshets, spates, groundswells, watersheds, waterpartings, geysers, cataracts, whirlpools, maelstroms, inundations, deluges, cloudbursts," I think of electrical spikes that wipe out hard drives, wildly spreading viruses, or what happens to my data when I bring a strong magnet too close to my laptop, disasterously scrambling my data in every direction. Joyce speaks of water the way data flows through our networks with "its vehicular ramifications in continental lakecontained streams and confluent oceanflowing rivers with their tributaries and transoceanic currents: gulfstream, north and south equatorial courses," while speaking of its upsides, "its properties for cleansing, quenching thirst and fire, nourishing vegetation: its infallibility as paradigm and paragon."

While writers have traditionally taken great pains to ensure that their texts "flow," in the context of our Joyce-inspired language / data ecosystem, this takes on a whole new meaning, as writers are the custodians of this ecology. Having moved from the traditional position of being solely generative entities to information managers with organizational capacities, writers are embodying tasks once thought to belong only to programmers, database minders, and librarians, thus eradicating the distinction between archivists, writers, producers and consumers.

Using methods similar to Lethem, Joyce composed this passage by patchwriting an encyclopedia entry on water. By doing so, he actively demonstrates the fluidity of language, moving language from one place to another. Joyce presages uncreative writing by the act of sorting words, weighing which are "signal" and which are "noise," what’s worth keeping and what’s worth leaving. Identifying -- weighing -- language in its various states of "data" and "information" are crucial to the health of the ecosystem:

Data in the 21st century is largely ephemeral, because it is so easily produced: a machine creates it, uses it for a few seconds and overwrites it as new data arrives. Some data is never examined at all, such as scientific experiments that collect so much raw data that scientists never look at most of it. Only a fraction ever gets stored on a medium such as a hard drive, tape or sheet of paper. yet even ephemeral data often has ‘descendents’ -- new data based on the old. Think of data as oil and information as gasoline: a tanker of crude oil is not useful until it arrives, its cargo unladen and refined into gasoline that is distributed to service stations. Data is not information until it becomes available to potential consumers of that information. On the other hand, data, like crude oil, contains potential value.

How can we discard something that might in another configuration be extremely valuable? As a result, we’ve become hoarders of data, hoping that at some point we’ll have a "use" for it. Look at what’s on your hard drive in reserve (pooled, as Joyce would say) as compared to what you actually use. On my laptop, I have hundreds fully indexable PDFs of e-books. Do I use them? Not in any regular way. I store them for future use. Like those PDFs, all of the data that’s stored on my hard drive is part of my local textual ecosystem. My computer indexes what’s on my hard drive and makes it easier for me to search what I need by keyword. The local ecosystem is pretty stable; when new textual material is generated, my computer indexes it as data as soon as it’s created. On the other hand, my computer doesn’t index information: if I’m looking for a specific scene in a movie on my drive, my computer will not be able to find that unless I have, say, a script of the film on my system. Even though digitized films are made of language, my computer’s search function only, in Joycean terms, the skims the surface of the water, recognizing only one state of language. What happens on my local ecosystem is prescribed, limited to its routine, striving to function harmoniously. I have software to protect against any viruses that might destabilize or contaminate it, allowing my computer to run as it’s supposed to.

Things get more complicated when I connect my computer to a network, suddenly transforming my local ecosystem into a node on a global one. All I need to do is to send and receive an email to show the linguistic effects of the networked ecosystem. If I take a plain text version of the nursery rhyme Edison used to test the phonograph with, "Mary Had A Little Lamb":

Mary had a little lamb,
little lamb, little lamb,
Mary had a little lamb,
whose fleece was white as snow.
And everywhere that Mary went,
Mary went, Mary went,
and everywhere that Mary went,
the lamb was sure to go.

and email it to myself, it comes back:

Received: from [10.10.0.28] (unverified [212.17.152.146]) by zarcrom.net (SurgeMail 4.0j) with ESMTP id 58966155-1863875 for <xxx@ubu.com>; Sun, 26 Apr 2009 18:17:50 -0500 Return-Path: <xxx@ubu.com>
Mime-Version: 1.0
Message-Id: <p06210214c61a9c1ef20d@[10.10.0.28]>
Date: Mon, 27 Apr 2009 01:17:55 +0200
To: xxx@ubu.com
From: Kenneth Goldsmith <xxx@ubu.com>
Subject: Mary Had A Little Lamb
Content-Type: multipart/alternative; boundary="="

---

Mary had a little lamb,
little lamb, little lamb,
Mary had a little lamb,
whose fleece was white as snow.
And everywhere that Mary went,
Mary went, Mary went,
and everywhere that Mary went,
the lamb was sure to go.

and email it to myself, it comes back:
whose fleece was white as snow.
And everywhere that Mary went,
Mary went, Mary went, and everywhere that Mary went,
the lamb was sure to go.
</html>
</x-</html>
</x-
</html>

While I haven't written a word, my simple email comes back to me a much more complex document than I sent out. The nursery rhyme, front and center when it left me, returns buried amongst reams of language, to the point where I almost can't find it, padded out by many varieties of language. A remarkable amount of it is normal English words: Status, style, head, boundary; there's also odd, poetic compounding of words: X-Authenticated-User, padding-bottom, SurgeMail); then there's html tags: , , ; and strange stringings together of equal signs: ============; and finally, there's lots of long numbers 58966155-1863875; and hybrid compounds: <p06210214c61a9c1ef20d@[10.10.0.28]>. What we're seeing are the linguistic marks left by the network ecology on my text, all of which is a result of the journey the rhyme made by leaving my machine to interact with other machines. A paratextual reading of my email would claim all of the new texts as being of equal importance to the nursery rhyme. Identifying the sources of those texts and noting their subsequent impact is a part of the reading and writing experience. The new text is a demonstration of local and networked ecologies acting together to create a new piece of writing.

We can create or enter into textual microclimates on a large scale -- such as chat rooms or tweets -- or more intimately with one-on-one instant messaging. Swarms of users on social networking sites around a keyword / trending topic can also create intensely focused microclimates of textuality.

I can take the transcript of an IM session and, stripping it of its networked context, it's immediately indexed by my machine and entered back into the safe stasis of my local ecology. Now let's say I take that same transcript and upload a copy of it to a publicly accessible server where it can be downloaded, while keeping a copy on my PC. I have the identical text in two places, operating in two distinct ecosystems, like twins, one who spends their life close to home, and the other who adventures out into the world: each textual life is marked accordingly. The text document on my PC sits untouched in a folder, remaining unchanged, while the text in play on the network is subject to untold changes: it can be cracked, password protected, stripped of its textual character, converted into plain text, remixed, written into, translated, deleted, eradicated, converted to sound, image or video, and so forth. If a version of that text were somehow to find its way back to me, it might very well be more unrecognizable than my nursery rhyme.

The editing process that occurs between two people via email of a word processing document is an example of a microclimate where the variables are extremely limited and controlled. The tracked editorial changes are extra-linguistic and purposeful. Opening up the variables a little more, think of what that happens when an mp3 is passed around from one user to another, each slightly remixing it, defying any definitive version. In these ecologies, final versions do not exist. Unlike the result of a printed book or pressed LP, there is no endgame, rather flux is the inherent to the digital.
The text cycle is primarily additive, spawning new texts continuously. If a hosting directory is made public, language is siphoned off like water from a well, replicating it infinitely. There is no need to assume that -- notwithstanding any of the above mentioned catastrophes -- that a textual drought will occur. The morass of language does not deplete, rather it creates a wider, rhizomatic ecology, leading to a continuous and infinite variety of textual occurrences and interactions across both the network and the local environment.

The uncreative writer constantly cruises the web for new language, the cursor sucking up words from untold pages like a stealth encounter. Those words, sticky with residual junky code and formatting, are transferred back into the local environment and scrubbed with TextSoap, which restores them back to their virginal states by removing extra spaces, repairing broken paragraphs, deleting email forwarding marks, straightening curly quotation marks, even extracting text from the morass of html. With one click of a button, these soiled texts are cleaned and ready to be redeployed for future use.

Language as Material

There's been a lot of talk the past few years about net neutrality, a concept which argues either for or against assigning different values to the various types of data that flows through our networks. Net neutrality advocates claim that all data on the network be treated as equal, whether it be a piece of spam or a Nobel Laureate's speech. Their advocacy reminds me of the post office which charges by the pound, not by what's inside the package: you can't charge more to send a couture dress than you can for a book of poetry just because it's more valuable.

Uncreative writing mirrors the ethos of net neutral advocates, claiming that one way of treating language is materially, foregrounding its formal qualities over its communicative ones, viewing it as substance which moves and morphs through its various states and ecosystems. Yet like data, language works on several levels, endlessly flipping back and forth between the meaningful and the material: we can choose to weigh it and we can choose to read it. There's nothing stable about it: even in their most abstracted form, letters are embedded with semantic, semiotic, historical, cultural and associative DNA. Think of the letter a and it's anything but neutral. Associations for me include The Scarlet Letter, a top grade, the title of Louis Zukofsky's life poem, Andy Warhol's novel, and so forth. When non-objectivist painters tried to rid painting of illusion and metaphor, you can see why they chose geometric forms, not letters to do so.

Right now, I am writing transparently: how I'm using words is supposed to be invisible to you so can follow what I'm saying. If, instead, I WAS TO WRITE IN ALL CAPS, I move into the material or oblique. You'd first notice the way it looked then -- noting that CAPS generally connote SHOUTING -- its tone, and lastly, its message. In day-to-day life we rarely notice the material properties of language except for when, say, we encountering a stutterer or a person with a heavy accent, we first notice how they say, secondly we decode what are they saying. When we listen to an opera sung in a language that we don't understand, we push language's formal properties to the front -- its cadences and rhythms -- choosing sound over sense. If we further choose to invert the transparency of words, we can hear them as sound or see them as shapes. One of modernism's great aspirations was to skew language in this way, but the backlash it produced was equally strong: foregrounding its materiality disrupts normative flows of communication. Human beings have trouble enough understanding each other, critics complained. Why would we purposely want to make it more difficult?

In most literature, most writers strive to strike a balance between these two states. A way to think of this is similar to the way the transparency slider bar in Photoshop functions: slide the bar far to the right and your image is 100% opaque; all the way to the left renders it barely visible, a ghost of its former self. In literature, if the slider is skewed towards complete transparency then language becomes functional discourse, the sort of language used to write a newspaper editorial or caption a photograph. Slide it back a little bit and it becomes prose: Lo-lee-ta: the tip of the tongue taking a trip of three steps down the palate to tap, at three, on the teeth. Lo. Lee. Ta. Nabokov's opening hits a perfect note between sound and sense, signal and noise, poetry and narrative. After this dynamic opener, Nabokov moves the slider back towards sense, swapping it for a more transparent style in order to tell a story.

Two movements in the middle of the twentieth century, Concrete Poetry and Situationism, experimented with sliding the slider all the way up at 100% opacity. In uncreative writing, new meaning is created by repurposing pre-existing texts. In order to work with text this way, words must first be rendered opaque and material. Both of these movements viewed materiality as primary goals, the Situationists through détournement and the Concretists by literally treating letters as building blocks. The Situationists worked in a variety of mediums, realizing their vision of the city as canvas whereas the Concretists took more traditional tack, mostly publishing books. By envisioning the page as a screen, the Concretists' were able to predict the way we would work with language in the digital world half a century later.

1. The Situationists: Out in the Streets

In the mid 50s, a group of artists and philosophers who called themselves The Situationist International proposed three concepts designed to infuse magic and excitement into the dull routine of everyday life: the dérive, détournement, and psychogeography. Their idea, not unlike that of uncreative writing, was not the need to reinvent life but to reframe it, reclaiming dead zones as alive. A slight shift of perspective could lead to fresh takes on tired subject matter: renaming a symphony without altering the music, drifting through a city with no goal in mind, or putting new subtitles on an old movie. By creating new situations, such interventions were intended as a catalyst for social change filtered through a reorientation of normal life.

If we were to map out our daily movements, we'd find that we tend to stick to what we know with little deviation. We move from our house, to our job, to the gym, to the supermarket, back to the house and get up the next day and do it all again. Guy Debord, one of the key figures in Situationism, proposed taking a holiday from those routines in the form of the dérive or drift, which was meant to renew the urban experience by intentionally moving through our urban spaces without intention, opening up ourselves to the spectacle and theater that is the city. Debord claimed that our urban spaces are rich places -- full of untold encounters, wondrous architecture, complex human interaction -- which we've grown too numb to experience. His remedy was to take a day or two out and disorient ourselves (often with the aid of drugs or alcohol) by stumbling about our city, tempering the grid of urbanity with the organic quality of not knowing, being pulled by intuition and desire, not by obligation and necessity. We might want to spend a night in a house that's in the process of being torn down; or hitchhike without destination through Paris during a transportation strike -- just to add more confusion; or break into graveyards and catacombs, wandering aimlessly through the bones.

By taking our city's physical geography and overlaying it with psychogeography -- a technique of mapping the psychic and emotional flows of a city instead of by its rational grids of streets -- we become more sensitive to our surroundings: "The sudden change of ambiance in a street within the space of a few meters; the evident division of a city into zones of distinct psychic atmospheres; the path of least resistance that is automatically followed in aimless strolls (and which has no relation to the physical contour of the terrain); the appealing or repelling character of certain places." Geography, then, that most concrete of propositions to which we are bound, is reconfigurable and customizable through the imagination.

Psychogeography can take many forms: One could create an alternate map of a city according to specific emotions, for example, mapping Paris not by arrondissement, but by every place you've shed a tear. Or you could create a psychogeographic map of a city's language by a making a dérive from point A to point B, writing down every word your eyes encounter on buildings, signage, parking meters, flyers and so forth. You'd end up with a trove of rich language, myriad in its tones and directives, comprised of peripheral words you’d most likely never paid attention to such as the fine print on a parking meter.

Guy Debord tells of a friend who wandered "through the Harz region of Germany while blindly following the directions of a map of London," détourning that map by assigning it a purpose for which it was not intended; it still functioned as a map, but yielded unpredictable results. Détourment is a way of taking existing objects, words, ideas, artworks, media, etc. and using them differently so that they become entirely new experiences. For example, Debord proposed that we take Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" and simply rename it "Lenin Symphony." After having dedicated his symphony to Napoleon when he was First Consul, Beethoven reneged his dedication when Bonaparte proclaimed himself Emperor. From that time on the symphony had no dedication and Beethoven changed the title to the generic "Heroic Symphony, Composed To Celebrate The Memory Of A Great Man." Debord, sensing that this was a free space, ripe for détournement, decided to fill the vacancy with his great man: Lenin.

There's a series of wonderful films by René Viénet that takes B-grade foreign exploitation flicks and re-subtitles them with political rhetoric: a sexist Japanese porn film is détourned into a protest statement about the oppression of women and the exploitation of workers. Similarly, a cheap kung-fu flick, in which the master teaches disciples the secrets of martial arts, is subtitled so that the master schools the students in the finer points of Marxism and is re-titled Can Dialectics Break Bricks? "Anyway, most films only merit being cut up to compose other works," Debord says.

Nor are the plastic arts immune to détourment. The Danish Situationist painter Asger Jorn took old thrift shop paintings and painted new images over them. In an essay entitled "Détourned Painting," he wrote:

Be modern, collectors, museums.
If you have old paintings, do not despair. Retain your memories but détourn them so that they correspond with your era. Why reject the old if one can modernize it with a few strokes of the brush? This casts a bit of contemporaneity on your old culture. Be up to date, and distinguished at the same time. Painting is over. You might as well finish it off. Detourn. Long live painting.

In 1959, Jorn and Debord collaborated on a book, Mémoires, that had a sandpaper cover: when slid in and out of the shelf, it destroys its neighbors. Titles, too, of books could be détourned: "We believe it would be possible to produce an instructive psychogeographical détournement of George Sand's Consuelo, which thus decked out could be relaunched on the literary market disguised under some innocuous title like Life in the Suburbs, or even under a title itself détourned, such as The Lost Patrol."

Low culture was subject to détournement. In 1951, The Situationists envisioned "a pinball machine arranged in such a way that the play of the lights and the more or less predictable trajectories of the balls would form a metagraphic-spatial composition entitled Thermal Sensations and Desires of People Passing by the Gates of the Cluny Museum Around an Hour after Sunset in November." Comic strip speech bubbles were replaced with new texts to create the most politically-charge funnies ever written.

Debord saw these cultural efforts as first steps towards an ultimate goal of the complete transformation of daily life: "Finally, when we have got to the stage of constructing situations – the ultimate goal of all our activity – everyone will be free to détourn entire situations by deliberately changing this or that determinant condition of them." Such situations were regularly enacted in the Happenings of the early 60s and found their fullest flowering on the streets of Paris in May '68, when the walls of the city were sprayed with Situationist slogans. Punk rock, too, claims Situationsim as its roots: On numerous occasions Malcolm McLaren has said that the Sex Pistols grew directly out of Situationist theories.

For Debord, the city is an ecology, a series of networks, each replete with its own potential for meaningful exchanges and encounters:

The ecological analysis of the absolute or relative character of fissures in the urban network, of the role of microclimates, of distinct neighborhoods with no relation to administrative boundaries, and above all of the dominating action of centers of attraction, must be utilized and completed by psychogeographical methods. The objective passional terrain of the dérive must be defined in accordance both with its own logic and with its relations with social morphology.

Our digital ecology is a virtual corollary to Debord's urbanism and many of the same gestures he proposed in meatspace can be enacted on the screen. As familiar as our urban movements are, our cyber-ramblings tend to be equally prescribed: we visit the same webpages, blogs and social networking sites again and again. We could break out by randomly clicking from one link to another, viewing a web surfing session as dérive. Or we could take the source code and graphics from a major news site and populate it with text of our choosing, like the poet Brian Kim Stefans did by repopulating the contents of The New York Times website with the Situationist writings of Raoul Vaneigem.

When peer-to-peer file-sharing began, widespread détournement of MP3s took a form referred to as a "dinosaur egg," wrongly titling a song for the purposes of promotion. A young unknown band would take a song of theirs, re-titled it "Like A Virgin," and throw it out onto the networks with the hopes that the millions of Madonna fans would download it and hear their music. The "dinosaur egg" was the cultural artifact as Trojan horse, flowing without direction, its author not knowing who would be receiving it nor what the response would be. On our networks, displaced objects are far more common than translated ones. Like a meteor crashing to earth, there's no time for translation, rather the appearance of the object and its displacement are a new cultural condition, creating a climate of widespread disjunction; we can't understand it, yet we must accommodate it without having to know what it is or where it came from. Disjunction and displacement are the new translation.

Variants of Situationist détournement can be found in the visual arts involving the eradication of texts. In 1978, the conceptual artist Sara Charlesworth took the front pages from 45 newspapers from around the world and, with the exception of the newspaper's title header, erased all of the text, leaving only the photographs in place. Charlesworth describes her process:

[The work] Follows photo of Italian Prime Minister Aldo Moro held in captivity by the Red Brigade as photo is dispersed in newspapers worldwide on April 21, 1978. This photo was released by the Red Brigade to "prove" Moro was alive following their previous day's announcement of his assassination. All text deleted. All photos remain in place on front pages of world newspapers revealing import of event in relation to "local" news priorities.

Why is Moro's image the only photograph on the front page of Il Messaggero and yet only one of four on The New York Times? What does this tell us about local versus international news? About the editorial decisions that were made? About the politics of the newspaper? A simple gesture of removal reveals a lot about the visual thinking, politics and editorial decisions behind what is presented as stable and objective information, elegantly revealing the structures of power and subjectivity behind the news. In these pieces, language is displaced in the cloak of erasure, leaving behind only structure and image.

The photographer Matt Siber removes language as well. He shoots mundane scenes of streetscapes and interiors -- parking lots, drug stores, subway stations, freeways -- then systematically eradicates every trace of language in them. He then lifts the all removed text intact that he took from the photograph and drops it situ -- fonts and all -- onto a blank white panel next to the photograph. The two are presented as one piece: a world devoid of language and a map the removal.

By removing the language, we become aware of its layout as well as its prevalence and ubiquity, a fact we are blind to in our daily lives. We see how language in the city is ruled as much by the grid of architecture as the streets are: When the words are displaced on to a blank sheet of paper, the ghosts of architecture remain visible, enforcing its structure onto the words. Architecture, generally front and center, is demoted to a secondary role as a page for words; the buildings feel empty and forlorn without them. If we examine the types of language on the white panels, we become aware of its varieties and microclimates, its tonalities and clusterings. We also see how bland and banal most of the public language is surrounding us. One could easily imagine laying Siber’s maps of words over any number of gridded buildings in any number of cities with the same effect. Surely every city has a building that is inscribed with the words "SELL BUY / LOANS CASH / SELL LOANS."

In "Untitled #21" we’re presented with language as branding. From the text adorning the car, to the dealership, to the logos on the sneakers of the figure, it’s all commercial, a veritable landscape of consumerism. The ghost panel is a visual poem, a linguistic schema of logos describing forms: a ghost car, with the forms of its wheels described by logos. Looking at the text panel, the imperatives in advertising are absurd when decontextualized: who in America hasn’t seen a Ford lately? Why would anyone want to look again? In fact, this photograph is nothing but Ford.

In the denser urban environment of "Untitled #13," the ad language and branding is just as present, yet less homogenous. The text panel, which looks like it could be a minimalist spread from a fashion magazine -- it’s hard to imagine a fashion magazine denuded of its images -- is spatialized, its elegant fonts strewn across the page in a dashing manner. But on closer examination, there’s an intersection of tonalities and brands that would never be found on the pages of Vogue. Through the uncanny placement of the delivery van, the cosmetic brand Bliss dialogues with Lay’s potato chips. Siber’s accomplishment is remarkable since, had we been walking down the street and seen the van parked in front of the billboard, it is unlikely that we would have seen the intersection of chips and makeup the same way. Similarly, the Dior billboard text is neatly bisected by a line of words taken from the bar of the cherry picker. And the "bliss" text, beginning with "wise" (an serendipitous coincidence with the "Lay’s" below it) is itself truncated by the fold in the billboard being installed. Two hours later, with the delivery truck gone and the billboard installation finished, Siber would’ve mapped a very different landscape. Words are temporary, moveable and changeable in the city’s commercial microclimates.

Moved indoors, branding has its own psychogeographic topography. "Untitled #3" shows a drug store display, scrubbed of its texts. Here packaging, with an slant toward natural beauty, sets the structure and tone of the work. It’s no coincidence that the textual placement mirrors the forms of stems and flowers upon which they’re placed. And when removed to the blank page, in fact, the words form a garden of language -- which could easily be titled, "The Healing Garden" -- not unlike Mary Ellen Solt’s word-flower concrete poems of the 1960s.

Siber’s words are derived from consumer notions of "organics": even the roots of the flowers are price tags. Warhol pioneered these notions with his détournement of Brillo Boxes and Campbells soup cans fifty years ago. More recently the photographer Andreas Gursky’s monumental consumerist landscapes -- such as his well-known image, "99 Cent," of an endlessly mirrored discount store -- shows us an infinite landscape of consumption, a modern-day bumper crop, a bounty of abundance. What Siber show us is the hyperreality and simulacra of modern retail display, which has both learned from and ultimately surpassed Warhol as it’s become part of our everyday landscape.
The anti-corporate film Food Inc. begins: "When you go through the supermarket, there is an illusion of diversity. So much of our industrial food turns out to be rearrangements of corn." A similar sentiment could be made about the types of public language surrounding us. When we look closely at what types of words splatter across our environment, we'll find it's mostly prescriptive and directive: either the language of authority (parking signs, license plates) or the language consumerism (advertising, product, display). While we have the illusion of abundance and variety, in our language-steeped cities, the varieties are shockingly small.

The audio equivalent to Siber's and Charlesworth's practices is a shadowy group of anonymous artists who call themselves Language Removal Services, which literally describes what they do: they remove all language from celebrities' recorded speech. Legend has it that they began as Hollywood sound editors, whose job it was to clean up the stars' speech, removing all their um's, ah's, and stutters from the day's rushes. After work, they'd surreptitiously scoop up all the bits of tape left on the cutting room floor and reassemble them into non-verbal portraits of famous actors as artworks. What began as a joke became serious as their practice extended to all forms of pre-recorded speech. Before long, they were making portrait of politicians, sports stars, and poets, leaving only the extra-linguistic traces: stumbles, ums, ughs, sighs, sneezes, coughs, breaths, swallows. Whether it's Marilyn Monroe, Malcolm X or Noam Chomsky, the intonation and rhythms distinctly belong to the speaker. William S. Burroughs' breathing and stutters contain his unmistakable nasal quality and even his grunts sound famously Burroughsian.

My own book Soliloquy -- a 600-page unedited record of every word I spoke for a week, from the moment I work up on Monday morning until the moment I went to bed the following Sunday -- was an investigation into how much one average person spoke over the course of a normal week. The book's postscript was: "If every word spoken in New York City daily were somehow to materialize as a snowflake, each day there would be a blizzard." There was a great snowstorm that year, and as the trucks and backhoes moved up and down Broadway, I imagined this mass as language. Daily, such collections would happen, backhoes shoveling language into the back of trucks, which in turn, like the snow, would be dumped in the Hudson River and floated out to sea. I was reminded of Rabelais, who tells of a winter battle when it was so cold that the sounds created during the battle instantly froze upon hitting the air, falling to the ground, never reaching the ears of the combatants. When springtime arrived, these long inaudible sounds began to melt randomly, creating a racket by skewing their original temporal sequences of action. It was suggested that some of the frozen sounds be preserved for later use by packing them in oil and straw.

The mathematician Charles Babbage was correct when he speculated that the air had great capacities for carrying information. In 1837, he predicted our impossibly packed, but invisible airwaves:

The air itself is one vast library, on whose pages are for ever written all that man has ever said or woman whispered. There, in their mutable but unerring characters, mixed with the earliest, as well as with the latest sighs of mortality, stand for ever recorded, vows unredeemed, promises unfulfilled, perpetuating in the united movements of each particle, the testimony of man's changeful will."

The thought of all that invisible language racing through the very air we breath is overwhelming: television, terrestrial radio, shortwave, satellite radio, citizen band, text messages, wireless data, satellite television, and cell phone signals but to name a few. Our air is now chokingly thick with language posing as silence. Nowhere is it as thick as in New York City, with its density of population and architecture: language is both silent and screamingly loud. The New York street is a place of public language. From signage to chatter, traces of language are inscribed on nearly every surface: t-shirts, sides of trucks, manhole covers, watch faces, baseball caps, license plates, food packages, parking meters, newspapers, candy wrappers, mailboxes, buses, posters, billboards and bicycles. It’s the density of population in New York that gives the illusion of anonymity, the sense that there are so many people around me that no one can possibly be listening to what I’m saying. In much of the world, talk goes on behind closed doors or sealed in climate-controlled cars, but on the streets of New York, words are out there for all to hear. One of my favorite things to do is to walk a few steps behind two people engaged in conversation for several blocks, listening to their conversation progress, punctuated by red lights, giving the speech a certain pace and rhythm. There’s a marvelous voyeuristic quality to hearing the most intimate of private conversations in the most public of places. In 1969, Vito Acconci created a work he called "Following Piece," whereby he simply followed the first person he saw, walking a few paces behind them, until they disappeared into a private space. As soon as they did, he would begin to follow the first person he saw until they went into a private space and so on. By mapping the city according to voyeurism, Acconci was enacting a Debordian derive, a psychogeographical cartography, a human chain of hypertext.

The modern city has added the complication of the mobile phone, yet another layer of language. A dérive -- the desire to get lost -- is hard when everyone either has a GPS embedded in their device or is broadcasting their coordinates to the public at large: "I’m walking north on Sixth Avenue, just past 23rd Street." The mobile phone has collapsed the space between private and public language. All language is public now. It's as if the illusion of public anonymity of the private conversation has been amped up. Everyone is intensely aware of the phenomenon of public cell phone use, most viewing it as inconsiderate, a nuisance. But I like to think of it as a release, a new level of textual richness, a reimagining of public discourse, half conversations resulting in a breakdown of narrative, a city full of mad people spewing remarkable soliloquies. It used to be this type of talk was limited to the insane and the drunken; today everyone shadow boxes language.

Public language on the streets used to include a physical embodiment of psychogeography: graffiti tagging. Ever changing due to the cat-and-mouse game played by taggers and the authorities, it was a physical model of textual instability. Subway cars tagged in the morning would be scrubbed clean by that night. Documentation was a must: the constant movement of the cars demanded specific times and locations for viewing the surviving works. Language traveled at high speeds, coming and going very quickly. When the city rid the subways of graffiti, there were changes in textual tactics. Exterior spray paint application was replaced by interior glass etching and plastic scratching, leaving ghost-like traces of the full-blown markings that once covered the cars. Today, the train exteriors are covered once again in another sort of temporary language, this time official language: paid advertising. The MTA learned from graffiti culture and détourned its tactics and methodology into a revenue-producing stream by covering the subway cars with paid advertising. The language itself is computer-generated and removable; next week, another series of advertisements will be stuck on the exterior of trains.

Impermanent language; moveable type; fluid language; language that refuses to be stuck in one form; sentiments expressed in language that can be swapped in a whim, a change of mind, a change of heart. A few years ago, shortly after the invasion of Iraq, I remember the widespread phenomenon of magnetic ribbons festooning the backs of cars. These ribbons were preceded by the bumper sticker, a committed gesture: once a bumper sticker is adhered, it's nearly impossible to remove. The magnet, however, is a tentative move, subject to whim. And sure enough, as popular sentiment turned against the war, the magnetic ribbon disappeared.

Soviet agitprop precipitated today's use of flexible language. Overnight, cathedrals would be turned into canons, trains into heroic revolutionary depictions, factory walls into a monumental works of propaganda, all quickly erected and just as quickly dismantled. In Flushing Meadows Park, the 1939 and 1964 World's Fairs took on similar characteristics: The erection of a spectacular city, only to be entirely dismantled just a few months later. Prescient and inspiring. John Cage said that music is all around us if only we had ears to hear it. I would extend that to say that particularly in New York, poetry is all around us, if only we had the eyes to see it and the ears to hear it.
Concrete Poetry and the Future of the Screen

Concrete Poetry, a little, somewhat forgotten movement in the middle of the last century, produced poems that didn’t look like poems: nothing was versified or lineated, there was no meter and very little metric rhythm. They looked more like corporate logos than they did poems: clusters of letters atop one another, sitting in the middle of a page. These were poems that bore more relation to the visual arts or to graphic design which, in fact, they were often mistaken for. Yet, sometimes a form is so ahead of its time -- so predictive -- that it takes many years to catch up to it. That’s what happened here.

Concrete poetry was an international movement that began in the early 50s and faded from view by the end of the 60s. It had a utopian agenda of creating a transnational, pan-linguistic way of writing that anyone -- regardless of where they lived or what their mother tongue was -- could understand. Think of it as a graphical Esperanto, taking language and rendering it as symbols and icons. Like most utopias, it never really got off the ground, yet scattered about in the ashes of its manifestoes are several kernels anticipating how we would think about language in the future. Like many other efforts in the twentieth century, the thrust of the movement was to force poetry into the modern age, away from the long-winded prosaic sentences of, say, Henry James, towards the headline-inspired compactness of Ernest Hemingway. Concrete poetry’s twist was to align the history of literature with the history of design and technology. By applying a Bauhaus sensibility to language, they invented new forms of poetry. Readability was the key: like a logo, a poem should be instantly recognizable. It just so happened that computing was moving in an identical direction, from the command line prompt to the graphical icon.

The poems themselves sometimes looked like gaggles of letters coming together to form a constellation. Sometimes they would deconstruct and look like leaves blown across a page willy-nilly. Other times, letters would form images -- a trophy or a face -- taking their cue from George Herbert’s 1633 poem "Easter Wings," in which a prayer is constructed visually, with lines getting successively longer and shorter, finally forming the images of a pair of wings.

The content of the poem -- humankind’s expanding and contracting fortunes -- is embodied in the image of the words. One glance at the poem and you get it’s message. "Easter Wings" is an icon, boiling down complex ideas into a single, easily-digested image. Concrete poetry aimed to render all language into poetic icons, similar to the way that everyone can understand the meaning of the folder icon on the computer screen.

The poems' visual simplicity belied an informed sense of history and intellectual weight behind them. Anchored in the tradition of medieval illuminated manuscripts and religious tracts, concrete poetry's modernist roots date back to Stéphane Mallarmé's "Un coup de des" (1897) where words were splayed across the page in defiance of traditional notions of versification, opening up the page as a material space, proposing it as a canvas for letters. Equally important was Guillaume Apollinaire’s Calligrammes (1912-18) in which letters were used visually to reinforce a poem's content: The letters of the poem "Il Pleut" pour down the page in lines, looking like streams of rain. Later, extending the practice of both Mallarmé and Apollinaire, E.E. Cummings’ stacks of atomized words proposed the page as a space where reading and seeing were mutually entangled. Ezra Pound’s use of Chinese ideograms and Joyce’s compound neologisms wrought from many languages gave concrete poetry ideas on how to carry out a transnational agenda.
Music, as well, played a part. The concrete poets borrowed Webern's notion of Klangfarbenmelodie -- a musical technique that involves distributing a musical line or melody to several instruments, rather than assigning it to just one instrument, thereby adding color (timbre) and texture to the melodic line. A poem could enact a multi-dimensional space, being visual, musical and verbal at once: they called it verbivocovisual.

But for all its smarts, concrete poetry was often dismissed as being little more than commercial one-liners -- akin to Robert Indiana's concrete poetry-inspired LOVE logo -- easily usurped by commercial culture into blacklight posters, t-shirts, or baubles. Even as conceptual artists began to use language as their primary material, the art world distanced itself. In 1969 Joseph Kosuth wrote "Concrete poetry was a formalization of the poet's material. And when the poets become materialistic, the state is in trouble." These sorts of dismissals resonate today. In a recent book about language and visual art from a top-notch academic press, a young art historian writes:

Understood in its most general sense, as 'language art,' poetry is a form that explores the aesthetics, structures, and operations of language as much as any specific content. In the postwar era, various types of concrete and visual poetry, in particular, promised to probe the space of the typographic page and link contemporary literature with the visual arts. Yet a reliance on rather quaint illustrational or pictorial modes -- as in poems that take on the shape of their subjects -- left much concrete poetry out of touch with changing paradigms in the visual arts and the wider conditions of language in modernity.

By focusing on concrete poetry's relationship to the art world, she misses the point: it turns out that the link was not so much with the visual arts but with the multimedia space of the screen. Had she gone back and read a 1963 tract written by the Swiss concretist Eugen Gomringer, she would've found much more than merely "quaint illustrational or pictorial modes":

Our languages are on the road to formal simplification, abbreviated, restricted forms of language are emerging. The content of a sentence is often conveyed in a single word. Moreover, there is a tendency among languages for the many to be replaced by a few which are generally valid. So the new poem is simple and can be perceived visually as a whole as well as in its parts... its concern is with brevity and conciseness.

A few years later, the concrete poet and theorist Mary Ellen Solt critiqued poetry's inability to keep up with the rest of culture, which she saw racing by:

Uses of language in poetry of the traditional type are not keeping pace with live processes of language and rapid methods of communication at work in our contemporary world. Contemporary languages exhibit the following tendencies: ... abbreviated statement on all levels of communication from the headline, the advertising slogan, to the scientific formula -- the quick, concentrated visual message.

The rise of global computer networks and their intensive use of language, both natural and computative, fueled these statements. As computing progressed from command line to icon, concrete poetry's parallel claim was that poetry, in order to remain relevant, needed to move from the verse and stanza to the condensed forms of the constellation, cluster, ideogram, and icon.

In 1958, a group of Brazilian concrete poets calling themselves the Noigandres group (after a word from Pound's Cantos), made a laundry list of physical attributes that they wanted their poetry to embody. When we read it, we see the graphical web described nearly four decades ahead of its time:

...space ("blancs") and typographical devices as substantive elements of composition... organic interpenetration of time and space... atomization of words, physiognomical typography; expressionistic emphasis on space... the vision, rather than the praxis... direct speech, economy and functional architecture...

All graphical user interfaces gives us "typographical devices as substantive elements of composition" in a dynamic setting of "time and space." Click on this word and watch it "atomize" in a "physiognomical" way. Without "functional architecture" -- the coding beneath the graphics and sounds -- the web would cease to work.

As modernists, they adored clean lines, sans-serif fonts and good design. Pulling theory from the plastic arts, they adhered closely to Greenbergian modernist tenets such as non-illusionistic space and autonomy of the artwork. Looking at early concrete poems, you can almost hear Greenberg saying "look how these 'shapes flatten and spread in the dense, two-dimensional atmosphere.'" In spite of ongoing attempts to prove otherwise, the screen and interface are, in essence, flat mediums. They generally employed sans-serif fonts such as Helvetica, for their classic design tropes. It's the same reason that Arial and Verdana have become the standard screen fonts: cleanness, readability and clarity.

The emotional temperature of their poems is intentionally kept process-oriented, controlled and rational:

Concrete poetry: total responsibility before language. Through realism. Against a poetry of expression, subjective and hedonistic. To create precise problems and to solve them in terms of sensible language. A general art of the word. The poem-product: useful object.

Against expression: such statements, with their need to create "precise problems" and to solve them with "sensible language," emerging with "a poem-product," and a "useful object" read more like a scientific journal than a literary manifesto. And it's that sort of mathematical level-headedness which makes their poetry so relevant to today's computing. Cool words for a cool environment.

Informed by Pop Art, the concretists engaged in the dialectics of language and advertising. As early as 1962, Decio Pignitari's poem "Beba Coca Cola" fuses the red and white colors of Coke with clean design to make an alliterative visual pun on the hazards of junk food and globalism. Over the course of a mere seven lines using only six words, the slogan "Drink Coca Cola" is transformed into "drool," "glue, coca(ine)," "shard," and finally into "cloaca / cesspool," a sewer or the intestinal digestive cavity where bodily waste is produced. Pignitari's poem is a testament to the powers of the icon, yet also works as a social, economic and political critique.

The international orientation of concrete poetry could be as celebratory as it could be critical. In 1965, poet Max Bense declared "... concrete poetry does not separate languages; it unites them; it combines them. It is this part of its linguistic intention that makes concrete poetry the first international poetical movement." Bense's insistence on a combinatory universally readable language predicts the types of distributive systems that the web enables. It's a poetics of pan-internationality, finding its ultimate expression in the de-centered, constellation-oriented global networks where no one geographic entity has sole possession of content.

By 1968, the idea of reader as passive receiver is called into question. The reader must distance herself from poetry's long yoke and simply perceive the poem's reality as structure and material:

[T]he old grammatical-syntactical structures are no longer adequate to advanced processes of thought and communication in our time. In other words the concrete poet seeks to relieve the poem of its centuries-old burden of ideas, symbolic reference, allusion, and repetitious emotional content; of its servitude to disciplines outside itself as an object in its own right for its own sake. This, of course, asks a great deal of what used to be called the reader. He must now perceive the poem as object and participate in the poet's act of creating it, for the concrete poem communicates first and foremost its structure.

But it works both ways. Concrete poetry has framed the discourse of the web, but the web has, in effect, given a second life to concrete poetry. Backlit by the screen, dusty, half-century old concrete poems look amazingly bright, fresh and contemporary. Like de Kooning's famous statement: "History doesn't influence me. I influence it," it's taken the web to make us see just how prescient concrete poetics was in predicting its own lively reception half a century later. What had been missing from concrete poetry was an appropriate environment in which it could flourish. For many years, concrete poetry has been in limbo, a displaced genre in search of a new medium. And now it's found one.
Anticipating Instability

1. Blurred: Parsing Thinking and Seeing

In 1970, the conceptual artist Peter Hutchinson proposed a work he called Dissolving Clouds which consisted of two parts, a written proposition and photographic documentation. The proposition states: "Using Hatha yoga techniques of intense concentration and pranic energy it is claimed that clouds can be dissolved. I tried it on the cloud (in square) in photographs. This is what happened. This piece happens almost entirely in the mind." The work is a humorous send-up of new age practices -- all clouds dissolve on their own without any help from us. It's also a piece that anyone can do: As I type this, I'm dissolving clouds in my mind.

Hutchinson's piece demonstrates one of the fundamental tenets of conceptual art: the difference between seeing and thinking.

Ludwig Wittgenstein used the optical illusion of the duck-rabbit to demonstrate the concept of visual instability. Like all optional illusions, it keeps flipping back and forth between being a duck and a rabbit. The way to stabilize it, at least momentarily, is to name what you see: "If you are looking at the object, you need not think of it; but if you are having the visual experience by the exclamation [I exclaim "A rabbit!"]}, you are also thinking of what you see." In Hutchinson's documentation, we are looking; in his linguistic proposition, we must think of what we see.

In 1960s and 70s conceptual art, the tension between materiality and proposition were continually tested to varying effects: how visual should an artwork be? In 1968, Lawrence Weiner began an ongoing series that he called Statements which permitted the works to take on any number of manifestations:

(1) The artist may construct the piece.
(2) The piece may be fabricated.
(3) The piece need not be built.

A piece could remain as a statement or it could be realized. Taking a classic work of Weiner's from this period, it's curious what happens when it's enacted. The proposition reads:

Two minutes of spray paint directly upon the floor from a standard aerosol spray can.

This statement left propositional form -- as language -- is open-ended. If two of us conceive of a mental image of Two minutes of spray paint directly upon the floor from a standard aerosol spray can, we're sure to have different ideas of what that might look like. You might think it was fire-engine red paint on a wooden floor; I might think it was Kelly green on a concrete floor. And we'd both be right.

The realization of the piece most frequently reproduced is the image above from the catalogue January 5-31, 1969, which is very much a fixed image visually, historically and circumstantially. It's got a great bloodline, hailing from the collection of famed conceptual artist, Sol Le Witt, lending this particular realization a lineage of provenance and authenticity.

That authenticity is reinforced by the black and white photo -- something that hardly exists any more -- endowing it with historicity. Further credibility is bestowed by the material fact that there is an actual photographic print in existence, a negative from which copies were made. Yet for the better part of the twentieth century, the photograph was suspect as not being capable of authenticity. Walter Benjamin, writing in 1935, states, "From a photographic negative, for example, one can make any number of prints; to ask for the 'authentic' print makes no sense." With the explosion of digital photography, Benjamin's proposition is exploded billions of times over. Suddenly we find analog photos -- particularly black and white -- reproduction recast as being unique and authentic.

In the photograph, the floor itself is not a neutral space, but an indicator of time and place: an old, rough, original industrial floor that was common in artists' lofts in lower Manhattan during this period. The realization as documented above was from Weiner's own loft on Bleecker Street. After decades of gentrification, such floors have been routinely ripped out and replaced as real estate values have climbed. In fact, after Weiner was displaced from that loft due to rising real estate prices, the purchaser of the loft, while in the midst of ripping out the floor and replacing them with new wooden floors, had Weiner's piece cut out intact -- old floorboards and all -- and sent to him as a gift. The piece resides in Weiner's storage vault to this day. What this photograph is, then, is not simply a realization of a proposition, but a coded, historic period piece, which evokes nostalgia for a Manhattan that has long ceased to exist in a form that signifies authenticity. We could refer to this documentation as the "classic" version of the work. In any case, it's a far cry from the neutral proposition Two minutes of spray paint directly upon the floor from a standard aerosol spray can. Although wildly specific and pinned to a certain place and time it shows, in this case, how much more limiting the realization of a work is as opposed to the simple proposition of it.

Is it possible to make a proposition and have it realized in a stable and neutral environment? Let's make a proposition: "A red circle with a two-inch diameter, drawn on the computer." When I do that, this is the result:

Yet, from the outset, we're plagued by language. This is what my computer calls "red," but the name "red" on the computer is merely shorthand for more language. "Red" is more accurately code: a hexadecimal code: "#FF0000"; or an RGB code: "R: 255, G:0, B:0"; or an HSB code: "H: 0, S: 0, B: 100". Even if you realize the identical proposition on your computer, due to your monitor's settings, age, manufacturer and so forth, you're bound to come up with a different color that what's displayed on my monitor. What, then, is "red"? We're thrown into a digital version of a Wittgensteinian loop:

Does it make sense to say that people generally agree in their judgments of colour? What would it be like for them not to? -- One man would say a flower was read which another called blue, and so on. -- But what right should we have to call these people's words "red" and "blue" our colour-words?

Then there is the problem of scale and realization: while it might be created on the computer, should it be printed out? By a two-inch diameter, do we mean a two-inch diameter when it is printed or when it is on the screen? According to the directions, "drawn on the computer," I'll take that to mean that it should be viewed on the computer. But that's problematic because I didn't specify a screen resolution. I could take the a digital ruler and measure a 2" diameter circle in 640 x 480 resolution but if I change it to 1024 x 768 resolution, although it still says two inches, it's considerably smaller on my screen.

If I email you my red circle and you view it on your computer at an identical resolution, the circle will still be a different size, due to wide variances in monitors and their resolutions. When displayed on the web, the variables are compounded: not only do we have screen resolution and monitor difference to reconcile, but there's the question of browsers and the way they each display information differently. My browser, for example, often scales images to fit on what it calls a "page." Only when you click on the image does it expand to its "actual" size in pixels. While the printed version will be able to stabilize the scale problem, we're left with the variables of printer output: contingent upon your ink and paper stock, what your printer outputs as "red" will certainly be a different shade and tone than mine.

Moving beyond the formal problems of instability, then there's the slippage of meaning. When I look at my red circle and think of what it could mean, my associations include a stop light, a ball, the Japanese flag, the planet Mars or the sun setting. In art, I am reminded of the geometries found in Russian Constructivism. Sitting on my screen, shimmering against the white of my "page," its primarily retinal quality reminds me of an Adolph Gottlieb Abstract Expressionist painting minus the expression, now a red circle reduced to a geometric icon.

Turning away from the bright red spot on my screen, I see that the image has been burned into my retina so much so that when I gaze at the white wall over my desk, I see a an afterimage, but it's not red at all: it's green, the opposite and complimentary color of red. And if I try to really examine it, it disappears, leaving a hovering ghost of its former self. What our eyes see is as restless and as unstable as trying to nail exactly what a digital red circle is.

Thinking makes it no better. If I turn away from the computer and think of the words "red circle," I conjure a very different sort of "red circle" in my mind. The image I'm thinking of is a round shape with a red outline, the interior is white. Now, if I think of a filled red circle, the hues vary. Concentrating, I see the red as a fire-engine red. Now it's changing to a maroon. In my mind, the image is restless, morphing and changing its properties. Just like the duck-rabbit optical illusion, I can't seem to make it sit still. Size, too, in my mind is variable from cosmically huge (Mars) to a microscopic (a red blood cell).

When I type the words, I get all of the above associations and more:

red circle

I see that these two words consist of ten elements: nine letters and a space. There are two r's and two e's, one in each word. The d of red is echoed in the cl of circle. There are also several instances of visual echoing in the letter forms: two repeated instances of c and e. The cl appears to be a split variation of the letter d as the i could be read as the l with the top severed and floated above its stem.

The words "red circle" have three syllables. I can pronounce the words with the stress on both the first or second words with a significant change in meaning. red circle brings forth the color; red circle emphasizes the shape over the color. If I say the words "red circle" aloud, I can alter my intonation up and down in a sing-song-y way, or speak them flat and monotone. The way I choose to speak them makes for an entirely different reception of them. In speaking the words, I also invoke the semiotic and emblematic properties of the Japanese flag or Mars.

Taking it one step further, if I perform an internet search on the phrase "red circle," it takes me places far outside what I, as an individual, can conjure. There are several businesses named Red Circle: a lounge called Red Circle in San Diego, an advertising agency in Minneapolis, a project that provides resources about HIV and AIDS for Native American gay men, and a company that runs tea tours in San Francisco. There are two films called Red Circle, one directed by Jean-Pierre Melville from 1970 and a forthcoming film starring Liam Neeson and Orlando Bloom. There is an imprint of Archie comics starring non-Archie characters called Red Circle. In literature, there is "The Adventure of the Red Circle," a Sherlock Holmes story, where the mark of a red circle means certain death. And that's just the first page of results.

When dropped into a semantically-driven image search, the words "red circle" throw us back to the visual, but it's far from my simple red circle shown above. Instead I find wide varieties of red circles. The first image is of the universal symbol for not permitted, an outlined red circle with a diagonal slash through it. The next is a sloppy spray painted red circle outline on a concrete wall which looks like it could be a variation of the Weiner proposition. Following that is what looks to be a Photoshopped outline of a red circle floating in a blue sky intersecting a cloud. Next is a veritable blizzard of red circles: painterly red circles, expressive Kandinsky-like red circles, a Swatch watch with a red circle around its face, a three-dimensional red circular piece of foam that holds test tubes and an image of a bonsai tree encapsulated within a red circle.

In fact, the results do not return a filled solid red circle until the several pages deep which, in the thumbnail image, looks very much like my red circle. Yet when viewed full size, to my surprise, it's not a red circle at all, but an image of red shag rug, textured and modeled. And it's not really perfectly round: its perimeter is broken on the right side by some stray shag pieces. The color is different as well. This circle is overall more purplish than my red circle. And it's got a great deal of variety in its shading, getting darker in the bottom left quadrant and growing lighter toward the top. Overall, there are dozens of shades of red, with plays of light and shadows. If you're reading a paper copy of this book, it's going to be another shade of red; if you're reading the digital version of this, there's no way that the color is going to match what's on my screen, a "red" as the "author" intended it. Which is the correct version? Clearly this a very complex and instable "red circle."

But we can complicate it further: When I download the shag rug to my computer and change its file extension from .jpg to .txt, and open it in a text-editor, I get this, which looks nothing like a red circle. Naturally, neither the word "red," nor the word "circle," nor the image of a red circle is anywhere to be found. We're thrown back into semantic language, but an entirely different one from the search term that lead me to this carpet or the hexadecimal color schemes. (If I perform the same experiment with my simple computer-generated "red circle," I get a similar results: just because it's computer-generated or "flat" doesn't make the underlying code any simpler.)

Where do we go from here? We could take this text and attempt to find patterns that would aid an investigation into the plasticity and mutability of language posing as image. Or we could do a close reading on this text alone, commenting, for example, how curious the row of fifty-one 7's is in the third line; or on the random but somewhat even spatial distribution of graphical apples on the page. Metaphorically we could even say that those apples are pictographic metaphors for the abstraction we find ourselves in now, after all, apples should be red... If we were visual or concrete poets, we could scoop up all of this language into a text-editing program, shade the letters "red" and line them up to create an ascii image of a red apple or a red circle. But once we get into a digital image of an apple, it's no longer an "apple", it's an "Apple." Enough.

All of this is to point out how slippery and complex the play between materiality and concept, word and image, proposition and realization, and thinking and seeing has become. What used to be a binary play between Weiner's proposition: "the artist may [or may not] construct the piece," today, language is suspect to so many variables -- linguistic, imagistic, digital and contextual -- that words seem to have become possessed by some spirit, an ever-changing cipher, sometimes manifesting itself as image, then changing into words, sounds, or video. Writing must take into account the multiple, these fluid and ever-shifting states, from the very conceptual to the very material. And writing that can mimic, reflect and morph itself in similar ways seems to be pointed in the right direction.
2. Nude Media: Tony Curtis Defrocked

These sorts of slippages take place across all forms of media and can be best described by a phenomenon I call nude media. What I mean by this is that once a digital file is downloaded from the context of a site, it's free or naked, stripped bare of the normative external signifiers that tend to give as much meaning to an artwork as the contents of the artwork itself. Unadorned with branding or scholarly liner notes, emanating from no authoritative source, these objects are nude, not clothed. Thrown into open peer-to-peer distribution systems, nude media files often lose even their historical significance and blur into free-floating sound works, traveling in circles that they would not normally reach if clad in their conventional clothing. Branding, logos, layout, and context all create meaning, but when thrown into the digital environment, such attributes are destabilized, stripping a fully-clothed document into nakedness as the more variables are thrown into the mix.

All forms of traditional media that are morphed onto the web are in some way defrocked. An article about Tony Curtis, for example, which appeared in the Sunday Arts & Leisure section of The New York Times, is fully clothed in the authoritative conventions of The New York Times. Everything from the typeface to the pull quote to the photo layout bespeaks the authority of the paper of record. There's something comforting about reading the Arts & Leisure section on Sunday which the visual presentation of the paper both produces and reinforces. The New York Times represents stability in every way [fig.].

If we look at that same article on the New York Times website, however, we find that much of what gave the piece its rock steadiness in the traditional print version is gone. For starters, there's a big red sans-serif "W" for Washington instead of the classic black serifed "T" for Tony. Thus, the message is that the place in which the interview happened has greater significance than the subject of the article. Other things have changed as well, most notably the size and character of the typeface. The default typeface on any browser is Times Roman, but if we look at the newspaper compared to the screen, we'll see that Times Roman is not New York Times Roman.

The image of Mr. Curtis, too, is different. It's shoved over to the side and shrunken, reminding us of Sarah Charlesworth's newspaper détournements. The Starbucks banner -- which appears nowhere in the print edition -- almost functions as a caption. I could go on and on but I think the point is obvious. The web version of the article might be termed scantily clad.

In the upper right hand corner of the web page is an option to email the article. When we do that, what arrives in our inbox is extremely stripped down compared to the web page. [fig.] It's just a text. The only indication that it comes from The New York Times is a line at the top that says "This article from NYTimes.com has been sent to you by..." The Times font has vanished, to be replaced -- at least in my inbox -- by Microsoft's proprietary sans-serif screen font Verdana. There are no images, no pull quotes, and no typographical treatments, save the capitalization of the words "WASHINGTON" and "TONY CURTIS'S." How easy it would be to strip out the words "NYTimes.com." If we do that, this file becomes detached from any authority, completely naked. In fact, it is entirely indistinguishable from any number of text-based attachments that arrive in my inbox daily.

To go one step further, if we cut and paste the text -- and it is a text and no longer an "article" -- into Microsoft Word and run a primitive altering function on it, for example the auto summarize feature [fig.], we end up with something bearing minimal resemblance to the original article as printed in the paper or on the web. Now the lead line is “SUMMARY OF ARTICLE,” followed by its provenance and then the headline. Curiously, the word “Washington,” which figured so prominently in prior versions, is nowhere to be found. The body text, too, now becomes radically unhinged and stripped down.

If I were to take this text and either email it to a number of people or enter it into an online text-mangling machine, the nude media game could continue ad-infinitem. Think of it as an ever-evolving game of telephone. Free-floating media files around the Net are subject to continuous morphing and manipulation as they become further removed from their sources.

When destabilized texts are recontextualized and reclothed back into “authoritative” structures, the results can be jarring. Examples of this include the Pornolizer (pornolize.com) machine [fig.], which turns all web pages into smutty, potty-mouthed documents while retaining their authoritative clothing, sporting the architecture of The New York Times site.

Sound also goes through various states of instability, with increasing variables once digital. Over the course of the last half-century, Henri Chopin’s sound poem “Rouge” has been subjected to various mutations, both clothed and unclothed. Chopin began his tape recorder experiments in the mid-50s, and “Rouge,” recorded in 1956, was one of his first pieces. It’s a literal sound painting, with the word red repeated with different emphasis, almost like varying brushstrokes. Manipulated audio techniques and track layering build up an increasingly dense surface. The piece reflects its time: think of it as an abstract expressionist canvas. It, too, is Greenbergian: its form is its content:

```
rouge rouge rouge
rouge rouge rouge
rouge rouge rouge
```
```
choc choc choc
dur & rouge dur & rouge
rouge rouge rouge
```
```
bruit bruit bruit
rouge rouge rouge
choc choc choc
```
```
rouge rouge rouge
rouge rouge rouge
rouge rouge rouge
```
```
nu nu nu
nu nu nu
rouge rouge rouge
rouge nu nu nu nu
```
```
il n’est que veine il n’est que veine il n’est que sang il n’est que sang il n’est que chair
```
The piece describes the intersection between the body and the voice, a main concern for Chopin who became well-known later for his audio pieces that were derived entirely from the sounds of his body. Chopin would amplify the sound of his blood circulation system, heartbeat, digestive tract and so forth which would form the basis for his works. This early work still uses language to describe the body instead of using the body itself.

In its day, "Rouge" never made it to LP as an "official" release by a record label. It was born naked and remained that way, unreleased and without a publisher until 24 years later when it was put out by a German gallery. Thanks to Chopin's highly visible work as a promoter and publisher of sound poetry, however, tapes of his work were making the rounds in advanced musical circles of the day.

A decade after "Rouge's" recording, it curiously appears in the first "Region" of Karlehinz Stockhausen's 1966 composition Hymnen, an electronic mélange of national anthems from around the globe. Although truncated, "Rouge" forms the basis for a short spoken-word section based around varieties of the color "red." Chopin's voice alternates with German-inflected voices reading a portion of a list of Windsor Newton paints. To listen to this excerpt alone and decontextualized, it sounds like an extension of Chopin's sound painting. But squeezed between magnetic tape deconstructions of "The Internationale" and "The Marseillaise," its meaning becomes very different. The nude poem is now clothed in the garments of leftist politics.

Twenty-one years later, in 1997, the sample-based group called Stock, Hausen & Walkman (note the group's name) brought "Rouge" back into its original context when it was sampled into an ironic pop track "Flagging" (flagging means dwindling, weak, fatigued, or drooping; a condition that occurs with the loss of blood). Amidst the cheesy vocals, snappy drumbeats and appropriated mathematical recitations from children's records, Chopin's piece is snatched away from Stockhausen's political agenda and returned closer to its bodily origins. But it’s an emptying gesture: finally “Rouge” is just one sample of many, part of a noisy landscape, in which sounds are easily obtained and just as easily manipulated. In such a landscape, no sound appears to have more meaning than any other. The corporeal and brutal image of Chopin’s red is now clothed in kitsch, more akin to Betty Page than to Antonin Artaud.

Stock, Hausen & Walkman are known for their graphical sense. They understand how to create a package that visually approximates their musical practice. Packaging -- or, in our terms, dressing -- creates a context of value. Stockhausen and Walkman’s redressing of “Rouge” places Chopin’s poem back into circulation fully clothed.

In the clothed realm, popular culture’s fetishization of the historical avant-garde reached a plateau when the enormously successful rock band Sonic Youth released a CD called Goodbye 20th Century (1999). On it, the rockers rattled their way through cover versions of some of the more difficult works by John Cage and George Maciunas, among others. Through a curious confluence of Downtown sensibility and mass marketing, thousands of rock-loving, Lollapalooza-attending Sonic Youth fans bought the disc and were exposed to what until very recently has resided on the fringes of the historical avant-garde.

Through gestures like these, the avant-garde becomes hip and well-marketed. Stroll through any good record store or museum gift shop and you’ll notice hundreds of artifacts of the historical avant-garde gorgeously repackaged to be snapped up by consumers. As soon as these items are purchased, however they can be recruited as nude media, via peer-to-peer file sharing. In the case of some of this material, what was originally created as an anti-authoritarian gesture has, thanks to the internet, been restored to its original radical intentions. Due to the manipulative properties of digital media, such artworks are susceptible to remixing and mangling on a mass scale, hence never having the one authoritative version bestowed upon these objects in traditional media. They are ever-changing works-in-progress operating in the most widespread gift economy yet known.

Such circumstances raise many questions: How does having a variety of contexts influence the cultural reception of such objects? Who or what determines an artifact’s value, both commercially and intellectually? How does this in turn impact the artist’s reputation, both commercially and intellectually? If artifacts are always in flux, when is an historical work determined to be “finished”?

It is little too early to answer such questions. Brought up on books and records – media in a clothed and stable form – it’s hard for us to accept cultural artifacts in constant flux as “genuine.” Once Ulysses arrived on our shelves, the only new versions of the book that came along were typesetters’ corrections and annotated editions, which only reified our sense that Joyce was a singular genius. With the exception of Xeroxing and collaging, remixing texts on the scale of Ulysses was difficult. When it comes to text, we haven’t seen anything nearly like the bootlegging phenomenon, but sites freely circulating unauthorized books with copyable and searchable text -- in particular, academic and theory texts -- are burgeoning. And as e-readers capable of reading open-source files emerge, we’ll begin to see more textual remixes. While nude Microsoft Word documents or .rtf’s of texts have been floating around the web forever, curiously, the lack of provenance and branding has discouraged these sorts of gestures. Now, with fully clothed, and gorgeously formatted PDFs, emanating from university presses in illicitly-distributed circulation, the texts themselves are being more carefully catalogued and archived as potentially useful objects on one’s local computer. Although they’re free, an authoritative version of a text signifies that it's ripe for deconstruction. As early as 1983, John Cage predicted and embraced the idea of unstable electronic texts as potential source texts for remixing:

Technology essentially is a way of getting more done with less effort. And it’s a good thing rather than a bad thing... The publishers, my music publisher, my book publisher – they know that Xerox is a real threat to their continuing; however, they continue. What must be done eventually is the elimination not only of the publication but of the need for Xeroxing, and to connect it with the telephone so that anyone can have anything he wishes at any time. And erase it — so that your copy of Homer, I mean, can become a copy of Shakespeare, mmm? By quick erasure and quick printing, mmm?... Because that's the — electronic immediacy is what we're moving toward.11
Identity and Ethics: An Expanded View

The identity politics battles of the past twenty years have done wonders and have given voice to many that have been denied. And there is still so much work to be done: so many voices are still marginalized and ignored. It's a long road ahead and every effort must be made to be made to ensure that those who have something to say have a place to say it and an audience to hear it. The importance of this work cannot be underestimated.

Still, identity is a slippery thing and no single approach can nail it. Also, citing the need for difference, we're never going to feel the same way on anything -- a good thing. We all come from different places and circumstances, which is something to be celebrated. To be prescriptive or to make generalizations regarding circumstances of economies, classes, religions and races is counterproductive.

I really don't think that there's a stable or essential "me." I am an amalgamation of so many things: books I've read, movies I've seen, televisions shows I've watched, conversations I've had, songs I've sung, lovers I've loved. In fact, I'm a creation of so many people and so many ideas to the point where I feel that I've actually had very few original thoughts and ideas; to think that any of this was original would be blindingly egotistical. Sometimes I'll think that I've had an original thought or feeling and then, at 2 a.m. while watching an old movie on TV that I hadn't seen in many years, the protagonist will spout something that I had previously claimed as my own. In other words, I took his words (which, of course, weren't really "his words" at all), internalized them and made them my own. This happens all the time.

Often -- mostly unconsciously -- I'll model my identity of myself on some image that I've been pitched to by an advertisement. When I'm trying on clothes in a store, I will bring forth that image that I've seen in an ad and mentally insert myself and my image into it. It's all fantasy. I would say that an enormous part of my identity has been adopted from advertising. I very much live in this culture; how could I possibly ignore such powerful forces? Is it ideal? Probably not. Would I like not to be so swayed by the forces of advertising and consumerism? Of course, but I would be kidding myself if I didn't admit that this was a huge part of who I am as a member of this culture.

Transgendered persons are trying to become the people who they are, not the ones they were born as. Transsexual persons too are in a constant state of remaking themselves, courageously laboring their whole lives to adopt new and fluid identities. I feel inspired by such fluid and changeable notions of identity.

On the internet, these tendencies move in different directions. With much less commitment than it takes in meatspace, we can project various personas with mere stokes of a keyboard. In this chat room, I'm a woman; on this blog, I'm a political conservative; in this forum, I'm a middle-aged golfer. And I never get called out for not being authentic or real. On the contrary, I am addressed as "madam" or "you right-wing asshole." I've come to expect that the person I think I'm addressing on the internet isn't really "that person."

If my identity is really up for grabs and changeable by the minute -- as I believe it is -- it's important that my writing reflect this state of ever-shifting identity and subjectivity. That can mean adopting voices that aren't "mine," subjectivities that aren't "mine," political positions that aren't "mine," opinions that aren't "mine," words that aren't "mine," because in the end, I don't think that I can possibly define what's "mine" and what isn't.
Sometimes, by reproducing texts in a non-interventionist way, we can shed light on political issues in a more profound and illuminating way than we can by conventional critique. If we wished to critique globalism, for example, uncreative writing's response would be to replicate and reframe the transcript from a G8 summit meeting where they refused to ratify climate control threats as is, revealing much more truth than one could ever editorialize. Let the text speak for itself: in the case of the G8, they'll hang themselves with their own stupidity. I call this poetry.

No matter what we do with language, it will be expressive. How could it be otherwise? In fact, I feel it is impossible working with language not to express oneself. If we back off and let the material do its work, we might even in the end be able to surprise and delight ourselves with the results.

Uncreative writing is a post-identity literature. With digital fragmentation, any sense of unified authenticity and coherence has long been shelved. Walter Ong claims that writing is a technology and is therefore an artificial act: "Technologies are not mere exterior aids but also interior transformations of consciousness, and never more than when they affect the word... Technologies are artificial, but -- paradox again -- artificiality is natural to the human being. Technology, properly interiorized, does not degrade human life but on the contrary enhances it." Robert Fitterman, whose works embrace our shifting identities shaped by the forces of consumerism, posits:

Can we express subjectivity, even personal experience, without necessarily using our own personal experience?... There has clearly been a desire to engage or re-claim the personal. I am interested in the inclusion of subjectivity and personal experience; I just prefer if it isn't my own. Today I have access to an unlimited number of personal utterances and expressions from the gut, or the heart. Why listen to my gut when I could listen to thousands of guts?... For writers coming of age in the 70s and 80s, the notion of multiple identities and appropriated identities is a sort of native language, a natural outgrowth of the multiple personas that have been engineered and then targeted by market strategists.

Fitterman cites the visual artist Mike Kelley, who also frames the identity discourse in terms of consumerism: "Glam rock was a music that fully understood the commercial music world and accepted its arena of façade and emptiness, using the image of the drag queen as a sign of its status... David Bowie adopts personas, throws them away at whim, and constantly reinvents himself for the market. He mirrors our culture of planned obsolescence. For consumer culture, it has been suggested, the constantly changing, chameleon persona represents empowerment." Writing needs to move in this direction.

And yet, who isn't moved by an authentic story? Surely one of the most inspiring identity-based narratives in recent history is that of Barack Obama. In a speech he gave at his family's ancestral village in Kenya, he speaks of pride from whence he came and also of how that country imbued his grandfather with the values that would propel the Obama family to stupendous achievements in the United States:

"He grew up around here. He was taking care of goats for my grandfather, and, maybe, sometimes, he would go to a school not so different from the Senator Barack Obama School," he said. "Except, maybe, it was smaller, and had even less in terms of equipment and books, the teachers were paid even less, and, sometimes, there wasn't enough money to go to school full time. Yet, despite all that, the community lifted him up, and gave him the opportunity to go to secondary school, then go to university in America, then get a Ph. D. in Harvard..."

America is full of such incredible stories. Another comes from the Armenian-American writer Ara Shirinayn. He was born in the Armenian Socialist Republic in the USSR into a family that was dispersed all over the Middle East by the Ottoman hostilities toward the Armenian population, sometimes known as the Armenian Genocide. In 1987, his family moved to the United States with $1500 and a few suitcases. His father went to work the second day after they arrived as a jeweler. His mother did the same, but as an antique rug restorer. They worked seven days a week and bought a house a year after they had arrived. His father's business grew when he began manufacturing jewelry, selling tons of kilos of it. By the time he retired, his business occupied an entire floor of a large building in downtown L.A. Ara, a product of public and state schools now has an international reputation and thriving career as a writer. As a member of the Armenian-American community in Los Angeles, he's very much involved with this close-knit community.

It's moving story. Why, then, would he choose to not to write about it when he penned an award winning book about nationalities? In his book Your Country Is Great, he's taken the names of every country in the world, organized them A to Z and Googled the phrase "[country name] is great" -- coming up with mostly user-reviewed travel sites -- and has hand-selected and sorted the results by nation. He then lineated the comments, with each stanza representing another opinion. The result is a multinational Baedeker of user-driven content and opinion. Unsourced and unsigned, the piece is by turns ugly and gorgeous, helpful and harmful, truthful and misleading, vital and completely irrelevant. By bringing a cool and rational methodology to these inherently hysterical forms, Shinyan lets the words speak for themselves, permitting the reader process the opinions expressed as they need to.

In his book, his home-country Armenia is treated no differently than Aruba, the next country that appears alphabetically:

Armenia is Great

armenia is great country famous for its christianity!

Armenia is great, and Yerevan is a city where people live their lifes to the maximum
I love you Yerevan,
I love your streets,
your sidewalks,

Armenia is great everyone should go back at least once the new information on Armenia is great – lots of good information –

I'll have to remember not to give anyone 2 flowers!
I also do not speak our language
Armenia is great though.
I have been there and made good friends, even though I could not speak a word to them.

Tour to Armenia is a great success!
To Understand Our Past,
Is To Understand Ourselves.

renovated sidewalks, roads, and unprecedented High Rise buildings going up
the future of Armenia is great.

With such warm summers and very cold winters
you will learn a great deal about the history of Yerevan

Armenia is great
I love it, but I don't think it is for me.

Aruba is Great

aruba is great its beaches are beautiful and the people are great

Aruba is great for diving and seeing marine life with visibility up to 90 ft.
You will see sponge tubes,
gliding manta rays, sea turtles, lobsters,

The taxi service on Aruba is great, but we like to pick up and go wherever and whenever we want,
so the rental is great for us.

Aruba is great for sightseeing, shopping, and a variety of water sports.
You should plan on renting a car to explore the island.

Aruba is great,
not a drop of rain,
barely a cloud and yet never felt too hot

Aruba is great,
that is where I went on my honeymoon last year.
I love it!
There are many places to stay.
The Marriott is nice,
the Wyndham is nice.

Aruba is great for singles, couples and families. Probably the best miniature golf courses in the world are in Aruba.

Aruba is great for a honeymoon for the following reasons:
1. No hurricanes
2. Predictable weather
3. Tons to do

Aruba is great.
If you bust out early,
be sure to go snorkelling.
They have a party bus
for bar hopping

What does this tell us about Armenia or Aruba? Not much. Shirinyan foregoes his personal narrative in place of demonstrating a much larger point: the deadening effects of globalization on language. Collapsing the space between the "real world" and the world wide web, this book calls into question: What is local? What is national? What is multicultural? Instead of accepting current notions of language as a medium of differentiation, Shirinyan persuasively demonstrates its leveling quality, demolishing meaning into a puddle of platitudes in a time when everything is great, yet nothing is great. It's great if I've been there: global tourism as authority. Or as the Sex Pistols put it over three decades ago: "A cheap holiday / in other people's misery."

Shirinyan's careful selection and juxtaposition of phrases makes this work a textbook example of how a writer might go about carve out a technology-fueled, post-identity writing practice, one that makes the reader wonder whether the author's identity actually had anything to do with the person who wrote it. Yet it doesn't shy away from using the first person subjective, strategically using it liberally, but non-specifically, producing a work that is at once fiercely nationalistic and is, at the same time, surprisingly bland.

The French artist Claude Closky, in his book Mon Catalog, takes a different, but equally cool tack. It's a listing of every possession he owns accompanied by the actual catalog or ad copy which advertised that possession. For the piece, he simply swapped the tense, substituting the directive "you" or "yours" for a subjective "I" or "mine."

An excerpt reads:

My refrigerator

The usable volume of my refrigerator is far superior to conventional capacities, and allows me to store my fresh and frozen products. The meat compartment with adjustable temperature and the crisper with humidity control assure me a perfect preservation of my food. Furthermore, the fan-cooling makes and dispenses my ice to me as well as fresh water. Moreover, my refrigerator is equipped with an anti-bacterial coating that helps me maintain it.
My Cleansing Gel

To gradually mattify the shiny appearance of my skin, tighten my dilated pores and clean my blackheads, I have a solution: clean my face every night with my purifying gel with zinc — known to be an active controller of sebum that eliminates, without chafing, the impurities accumulated during the day. My skin is no longer shiny. The soothing power of zinc, reinforced by a moisturizing agent, softens and relaxes the dry areas of my face. My skin no longer pulls.

My one-piece glasses

I tame the sun's rays with my one-piece glasses. True shields against harmful UV radiation and too-bright light, I can also appreciate them as glasses, as they surround my face perfectly. I benefit from the panoramic vision of the enveloping impact-resistant Lexan glass. Filtering ultraviolet rays on all sides, they protect my eyes not only from the sun, but also wind, sand, and dust. The ultimate refinement: a small foam band contours perfectly to my face, assuring comfort and a perfect fit. Extremely lightweight, I enjoy wearing them in all circumstances. With their removable cord, I also appreciate them while playing my favorite sports.

Closky creates a consumer-frenzied overload of language, a contemporary form of self-portraiture, voluntarily defining oneself not only by what one owns, but confessing to let oneself be completely possessed by one's possessions. Refusing to moralize, editorialize, or emote in any way, he's propping himself up as the ultimate consumer, an uber-consumer. He doesn't need to be won over, he's already sold. If I tell you that I will not only buy everything you're trying to sell me, but that I will embrace your products to the point of strangulation, what good are your pitches? An impasse is erected, resulting in a total collapse to a system based on a troika of resistance, persuasion, and capitulation.

In S/Z Roland Barthes performs an exhaustive structuralist deconstruction of Honoré de Balzac's short story "Sarrasine." In it, he reveals how signifiers of class are expressed in seemingly innocuous statements about parties, furnishings, or gardens. His book gives you the tools to tease out these codes from any work of art. But what we see happening in uncreative writing is an inversion of Barthes' project, a situation in which those normally hidden codes are brought front and center, comprising the entire art work. Like so much advertising, music, film and visual art, the discourse has been moved to the next level, finding ourselves in a hall of mirrors with all the complexity that ensues.

What do we do with a work like Alexandra Nemerov's "First My Motorola," which is a list of every brand she touched over the course of a day in chronological order, from the moment she woke up until the moment she went to sleep? The piece begins:

First, my Motorola
Then my Frette
Then my Sonia Rykiel
Then my Bvulgari
Then my Asprey
Then my Cartier
Then my Kohler
Then my Brightsmile
Then my Cetaphil
Then my Braun
Then my Brightsmile
Then my Kohler
Then my Cetaphil
Then my Bliss
Then my Apple
Then my Kashi
Then my Maytag
Then my Silk
Then my Pom

and ends:
Then my Ralph Lauren
Then my La Perla
Then my H&M
Then my Anthropology
Then my Motorola
Then my Bvulgari
Then my Asprey
Then my Cartier
Then my Frette
Then my Sonia Rykiel
And finally, my Motorola

Nemerov doesn't situate these brands in terms of likes and dislikes as opposed to Closky who "cheerfully" professes to "like" his humidity controlled refrigerator. There's nothing here but brands. Nemerov is a cipher, a shell, a pure robotic consumer. Enacting Barbara Kruger's famous slogan, "I shop therefore I am," she boldly creates a new type of self-portraiture: a complicit demographic, a marketer's dream. In the Baudrillardian sense, she's dead on: everyone is Ali Nemerov.

***

In 2007, Time Magazine questioned whether the $200 million gift that pharmaceutical heiress Ruth Lilly gave to The Poetry Foundation could really change the way people feel about poetry:

The $200 million won't change that; nothing, not even money, can get people to enjoy something against their will. What poetry really needs is a writer who can do for it what Andy Warhol did for avant-garde visual art: make it sexy and cool and accessible without making it stupid or patronizing. When that writer arrives, cultural change will come swiftly, and relatively effortlessly.

While there are a number of problems with this statement -- by choosing Warhol, he's hoping for a return to a specific cultural moment that permitted Warhol to become Warhol: the Sixties, a time that isn't coming back anytime soon -- his challenge does however make me wonder why there hasn't been an Andy Warhol for poetry.

You might think that during the boom years of the George W. Bush administration, pro-consumerist poets would have come out of the woodwork. But no. Instead Bush's Poet Laureates wrote about fishing on the Susquehanna in July, or porch swings in September, or ox-cart men, hopelessly out of touch with what was obsessing most Americans (and most of the world): buying things. Again in the Baudrillardian sense, it's not surprising that a Bush poet laureate hearkens back to a form of nostalgic poetry, insanely unaware that they were performing a simulacra for a time when poets genuinely wrote about "true" American values.

The poetry world has yet to experience its version of Pop Art -- and Pop Art happened over 50 years ago. While the New York School fondled consumerism sweetly, using pop as a portal to subjectivity -- (O'Hara: "Having a Coke with you / is even more fun than going to San Sebastian, Irú, Hendaye, Biarritz, Bayonne" ) -- it never came close to the cold objectivity, naked, prophetic words of Warhol: "A Coke is a Coke and no amount of money can get you a better Coke than the one the bum on the corner is drinking. All the Cokes are the same and all the Cokes are good. Liz Taylor knows it, the president knows it, the bum knows it and you know it."

A recent issue of Poetry magazine, published by the Poetry Foundation, kicks off with a short poem by Tony Hoagland called "At the Galleria Shopping Mall," warning us of the pitfalls of consumerism:

Just past the bin of pastel baby socks and underwear, there are some 49-dollar Chinese-made TVs;

one of them singing news about a far-off war, one comparing the breast size from Hollywood to the breast size of an actress from Bollywood.
And here is my niece Lucinda, who is nine and a true daughter of Texas, who has developed the flounce of a pedigreed blonde

And declares that her favorite sport is shopping.
Today is the day she embarks upon her journey, swinging a credit card like a scythe through the meadows of golden merchandise.

Today is the day she stops looking at faces, and starts assessing the labels of purses;
So let it begin. Let her be dipped in the dazzling bounty and raised and wrung out again and again.

And let us watch.
As the gods in olden stories turned mortals into laurel trees and crows to teach them some kind of lesson, so we were turned into Americans to learn something about loneliness.

Poor Lucinda is taken in by the oldest adage in the book -- all that glitters is not gold -- losing her humanity in the process: "Today is the day she stops looking at faces / and starts assessing the labels of purses." The only way this young girl can learn her lesson is the way we elders / gods have learned ours: only after succumbing to the temptations, did we come to realize the folly of our pursuits. Ah, youth! The telescopic nature of the piece in the last stanza widens to give us -- as a culture, as a nation -- pause to think how alienated, lonely and how disconnected from humanity such encounters have made us. It's a poem that has something specific to teach us; one that imparts true and wise values, wagging its knowing finger at the folly of youth.

By giving us snapshots of specific moments -- pastel baby socks, underwear, Chinese-made TVs -- Hoagland attempts to express in shorthand what Rem Koolhaus calls "Junkspace": a type of provisional architecture that has given us malls, casinos, airports and so forth. But trying to specify or stabilize anything in Junkspace works against the nature of Junkspace: "Because it cannot be grasped, Junkspace cannot be remembered. It is flamboyant yet unmemorable, like a screensaver; its refusal to freeze insures instant amnesia. Junkspace does not pretend to create perfection, only interest... Brands in Junkspace perform the same role as black holes in the universe: essences through which meaning disappears..." Like an easel painter setting up outside the mezzanine-level entrance of J.C. Penney and trying to render the mall experience in oils, Hoagland chooses the wrong approach using the wrong materials: deep image doesn't fly in this weightless space.

In the same issue of Poetry is a poem by Robert Fitterman called "Directory," which is simply a directory from an unnamed mall, looped with poetic concerns for form, meter, and sound. Koolhaas tells us that Junkspace is a labyrinth of reflection: "It promotes disorientation by any means (mirror, polish, echo)." Fitterman's listing of a mall directory purports to be as numbing, dead, and dull as the mall experience itself, purposely encouraging linguistic disorientation by reflecting rather than expressing:

- Macy's
- Circuit City
- Payless Shoes
- Sears
- Kay Jewelers
- GNC
- LensCrafters
- Coach
- H & M
- RadioShack
- Gymboree
- The Body Shop
- Eddie Bauer
- Crabtree & Evelyn
- Gymboree
- Foot Locker
- Land's End
- GNC
- LensCrafters
- Coach
- Famous Footwear
- H & M
- LensCrafters
- Foot Locker
- GNC
- Macy's
- Crabtree & Evelyn
- H & M
Fitterman's list is reminiscent of Koolhaas, speaking about the Junkspace of the Dallas / Fort Worth airport: "DFW is composed of three elements only, repeated ad infinitum, nothing else: one kind of beam, one kind of brick, one kind of tile, all coated in the same color - is it teal? rust? tabacco? ... Its drop-off is the seemingly harmless beginning of a journey to the heart of unmitigated nothingness, beyond animation by Pizza Hut, Dairy Queen..." Fitterman's repeated non-specificity mirrors the nature of global capitalism by giving us instantly recognizable name brands in a numbing stream. It's as if RadioShack is interchangeable with Circuit City -- and aren't they really? The effect of Fitterman's poem is like the looping background of The Flintstones, where the same tree and mountain keep scrolling by again and again: H&M, Kay's Jewelers and The Body Shop keep repeating. And as alienated / invigorated as Hoagland's niece is purported to feel, running our eyes down this Fitterman's list of deadening stores gives us the reader -- first hand -- the feeling of being in a mall. By doing very little, Fitterman has actually given us a more realistic experience than Hoagland, without having to resort to sermonizing to convince us of his point. The lesson of the poem is the experience of the poem.

The former United States Poet Laureate Donald Hall in his poem "Ox Cart Man," writes of a different kind of market experience:

In October of the year, he counts potatoes dug from the brown field, counting the seed, counting the cellar's portion out, and bags the rest on the cart's floor.

He packs wool sheared in April, honey in combs, linen, leather tanned from deerhide, and vinegar in a barrel
hoped by hand at the forge's fire.

He walks by his ox's head, ten days to Portsmouth Market, and sells potatoes, and the bag that carried potatoes, flaxseed, birch brooms, maple sugar, goose feathers, yarn.

When the cart is empty he sells the cart.
When the cart is sold he sells the ox, harness and yoke, and walks home, his pockets heavy with the year's coin for salt and taxes, and at home by fire's light in November cold stitches new harness for next year's ox in the barn, and carves the yoke, and saws planks building the cart again.

Unlike Hoagland's niece, who produces nothing and is, at this stage of her life, only capable of blind consumption or Fitterman's objectified view of consumerism, Hall presents us with a idealized, nostalgic picture which feels like something out of a Currier and Ives lithograph. This was a time when men were honest and did honest work; when a man not only grew, harvested, packed, transported nature's bounty, but he also sold them. (Where are the women?) From October to November, he works hard, at once depleting and replenishing for the next season, in tune with nature's cycle.

In a review of Hall's Selected Poems, Billy Collins wrote in the Washington Post: "Hall has long been placed in the Frostian tradition of the plainspoken rural poet. His reliance on simple, concrete diction and the no-nonsense sequence of the declarative sentence gives his poems steadiness and imbues them with a tone of sincere authority. It is a kind of simplicity that succeeds in engaging the reader in the first few lines." I'd argue that the "simplicity" of Fitterman expresses truths much closer to the everyday experience of most people than the morality-fueled sentiments of Hoagland or the nostalgic rustic rural vignettes of Donald Hall. And in that, I think these are truly populist expressions: what could be easier to understand than a list of mall stores, reflecting most American's daily commutes past and common interactions with our endless strip malls?

A common accusation hurled at the avant-garde is that it is elitist and out of touch, toiling away in its ivory tower, appealing to the few who are in-the-know. And I'd agree that a lot of "difficult" work has been made under the mantle of populism only to be rejected by their intended audience as indecipherable, or worse, irrelevant. But uncreative writing is truly populist. Because Fitterman's writing makes its intentions clear from the outset, telling you exactly what it is before you read it, there's no way you can't understand it. But then the real question emerges: why? And with that question, we move into conceptual territory that moves us away from the object and into the realm of speculation. At that point, we could easily throw the book away and carry on with a discussion, a move conceptual writing applauds: the book as a platform to leap off into thought. We move from assuming a readership to embracing a thinkership. By relinquishing the burden of reading -- and thereby a readership -- we can begin to think of uncreative writing as a new Esperanto, a body of literature able to be understood by anyone without having to be saddled with the act of translation. If you get the concept (and the concepts are blindingly simple) -- regardless of your geographic location, income level, education or social status -- you can engage with this writing. It's open to all.

This is a poetics of realism, reminiscent of the documentary impulse behind Zola's Les Rougon-Macquart series where in the guise of dime-store potboilers, Zola took on a massive project on how best to fully describe in full French life during the Second French Empire. From the farmer to the priest to the food markets to the department store, Zola claimed that these books transcended mere fiction; his intention was "strictly naturalist, strictly physiologist," a claim closer to de Certeau than to Balzac. Inspired by Zola, the new writing is a realism beyond realism: it's hyperrealist, a literary photorealism, an embodied and enacted simulacrum.

It's commonly said that you can only teach the avant-garde in advanced courses, but Craig Dworkin, a professor at the University of Utah, feels differently. He thinks that a text like Gertrude Stein's Tender Buttons works well at any level because you don't need to know any Greek myths, literary allusions, old British royal history, literary tropes, or even have a good vocabulary. You know all the words, and there they are. Christian Bök's students seem to object to works like Tender Buttons at first because they dislike familiar language being rendered unfamiliar to them since they feel that the whole point of their education is to make unfamiliar things readily understandable (not the other way around). He spends much of his time in class trying to show the students the wonders of the strange enigma that is Stein showcasing, for example, that when Stein describes a pinbox as 'full of points,' all of which we find 'disappointing,' she is in fact making a very simple, but subtle, point about the thorniness of something so 'pointless' as poetry itself."

***

In the self-reflexive use of appropriated language, uncreative writing embraces the inherent and inherited politics of the borrowed words: far be it for conceptual writers to morally or politically dictate words that aren't theirs. The choice or machine that makes the poem sets the political agenda in motion, which is often times morally or politically reprehensible to the author (in retyping the every word of a day's copy of the New York Times, am I to exclude an unsavory editorial?). Vanessa Place is a writer who re-presents ethically challenging and unsavory legal documents as literature. She doesn't alter them one bit, instead she simply transfers them from the legal framework to the literary, leaving it to the reader to pass moral judgment on them.

There's a touch of Bartelby in the work of Vanessa Place. As a beacon of stillness and silence in a frenzied workplace, Bartelby's composure and strict sense of self-imposed ethics exposed the hollowness and habitualness of the busy routine that surrounded him.
Like a black hole, he sucked everyone into him, finally causing a total implosion. Place is a lawyer and, like Bartelby, much of her work involves scribing appellate briefs, that task of copying and editing, rendering complex lives and dirty deeds into "neutral" language to be presented before a court. That is her day job. Her poetry is an appropriation of the documents she writes during her day job, flipping her briefs after hours into literature. And like most literature, they're chock full of high drama, pathos, horror and humanity. But unlike most literature, she hasn't written a word of it. Or has she? Here's where it gets interesting. She both has written them and, at the same time, she's wholly appropriated them -- rescuing them from the dreary world of court filings and bureaucracy -- and, by mere reframing, turns them into compelling literature.

Place represents indigent sex offenders on appeal, no easy job. As she puts it:

All my clients have been convicted of a felony sex offense and are in state prison at the time I am appointed to their case. Because of my experience/expertise, many of my clients have been convicted of multiple offenses, and sentenced to hundreds of years and numerous life terms. I primarily represent rapists and child molesters, though I have also represented a few pimps and sexually violent predators (those who, after having served their sentences, have been involuntarily committed to state hospitals: I appeal their commitments).

After having published two fine successive experimental novels -- one that is a 130-page single sentence -- her literary production these days consists of republishing Statements of Facts from her courtroom cases. An Appellate Brief is composed of three parts: a Statement of the Case, which sets forth the procedural history of the case; a Statement of Facts, which sets forth, in narrative form, the evidence of the crime as presented at trial; and an Argument, which are the claims of error and (for the defense) the arguments for reversing the judgment. For her literary production, she only uses the Statement of Facts -- the coolest, most objective and most narrative part of the brief.

Place does not alter the original document in any way other than to remove specific witness/victim information as necessary to protect those people's identities. By re-presenting the Statements as literature, she does not violate any formal ethical standards or professional codes of conduct: all her briefs are matters of public record and could be found or read by anyone. But it seems like she is violating some sort of unwritten rules of her profession in order to critique and expose the language in Bartelby-like ways. Place claims, "All of my clients are legally guilty. Most are morally guilty. As their advocate, I may be morally guilty, though I am not legally guilty." By shifting the context from law to art and by stripping the language of any purpose, we suddenly see these documents in ways impossible to see them before. The types of questions that this gesture provokes is at the heart of Place's practice.

Language is never neutral, never stable, and can never be truly objective, thus the Statement of Facts is actually an argument in the disguise as factual documentation. Even the basic rules for writing a Statement of Facts acknowledges this bias:

In the Statement of Facts...we are not allowed to argue explicitly. So what do we do? We argue implicitly.
What is an implicit argument? Just as an explicit argument is one that explicitly states the because, an implicit argument is one that does not explicitly state a because in answer to the question "Why?" Rather, an implicit argument arranges and emphasizes the facts to lead the recipient of the argument to the desired conclusion.

For her day job, Place is intentionally writing an implicit argument; yet for her art, she is exposing that fallacy.

A published section of her 400-page work Statement of Facts -- which is comprised of the documents from 25 cases -- tells the lurid tale of Chavelo, a child-molesting uncle, and Sara, his niece. It wends its way for ten pages with graphic descriptions of sex interspersed with psychological impasses and heart-rending struggles to cope. In spite of the Clerk's transcript notes -- the log of matters heard in court in the form of summary notations that continually interrupt the textual flow -- a clear narrative written emerges, written in plain English. An excerpt reads:

Once, Sara's mother noticed Sara's underwear was wet and smelled of semen. She asked Sara about it, but Sara said she didn't know how it got there, and walked away. So her mother put Sara's underwear in the wash and told herself not to think about "this evil of what's happening."

The last time appellant touched Sara was at her house. (RT 1303) Sara's private hurt when appellant touched her: it felt like "poking." It also hurt later when she went to the bathroom. (RT 1302) Sara went to the doctor because her private was bothering her, "Like, when you put alcohol on your cut, but kind of worse than that." (3) Sara's mother saw blisters "like blisters that you get when you get on the monkey bars." The blisters itched. The doctor asked Sara what happened, but Sara didn't want to say. The doctor gave Sara pills to take every day for a month, and the blisters went away. They returned; Sara had to take the medicine again. The blisters again went away, and again returned. Sara went back to the doctor, and saw Dr. Kaufman. (RT 1306-1309, 1311-1313, 1318, 2197)

-----------

(3) Sara complained to her mother about pain during urination; her mother gave her medicinal tea for three days. When the pain didn't abate, her mother checked her vagina, saw a blister, and took Sara to the doctor. (RT 2196-2197, 2218-2221) Sara had never had blisters on her vagina before. (RT 2199)

In reframing the work as literature, the first thing Place does is to remove the profession-required serif font ("those little epaulets of authority," as she calls them), thus casting the document as something other than that which belongs in a courtroom. But outside of that, the Statement is identical to the original with everything from footnotes to the Clerk's notations left intact. Place says "My job is information 'processing.' That is the job of all rhetoric, all language." It's strange to think of someone with so much power -- one who makes her living and upon whom lives are affected -- as a lawyer claiming herself as a mere "information processor." Yet, it's not such a leap to hear a poet make such a claim.

It is the artists' right to make such a claim, in fact, one of the most beautiful, free and expansive ideas about art is that it -- unlike just about everything else in our culture -- doesn't have to partake in an ethical discourse. Artists, after all, needn't be held to the same standards of politicians. And when they are, something very precious is lost. It's important to note that this freedom is very much a Western freedom, for there are many places in the world where such investigations and actions could lead to severe actions, with real lives, family, property, etc. at stake. Which is why it seems even more pressing for someone like Place to be able to explore such outré notions. And yet even in our Western culture, where we are able to take such liberties, it's surprising that more artists don't. I find this to be enormously powerful, liberating and worth fighting for. Where else can this exist in our culture?

Yet Place plays both angles -- this is both real life and art -- clouding my rosy picture of art and ethics. While Statement of Facts might strike many as merely lurid and sensationalist, to linger on the content is to miss the greater conceptual point of the work: it's the matrix of apparatuses surrounding it -- social, moral, political, ethical -- that give the work its real legs. And when you hear Place read these works, you realize that the vile content of the works is just the tip of the iceberg. What happens to you, the listener, during the reading that makes what she's doing so important.

But it's hard to listen to her read these works. I recently sat through a reading of Statement of Facts which lasted forty-five minutes. Onstage, Place dons the same outfit she does when appearing before a judge and reads in a low monotone, tamping down the wildly heated subject matter with a cool and mechanical delivery. Upon hearing the work, the first reaction is of shock and horror. How can people be so terrible? But you keep listening. It's hard to stop. The narrative draws you in and you find yourself listening to the small incidents pile up: doctor's examination of the victim, the victim's slow and painful admittance that a criminal act has been perpetrated upon her, leading to the climax, where the appellant is finally arrested and it appears that justice, after all, will be served. After some time, this begins to feel like a Hollywood movie, replete with tragedy and redemption.

Andy Warhol said that "when you see a gruesome picture over and over again, it doesn't really have any effect" and the longer Place read for, the more immune I became to the horrors of what she was saying. Like a detective, I began to divorcing my emotional response from the Facts, scratching my chin, logically trying to poke holes in her argument, passing judgments on each incident. Like Bartelby's workmates, I found myself shifting my position to accommodate Place's narrative. Unconsciously, I had been transformed from passive listener to active juror. She actually transformed my position as receiver of the work, spinning me around in ways that were very much against my will. I didn't want to objectify my experience but I did. Place used a passive coersion, a sort of courtroom logic, to enact a change in me, the reader, as she does to jurors every day. What I was experiencing was the legal system; to my horror, I was caught up in its machinations. As I listened to the litany of crimes, I found my circuits overloaded. As Place puts it:

I am considering information -- even of a most disturbing variety -- as linguistic compost. There is too much to consider, too many words, of both thin and thick content. It is too much to bear, and so we don't. And still, I am asking the reader to bear witness, or to choose not to. Either way, they become complicit. There's no such thing as an unbiased witness. There's no such thing as an innocent bystander. Not after they've listened for a while. Never after they've stopped listening.
In the 1930s, the Objectivist poet Charles Reznikoff began an epic called Testimony: The United States (1885-1915) Recitative. It consists of hundreds of courtroom witness statements, which have then been lineated and versified. They're short pieces, each one telling a story:

Amelia was just fourteen and out of the orphan asylum; at her first job -- in the bindery, and yes sir, yes ma'am, oh, so anxious to please.
She stood at the table, her blonde hair hanging about her shoulders, "knocking up" for Mary and Sadie, the stitchers ("knocking up" is counting books and stacking them in piles to be taken away).
There were twenty wire-stitching machines on the floor, worked by a shaft that ran under the table;
as each stitcher put her work through the machine, she threw it on the table. The books were piling up fast and some slid to the floor
(the forelady had said, Keep the work off the floor!); and Amelia stooped to pick up the books -- three or four had fallen under the table between the boards nailed against the legs.
She felt her hair caught gently;
put her and up and felt the shaft going round and round and her hair caught on it, wound and winding around it, until the scalp was jerked from her head, and the blood was coming down all over her face and waist.

Reznikoff’s tale feels like a folk song, a blues recitation, or a Dickensian tale, metaphorically intoning a timeless rite of passage. The short passage is ripe with sexual metaphor: the pubescent girl with long "blond hair hanging around her shoulders," "oh, so anxious to please," whose job is "knocking up." The inevitable dénouement happens when she feels the "shaft going round and round," its symbolic deflowering, replete with the flow of blood "coming down all over her face and waist." It’s a complex play of eros and thanatos, poetic and nuanced, expressed in surgically selected lineation and enjambment. It's remarkably economical, painting a picture of an entire world in just a few lines, while packing a wallop of an emotional punch.

Place, conversely, doesn’t deal in metaphor. There’s nothing subtle about what she does, ardently adhering to Beckett’s motto, "no symbols where none intended." We are horrified by Reznikoff’s tales, but they’re only a stanza or two and we quickly move on to the next encapsulated tragedy. Unlike Place’s durational onslaught, Reznikoff permits us to keep our objectivity intact: we’re still the reader -- safe and distanced -- witnessing tragedy. But we’re never forced to alter our readerly position as in the way that Place forces us to. Reznikoff’s work reeks of a world passed; to it’s easy to separate from the content as opposed to Place whose lurid tales are being acted out every day in our time. In fact, Reznikoff’s poem lives up to its moniker as Objectivist, keeping reader and author outside in ways that Place refuses to. Hers is a poetics of realism, ratcheting up a Duchampian gesture until it’s too much to bear.

Labor, value, surplus, expenditure, context, recontext: uncompromising realism. These works have a lot on their plate. Place’s gesture recalls a legend of the Warhol years. When Warhol first showed his Brillo boxes in New York to great acclaim in the early 60s, during the opening, an intoxicated angry man approached Warhol and expressed his disgust at what he felt to be a one-trick, cheap shot gesture. He violently accused Andy of ripping off somebody else's hard work. As it turns out, this man was a failed, yet earnest Abstract Expressionist painter whose day job was a graphic designer for Brillo: he designed the box. He was doubly felled by Warhol, once on account of his day job and in a larger sense on account of Warhol's Pop Art rendering his "art" obsolete. Place complicates the already-complicated Warhol tale by playing both the victim and the victor, outsmarting herself by taking her alienated labor and détournin

I recall a holiday dinner with my curious and bright but very bored cousin who is a lawyer. He was complaining about the drudgery of his job, having to write endlessly dull legal briefs day in and day out.
Prodding him, I would say, why don't you think of what you do all day as art? If you reframe those documents, they don't look too far from many conceptual art documents I've seen. In fact, part of the practice of certain artists such as Christo is to include all the legal briefs that he had to file in order to, say, run a fence across miles of California wilderness. There's a certain fascination with documentation and the dry authoritativeness of legalese that runs through much conceptual art and writing. You could be a part of that tradition. I could've told him about the work of Vanessa Place. My cousin, although intrigued, demurred and continued being bored for many years henceforth. I always saw it as a great lost opportunity.
Why Appropriation?

The greatest book of uncreative writing has already been written. From 1927 to 1940, Walter Benjamin summed up all of his thinking into a singular work of literature that came to be called The Arcades Project. Many have argued that it's nothing more than hundreds of pages of notes for an unrealized work of coherent thought, merely a pile of shards and sketches. But others have claimed it as a groundbreaking 1000-page work of appropriation and citation, so radical in its undigested form that it's impossible to think of another work in the history of literature that takes such an approach. It's a massive effort: most of what is in the book was not written by Benjamin, rather he simply copied texts written by others from stack of library books, with some passages spanning several pages. Yet conventions remain: each entry is properly cited and Benjamin's own "voice" inserts itself with brilliant gloss and commentary on what's being copied.

With all of the twentieth century's twisting and pulverizing of language and the hundreds of new forms proposed for fiction and poetry, it never occurred to anybody to grab somebody else's words and present them as their own. Borges proposed it in the form of Pierre Menard, but even Menard didn't copy -- he just happened to write the same book that Cervantes did without any prior knowledge of it. It was sheer coincidence, a fantastic stoke of genius combined with a tragically bad sense of timing.

Benjamin's gesture raises many questions about the nature of authorship and ways of constructing literature: isn't all cultural material shared, with new works built upon preexisting ones, whether acknowledged or not? Haven't writers been appropriating from time eternal? What about those well-digested strategies of collage and pastiche? Hasn't it all been done before? And if so, is it necessary to do it again? What is the difference between appropriation and collage?

A good place to start looking for answers is in the visual arts, where appropriative practices have a tested and digested for the past century, particularly in the approaches of Duchamp and Picasso, both of which were reacting to the previous century's shifts in industrial production and its subsequent technologies, particularly the camera. A useful analogy is Picasso as a candle and Duchamp as a mirror. The light of the candle draws us into its warm glow, holding us spellbound by its beauty. The cool reflectivity of the mirror pushes us away from the object, throwing us back on to ourselves.

Picasso's Still Life with Chair Caning (1911–12) incorporates an industrially-produced piece of oilcloth printed with an image of chair caning into its composition and an actual rope is wrapped around the painting, framing the picture. Other elements include the letters J, O, U, presumably referencing the word journal. These elements intermingle with various painted human and still life forms in the painting, all done in the typical browns, grays and whites of the synthetic style. Picasso's painting is an example of what a painter generally does: like a bird constructing a nest, discreet elements are gathered and stitched together to create a harmonious whole. The fact that the collaged elements are not rendered by hand does not serve to disrupt the composition in any way; rather they reinforce the strength of it. Picasso struts his mastery over several mediums and methods and we are justifiably wowed by his skill. Like a candle, Still Life with Chair Caning is a picture that draws you into its composition; clearly, you could spend an awful lot of time absorbed in this picture and basking in its warm glow.
Conversely, Duchamp's Fountain form just a few years later in 1917, is a urinal turned on its side, signed and put on a pedestal. Here, as opposed to Picasso, Duchamp appropriated an entire object, thus defamiliarizing and rendering this industrially-produced functionless. Unlike Picasso's constructive method, Duchamp didn't use collage to create a harmonious, compelling composition, rather he eschewed "the retinal" qualities to create an object that really doesn't require a viewership as much as it does a thinkership; no one has ever stood wide-eyed before Duchamp's urinal admiring the quality and application of the glaze. Instead, Duchamp invokes the mirror, creating a repellent and reflective object, one which forces us to turn away into other directions. Where it sends us has been exhaustively documented. Broadly speaking, we could say that Duchamp's action is generative while Picasso's is absorptive.

In literature, a similar comparison can be made in the constructive methodology of Ezra Pound's Cantos and the scrivener-like process of Walter Benjamin's The Arcades Projects. The assemblage and collage quality of The Cantos stitches together thousands of lines, drawn from a number other sources, literary and non-literary, all held in place with the glue of Pound's own language to create a unified whole. Like a gleaner of history, he collects heaps of ephemera from the ages and sorts through it looking for the gems out of which he will construct his epic; sound, sight and meaning all coalesce, frozen into shimmering verse. Everything seems to have come from somewhere else, but it's been chosen with the best of taste; his genius is in synthesizing found material into a cohesive whole. The flotsam and jetsam include offhanded notes, price lists, shards of language, erratic typography and odd spacing, chunks of correspondence, arcane legalese, slabs of dialogue, a dozen languages, and numerous unreferenced footnotes just to name a few, all bound together into a life's work. Written not according to system or constraint, this rambling mess is remarkably sensuous. The result is an exquisitely built construction cobbled together by a master craftsman. We could say that like Picasso, Pound's practice is synthetic, one which draws us in to tease out its puzzles and bask in the light of its sheer beauty.

Benjamin, on the other hand, taking his cues from cinema, creates a work of literary montage, a disjunctive, rapid-fire juxtaposition of 'small fleeting pictures.' With some 850 sources crashed up against each other, Benjamin makes no attempt at unification, other than by loosely organizing his citations by category. The scholar Richard Sieburth tells us that "of a quarter of a million words that comprise [this] edition, at least 75 percent are direct transcriptions of texts." As opposed to Pound, there is no attempt to blend the shards into a whole; instead there is an accumulation of language, most of it not belonging to Benjamin. Instead of admiring the author's synthetic skills, we are made to think about the exquisite quality of Benjamin's choices, his taste. It's what he selects to copy that makes this work successful. Benjamin's insistent use of fragmentary wholes does not make the text the final destination rather, like Duchamp, we are thrown away from the object by the power of the mirror.

The general consensus amongst scholars is that the Arcades was sheaves of notes for a great, unrealized project that he planned to call Paris, Capital of the Nineteenth Century. And there are chapters and sketches for such a book which boil the notes into a well-argued, logical essay. But the book can also be read (or misread, depending upon how you wish to frame it) as a stand-alone work in and of itself. It is a book made up of refuse and detritus, writing history by paying attention to the margins and the peripheries rather than the center:
bits of newspaper articles, arcane passages of forgotten histories, ephemeral sensations, weather conditions, political tracts, advertisements, literary quips, stray verse, accounts of dreams, descriptions of architecture, arcane theories of knowledge, and hundreds of other offbeat topics.

The book was constructed by reading through the corpus of literature about Paris in the nineteenth century. Benjamin simply copied down the passages onto to cards that caught his attention, which were then organized into general categories. Anticipating the instability of language in the later part of the twentieth century, there was no fixed forms. Benjamin would endlessly shuffle his note cards, transferring them from one folder to another. In the end, realizing that no passage could only live forever in one category, he cross-referenced many entries and those notations have traveled with the printed edition, making The Arcades Project an enormous proto-hypertextual work. With the inevitable printing of the book, the words were forced to settle down, as an editor pinned them to fixed entities on the page forever. What Benjamin intended as a final version was never made clear; instead, posterity has nailed his words down for him in the form a 1000 page tome. Yet it's that mystery -- was this the form he intended for his life's work? -- that gives the book so much energy, so much life and play, some 60 years after it was written. In that time, all sorts of experiments in unfixed pages have occurred. Today, in places like Printed Matter and book arts exhibitions, it's not uncommon to find books comprised entirely of unbound sheets that the purchaser may arrange according to their will. The catalogue to John Cage's retrospective Rolywholyover was one such book, with nearly fifty pieces of printed ephemera laid in, with no hierarchical order. The book self-reflexively embodies Cage's chance operations, a book without fixity or finality, a work in progress.

Even in its final form, The Arcades Project is a great to book bounce around in, flitting from page to page, like to window-shopping, pausing briefly to admire a display which catches your eye without feeling the need to go into the store. Quickly you move on to the next window. Because the book is about the Parisian arcades, an early incarnation of the shopping mall, Benjamin encourages the reader to be a consumer of language the way we would allow ourselves to be seduced by any other commodity. The book's unknowability is not denied by its fixity, rather it's the sense of sheer bulk and abundance, that makes it impossible to ever finish; it's so rich and so dense that trying to read it induces amnesia -- you're not sure whether you've already read this or that passage. It's really a text without end. Benjamin's texts are multi-dimensional, just like his sense of history. In order for history to be studied he says, we've got to be able to freeze a moment. When this happens, he calls it a constellation: "It's not that what is past casts its light on what is present, or what is present its light on what is past; rather what has been comes together in a flash with the now to form a constellation." Like the web, the constellation is a temporary condition, a momentary fusion which will turn on a dime. But it all comes back to language: "the place where one encounters [the dialectical image] is language."

So we have a literary roadmap for appropriation, one that is picked up across the twentieth century by writers as such as Gysin, Burroughs, and Acker, to name but a few, and one that points toward the more radically appropriative texts being produced today. Yet, contrary to Benjamin's forays, the twentieth century embraced and ran with the fragmentary, not the whole, playing itself out into smaller and smaller bits of shattered language. But even The Arcades is still dealing in fragments -- although large ones -- rather than in wholes. And for all his love of copying, there is still a great deal of authorial intervention. Isn’t appropriation supposed to be free of intervention?

I’m not so sure. As a matter of fact, my own appropriated work Day might be a good test case. The recipe for my appropriation seems direct and simple enough: "On Friday, September 1, 2000, I began retyping the day’s New York Times, word for word, letter for letter, from the upper left hand corner to the lower right hand corner, page by page." But in order for me to simply "appropriate" the newspaper and turn it into a work of literature, it involved dozens of decisions. First came lifting the text off the page of the newspaper and getting it into my computer. But what to do with the font, font sizes and formatting? If I remove the images (while grabbing the texts embedded in the images, such as the numbers on the license plate in a car ad), I still must keep the captions. Where do the line breaks occur? Do I remain faithful to the slim columns or do I flow each article into one long paragraph? What about the pull quotes: where do those lines break? And how do I make my way around a page? I know I have a rough rule to move from the upper left corner to the lower right, but where do I go when I reach the end of a column and it says "continued on page 26"? Do I go to page 26 and finish the article or do I jump to the adjacent column and start another article? And when I make those jumps, do I add another line break or do I flow the text continuously? How do I treat the advertisements which often have playful text elements of varying fonts and styles? Where do line breaks occur in an ad where words float about a page? And what about the movie timetables, the sports statistics, the classified ads? In order to proceed, I have to build a machine. I have to answer each question, and set up a number of rules, which I must then strictly follow.

And once the text is into my computer, what font do I choose to reset the piece in? And finally, there are dozens of paratextual decisions: what size is the book going to be? What paper stock will the book be printed on? What will the cover look like? How much should the book sell for?

Once those formal decisions are made, there are ethics to parse. If I am to truly appropriate this work, then I must faithfully copy/write every word of the newspaper, whether I agree with the sentiments expressed or not. No matter how tempted I might be to alter the words of a disagreeable politician or film critic, I cannot for to do so would be to undermine the strict "wholes" that appropriation trucks in. My aim was to be as uncreative as possible; this was the hardest part of the task, for with every keystroke came the "creative" urge to fudge, skew, intervene. So, for a simple appropriation, it’s not so simple. There were as many decisions, moral quandaries, linguistic preferences, and philosophical dilemmas as there are in an original or collaged work.

And yet I still trumpet the work’s "valuelessness," its "nutritionlessness," its lack of creativity and originality when clearly the opposite is true. In truth, I’m not doing much more than trying to catch literature up with appropriative fads the art world moved past decades ago. There may, in fact, be a lot of truth when my detractors claim that I’m not that radical, that my name is still on these objects and all those decisions are so much in the service of upholding notions of my own genius. For an ego-less project, there sure is a lot of investment in me here. One prominent blogger acutely commented, "Kenny Goldsmith’s actual art project is the projection of Kenny Goldsmith."
So how could I practice a more pure and radical form of appropriation, one that really moves a whole from one place to another with minimal intervention from the author? I could, for example, take Stephen King's The Shining, replace his name with mine and call it my own. As a gesture, it's too facile, a bit too easy, untied to any sustained practice. Perhaps that could be remedied if I were to engage the mechanics of the literary world into my appropriation. I could go on a book tour with my new book, The Shining, do readings, radio shows and book signings with it. I would send review copies to critics and treat it exactly as I would any of my own "authored" books. Taking it a step further, I would go on to appropriate Stephen King's entire oeuvre as my own, making a full-blown career of literary appropriation. In the best case, Mr. King would sue me for impersonation, something that would surely give my career a great boost. I'd make the rounds of the talk shows, delivering the gospel of appropriation to all.

But during the twentieth century, the art world was full of such gestures -- people remaking other people's works -- that its long been absorbed into a legitimized practice.

How could younger writers proceed in an entirely new way, using current technologies and modes of distribution? Perhaps a glimmer into the battlegrounds of the future was glimpsed when three young, anonymous writers edited the now infamous Issue 1, a 3,785-page unauthorized and unpermissioned anthology, "written" by 3,164 poets, whose poems were actually authored not by the poets to whom they were attributed. Instead, the poems were generated by computer which randomly synced each author with a poem. Stylistically, it made no sense: a well-known traditional poet was paired with a radically disjunctive poem penned by a computer and vice versa.

Yet it wasn't so much the stylistics that raised eyebrows, it was the mechanics of it -- the distribution and the notification -- which riled the contributors. The work was stitched into a massive PDF, which was placed on a media server late one evening. Many people found about their inclusion the first thing in the morning, when finding that the Google Alert they had set for their name had notified them that they were included in a major new anthology. Clicking on the link brought them to the anthology where upon downloading it, they found their name attached to a poem they didn't write. Like wildfire, reaction spread through the community: Why was I in it? Why wasn't I in it? Why was my name matched with that poem? Who was responsible for this act? Half the "contributors" delighted to be included and the other half wildly angered. Several of the poets included said that they would include the poem ascribed to them in their next collection. Speaking on behalf of the disgruntled authors whose reputations of genius and authenticity were sullied was blogger and poet Ron Silliman, who said "Issue 1 is what I would call an act of anarcho-flarf vandalism... Play with other people's reps at your own risk" and went on to cite a lawsuit in which he and a group of authors won on a great sum of money for involving copyright infringement back in the 70s, suggesting that such a gesture might be a good idea for those scammed by Issue 1. Strikes an ominous tone, he stated, "As I certainly did not write the text associated with my name on page 1849... I don't think you wrote your work either."

As there really wasn't much to discuss about the poems -- in regard to everything else going on about this gesture, they seemed pretty irrelevant -- we were forced to consider the conceptual apparati that the anonymous authors had set into motion. With one gesture, they had swapped the focus from content to context showing us what it might mean to be a poet in the digital age.
At the center of it all is appropriation. The twentieth century's fuss over authorial authenticity seems tame compared to what is going on here. Not only are the texts themselves appropriated, but it is compounded by the appropriation of names and reputations, randomly synced up with poems that were written not written by them. It's the largest anthology of poetry ever compiled and it was distributed to thousands one weekend from a blog and then commented upon endlessly on other blogs and subsequently in the comments streams of those blogs.

The candle has blown out and we're left with a hall of mirrors. In fact, the web has become a mirror for the ego of the absent but very present author. With the abundance of texts and the sheer numbers of words that fly back and forth daily on our screens, it's clear that textuality has a new focus and function in this environment. What mattered more than what poem you were represented by in the anthology was whether or not you were or were not included. Issue 1 pulled back to the veil on what it means to be an author now. If it doesn't exist on the internet, it doesn't exist. If you don't exist on the internet, you don't exist. As always, Andy Warhol -- a ghostly absent ubiquitous presence who functioned as a mirror to the world -- gets the last word. When asked how he felt when he got a bad review, he replied that he never read his reviews; instead, he just added up the column inches.
Against Failure: The Infallible Processes of Sol LeWitt and Andy Warhol

The visual arts have long embraced uncreativity as creative practice. Beginning with Marcel Duchamp's ready-mades, the twentieth century was awash with art works that challenged the primacy of the artist and questioned received notions of authorship. Particularly in the 1960s, with the advent of conceptual art, Duchampian tendencies were tested to the extreme, producing important bodies of often ephemeral and propositional work by towering artists. What they made was often secondary to the idea of how it was made.

There's a lot that writers can learn from by examining how they went about eradicating traditional notions of genius, labor and process. These ideas seem particularly relevant in today's digital climate, since the basis of much conceptual art was systematic, logical language. Like the Concrete Poets and Situationists, there's a direct tie-in to the use of language materially. In fact, many conceptual artists used words as their primary medium in the form of proposition and / or as a gallery-based expression.

There's a lot, too, that a contemporary readership can learn from the precedent of conceptual art. While no one flinches today upon walking into an gallery and seeing a few lines drawn on a wall according to a recipe (Sol LeWitt) or entering a theater or gallery showing a film of a man sleeping for 8-hours (Andy Warhol's Sleep [1963]), parallel acts bound between the pages of a book and published as writing still raises many red flags and cries of "That's not literature!" In the 1960s, gallery viewers quickly learned -- as in the case of Warhol's films -- how not to watch them but to think about them, write about them and discuss them without being burdened by the need to watch it in full. Similarly, art lovers when looking at a drawing by LeWitt, learned the futility of demanding an emotional kick where there wouldn't be any. Instead, they learned to ask different questions, learning that mechanical expressions can be equally -- but differently -- beautiful and moving. Any resistance to such approaches in art quickly collapsed: I don't need to tell you how mainstream and canonized both artists are today.

While the history of conceptual art is widely known, the overlaps and connections between it, contemporary writing, and digital culture are seldom made. What follows is an examination of Sol LeWitt and Andy Warhol's practice in ways that are applicable to uncreative writing. While both work on freeing the artist from the burden of "genius," each goes about it differently: LeWitt by mathematics and systems, Warhol by contraction, falsification and ambiguity.

***

One of my favorite descriptions of procrastination is this portrait of John Ashbery written for the New Yorker in 2005:

It's late already, five or five-thirty. John Ashbery is sitting at his typewriter but not typing. He picks up his cup of tea and takes two small sips because it's still quite hot. He puts it down. He's supposed to write some poetry today. He woke up pretty late this morning and has been futzing around ever since. He had some coffee. He read the newspaper. He dipped into a couple of books: a Proust biography that he bought five years ago but just started reading because it suddenly occurred to him to do so, a novel by Jean Rhys that he recently came across in a secondhand bookstore—he's not a systematic reader. He flipped on the television and watched half of something dumb. He didn't feel up to leaving the apartment—it was muggy and putrid out, even for New York in the summer. He was aware of a low-level but continuous feeling of anxiety connected with the fact that he hadn't started writing yet and didn't have an idea. His mind flitted about. He thought about a Jean Helion painting that he'd seen recently at a show. He considered whether he should order in dinner again from a newish Indian restaurant on Ninth Avenue that he likes. (He won't go out. He's seventy-eight. He doesn't often go out these days.) On a trip to the bathroom he noticed that he needed a haircut. He talked on the phone to a poet friend who was sick. By five o'clock, though, there was no avoiding the fact that he had only an hour or so left before the working day would be over, so he put a CD in the stereo and sat down at his desk. He sees that there's a tiny spot on the wall that he's never noticed before. It's only going to take him half an hour or forty minutes to whip out something short once he gets going, but getting going, that's the hard part.

No need to worry, Mr. Ashbery: there's plenty of people out there to help you. There are dozens of books offering up antidotes for people like you. For instance, you might want to change your clothes ("to get a truly fresh start, John"); or try stretching a bit; it's a good idea to get up and get a glass of water every twenty minutes; you really should try freewriting -- just let your mind relax and let it flow, John; or you could try writing "badly"; it might be a "good idea to turn off the internet"; and perhaps it would help if you got up from your writing desk and did just one chore. But there's one solution that each and every book on writer's block offers: write five words. Any five words. Follow this advice, Mr. Ashbery, and you'll never have writer's block again.

The irony is that that last suggestion was actually realized as an artwork twice in the past century: once by Gertrude Stein who, in 1930, wrote a one-sentence poem, that simply went Five words in a line. and by Joseph Kosuth who, in 1965, realized the Stein piece in red neon by writing in capital letters FIVE WORDS IN RED NEON, of course, in red neon. If only writers had paid more attention to the smarter and self-referential strategies of Kosuth or Stein, surely they would have found a way to think their way out of their dilemma.

The poet Kwame Dawes tells us that, "On NPR a few years ago Derek Walcott confessed to feeling terror at the blank page -- the terror of someone wondering whether he can do it again, whether he can make a successful poem again. The interviewer laughed with some disbelief remarking that even the great Nobel laureate could feel such terror. Walcott insisted, 'Anyone [meaning any poet] who tells you otherwise is lying.'"

I'm not so sure about that. This sort of writer's block is something you don't hear too much about in the contemporary art world. While some might get stuck -- those clinging to older ideas of "originality" -- there's a well-honed tradition of adopting mechanical, process-based methods that makes the decisions for you. Beginning with Duchamp, who used the world as his art supply store -- if you come up with a good recipe, add the right ingredients and follow the directions and you're bound to come up with a good art work. Particularly in the 1960s, scores of artists swapped perspiration for procedure, thus expiating the struggle to create. I'm reminded of the sculptor Jonathan Borofsky running out of juice in graduate school in the mid-1960s. Sitting alone in his Yale studio, he simply began counting and kept counting for weeks until the numbers moved from his mind to his mouth to the page, and from there into three dimensions, until insane figurative worlds grew out of this practice. But he never gave up his counting: to this day, each subsequent piece of sculpture or drawing still has a sequential number inscribed upon them.

The implications for writing are profound: imagine us adopting these ways of working so that we’d never have writer’s block again. That’s what Sol LeWitt did when he wrote two remarkable documents, "Paragraphs on Conceptual Art" (1967) and "Sentences on Conceptual Art" (1969), which were manifestoes that spoke for a generation more interested in ideas than in objects. The ideas are so good that once he embraced them, he never looked back; by virtue of a rigorous series of self-imposed constraints, his subsequent production blossomed in every fruitful direction for decades. There was never again any sort of blocks. The example of LeWitt offers writers several permissions to do the same. If we look closely at his thinking and methodology, we'll find a model for uncreative writing all the way through, from its inception to execution right up to its distribution and programmed reception. By swapping LeWitt’s visual concerns for literary ones, we can adopt "Paragraphs" and "Sentences" as roadmaps and guidebooks for conceptual writing.

In these documents, LeWitt calls for a recipe-based art. Like shopping for ingredients and then cooking a meal, he says that all of the decisions for making an artwork should be made beforehand; and that the actual execution of the work is a merely a matter of duty, an action which shouldn’t require too much thought, improvisation, or even genuine feeling. He felt that art shouldn’t be based on skill: anyone can realize the work. In fact, throughout his career, LeWitt never made his work himself; instead he hired teams of draftsmen and fabricators to execute his works, a gesture that goes back to the Renaissance painters’ workshops and their schools of disciples. He got the idea when working a day job in an architect’s office and it dawned on him that “an architect doesn’t go off with a shovel and dig his foundation and lay every brick” he conceived of the idea and contracted it out to others to realize. Why shouldn’t an writer operate in the same way? In this way, he’s close to Marcel Duchamp, who claimed to give up making art, instead becoming a respirator. Duchamp said, “I like living, breathing, better than working (...) if you wish, my art would be that of living: each second, each breath is a work which is inscribed nowhere, which is neither visual nor cerebral. It’s a sort of constant euphoria.” (But of course Duchamp never gave up making art, he just worked for decades in secrecy. And it’s this sort of contradiction between what is claimed and what actually happens which really ties LeWitt to Duchamp as we’ll see later.) Imagine writer’s feigning silence or having others write their books for them the way Andy Warhol did.

I'm inspired by the idea that writing need not be based on skill. John Cage, famous for his works based on chance via a throw of the dice, I Ching, or randomizing computer programs, was often asked why he did what he did. Couldn’t anyone do what he did? Cage replied, yes, but nobody did. What if we followed LeWitt's lead and devised the recipe as an open invitation for anyone to realize the work? I could take any one of my books, say, Day and devise a recipe: "Retype a day’s edition of the New York Times from beginning to end, working your way across the page, left to right. Retype every letter in the paper, making no distinction between editorial or advertising." Surely your choices -- the way you make your way through the paper, how you choose LeWitt echoed Duchamp’s claim that art need not be exclusively retinal and goes further by stating that a work of art should be made with the minimum of decisions, choices, and whimsy. It’s better if the artist makes deliberately uninteresting choices so that a viewer won’t lose sight of the concepts behind the work, a sentiment close to the ideas of uncreative writing. And sometimes, the final product shouldn’t be judged as the artwork; instead, all of the background documentation of how the work was made, conceived of, and executed might actually prove to be more interesting than the art itself. Gather up that documentation and present it instead in lieu of you thought was going to be the art work. He begs the artist to stop worrying about trying to be original and clever every time, saying that all aesthetic decisions can be resolved mathematically and rationally. If you’re in a bind, just space everything equidistant which, like dance music, gives the work a pre-determined, hypnotic beat. You can’t lose. Finally, he warns us: Don’t get blinded by new materials and technology, for new materials do not necessarily make for new ideas, something that is still a pitfall for artists and writers in our technologically-infatuated age.

Now, there are some problems with the stated intent of LeWitt and the gorgeous results which were the hallmark of his career. When I look at a wall drawing of LeWitt’s, regardless of how conceptually based it might be, it’s about the most eye-poppingly beautiful art work ever made: uber-retinal. How can such sterile rhetoric and process produce such sensual and perfect results? When LeWitt claimed that the resultant work of art may be unappealing, he certainly couldn’t have been referring to his practice. I’ve seen many LeWitts in my lifetime and I can’t think of a single one that could be termed anything but gorgeous and successful. So something is happening here that makes me wonder if LeWitt is pulling our leg. As far as I can see, he’s a singular genius with a exquisitely refined sense of the visual, a perfectionist who would stand for nothing less than finely-honed, crafted products that give a maximal bang for the buck, intellectually, visually and emotionally.

Perhaps we can find some clues to this discrepancy if we take a closer look at how these works were actually made. First off, each of LeWitt’s works are dictated by short single recipes.

Here’s one from 1969:

On a wall, using a hard pencil, parallel lines about 1/8” apart and 12” long are drawn for one minute. Under this row of lines, another row of lines are drawn for ten minutes. Under this row of lines another row of lines are drawn for one hour.

and another from 1970:

On a wall (smooth and white if possible) a draftsman draws 500 yellow, 500 gray, 500 red and 500 blue lines, within an area of 1 square meter. All lines must be between 10 cm. and 20 cm. long.

LeWitt himself never executed these pieces; he conceived of them and then had someone else realize them. Now, why would a conceptual artist need to realize anything, particularly one who had an aversion to the retinal? Isn’t he contradicting himself when he states, "The conceptual artist would want to ameliorate this emphasis on materiality as much as possible or to use it in a paradoxical way (to convert it into an idea).”

Why not just present them as ideas like Yoko Ono:

TIME PAINTING

Make a painting in which the color comes out only under a certain light at a certain time of the day.
Make it a very short time.

1961 summer

We have no evidence that Ono’s time painting was ever executed. And if it was, the variables for success are elusive, non-specific and subjective. It's not entirely clear where this piece should be performed. One might assume that since she's referring to a "certain time of day," then it's to be done outdoors. Assuming that's true, how are we to know which "certain light" she is specifically referring to as light over the course of the day changes infinitely? And how are we to know what time is a "certain time?" And furthermore, what does a "very short time" mean: one second? five minutes? short in relation to what? the course of day? of a lifetime? Conversely, if we attempt to make the time painting indoors, what type of light is the "certain light"? incandescent? fluorescent? candlelight? blacklight? If we are exposing the color indoors, then surely the "certain time of day" would have to be night so the light could act on the color. And finally, if we are somehow able to get all the coordinates right, how are we to know if we got the right color? There's mystical implications here as well: if we can somehow figure out how to align up all the coordinates -- like Indiana Jones does in order to move a rock that's sealing a hidden cave -- we, too, be rewarded with a fleeting cosmic vision.

LeWitt would agree. Art should exist exclusively in the mind. He states: "Ideas can be works of art; they are in a chain of development that may eventually find some form. All ideas need not be made physical." Yet he insists that they may eventually realized, a claim that Ono never makes. In fact, over the course of his career, LeWitt becomes famous for enacting those instructions, making them gorgeously visible, explicitly stating that "The plan exists as an idea but needs to be put into its optimum form. Ideas of wall drawings alone are contradictions of the idea of wall drawings."

Contradiction is a state that LeWitt, for all his posturing and hyperbole, seems to embrace. His "Sentences on Conceptual Art" begins with the New-agey statement, "Conceptual artists are mystics rather than rationalists. They leap to conclusions that logic cannot reach," and makes wacky Mad Hatter-like pronouncements such as: "Irrational thoughts should be followed absolutely and logically."

His instructions, too, could be just as vague and elusive as Ono’s. Take, for example, this recipe for his 1971 wall drawing which was executed at the Guggenheim Museum:

Lines, not short, not straight, crossing and touching, drawn at random, using four colors (yellow, black, red and blue), uniformly dispersed with maximum density covering the entire surface of the wall.

Someone had to interpret and execute this drawing and I’m glad it wasn’t me. What does "not short" and "not straight" mean? And what does "random" mean? A few summers ago, when I was redoing a bathroom, I told the contractor that I wanted the colors of the tiles to be random. I figured that he'd place them about, willy-nilly, making them appear random. Each night when I came home from work, I'd pop my head into the bathroom and wonder why the work was proceeding so slowly. The next day, when I stopped in during lunchtime to find out, I saw Joe sitting there, rolling a dye to insure that, in fact, each tile was put in completely randomly. Would I have to roll dice or throw I-Ching sticks every time I needed to draw a line? That would take forever.

Other questions: how is "maximum density" achieved? I might interpret that to mean that not one speck of the white wall should be seen by the time the piece is finished. This seems to me like an awful lot of work, and combined with having to make it really random, I could spend the rest of my life doing this.

And then, let's say I spent ten years doing it the way I thought it should be done, what if it wasn't "successful?" What if Sol wasn't pleased with my work? What if my "not short" lines were too long and my "not straight lines" were too wavy? In some Sisyphean nightmare, would he make me start all over again?

Fortunately we have documentation from a draftsman named David Schulman who took notes during the time he executed the aforementioned 1971 Guggenheim piece:

[Lines, not short, not straight, crossing and touching, drawn at random, using four colors (yellow, black, red and blue), uniformly dispersed with maximum density covering the entire surface of the wall.]

Started Jan. 26, having no idea how long it would take to reach a point of maximum density (a very ambiguous point at that). Being paid $3.00 per hour, trying to let my financial needs have little effect on the amount of time I worked ... I was exhausted after 3 days of working without the slightest intimation of density. Having only one mechanical pencil, even the energy expended changing leads had an accumulative tiring effect ... I pushed to get the lines down faster while keeping them as not short as not straight and as crossing, touching and random as possible. I decided to use one color at a time, and use that color until it reached a point I considered one quarter "Maximum Density" ... Signals of discomfort became an unconscious time clock determining when I would stop and step back from the drawing. Walking up the ramp to look at the drawing from a distance provided momentary relief from the physical strain of the drawing. From a distance, each color had a swarming effect as it slowly worked its way across a portion of the wall ... The drawing in ways was paradoxical. The even density and disbursement of the lines took on a very systematic effect. Once the individual difficulties of each color were determined, any thought as to how the lines were going down in relation to lines previously drawn gradually diminished until there was no conscious thought given to the lines being drawn. Doing the drawing I realized that totally relaxing my body was only one way of reaching a deep level of concentration. Another was in the mindless activity of doing the drawing. Keeping my body totally active in an almost involuntary way -- in a sense, totally relaxed my mind. When my mind became relaxed, thoughts would flow at a smoother and faster pace.

While Schulman gives us some answers, surprisingly his take is as foggy as ours. He doesn't know what density means either and he's very vague about what "not short," "not straight" means or what exactly "random" is. And by the end of it, he's no longer talking about making a work of art; he's rambling on about mind / body splits. The whole thing starts to feel oddly spiritual, more like yoga than conceptual art.

It's curious how the work begins to make itself, answering Schulman's questions, by following its own orders and rules. LeWitt had prescribed -- almost predicted -- this state when he said, "The draftsman and the wall enter a dialogue. The draftsman becomes bored but later through this meaningless activity finds peace or misery." How could he possibly know? At this point, he's getting very close to the mystical vagaries of Ono. And yet, Schulman's experience confirms LeWitt's hunches.

John Cage, who took an explicitly mystical Zen Buddhist attitude toward his work, said something similar: "If something is boring after two minutes, try it for four. If still boring, then eight. Then sixteen. Then thirty-two. Eventually one discovers that it is not boring at all," which was something Cage said to soothe baffled musicians who were hired to play his music. In a way, a contract musician is similar to a fabricator like David Schulman, an anonymous craftsman who is paid to execute works of art in the service of someone else's name. Unlike a novelist who, with the exception of an editor, labors in a state of solitary creation, music and sometimes visual art -- like in the case of LeWitt -- is an enactment of a social contract. If the laborer feels s/he is being mistreated, s/he can subvert the success of the art, which is what frequently happened to Cage.

There are many stories of John Cage storming out of rehearsal sessions in anger after contract musicians of orchestras refused to take his music seriously. Cage, like LeWitt, gave musicians a lot of leeway with his scores, providing only vague instructions but was often frustrated with the results. In the middle of an abstract chance operations piece, for instance, a trombonist would slip in a few notes from "Camptown Races" which angered Cage to no end. Speaking about an incident in New York, he said, "Faced with a music such as I had given them, they simply sabotaged it. The New York Philharmonic is a bad orchestra. They're like a group of gangsters. They have no shame -- when I came off the stage after one of those performances, one of them who had played badly shook my hand and said, 'Come back in ten years; we'll treat you better.' They turn things away from music, and from any professional attitude toward music, to some kind of a social situation that is not very beautiful."

For Cage, music was a place to practice a utopian politics: An orchestra -- a social unit which he felt to be as regulated and controlled as the military -- could each be given the freedom not to act as a unit, instead permitting each member to be an individual within a social body. By undermining the structure of the orchestra -- one of the most established and codified institutions in Western culture -- he felt that in theory, the whole of Western culture could work within a system of what he termed "cheerful anarchy." Cage said, "The reason we know we could have nonviolent social change is because we have nonviolent art change."

LeWitt took pains to avoid such awkward situations. (He was working with a smaller group of craftsmen as opposed to Cage who was sometimes dealing with a 120 piece orchestra. Also, the craftsmen were generally sympathetic to the project, some whom he trained, with the expectation that they would train others, who would, in turn, train, Renaissance workshop style, still others, stretching on through generations. ) To this end, in 1971, the same year that Schulman worked on the Guggenheim piece, LeWitt wrote a detailed contract to clear up any ambiguity regarding the social and professional relationship between artist and draftsman, allowing the draftsman a great deal of freedom:
The artist conceives and plans the wall drawing. It is realized by draftsmen. (The artist can act as his own draftsman.) The plan written, spoken or a drawing, is interpreted by the draftsman.

There are decisions which the draftsman makes, within the plan, as part of the plan. Each individual, being unique, given the same instructions would carry them out differently. He would understand them differently.

The artist must allow various interpretations of his plan. The draftsman perceives the artist's plan, the reorders it to his own experience and understanding.

The draftsman's contributions are unforeseen by the artist, even if he, the artist, is the draftsman. Even if the same draftsman followed the same plan twice, there would be two different works of art. No one can do the same thing twice.

The artist and the draftsman are collaborators in making the art. Each person draws a line differently and each person understands the words differently.

Neither lines nor words are ideas. They are the means by which ideas are conveyed.

The wall drawing is the artist's art, as long as the plan is not violated. If it is, then the draftsman becomes the artist and the drawing would be his work of art, but art that is a parody of the original concept.

The draftsman may make errors in following the plan without compromising the plan. All wall drawings contain errors. They are part of the work.

Yet although LeWitt claimed that the artist and draftsman are collaborators, all of his collaborators went -- and continue to go -- unnamed, as compared with the very generous method of Scottish concrete poet and sculptor Ian Hamilton Finlay who never released a work of art without the fabricator's name given in the title of the work: A Rock Rose (with Richard Demarco) or Kite Estuary Mode (with Ian Gardner).

LeWitt held a remarkably lax and forward-looking concept of copyright, permitting, up until the mid-eighties, anyone to freely copy his works as long as they strictly adhered to the recipe, something he viewed as a compliment. In this way, he presages the 2006 sentiments of the science-fiction writer Cory Doctorow who makes his books freely available on the internet, as well as in print. Doctorow says: "Being well-enough known to be pirated is a crowning achievement. I'd rather stake my future on a literature that people care about enough to steal than devote my life to a form that has no home in the dominant medium of the century."

Unlike digital material which can be replicated infinitely without any quality loss, LeWitt eventually reneged this stance due to the sheer number of bad copies that unskilled draftsmen made in spite of his utopian notion that "anyone with a pencil, a hand, and clear verbal directions" could make copies of his drawings. He put his foot down and turned the tide: the later works became better. There is evidence that as time has gone on, "the quality of the LeWitt drawings have improved as many of LeWitt's draftsmen have specialized in particular techniques, becoming 'samurai warriors' in their crafts. A LeWitt skillfully executed today dwarfs the quality of what the artist himself regularly produced."

In the early 80s, LeWitt left New York and moved to Italy. While there, living amongst Italian Renaissance frescoes, his work went through enormous changes: suddenly it became wildly sensual, organic, and playful. Gone were the austere lines and measurements and in its place came in colorful and whimsical works that seemed to owe more to the 1970s Pattern and Decoration movement than it did to recipe-based procedural conceptual art. And yet, these works were created by the identical methods as the early works, it's just that he swapped out different ingredients. So while the early works might only permit the four primary colors adhering to strict geometry, the new works could be eye-poppingly psychedelic with day-glo apple greens alternating with fluorescent oranges in wavy patterns. Often times, they were garish in taste, looking out of place in the white box of a museum. "When he was asked about the switch he made in the 1980's -- adding ink washes, which permitted him new colors, along with curves and free forms -- Mr.
LeWitt responded, 'Why not?'"

To the untrained eye, these works were a complete betrayal of everything he had stood for up until that point. They seemed whimsical and overtly retinal, lacking any kind of formal rigor. But upon closer examination, they were as recipe-based as ever. These pieces from 1998, have the instructions:

Wall Drawing 853: A wall bordered and divided vertically into two parts by a flat black band. Left party: a square is divided vertically by a curvy line. Left: glossy red; right: glossy green; Right part: a square is divided horizontally by a curvy line. Top: glossy blue; bottom: glossy orange.

Wall Drawing 852: A wall divided from the upper left to the lower right by a curvy line; left: glossy yellow; right: glossy purple.

But that, to me, is the beauty of it all. These are works that, no matter what you did to them, really could not fail. The works, all done exactly to plan, were executed perfectly and were therefore successful.

There's a classic trajectory of an artist that I love: think of Duchamp, Philip Guston, John Cage or James Joyce. After an early academic career, they fall in with the styles of the day, very much making their mark as it is defined by their day. They become famous for that period: we need only think of Guston's Abstract Expressionist phase, Joyce's Ulysses or Cage's prepared piano sonatas. But then, something happens and they need to push what they're doing beyond the realm of acceptance. They rebel and revolt and make a move that appears so outrageous that even their staunchest of supporters turn against them. This happened at Cage's 25th anniversary concert at Town Hall in New York in 1958 when, after the first half which featured Cage's sweet and tonal prepared piano works, the entire second half was dedicated to his then-recent aleatory pieces. The audience started hissing and by the time the show was over, the house was pretty much cleared.

A similar story happens when Guston showed his cartoonish figurative works in a New York gallery for the first time in 1970 -- the Klansmen riding around in jeeps and hairy paws holding cigarettes.
Hilton Kramer, writing for The New York Times famously dismissed Guston as "a mandarin pretending to be a stumblebum," calling him a second-rate Dubuffet and accusing him of feigning the role of "urban primativist." After the opening, a core group of Abstract Expressionists in the elevator ride down were heard to say with relief, something to the tune of, "Well, thank god we'll never have to think about that again."

But it's these moves that, historically speaking, makes these figures the towering figures that they became. If Cage hadn't relinquished his tonal works and went aleatory, he'd be another curious composer -- important and historical -- perhaps someone more along the lines of a Lou Harrison or Alan Hovhaness than a John Cage. Or imagine if Joyce hadn't pushed beyond the limits of known taste and never wrote Finnegans Wake. The consequences, in the short term at least, are brutal. After Joyce had published Ulysses, he was driving a Rolls Royce; seventeen years later, upon finishing Finnegans Wake, he was impoverished. But had he not written Finnegans Wake, he would never have risen to the status of James Joyce. What would've happened if Duchamp had accepted his moderate success as an oil painter if he had stopped at the scandal surrounding "Nude Descending a Staircase?" In turning their backs on what made them successful, they made themselves monumental, giving tools and methods to artists far in the future. I always say that I'd consider myself a success if I could bestow one new permission to future writers. These artists bestowed entire worlds.

When LeWitt makes his turn in the 80s against austerity, he makes his pivotal move and it's clear that it all comes down to taste. In the twentieth century, any avantist who made a point of killing art did it with impeccable taste, hence its ultimate absorption into the canon of art. Yet contrary to my own claims, I'm always banging my head against the realization that no matter how hard you try, you can never remove the individual from art. I have made arguments for ego-less art, found art, art driven by chance operations and many other strains, but in fact there's always someone behind the curtain, manning the machines. Again, take Duchamp. Every objet trouvé of his reeked of his taste. What if, for example, Duchamp had chosen a light bulb (as Johns did later with impeccable taste) instead of a urinal? a shoe (as Warhol did later with impeccable taste) instead of a bicycle wheel? What made these anti-art objects essentially Duchampian was his great taste.

There's a lot to take away from LeWitt: the idea of the authorless art, the socially enlightened dance between the author and the fabricator, the debunking of the Romantic impulse, the usefulness of well-spun rhetoric and precise logic -- not to mention the freedom that it brings, the elegance of primary form and structure, overcoming the fear of the white page, the triumph of good taste, the embrace of contradiction. But there's one thing above all the others that I get: We're always bending over backwards trying to express ourselves, yet LeWitt makes us realize how impossible it is not to express ourselves. I think that writers try too hard, hitting huge impasses by always trying to say something original, new, important, profound. LeWitt offers us several way out of our jams. Construct the machine and set it in motion and let the work create itself.

***

Andy Warhol is perhaps the single most important figure for uncreative writing. Warhol's entire oeuvre was based on the idea of uncreativity: the seemingly effortless production of mechanical paintings and unwatchable films where literally nothing happens. In terms of literary output, too, Warhol pushed the envelope by having other people write his books for him, yet the covers bore his name as author. He invented new genres of literature: a: a novel was the mere transcription of dozens of cassette tapes, spelling errors, stumbles, and stutters left exactly as they were mistyped. His Diaries, an enormous tome, were spoken over the phone to an assistant and transcribed, charting the minute, yet mostly mundane, movements of one person's life. In Perloffian terms, Andy Warhol was an unoriginal genius, one who was able to create a profoundly original body of work by isolating, reframing, recycling, regurgitating, and endlessly reproducing ideas and images that weren't his -- yet by the time he was finished with them, they were completely Warholian. By mastering the manipulation of information (the media, his own image, or his Superstar coterie, to name a few), Warhol understood that he could master culture. Warhol reminds us that to be the originator of something widely memed (the word meme comes from the Greek word mimema: "something imitated") can match being the originator of the trigger event. These re-gestures -- such as reblogging and retweeting -- have become cultural rites of cache in and of themselves. Sorting and filtering -- moving information -- has become a site of cultural capital. Filtering is taste. And good taste rules the day: Warhol's exquisite sensibility combined with his finely-tuned taste challenged the locus of artistic production from creator to mediator.

In a 1966 black and white television interview, Warhol reluctantly answered questions fired at him by an aggressive and skeptical off-screen interlocutor. Picture in your mind, a tight-lipped Warhol sitting on a stool in front of a silver Elvis painting. The camera frequently zooms close-up on Warhol's face, framed by a broken pair of dark sunglasses; his fingers cover his lips, causing him to mumble hesitant and barely audible responses:

WARHOL: I mean, you should just tell me the words and I can just repeat them because I can't, uh...... I can't... I'm so empty today. I can't think of anything. Why don't you just tell me the words and they'll just come out of my mouth.
Q: No, don't worry about it because...
WARHOL: ...no, no... I think it would be so nice.
Q: You'll loosen up after a while.
WARHOL: Well, no. It's not that. It's just that I can't, ummm... I have a cold and I can't, uh, think of anything. It would be so nice if you told me a sentence and I just could repeat it.
Q: Well, let me just ask you a question you could answer...
WARHOL: No, no. But you repeat the answers too.

A few years earlier, in a 1963 interview, he says, "But why should I be original? Why can't I be non-original?" He sees no need to make create anything new: "I just like to see things used and re-used." Echoing then-current notions of eradicating the division between art and life, he says, "I just happen to like ordinary things. When I paint them, I don't try to make them extraordinary. I just try to paint them ordinary-ordinary... That's why I've had to resort to silk screens, stencils and other kinds of automatic reproduction. And still the human element creeps in!... I'm anti-smudge. It's too human. I'm for mechanical art... If somebody faked my art, I couldn't identify it."

Warhol himself was a series of contradictions: He was poorest who became the richest; the ugliest who became the most beautiful (at the end of his life he was a runway model); he could barely speak, but what he did say became cultural truisms; he was the lowest of the low (the most commercial) and the highest of the high (creating some of the most difficult and challenging art of the twentieth century); the kindest and the cruelest; the most profane yet the most religious (Warhol attended church every Sunday); the dullest man who surrounded himself with the most exciting men. The list could go on forever.

His artwork embodied the same tensions which lead us into a query regarding ethics and morality along the lines of Vanessa Place. What happens when one's artistic practice is programmatically predicated upon deceit, dishonesty, lying, fraudulence, impersonation, identity theft, plagiarism, market manipulation, psychological warfare, and consensual abuse? When humanism is tossed out the window and the
When a practice adamantly denies emotion, promoting style over substance, vapidity over genius, mechanical process over touch, boredom over entertainment, surface over depth? When art is made with alienation as a goal, art which intentionally disconnects from what we normally ascribe to as having cultural and social value?

The plot thickens. Warhol embraced a flexible morality, one that is almost impossible for most of us to conceive of either in theory or in practice. Warhol spent his career testing these waters in his life and in his art and, in his life specifically, the consequences were often devastating. In Andy’s world, there were no happy endings; the ride was fast and glamorous but there was always doom ahead. With the notable exception of Lou Reed, few Factory denizens went on to a substantial life or career outside of the moment. For several, the results were deadly. Wayne Koestenbaum, in his biography of Warhol comments that, “Many of the people I’ve interviewed, who knew or worked with Warhol, seemed damaged or traumatized by the experience. Or so I surmise: they might have been damaged before Warhol got to them. But he had a way of casting light on the ruin -- a way of making it spectacular, visible, audible. He didn’t consciously harm people, but his presence became the proscenium for traumatic theater.”

This is the most often-told side of Warhol, the train-wreck narrative we are all familiar with. But there is another way to look at it. I’d like to propose that we use his example of ambiguity and contradiction as a utopian experiment in artistic practices as a way of testing the limits of morality and ethics, in a positive sense. If we are able to separate the man from the work, we may see that in this series of negative dialectics, Warhol was actually proposing a free space of play within the safe confines of art. Art as a free space to say “what if...?”; art as one of the only spaces available in our culture that would allow such experiments. But first, we need to get out of the path of the emotional train wreck that was Warhol’s life. If we refuse to move, we are bound to be held to the destructive myth of the Factory and dragged down with it.

We’re back in contradictory territory again: how can we separate Warhol’s life from his art or any artists’ life from their art for that matter? To answer that question, I think we need to invoke a bit of theory in order to connect the dots, using Roland Barthes’ seminal essay, “The Death of the Author.” In it, he made a distinction between literature and autobiography saying that, for instance, “if we were to discover that, after admiring a series of books extolling courage and moral fidelity, that the man who wrote them was a coward and a lecher, this would not have the slightest effect on their literary quality. We might regret this insincerity, but we should not be able to withhold or admiration for his skill as writer.” Barthes referred to the idea of an authorless work as text rather than literature.

The Barthesian premise was demonstrated most powerfully in the vast body of literary works that Warhol produced. Take, for example, The Andy Warhol Diaries which spent four months on the New York Times bestseller list. It’s hard to imagine a less-engaging narrative: over 800 pages of Andy’s diary entries recording every cent spent on taxis and documenting each phone call he made. The idea of autobiography falsely permeates the book: on the front cover The Boston Globe exclaims, "The ultimate self-portrait." The book in its accumulation of minute and insignificant detail is nearly identical to Boswell except for the fact that it’s presented as an autobiography. Take the entry from Monday, August 2, 1982:
Mark Ginsburg was bringing Indira Gandhi's daughter down and he was calling and Ina was calling and Bob was calling saying how important this was, so I gave up my exercise class and it turned out just to be the daughter-in-law, who's Italian, she doesn't even look Indian.

Went to 25 East 39th Street to Michaele Vollbracht's (cab $4.50). Ran into Mary McFadden on the way in and I told her she looked beautiful with no makeup and she said she'd never worn more. I told her that in that case, as one made-up person to another, it looked like she didn't have any on. Giorgio Sant'Angelo was there. The food looked really chic but I didn't have any.

Went to Diane Von Furstenberg's party for the launching of her new cosmetics (cab $4). and all the boys at the party were the same ones who had been on Fire Island. It was fun seeing Diane, she was hustling perfume. Her clothes are so ugly though, they're like plastic or something. And she had all the high-fashion girls there wearing them. Barbara Allen was there even she looked awful in the clothes. I did get an idea for decorating though -- big boxes of color that you can put in a room an move around and change your decorating scheme.

What a life! Warhol's workout is cancelled so he can meet presumed royalty. Then it's off to meet Vollbracht -- a designer for Geoffrey Beene -- where he runs into a fashion editor and hangs out with yet another fashion designer. Next is a party for, yes, another fashion designer, this one replete with fabulous gay boys from Fire Island and beautiful models. He snubs rich people and gets inspired by interior design.

Is this really autobiography? No. It's a highly edited work of fantasy fiction based on Warhol's life. Where is the author? It was Warhol who dictated and shaped his unreal image; no trips to the grocery store or the dry cleaners, no traffic jams, no self-reflection, no doubt, no friction. Warhol, as he portrayed his life, was one whirl of glamour. It's unabashedly autobiography as fiction which, of course, all autobiographies are. Warhol meticulously reported the edited version of his life every morning for the last twelve years of his life, calling his secretary / ghost writer Pat Hackett and telling her what happened the day before. The daily phone calls began innocently enough as log of Andy's personal expenses for keeping the IRS at bay, but soon developed into a full-blown record of his life. Hackett acted as gatekeeper and editor for the book becoming as much of a author and shaper of Warhol's life as was Boswell. In fact, she boiled the book down from the original manuscript of 20,000 pages, choosing what she felt to be "the best material and most representative of Andy."

Hackett ruthlessly edited the material: "On a day when Andy went to five parties, I may have included only a single one. I applied the same editing principle to names to give the diary a narrative flow and to deep it from reading like the social columns... I've cut many names. If Andy mentioned, say, ten people, I may have chosen to include only the three he had conversations with or spoke of in the most detail. Such omissions are not noted in the text since the effect would serve only to distract, and slow the reader down."

But isn't the reader slowed down enough? Hackett is mistaken to think that anybody would actually "read" the Diaries straight through. The way to ingest the work is to skim it and even that, after a while, becomes exhausting due to the sheer amount of trivial data. In fact, to lift the onus of having to read the book at all, later editions included an index of names and places to make ego-surfing easier for those in the club; and to make those with their noses pressed up against the window envious. It was a book not to read but to reference.
Warhol would have been delighted by this. He claimed, "I don't read much about myself, anyway, I just look at the pictures in the articles, it doesn't matter what they say about me; I just read the textures of the words."

Warhol, a man who claimed not to read, naturally published what is largely considered to be an unreadable book, a, A Novel. Yet, as a work of literature, it has all the marks of a Warhol: mechanical processes, off-register marks (spelling errors) and a good deal of modernist difficulty and a plot that was arguably Joycean in its complexity and attention to quotidian detail. If there is a story, it's so buried in literal transcription and typographical inconsistency that the signal-to-noise ratio makes a conventional reading nearly impossible which, of course, was Warhol's intention. Warhol conquered the experimental film world in the early 60s by a similar tactic. The prevalent trend was the quick edit and jump cut, but Warhol did the opposite: he plunked the camera on a tripod and let it run... and run.... and run... There were no edits, no pans. When asked about the slowness of his films, he said that he was not interested in moving forward, but moving backward to the very beginning of filmmaking when the camera was fixed to a tripod, capturing whatever happened to be in front of it. If you've seen his 3-minute screen tests, where the camera is fixed on a face, you can't but be persuaded by Warhol's point of view: they’re amongst the most striking and gorgeous portraits ever made. Sleep, six hours of a man sleeping and Empire, a still, 8-hour shot of The Empire State Building, are incredible time-based portraits.

a purported to be a 24-hour tape recorded portrait of Factory superstar Ondine but turned out to be a mix of over 100 characters recorded over a two-year period. Each section of the book has a different typographical layout due to the idiosyncrasies of the various typists that worked on the tapes. Warhol decided to leave these as they were given to him as well as maintaining all misspellings. What a ends up as is approaching the idea of a literary vérité that is a multi-authored text, riddled with the formal subjectivity of several transcribers, radically questioning the notions of singular authorial genius. Like all of Warhol's production, his role was that of conceptualist or as he saw it, factory boss making sure that his legions executed his concepts with enough latitude to make it feel like they had some stake in it, when in actuality they had none.

His other books, The Philosophy of Andy Warhol, POPism, America and Exposures were ghost written affairs by his assistants who channeled the voice of Andy Warhol. Their voice became his public voice while Warhol largely remained silent. Those famous Warholian soundbites you hear -- famous for fifteen minutes, etc. -- often weren't written by him.

While mid-century modernism dipped a toe into what William Carlos Williams called "the speech of Polish mothers," the actual speech of Polish mothers was too ugly, too unrefined, for the likes of poetry. Frank O'Hara, father of the "talk" poem, approaches in his late works, what Marjorie Perloff calls, "the vagaries of everyday conversation":

"thank you for the dark and the shoulders"
"oh thank you"

okay I'll meet you at the weather station at 5 we'll take a helicopter into the "eye" of the storm we'll be so happy in the center of things at last now the wind rushes up nothing happens and departs
This late work, "Biotherm (for Bill Berkson)" written in 1961, yet it still hung on to privileged vernacular (the "eye of the storm") and the polite space between "oh" and "thank you." And although it's an everyday sort of poem, the piece is full of meaningful and heightened moments that make it, undoubtedly, a great poem.

Yet a mere five years later a blasts apart the New York School's claims to speech-based realism by publishing nearly five hundred pages of real speech. The book has its roots in another attempt at real speech -- Molly Bloom's soliloquy-- yet Molly's banter looks stiff and contrived by comparison. a is ugly. And difficult:

O--I gave him amphetamine, I gave him amphetamine one night, when when D--Recently?... O--I first met him. D-- No no, a long time ago. O-- and he was a frightening poetry D--Yeah. O--He wrote poetry, he wrote poetry D--It scared him very much. O--It scared him,... D--He's been on LSDand uh, pills and uh every O--Baby, it doesn't matter. D--It doesn't matter, well well- O--Why why why don't yo have to take pills D--Huh? O--Wht don't you have to t-t-t-ake drugs? Why isn't it a necessity for you to take drugs? D--Oh. O--Why, because you D--Well, no, I O--You're as high as you are... Hello? Who's caluing? Duchess oh, Duchess lover, it's Ondine.

Warhol took the 20th century's quest for natural speech to its logical conclusion proving, contrary to Robert Grenier ("I HATE SPEECH") that blather, in its untouched state, is just as disjunctive as other fragmentary modernist strategies.

Surrounding Warhol was an entire cult of people constantly engaged in translating ephemeral speech into text:

Everyone, absolutely everyone, was tape-recording everyone else. Machinery had already taken over people's sex lives--dildos and all kinds of vibrators--and now it was taking over their social lives, too, with tape recorders and Polaroids. The running joke between Brigid and me was that all our phone calls started with whoever'd been called by the other saying, "Hello, wait a minute," and running to plug in and hook up... I'd provoke any kind of hysteria I could think of on the phone just to get myself a good tape. Since I wasn't going out much and was home a lot on the mornings and evenings, I put in a lot of time on the phone gossiping and making trouble and getting ideas from people and trying to figure out what was happening--and taping it all.

The trouble was, it took so long to get a tape transcribed, even when you had somebody working at it full-time. In those days even the typists were making their own tapes--as I said everybody was into it.

At the Warhol Museum in Pittsburgh while researching my book of Warhol interviews, the curator rolled out a cart with enormous stacks of paper on it. He told me that here were the complete transcriptions of Warhol's tapes from over the years. Apparently, each night out on the town, Warhol would take his tape recorder (which he referred to as his "wife") and let the machine roll for the duration of the evening. People eventually became so used to its presence that they ignored it and went on speaking without any self-consciousness at all. The next morning, Warhol would then take the previous night's catch of tapes into the Factory, drop them on a desk and have an assistant transcribe them. Upon seeing these documents -- raw, unedited transcriptions of lost, ephemeral conversation that had transpired decades ago between some of the most famous people in the world -- I proposed to the curator that this would make a great next book. He shook his head and said that due to the threat of libel, the tapes could not be published until 2037, fifty years after Warhol’s death.

Also at the museum were Warhol’s time capsules stacked on shelves in the library. For the better part of his career as an artist, Warhol always kept an open cardboard box in his studio into which was thrown both the detritus and gems that drifted through the Factory. Warhol made no distinction as to what was saved -- from hamburger wrappers to celebrity-autographed photos; full runs of his magazine Interview; even his wigs -- it all went in. When the box was full, it was sealed, numbered, and signed by Warhol, each a work of art. After his death, the museum was given the boxes, totaling over 8,000 cubic feet of material. When I visited the museum, I noticed that only a few dozen of the seemingly hundreds of boxes were opened. When I asked why, the curator informed me that each time a box is opened, every object in that box must be extensively documented and catalogued, assigned a catalog number, described, photographed and so forth, to the point where opening a single box entailed a month’s worth of work for two people laboring full time. The implications of not only the act of archiving but the process of decoding -- cataloguing, sorting, preserving -- makes Warhol’s oeuvre particularly prescient for web-driven literary practices today.

Warhol’s oeuvre, then, should be read as text instead of literature, echoing Barthes’ idea that “the text is a tissue of citations, resulting from the thousand sources of culture,” which is a shorthand defense for the waves of appropriative, “unoriginal,” and “uncreative” artworks that would follow after Warhol for decades. It also explains why Warhol could take a newspaper photo of Jackie Kennedy and turn it into an icon. Warhol understood that the “tissue of citations” around the image of Jackie would only accrue over time, growing more complex with each passing historic event or era. Warhol had a keen eye for choosing the right image, the image with the most accumulative potential. As a result, it’s possible for us to see Warhol’s Jackie without knowing a thing about the Warholian soap opera environs from which it sprung. Warhol’s ongoing strategic removal of himself as Author lets the works live on after all the day’s drama was done with. As Barthes says, “Once the Author is gone, the claim to ‘decipher’ a text becomes quite useless.” What on the surface appears to be a web of lies in Warhol’s life is actually a smokescreen of purposeful disinformation in order to deflate the figure of the Author.

By invoking the normally anti-social, criminal acts of impersonation, fraudulence and identity fraud he was able to gradually eradicate himself from his work, realizing that dependence on autobiography would limit the shelf-life of his art works. Contradictorily, he also realized that through absence, what was lost becomes more ever-present and ubiquitous, morphing into the iconic.

Let’s look at the ways in which he set about accomplishing this. In interviews, Warhol lied all the time. When, for instance, he was asked where he was born, he gave a different answer each time. Warhol’s career leaves a legacy of authorized impersonations, most famously when, in the fall of 1967, Factory denizen and seasoned actor Allen Midgette was hired by Warhol to do a series of college lectures impersonating Andy Warhol. Warhol himself found these engagements difficult and tedious. The students, expecting someone dynamic and glamorous, were often disappointed when the tight-lipped, shy Warhol appeared. Midgette on the other hand -- charismatically donning his silver wig and dark sunglasses -- was a smash hit with the students. The stunt went off without a hitch for some time, but the gig finally ended when a suspicious newspaper reporter (a keeper of logos) called the Factory and Warhol was forced to spill the beans. Andy Warhol -- as himself -- subsequently had to return to the colleges to make up for the impersonations.

Another tactic was to move a conversation off-subject, normally one which forced the conversation away from him. In the Spring of 2002 I was leafing through a compilation of essays about Warhol released by October magazine and the last piece in the book was an interview with Andy by the art critic Benjamin Buchloh from 1985. It seemed that the more pointed Buchloh's questions became, the more elusive Andy's answers were. Buchloh would hit harder and Warhol would get slipperier, repeating things he'd said many times before as if Buchloh's questions were irrelevant. Buchloh got more and more agitated by Warhol's lack of response and in turn began talking at length while Warhol kept his mouth shut. In the end, I realized that by saying so little, Warhol was inverting the traditional form of the interview; I ended up knowing much more about Buchloh than I did about Warhol. Really, although Buchloh set out to interview Warhol, Warhol ended up interviewing Buchloh. From the beginning of his painting career in 1962 to his death in 1987, every interview was treated as an opportunity to for him to disappear.

Throughout his interviews, Warhol is nothing if not consistent. The art critic Reva Wolf, tells of a collection of artists' statements gathered for the 1980 MoMA Picasso retrospective catalog. She tells us that painter Paul Jenkins was of the opinion that "the dominant feature of his work is the distortion of the classical which eventually became the classical itself." Romare Bearden explained that Picasso "remained a very Spanish painter." And Roy Lichtenstein said, "I think of Picasso as the most important artist of the twentieth century." Warhol, avoiding such weighty art-historical pronouncements, offered this observation: "Ah, the only thing I can really relate to is his daughter Paloma. She's wonderful. Do you know her at all? She comes to town. You should maybe interview her sometime. She comes here every other week. I'm just glad he had a wonderful daughter like Paloma."

Likewise, when, in a 1971 documentary film, art critic Barbara Rose asked him what he thought of the artist Jasper Johns (whose work is often noted as a strong early influence on Warhol), he responded with a simple and characteristic "I think he's great." When pressed to say why, Warhol explained, "Ohhh, uh, he makes such great lunches. He does this great thing with chicken. He puts parsley inside the chicken." While it very well may have been true that Johns was a terrific cook, Warhol's description of his chicken recipe was, needless to say, not the kind of information Rose was seeking, and was clearly meant to rile her. Wolf goes on to speculate that it is likely Warhol found a way to "out" Johns by focusing on a stereotypically female activity.

Warhol was the king of passive aggressiveness. By moving himself away, he only became more forceful, throwing a focus onto the margins, the peripheral. He proposes new ways of thinking: Wait. What if stuffing the chicken with parsley means more than a flag painting?

Even his management of his career fell under this spell. In regard to his fame, he said, "Being famous isn't all that important. If I weren't famous, I wouldn't have been shot for being Andy Warhol." [cit.] Often, when asked for an interview, he would ask a Factory denizen to write it for him in its entirety. In two cases, "important" interviews with Andy (from which oft-repeated truisms were attributed to him) were written entirely by assistant Gerard Malanga. It wasn't until decades later that it was revealed that these words weren't Andy's.
In another 1964 interview penned by Malanga, "Interview With Andy Warhol on EMPIRE," the majority of the questions and answers were appropriated directly from an Empire State Building publicity brochure.

GM: Can you tell me about the exterior of the Empire State?
AW: Not only the highest building in the world, Empire State is also one of the most beautiful. The exterior is of Indiana limestone trimmed with sparkling strips of stainless steel which run from the sixth floor all the way to the top. Whether seen in sunlight or moonlight, the effect is magnificent. Marble in the Cathedral-like lobby was imported from four different countries, France, Italy, Belgium and Germany. Experts combed these countries to get the most beautiful marble, and in one case, the contents of an entire quarry were exhausted to insure matching blocks of exactly the right color and graining.

GM: Who are some of Empire State's celebrated visitors?
AW: Each year the Empire State Building plays host to many Heads of State or dignitaries and celebrities. Had you been here on the right days in the past, you might have seen Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip of England, or the King and Queen of Thailand, or Princess Birgitta and Desiree of Sweden, or Queen Frederika of Greece or even your favorite movie actor.

GM: Oh, by the way, that reminds me, who is your favorite movie actor?
AW: My favorite movie actor is Troy Donahue.

In the 1966 black and white interview which I quoted from at the beginning of this chapter, Warhol shares a bill with Roy Lichtenstein and the difference between the two artists couldn't be more striking. The first fifteen minutes of the half-hour documentary feature a cheerful, articulate normal-looking Lichtenstein in his studio talking about the pop landscape of billboards and advertising. He says, "I'm working in a style which parodies the style of everyday art and everyday society. I'm interested in portraying an anti-sensibility that pervades the society and a kind of gross oversimplification. I use that more as style than as actuality. I really don't think that things can be gross and oversimplified and remain art. I mean, it must have subtleties and it must appeal to a kind of aesthetic unity, otherwise it's not in the realm of art, it's something else." For Lichtenstein, Pop couldn't be confused with life. It was something to play with during work hours but then left behind.

By contrast Warhol stumbles through his portion:

Q: A lot of people might be inclined, it seems to me, to put you down because they could say that your work has a certain distance: it's mechanical and you don't really make it and all of those things. And yet, like anyone else, when you start to talk about it, the things you say are about really caring, I mean, you want people's lives to be better.

WARHOL: Uh... Uhhhhhh... Yeah, well I guess I really don't, uhhh... It's too hard to care and I guess I... Well, I care... I still care but it would be so much easier not to care.

Q: In other words, are you saying that you are involved in this idea of making people more conscious of their lives but you don't really want to get into their lives deeply...

WARHOL: Uh... Oh, yes... yeah. I don't want to get too involved.
Q: I think that this is a very important thing about all of your work: The idea of your own distance that you keep from it. Is this because of this feeling that you don't want to get that close to it?
WARHOL: Uh... yes. I don't want to get too close to it.
Q: You never, in any of your work have ever really said anything that tells anyone anything about you. You don't want that to happen, do you?
WARHOL: Uh... well, there's not very much to say, you know, about me.

When Lichtenstein left his studio, he left Pop behind. Warhol, on the other hand, lived pop. Warhol's entire career as a response to the question: What does it mean to really be Pop? His whole life was an ongoing performance dedicated to answering that question. Like a snake shedding skins, the different phases of his work are all an attempt to get ever closer to the ideal of Pop.

And it worked. In the 1960s, when he painted his famous portrait of Elizabeth Taylor, he was a gushing fan, and to paint her was the only way to get close to her. By contrast, by the end of the 1970s, it was Elizabeth Taylor who needed to stand next to Andy Warhol in order to bask in the glow of his reflected light. While Lichtenstein, Johns, Rauschenberg and others largely kept out of the spotlight, keeping Pop at bay, Warhol never looked back. He embodied Pop. And like Pop, living life as Pop was ugly, brutal, cheap, shallow, depressing and hollow. As much as Warhol got out of it, that's how much was taken out of him: suicides, drug casualties, two assassination attempts, numerous jealousies, death threats. Just like a pop star. In the end, it was a tremendous sacrifice to make for a set of complex philosophical propositions that could perhaps only be wrapped in the guise of Pop.

By stepping outside of the logocentric culture into a weightless world, one devoid of any consequences, everything was possible. Only art would permit him to play out these ideas with 100% commitment on a journey that was truly lifelong.

By all rights, I should be done with Warhol. I've written books and articles about him, lectured endlessly on him, taught him year after year, quote him ceaselessly, and still he continues to have a grip on me. Warhol was a 360 degree artist: no matter what angle you hit him from you're both right and wrong. He's like a greased spinning cylinder, there are simply no handles to grab on to; there are no sides, no angles, no surety. Every way is the right way, particularly if it involves a seemingly contradictory stance.

In his last interview just before he died in 1987 with the Australian art critic Paul Taylor, Warhol repeated what he had said dozens of times throughout his life but this time it had a weight, a prescient and a nod and a wink, so strong as to convince the most skeptical of us:

Taylor: If you were starting out now, would you do anything differently?
Warhol: I don't know. I just worked hard. It's all fantasy.
Taylor: Life is fantasy?
Warhol: Yeah, it is.
Taylor: What's real?
Warhol: Don't know.
Taylor: Some people would.
Warhol: Would they?
Taylor: Do you really believe it, or tomorrow will you say the opposite?
Warhol: I don't know. I like this idea that you can say the opposite.
Taylor: But you wouldn't in this case?
Warhol: No.
A few years ago I was lecturing to a class at Princeton. After the class, a small group of students came up to me to tell me about a workshop that they were taking with one of the most well-known fiction writers in America. They were complaining about her lack of pedagogical imagination, assigning them the types of creative writing exercises that they had been doing since junior high school. For example, she had them pick their favorite writer and come in next week with an "original" work in the style of that author. I asked one of the students which author they chose. She answered Jack Kerouac. She then added that the assignment felt meaningless to her because the night before she tried to "get into Kerouac’s head" and scribbled a piece in "his style" to fulfill the assignment. It occurred to me that for this student to actually write in the style of Kerouac, she would have been better off taking a road trip across the country in a '48 Buick with the convertible roof down, gulping Benzedrine by the fistful, washing 'em down with bourbon, all the while typing furiously away on a manual typewriter, going 85 miles per hour down a ribbon of desert highway. And even then, it would’ve been a completely different experience, not to mention a very different piece of writing, than Kerouac’s.

Instead, my mind drifted to those aspiring painters who fill up the Metropolitan Museum of Art every day, spending hours learning by copying the Old Masters. If it’s good enough for them, why isn’t it good enough for us? The power and usefulness of the act of retyping is invoked by Walter Benjamin, a master copyist himself, in the following passage where he extols the virtue of copying, coincidentally invoking the metaphor of the road:

The power of a country road is different when one is walking along it from when one if flying over it by airplane. In the same way, the power of a text is different when it is read from when it is copied out. The airplane passenger see only how the road pushes through the landscape, how it unfolds according to the same laws as the terrain surrounding it. Only he who walks the road on foot learns of the power it commands... Only the copied text commands the soul of him who is occupied with it, whereas the mere reader never discovers the new aspects of his inner self that are opened by the text, the road cut through the interior jungle forever closing behind it: because the reader follows the movement of him mind in the free flight of day-dreaming, whereas the copier submits to its command.

The idea of being able to physically get inside a text through the act of copying is an appealing one for pedagogy: I would think that should this student have retyped a chunk – or if she was ambitious, the entirety – of On The Road. Wouldn’t she have really understood Kerouac’s style in a profound way that was bound to stick with her?

After having learned of my proposition, Simon Morris, a British artist, decided to actually retype On The Road, one page a day on a blog called "Getting Inside Kerouac’s Head." In his introductory post, he wrote, "It's an amusing anecdote and it occurred to me that it would make an interesting work. It would be interesting to realize this proposition as a work in its own right and in the process to see what I would learn through re-typing Kerouac's prose." And so on May 31, 2008, he began: "I first met Neal not long after my father died..." filling up the page with Kerouac's first page and ending the blog-entry mid-sentence, corresponding with the printed page of On The Road: "...which reminded me of my jail problem it is absolutely necessary now to postpone all. The blog entry, published June 1 picks up mid-sentence from the preceding day: "those leftover things concerning our personal lovestings and at once begin thinking of specific worklife plans..." He reached page 408 on March 22 2009, thereby completing the project.

Morris had never read the book before and as he retyped it, he enjoyed the watching the narrative unravel. It took him twenty minutes each day, hunting-and-pecking, to type the 400-word pages. And, true to my hunch, he's had a relationship to the book far different from if he had merely read it: "I have told several people in an excited manner that 'this is the most thrilling read/ride of my life.' Certainly, I have never paid any single book this much attention and having never read Kerouac's book, the unfolding story is certainly a pleasurable experience -- it's a great read. Not only do I type it up, word for word, each day but I then proofread each page, checking for mistakes before posting it on the blog... so each page is being re-typed and read several times... But the level of scrutiny that the daily activity has opened up to me in my reading has drawn my attention to certain characteristics in Kerouac's prose which in my normal reading style I'm fairly certain I wouldn't have noticed." Morris echoes Gertrude Stein who says, "I always say that you cannot tell what a picture really is or what an object really is until you dust it every day and you cannot tell what a book is until you type it or proof-read it. It then does something to you that only reading never can do."

For example, Morris takes note of Kerouac's use of hyphens in the text, which he discovered gives the story its flow, drawing parallels with lines on the highway. He also calculated how many times the title phrase "on the road" is used (24 times in the first 104 pages). Morris muses, "In Kerouac's book, the words 'on the road' are chanted like a mantra and their repetition keeps you moving through the text, along the asphalt from East to West." He's also gained insight into the way in which Kerouac's shorthand allows the reader to complete sentences in their head, which has led Morris to chuck in a few words of his own: "When re-typing the following words by Kerouac: 'The counterman -- it was three A.M. -- heard us talk about money and offered to give us the hamburgers for free.' I notice I had added the word 'for free' to the end of the sentence and then had to delete my addition. This has happened on more than one occasion. And there is, of course, the possibility that I haven't caught all my additions and have left some extra words imbedded in Kerouac's text." One wonders, then, if this is really a copy or if it in some way couldn't be construed as an entirely different text, one based on the original. Taking it one step further, one could always write a new text simply by tossing words in as one feels the need to, the way Morris inserted "for free."

Morris wants to show us that reading no longer need be a passive act, with the almighty word of the author going directly to the passive receptor of the reader. In the 1970s, the experimentally-inclined Language poets proposed a way that the reader could, in fact, become the writer. By atomizing words across a page coupled with disrupting normative modes of syntax (putting the words of a sentence in the "wrong" order), they felt that a non-hierarchical linguistic landscape would encourage a reader to reconstruct the text as they saw fit. Fueled by French theoreticians such as Jacques Derrida, they wanted to demonstrate that the textual field is an unstable field of ever-shifting signs and signifiers, thereby unable to be claimed by either author or reader as stable and authoritative. If the reader were able to reconstruct the open text, it would be as (un)stable and as (un)meaningful as the author's. The end result would be a level playing field for all, debunking the twin myths of both the all-powerful author and the passive reader.

I think that Morris would agree with the Language poets about the need to challenge this traditional power dynamic, but he’s going about it in a completely different way, based in mimesis and replication instead of disjunction and deconstruction. It’s about moving information from one place to another completely intact. With very little intervention, the entire reading / writing experience is challenged; no words need to be scrambled.

Morris' uptake of my provocation potentially puts into play a game of telephone of fluid concepts and interchanges abetted by technology, fueled by the raging cultural practice of the remix. While Kerouac remains iconic, dozens of parasitic and paratextual versions could inevitably appear. This is what happened to Elizabeth Alexander’s Obama inaugural poem days after her reading of it, on a blog where I asked readers to remix her words. An MP3 of her reading was available to be used as a source and within a week, over fiftywildly disparate versions of the poem appeared, each using her words and voice. One mixer cut up each word of Alexander’s reading and strung them back together alphabetically. Others looped and twisted her poems, making her say the opposite of what she intended; some set to them to music; others recited them verbatim but in highly unusual voices; a pair of beat-boxing schoolchildren even took a stab at it. Like Kerouac, Alexander’s status remains iconic but instead of an all-powerful author intoning to a sea of passive receivers, an instantaneous outpouring of artistic responses was created as an active response. The most uncreative response was entitled, “I Am A Robot” and was simply an unaltered recording of Alexander reading her poem. Is this anything new? Haven’t there always been parodies, written or spoken, of events large and small? (Nixon’s “I am not a crook” speech spawned dozens of satires.) Yes, but never this quickly, democratically nor this technologically engaged. And the highly mimetic qualities of the many responses -- some of which just barely nudged Alexander’s words -- showed how deeply ideas of reframing have seeped into the way we think; many of these responses didn’t aim to be wildly "creative" and "original." Instead, the uncreative and untouched re-presentation of an iconic artifact placed into a new context proved to be creative enough.

Likewise, Morris' retyping would have been a different project altogether before the web. It’s hard to think of a precedent for such an act. Certainly there were untold numbers of bootlegged and pirated editions of books of which hours and hours were spent exactly retyping preexisting texts, as well as medieval scribes and scriveners of all stripes throughout history. But the fluidity of the digital environment has encouraged and incubated these dormant ideas to fruition as creative / uncreative acts. As I stated in my Introduction, the computer encourages the author to mimic its workings, where cutting and pasting are integral to the writing process.

One could imagine a novelist’s entire oeuvre dedicated to the recopying of classic novels much in the way that artists like Sherrie Levine, Elaine Sturtevant, or Richard Pettibon have made careers of copying existing works, reframed as their original creation. But it didn’t happen; and the only time it was bandied about was in the realm of magical realism, as an odd coincidence or a private obsession.

Morris asks, "If Kerouac were alive today, would he publishing on paper, or blogging or tweeting his way across America?" Perhaps the answer to that can be found in an interview Jackson Pollock conducted in 1951, responding to a question about his controversial method of painting: "My opinion is that new needs need new techniques. And the modern artists have found new ways and new means of making their statements. It seems to me that the modern painter cannot express this age, the airplane, the atom bomb, the radio, in the old forms of the Renaissance or of any past culture. Each age finds its own technique." For Morris, it’s the blog: "I’ve probably shifted into reverse -- the further forwards I progress on his road from East to West, by the nature of blogs, the further backwards 'my' story goes, disjointed, broken up as a daily bulletin." He likened his readers to passengers joining him on the trip.

Traffic -- in this context, web traffic -- has been light, in spite of common wisdom that says by consistently blogging for hundreds of days in a row, you will generate interest. For the duration of the project and its afterlife as an artifactual blog, Morris has only had a handful commenters / passengers, curiously, none of them have been Kerouac’s estate or his business representatives calling foul play for freely republishing a very lucrative artwork. Morris’ work, then, is an anomaly -- not a pirated edition worth legally pursing -- and as such, becoming functionless and aestheticized, it can only be a work of art. Morris doesn't see himself as replicating Kerouac's practice, only his words: "I'm more interested in tracing, pressing myself up against the existing text, hitting the same letters in the same order (give or take a few slippages), reconstructing the same words, sentences, paragraphs and chapters." In some ways, although he is using a fast technology, the daily ritual of blogging is a plodding, deliberate practice. Unlike Philip Whalen, who said of Kerouac, "He could type faster than any human being you ever saw, supposedly 100 words per minute," Morris is the opposite: "There was no real problem there as I'm a fairly poor typist," he admits, debunking any notion of craft in his practice.

Morris eloquently sums up the project by claiming: "There’s more differences than similarities which makes it challenging that the same piece of writing, typed up in a different context, is an entirely new piece of writing." Yet when asked how the re-typing makes him feel, Morris hesitates: "One would hope for some truly profound response but really there is none. I don’t feel anything at all. A bit like Jack Kerouac’s own journey on the road and into himself in search of something that he never really finds." And then, haltingly, he asks "Am I losing myself as I 'uncreatively' type words that have already been typed in one of literature’s most celebrated acts of spontaneous prose?" and answers, "All I can really say with any certainty is I’ve never spent such a long time with a book or thought about any book as much. When you read a book you are often simultaneously inside and outside of the text. But in this case, I have reflected much more on the process of reading than I would normally when I engage with a text. It’s not only about hitting the same keys as Kerouac in the same order, give or take a few slippages but it’s also about the process of the project." In the end, he doesn’t know if he’s succeeded in getting inside Kerouac’s head, but it’s clear that he’s succeeded in getting far inside his own head, garnering a great deal of self awareness as both reader and writer, act which, after this experience, he will never be able to take for granted again.
Parsing the New Illegibility

Twentieth century notions of illegibility were commonly bound up with a shattering of syntax and disjunction, but the twenty first century’s challenge to textual convention may be that of density and weight. Appropriative writing specializes in moving information resulting in books that are often written not to be read, but to be thought about. How does this, then, impact on the reception of such works? Uncreative writing upends the tradition relationship between writer and reader, opening up new strategies for reading -- or not reading. The web functions both as the site of reading and site of writing: for writers, it's a vast supply text from which to construct literature; readers function in the same way, hacking a path through the morass of information, working as much at filtering as reading.

The internet is mostly unreadable not because of the way it is written (mostly normative expository syntax at the top-level), but because of its enormous size. Just as new reading strategies had to be developed in order to read difficult modernist works of literature, so new reading strategies are emerging on the web: skimming, data aggregating, the employment of intelligent agents to name a few. Our reading habits seem to be imitating the way machines work. We could even say that online, by an inordinate amount of skimming in order to comprehend all the information passing before our eyes, we parse text -- a binary process of sorting language -- more than we read it. And there is an increasing number of texts being written by machines to be read specifically by other machines rather than people, as evidenced by the untold number of spoof pages set up for page views or ad clickthroughs, lexicons of password code cracks, and so forth. While there is still a tremendous amount of human intervention, the future will be mechanical. Geneticist Susan Blackmore affirms this: "Think of programs that write original poetry or cobble together new student essays, or programs that store information about your shopping preferences and suggest books or clothes you might like next. They may be limited in scope, dependent on human input and send their output to human brains, but they copy, select and recombine the information they handle." The twentieth century’s challenge was to decode the illegible in a sea of legibility; better yet -- cutting across the cultural grain -- was to scribe the illegible. The twenty-first’s challenge is to mime the structures of illegibility in a sea of illegibility: not to read, not to write, but to manage.

Trying to linearly read Gertrude Stein's The Making of Americans is like trying to linearly read the web. It's mostly possible in small doses, dipped in and out of. At nearly 1,000 pages, its heft is intimidating but the biggest deterrent to reading the book is its scope, having begun small as "a history of a family to being a history of everybody the family knew and then it became the history of every kind and of every individual human being," thus rendering it a conceptual work, a beautiful proposal that's hard to fulfill. "Ever tried. Ever failed. No matter. Try again. Fail again. Fail better." says Beckett, a sentiment which could easily apply to uncreative writing.

The Making of Americans is one in a long line of impossibly scoped projects. The anonymously penned My Secret Life, a 2500 page of non-stop Victorian work of pornography is another. No matter how titillating any given page may be -- and every single page is -- there's no way of ingesting it straight through. It's a concept as much as anything, a mad work of language on steroids to counter the moral repression of the day both by means of content and sheer bulk. It had to be big: It's surplus text at its most erotic.

Or take Douglas Huebler's impossible to fulfill Variable Piece #70 (1971), where he attempts: "Throughout the artist's lifetime he will photographically document, to the extent of his capacity, the existence of everyone alive in order to produce the most authentic and inclusive representation of the human species that may be assembled in that manner." Like Stein, Huebler began locally, photographing everyone he passed by on the street. Later, he would go to huge rallies and sporting events, photographing the crowds. Finally, realizing the futility of his efforts, he began rephotographing existing photos of large gatherings of people in order to attempt to accomplish his goal. Of course, he too, failed better.

Another instance is Joe Gould's An Oral History of Our Time, which was purported in June of 1942 to be "approximately nine million two hundred and fifty-five thousand words long, or about a dozen times as long as the Bible," written out in longhand on both sides of the page written so illegibly that only Gould could read it:

Gould puts into the Oral History only things he has seen or heard. At least half of it is made up on conversations taken down verbatim or summarized; hence the title. "What people say is history," Gould says. "What we used to think was history -- kings and queens, treaties, inventions, big battles, beheadings, Caesar, Napoleon, Pontius Pilate, Columbus, William Jennings Bryan -- is only formal history and largely false. I'll put down the informal history of the shirt-sleeved multitude--what they had to say about their jobs, love affairs, vittles, sprees, scrapes, and sorrows--or I'll perish in the attempt."

The scope was enormous: included are everything from transcriptions of soliloquies of park-bench bums to rhymes transcribed from restroom stalls:

Hundred of thousands of words are devoted to the drunken behavior and sexual adventures of various professional Greenwich Villagers, in the twenties. There are hundreds of reports of ginny Village parties, including gossip about the guests and faithful reports of their arguments on subjects such as reincarnation, birth control, free love, psychoanalysis, Christian Science, Swedenborgianism, vegetarianism, alcoholism, and different political and art isms. "I have fully covered what might be termed the intellectual underworld of my time," Gould says.

Gould's project, too, ended in failure: No manuscript was ever written. It was an enormous hoax, so convincing that it fooled Joseph Mitchell, a reporter writer for The New Yorker, who wrote a small book about him, ending up as Gould's de facto biographer.

Although there was no Oral History, there is a The Making of Americans. What, then, are we supposed to do with it if not read it? The scholar Ulla Dydo proposes a radical solution: don't read it at all. She remarked that much of Stein's work was never meant to be read closely, rather she was deploying visual means of reading. What appeared to be densely unreadable and repetitive was, in fact, designed to be skimmed, and to delight the eye, in a visual sense, while holding the book: "These constructions have an astonishing visual result. The limited vocabulary, parallel phrasing, and equivalent sentences create a visual pattern that fills the page... We read this page until the words no longer cumulatively build meanings but make a visual pattern that does not require understanding, like a decorative wallpaper that we see not as details but only as design." Here's an excerpt from the "Mrs. Hersland and the Hersland Children" chapter:

There are then always many millions being made of women who have in them servant girl nature always in them, there are always then there are always being made then many millions who have a little attacking and mostly scared dependent weakness in them, there are always being made then many millions of them who have a scared timid submission in them with a resisting somewhere sometime in them. There are always some then of the many millions of this first kind of them the independent dependent kind of them who never have it in them to have any such attacking in them, there are more of them of the many millions of this first kind of them, who have very little in them of the scared weekness in them, there are some of them who have in them such a weakness as meekness in them, some of them have this in them as gentle pretty young innocence inside them, there are all kinds of mixtures in them then in the many millions of this kind of them in the many kinds of living they have in them.

The above passage proves Dydo's thesis to be correct. It's an extremely visual text with the rhythm being propelled by the roundness of the letter m and the verticality of the architectural letter formation "illi" of million. The word million is the driving semantic unit with the visual correlatives -- m and on -- framing the illi, in an almost palindromatic way, as the on visually glues the two round humps into another m. The negative spaces of the o and n echo the negative spaces of the m. The result is the visual construction of a new word, millim, a gorgeously rhythmic, palindromic unit. The m's lead the eye up a step to the i's, which then step you up to the twin l's, the apogee of the unit and then step back down the way you came. This visual sequence is echoed by the words sometimes and them. The connective tissue is the repeated use of the conjunctions more of them / little in them / have in them / some of them / kind of them / many of them which permeate the passage, giving it its basic rhythm and flow.

Stein's words, then, when viewed this way, don't really function the way words normally do. We can read them as transparent or visual entities, or we can read them as signifiers of language constructed entirely of language. This is the approach Craig Dworkin has taken in his book Parse, where he's parsed an entire grammar book by it's own rules, resulting in a 284-page book. The writing is almost an abstraction -- a schema -- of Stein's repetitions:

Preparatory Subject third person singular intransitive present tense verb adjective of negation Noun conjunction of alternation Noun locative relative pronoun auxiliary infinitive and incomplete participle used together in a passive verbal phrase definite article Noun genitive preposition relative pronoun period Relative Pronoun third person singular indicative present tense verb and required adverb forming a transitive verbal phrase marks of quotation definite article singular possessive noun verbal noun preposition of the infinitive intransitive infinitive verb comma marks of quotation all taken as a direct object conjunction marks of quotation definite article verbal noun genitive preposition definite article singular noun comma marks of quotation all taken as a direct object conjunction adjective adjective plural direct objective case noun preposition of the infinitive intransitive infinitive verb and passive incomplete participle used as a complex compound passive verbal construction adverb definite article
The source text, Edwin A. Abbott’s How To Parse: An Attempt to Apply the Principles of Scholarship to English Grammar, was first published in 1874 and played a leading role in the pedagogic debate over whether English should be analyzed as if it were Latin. Thousands of copies were printed as textbooks in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Dworkin says, "When I first came across the book I was reminded of a confession by Gertrude Stein (another product of 1874): 'I really do not know that anything has ever been more exciting than diagramming sentences.' And so, of course, I parsed Abbott’s book into its own idiosyncratic system of analysis." The process was slow, taking over five years to complete. Dworkin called it "EXCRUCIATINGLY slow" when he started, but by the end, he could sit down with the source text and parse-type at "full speed." But parse-typing at full speed requires little inspiration, tons of perspiration, and an acute knowledge of the rules of grammar. This couldn't be more different compared to the famously hypnotic all-night writing sessions of Gertrude Stein, where inspiration was inseperable from process: "When you write a thing it is perfectly clear and then you begin to be doubtful about it, but then you read it again and you lose yourself in it again as when you wrote it." What Dworkin gives us is structure as literature, plain and simple. It's purposely lacking is the play of rhythmic visu ality and orality that Stein worked so hard to achieve. This is not to say that there's not visual interest in Dworkin's text, rather it's asking different questions of us.

What does it mean "to parse"? The verb "to parse" comes from the Latin pars, referring to parts of speech. In vernacular, to parse means to understand or comprehend. In literature, it's a method of breaking a sentence down into its component parts of speech, analyzing the form, function, and syntactical relationship of each part to the whole. In computing, the meaning is similar, meaning to analyze or separate parts of code so that the computer can process it more efficiently. In computing, parsing is done by a parser, a program which assembles all the bits of code so it can build fluid data structures. But here's where it gets interesting: computational parsing language was based on the rules of English as set forth by the likes of Abbott. Now, the rules English are notoriously complicated, idiosyncratic, and ambiguous -- just ask anyone trying to learn it -- and those vagaries have been carried over into computing. In other words, the compiler can get pretty confused pretty easily. It likes repetition and predictable structures; every ambiguity it must parse will ultimately result in slowing down the program. At his most programmatic, the most logical and least ambiguous part of Dworkin's book is when he parsed the complete index of Abbott's book. It's so simple that even I can parse it. Here's the index entry for the word colon:

Colon, 309.
which Dworkin parses as:

Noun comma compound arabic numeral period or the entry for the word "clause":

Clause, defined, 239.

which is:

Noun comma compound arabic numeral comma Noun period

A column of the index looks like this:

Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral comma Noun period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period
Noun comma compound arabic numeral period

This simple and repetitive structure is nearly identical to any number of returns I get when I use the UNIX command ls to view the contents of a directory. Here's a portion of a log written by a compiler that notes every time a program on my computer crashes:

Kenny-G-MacBook-Air-2:CrashReporter irwinchusid$ ls
KDXClient_2009-04-05-030158_Kenny-G-MacBook-Air.crash
Microsoft AU Daemon_2009-04-23-183439_Kenny-G-MacBook-Air.crash
Microsoft AU Daemon_2009-04-23-184134_Kenny-G-MacBook-Air.crash
Microsoft AU Daemon_2009-04-24-030404_Kenny-G-MacBook-Air.crash
Microsoft AU Daemon_2009-04-27-233001_Kenny-G-MacBook-Air.crash
Microsoft Database Daemon_2009-01-28-141602_irwin-chusids-macbook-air.crash
Note the cleanliness consistency of the data structures: subject / date / hard drive / crash, a streamlined way of writing that spans more than a century from Abbott to Dworkin to my MacBook Air — rhetoric, literature, computing — each employing the identical rules and processes. When it comes to language, there’s been a general leveling of labor, with everyone — and each machine — essentially performing the same tasks. Digital theorist Matthew Fuller sums it up best when he says, "The work of literary writing and the task of data-entry share the same conceptual and performative environment, as do the journalist and the HTML coder."

Dworkin’s index alone goes on for nearly ten pages and is reminiscent of the index of Louis Zukofsky’s own index of his life-poem, A. He calls the index, “Index of Names & Objects,” but unlike a typical index where nouns or concepts are indexed, Zukofsky also indexes a few articles of speech. Here are the indexes for a and the:

Yet there are major flaws in Zukofsky’s index. a appears hundreds of times between the pages of 1 and 103, yet they’re not indexed. Same thing with the, which appears on almost every page of the book yet the index states that the word doesn’t make an appearance until page 175! If, in fact, he had adopted such a constraint — "no use of the word the from pages 1–175" — it would’ve been Oulipian.

It turns out that when The University of California approached Zukofsky wanting to do a complete volume of A, his initial idea was to do an index only containing a, an and the, words he felt were key to understanding to his life’s work (a subjective constraint-based way of writing). He was delighted with the idea of a conceptual index and his wife Cecilia set to work, amassing thousands of index cards, many of which Zukofsky would eliminate what he thought unnecessary for his own idiosyncratic reasons, hence the gaps. Clearly Zukofsky thought of the index as another poem, a conceptual one at that, one ridiculing the idea that an artificially formal device such an index could ever truly control, categorize, domesticize, and stabilize such a wild and uncontrollable beast as language, particularly poetic language.

I've found that the way to deal with the most perplexing of texts is not to try to figure out what they are but instead to ask what they're not, applying a sort of negative dialectics to literary criticism. If we say, for example, that Parse is not a book of poetry, it is not a narrative, it is not a work of fiction, it is not melodic, it has no pathos, it has no emotion, yet it's not a phone book, nor is it a reference book, and so on, it gradually begins to dawn on us that this is a material investigation of a philosophical enquiry, a concept in the guise of literature. We then begin to ask questions of it: What does it mean to parse a grammar book by it's own rules? What does this tell us about language and the way we process it, its codes, its hierarchies, its complexities, its consistencies? Who made these rules? How flexible are they? Why are they not more flexible? How would this book be different if it were based on a book about how to parse, say, Chinese sentences? Is Dworkin exacting a schoolboy's revenge on Abbott by turning the tables on him, by taking an obsessive "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" approach? Is he turning Abbott inside out? Or is Dworkin echoing Abbott's call in Flatland to go beyond the page, giving us a portal through which we may truly see the dimensionality of language? As curious as the material text is, it's when don't read it that we really begin to understand it.

But just when we think we've figured it out, we get fooled again. In the midst of all of this parsing, you stumble across a sentence in full, normal syntax. This is the entire text on page 217:

```
NOUN CARDINAL ROMAN NUMERAL PERIOD

SUBJUNCTIVE MOOD
```

The answer is, that we desire here to speak of the fact, not as definite facts, but as possibilities.

It's a beautiful and certainly relevant sentence, but why? Dworkin is simply translating into normative English the skeletal examples that Abbott used to show how sentences should be parsed.

Dworkin's sentence as parsed -- the way it appears in Abbott's book -- is:

```
Definite article noun singular present continuous verb of definition comma preparatory pronoun first person plural subjective case pronoun first person plural present tense transitive verb preposition of the infinitive infinitive verb genitive preposition definite article objective case singular noun comma adverb of counterfact syncategorematic adjective plural noun comma conjunction syncategorematic plural noun period
```

So Dworkin did do some "creative" writing: He had to come up with several sentences comprised of groups of original words that would be meaningful and sensible, which also cleverly reflect on the text. While he could've filled those words with anything -- about the weather or plumbing or dancing -- he chose to use those instances as philosophical insertions, ones which comment on both his own process and on Abbott’s text. Another reads "with the entire illustrative sentence meant to suggest an intimately impersonal cast of characters in a reductive permutational drama in the mode of Dick and Jane or Beckett." These small exercises gave Dworkin practice for the next version of the book where he plans to write a narrative novel -- completely of his own words -- using Abbott’s grammatical structure as a template. He’ll follow the book to the letter dropping in nouns where they’re supposed to go and present tense transitive verbs where they’re supposed to go, until he’s retranslated the entire book according to its own rules, a doubly Herculean task.

While Dworkin could’ve merely proposed the work -- as could have Zukofsky or Stein -- the realization of it, the fact of it, gives us something to base our philosophical inquires on. Had he merely proposed the work: "Parse a grammar book according to its own rules," we’d have had no conception of what it would feel like to read it, to hold it, to examine it. We would’ve been denied the sheer pleasure and curiosity of it, the workmanship and craftsmanship, the precision of his execution, the beauty of its language, and the beauty of its concept. It’s a wonderful and very powerful object. Can you imagine how much less an interesting a world it would be without The Making of Americans on your bookshelf?

The spectre of Edwin A. Abbott haunts uncreative writing. For his 2007 book Flatland Derek Beaulieu removed all of the letters of Abbott’s book of the same title, creating a work of asemic literature, a way of writing without using letters. While based entirely on Flatland, there’s not a word to be found: page after page reveals a series of tangled lines. Like Dworkin, Beaulieu empties Abbott of content to reveal the skeleton of the work. Abbott’s Flatland, written in 1884, chronicles the adventures of a two-dimensional square who meets a three-dimensional cube, challenging his assumptions and demonstrating his inherent limitations. Abbott wrote the book both as a satire about the rigidity of Victorian class structure and as a tract that ignited the notion of a fourth-dimension in popular imagination.

Beaulieu’s tangles of lines represents every letter’s placement in Abbott’s text, from start to finish. He accomplishes this by taking a ruler and beginning with the first letter on each page, traces a line to the next occurrence of that letter on the page, then the next and so forth until he reaches the end of the page. He then takes the second letter of the first word on the page and traces that in the same manner. He does this until all letters of the alphabet are accounted for.

The result is a unique graphical rendering of each page. No two pages in Beaulieu’s book are identical as each page contains words and letters in unique sequences. It’s a translation or a write-through in the Cagean tradition, based upon letteristic occurrence instead of semantic content. By performing a conceptual statistical analysis on the text, Beaulieu reveals a hidden dimension in Abbott’s work which concretely demonstrate Abbott’s principles. Even colder and more clinical than Dworkin, minus the sensuality of Stein, we’re left with a completely unreadable work, yet one based entirely on language.

Perhaps the most unreadable text of all is Christian Bök’s Xenotext Experiment, which involves infusing an amoeba with an encrypted poem, illegible to the human eye, but meant to be read far into the future, most likely by an alien race after human beings have long since perished. It’s also the most far-fetched of the works, with a scope of six million years, making the propositions of Stein, Gould, or Huebler seem humble and earthbound by comparison.

Christian Bök’s earlier project, Eunoia -- consisting of five chapters, each one of which uses only one vowel to tell a story -- was the result of seven years labor. To accomplish such a staggering feat, he read through Webster’s Third New International Dictionary -- a three-volume tome that contains about a million and a half entries -- doing so five times, once for each of the vowels. When Bök describes his writing process, he sounds like a computational parser, making clear the idiosyncrasies of the English language speak for themselves, and thereby having to do the work that the computer can't do. "I proceeded then to sort them into parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, etc.), and then I sorted each of those parts of speech into topical categories (food, animals, professions, etc.) in order to determine what it might be possible to recount using this very fixed lexicon. It was a very difficult task to abide by these rules, but in the end I demonstrated, I think, that it was possible to write something beautiful and interesting even under such conditions of extreme duress."

While the book is immensely pleasurable to engage with, it's a difficult read because, in spite of all its musical and narrative qualities, what is foregrounded is the structure of the constraint itself, which quickly gets so thick and intrusive that whacking it back to uncover the tale beneath is nearly impossible. Instead of being able to transparently enjoy the text, you’re drawn into the quicksand of the physicality of language. You also continually snap back to the labor that it must’ve taken to construct this monument, so that the question How did he do this? becomes more pressing than trying to make sense of what the author is saying.

The constraints inevitably force the words into some very stiff prose: "Folks who do not follow God’s norms word for word woo God’s scorn, for God frowns on fools who do not conform to orthodox protocol. Whoso honors no cross of dolors nor crown of thorn doth go on, forsooth, to sow worlds of sorrow. Lo!" But the style couldn’t be otherwise if Bök was to abide by the constraint, making it an accountable and realized work of literature.

But far from the drudgery of alienated labor, Bök’s lengthy engagement afforded him -- and by extension the reader -- an intimacy with language that otherwise couldn't be gleaned if he had merely proposed the work: "I discovered that each of the five vowels seems to have its own idiosyncratic personality. A and E, for example, seem to be very elegiac and courtly by comparison to the letters O and U, which are very jocular and obscene. It seems to me that the emotional connotations of words may be contingent upon these vowel distributions, which somehow govern our emotional response to words themselves." In order to explore his idea thoroughly, he kept arbitrary decisions to a minimum, an oblique strategy which paid off. Bök’s deep ontological engagement helped him -- and once again, by extension, the reader -- discover the richness of language just as much as a conventionally expressive "creative" work could. He says, "The project also underlined the versatility of language itself, showing that despite any set of constraints upon it, despite censorship, for example, language can always find a way to prevail against these obstacles. Language really is a living thing with a robust vitality. Language is like a weed that cannot only endure but also thrive under all kinds of difficult conditions." What emerges, then, is not arid nihilism or negativity, but the reverse: by not expressing himself, he’s cleared the way to let the language fully express itself.
The Xenotext Experiment involves infusing a bacterium with a poem that will last so long that it will outlive the eventual destruction of the Earth itself. While it sounds like something out of a science fiction story, it's for real: Bök has received hundreds of thousands of dollars in funding from the Canadian government and he’s working with a prominent scientist to make it happen.

He’s found a species of bacterium which is the most resilient on the planet in which to implement his poem, one that can withstand extremes of cold, heat and radiation, hence capable of surviving a nuclear holocaust. He’s got high aspirations: "I am hoping, in effect, to write a book that would still be on the planet earth when the sun explodes. I guess that this project is a kind of ambitious attempt to think about art, quite literally, as an eternal endeavor."

The process of writing this one poem is insanely difficult and has already eaten up several years of his life:

I’d write a poem, and then I would arbitrarily assign, to each letter of the alphabet, a "triplet" of genetic nucleotides. There are four genetic nucleotides in DNA: they consist of adenine, cytosine, guanine, and thymine, and they are represented typically by the letters A, C, G, T, respectively. I could, for example, say that the triplet of letters ACT might represent the letter A, while the triplet of letters AGT might represent the letter B, etc. By assigning, say, a triplet of such letters to any arbitrary letter of the alphabet, I would construct a cipher that could be embodied in the genetic sequence of this organism. I’m ideally trying to design the code in such a way that the gene sequence I implant in the bacterium would actually cause it to produce a protein in response. I would not only be storing my poem in the organism, in its genetic matrix, but I would also be hijacking the organism and turning it into a machine for writing a poem in response. Because these two poems are chemically correlated, they are actually biochemically constrained by each other. It’s tantamount to writing two poems that mutually encipher each other—that are correlated in a very rigorous way... Imagine there are about 8 trillion different ways of enciphering the alphabet so that the letters are mutually encoded. Pick one of those 8 trillion ciphers. Now write a poem that is beautiful, that makes sense, in such a way that if you were to swap out every single letter of that poem and replace it with its counterpart from the mutual cipher, you’d produce a new poem that still remains just as beautiful and that still makes sense. So I’m trying to write two such poems. One of these poems is the one that I implant in the bacterium. The other poem is the one that the organism writes in response.

It’s fascinating how Bök still uses the word "poem"; the new poems might well be written on computer chips or, in this case, inscribed upon life itself. By referring to the work as a poem, he keeps the project squarely in the realm of the literary as opposed to the scientific or the world of visual art. Although the project will take various forms -- the final realization will include a sample of the organism on a slide and a gallery show with images and models of the genetic sequence as support materials for the poem itself -- Bök’s greatest challenge is to write a good poem, one that will speak to civilizations far into the future. And so Bök notches us the trope of unreality. This poem is not meant to be read by us and by doing so, he’s enacting one of his long-held precepts that the future of literature will be written by machines for other machines to read or, better yet, parse.
Seeding the Data Cloud

As I write this, the Iranian election is being challenged by 140-character blasts. As data moves faster and we need to manage more, we are drawn to smaller chunks. Social network status updates -- which succinctly describes your current circumstance or mood -- seems to do an adequate job of reducing complicated circumstances down to a sentence. And the popularity of mood-blasting services like Twitter -- which allows no more than 140 characters per post -- compress language even further. These short bursts of language are the latest in a long line of linguistic reductions: Chinese ideograms, haikus, telegrams, newspaper headlines, the Times Square news zipper, advertising slogans, concrete poems, and desktop icons. There's a sense of urgency that compression brings: even the most mundane tweets -- what someone is eating for breakfast -- feel like breaking news, demonstrating once more, that the medium is still the message.

Social networking updates, which are fast and ephemeral, do not occur in isolation, rather their value is in rapid succession; the more blasts you broadcast with greater frequency, the more effective they are until, like so many little shards, they accumulate into a grand narrative of life. Yet as soon as they appear, they're pushed off the screen and evaporate even faster than what used to be referred to as yesterday's news. In parsing all this information, there's an urge to act, to respond, to click, to hoard, to archive... to manage it all. Or don't. Tweets scroll in real time across the screen the way the tickertape used to spew stock quotes. As I type, the topic #iranelection is backed up with so many tweets and retweets that the interface cannot keep up: there are currently 20,000 blasts in the queue, an echo chamber, packed to the gills with information and disinformation, all expressed in alpha-numeric language. Most of us tuning in will try to make sense of validity of the ephemera before it slides off the screen, but there are some writers lurking who are harvesting it all as the basis for future works of literature.

We've witnessed this many times in the last century. The compressed three-line "novels" of Félix Fénéon, which appeared anonymously in a French paper over the course of 1906, read like a mix of telegrams, zen koans, newspaper headlines and social network updates:

The bread in Bordeaux will not be bloodied at this time; the trucker's passage provoked only a minor brawl.

Love. In Mirecourt, the weaver Colas lodged a bullet in the brain of Mlle Fleckenger, and treated himself with equal severity.

"Why don't we migrate to Les Palaiseaux?" Yes, but M. Lencre, while enroute by cabriolet, was assaulted and robbed.

Hemingway famously wrote a short story in just six words: For sale: baby shoes, never worn.

Or we end up with the wildly reduced language of later Beckett, fusing the terse compression of telegrams with an innate hesitancy to explicate:

Nothing to show a child and yet a child. A man and yet a man. Old and yet young. Nothing but ooze how nothing and yet. One bowed back yet an old man's. The other yet a child's. A small child's.
Somehow again and all in stare again. All at once as once. Better worse all. The three bowed down. The stare. The whole narrow void. No blurs. All clear. Dim clear. Black hole agape on all. Inletting all. Outletting all.

David Markson, in a remarkable series of late novels, merges the reportage of Fénéon with the compact prose of Beckett, dropping in subjective sentiments of unnamed narrators into the midst of hundreds of shards of art history, most no longer than a line or two:

Delmore Schwartz died of a heart attack in a seedy Times Square hotel. Three days passed before anyone could be found to claim is body.

James Baldwin was an anti-Semite.

Not sorting book and phonograph records merely, but the narrowing residue of an entire life? Papers, files of correspondence?

Like a Twitter stream, it's the slow accumulation of tiny shards which cohere into a fractured narrative by the book's end. Markson is a compulsive cataloguer: One can imagine him combing through the annals of art history, boiling down long and complicated lives into essential quips. He uses names often. Names are shorthand — tiny two-word headlines — that stand in for a life. Running your eyes down a page of a Markson at random produces an incredible list of well-known artists and thinkers: Brett Ashley, Anna Wickham, Stephen Foster, Jacques Derrida, Roland Barthes, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Roman Jakobson, Michel Leiris, Jullia Kristeva, Phillipe Sollers, Louis Althusser, Paul Ricoeur, Jacques Lacan, Yannis Ritsos, Iannis Xenakis, Jeanne Hébuterne, Amadeo Modigliani, David Smith, James Russell, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Markson's lists evoke the way gossip columns function, with names printed in boldface signify importance.

The essayist Gilbert Adair articulates the explosive power of names printed on a page:

What an alluring entity is the printed name! Consider the following: Steffi Graf, Bill Clinton, Woody Allen, Vanessa Redgrave, Salman Rushdie, Yves Saint Laurent, Umberto Eco, Elizabeth Hurley, Martin Scorsese, Gary Lineker, Anita Brookner. Practically the only thing they have in common is that this essay happens not to be about any of them. Yet how their capital letters glitter on the page — so much so, it is not inconceivable that more than one reader, scanning the essay to see whether it contains anything worth reading, will have been arrested not by its opening paragraph, which is how these things are supposed to work, but by this fourth paragraph, merely on the strength of the names above. It scarcely matters that nothing at all has been made of them, that nothing new, interesting or juicy has been said about them, that the cumulative effect is akin to that produced by some trompe l'oeil portrait by Gainsborough in which what seems from a distance to be an intricately, even finickily, rendered satin gown turns out, on closer inspection, to be nothing but a fuzzy, meaningless blur of brushstrokes — it is, nevertheless, just such a bundle of names that is calculated to attract the lazy, unprimed eye. And it has now reached the point where a newspaper or magazine page without its statutory quota of proper, and preferably household, names is as dispiriting to behold as a bridge hand with nothing in it but threes and fives and eights. Household names are, in short, the face-cards of journalism.

In 1929, an outside writer named John Barton Wolgamot privately published a book in a tiny edition consisting almost entirely of names called In Sara, Mencken, Christ and Beethoven There Were Men and Women. The book is nearly impossible to read linearly: it's best skimmed, your eye darting across the names, resting on the occasional familiar one, similar to the way Adair shows us how scanning the gossip, society, or obituary columns of a newspaper work. The text was begun in 1929. While listening to a live performance of Beethoven's Eroica in New York's Lincoln Center, Wolgamot had a synaesthetic response to the music and heard within "the rhythms themselves, names -- names that meant nothing to him, foreign names." A few days after the concert, he checked out a biography of Beethoven from the library and in that tome, he found, oddly enough, one after another, all the names he had heard ringing throughout the symphony. And it dawned on him that, "as rhythm is the basis of all things, names are the basis of rhythm," hence deciding to write his book. The entire text consists of 128 paragraphs, an example of which is:

In her very truly great manners of Johannes Brahms very heroically Sara Powell Haardt had very allegorically come amongst his very really grand men and women to Clarence Day, Jr., John Donne, Ruggiero Leoncavallo, James Owen Hannay, Gustav Frenssen, Thomas Beer, Joris Karl Huysmans and Franz Peter Schubert very titanically.

When questioned about Sara, Mencken, Wolgamot said that he had spent a year or two composing names for the book, but that the connective sentence -- the framework in which the names exist -- took him ten years to write. Wolgamot described to composer Robert Ashley (who later used the text as a libretto) how he constructed the 60th page of the book, which lists the names of George Meredith, Paul Gauguin, Margaret Kennedy, Oland Russell, Harley Granville-Barker, Pieter Breughel, Benedetto Croce and William Somerset Maugham: "Somerset has both summer and set as in sun-set, and Maugham sounds like the name of a South Pacific Island, and Maugham wrote a biography of Gauguin, which name has both 'go' and 'again' in it, and Oland could be 'Oh, land,' a sailor's cry, and Granville sounds French for a big city, which Gauguin left to go to the South Pacific..."

In 1934, five years after Wolgamot began Sara, Mencken, Gertrude Stein described way in which she wrote the name-laden The Making of Americans: "... from the beginning until now and always in the future poetry will concern itself with the names of things. The names may be repeated in different ways... but now and always poetry is created by naming names the names of something the names of somebody the names of anything... Think what you do when you do do that when you love the name of anything really love its name..."

Fully aware of this history, two Canadian writers, Darren Wershler and Bill Kennedy, have recently fused compressed forms with the power of proper names, giving it a digital spin in their ongoing work called Status Update. They've built a data-mining program which combs social networking sites, collecting all users' status updates. The engine then strips out the user's name and replaces it randomly with the name of a dead writer. The result reads like a mashup of Fénéon, Beckett, Markson and Wolgamot, all filtered through the inconsequential vagaries of social networking feeds:
Kurt Tucholsky is on snow day number two....what to do, what to do? Shel Silverstein is gettin' in a little Tomb Raiding before going into work. Lorine Niedecker is currently enjoying her very short break. Jonathan Swift has got tix to the Wranglers game tonight. Arthur Rimbaud found a way to use the word 'buttress' as well.

The program authors the poem non-stop, constantly grabbing status updates as fast as they are written and then automatically posts it to the homepage every two minutes. Each proper name on the page is clickable, which brings you to an archives of that author's status updates. If I click, for example, on Arthur Rimbaud's name, I'm brought to the Rimbaud page, an excerpt of which reads:

Arthur Rimbaud is on a goofy musical nostalgia trip. Arthur Rimbaud just picked up a sweet old studio convertible table for 10 bucks at a yard sale round the corner. Arthur Rimbaud is at the shop and assembling a window display with huge budding branches found at the side of the road! Arthur Rimbaud can finally listen to the wonderfulness of vinyl! Arthur Rimbaud would like to learn to read while sleeping. Arthur Rimbaud is so sleepy! Arthur Rimbaud is realizing if not now then when? Arthur Rimbaud is kinda drunk and preparing for his accountant.

At the bottom of the page is another feature, something that might have dreamed up by Madame Blavatsky had she the technology: "Arthur Rimbaud has an RSS feed. Subscribe now!" In a deliciously ironic gesture, Wershler and Henry make these legends participate in the flotsam and jetsam of today's online life, pulling them down from their pedestals, forcing them against their will to join in the ruckus. In Benjaminian terms, today's geniuses lack the aura of the titans of the past for the simple reason that today, cameras and recorders are everywhere which, are then instantly posted to an openly accessible archive without end. Had Brecht been alive today, there is no way he could have shaped his aura in the way that he did, permitting only a handful of photographs of himself to be reproduced. What Status Update does is sully the aura of these legends, reminding us that in their own day, they too would've been left wondering why "the cubicle gods are mocking his cleaned-up desk."

On their own, status updates are the most ephemeral wisps of language, but when hitched to immortal names and archived as an ongoing work of literature, the results are rich and serendipitous, similar to stumbling across a trash-laden Rauschenberg combine sitting in the middle a room of a pristine museum.

An earlier electronic writing project of theirs has similar concerns. The Apostrophe Engine also culls, organizes, and preserves chunks of language from the internet, yet this program unleashes smaller programs to go out an harvest language en masse, creating what could be the largest poem ever written, and it will keep on being written until someone pulls the plug on the hosting server.

The homepage of the piece is deceptively simple. It reproduces a list poem written by Bill Kennedy in 1993, in which each line begins with the directive "you are." Every line, it turns out, is clickable. Kennedy and Wershler explain what happens next:

When a reader/writer clicks on a line, it is submitted to a search engine, which then returns a list of Web pages, as in any search. The Apostrophe Engine then spawns five virtual robots that work their way through the list, collecting phrases beginning with "you are" and ending in a period. The robots stop after collecting a set number of phrases or working through a limited number of pages, whichever happens first.

Next, The Apostrophe Engine records and spruces up the phrases that the robots have collected, stripping away most HTML tags and other anomalies, then compiles the results and presents them as a new poem, with the original line as its title ... and each new line as another hyperlink.

At any given time, the online version of "apostrophe" is potentially as large as the Web itself. The reader/writer can continue to burrow further into the poem by clicking any line on any page, sliding metonymically through the ever-changing contents. Moreover, because the contents of the Web is always changing, so is the contents of the poem. The page it returns today will not be the page that it returns next week, next month, or next year.

The result is a living poem, being written as the internet is being written; completely parsed by robots which continues to grow even if no one is reading it. Like Status Update, it's an epic of language writ in short bursts, a Marksonian compendium, the nature of which is exactly what Wershler and Kennedy are exploiting:

The catalogue is a form that struggles with excess. Its job is to be reductive, to squeeze all the possibilities that a world of information has to offer into a definitive set... Its poetic effect, however, is the exact opposite. A catalogue opens up a poem to the threat of a surfeit of information, felt most keenly when the reader wonders, politely, "How long can this go on?" It can, in fact, go on for a very long time. In 1993, when the full implications of the nascent World Wide Web were only beginning to occur to us, the catalogue and its paradoxical struggles were already becoming the forum for addressing the fear that we are producing text at a rate beyond our collective ability to read it.

But what happens when this dynamically generated text is bound and frozen between the covers of a book? Wershler and Kennedy published a selection of 279 pages and the result is a very different project. In book's afterword, the authors make a disclaimer that they have massaged the texts for maximum effect in print: "The Apostrophe Engine has meddled with the writing of others, and we in turn have done the same with its writing... The engine provided us with an embarrassment of riches, an abundance of raw material, beautiful and banal at once and by turns."

Raw material is right. Here's an excerpt of what The Apostrophe Engine on the web returns to me when I click on the line, "you are so beautiful to me," taken from Joe Cocker's hit pop song:

you are so beautiful (to me) hello, you either have javascript turned off or an old version of adobe's flash player • you are so beautiful to me 306,638 views txml added1:43 kathie lee is a creep 628,573 views everythingisterrible added2:39 you are so beautiful 1,441,432 views caiyixian added0:37 reptile eyes • you are so beautiful (to me) 0 • you are so beautiful 79,971 views konasdad added0:49 before • you are so beautiful to me 19,318 views walalain added2:45 escape the fate - you are so beautiful 469,552 views darknearhome added2:46 sad slow songs: joe cocker - you are so beautiful • you are already a member • you are so beautiful (nearly unplugged) hello, you either have javascript turned off or an old version of adobe's flash player • you are so beautiful 1,443,749 views caiyixian featured video added4:48 joe cocker—you are so beautiful (live at montre • you are so beautiful 331,136 views jozy90 added2:32 zucchero canta "you are so beautiful" 196,481 views lavocedinarciso added3:50 joe cocker mad dogs – cry me a river 1970 777,970 views scampi199 added5:18 joe cocker – whiter shade of pale live 389,420 views dookofoils added4:49 joe cocker – n'oubliez jamais 755,731 views neoandrea added5:22 patti labelle & joe cocker—you are so beautiful • you are the best this was very exiting> akirasovan (5 days ago) show hide 0 marked as spam reply mad brain damage

It's a rambling mess: the signal to noise ratio is very low. Yet in print, an excerpt from the same passage is a very different animal:

you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful artist: Babyface • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful, yes you are to me you are so beautiful you are to me can't you see? • you are so beautiful the lyrics are the property of their respective authors, artists and labels • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful artist: Ray Charles • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful to me • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful • you are so beautiful to meee • you are so beautiful, would you please

The spacing has been normalized, the numbers have been taken out, the dead lines have been removed; it's been heavily edited to good effect. The printed edition reads gorgeously, full of jagged musical repetitions rhythms, like Gertrude Stein or Christopher Knowles's libretto for the opera Einstein on the Beach. And there's careful placement of different types of content such as the copyright warning which comes crashing down just as you are lulled by the rhythms of the repeating phrases. The two "boldfaced" proper names, Babyface and Ray Charles, each with an identical precessional phrase -- "you are so beautiful artist" -- are placed far enough apart so as not to interfere with one another, resulting in a perfectly balanced text.

While the computer has harvested the raw material for the poem, it's the authorial hand of Wersher and Kennedy that wrangles the beauty out of the surplus text, making for a more conventional rendition of the work, one predicated upon a skilled editorial hand. Yet the page-bound version lacks the ability to surprise, grow and continually reinvent itself the same way the rougher web version does. What emerges, then, in these two versions is a balance that embraces both the machine and the printed book; the raw text and the manipulated; the infinite and the known, showing us two ways of expressing contemporary language neither one can be crowned definitive.

Having a computer write poems for you is old hat. What's new is that, like Wershler and Kennedy, writers are now exploiting the language-based search engines and social networking sites as source text. Having a stand-alone program that can generate whimsical poems on your computer feels quaint compared to the spew of the massive word generators out there on the web, tapping into our collective mind.

Sometimes that mind isn't so pretty. The Flarf Collective has been intentionally scouring Google for the worst results and reframing it as poetry. What began as a group of people submitting poems to a poetry.com online contest -- they created the absolutely worst poems they could and were naturally rejected -- snowballed into an aesthetic, which co-founder Gary Sullivan describes as "A kind of corrosive, cute, or cloying awfulness. Wrong. Un-P.C. Out of control."
Typical of a Flarf poem is Nada Gordon’s “Unicorn Believers Don’t Declare Fatwas”:

Oddly enough, there is a “Unicorn Pleasure Ring” in existence. Research reveals that Hitler lifted the infamous swastika from a unicorn emerging from a colorful rainbow.

Nazi to unicorn: “You’re not coming out with me dressed in that ridiculous outfit.” You can finally tell your daughter that unicorns are real. One ripped the head off a waxwork of Adolf Hitler, police said.

April 22 is a nice day. I really like it. I mean it’s not as fantastic as that Hitler unicorn ass but it’s pretty special to me. CREAMING bald eagle there is a tiny Abe Lincoln boxing a tiny Hitler. MAGIC UNICORNS “You’re really a unicorn?” “Yes. Now kiss my feet.” Hitler as a great man. Hitler... mm yeah, Hitler, Hitler, Hitler, Hitler, Hitler, Hitler, Hitler. ... German food is so bad, even Hitler was a vegetarian, just like a unicorn.

I was sort of doodling Hitler at my friend’s house and we couldn’t stop watching unicorn Hard core soft porn abortion e-cards containing scenes in which the baby angora unicorn and Hitler stay warm on a cold night.

This blog is dedicated to the individual mystery of Hitler’s mustache and my book of poems to becoming a unicorn. That unicorn is worse than Hitler. The unicorn has always been a mythological animal: Flossy Unicorn Puppet Show Cats That Look Like Hitler Pez dispensers Unicorn believers don’t declare fatwas. So worry about something more important like getting hit in a collision between a comet being ridden by Elvis, and Hitler riding a Unicorn. It’s a psychedelic unicorn light show and you know that’s groovy baby!

Gordon dug deep and selected expertly to grab the very worst of the web. But in order to make something great out of horrible materials, you’ve got to choose well. Flarf’s co-founder, K. Silem Mohammad, dubbed Flarf a kind of "sought" poetry, as opposed to "found" poetry, because its makers are actively and constantly engaged in the act of text mining. Every hot button is purposely pushed here from the using the cheesy image to the cliché: fatwas, abortions and Hitler’s birthday; nothing is off-limits. Postmodern painting went through similar spasms in the mid-70s when trying to figure a way out of conceptual and minimal art by inventing a movement called "Bad "Painting," where the idea was to paint as primitively and as inappropriately as you could. Artists like Neil Jenney and William Wegman, who took inspiration from the mechanical drawings, freely employing images of kitsch which were painted as crudely as possible. These sorts of explorations were partly responsible for the re-emergence of figuration in the late 70s and early 80s, continuing today.

Flarf takes its historical cues from the coterie-based poetics of the New York School, whose poems were filled with in-jokes intended for their friends. In Flarf's case, many of its poems are posted onto its private listserv. But the New York School -- for all their ideas of "low" and "kitsch" -- never went this far. Flarf, by using disingenuous subjectivity, it never really believes in what it's saying, but it's saying it anyway, acutely scraping the bottom of the cultural barrel with such prescience, precision and sensitivity, that we are forced to reevaluate the nature of language engulfing us. Our first impulse is to flee, to deny its worth, to turn away from it, to write it off as a big joke; but like Warhol's "Car Crashes" or "Electric Chairs," we are equally entranced, entertained and repulsed. It's a double-edged sword that Flarf holds to our necks, forcing us look at ourselves in the blade's reflection with equal doses of swooning narcissism and white-knuckled fear.
Some stories are so profoundly moving as they are, that any sort of creative gloss or fictive enhancement serves to lessen their impact. Take the bestselling novel, Angel at the Fence, written by Herman Rosenblat where he tells of meeting his future wife when he was imprisoned as a child in a concentration camp she tossed him apples over the fence, helping him to survive. According to Rosenblat, they met by happenstance years later in Coney Island, realized their history and married happily ever after. Rosenblat's memoir made the usual rounds, was included in a volume of Chicken Soup for the Soul and he appeared twice on Oprah, who called the book "the single greatest love story" she had encountered in her 22 years on the show. However, the truth sleuths smelled a rat and the whole thing quickly unraveled. After he was busted he wrote, with remorse, "In my dreams, Roma will always throw me an apple, but I now know it is only a dream." The book was remarketed as a work of fiction instead of a memoir. Deborah E. Lipstadt, a professor of Jewish and Holocaust studies at Emory University upon hearing that yet another Holocaust memoir was recently falsified said, "There's no need to embellish, no need to aggrandize. The facts are horrible, and when you're teaching about horrible stuff you just have to lay out the facts."

Lipstadt's sentiments echo -- in a very different way and context -- something that many artists have proposed over the past century: that unembellished life is more profoundly moving and complex than most fiction can conjure. Popular culture gives us the same message from a different angle: over the past decade, witness the rise and relentless domination of reality television over the constructed sitcom. And from the looks of it, our online lives are headed in the same direction through obsessive documentation of our terrestrial lives. From the early days of webcams to today's rapid-fire Twitter blasts, we've constructed and projected certain notions of who we are through a process of accumulating seemingly insignificant and ephemeral gestures, fashioning identities which might or might not have anything to do with who we actually are. We've become autobiographers of an obsessive nature, but just as much, we've also become biographers of others, collecting scores of minute facts and impressions on whomever we choose to focus our lens. Tribute pages, fan sites and Wikipedia entries on even the most marginal persons or endeavors continually accumulate, line by line, all adding up to an obsession with detail and biography which rivals Boswell.

Boswell in many ways both mirrors and predicts our contemporary linguistic condition. His massive tome is an accumulation of bits and pieces of the quotidian ephemera: letters, observations, patches of dialogue, and descriptions of daily life. The text is an unstable one due to Boswell's excessive footnoting and to Mrs. Thrale's marginalia rebutting and correcting Boswell's subjectively flawed observations. And Thrale's comments are not just appended to the main body of the text, but she also annotates Boswell's minutiae-laden footnotes, some of which take up three-quarters of the page. The book feels Talmudic in its multi-threaded conversations and glosses. It's a dynamic textual space, reminiscent of today's web with built-in feedback and response systems. It also has some of the same cacophonous dilemmas of online space. The spectator sport of Johnson's life in some ways trumps the subject.

Boswell's Johnson can be read cover-to-cover, but it's just as good taken in small chunks, by bouncing around skimming, grazing or parsing.
I recall in the early days of the web a friend lamenting that he reads so "carelessly" online, that he's more curious to get to the next click than he is engaging in a deeper way with the text. It's a common cry: we do tend to read more horizontally online. But The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. is a reminder from over two centuries ago that not all text demand a strictly linear reading. Once Boswell actually meets up with his subject, there's no real narrative thrust other than chronological, ending with Johnson's death. You can dip in and out without worrying about losing the thread the way you might in a more conventionally written biography. Running your eyes across the pages -- skimming -- you haul in gems of knowledge while experience fleeting ephemeral moments that have been rendered timeless. Yet there's a lot of chaff such as this frivolous instance which Boswell pens deep into Johnson's 74th year:

I never shall forget the indulgence with which he treated Hodge, his cat; for whom he himself used to go out and buy oysters, (a) lest the servants, having that trouble, should take a dislike to the poor creature. (b)

Like a commenter on a blog, Hester Thrale in the margins, chimes in:

(a) I used to joke him for getting Valerian to amuse Hodge in his last Hours.
(b) no, it was lest they should consider him as degrading Humanity by setting a Man to wait upon a beast.

This is a not-particularly-profound conversation about wine that feels like the meandering improvised dialogue from an Andy Warhol film:

SPOTTISWOODE. So, Sir, wine is a key which opens a box; but this box may be either full or empty? JOHNSON. Nay, Sir, conversation is the key: wine is a pick-lock, which forces open the box and inures it. A man should cultivate his mind so as to have that confidence and readiness without wine, which wine gives. BOSWELL. The great difficulty of resisting wine is from benevolence. For instance, a good worthy man asks you to taste his wine, which he has had twenty years in his cellar. JOHNSON. Sir, all this notion about benevolence arises from a man's imagining himself to be of more importance to others, than he really is. They don't care a farthing whether he drinks wine or not. SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. Yes, they do for the time. JOHNSON. For the time! -- If they care this minute, they forget it the next...

It's through these small and seemingly insignificant details that Boswell is able to build a convincing portrait of Johnson's life and genius. Boswell's strength is information management. He's got a great sense balance, mixing toss-aways with keepers. The text has a leveling quality -- profound with insignificant, eternal with quotidian -- which is very much the way our attention (and lives) tend to be: divided and multi-threaded. Just as I'm writing this text now, with one eye on Samuel Johnson and the other on the score of the Mets game playing live in another window on my screen.

In 1938, The Monthly Letter of The Limited Editions Club, asked of Boswell, "What, however, has the Life to offer a twentieth century reader?" And in the parlance of the day, it goes on to ascribe conventional value to the presumed profundity of the book, saying that "the Life has an apt word or phrase for everything" and that it is "at once intimately personal and classically universal." Over seventy years later, I think we can ask the same question: "What has the Life to offer a twenty-first century reader?" and get a completely different answer, one intimately connected to the way we live today.

There's something about inventory that feels contemporary. When the graphical user interface emerged, I remember there was a common sense that "now everybody is a graphic designer." With the ever-increasing push of information and material flowing through our networks, we've become like kids in a candy store: we want it all. And since it's mostly free, we grab it. As a result, we've had to learn how to store things, organize them and tag them for quick recall. And we've become very good at it. This ethos has seeped into every aspect of our lives; offline, too, we find ourselves meticulously gathering and organizing information as a way of being in the world. Caroline Bergvall, a trilingual poet living in London, recently decided to inventory the opening lines of all the British Library's translations of Dante's Inferno. She claims that the act of translating Dante has become "something of a cultural industry." In fact, by the time she finished collecting her versions -- there were forty-eight in all -- two new translations had reached the library's shelves. Bergvall explains her process: "My task was mostly and rather simply, or so it seemed at first, to copy each first tercet as it appeared in each published version of the Inferno. To copy it accurately. Surprisingly, more than once, I had to go back to the books to double-check and amend an entry, publication data, a spelling. Checking each line, each variation, once, twice. Increasingly, the project was about keeping count and making sure. That what I was copying was what was there. Not to inadvertently change what had be printed. To reproduce each translative gesture. To add my voice to this chorus, to this recitation, only by way of this task. Making copy explicit as an act of copy."

Here's an excerpt from Bergvall's "Via: 48 Dante Variations":

Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita mi ritrovai per una selva oscura che la diritta via era smarrita

The Divine Comedy - Pt. 1 Inferno - Canto I -

1. Along the journey of our life halfway
I found myself again in a dark wood wherein the straight road no longer lay (Dale, 1996)

2. At the midpoint in the journey of our life
I found myself astray in a dark wood
For the straight path had vanished.
   (Creagh and Hollander, 1989)

3. HALF over the wayfaring of our life,
Since missed the right way, through a night-dark-wood Struggling, I found myself.
   (Musgrave, 1893)

4. Halfway along the road we have to go,
I found myself obscured in a great forest,
Bewildered, and I knew I had lost the way.
   (Sisson, 1980)

5.
Halfway along the journey of our life
I woke in wonder in a sunless wood
For I had wandered from the narrow way
(Zappulla, 1998)

A simple act of inventory belies the subjectivity of translation as the immortal words of Dante are up for grabs. Through re-presentation, Bergvall détourns the tercet into a permutational poem or an Oulipian N+7 style exercise. We move from a "dark wood" to a "night-dark-wood" to a "great forest" to a "sunless wood"; or "journey of our life halfway" to "midpoint in the journey of our life" to "HALF over the wayfaring of our life" to "Halfway along the road we have to go" and "Halfway along the journey of our life." Each phrase uses metaphor, allusion, sentence structure, and wordiness in entirely different ways. By doing very little, Bergvall reveals so very much.

The poet Tan Lin complies information into what he calls "ambient stylistics," which can be likened to the "non-listening" of Erik Satie's "Furniture Music." In the midst of an art opening at a Paris gallery in 1902, Erik Satie and his cronies, after begging everyone in the gallery to ignore them, broke out into what they called "Furniture Music" -- that is, background music -- music as wallpaper, music to be purposely not listened to. The patrons of the gallery, thrilled to see musicians performing in their midst, ceased talking and politely watched, despite Satie's frantic efforts to get them to pay no attention. Satie's gesture was picked up by Brian Eno some seventy-five years later when he described his concept of ambient music: "An ambience is defined as an atmosphere, or a surrounding influence: a tint. My intention is to produce original pieces ostensibly (but not exclusively) for particular times and situations with a view to building up a small but versatile catalogue of environmental music suited to a wide variety of moods and atmospheres."

Lin wants to create a space for create a space for innovative writing that is relaxing, not demanding, to the point where he envisions a writing environment where literature exists without having to be read at all:

A good poem is very boring... In a perfect world all sentences, even the ones we write to our loved ones, the mailman or our interoffice memos, would have that overall sameness, that sense of an average background, a fluid structure in spite of the surface disturbances and the immediate incomprehension. The best sentences should lose information at a relatively constant rate. There should be no ecstatic moments of recognition... The canon is an idealistic maze and should ideally prefigure a range of meaningless mood musics, from elevator Muzak to New Age music, to ambient sound construction by Brian Eno, Soundlab and others, to endless TV soap operas and, most of all, to mid- to late- '70s disco with its emphasis on monotonous rhythms, its superficiality, and its blatantly unsubtle sexual innuendoes. The best way to listen to prerecorded voices and background music is to listen carelessly and accidentally, as if one were reading a poem by John Ashbery, T.S. Eliot or Charles Bernstein. Rod McKuen makes you care, unfortunately, and the last thing one wants to do while reading a poem is to care. Reading is too selfish for that. That is why the most boring and long-winded writings encourage a kind of effortless non-understanding, a language in which reading itself seems perfectly (I say this in a positive way) redundant. One needn't read through great novels anymore like one did in the nineteenth century with Balzac or now with someone like Tom Wolfe whose works are basically dull repetitions (realism) that function like a nineteenth-century version of the Nynex Yellow Pages or Page Six of the New York Post.

The idea of making a text intentionally flat and boring flies in the face about everything we've come to expect from "good" literature. His project Ambient Fiction Reading System 01: A List of Things I Read Didn't Read and Hardly Read for Exactly One Year took the form of a blog documenting each day's intake or textual grazing. Here's an excerpt from Tuesday, August 22, 2006, which begins:

10:08-15 HOME OFFICE NYT From Their Own Online World, Pedophiles Extend Their Reach
10:15-23 Pakistanis Find US an Easier Fit than Britain
10:24-26 nytimes.com Editorial Observer; The Television Has Disintegrated. All that's Left is the Viewer
10:28-31 A Police Car with Plenty of Muscle
10:31-4 Now the Music Industry wants Guitarists to Stop Sharing
10:50-6 Code Promotions, A Madison Ave Staple, are Going Online
10:57-07 The Tragic Drama of a Broken City, Complete with Heros and Villains When the Levees Broke 11:09-15 Helping Fledgling Poets Soar with Confidence
11:15-12:16 AOL Acts on Release of Data
11:59 wikipedia "abdur chowdhury"
12:16-23 Rohaytn Will Take Lehman Post "I remember the first time I cam into contact with them. I was carrying Adren Meyer's briefcase into a meeting with Bobby Lehman in the mid-1950's. They had six desks. I've always had a yen for them."
12:23-5 wikipedia "rohatyn" "greenberg"
12:25 style.com "greenberg"
12:25-33 What Organizations Don't Want to Know Can Hurt
12:34 Tower Records will Auction its Assets
12:34-57 Web Surfing in Public Places is a Way to Court Trouble

What appears to be a banal list of things he read -- or didn't read -- with some investigation reveals a wealth of autobiographical narrativity and sheds light on the act of consuming, archiving and moving information. Lin begins his day at 10:08 in his home office, where he skims the day's news. The first thing he reads is a story about how pedophiles are colonizing the online space. The story says that "They swap stories about day-to-day encounters with minors. And they make use of technology to help take their arguments to others..."

"We have no way of knowing if Lin is reading this in the paper version or online, but since he's blogging about it or entering his meanderings into a word processing document, we can pretty much assume that one hand is on the computer. In a sense -- without the pedophilia, of course -- this article describes Lin's situation. Sitting at his computer, he is simultaneously reading and writing, consuming and redistributing, creating and disseminating information, "mak[ing] use of technology to help take [his] arguments to others." Minus the lurid connotations, we could easily reimagine the title of this excerpt to be "From His Online World, Tan Lin Extends His Reach."

By 10:24, he is definitely online: "The Television Has Disintegrated. All that's Left is the Viewer," is a folksy mediation on how our digital technology has supplanted the functional simplicity of the old analog television set. With one window cracked to nytimes.com and another open for blog entries, Lin is enacting the dilemma put forth in the article (which was published in the shrinking
New York Times but read online by Lin at nytimes.com, thereby self-reflexively further contributing to the disintegration of old media).

Immersed in the screen, Lin continues to read about the erosion of old media distribution from 10:31-10:34 in "Now the Music Industry wants Guitarists to Stop Sharing." The article, which is still online at The New York Times site, is 1500 words long. Quickly reading or skimming, it’s entirely plausible that Lin did read this article during the time he said he did. Yet a much shorter article of only 920 words, which takes six minutes to read, "Helping Fledgling Poets Soar with Confidence," is a book review where the author claims “poetry is a primal impulse within us all,” which again, Lin is also enacting.

As much of Lin's work is about identity and the slippages therein, he naturally is drawn toward an article which he spends 65 minutes with, from 11:15-12:16. "AOL Acts on Release of Data," is about a data scandal at AOL where the identities of many users were exposed. Coincidentally, that same AOL leak forms the basis of Thomas Claburn's book-length piece, i feel better after i type to you, where he republished all the data of one users. As Claburn explains:

Within the third of the ten files of user search queries AOL mistakenly released (user-ct-test-collection-03), there's a poem of sorts. Between May 7 and May 31 of this year, AOL user 23187425 submitted a series of more than 8,200 queries with no evident intention of finding anything—only a handful of the entries are paired with a search results URL. Rather, the author's series of queries forms a stream-of-consciousness soliloquy.

Whether it's fact or fiction, confession or invention, the search monologue is strangely compelling. It's a uniquely temporal literary form in that the server time stamps make the passage of time integral to the storytelling. It could be the beginning of a new genre of writing, or simply an aberration. But it does beg further explanation. What circumstances prompted the author to converse thus with AOL's search engine?

Claburn's poem looks eerily like Lin's:

Tuesday 1:25 am 2006-05-09 01:25:15 break in 2006-05-09 01:26:00 joseph i have a question
2006-05-09 01:27:27 all the years why did you work out of delphi
2006-05-09 01:28:36 could have gone to detroit
2006-05-09 01:29:40 why you make delphi kettering your base
2006-05-09 01:30:09 your base
2006-05-09 01:31:13 joe why
2006-05-09 01:31:56 you choose kettering
2006-05-09 01:33:01 had opportunity 2006-05-09 01:33:26 to leave
2006-05-09 01:34:19 start there but could have left 2006-05-09 01:34:54 know you started there but could have left 2006-05-09 01:35:28 why did you stay
2006-05-09 01:36:14 but why
2006-05-09 01:37:46 cause of me
2006-05-09 01:38:48 last saw you bicycle 2006-05-09 01:39:31 why didn’t you tell me who you were 2006-05-09 01:41:07 was not to tell me
2006-05-09 01:41:47 orders
2006-05-09 01:42:38 jt order
2006-05-09 01:43:59 was thinking
In the same way that Lin tracks his reading habits and, by association, his mental patterns, Clauburn tracks "AOL User 23187425." Our digital footprint, when rendered visible by data trails, makes for compelling narrative, psychological and autobiographical literature, proving once again that, incisively framed, "mere data" is anything but banal.

When Tan Lin reads about the AOL leak, he comes across the name Abdur Chowdhury, a professor who was the source of the leak. At 11:59, he most likely cracks another browser window and looks up the Wikipedia entry for "Abdur Chowdhury" for which no page is found. The Times article claims that "Nearly 20 million discrete search queries, representing the personal Internet hunting habits of more than 650,000 AOL customers gathered over a three-month period last spring, were posted by a company researcher, Abdur Chowdhury, on a publicly accessible Web site late last month." One presumes that such a figure would be of interest to Lin who claims, "[R]eading, in a web-based environment, crosses into writing, publication, distribution, and marketing. Is a Twitter feed a form of publication? or is it writing? or is it distribution that is 'pulled' by readers who 'subscribe'? It would seem to be a combination and the lines between these practices is less rigid than with a book where writing and publication are distinct temporally and as entities. Even tags used by Twitterers don't necessarily identify the author by name."

Lin moves on at 12:16 and finds an article about the financier Felix Rohaytn's new job at Lehman Brothers. Strangely enough, Lin includes a paragraph from the article, the original which reads: "'I remember the first time I came into contact with them,' he said. 'I was carrying Andre Meyer's briefcase into a meeting with Bobby Lehman in the mid-1950's. They had six desks. I've always had a yen for them.'" In Lin's piece, he combines the two sentences and removes a pair of quotation marks and the connective phrase "he said." Here one wonders if he wasn't reading the paper edition of the newspaper simultaneously; perhaps that was a pull-quote, but in an article about a prominent financier's promotion, a pull-quote would hardly focus on his passion for furniture. But for Lin, who is a part-time furniture dealer, this particular sentence might have had a particular meaning. Perhaps it's a note to himself to get in touch with Mr. Rohaytn, who might be interested in some of Lin's pieces. The next entry, a Wikipedia search for the terms "Rohatyn" "Greenberg" doesn't turn up anything. But a Google search for those same terms turns up a style.com page featuring benefit and party pictures of the rich and fashionable art dealer Jeanne Greenberg Rohatyn, who it is well-known, is married to Nicolas Rohatyn, son of Felix Rohaytn. Lin, who moves in art world circles, might see this as a way of getting in touch with the elder Rohaytn.

So what does this all add up to? What looks at first glance to be a mass of random information is, in fact, multi-dimensional and autobiographical. And it's also mostly verifiable. Those articles do exist and the correspondent times generally make sense. In short, we must conclude that this is not a work of fiction and that Lin really did read what he did and when he did over the course of a year. Taken cumulatively, this is a fairly accurate portrait of Tan Lin, a different type of autobiography, accurately describing himself and his circumstances, without once ever having used the pronoun "I."

In 1974, George Perec, the Oulipian writer, wrote a work that asked similar questions. He compiled a massive Rabelaisian piece, "Attempt at an Inventory of the Liquid and Solid Foodstuffs Ingurgitated by Me in the Course of the Year Nineteen Hundred and Seventy-Four" which begins:

Nine beef consommé, one iced cucumber soup, one mussel soup.
Two Guêndouilles, one jellied andouillette, one Italian charcuterie, one cervelas sausage, four assorted charcuteries, one coppa, three pork platters, one figatelli, one foie gras, one fromage de tée, one boar's head, five Parma hams, eight pâté, one duck pâté one pâtée foie with truffles, one pâté croûte, one pâtérand-mèe, one thrush pâté six pâté des Landes, four brawns, one foie gras mousse, one pig's trotters, seven rillettes, one salami, two saucissons, one hot saucisson, one duck terrine, one chicken liver terrine.

Fifty-six Armagnacs, one Bourbon, eight Calvadoses, one cherries in brandy, six Green Chartreuses, one Chivas, four cognacs, one Delamain cognac, two Grand Marniers, one pink-gin, one Irish coffee, one Jack Daniel's, four marc's, three Bugey marc's, one marc de Provence, one plum liqueur, nine Souillac plums, one plums in brandy, two Williams pears, one port, one slivovitz, one Suz, thirty-six vodkas, four whiskies.
N coffees
one tisane
three Vichy waters

Perec's inventory is a massive indulgence in the pleasure principle, literally creating a portrait based on the cliché you are what you eat. Or perhaps not. Taken as autobiography, if food and drink can be immense carriers of class and economic status, then we can glean a lot from this list about the author. But the problem is that even though its stated that this is what Perec himself ate, we have no verification of it. And if you think about it, quantifying exactly what you ate over the course of a year is almost impossible. In the text, he claims to have consumed "one milk-fed lamb." How much of that lamb did he actually eat? Class status might become more traceable when wines are mentioned, for instance, "one Saint-Emilion '61." There's no vintner mentioned and if we look up the price of that wine today, it goes anywhere from $220 to $10,000. While it would've been considerably less in 1974, how are we to know that this isn't just fantasy, an impoverished writer dreaming of great luxuries? It's entirely conceivable that Perec sat down and invented this inventory in one drunken evening at his desk in his modest flat. We'll never know. Would the real Georges Perec please stand up?

Uncreative writing allows for a new type of writing about ourselves: call it oblique autobiography. By inventorying the mundane -- what we eat and what we read -- we leave a trail that can say as much about ourselves as a more traditional diaristic approach, leaving room enough for the reader to connect-the-dots and construct narratives in a plethora of ways.
Uncreative Writing in the Classroom: A Disorientation

In 2004, I began teaching a class called "Uncreative Writing" at the University of Pennsylvania. I sensed that the textual changes that I was noticing in the digital landscape as a result of intensive online engagement was going to be echoed by a younger generation who had never known anything but this environment. This is the course description:

It's clear that long-cherished notions of creativity are under attack, eroded by file-sharing, media culture, widespread sampling, and digital replication. How does writing respond to this new environment? This workshop will rise to that challenge by employing strategies of appropriation, replication, plagiarism, piracy, sampling, plundering, as compositional methods. Along the way, we'll trace the rich history of forgery, frauds, hoaxes, avatars, and impersonations spanning the arts, with a particular emphasis on how they employ language. We'll see how the modernist notions of chance, procedure, repetition, and the aesthetics of boredom dovetail with popular culture to usurp conventional notions of time, place, and identity, all as expressed linguistically.

My hunch proved to be correct. Not only did the students take to the curriculum, but they ended up teaching me much more than I knew. Every week, they'd come into class and show me the latest language meme raging across the networks or some new remix engine that was more capable of mangling texts than I had ever dreamed of. The classroom took on the characteristics of an online community, more of a dynamic place for sharing and exchanging ideas than a traditional professor-lectures-students college course.

But as time went on, I realized that although they could show me cool new things, they didn't know how to contextualize these artifacts, historically, culturally, or artistically. If, for example, they showed me "The Hitler Meme," where the infamous scene from Oliver Hirschbiegel's film Downfall was re-subtitled so that Hitler was screaming about everything from Windows Vista problems to the collapse of the real estate bubble, I had to inform them that in the 1970s, Situationist filmmaker René Viénet used the resubtitling technique to détourn genre films like porn or kung fu into scathing artworks of social and political critique. It also dawned on me that they were much more oriented to consuming online culture than seeing it as something to create new works from. Although we were engaging in a meaningful two-way conversation, I felt there was a real pedagogical need to be filled, one that centered around issues of contextualization. And there were big gaps of knowledge. It was as if all the pieces were there but they needed someone to help put them together in the right place and in the right order, a situation that called for a conceptual reorientation of what already came very naturally to them. In this chapter, I want to give three case studies of basic exercises I give my students to in order to acclimate them to the ideas of uncreative writing and to make them aware of the language and its riches that is -- and has always been -- around them.

I. Retyping Five Pages

The first thing I want to do is to get them to think about the act of writing itself, so I give them a simple assignment: retype five pages with no further explanation. To my surprise, the next week they arrive in the class, each with a unique piece of writing. Their responses are varied and full of revelations. Although some predictably find the task unbearable and can't wait to get it over with, others discover that it is relaxing and Zen-like, saying it's the first time they've been able to focus on the act of typing, as opposed to struggling to find "inspiration." As a result, they find themselves happily ensconced in an amnesia-like state, with words and their meanings drifting in an out of their consciousness. Many become aware of the role that their body plays in writing, from their posture, to the cramps in their hands, to the movement of their fingers, they became aware of the performative nature of writing. One woman says that she finds the exercise closer to dancing than to writing, entranced by her rhythmic tapping on the keys. Another says it's most intense reading experience she's ever had; when retyping her favorite high school short story, she discovers to her amazement just how poorly written it is. For many students, they began to view texts not only as transparent carriers of meaning, but also as opaque objects to be moved around the white space of the page.

In the act of retyping, another thing that differentiates one student from another is their choice of what to retype. For example, one student retypes a story about a man's repeated inability to complete a sexual act. When I asked him why he chose this text to retype, he replies that he finds it the perfect metaphor for this assignment, frustrated as he is by not being permitted to be "creative." One woman, who has a day job as a waitress, decides to mnemonically retype her restaurant's menu in order to learn it better for work. The odd thing is that it fails: she detests the assignment and is enraged that it didn't help her at all on the job. It's a nice reminder that, often, the value of art is that it has no practical value at all.

The critique proceeds through a rigorous examination of paratextual devices, those which are normally considered outside of the scope of writing but, in fact, have everything to do with writing. Questions arise: What kind of paper did you use? Why was it on generic white computer paper when the original edition was on thick, yellowed, pulpy stock? What did your choice of paper stock say about you: your aesthetic, economic, social, political and environmental circumstances?
Did you reproduce exactly the original text's layout page by page or did you simply flow the words from one page to another, the way your word processing program does? Will your text be read differently if it is in Times Roman or Verdana?

Even the way the students discuss their work is closely examined.
One student, for example, without thinking, prefaces a presentation of her work to the class by claiming her piece "isn't going to change the world," which is normally shorthand for "this piece isn't all that great." But in this environment, her pronouncement leads to a heated half-hour-long discussion about writing's ability or inability to affect change in the world, its political ramifications and its social consequences, all on account of an innocently -- but sloppily -- spoken platitude.

II. Transcribe a short piece of audio

I give the class the instructions to transcribe a piece of audio. I try to pick something with little excitement or interest so as to keep the focus on the language, a straight-forward news report or something seemingly dry and dull so as not to "inspire" any student. If I give ten people the same audio file to transcribe, we end up with ten completely unique transcriptions. How we hear -- and how, in turn, we process that hearing into written language -- is riddled with subjectivity. What you hear as a brief pause and transcribe as a comma,
I hear as the end of a sentence and transcribe as a period. The act of transcription, then, is a complex one involving translation, displacement and détournement. No matter how hard we try, we can't objectify this seemingly simple and mechanical process.

And yet, perhaps mere transcription is not enough. What we end up with is a text, but upon reading it over, we are still missing one key element: the physical qualities of the voice -- the lulls, the stresses, the accents and pauses. Once we allowed those vagaries in, we open Pandora's box: How to transcribe the messiness of speech, say, when two people are talking atop one another? Or what to do when words are mumbled or indecipherable? Or how do we connote someone laughing or coughing while speaking? What to do about foreign accents or multi-language texts? For such a seemingly simple task, the questions kept piling up.

On an internet search, one student comes up with a standard set of transcription conventions, one used in courtrooms and in witness statements which we immediately adopt as our guide. In them, we discover a world of orthographic symbols designed to bring the voice out of the text. We set to work, peppering our dry texts with extra-lingual symbols. We listen over and over again, each time parsing with more minute focused intensity -- was that pause (.10) seconds or was it (1.75) seconds? No, it was somewhere in between, noted as (.), a micro pause, usually less than a quarter of a second. By the time we are through, the voices literally jump off the page, shouting and singing as if a recording of them were playing in the room. The results look more like computer code than "writing," and it produces a dozen unique works, in spite of the uniform standards we impose upon them, so that, for example, a transcription of a snippet of dialogue would go from this:

ends up looking like this:

He comes for/ CONverASion-- I COMfort him sometimes (2.0) COMfort and >CONsultAtion< (.) He knows (.) that's what >HE'll find--< (2.0) He knows that's <whAT--> he'll fi--nd< (6.0)

The passage was coded using the following transcriptional conventions:

Underlining of the syllable nucleus denotes that the word is stressed with a syntactically focused accent

UPPERCASE indicates words which are spoken in a louder volume and/or with emphatic stress

(2.0) marks a timed pause of about 2 seconds

(.) denotes a micro-pause, usually less than a quarter of a second

- (single dash sign) in the middle of a word denotes that the speaker interrupts himself

-- (double dash signs) at the end of an utterance indicates that the speaker leaves his utterance incomplete, often with an intonation which invites the addressee to complete the utterance

/ / inward slashes denotes speech in a low volume ("sotto voce")

> < (arrows) denotes speech (between the arrows which is spoken at a faster rate than the surrounding talk

< > denotes speech (between the arrows) which is spoken at a slower rate than the surrounding talk
* * (asterisks) indicate laughter in the speaker's voice while pronouncing the words enclosed

Read the two passages aloud and you'll hear the difference.

Is this writing or is it mere transcription? It depends on who you ask. To a stenographer, it's a job; to a fiction writer focused on telling a compelling narrative, it's a clogged storyline; to a screenwriter, it's the actor's job; to a linguist, it's analytical data; yet to an uncreative writer -- one who finds unexpected richness by subtly shifting frames of reference -- it's art.

III. Transcribing Project Runway

As the semester progresses, the class begins to take on a life of its own and the students begin to act as a group. The class virtually assembles to watch, say, the season's finale of Project Runway at 10:00 on a Tuesday evening. We'll each be at our separate homes, scattered up and down the East Coast yet all connected by a chat room. Once the show starts, no conversation is allowed except for us to all type what we're hearing on the television as we're hearing it. Subjective commentary, gloss and opinion -- original thoughts and words -- are prohibited. From the moment the show's opening credits roll, a blizzard of repeated words are looped onto the screen by all fifteen participants. We don't stop for ads, rather texts are spawned continuously until 11pm, at which time over 75 pages worth of raw text is generated which looks like this:

ChouOnTHISSS (10:19:37 PM): really really happy beansdear (10:19:37 PM): all the models are dress ChouOnTHISSS (10:19:37 PM): show the world what I can do
WretskyMustDie (10:19:38 PM): Michael's parents ChouOnTHISSS (10:19:38 PM): Michael's parents customary black (10:19:38 PM): ready to show the world Kerbear1122 (10:19:38 PM): weally weally happy sunglassaholic (10:19:38 PM): ready to show the world ChouOnTHISSS (10:19:38 PM): I really like it.
ChouOnTHISSS (10:19:38 PM): do or die tweek90901 (10:19:40 PM): I really like it EP1813 (10:19:40 PM): coming to life I like it shoegal1229 (10:19:40 PM): I do or die WretskyMustDie (10:19:40 PM): do or die now or never beansdear (10:19:40 PM): i really like it tweek90901 (10:19:40 PM): one shot shoegal1229 (10:19:40 PM): now or never sunglassaholic (10:19:40 PM): one shot beansdear (10:19:40 PM): do or die shoegal1229 (10:19:40 PM): one shot WretskyMustDie (10:19:40 PM): Jeffrey's girlfriend and son beansdear (10:19:40 PM): I'm giving it tweek90901 (10:19:40 PM): all of the looks tweek90901 (10:19:40 PM): on all of the girls sunglassaholic (10:19:40 PM): all of the looks customary black (10:19:40 PM): all the looks all the girls

The class then constructs an editing process. They decide to remove language that they feel interrupts the rhythmic flow ("Michael's parents" and "Jeffrey's girlfriend and son" were extricated). After much argument, the userids and timestamps are removed (some felt that their documentary function was essential to understanding the piece), really really happy all the models are dressed show the world what I can do ready to show the world weally weally happy
ready to show the world
I really like it
do or die
I really like it coming to life I like it
I do or die
do or die now or never
I really like it
one shot now or never one shot
do or die
one shot
I'm giving it all of the looks on all of the girls
all of the looks
all the looks all the girls

It's streamlined and rhythmic, none of which was generated by doing anything other than repeating what was heard. But it's a powerful echo chamber, feeling like a minimalistic cross between E.E. Cummings and Gertrude Stein, all generated by a group listening closely to the spew of a popular television show. If the text wasn't convincing enough, the students give a group reading of the piece, each speaking the lines that they "wrote," reanimating this media-saturated text with a bodily presence in a physical space. If we listen closely to the everyday language spoken around us, we'll be sure to find poetry in it. When Project Runway is aired, you'd be hard-pressed to find a group of viewers paying attention to the way words are spoken instead of how they carry the narrative. Yet all media using language is multifaceted, at once transparent and opaque; by reframing, recontextualizing and repurposing the found language around us, we'll find that all the inspiration we need is right under our noses. As John Cage said, "Music is all around us. If only we had ears. There would be no need for concert halls."

***

The uncreative classroom is transformed into a wired laboratory, in which students hypertext off the ideas of the instructor and their classmates in a digital frenzy. This was proven during a recent visit by a writer to my classroom. The writer began his lecture with a PowerPoint presentation about his work. While he was speaking, he noticed that the class -- all of whom had their laptops open and connected to the internet -- were furiously typing away. He flattered himself that, in the traditional manner, the students were taking copious notes on his lecture, devouring every word he spoke. But what he was not aware of was that the students were engaged in a simultaneous electronic dialogue with each other about what the writer was saying, all played out over the class listserv, which they had instant access to. During the course of the writer’s lecture, dozens of emails, links and photos were blazing back and forth to each other; each email elicited yet more commentary and gloss on the prior emails to the point where what the artist was saying was merely a jumping off point to an investigation of such depth and complexity, that the visiting writer, let alone a professor’s lecture -- would never have achieved. It was an unsurpassed form of active and participatory engagement, but went far astray from what the speaker had in mind. The top-down model had collapsed, leveled with a broad, horizontal student-driven initiative, one where the professor and visiting lecturer were reduced to bystanders on the sidelines.

But what of the sustained classroom discussion or the art of carefully listening to another person’s point of view? From time to time, I make them close their laptops and switch off their cell phones and we reconnect face-to-face in meatspace. My students seem to be equally comfortable with both modes, moving in and out of them with as much ease as they do in their day-to-day lives, texting their friends during day, and going out dancing with them that evening.

But I do wish to raise a red flag: I work at a privileged university, perhaps one of the most privileged in the world. The classrooms are crammed with the latest technology and top-speed wireless flows like water from the tap. The students, as a whole, come from economically empowered backgrounds and those who aren’t, are well-subsidized by the university. They arrive in class with the latest laptops and smart phones and seem to have every imaginable piece of the latest software on their machines. They are adept at file-sharing and gaming, instant messaging and blogging; they tweet non-stop while updating their Facebook status. In short, it’s an ideal environment in which to practice the sort of techno-utopianism I preach with enabled students ready willing and able to jump right in.

Needless to say, the situation at an ivy league institution is not in any way normal. While many institutions in the West have ramped up their technological infrastructures in similar -- if not quite as elaborate ways -- at most universities, students struggle to get by with older laptops, earlier versions of software and slower connections; smart phones, for now, are the exception, not the rule; and vast numbers of students must balance the demands of school with equally demanding jobs. In many parts of the West and throughout the Third World, the situation is much worse to the point of technology being non-existent. The data cloud is a fiction, with open and accessible wireless connections few and far between. If you’ve ever tried to find an unlocked or open wireless network anywhere in the USA, you’ll know what I mean. This won’t be changing any time soon.

My students know how to express themselves in conventional ways; they’ve been honing those skills since grade school. They know how to write convincing narratives and tell compelling stories. Yet, as a result, their understanding of language is often one-dimensional. To them, language is a transparent tool used to express logical, coherent and conclusive thoughts according to a strict set of rules that, by the time they’ve entered college, they’ve pretty much mastered. As an educator, I can refine it, but I prefer to challenge it in order to demonstrate the flexibility, potentiality and riches of language’s multidimensionality. As I’ve discussed throughout this book, there are many ways to use language, why limit it to one? A well-rounded education consists introducing a multiplicity of approaches. A law student can’t only study a case from the side of the prosecution; what the defense does is equally important. The Socratic method of legal education emphasizes the importance of knowing both sides of an argument in order to win it. Like a chess match, a skilled Socratic lawyer must anticipate her opponent's next move by embodying the contrary stance. A legal education also stresses objectivity and dispassion in order to represent a client's interests. I think writers can learn a lot from such ways.

Why shouldn't a literary education adopt a similar approach? If we can manage language/information, we can manage ideas and thus the world. Most tasks in the world are oriented around these processes, be it the gathering of legal facts for an appellate brief, the collating of statistics for a business report, fact-finding and drawing conclusions in the science lab, and so forth. Taking it one step further, by employing similar strategies, we can create great and lasting works of literature.

At the start of each semester, I ask my students to simply suspend their disbelief for the duration of the class and to fully buy into uncreative writing. I tell them that one good thing that can come out of the class is that they completely reject this way of working. At least their own conservative positions become fortified and accountable. Another fine result is that the uncreative writing exercises become yet another tool in their writing toolbox, upon which they will draw from for the rest of their careers. But the big surprise, even for my most skeptical students, is that being exposed to this "uncreative" way of thinking forever alters the way they see the world. They can no longer take for granted the definition of writing the way they were taught. The change is as much philosophical as it is practical; they leave the class more sophisticated and complex thinkers. I, in fact, train them to be "unoriginal geniuses.

Uncreative Writing in the Classroom

Students have now been immersed in the digital world from childhood and their adaptation to these ideas is native; they've been weaving together words and images into new creations since they learned how to cut-and-paste. Yet, in my experience, I've found that this skill set has never been valued in the classroom as a potential way of constructing serious written works. On the contrary, when asked, students tell me that it's universally criminalized in universities, resulting in students pretending to "research" in old fashioned ways. One student of mine told me that instead of citing the The New York Times website in a thesis, she cited the paper version instead, trying to "fool" the teacher into thinking that she had broader sources other than the web for her research, even when the content is identical in both places.

Simply put, pedagogy has not adapted itself to contemporary conditions in culture. And we are reaping what we sew, breeding a culture of deception, converting a natural enthusiasm for research and learning into a surreptitious practice to the point where outsmarting the professor becomes more pressing than what the student is engaged with. The irony is that this is exactly what the academy claims happens to students when they rely too much on digital media. It's a lose-lose situation: the students do twice the work to prove that they've done "twice the work" to the authorities, and the professors do twice the work to "catch" the students. If we could learn to accept the student's infatuation with the digital as a natural, normal, even healthy way of proceeding, thus bridging the gap of mutual distrust that has grown between student and teacher. The truth is that things are not going back to the way they were and the longer we condemn and ignore the realities of web and digitally-based research -- with all the complexities they invoke -- the further out of touch we will become. Academia is bound to lose this one.

But really, the game hasn't really changed; it just happens faster. Just like book-based research, digitally-spun academic research is a mixture of hunch, stumble, hypertexting, patchwriting and amalgamation, fusing other people’s thoughts into something that is your own. Was your research sprung completely from your own genius? Most likely not. You sourced it from dozens of places. What is original -- and genius -- is the way you wove those sources together.

My students live in a world of file-sharing and open-source culture. As a result, their attitude toward research is a collective one. Upon completing an academic paper, their first impulse is to post it on blogs, social networks and file-sharing sites. Just like MP3s, they tend to view the grand sum of learning as a collective pool into which they may freely dip, remixing, reconfiguring and regurgitating it as their own before letting someone else take a turn with it. Naturally, they tend to trust sources that are just as collaborative and fluid, like Wikipedia, rather than ones that are walled-off and top-down like JSTOR. (One student of mine has claimed to fool many a professor by "taking a JSTOR article, rearranging the words, then writing a few lines into it so that it isn't verifiable through search engines.) When asked, my students tell me that the greatest factor in their college education has been Wikipedia, yet they are not allowed to cite Wikipedia as a valid source. One student informed me that his professor demotes one grade for every Wikipedia entry cited in a paper. So what do they do? They use Wikipedia anyway and patchwrite without any citation, resulting in truly sloppy scholarship.

This won't go on much longer. The classroom will inevitably transform from a site of mutual suspicion into a place for experimentation, where both parties can openly investigate these cultural conditions without fear of suspicion or reprisal. Once that happens, a fascinating and complex dialogue will ensue, one where students are actually encouraged to indulge their proclivities in a formal, rigid and structured environment. I’ve seen this happen. While the results are striking, what’s equally important is the discourse that emerges, one that focuses as much on process as it does on product. An entirely new conversation ensues: How do you choose what to use? Or more important, what don’t you take? What is the way to digest all this material, transforming surplus text (which is what most of the web is) into smart, concise and pointed research or literature? What steps and processes are invoked to massage these raw texts into something meaningful? What can we trust on the web? And what is best to stay away from? New ideas of distribution emerge: if we're going to share our work, how and where and with whom do we do it? What does context mean on the web, a space the innately resists contextualization? These questions are new, but endlessly engaging -- and highly valuable -- ones.

The uncreative classroom is transformed into a wired laboratory, with students hypertexting off the instructor and their classmates in a digital frenzy. This was proven during a recent classroom visit of a writer. The writer began his lecture with a PowerPoint presentation about his work. While he was speaking, he noticed that the class -- all of whom had their laptops open and connected to the internet -- were furiously typing away. He flattered himself that, in the traditional manner, the students were taking copious notes on his lecture, devouring every word he spoke. But what he was not aware of was that the students were engaged in a simultaneous electronic dialogue with each other about what the writer was saying, all played out over the class listserv, which they had instant access to. During the course of the writer’s lecture, dozens of emails, links and photos were blazing back and forth to each other; each email elicited yet more commentary and gloss on the prior emails to the point where what the artist was saying was merely a jumping off point to an investigation of such depth and complexity, that the visiting writer, let alone a professor’s lecture -- would never have achieved. It was an unsurpassed form of active and participatory engagement, but went far astray from what the speaker had in mind. The top-down model had collapsed, leveled with a broad, horizontal student-driven initiative, one where the professor and visiting lecturer were reduced to bystanders on the sidelines.

But I do wish to raise some red flags: I work at a privileged university, perhaps one of the most privileged in the world. The classrooms are crammed with the latest technology and top-speed wireless flows like water from the tap. The students, as a whole, come from economically-empowered backgrounds and those who aren’t are well-subsidized by the university. They arrive in class with the latest laptops and smartphones and seem to have every imaginable piece of the latest software on their machines. They are adept at file-sharing and gaming, instant messaging and blogging; they tweet non-stop while updating their Facebook status. In short, it’s an ideal environment in which to practice the sort of techno-utopianism I preach with enabled students ready willing and able to jump right in.

Let’s not for a minute think this normal in any way. While many institutions in the West have ramped up their technological infrastructures in similar -- if not quite as elaborate ways -- at most universities, students are struggling to get by on older laptops, earlier versions of software and slower connections; smartphones are the exception, not the rule; and vast numbers of students must balance the demands of school with equally demanding jobs. In many parts of the West and throughout the Third World, the situation is much worse to the point of technology being non-existent. The data cloud is a fiction, with open and accessible wireless connections few and far between. If you’ve ever tried to find an unlocked or open wireless network anywhere in the USA, you’ll know what I mean. This won’t be changing any time soon.

But enormous public institutions serving the widest array of backgrounds and classes are moving in toward digitization. At the University of California, the Digital Textbook Initiative mandates that all textbooks be electronic by 2020. The ease with which one can manipulate and master information in this format changes the way learning happens. Of course these files will be cracked and when the temptation to copy and paste is right in front of a student’s nose, don’t think for a moment that they won’t. The idea, instead, is to acclimatize the student to the digital environment, making them aware, accountable and responsible for what they do copy, thus mitigating the knee-jerk impulse to mindlessly cheat.

My students know how to express themselves in conventional ways; they’ve been honing those skills since grade school. They know how to write convincing narratives and tell compelling stories. Yet, as a result, their understanding of language is often one-dimensional. To them, language is a transparent tool used to express logical, coherent and conclusive thoughts according to a strict set of rules that, by the time they’ve entered college, they’ve pretty much mastered. As an educator, I can refine it, but I prefer to challenge it in order to demonstrate the flexibility, potentiality and riches of language’s multidimensionality. As I’ve discussed throughout this book, there are many ways to use language, why limit it to one? A well-rounded education consists introducing a multiplicity of approaches. A law student can't only study a case from the side of the prosecution; what the defense does is equally important. The Socratic method of legal education emphasizes the importance of knowing both sides of an argument in order to win it. Like a chess match, a skilled Socratic lawyer must anticipate her opponent's next move by embodying the contrary stance. A legal education also stresses objectivity and dispassion in order to represent a client's interests. A great deal of falsification and insincerity wrapped in the cloak of utter conviction wins the day. I think writers can learn a lot from such ways.

Why shouldn't a literary education adopt a similar approach? If we can manage language / information, we can manage ideas and thus the world. Most tasks in the world are oriented around these processes, be it the gathering of legal facts for an appellate brief, the collating of statistics for a business report, fact-finding and drawing conclusions in the science lab, and so forth. Taking it one step further, by employing similar strategies, we can create great and lasting works of literature.

This is a writing of surgical precision; in uncreative writing, it’s the small gestures that make all the difference. That’s why in the classroom, we take great pains to workshop the plans for the work, knowing that the ideas are what drives the writing machine. If the ideas are solid, chances are that the writing will be as well. Sloppy decisions make for unsuccessful writing. Front-loading solid ideas will make for swift and mechanical writing, one that rarely fails. Even the way we discuss works can influence their reception. Articulating a precise framing for each work in conversation makes the results all the more effective. As a result, casual conversation and classroom discourse are raised to new heights of awareness. One student, for example, without thinking, prefaced a presentation of her work to the class by claiming her piece “isn’t going to change the world,” which is normally shorthand for “this piece isn’t all that great.” But in this environment, her pronouncement led to a heated half-hour discussion about writing’s ability or inability to affect change in the world, its political ramifications and its social consequences, all on account of an innocently -- but sloppily -- spoken platitude. All training in the uncreative writing classroom is rigorous. We try to eradicate all whim and fancy during the writing of a work, instead relegating all inspiration and "creativity" to happen before the writing actually starts; once in motion, nothing should sway it.

One exercise I give the students is the simple instructions to transcribe a short audio file. I try to pick something with little excitement or interest so as to keep the focus on the language, a news report or something so dry and dull as not to "inspire" any student. If I give ten people the same audio file to transcribe, we end up with ten completely unique transcriptions. How we hear -- and how, in turn, we process that hearing into written language -- is riddled with subjectivity. What you hear as a brief pause and transcribe as a comma, I hear as the end of a sentence and transcribe as a period. The act of transcription, then, is a complex one involving translation, displacement and détournement. No matter how hard we try, we can't objectify this seemingly simple and mechanical process.

And yet, perhaps mere transcription is not enough. What we end up with is a text, but upon reading it over, we are still missing one key element: the physical qualities of the voice -- the lulls, the stresses, the accents and pauses. Once we allowed those vagaries in, we open Pandora's box: How to transcribe the messiness of speech, say, when two people are talking atop one another? Or what to do when words are mumbled or indecipherable? Or how do we connote someone laughing or coughing while speaking? What to do about foreign accents or multi-language texts? For a such a seemingly simple task, the questions kept piling up.

By Googling, one student comes up with a standard set of transcription conventions, one used in courtrooms and in witness statements which we immediately adopt as our guide. In them, we discover a world of orthographic symbols designed to bring the voice out of the text. We set to work, pepperling our dry texts with extra-lingual symbols. We listen over and over again, each time parsing with more minute focused intensity -- was that pause (.10) seconds or was it (1.75) seconds? No, it was somewhere in between, noted as (.), a micro pause, usually less than a quarter of a second. By the time we are through, the voices literally jump off the page, shouting and singing as if a recording of them were playing in the room. The results look more like computer code than "writing," and it produces a dozen unique works, in spite of the uniform standards we impose upon them.

Similarly, I ask my students to simply retype five pages with no further instruction. Each student arrives in class with a unique piece of writing. Their responses are varied and full of revelations: some find it enlightening to become a machine (without ever having known Warhol's famous dictum "I want to be a machine"). Others say that it was the most intense reading experience they ever had, with many actually embodying the characters they were retyping. Several students become aware that the act of typing or writing is actually an act of performance, involving their whole body in a physically durational act (even down to noticing the cramps in their hands). Some of the students become intensely aware of the text's formal properties and for the first time in their lives began to think of texts not only as transparent, but as opaque objects to be moved around a white space. Others find the task Zen-like and amnesia-inducing (without ever having known Erik Satie's "Memoirs of an Amnesiac" or Duchamp's desire to live without memory), alternately having the text lose and then regain meaning. What universally emerges is an awareness of the act of typing (we could say the act of writing); what has become a rote, habitual and automatic process is now rendered visible.

In the act of retyping, what differentiates each student is their choice of what to retype. One student retypes a story about a man's inability to complete the sexual act, finding the perfect metaphor for this assignment. Another student retypes her favorite high school short story, only to discover during the act of retyping it, just how poorly written it was. Yet another is a waitress who takes it upon herself to retype her restaurant's menu in order to learn it better for work. She ends up hating the task and even hating her job more. The spell is broken when purposefulness and goal-orientation enters into the process. She learns that what works for art doesn't always translate when applied towards practical tasks in the "real" world.

The critique proceeds through a rigorous examination of paratextual devices, those which are normally considered outside of the scope of writing but, in fact, have everything to do with writing. Question arise, among them: What kind of paper did you use? Why is it on generic white computer paper when the original edition was on thick, yellowed, pulpy stock? What does your choice of paper stock say about you: your aesthetic, economic, social, political and environmental circumstances?
Do you reproduce exactly the original text's layout page by page or do you simply flow the words from one page to another, the way your word processing program does? Will your text be read differently if it is in Times Roman or Verdana? For a task so seemingly simple, the questions never end.

I ask them to create a film script for an unscripted film. One student takes a short pornographic clip and writes an incredibly detailed 20-page screenplay after it, complete with camera angles, set descriptions, dialogue and body movements. The screenplay is now available for re-enactment according to the script. Another student takes a home video of an emotional family trip to Poland to visit their ancestral villages where thousands were slaughtered during WWII. She then creates a precise screenplay, by transcribing the video -- the action, the scenery, the emotions, the dialogue -- and presents bound copies to her family during the holiday season as gifts. Someone else decides to create screenplays for several notoriously unscripted Andy Warhol films: six hours of a man sleeping, eight hours of the Empire State Building, a man getting a blow job. Nuanced and detailed, this uncreative exercise requires careful watching and precise writing skills. It's absurd, but someone now can remake these films according to a script.

The students must buy into inauthenticity by creating false and misleading self-portraits written in first-person singular. They must inhabit another's subjectivity, presenting it convincingly in front of their peers as if it were their own words. In most cases, the sentiments are simply cut-and-pasted from blogs. A rigorous examination of each student ensues around why and how the inauthentic persona was chosen. In defending their choice, it is always revealed that what they chose was, in fact, very personal: Googling a location near where they grew up, ripping the words off of a high-school enemy's Facebook page in an act of belated revenge or reading their step-mother's autobiography aloud speaking every "I" -- even the intimate love scenes with her husband -- with total conviction. Although every exercise begins with the inauthentic, it ends with sincere subjectivity. How could it be otherwise?

But still, we try to be as shallow as we can. Cast yourself in terms of what you buy: create a consumerist self-portrait. Can you define yourself as a statistic, a demographic? Of course you can, it's what you do every day. Let's extend that into writing. One student plugs last month's spending habits into an online machine, resulting in a generic series of statistics and pie-charts, revealing as much about the machine as it does about the student. Another student, by inventorying every CD, LP and MP3 they own, chooses to define himself by a list of these purchased or procured consumer goods. How could that not be true? One girl meticulously notes the location and brand of every piece of clothing strewn about her apartment, resulting in a label-driven psychogeographic GPS mapping of her apartment as read through her clothing addiction. It's very intimate: taste, proclivity, class, fashion and autobiography are on display for all to see.

Every piece must be able to take several forms. Writing's materiality and fluidity needs to be proven by successive iterations which unfold over the course of several weeks. When we work with language on the streets, for example, we make sure to domesticate those texts by repurposing them on the computer in class next week. Graffiti your environment. But just don't use current language. Take outmoded slogans, propaganda or advertisements and spray paint a wall, sticker a window, chalk a sidewalk, lipstick a mirror. Warp time and space, passion and politics into a poetic, nonsensical situation by creating an absurd reading experience for the passerby. Make them do a double take: "Impeach Nixon" spraypainted on a new condo wall? Then take those slogans and print a series of greeting cards emblazoned with them on their fronts. Recreate them to look exactly like the ones you buy at the pharmacy, down to the bar-codes and envelopes. Now take them down to the local card shop and droplift them in and amongst the greeting cards. "Burn Your Bra," "MVRTIS BENJI. FELAS." ("Murtis, you suck well"
- graffiti from Pompeii) and "Is It Always Illegal to Kill A Woman?" (text from a 1953 postage meter ad) sit alongside Mother's Day and First Communion cards in the racks.

We convene after class, virtually assembling to watch, say, the season's finale of Project Runway at 10:00 on a Tuesday evening. We'll each be at our separate homes, scattered up and down the East Coast yet all connected by a chatroom. Once the show starts, no conversation is allowed except for us to all type what we're hearing on the television as we're hearing it. Subjective commentary, gloss and opinion -- original thoughts and words -- are prohibited. From the moment the show's opening credits roll, a blizzard of repeated words are looped onto the screen by all fifteen participants. We don't stop for ads, rather texts are spawned continuously until 11pm, at which time over 75 pages worth of text is generated. What emerges is a remarkable piece of writing, written, really, very little effort or any "creative input."
Over the next several weeks, the texts are massaged and finally, a public performance of the text is read by the students, each giving body to the coolly generated language by vocalizing the texts they "wrote."

Entire semesters are spent in Second Life, listservs are the class's lifeblood, and the clatter of keyboards fills the room in place of words. Some classes are completely silent; even though we're all in the same room, the only class communication takes place in chat rooms.
The transcript is saved, parsed by each member of the class and presented as works of literature the next week. It's all writing.

At the start of each semester, I ask my students to simply suspend their disbelief for the duration of the class and to fully buy into uncreative writing. I tell them that one good thing that can come out of the class is that they completely reject this way of working. At least their own conservative positions become fortified and accountable. Another fine result is that the uncreative writing exercises become yet another tool in their writing toolbox, upon which they will draw from for the rest of their careers. But the big surprise, even for my most skeptical students, is that being exposed to this "uncreative" way of thinking forever alters the way they see the world. They can no longer take for granted the definition of writing the way they were taught. The change is as much philosophical as it is practical; they leave the class more sophisticated and complex thinkers. I, in fact, train them to be "unoriginal geniuses."
Provisional Language

Language has become a provisional space, temporary and debased, mere material to be shoveled, reshaped, hoarded and molded into whatever form is convenient, only to be discarded just as quickly. Because words today are cheap and infinitely produced, they are detritus, signifying little, meaning less. Disorientation by replication, mirroring, and spam is the norm. Any notion of the authentic or original is untraceable. French theorists who anticipated the destabilizing of language could never have foreseen the extent that these words refuse to stand still; restlessness is all they know. Words today are bubbles, shape shifters, empty signifiers, floating on the invisibility of the network, that great leveler of language, from which we greedily and indiscriminately siphon, stuffing hard drives only to replace them with bigger and cheaper ones.

Digital text is the body-double of print, the ghost in the machine. The ghost has become more useful than the real; if we can't download it, it doesn't exist. Words are additive, they pile up endlessly, become undifferentiated, shattered into shards now, words reform into language-constellations later, only to be blown apart once more.

The blizzard of language is amnesia-inducing; these are not words to be remembered. Stasis is the new movement. A simultaneous condition of ubiquitous obsolence and presence, dynamic yet stable. An ecosystem: recyclable, repurposed, reclaimed. Regurgitation is the new uncreativity; instead of creation, we honor, cherish and embrace manipulation and repurposing.

Letters are undifferentiated building blocks -- with no one meaning more or less than another; vowels and consonants are reduced to decimal code, temporarily constellating into a word processing document; then a video; then an image; perhaps back to text. Both irregularity and uniqueness are provisionally constructed from identical textual elements. Instead of trying to wrest order from chaos, the picturesque now is wrested from the homogenized, the singular liberated from the standardized. All materialization is conditional: cut, pasted, skimmed, forwarded, spammed.

Where once the craft of writing suggested the coming together -- possibly forever -- of words and thoughts, it is now a transient coupling, waiting to be undone; a temporary embrace with a high probability of separation.

The industrialization of language: because it is so intensely consumed, words are fanatically produced and just as fervently maintained and stored. Words never sleep; torrents and spiders are hoovering language 24-7.

Traditionally, typology implies demarcation, the definition of a singular model that excludes other arrangements. Provisional language represents a reverse typology of cumulative, less about kind than about quantity.

Language is draining and is drained in return; writing has become a space of collision, a container of atoms.

There is a special way of wandering the web, at the same time aimless and purposeful. Where once narrative promised to deliver you to where you wanted to be, the web's blizzard of language now obfuscates and entangles you in a thicket of words that forces you past unwanted detours, turns you back when you're lost: a dér eive on overdrive, a fast flâneur.

Language has been leveled to a mode of sameness, blandness. Can the bland be differentiated? The featureless be exaggerated? Through length? amplification? variation? repetition? Would it make a difference? Words exist to for the purpose of détournement: take the most hateful language you can find and neuter it; take the sweetest and make it ugly.

Restore, rearrange, reassemble, revamp, renovate, revise, recover, redesign, return, redo: verbs that start with re- produce provisional language.

Half of mankind pollutes to produce, the other pollutes to consume. The combined pollution of all Third World cars, motorbikes, trucks, buses, sweatshops, pales into insignificance compared to the heat generated by digital language. Entire authorial oeuvres now adopt provisional language, establishing regimes of engineered disorientation to instigate a politics of systematic disarray.

Babel has been misunderstood; language is not the problem, just the new frontier.

Provisional language pretends to unite, but it actually splinters. It creates communities not of shared interest or of free association, but of identical statistics and unavoidable demographics, an opportunistic weave of vested interests.

Kill your masters. A shortage of masters has not stopped a proliferation of masterpieces. Everything is a masterpiece; nothing is a masterpiece. It's a masterpiece if I say it is. Inevitably, the death the author has spawned orphaned space; provisional language is authorless, yet surprisingly authoritarian, indiscriminately assuming the cloak of whomever it snatched it from.

The office is the next frontier of writing. Now that you can work at home, the office aspires to the domestic. Provisional writing features the office as the urban home: desks become sculptures; an electronic Post-It universe imbues the new writing, adopting corporate-speak as its lingo: "team memory" and "information management."

Contemporary writing requires the expertise of a secretary crossed with the attitude of a pirate: replicating, organizing, mirroring, archiving, and reprinting, along with a more clandestine proclivity for bootlegging, plundering, hoarding, and file-sharing. We've needed to acquire a whole new skill set: we've become master typists, exacting cut-and-pasters, and OCR demons. There's nothing we love more than transcription; we find few things more satisfying than collation.

There is no museum or bookstore in the world better than our local Staples, crammed with raw writing materials: gigantic hard drives, spindles of blank discs, toners & inks, memory-jammed printers and reams of cheap paper. The writer is now producer, publisher and distributor. Paragraphs are ripped, burned, copied, printed, bound, zapped and beamed simultaneously. The traditional writer's solitary lair is transformed into a socially networked alchemical laboratory, dedicated to the brute physicality of textual transference. The sensuality of copying gigabytes from one drive to another: the whirr of the drive, the churn of intellectual matter manifested as sound. The carnal excitement from supercomputing heat generated in the service of literature. The grind of the scanner as it peels language off the page, thawing it, liberating it. Language in play. Language out of play. Language frozen. Language melted.

Sculpting with text.
Data mining.
Sucking on words.
Our task is to simply mind the machines.

Globalization turns all language into provisional language. The ubiquity of English: now that we all speak it, nobody remembers its use. The collective bastardization of English is our most impressive achievement; we have broken its back with ignorance, accent, slang, jargon, tourism and multitasking. We can make it say anything we want, like a speech dummy.

Narrative reflexes that have enabled us from the beginning of time to connect dots, fill in blanks, are now turned against us. We cannot stop noticing: no sequence too absurd, trivial, meaningless, insulting, we helplessly register, provide sense, squeeze meaning, and read intention out of the most atomized of words. Modernism showed that we cannot stop making sense out of the utterly senseless. The only legitimate discourse is loss; we used to renew what was depleted, now we try to resurrect what is gone.
Afterword

In 1726, Jonathan Swift imagined a writing machine whereby "the most ignorant person, at a reasonable charge, and with a little bodily labour, might write books in philosophy, poetry, politics, laws, mathematics, and theology, without the least assistance from genius or study." He described a primitive grid-based machine with every word in the English language inscribed upon it. By cranking a few handles, the grid would shift slightly and random groups of half-sensible words would fall into place. Crank it again and the device would spit out another set of non-sequiturs. These resulting broken sentences were jotted down by scribes into folios which, like pieces of a giant jigsaw puzzle, were intended to be fit together in an effort to rebuild the English language from scratch, albeit written by machine. The Swiftian punchline, of course, is that the English language was fine as it was and the novelty of reconstructing it by machine wasn't going to make it any better. It's a pointed satire of our blinding belief in the transformative potential of technology, even if in many cases it's sheer folly. Yet it's also possible to view Swift's proposition as an act of uncreative writing, particularly when placed in the context of Pierre Menard's rewriting of Don Quixote or Simon Morris's retyping of On The Road.

I can imagine someone today reconstructing Swift's machine, rebuilding the English language from scratch, and publishing the book as a work of uncreative writing. It would be a rich project, something along the lines of an Oulipian exercise: "Reconstruct the English language from scratch using the 26 letters on a hand-cranked 20 x 20 grid..." Yet the lesson wouldn't be that much different from Swift's; in 2010, the English language still functions quite well as is. Would reconstructing it by hand really make it any better or would this be an exercise in nostalgia, hearkening back to the time when reproduction and mimesis was labor intensive? But in the end, we'd probably say, why bother when a computer can do it better?

In 1984, a computer programmer named Bill Chamberlain did try to do it better when he published The Policeman's Beard is Half Constructed, the first book in English that was penned entirely by a computer named RACTER. Like Swift's machine, RACTER reinvented a perfectly good wheel with less than impressive results. The rudimentary sentences RACTER came up with were stiff, fragmented and surrealist-tinged: "Many enraged psychiatrists are inciting a weary butcher. The butcher is weary and tired because he has cut meat and steak and lamb for hours and weeks." Or it spewed some light romantic cyber-doggerel: "I was thinking as you entered the room just now how slyly your requirements are manifested. Here we find ourselves, nose to nose as it were, considering things in spectacular ways, ways untold even by my private managers." In his introduction to the book, Chamberlain, sounding rather Swiftian, states, "The fact that a computer must somehow communicate its activities to us, and that frequently it does so by means of programmed directives in English, does suggest the possibility that we might be able to compose programming that would enable the computer to find its way around a common language 'on its own' as it were. The specifics of the communication in this instance would prove of less importance than the fact that the computer was in fact communicating something. In other words, what the computer says would be secondary to the fact that it says it correctly."

RACTER's biggest problem was that it operated in a vacuum without any interaction or feedback. Chamberlain fed it punch cards and it spewed semi-coherent nonsense. RACTER is what Marcel Duchamp would call a "bachelor machine," a singular onanistic entity speaking only to itself, incapable of the reciprocal, reproductive, or even mimetic interaction with other users or machines that might help improve its literary output. Such was the state of the non-networked computer and the primitive science of programming in 1984. Today, of course, computers continually query and respond to each other over the internet, assisting one another to become ever more intelligent and efficient. Although we tend to focus on the vast amount of human-to-human social networking being produced, much of the conversation across the networks is machines talking to other machines, spewing "dark data," code that we never see. In August of 2010, a watershed occurred when more non-human objects came online registered with AT&T and Verizon in greater numbers than did new human subscribers in the previous quarter. This long-predicted situation sets the stage for the next phase of the web called "the internet of things," where machinic interaction far outpaces human-driven activity on the networks. For example, if your dryer is slightly off-tilt, it wirelessly sends data to a server, which sends back a remedy and the dryer fixes itself accordingly. Such data queries are being sent every few seconds and as a result, we're about to experience yet another data explosion as billions of sensors and other data input and output devices upload exabytes of new data to the Web.

At first glance, armies of refrigerators and dishwashers sending messages back and forth to servers might not have much bearing on literature, but when viewed through the lens of information management and uncreative writing -- remember that those miles and miles of code are actually alphanumeric language, the identical material that Shakespeare used to write with -- these machines are only steps away from being programmed for literary production, writing a type of literature readable only by other bots. And as a result of networking with each other, their feedback mechanism will create an ever-evolving, sophisticated literary discourse, one will be not only invisible to human eyes, but one that will bypass humans altogether. Christian Bök calls this Robopoetics, a condition where "the involvement of an author in the production of literature has henceforth become discretionary." He asks, "Why hire a poet to write a poem when the poem can in fact write itself?" Science fiction is poised to become reality, enacting Bök's prediction for the literary future:

We are probably the first generation of poets who can reasonably expect to write literature for a machinic audience of artificially intellectual peers. Is it not already evident by our presence at conferences on digital poetics that the poets of tomorrow are likely to resemble programmers, exalted, not because they can write great poems, but because they can build a small drone out of words to write great poems for us? If poetry already lacks any meaningful readership among our own anthropoid population, what have we to lose by writing poetry for a robotic culture that must inevitably succeed our own? If we want to commit an act of poetic innovation in an era of formal exhaustion, we may have to consider this heretofore unimagined, but nevertheless prohibited, option: writing poetry for inhuman readers, who do not yet exist, because such aliens, clones, or robots have not yet evolved to read it.

It's not just Bök who is decrying an end to human-produced literature. Susan Blackmore, the genetics historian, paints an evolutionary scenario, telling us we've already been sidelined by machines and their ability to move information. She calls this new stage the third replicator, claiming that, "The first replicator was the gene -- the basis of biological evolution. The second was memes -- the basis of cultural evolution. I believe that what we are now seeing, in a vast technological explosion, is the birth of a third evolutionary process... There is a new kind of information: electronically processed binary information rather than memes. There is also a new kind of copying machinery: computers and servers rather than brains." She calls these temes (technological memes), digital information that is stored, copied and selected by machines. The future doesn't look promising for us as creative entities. Blackmore says, "We humans like to think we are the designers, creators and controllers of this newly emerging world but really we are stepping stones from one replicator to the next." Listening to these scenarios, every direction we turn, it seems, has already been co-opted by machines, pushing us humans to the sidelines.

But wait. Here I am, hammering out original thoughts on unoriginality to convey to you, another human, about the future of literature. Although this book might be available electronically, I can't wait to wrap my hands around the paper version, making it "real" for me. Ironies abound. Much of what I've discussed in these pages, by comparison to Blackmore, Bök, or "the internet of things," seem folksy and human-driven (humans retyping books, humans parsing grammar books, humans writing down everything they read for a year, etc.). Their predictions make me feel old-fashioned. I'm part of a bridge generation, raised on old media yet in love with and immersed in the new. A younger generation accepts these conditions as just another part of the world: they mix oil paint while Photoshopping and scour flea markets for vintage vinyl while listening their iPods. They don't feel the need to distinguish the way I do. I'm still blinded by the web. I can hardly believe it exists. At worst, my cyber-utopianism will sound as dated in a few years as jargon from the Summer of Love does today. We're early in this game and I don't need to tell you how fast its evolving. Still, it's impossible to predict where it's all headed. But one thing is for certain: it's not going away. The references I've made in these pages will inevitably contain references to soon-to-be-obsolete software, discarded operating systems, and abandoned social networking empires, but the change in thinking and in doing from an analog way of writing has been made and there's no turning back.
Wasting Time on the Internet
Introduction: Let’s Get Lost

I’m wasting time on the Internet. I click to the New York Times front page to see the latest headlines and today a major nuclear deal with Iran was signed. The banner headline screams HISTORY and even though I haven’t really been following the story, I click on it. I’m taken to a page with an embedded video that features Thomas Friedman asking Obama to explain what he thinks the United States gained from the nuclear deal with Iran. I check the time on the video—three and a half minutes—and figure that’s not too long to listen to the president speak. He speaks; I watch. He continues to speak; I scroll through my Twitter feed but I still listen. I click back on the Times window and watch again. Somewhere about the three-minute mark, I start to think, Am I really wasting time on the Internet? This is important stuff that I’ve stumbled on to. I’m struggling to see what’s so shameful about this. The video ends and, impressed by what the president was saying, I start to read Freidman’s lengthy article about this beneath the video. I read the first few paragraphs carefully, then scroll down and read some more. It’s starting to get too granular for me. But my interest is piqued. Although I’m not going to read this piece to the end, I’m going to start following this story as it unfurls over the next few days. I stumbled on it and got hooked. Is my engagement deep? Not right now. But judging by the way these things tend to go, as I start to follow the story, my appetite for the topic will most likely become voracious. I can’t see this event—one that happens several times a day—as being anything other than good. Because of it, I’m better informed, more engaged, and perhaps even a bit smarter.

After I finish with this article, I click over to Facebook and find myself watching a video of Keith Richards discussing how he gets ideas for his songs. He says that when he’s in restaurants and overhears conversation coming from the next table, he simply writes down what they’re saying. “Give me a napkin and a pen,” he says, smiling. “You feel that one phrase could be a song.” Although the video is only a minute long, it’s packed with wisdom. Really? Could his process be that simple, that pure? After listening to Keith, I feel inspired. After all, I feel like I spend tons of time eavesdropping on Facebook conversations. Might I be able to wring a song or a poem out of those as well?

I’m back on Facebook, and the next thing I know I’m looking at this incredible black-and-white photo from 1917 of a full-size battleship being built in New York’s Union Square. The picture is huge and brimming with details. I click on it and I’m taken to a website. As I scroll down, there’s a short explanatory text about how this came to be, followed by a dozen more giant, rich photos of the ship being built in progress. It’s fascinating. I just wrote a book about New York City and I’m floored that I somehow missed this but grateful to know about it. I bookmark the page and move on.

What is wasting time on the Internet? It’s not so easy to say. It strikes me that it can’t be simply defined. When I was clicking around, was I wasting time because I should’ve been working instead? But I had spent hours working—in front of the same screen—and quite frankly I needed a break. I needed to stop thinking about work and do a bit of drifting. But, unlike the common perception of what we do when we waste time on the Internet, I wasn’t watching cat videos—well, maybe one or two. I was actually interested in the things that I stumbled on: the president, the rock star, and the battleship. I had the choice not to click on these things, but I chose to do so. They seemed to me to be genuinely interesting. There were many more things that I didn’t click on.

Listening to Internet pundits tell it, you’d think we stare for three hours at clickbait—those webpages with hyper-sensational headlines that beg you to click on them— the way we once sat down and watched three hours of cartoons on Saturday morning TV. But the truth is most of us don’t do any one thing on the Internet for three hours. Instead, we do many things during that time, some of it frivolous, some of it heavy. Our time spent in front of the computer is a mixed time, a time that reflects our desires—as opposed to the glaze-eyed stare we got from sitting in front of the television where we were fed something we ultimately weren’t much interested in. TV gave us few choices. Naturally, we became “couch potatoes” and many of us truly did feel like we wasted our time—as our parents so often chided us—“rotting away” in front of the TV.

I’m reading these days—ironically, on the web—that we don’t read anymore. People often confess this same thing to me when they hear I’m a poet. The other day, I was opening up a bank account and the associate working at the bank, when he found out what I did, sighed and admitted that he doesn’t read as much as he used to. I asked him whether he had a Facebook account, which he did, and a Twitter, which he also did. I asked him whether he sent and received e-mails. Yes, he said, many every day. I told him that he was, in fact, reading and writing a lot. We’re reading and writing more than we have in a generation, but we are doing it differently—skimming, parsing, grazing, bookmarking, forwarding, and spamming language—in ways that aren’t yet recognized as literary, but with a panoply of writers using the raw material of the web as the basis for their works it’s only a matter of time until it is.

I keep reading that in the age of screens we’ve lost our ability to concentrate, that we’ve become distracted, unable to focus. But when I look around me and see people riveted to their devices, I’ve never seen such a great wealth of concentration, focus, and engagement. I find it ironic that those who say we have no concentration are most bothered by how addicted people are to their devices. I find it equally ironic that most of the places I read about how addicted we are to the web is on the web itself, scattered across numerous websites, blog posts, tweets, and Facebook pages.

On those blogs, I read how the Internet has made us antisocial, how we’ve lost the ability to have a conversation. But when I see people with their devices, all I see is people communicating with one another: texting, chatting, IM’ing. And I have to wonder, In what way is this not social? A conversation broken up into short bursts and quick emoticons is still a conversation. Watch someone’s face while they’re in the midst of a rapid-fire text message exchange: it’s full of human emotion and expression—anticipation, laughter, affect. Critics claim that even having a device present acts to inhibit conversation, and that the best antidote to our technological addiction is a return to good old-fashioned face-to-face conversation. They say, “Conversation is there for us to reclaim. For the failing connections of our digital world, it is the talking cure.” But this seems to ignore the fact that smartphones are indeed phones: two-way devices for human-to-human conversations, replete with expressive vocal cadence and warmth. Is conversation over the telephone still—140 years after the phone was invented—somehow not considered “intimate” enough, lessened because it is mediated by technology?
But beyond that, life is still full of attentive, engaged face-to-face conversations and close listening, be it at the many conferences, lectures, or readings I attend where large audiences hang on every word the speakers say, or my own therapy sessions—nothing more than two people in a room—the tenor and intensity of which hasn’t changed in decades despite several technological revolutions. When a student comes and finds me during office hours, that student—normally tethered to her device—can still go deep without one. Even my seventeen-year-old son, awash in social media, still demands that we “talk” in the darkness of his bedroom each night before he goes to sleep, just as we have done his entire life. It’s a ritual that neither of us are willing to forego in spite of our love of gadgets. Everywhere I look—on the street, in restaurants and cafés, in classrooms, or waiting in line for a movie—in spite of dire predications, people still seem to know how to converse.

Our devices, if anything, tend to amplify our sociability. Sometimes we converse face-to-face, other times over our devices, but often, it’s a combination of the two. I’m in a hotel lobby and I’m watching two fashionable women in their twenties sitting next to each other on a modernist sofa. They are parallel with one another: their shoulders are touching; their legs are extended with their feet are resting on a table in front of them. They’re both cradling their devices, each in their own world. From time to time, they hold their phones up and share something on-screen before retreating into their respective zones. While they peck away at their keyboards, shards of conversation pass between them, accompanied by laughter, head nods, and pointing. Then, at once, they put their phones in their purses, straighten up their bodies, angle toward one another, and launch into a fully attentive face-to-face conversation. They’re now very animated, gesticulating with their hands; you can feel the words being absorbed into their bodies, which are vehicles for augmenting what they’re saying. It’s fascinating: just a moment ago it was parallel play; now it’s fully interactive. They continue this way for several more minutes until, as if again on cue, they both reach into their purses, take out their phones, and resume their previous postures, shoulders once again touching and legs outstretched. They’re no longer conversing with each other, but are now conversing with someone unseen. Our devices might be changing us, but to say that they’re dehumanizing us is simply wrong.

The internet has been accused of making us shallow. We’re skimming, not reading. We lack the ability to engage deeply with a subject anymore. That’s both true and not true: we skim and browse certain types of content, and read others carefully. Oftentimes, we’ll save a long form journalism article and read it later offline, perhaps on the train home from work. Accusations like those tend to assume we’re all using our devices the same way. But looking over the shoulders of people absorbed in their devices on the subway, I see many people reading newspapers and books on their phones and many others playing Candy Crush Saga. Sometimes someone will be glancing at a newspaper one moment and playing a game the next. There’s a slew of blogs I’ve seen recently which exhaustively document photos of people reading paper books on the subway. One photographer nostalgically claims that he wanted to capture a fading moment when “books are vanishing and are being replaced by characterless iPads and Kindles.” But that’s too simple, literally judging a book by it’s cover. Who’s to say what they’re reading? Often we assume that just because someone is reading a book on a device that it’s trashy. Sometimes it is; sometimes it isn’t. Last night I walked into the living room and my wife was glued to her iPad, reading the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass. Hours later, when I headed to bed she hadn’t moved an inch, still transfixed by this 171-year-old narrative on her twenty-first-century device. When I said good night, she didn’t even look up.

And while these critics tell us time and again that our brains are being rewired, I’m not so sure that’s all bad. Every new media requires new ways of thinking. How strange it would be if in the midst of this digital revolution we were still expected to use our brains in the same way we read books or watched TV? The resistance to the Internet shouldn’t surprise us: cultural reactionaries defending the status quo have been around as long as media has. Marshall McLuhan tells us that television was written off by people invested in literature as merely “mass entertainment” just as the printed book was met with the same skepticism in the sixteenth century by scholastic philosophers. McLuhan says that “the vested interests of acquired knowledge and conventional wisdom have always been by-passed and engulfed by new media . . . The student of media soon comes to expect the new media of any period whatever to be classed as pseudo by those who have acquired the patterns of earlier media, whatever they may happen to be.”

I’m told that our children are most at risk, that the excessive use of computers has led our kids to view the real world as fake. But I’m not so sure that even I can distinguish “real” from “fake” in my own life. How is my life on Facebook any less “real” than what happens in my day-to-day life? In fact, much of what does happen in my day-to-day life comes through Facebook—work opportunities, invitations to dinner parties, and even the topics I discuss at those dinner parties often comes from stuff I’ve found out about on Facebook. It’s also likely that I met more than a few of my dinner companions via social media.

I’m reading that screen time makes kids antisocial and withdrawn, but when I see my kids in front of screens, they remind me of those women on the couch, fading in and out, as they deftly negotiate the space of the room with the space of the web. And when they’re, say, gaming, they tend get along beautifully, deeply engaged with what is happening on the screen while being highly sensitive to each other; not a move of their body or expression of emotion gets overlooked. Gaming ripples through their entire bodies: they kick their feet, jump for joy, and scream in anger. It’s hard for me to see in what way this could be considered disconnected. It’s when they leave the screens that trouble starts: they start fighting over food or who gets to sit where in the car. And, honestly, after a while they get bored of screens. There’s nothing like a media-soaked Sunday morning to make them beg me to take them out to the park to throw a football or to go on a bike ride.

* * *

It’s Friday night and my teenage son has invited about a dozen of his buddies—boys and girls—over to the house. They’re sprawled out on the couch, mostly separated by gender, glued to their smartphones. Over by the TV, a few kids are playing video games that along with their yelps and whoops are providing the soundtrack for the evening. The group on the couch are close, emotionally and physically; they form a long human chain, shoulders snuggled up against their neighbor’s. Some of the girls are leaning into the other girls, using them as pillows. The boys are physical with each other, but differently: they reach out occasionally to fist bump or high-five. One couple, a boyfriend and girlfriend, are clumped in the middle of the couch, draped on top of one another, while at the same time pressed up against the others.

There’s an electric teenage energy to the group. They’re functioning as a group, yet they’re all independent. They spend long periods in silence; the only noises emanating from the gang are the occasional sounds that are emitted from their devices—pings, plonks, chimes, and tinny songs from YouTube pages. Bursts of laughter are frequent, starting with one person and spreading like wildfire to the others. As they turn their devices toward one another, I hear them saying, “Have you seen this?” and shrieking, “Oh my god!” Laughter ripples again, dying out quickly. Then they plunge back into concentrated silence. Out of the blue, one of the kids on the couch playfully says to the other, “You jerk! I can’t believe you just sent me that!” And it’s then that I realize that as much as they’re texting and status updating elsewhere on the web, a large part of their digital communication is happening between these kids seated on the same couch.

They’re constantly taking pictures of themselves and of each other. Some are shooting videos, directing their friends to make faces, to say outrageous things to the camera, or to wave hello. And then, it’s right back to the devices, where those images are uploaded to social media and shared among the group, as links are blasted out—all within a minute. Suddenly, the girls shriek, “I look so ugly!” or “You look so pretty!” and “We need to take this one again.” I hear someone say, “That was so funny! Let’s watch it again.” They count likes and favorites as they pile up and read comments that are instantly appearing from both inside and outside the room. This goes on for hours. In a sense, this is as much about creativity as it is about communication. Each photo, posed and styled, is considered with a public response in mind. They are excited by the idea of themselves as images. But why wouldn’t they be? From before the moment they were born, my kids have been awash in images of themselves, beginning with the fuzzy in utero sonograms that they now have pinned to their bedroom walls. Since then, our cameras—first clumsy digital cameras and now smartphones—have been a constant presence in their life, documenting their every move. We never took just one picture of them but took dozens in rapid-fire fashion, off-loaded them to the computer, and never deleted a single one. Now, when I open my iPhoto album to show them their baby pictures, the albums look like Andy Warhol paintings, with the same images in slight variations repeated over and over, as we documented them second by second. Clearly we have created this situation.

There is no road map for this territory. They are making it up as they go along. But there’s no way that this evening could be considered asocial or antisocial. Their imaginations are on full throttle and are wildly engaged in what they’re doing. They are highly connected and interacting with each other, but in ways that are pretty much unrecognizable to me. I’m struggling to figure out what’s so bad about this. I’m reading that screen addiction is taking a terrible toll on our children, but in their world it’s not so much an addiction as a necessity. Many key aspects of our children’s lives are in some way funneled through their devices. From online homework assignments to research prompts, right on down to where and when soccer practice is going to be held, the information comes to them via their devices. (And yes, my kids love their screens and love soccer.)

After reading one of these hysterical “devices are ruining your child” articles, my sister-in-law decided to take action. She imposed a system whereby, after dinner, the children were to “turn in” their devices—computers, smartphones, and tablets—to her. They could “check them out” over the course the evening, but only if they could explain exactly what they needed them for, which had to be for “educational purposes.” But if there was no reason to check them out, the devices stayed with my sister-in-law until they were given back the next day for their allotted after-school screen time, which she also monitors. Upon confiscating my nephew’s cell phone one Friday night, she asked him on Saturday morning, “What plans do you have with your friends today?” “None,” he responded. “You took away my phone.”

On a family vacation, after a full day of outdoor activities that included seeing the Grand Canyon and hiking, my friend and her family settled into the hotel for the evening. Her twelve-year-old daughter is a fan of preteen goth girl crafting videos on YouTube, where she learns how to bedazzle black skull T-shirts and make perfectly ripped punk leggings and home-brewed perfumes. That evening, the girl selected some of her favorite videos to share with her mother. After agreeing to watch a few, her mother grew impatient. “This is nice, but I don’t want to spend the whole night clicking around.” The daughter indignantly responded that she wasn’t just “clicking around.” She was connecting with a community of girls her own age who shared similar interests. Her mother was forced to reconsider her premise that her daughter wasn’t just wasting time on the Internet; instead, she was fully engaged, fostering an aesthetic, feeding her imagination, indulging in her creative proclivities, and hanging out with her friends, all from the comfort of a remote hotel room perched on the edge of the Grand Canyon.

In theorizing or discussing our time spent online, we tend to oversimplify what is an extraordinarily nuanced experience, full of complexity and contradiction. The way we speak about technology belies our monolithic thinking about it. During his recent run for president, a number of Donald Trump’s legal depositions were scrutinized by the New York Times, which intended to show how Trump spoke when he wasn’t in the spotlight. During a series of questions about the ways he used technology, he was asked about television, to which he replied, “I don’t have a lot of time for listening to television.” I was struck by the phrase “listening to television.” You don’t really listen to television; you watch it. You listen exclusively to radio. Born in 1946, it’s safe to assume that Trump spent his formative years listening to radio. My father, roughly the same age as Trump, says similar things. Growing up, he used to berate us kids for watching TV, saying that it took no imagination. Waxing nostalgic, he’d say, “When I was a boy listening to radio, you had to make up everything in your mind. You kids have it all there for you.” For my father—and I can imagine Trump, too—although they watched television, I don’t think they really understood it. Certainly, Trump’s statement belies a basic misapprehension of the medium.

Trump’s comment is a textbook example of Marshall McLuhan’s theory which states that the content of any medium is always another medium:
“The content of writing is speech, just as the written word is the content of print, and print is the content of the telegraph.” For Trump, the content of TV is radio. It’s common for people to pick up everything they know about a previous medium and throw it at a newer one. I’m often reminded of Trump’s comment when I hear complaints about how we’re wasting time on the Internet. To them, television is the content of the web. What they seem to be missing is that the web is not monolithic, but instead is multiple, diverse, fractured, contradictory, high, and low, all at the same time in ways that television rarely was.

* * *

It’s a Sunday morning and I go downstairs to get the New York Times.
In the travel section is a piece entitled “Going Off the Grid on a Swedish Island.” It’s about a woman who takes a digital detox on a remote island as a reminder that she is not, in fact, “merely the sum of my posts and tweets and filter-enhanced iPhone photos.” She checks herself into a “hermit hut”—an isolated cabin without electricity or running water—and gives her phone to her husband who locks it with a pass code. As she settles into the hut, bereft of her technology, she suddenly discovers herself connected to nature, listening to the sound of waves folding by the nearby shore. She also rediscovers the pleasure of reading books. She becomes introspective, remarking, “Now, disconnected from the imposed (or imagined) pressures from followers and friends loitering unseen in the ether of the Web, I found myself reaching for a more authentic, balanced existence for myself, online and off.”

She takes long walks. But each natural experience she has is filtered through the lens of technology. While listening to the sounds of nature, she muses, “Without a Spotify playlist to lose myself in . . . What else had I been blind to while distracted by electronics, I wondered?” She sees marvelous things: towering wind turbines, whose “graceful blades whoosh audibly overhead,” and congratulates herself when she resists the urge to record and share the scene on social media. She conveniently forgets the fact that these turbines are wholly designed and driven by digital interfaces. She nostalgically finds older, predigital technologies—ironically littering the landscape—charming. Seeing an upturned rotting car that “looks like a bug,” she can’t resist: “I pulled out my camera and took a photo, one that I knew would never get a single ‘like’ from anyone but me. And that was just fine.” On these sojourns, she mechanizes nature, describing it with tech metaphors: “Along the way, the only tweets I encountered were from birds.” On her final evening on the island, she has a cosmic epiphany whilst musing on the stars in the night sky, one that is served with a dose self-flagellation for her previous misdeeds: “Those spellbinding heavens are always hiding in plain sight above us, if only we would unplug long enough to notice.”

Even in such lighthearted Sunday morning fare, her words are laced with an all-too-pervasive, unquestioning guilt about technology. Try as she might, the writer is enmeshed with technology to the point that she is unable to experience nature without technological mediation. She may have left her devices at home, but she’s still seeing the world entirely through them. Her brain, indeed, has become differently wired and all the nature in the world on a weekend digital detox won’t change that. What was accomplished by this trip? Not much. Far away from her devices, all she did was think obsessively about them. Returning from her trip, it’s hard to imagine that much changed. I can’t imagine that in the spirit of her adventure she wrote her piece out longhand in number 2 pencils on legal pads by candlelight, only to sit down at a Remington typewriter bashing out the final draft, and filing it via carrier pigeon. No. Instead, the morning her piece appeared, she retweeted a link to the article: “@ingridkwilliams goes off the grid on a charming Swedish island.”

What these types of articles tend to ignore is the fact that technology has been entwined with nature for as long as humans have been depicting it. French landscape painters such as Claude Lorrain (1600–1682) often painted what they called ideal landscapes, which rendered nature in pitch-perfect states that never existed. So you get classical ruins nestled in dense, thick jungles that couldn’t possibly grow in the rocky Greek soil. These painters claimed that architecture was a kind of technology, one that either represented the spoiling of nature or its conquest by man. Even Thoreau’s cabin on Walden Pond was within earshot of the rattle and hum of a busy East Coast railroad line that ran about a kilometer away from his “hermit hut.”

Another article in this morning’s newspaper—this time in the business section—sends an identical message. It’s called “Put Down the Phone.” The piece focuses on various types of software and apps that monitor and restrict the time you spend on social media. These technologies include wearable clothing—with a sweep of an arm you can silence your phone—and suggests twelve-step-style parlor games you can play with your friends: the winner is the one who looks at their phone the least. There’s also a review of an app that turns your smartphone back into a “dumb phone” circa 1999 that does nothing more than make and receive calls.

But the highlight of the article is a plastic facsimile of a smartphone that is a piece of plastic that does absolutely nothing. It’s touted as “a security blanket for people who want to curb their phone addiction but are afraid to leave home without something to hold on to.” And yet in psychoanalytic theory, a security blanket is known as a transitional object, one that represents “me” and “not me” simultaneously. That definition—me and not me simultaneously—seems to be a more realistic assessment of our online lives than the tirade of pleas for a return to some long-lost, unified “authentic” self. Online, I am me and not me at the same time. Surely, the way I portray myself on Facebook isn’t really me; it’s an image of myself as I wish to project it to the world. Sometimes that image is true. Other times it’s a complete lie.

The article concludes with a quote from a psychology professor at the University of Kansas, who disparagingly says, “Smartphones are a potent delivery mechanism for two fundamental human impulses: our quest to find new and interesting distractions, and our desire to feel that we have checked off a task.” But I find that to be positive. That quote sums up the complex balancing act we perform with our devices. We’re productive—we’re checking off tasks—and we’re distracted in new and interesting ways. (Since when are new and interesting pejorative?) It’s that frisson of opposites—sweet and sour pork or salted caramel ice cream—that make it zing. The professor goes on to bemoan the fact that “with these devices you can get that sense of accomplishment multiple times a minute. The brain gets literally rewired to switch—to constantly seek out novelty, which makes putting the phone down difficult.” It sounds great to me. Novelty and accomplishment. They work together.

* * *

When I used to watch TV, “likes” weren’t really part of the game. Sure, I liked one show better than another, but I was forced to choose from a tiny set of options, seven channels, to be specific. Today, “like” has come to mean something very different. We can support something, expressing ourselves by clicking like or we can download something we like. In this way, we build a rich ecosystem of artifacts around us based on our proclivities and desires. What sits in my download folder—piles of books to be read, dozens of movies to be watched, and hundreds of albums to be heard—constitutes a sort of self-portrait of both who I am in this particular point in time, and who I was in earlier parts of my life. In fact, you’ll find nestled among the Truffaut films several episodes of The Brady Bunch, a show I really “liked” back in the day. Sometimes I’m in the mood to watch Truffaut; other times I’m in the mood to watch The Brady Bunch. Somehow those impulses don’t contradict one another; instead, they illuminate the complexities of being me. I’m rarely just one way: I like high art sometimes and crap others.

While I could discuss any number of musical epiphanies I’ve personally experienced over the past half century, all of them would pale in comparison to the epiphany of seeing Napster for the first time in 1999. Although prior to Napster I had been a member of several file-sharing communities, the sheer scope, variety, and seeming endlessness of Napster was mind-boggling: you never knew what you were going to find and how much of it was going to be there. It was as if every record store, flea market, and charity shop in the world had been connected by a searchable database and flung their doors open, begging you to walk away with as much as you could carry for free. But it was even better because the supply never exhausted; the coolest record you’ve ever dug up could now be shared with all your friends. Of course this has been exacerbated many times over with the advent of torrents and MP3 blogs.

But the most eye-opening thing about Napster was the idea that you could browse other people’s shared files. It was as if a little private corner of everyone’s world was now publically available for all to see. It was fascinating—perhaps even a bit voyeuristic—to see what music other people had in their folders and how they organized it. One of the first things that struck me about Napster was how impure and eclectic people’s tastes were. Whilst browsing another user’s files, I was stunned to find John Cage MP3s alphabetically snuggled up next to, say, Mariah Carey files in the same directory. It boggled the mind: how could a fan of thorny avant-garde music also like the sugary pop of Mariah Carey? And yet it’s true. Everyone has guilty pleasures. But never before have they been so exposed—and celebrated—this publically. To me, this was a great relief. It showed that online—and by extension in real life—we never have been just one way, all the time. That’s too simple. Instead, we’re a complex mix, full of contradictions.

***

The web is what Stanford professor Sianne Ngai calls “stuplime,” a combination of the stupid and the sublime. That cat video on BuzzFeed is so stupid, but its delivery mechanism—Facebook—is so mind-bogglingly sublime. Inversely, that dashboard cam of the meteor striking Russia is so cosmically sublime, but its delivery mechanism—Facebook—is so mind-bogglingly stupid. It’s this tension that keeps us glued to the web. Were it entirely stupid or were it entirely sublime, we would’ve gotten bored long ago. A befuddling mix of logic and nonsense, the web by its nature is surrealist: a shattered, contradictory, and fragmented medium. What if, instead, of furiously trying to stitch together these various shards into something unified and coherent—something many have been desperately trying to do—we explore the opposite: embracing the disjunctive as a more organic way of framing what is, in essence, a medium that defies singularity?

Shattered by technology, modernism embraced the jagged twentieth-century media landscape and the fragmentation it brought, claiming it to be emblematic of its time. Not to overstretch the analogy—it’s a new century with new technologies—but there are bits and pieces salvageable from the smoldering wreckage of modernism from which we might extract clues on to how to proceed in the digital age. In retrospect, the modernist experiment was akin to a number of planes barreling down runways—cubist planes, surrealist planes, abstract expressionist planes, and so forth—each taking off, and then crashing immediately, only to be followed by another aborted takeoff, one after another. What if, instead, we imagine that these planes didn’t crash at all, but sailed into the twenty-first century, and found full flight in the digital age? What if the cubist airplane gave us the tools to theorize the shattered surfaces of our interfaces or the surrealist airplane gave us the framework through which to theorize our distraction and waking dream states or the abstract expressionist airplane provided us with a metaphor for our all-over, skein-like networks? Our twenty-first-century aesthetics are fueled by the blazing speed of the networks, just as futurist poems a century ago were founded on the pounding of industry and the sirens of war.

Literary modernism provides insights as well. Could we theorize our furious file sharing through Freud's ideas about the archive, our ROM and RAM through his perception-consciousness system? Could we imagine the web as the actualization of Jorge Luis Borges's infinite library of babel, as described in his famous 1941 short story of the same name? Could we envision Twitter's 140-character constraint as being a direct descendent of Hemingway's brilliant one-line novel: "For sale: baby shoes, never worn." Are Joseph Cornell's boxes palm-sized, handheld pre-Internet devices, replete with icons and navigational systems? Is Finnegans Wake a wellspring of hashtags? Postmodernism's sampling and remixing—so predominant in mainstream culture from karaoke to gaming to hip-hop—are also foundational to the mechanics of the web. If the Internet is one big replication device, then every artifact flowing through it is subject to its bouncy reverberatory gestures (the retweet, for example), a situation where an artifact's primary characteristic, to quote Roland Barthes, is "a tissue of quotations drawn from the innumerable centers of culture," while at the same time remaining a container of content.

When futurist poet F. T. Marinetti famously wrote in a 1909 manifesto that "we will destroy the museums, libraries, academies of every kind," he could not have foreseen the double-edged sword of web-based structures. On one hand, artists are embracing the meme's infinitesimal life span as a new metric (think: short attention span as a new avant-garde), constructing works not for eternity but only for long enough to ripple across the networks, vanishing as quickly as they appear, replaced by new ones tomorrow. On the other hand, our every gesture is archived by search engines and cemented into eternally recallable databases. Unlike Marinetti's call to erase history, on the web everything is forever. The Internet itself is a giant museum, library, and academy all in one, comprised of everything from wispy status updates to repositories of dense classical texts. And every moment you spend wasting time on the Internet contributes to the pile—even your clicks, favorites, and likes. Read through a literary lens, could we think of our web sojourns as epic tales effortlessly and unconsciously written, etched into our browser histories as a sort of new memoir? Beyond that, in all its glory and hideousness, Facebook is the greatest collective autobiography that a culture has ever produced, a boon to future sociologists, historians, and artists.

This accretion of data is turning us into curators, librarians, and amateur archivists, custodians of our own vast collections. The web's complex ecosystem of economies—both paid and pirated—offer us more cultural artifacts than we can consume: There are more movies on Netflix than I will ever be able to see, not to mention all the movies I've simultaneously downloaded from file-sharing which languish unwatched on my hard drive. The fruits of what's known as "free culture"—the idea that the web should be a place for an open exchange of ideas and intellectual materials, bereft of over-restrictive copyright laws—create a double-edged sword. Abundance is a lovely problem to have, but it produces a condition whereby the management of my cultural artifacts—their acquisition, filing, redundancy, archiving, and redistribution—is overwhelming their actual content. I tend to shift my artifacts around more than I tend to use them. And all of those artifacts—jaggy AVIs, fuzzy PDFs, lossy MP3s—are decidedly lo-res. I've happily swapped quality for quantity, uniqueness for reproduction, strength for weakness, and high resolution for super compression in order to participate in the global cornucopia of file sharing and social media. And what of consumption? I’ve outsourced much of it. While I might only be able to read a fraction of what I’ve downloaded, web spiders—indexing automatons—have read it all. While part of me laments this, another part is thrilled at the rare opportunity to live in one’s own time, able to reimagine the status of the cultural object in the twenty-first century where context is the new content.

The web ecology runs on quantity. Quantity is what drove the vast data leaks of Julian Assange, Aaron Swartz, Chelsea Manning, and Edward Snowden, leaks so absurdly large they could never be read in their entirety, only parsed, leaks so frighteningly huge they were derided by the mainstream media as “information vandalism,” a critique that mistook the leak’s form for function—or malfunction—as if to say the gesture of liberating information is as important as what’s actually being moved. To Assange, Swartz, Manning, and Snowden, what was being moved was important—a matter of life and death. But then again to many of us, our devices are a matter of life and death. The ubiquity of smartphones and dashboard and body cams, combined with the ability to distribute these images virally, have shed light on injustices that previously went unnoticed. When critics insist we put down our devices because they are making us less connected to one another, I have to wonder how the families of Tamir Rice or Laquan McDonald might react to that.

This book attempts to reconcile these contradictions and embrace these multiplicities as a means of reenriching, reenlivening, recuperating, and reclaiming the time we spend in front of screens—time that is almost always dismissed as being wasted. Scrawled across the walls of Paris in May 1968, the slogan “live without dead time” became a rallying cry for a way of reclaiming spaces and bureaucracies that suck the life from you. I’d like to think our web experience can be nearly bereft of dead time if only we had the lens through which to see it that way. I don’t mean to paint too rosy a picture. The downsides of the web are well known: trolling, hate, flame wars, spam, and rampant stupidity. Still, there’s something perverse about how well we use the web yet how poorly we theorize our time spent on it. I’m hearing a lot of complaints, but I’m not getting too many answers, which makes me think perhaps our one-dimensional approach has been wrongheaded. Befitting a complex medium, one that is resistant to singularities, let’s consider a panoply of ideas, methods, and inspirations. The word “rhizomatic” has been used to describe the web to the point of cliché, but I still find it useful. The rhizome, a root form that grows unpredictably in all directions, offers many paths rather than one. The genie will not be put back in the bottle. Walking away is not an option. We are not unplugging anytime soon. Digital detoxes last as long as grapefruit diets do; transitional objects are just that. I’m convinced that learning, interaction, conversation, and engagement continues as it always has, but it’s taking new and different forms. I think it’s time to drop the simplistic guilt about wasting time on the Internet and instead begin to explore—and perhaps even celebrate—the complex possibilities that lay before us.
Chapter 1: The Social Network

One crisp Saturday morning in the fall of 2014, I announced a new course on my modest Twitter feed: “My class, called ‘Wasting Time on the Internet,’ will be offered @Penn next semester,” along with a link to the course description:

We spend our lives in front of screens, mostly wasting time: checking social media, watching cat videos, chatting, and shopping. What if these activities—clicking, SMSing, status updating, and random surfing—were used as raw material for creating compelling and emotional works of literature? Could we reconstruct our autobiography using only Facebook? Could we write a great novella by plundering our Twitter feed? Could we reframe the Internet as the greatest poem ever written? Using our laptops and a Wi-Fi connection as our only materials, this class will focus on the alchemical recuperation of aimless surfing into substantial works of literature. Students will be required to stare at the screen for three hours, only interacting through chat rooms, bots, social media, and LISTSERVs. To bolster our practice, we’ll explore the long history of the recuperation of boredom and time wasting through critical texts. Distraction, multitasking, and aimless drifting is mandatory.

A few hours later, when I checked back, the tweet had gone viral, accompanied by comments like: “Wait I believe I already have a PhD in that” and “I’d ace it.” In my feed was a request from Vice for an interview, which I gave a day later. Shortly afterward, I found a message in my inbox from the Washington Post also requesting an interview, which I gave. From then on, I was inundated daily with interview requests, all of which—with the exception of some mainstream television shows—I declined. With a shortage of new chum in the waters from me, what ensued was a media feeding frenzy, which ultimately ended up consuming itself.

After the two interviews in Vice and the Washington Post, I noticed a spate of second-tier news sites that basically reprinted the Vice and Post pieces in their entirety, slapped on new opening and concluding sentences, gave it a new title, and added a byline. A few days later, a bunch of third-tier sites did the same thing to the text of the second-tier sites. It was a massive game of copy and paste, far from what we consider to be upholding standards of original journalism. It was an object lesson not only on how information travels in a world of cut and paste but also how quickly it can devolve into distorted disinformation.

With the torrents of press—good and bad—the waiting list for the class had swelled to more than three hundred students for only fifteen seats. After much anticipation, the class finally convened in January 2015 in an oak-paneled Ivy League room. The surroundings—which included a huge oval antique wooden table around which the class gathered—were incongruous with the task at hand. Yet this distinguished room was equipped with racks of audio, video, and Internet equipment, as well as a flat-screen monitor that adorned an otherwise empty wall above the colonial wainscoting. An antique chandelier hovered over the table. Because of its location on the university backbone of the Internet, the Wi-Fi in the room was industrial strength. The students filtered into the room, opened their laptops, and—without a word—began wasting time on the Internet. Few instructions were given other than the fact that “something” needed to be written and submitted, culled from these sessions.
From the start, it was a disaster. The students drifted aimlessly for three hours barely using the social media and LISTSERVs that had been set up for them. With no one to guide or critique them, the writing they produced at the end of each session was dreadful, reflecting the unfocused experience they were having in this class. During cigarette breaks, the students looked isolated, exhausted, and irritated. I wasn't sure what to do. In my decade of teaching at Penn, I had never seen a group of students as demoralized as these. Clearly, my experiment was failing.

After one of those breaks, I was sitting at a table outside the room trying to figure out how to solve this mess with my TA when, from out of nowhere, music started blasting from behind the closed doors in the classroom. When we got up to see what was going on, we found all fifteen students, up out of their chairs, dancing madly to Khia's X-rated rap song "My Neck, My Back," which was blaring from all fifteen laptops streaming the identical YouTube video. One student commandeered the huge screen on the wall by jacking his computer into it, playing the video on the monitor, and pumping the sound through the room's speakers. The room resembled a cross between a television showroom—where all the TVs are lined up in a row playing the same show—and a disco. I wasn't sure what happened, but something had changed.

As it turns out, one of the students sent a request to the LISTSERV in silence, asking everyone to participate in a writing exercise she needed help with. Her idea was for everyone in the room to pick a song and play it aloud. She would then listen to the cacophony of lyrics and write down snippets from random lyrics she heard, coming up with an audio portrait in words. The students obliged, but the cacophony of fifteen computers each playing a different song proved to be too overwhelming for her to extract anything worthwhile. Instead, breaking the rules, the class began a lively discussion, brainstorming on how they could help make her project better. They decided to see what would happen if they all played the same song at the same time, which was, in short, how they stopped writing and started dancing. As soon as that song ended, they began debating the next song to play. The video was queued, and on the count of three, everyone pushed Start. The next song began, and the dancing resumed. For the next two hours, until the class ended, all they did was dance.

The next week in class, fully energized and working as a group, they began to throw around other ideas for wasting time on the Internet that they could do together. Gone was the lethargy; gone was the silence. In their place, dozens of ideas flew around the room, which were debated and tested. Some were great; many failed.

One particularly provocative idea was for everybody to open their laptops and pass them to the person seated to their left. For the next minute, that person could open anything on the laptop—any document, folder, or file. The only rules were that nothing could be altered or deleted and, for transparency's sake, no windows that had been opened could be closed. At the end of a minute, the laptops would be passed again to the person sitting to the left of them, and so forth, until every machine had traveled around the table and fifteen different people had a turn with everybody's computer. Upon hearing this proposition, my students' faces went white. I could feel the fear rippling through the room. There was hesitation. Some expressed reservations: "My whole life is on that laptop!" or "I've never allowed anyone to touch my laptop before." But once they realized that everyone was in the same position of radical vulnerability, they agreed to cautiously proceed.
What transpired was both fascinating and a bit anticlimactic. I saw one woman hesitantly eyeing someone’s laptop, which had landed in front of her. She pecked at a few keys, opened a couple of windows, and passed it on. I watched another student as he dug a few levels deep into a directory, found a Word document, opened it, glanced quickly at it, and proceeded to dig around some more. Finally, when your laptop made its way back to you, you saw exactly what everyone had looked at. My laptop returned with my iPhoto open, several of my downloaded videos playing, and a bunch of financial spreadsheets cracked. Someone had gone through my e-mails; someone searched for the word “porn”; someone else took a peek at my book in progress. Upon inspecting their computers, they had a variety of responses, mostly of amusement. As it turns out, even if, for example, somebody’s diaries were found, there hadn’t been enough time to uncover the juicy parts. After all, there wasn’t much to see in a minute’s time, and revenge awaited: they’d have a turn with your laptop soon enough.

The exercise was demystifying. It began to dawn on everybody that what we have on our laptops is, by and large, the same as what everyone else has on their laptops—a jumble of documents and files that mean a lot to us—but unless someone was looking for something very specific, our stuff didn’t matter much to anybody else. Afterward, I could feel a palpable sense of relief in the room. I could see my students’ bodies relaxing and the tension draining from their faces as they began connecting with their neighbors, sharing what other people opened, and laughing about it. What they feared—a massive invasion of privacy—didn’t happen in the ways they feared it would. Instead, the opposite happened: the room felt deeply connected, physically and emotionally, through those interactions with machines. They took a risk and as a result found themselves having crossed a certain threshold, one that allowed new levels of trust and intimacy and permitted them to move forward as a group into uncharted waters.

The stakes got higher: they began doing “data duels,” in which two people would get up in front of the class, exchange laptops, stand back-to-back, walk ten paces, turn around, face each other, and, at the count of three, each would delete one document from the other’s computer and empty the trash. Before handing the laptops back, all windows were closed so they’d never know which document was deleted. A year later, I still have no idea which documents I lost, which reminds me that maybe my data isn’t as precious as I thought it was.

Over the months, the class evolved into an idea generator on how a group of people in a room could waste time on the Internet together:

- Venmo $1,000 to the person to your right. They must then Venmo $1,000 to the person to their right and so on until your money goes full circle and returns to you.
- Work in a group to invent a rumor. Spread the rumor on as many social media sites as possible.
- Do a background check on the person to your left. Find every detail about them: addresses, schools, e-mail, hobbies, groups, publications, work, criminal record, family members, etc. Find everything you can by any means necessary. Hack into their accounts if necessary. Send it to them.
- In a group, have everyone put their addresses in a bowl in the middle and each person draws one at random. Go to eBay and buy that person a present for less than one dollar.
- As a group, choose a popular album of music. Find the worst possible versions of each song on the web, be it a terrible cover on YouTube, a bad-quality download, a virus-laden download, a misheard lyrics version, or a horrible remix. Reconstruct the album out of these new versions.

One week, a challenge was made to see who, after fifteen minutes, could tally the largest dollar amount by adding things to their Amazon shopping cart. When it was finished, the winner tallied $23,475,104.18 by clicking on vintage postage stamps, sports memorabilia, and expensive jewelry. Most people quickly emptied everything in their cart, fearing that they’d mistakenly hit a Buy button, putting them into debt for thousands or even millions of dollars. I forgot to empty mine, whereupon the next day at work, I got a panicked call from my wife, freaked out that someone had hacked our Amazon account to the tune of $2.5 million. I had some explaining to do. After each exercise, everyone in the room would restart their computer—a ceremonial cleansing that became a ritual. As computer start-up chimes tolled throughout the room, it was a sign that it was time to begin a new activity.

And so it went, week after week. I soon dropped the writing requirement, for the experience of wasting time on the Internet together in the same room far surpassed any artifact that would result from it. We came to the conclusion that when we waste time on the Internet, we usually do it alone or as a parallel activity—like in a dorm or a library—which is why the first few classes failed. By inserting the network and machine into the midst of physically based social interaction, new forms of communal activity were possible. The class was remarkably close to the experience of playing Twister, in which physical commands are decreed by an apparatus—the spinner—which tells you where to put your hands and feet. Because you must follow the edicts of the machine (the spinner is a primitive machine) your body ends up in places it normally wouldn’t. Even when those positions are awkward—your nose ends up in somebody’s crotch—no offense is taken because it’s the machine that dictates where the body goes. Arguably, that’s what makes it fun. (It’s been said that Twister was the first board game to ever use human beings as pieces.) We all agreed to play together and play by the rules, whatever the outcome may be. The presence of machines at the center of our social interactions seemed to temper whatever emotional responses we had to what were, at times, some white-knuckle moments. Like Twister, if things got too uncomfortable, we could always blame it on the machine rather than on a fellow student. Emotionally, the tone stayed cool, often verging on flat and mechanical, even when they were having fun. The dancing was wild, but wholly self-conscious; after all, this was an Ivy League university not a nightclub. There was no catharsis; we never had a group hug. Instead, there was a lot of affect flying around the room.

Affect is the powerful but often invisible emotional temperature in any given social situation, for instance, when you walk into a room that feels so tense you could “cut it with a knife,” although there are no visible signs of that tension. It’s similar to being afraid and noticing your palms are sweating, a palpable reaction that—except the exception of a handshake—is mostly invisible to others. Sweaty palms are an affective pre-emotion, as opposed to the full-blown emotions of screaming, laughing, or crying. Perhaps the most famous instance of affect is Pavlov’s dog salivating. Affect is an inventory of shimmers, nuances, and states. Contagious, leaping from one body to another, affect infects those nearby with microemotions and microfeelings, pulsating extensions of our bodies’ nervous systems. Our online lives are saturated with affect, our sensations amplified and projected by the network. Our Wi-Fi networks—carriers of affect—are invisible but ubiquitous, transmitting pulses and sensations through the air that have the potential to convert to emotions when displayed on our screens. This goes a long way to explain how hyperemotional social networking is, even on such a cold platform. Affect accounts for why things go viral on the networks. An invisible force, affect makes everything contagious.

When I e-mail a resume to apply for a job, my affectual state flickers somewhere between nervousness and hope. When I receive a response from that query, my affect is anticipation that will undoubtedly convert to emotion once I open the mail. Because of the time lag—an interval of even microseconds—online communications are affective in every way; most likely the receiver of that e-mail is also in an affective state. Watching someone await a response to a text message is a demonstration of anticipatory affect in that interval. In this way, the web is telepathic: we send an e-mail, post a status update, send a Facebook message, and then we wait, anticipating the nature of the response. Web communication is like fishing; dropping a pole in the water and hoping that something will bite. But because we are addressing the entire world—an unprecedented situation—we don’t really know to whom we are speaking, which sometimes results in tragic misunderstanding and miscommunication: we thought we were doing one thing but it turns out we were doing something else. Still, it is telepathy that makes the vast connections possible—between writers and readers, coders and viewers, followers and friends, not to mention members of online communities—all of which is transmitted by affect.

The content of Wi-Fi is radio, an earlier affectual wireless transmission technology. Ezra Pound, writing in 1934, famously called the artist “the antennae of the race.” Pound used a new technological metaphor—the radio antennae—in order to propose a visionary occult use for it. As few artists were exclusively using radio as their medium, Pound was using new technology to describe very old media: sculpture, painting, and poetry. In this way, Pound was referring to what has become known as “hauntology,” a term invented by Jacques Derrida to describe “the figure of the ghost as that which is neither present, nor absent, neither dead nor alive,” which also describes the way newer media is haunted by the old. In the nineteenth century, séances used machines such as the Ouija board through which voices and ideas, many of them long dead, were transmitted to the living—literally as “ghosts in the machine”; our twenty-first-century Wi-Fi transmissions bear eerie similarities.

Like the occult, affect works against narrative: it isn’t conclusive or curative; instead, it’s static, continual, hovering, and conditional. As a result, my class had no denouement or dramatic conclusion. In a room full of machines and gadgets it was, ironically, the body and its small human gestures—the affective gestures—that drove the class. People say that technology creates distance between people, but we found it to be just the opposite: our physical and emotive experiences were intensified through our devices. By merging our bodies with the network, we became highly attuned and acutely sensitive to everyone in the room. The class’s success was predicated on our bodies being together in the same space. Telecommuting or a MOOC (massive online open course) would simply have reified typically distanced ways of being online; our experience was, to put it mildly, rather atypical. In that room, every action was a transmission. Something as simple as students turning their laptops around to share with the class what they discovered while wasting time on the Internet triggered a series of electric responses, ones that pierced every body and mind in the room. It was, literally, a meatspace social network.
I’m in a large room in Berlin—where I’ve been brought to lead a four-hour workshop—on a gray, rainy Saturday afternoon wasting time on the Internet with a hundred people. They’ve all been required to bring their laptops and devices, which are connected to a lightning-speed Wi-Fi connection. I start by telling the group a story about how I once had a student who did a project in which he took his bank PIN code, blew it up huge on a flag, and ran it up a flagpole in the center of campus in the middle of the night when no one was looking. The next day, his PIN—his most private information—was there for all to see. Of course, nobody knew the meaning of this strange string of numbers, and even if someone could figure out that it was a PIN, they’d have no idea to which account it was attached. Within a few hours, the flag was removed. His finances were untouched.

Extending the laptop data-invasion exercise I did with my class, I proposed the following: might we be able to go a step further and share our passwords with one another? I ask if anyone wants to share their password with the group. My request is met with dead silence. I can see I’m not going to get too far with this one. So instead, I demonstrate the way I construct my passwords. I crack open a Word document and make the font really big, which is projected on a screen behind me. I explain to one hundred total strangers the formula I use to create my passwords. I show them how every password I make begins with the names of the site beginning with a capital letter—Yahoo, for instance—which is then followed by a scientist’s first and last name, trailed by the last four digits of one my old landline numbers, ending with two exclamation points. So, a typical password of mine would be YahooStephenHawking6830!! or AmazonMaxPlanck2448!! The elements I chose are indicative of who I am, including my nerdy fascination for science and nostalgia for the many phone numbers I’ve had throughout my life, each one evoking a flood of memories every time I type them.

I ask anyone else if they would like to come up in front of the workshop and demonstrate how they make their passwords. A woman volunteers, showing us her technique, which always includes the number 410. When asked why, she said that when she was a child growing up in Denmark, 4:10 was the time her favorite television show aired. Suddenly, the room lights up with conversation. It turns out that this particular show was aired all over Europe at that identical time and many of these international participants have deep connections to this show as well. The animated memories and chatter go on for quite a while before another gentleman steps up and proceeds to walk us through his passwords. It’s very confusing and no one in the room can understand it at all, which is his intention. As he explains it to us, he is a trained cryptographer, a lover of puzzles. His passwords are completely logical, but it’s a different type of logic. What’s beginning to emerge among the participants is that passwords are much more than something we use to get into locked rooms: they are tiny self-portraits constructed with fragments of autobiographical data that unwittingly convey who we are and how we think. Even those generic security questions you get asked are steeped in awkwardly intimate autobiography: “What is the first name of the person you first kissed?” or “What is the last name of the teacher who gave you your first failing grade?”

Next, taking a page from my Penn class, I ask everyone to cue up one song on YouTube, then full-screen it. At the same moment, everyone hits Play. The room fills up with a cacophony of one hundred different songs played from tinny speakers. Afterward, people get up to speak about what song they chose, why they chose it, and by doing so, what sort of message they were trying to project about themselves to the others. As it turns out, everyone has a reason for choosing the song they did. One man played a rap video from Tyler the Creator that his sixteen-year-old son had showed him that morning over breakfast; another woman played a current earworm, one she claimed to be her soundtrack for the summer, already laden with memories on this early mid-June day; an older gentleman played an alternative British national anthem, one he said expressed his strong political sentiments.

One song rises above the din. It’s Taylor Swift’s “Shake It Off,” the one song everyone in the room seems to know, and because of its iconic pop hooks the one song ringing in everyone’s ears long after all the other videos have been turned off. I have everyone cue up the same YouTube video of “Shake It Off.” Again, at the count of three, everyone hits Play at the identical instant. One hundred laptops are displaying the first moment of the video, a row of ballet dancers at a barre doing stretches to the heavy drumbeat that begins the song. The row of dancers in the video extends to infinity across this large room like an endless Rockettes kick line. On a hundred screens, a hundred Taylor Swifts emerge from the clusters of dancers, turn toward the camera, and sing, “I stay up too late, got nothing in my brain, that’s what people say.” But then a lovely computer glitch happens. Due to the various laptop processing speeds and the way they connect differently to the Internet, the videos begin to play off-kilter, with some laptops ten seconds ahead and others ten seconds behind. The room becomes a large echo chamber and as the four-minute video unfurls, the asynchronization becomes more and more pronounced. The pop song is starting to sound like one of Steve Reich’s early tape-loop pieces, in which two reel-to-reel recorders play an identical tape loop simultaneously. As they play, they gradually fall out of sync with one another due to microscopic differences in the machines’ playback speeds, resulting in psychedelic echoes and overlays, which is what’s happened to poor Taylor Swift. Gradually, the room grows quieter as each video winds down at a different speed, then ends. Finally, the slowest laptop in the room finishes—a solo performance that mimics the final shot of the video, with Taylor Swift dropping to the ground among a troupe of perfectly poised ballerinas. It’s simply poetic.

Next, I have everyone open their laptops and log on to Facebook, then walk away from their computers. For the next fifteen minutes, anyone can approach any laptop and enter whatever they like in the status update windows. There’s great trepidation as the participants gingerly eyeball the laptops. I see them think for a moment, then timidly type something in the window and move on to another computer. But within a few minutes, they’re fully engaged, banging words into other people’s lives. Some enter benign comments: “Have a nice day!” Others are more self-reflective: “You know this is not me.” “I am wasting time on the Internet.” “Kenneth Goldsmith made me do this.” Others yet are laden with moral sentiment: “This feels so wrong to be typing into someone else’s Facebook page.” Several people type surrealistic sentences, nonsensical words, and spontaneous poems in the boxes. Like graffiti taggers, a few participants enter the identical cryptic phrase into each and every computer, marking their territory. When it’s over, I ask several people to read what other people wrote. The room is tense. Some people smile knowingly when they hear their words read aloud; others are horrified as they read what’s been scrawled on their walls. The room becomes an emotive echo chamber, with feelings zooming around the room, bouncing off Facebook pages, and back into the room again. The affect also extends outside of the room: sure enough, phones start buzzing with friends and family contacting the participants to ask if everything is alright, and if they know their Facebook accounts have been hacked. Everyone has a lot of explaining to do.

Next I ask for volunteers to come to the front of the room and waste time on the Internet publically for all to see on the computer, which is projected on a large screen behind them. A young man approaches, his hands trembling as he logs on to Facebook. His cursor jitters, a digital manifestation of his physical condition. He hesitates, then checks his e-mail, looks at his work schedule, and deletes a wad of spam. He scrolls through Facebook, zooming past many items, slowing down to play each and every video for a split second. His web activity is an extension of his mind: we can almost see what he is thinking when he zooms past certain items on his feed or when he lingers on others.

He’s been silent the entire time, but increasingly looks out at us to gauge our reaction. The more he looks at us, the more self-conscious of his actions we feel him become. He goes to YouTube and searches through a comedy feed he subscribes to and clicks on a long video by the Canadian comedian Russell Peters, which he expands to full screen. Leaning back in his chair, he folds his arms and watches the video along with us. We titter; he smiles. The video is mildly funny and sort of entertaining; he’s just letting it roll. It’s going on for a little too long. I can feel the affect in the form of impatience rising in our room; after all, we were here to watch him waste time on the Internet—to see how he, specifically, wastes time—but now we’re stuck watching an interminable mediocre video. While he is indeed wasting time on the Internet, he’s not playing along to some set of invisible rules the group seems to have invented on the spot. People begin grumbling. Finally, affect converts to full-blown emotion when a woman in the audience challenges him: “You’re not wasting time on the Internet! You’re just trying to entertain us. We came here to watch the way you waste time!” The young man appears to feel her words deeply. He bows his head and apologizes: “This is pretty nerve wracking. I’m sorry but I thought you’d be bored if I wasted time on the Internet the way I normally do. I feel guilty that I wasn’t being entertaining enough, so I thought you’d enjoy this video.” Defeated, he heads back to his seat.

A nerdy hipster dude in black thick-rimmed glasses struts up to the podium. He sits down with confidence—perhaps even with a bit of smugness—cracks a browser and goes to a password-protected academic site where he downloads an essay by Heidegger. Next he opens Spotify, where he starts streaming some atonal string quartets by Schoenberg. You can feel the eyes beginning to roll in the room. Could this guy be more pretentious? He goes further by streaming a clip of a Godard interview with the sound turned off, at which point people start begging him to sit down. He’s been caught in his performance, which, while it might not have been exactly how he wastes time on the Internet—doesn’t he check his Facebook like the rest of us?—belie some grain of truth. He knew his stuff and probably chose to perform a certain curated aspect of his personality. In its own way, what he did was take the opportunity to create a performance by curating a set of cultural artifacts that spoke perhaps of who he was, who he wasn’t, or who he wanted us to think he was. Chances are it was a combination of all three.

The final time waster is a graduate student who begins admitting her nervousness by stating: “My pulse is jumping.” She settles in and logs on to Facebook. Scrolling through her feed, she pauses and says, “I feel guilty, like I’m exposing my friends on Facebook by doing this in front of one hundred strangers.” I make a mental note about how much guilt is inscribed in these exercises. She then cracks another tab, checks her Yahoo e-mail, and begins streaming Mumford and Sons’ “Little Lion Man” (radio edit) on Pandora, which resembles a soundtrack for a spaghetti Western and gives her performance a cinematic quality; we now feel like we’re watching a movie. Her browsing style is restless and jumpy. Quickly, she is back on Facebook, where she full-screens a clip from Ellen DeGeneres for a brief moment, then closes it. By now, she’s losing her self-consciousness and her surfing becomes rhythmic: first she checks her e-mail, then Facebook, then back to YouTube, over and over. Both structured and restless, this cycle continually repeats with slight variations over the next ten minutes. Her ease and lack of self-consciousness is infectious: I can see the other participants’ body postures change; some have stretched out on the carpeted floor as they watch, their faces open and relaxed. Her online habits have a regularity, which remind me of breathing—drawing breath in, holding it, and expelling it in regular intervals—as she rhythmically circulates from one site to another. As she has gotten into her groove, her time wasting has become organic; everyone’s become nearly silent. We’re in a trance. This banal room, housed in the bowels of a brutalist concrete room in Berlin has now been transformed into something resembling a yoga studio, with one hundred strangers harmoniously enraptured, swaying together in a state of buzzing electronic tranquility.
Chapter 2: The Walking Dead

A few weeks after returning from Berlin, I’m walking down Park Avenue on a beautiful midsummer evening. Armies of people are streaming out of their offices, most with their smartphones in hand. I am reminded of US Supreme Court chief justice John G. Roberts Jr.’s comment on the central role our devices play in the contemporary world: “They are such a pervasive and insistent part of daily life that the proverbial visitor from Mars might conclude they were an important feature of human anatomy.” Part human, part machine, these masses peck away at their smartphones, deftly navigating the packed sidewalk the way colonies of bats traverse the night sky.

Gazing out on this technology-soaked urban landscape, I am reminded of how fond the surrealists were of sleeping in public. Inspired by Freud, they wanted to bring dreams out of the bedroom and onto the streets. While most of us deem sleep to be a necessary remedy, a state of repair and restoration, the surrealists felt that having to be awake was an unwelcome interruption to sleep. Their greatest wish was to exist in a continual dream state. “I believe in the future resolution of these two states, dream and reality,” wrote Breton, “which are seemingly so contradictory, into a kind of absolute reality, a surrealism.”

In his never-ending search to join these two disparate states, Breton started attending séances, which became required attendance for all aspiring surrealists. During the séances, Breton noticed several of his acolytes nodding off. One in particular, the poet René Crevel, revealed himself as a sleep talker, babbling nonsense in the twilight of consciousness. In Crevel’s dozing, Breton discovered a sort of portable séance, one that could be whisked out of the tomb-like silence of the parlor and dropped into noisy public spaces, inserting the dreamer into the midst of the crowd. From then on, he convinced Crevel to start falling asleep in cafés where, once he was presumed to be fast asleep—there was always some doubt that this was just theater—he was peppered with questions by a circle of awake poets, who transcribed these conversations as the basis for future poems. Breton was delighted with the results: Crevel’s answers were perfectly surreal; his responses never quite matched up with the questions, which he took as direct manifestations culled from the subconscious, a balancing act between wakefulness and sleep.

Rivalries grew among the surrealist poets as to who could be the best public sleeper. Commenting on this, Breton wrote: “Every day they want to spend more time sleeping. Their words, recorded, intoxicate them. Everywhere, anywhere, they fall asleep . . . In the cafés, and amid the beer-glasses, the saucers.” One aspiring sleeper posted a note on his door each night before going to bed that read: THE POET IS WORKING.

Proposing sleepwalking as an optimal widespread societal condition, André Breton once asked, “When will we have sleeping logicians, sleeping philosophers?” It seems the surrealist vision of a dream culture has been fully realized in today’s technologies. We are awash in a new electronic collective unconscious; strapped to several devices, we’re half-awake, half-asleep. We speak on the phone while surfing the web, partially hearing what’s being said to us while simultaneously answering e-mails and checking status updates. I can’t help notice that we’ve become very good at being distracted. Breton would be delighted.
I decide to go for a run. I throw on some shorts and sneakers, strap on some headphones, grab my iPhone, and I’m out the door. When I run I generally don’t set out with a plan. Instead, I let the city take me: the traffic flows and crowds of Manhattan determine where I go. Getting going is always tough at first, but about ten minutes into it, I feel a breakthrough. Some seventies dub—King Tubby, streaming over Spotify—is rolling through my headphones, and I’m starting to get my groove.

As I start to feel the rhythm of the music and the rhythm of the run, good thoughts about the structure of a book I’m working on start to emerge. Wanting to catch them during my run, I take my iPhone out of my pocket, open up the Notes app, click on Siri’s voice recognition, and begin to dictate. My speech is sent over the cell network to a server, where it’s shot back to my phone in the form of text. To most people passing by on the street, I look like any other jerk multitasking. They grimace at me and shake their heads as if to say, “Why can’t you just run? Must you always be tethered to that device, gossiping?” Little do they know that I am actually writing a book.

I’m in a semiconscious state: my feet are moving and my body is sweating. The thoughts are really flowing now, so much so that I almost forget I’m running as I float effortlessly above the pavement on a runner’s high. In addition to the rhythms of the city, my run is determined by my interactions with technology. Every time I click voice recognition, King Tubby is paused. I change the way I speak to accommodate Siri. I want her to be able to recognize everything I’m saying, so I slow down my speech and tend to overpronounce words. I say the word “comma” every time I want to insert a comma and the word “period” every time I want to end a sentence. I say “new paragraph” when I wish to start a new thought. I happily adjust my speech to the constraints of the machine, which is now enmeshed with my heavy breathing and the system of traffic lights on Manhattan’s grid. I pause self-consciously for a moment as I’m describing the way I’m speaking and am embarrassed when I recall a voice message that I left for a friend recently, where I said the words “comma” and “period” just as if I were speaking to Siri.

As I’m running, I’m also throwing off data to the cloud even though I don’t wear a smartwatch or a fitness band. Instead, my phone is tracking every move my body makes and where I am. My Health app shows that I ran 4.49 miles today. In fact, my phone shows me every move I make in five-minute intervals all day long, every day. Today, for instance, from 5:05 to 5:10 P.M., I ran 0.5687 miles, whereas in the next five minutes, I ran 0.4918 miles. The app also shows me that I’ve taken 8,306 steps so far today and that on a typical day in 2015, I took 10,129 steps. And all of this information is stored deep in my privacy settings in the form of maps, which shows me gorgeously rendered visual representations of every single place I’ve been around the world over the past few years, along with the date and time I was there. On top of that, my phone’s GPS is tracking every move I’ve made on this run and how fast I’ve been going. Since I’ve been running mostly in the streets, my data will be fed into the traffic reports on Google Maps. Since Google Maps can’t tell whether I am in a car or running on the streets—to them, I’m just another pulsing GPS—my pathetic running speed will probably skew the results toward gridlock. Of course I am free to turn off these features but they’re so buried I haven’t bothered. I can assume that most of this data, if not all of it, is being sold to marketers and scooped up by government agencies like the NSA.
So my run, which I took to clear my head, is much more complicated than I thought. I’m not just running; I’m throwing off an enormous amount of data, navigating the physical urban landscape, while structuring and writing my book. If I thought I was only doing one thing—running—I would be naïve. Even in my leisure, when strapped to a web-enabled device, I’m furiously multitasking and, in a very positive way, highly distracted.

* * *

Could we say that the act of running or walking in the city is what the act of speech is to language? Could we think of our feet as our mouth, articulating stories as we journey though the urban jungle? And in what ways are these stories written and communicated? When we walk, we trod upon a dense palimpsest of those who have traveled these same sidewalks before us, each inscribing on those pavements their own narratives. In this way, when we walk in the city, we are at once telling our own stories and retelling tales of those who came before us.

Walking the city invokes a text, one that is instantaneously written and read at once. The urbanist philosopher Michel de Certeau says, “They walk—an elementary form of this experience of the city; they are walkers, Wandersmänner, whose bodies follow the thick and thin of an urban ‘text’ they write without being able to read it.” Walking, then, is an act of reading the city with our feet. The city itself is an epic novel: each building a word, each street a sentence, and each block a paragraph. De Certeau’s claim for unreadability is hinged on three facts: the blur of motion, the speed at which the tale is unwinding, and the sheer of immensity of the text. When we speak of hypertexts, we usually mean those that exist online, but we might think of the city as the ur-hypertext, a dynamic, analog, predigital model of complex intertextuality.

In the twenty-first century, the story has entered a fourth dimension of data. As we walk, we emit streams of data, tracking where we’re walking and how we’re walking: how far, how fast, how many calories burned, and so forth. The air above the streets is thick with our narrative transmissions uploading to far-flung server farms where, parsed and analyzed, they reappear on our devices. We walk and we think; we read and we write. The rhythm of our walking influences the pace of our thinking. In a rush, we run/walk/think/read/write frantically and obsessively; at our leisure, casting aside logic, we let our feet instinctually caress the sidewalk’s urban braille. Inspired by the surrealists, the situationists had a technique for urban sleepwalking that they called derive, which literally translates as “drifting.” Their idea was for the dériviste to completely give themselves up to the tugs and flows of the urban street, letting the crowds take them where they will, revealing regions of the city that, in their more “conscious” or “waking” moments, would most likely not have been exposed to. Similarly, when beset by his demons, the painter Willem de Kooning would wander the dark streets of New York for most of the night, walking as far south as Battery Park at the southern tip of the island and then back. Often he went on these prowls alone, but friends occasionally accompanied him. The critic Edwin Denby said, “I can hear his light, tense voice saying as we walked at night, ‘I’m struggling with my picture, I’m beating my brains out, I’m stuck.’” Relieving ourselves of intention, we get unstuck; drifting through the streets with a purposeful aimlessness, we find ourselves reading the city for pleasure.
When we drift through the city device-bound, we are enveloped in our own data storm, similar to the Peanuts cartoon character Pig-Pen, an embodiment of cloud-based computing. As a completely quantified being, each motion he makes—every step and every shake of the head—generates more visible dust. He doesn’t traffic in clods of turf or thick mud. Instead, his dust is atmospheric and crystalline, melding with the air. Like snow, it gently falls on whatever it touches, only to be whisked away just as quickly. He’s a machine; his cloud functions 24/7, continuously spewing billows of dust. Regardless of the weather, his condition remains unaffected; even rainstorms can’t rinse him clean. His is a networked cloud, affecting those who come into contact with him; he himself is a living social network, always eliciting a strong interactive response from those in close proximity to him. Like a Wi-Fi signal in search of a smartphone, dirt finds Pig-Pen. Stepping outside after a bath, in clean clothes, he is immediately coated in dirt, declaring to Charlie Brown: “You know what I am? I’m a dust magnet!”

Wherever Pig-Pen walks, he is met with repulsion. His critics—the entire cast of Peanuts—often accuse him of wallowing in his dirt, of taking a hedonistic pleasure in his condition. They say he’s as self-absorbed and insensitive to others as he is a bastion of filth. But he sees it differently, claiming that he has affixed to him the “dust of countless ages.” Deftly assuaging his critics, he turns the tables on them, forcing them to see value where before they saw none: “Don’t think of it as dust,” he says. “Just think of it as the dirt and dust of far-off lands blowing over here and settling on Pig-Pen! It staggered the imagination! I may be carrying the soil that was trod upon by Solomon or Nebuchadnezzar or Genghis Khan!”

As he moves through the world, he inscribes the contemporary into his cloud, adding the dirt of the day to his already thickly layered historical record. In this, he at once performs the roles geologist, archeologist, and archivist. Like Homer, who transmitted his sagas orally, Pig-Pen is the bearer of a certain historical record, told in his own specific tongue. As an outcast, he assumes the role of the trickster, a figure who, defying normative community-based behavioral standards, is the keeper of a database of deep and secret knowledge. He is at once physical and ephemeral, omnipresent and local, site specific and distributed, time based and atemporal. His cloud is a haze, an ambience, a network that can’t be defined by specific boundaries. It is without beginning and without end: a pulse, a stasis, a skein, a caliphate.

Going against the grain, his self-image is strong. Violet shows him a mirror and tries to humiliate him by asking, “Aren’t you ashamed?” Pig-Pen replies, “On the contrary. I didn’t think I looked this good.”

* * *

A few months later, on a cool autumn evening after work, I’m sauntering down Madison Avenue. I walk lockstep a few paces behind a woman who is thumbing her Facebook page as she languidly ambles. She is oblivious to anything else going on around her, including my shadowing her and looking over her shoulder. Like many of us, she has honed and fine-tuned her peripheral vision to animal strength, stopping with the crowds at corners, waiting for red lights, never looking up. When the lights change, she crosses the street, neither crashing into anyone nor stumbling on a curb. We walk together for about five or six blocks, at which point my attention is drawn to a man stopped dead still in the middle of the sidewalk texting. As a sea of pedestrians flow around him, he doesn’t budge. He just stands there still as a stone. He’s a human piece of street furniture, a public impediment to others—many of whom are also glued to their devices.

Everyone is in their own world, but it would be unfair to say that just because they aren’t interacting with people on the street they’re antisocial. In fact, they’re aggressively social, but their interrelations are geographically distributed. Like sleepwalkers, they’re both present and absent. I’m reminded of how the surrealists’ ideal state for making art was the twilight between wakefulness and sleep, when they would dredge up images from the murky subconscious and poetically juxtapose them on the page or canvas. A few days later, I’m walking down Sixth Avenue with a buddy who almost collides with a digital sleepwalker. “Fucking zombies,” he says, something I often hear used to describe them. He’s right: “zombie” is an accurate way to depict our digital somnambulists. Zombies seem self-motivated, even purposeful, but it’s an illusion. Completely lacking in awareness, zombies don’t make choices. They’re preprogrammed by drive, similar to the way consumers are. In fact, by nature, zombies are insatiable consumers. As reactivated corpses, zombies are living bodies rendered soulless, lobotomized by sorcery (which is itself a kind of programming), automated to consume living flesh.

It’s been said that social media has turned us into ravenous consumerist zombies. Nothing has voracious brand loyalty the way social media does, which keeps us refreshing our feeds the way zombies crave flesh. On August 27, 2015, Facebook reported for the first time that one billion users logged on in a single day—and many of us compulsively log on several times a day. Each time we click like on a status update we add to an already shockingly accurate profile of our consumerist selves—highly valuable information that’s eagerly harvested by the network. Edward Snowden said that if we want to protect ourselves against government agencies scraping our data, we should get off Dropbox, Facebook, and Google and that we should “search for encrypted communication services” because they “enforce your rights.” Few have taken his advice. Zombies can’t be deprogrammed. The social media apparatus beckons us and we become addicted, joining the billion-plus strong for whom a life without social media is an impossibility. Social contacts, dating prospects, job opportunities, communications with loved ones—just about every interaction we have—flows through social media. For most of us it isn’t a choice; it’s a necessity. Even Snowden couldn’t resist: on October 6, 2015, he joined Twitter.

Much of the web itself has been colonized by zombies that automatically churn pages, entice us to click on them, sometimes phishing for passwords, other times accumulating page views to generate ad revenue. At the same time, spiders—another type of zombie—crawl the web and consume all they can, indiscriminately sucking up files. Casting the widest net possible, they trawl data, passwords, and media that are warehoused in distant servers with the hopes of salvaging something of value, ultimately to be resold by yet more zombies. Every move we make on the web is tracked, transforming our digital peregrinations into data sets. Truly, our online lives—intersections of flesh and machine—are daily feasts of extreme digital consumption.

The zombies in George Romero’s 1978 film Dawn of the Dead, were also hyperconsumers. Descending on a suburban shopping mall, they’re doing all the things shoppers normally do—wandering aimlessly through the aisles, pushing their brimming carts to the piped-in strains of Muzak. A swarm of individuals who are unaware of each other, they act entirely out of self-interest. They are driven by the fierce desire to consume, in this case, the flesh of the living humans who have barricaded themselves inside the mall and who have also fallen prey to the dazzling array of products in this depopulated mall, all free for the taking. As much as the zombies have no real use for the consumer goods overflowing their shopping carts, neither do the humans. Trapped indoors, they can’t play golf with their new shiny clubs or go anywhere fabulous in their recently liberated couture. Yet both—the humans and the zombies—are consumed by the act of consumption. And the human consumers may themselves ultimately be consumed—literally eaten—by the hyperzombie consumers.

Zombies replicate virally. Similar to the metrics of our social media accounts—your number of Twitter followers moves strongly in one direction—their numbers are always gaining in strength. Their power is in numbers: the more of them there are, the more powerful they are. Our power is also in numbers: the more followers we have, the more powerful we are. When we gain a follower, we don’t gain a person; we gain a metric. And yet, many of our followers might in fact truly be zombies or bots—programs on a network that often appear to act and interact like humans—who follow us so we’ll follow them back. A trick to swell our ranks is to buy followers, acquiring legions of zombies who will do our consuming on our behalf. Romero’s zombie shoppers may have filled their shopping carts with stuff but they can’t use it the same way you can’t use all the data you download. However, someone else can: our computers are invaded by agents that turn them into zombies as part of a botnet—a swarm of bots—performing nefarious deeds without us even knowing it.

We are the walking dead, passive-aggressive, human-machine hybrids who are under the illusion that we’re in control. But it’s not that simple. We are collaborators with the zombies: sometimes wittingly, other times coercively, but always codependently. We are at once identified and self-identified with them, which might not be such a bad thing because the apparatus through which all of this flows—the network—is the ultimate zombie. The network appears to be more resilient than the waves of global epidemics and terrorism that continually engulf us. In spite of extremism, wars, mass migration, climate change, and market meltdowns in which fragile human bodies are decimated, our robust networks remain unbreakable in ways that bodies aren’t.

* * *

A great inspiration for the dreamy surrealists was the nineteenth-century flaneur, an idle man-about-town who was the opposite of the zombie. Like a dériviste (the situationists also claimed the flaneur as a predecessor), he roamed the city alone, allowing himself to be pulled by the flows of the crowds on the grand boulevards. With no goal in mind, he was a spectator of the urban landscape, viewing the goings-on from the shadowy sidelines. Whereas the zombie was obsessed with consuming, the flaneur assiduously avoided it, feeling that to buy something would be too participatory. Instead, he was a world-class window-shopper, haunting enclosed arcades and narrow winding streets, browsing the displays. His was a stance of studied ambivalence. When asked about a certain topic of the day, he would feign indifference and recuse himself by simply saying, “I don’t know” or “I don’t care.” The flaneur exemplified a position that Roland Barthes called “the neutral,” wherein one intentionally places oneself in a state of uncertainty or indecision—living in a state between states—like sleepwalkers, ghosts, vampires, androids, and androgynous persons. (He was always conceptualized as a “he,” since during the nineteenth century, women were not able to walk around the city with the same freedom as men.) Neutrality was at the heart of the flaneur’s resistance; fiercely individualistic, he resisted any attempts to be programmed or enlisted to join movements or groups. Uninterested in power, he was bereft of the kind of hungry desire that drives consumers and zombies.

The flaneur is hardwired into the ethos of the Internet: we “browse” the web with our “browsers,” “surfing” from site to site, voyeuristically “lurking” from the sidelines. The digital flaneur obsessively frequents comments streams but doesn’t dare leave a comment; he browses the great online shops and bazaars but doesn’t buy anything; he googles strangers but his online profile is studiously all but invisible. He is a peripatetic digital wanderer, pulled by the tugs and flows of his feeds, carelessly clicking from one spectacle to the next. Instagram is his Louvre, YouTube his Ziegfeld.

The flaneur has a buzzing, hovering presence, at once visible and unnoticed, not unlike the dozens of Wi-Fi networks crowded into the air we breathe. He is an embodiment of Marcel Duchamp’s concept of the infrathin—a state between states. When asked to define the infrathin, Duchamp claimed it couldn’t be defined, only described: “the warmth of a seat (which has just been left)” or “Velvet trousers / their whistling sound (in walking) by / brushing of the 2 legs is an / infrathin separation signaled / by sound.” The infrathin is the lingering warmth of piece of paper just after it emerges from the laser printer or the chiming start-up sound the computer makes, signifying its transition from death to life. When composer Brian Eno was commissioned to compose the Windows 95 start-up sound, he had to fulfill the requirements that it be “optimistic, futuristic, sentimental, emotional.” He did that and more, coming up with a three-and-a-quarter-second pocket symphony. Eno, an artist familiar with Duchamp, invented an infrathin genre, “ambient music”—a hovering static music that is barely noticeable—which he intended to act as little more than an atmospheric perfume or tint to a room. The whooshing sound my e-mail program makes when I hit Send or the click of the shutter my smartphone makes when I take a picture are similarly displaced infrathin moments. These noises are signifiers of an event that in some ways happened and in other ways didn’t happen. My mail was sent, silently and invisibly, and my photo was taken, but not in the way that I heard it. These series of contradictory events happening simultaneously—compatible and disjunctive, logical and absurd, present and absent, real and artificial—are evidence of ways in which the infrathin permeates our online lives.

The flaneur died with the birth of the department store. A creature of the boutiques, arcades, and streets, he felt unwelcome in the controlled confines of the big-box shops. His stage taken from him, the flaneur ceased to be. As the web becomes more commercial, I find I do less wandering than I used to. The web is now so riddled with zombies and their foul culture—clickbait, spam, ads—that I tend to return again and again to the few sites I know and trust. And even when I do, say, click to a site from a Facebook link, I find myself closing that window and returning to Facebook to seek another for fear that I, too, might become contaminated. Years ago, I might’ve hung around, exploring that site, drilling down to see what else was there, but today, the lure of social media draws me in over and over again, filling me with nostalgic sadness to witness my digital flaneur hovering on the verge of extinction.

* * *
Many lament the passing of the book’s physicality. They are nostalgic for its smell, the sound of flipping pages, or the habit of dog-earing a page. But reading the web has a different type of physicality than reading on the printed page. When I click on a link, I literally press down on language, something that never happens when I’m reading a book. I find that when I read a web page, I tend to nervously mouse over the words I’m reading, highlighting them, pawing and dragging them around as I read. Sometimes when I read a book, if I’m reading really carefully, I’ll run a finger over the words I’m reading; it’s a surface engagement, which never actually transforms the words I’m reading, unlike when I highlight those same words with a yellow highlighter pen, physically altering them. Yet now when I highlight words on my iPad, I do so with the tip of my index finger. Same when I sign a tablet for a credit card charge with my finger. Relieving the need for an intermediary utensil, my flesh directly creates or alters words. In what way is this not physical? Even the resizing of images, which I do with my forefinger and thumb, physicalizes the way I interact with visual media, bringing to mind a popular YouTube video of a young child crying with frustration as she tries to enlarge a photograph in a print magazine by frantically moving her fingers back and forth.

We create the digital world in our own image. In this way, we can think of the web as a body double. With every click, we penetrate its flesh; with every bit of text we “cut,” we incise its corpus. Page views are, after all, sometimes referred to as “impressions” or “hits” marking this body. The data trails we leave on it are inscribed, marked, and tracked, engraved in browser histories, clouds, and databases, like tattoos on that body. Attempts to cleanse that body range from plastic surgery for surface blemishes to invasive surgery to root out virally spreading cancers by companies such as reputation.com, whose slogan is: “We believe individuals and businesses have the right to control how they look online”. In the European Union, one may exercise one’s right to be forgotten, which allows you to have documents, recordings, or images of yourself scrubbed from the web so search engines don’t index you, making you physically present and virtually absent, in essence, rendering you infrathin.

This sense of being in-between—being at once digital and physical—has spawned a reassessment of the relationship of our bodies to meatspace, the earthbound equivalent of cyberspace. There was a time when the divide between being online and off was clear. It used to be that when I was online, I was sitting at my desk, tied to a computer. During that time, I was clearly online. When I was done, I’d shut down my computer and take a walk around the block, being clearly offline. Today, I don’t leave my house without a device; I’m still online when I take my walk around the block, smartphone in hand, at once straddling the physical and the virtual. In those days, the future appeared to be either/or. Either you were going to be spending time in sealed-off worlds like Second Life or Virtual Reality or you’d be offline. Now wearable computing, mobile media, and Augmented Reality have reinscribed our bodies back into our physical settings, while we remain, at the same time, online. This intersection of the digital world and the physical has been driving the new aesthetic, a catchphrase cum art movement that was coined by the British designer James Bridle in 2011. No longer content to live exclusively on the screen, memes, images, and ideas born of digital culture are infiltrating and expressing themselves in meatspace. Think of digital pixelated camouflage as an example or a T-shirt with the dancing baby meme printed on it. This slight warping of reality, at once familiar and disconcerting, represents a shift in the ways we might process aesthetics much the same way Warhol’s soup cans did, prompting author Bruce Sterling to comment: “Look at those images objectively. Scarcely one of the real things in there would have made any sense to anyone in 1982, or even in 1992. People of those times would not have known what they were seeing with those New Aesthetic images.”

With technologies like augmented reality, geography itself has become unhinged from any singular verifiable, stable state, instead subjected to remixes and whimsical interpretations, overwashed with data-hazed layers of subjectivity, proposing the landscape itself as a series of collage elements to be repurposed and reconfigured. Standing in front of my apartment building on West Twenty-Sixth Street in New York City and looking at it through an AR app, I view not only the history of the building, a biography of the architect who built it, and the city records attached to it, but also a wealth of unofficial crowdsourced data lobbed on top of it: personal stories of births, deaths, breakups, love affairs, and memories. I can view photographs of these ghostly protagonists as readily as I can call up old pictures of the building. On top of this—if I’m using the unpaid version of the app—I’m seeing a stream of geogenerated advertising associated with my neighborhood: “Hill Country at 30 West Twenty-Sixth Street serves the best Texas-style ribs in the city” and “Duane Reade at Sixth Avenue and Twenty-Seventh Street is having a sale on shaving supplies today.”

In this way, the twenty-first century itself feels both visible and invisible; the surface of things alone might be the wrong place to look. Instead, the physical mixed with the unseen—the infrathin—as expressed by those tiny devices in our hands or the thick data haze that permeates the air we breathe, is what locates us in the present. And in this way, the collapse of online and physical space functions as a marker, a moment that informs us that culture—along with its means of production and reception—has radically shifted beneath our feet while we were looking elsewhere.

* * *

The city streets, with their complex interplay of wakefulness and sleep, are rife with surrealism. Sometimes we barrel down the sidewalks apace, clinging to our devices; other times we meander slowly weaving in and out of the traffic flow as we stare down at our screens in a waking dream state. And yet, in the midst of the hustle and bustle, there are people actually sleeping in the teeming urban landscape around us. It’s late at night, I’m walking down Broadway, and there, in a huge plateglass window facing the street, is a night watchman sound asleep. I stand directly in front of him—there’s literally only a few millimeters of glass separating us—which is making my wife very uncomfortable. I ask her why and she responds, “You might wake him.” I reply, “But he’s sleeping, on display in public.” Encased in glass, and looking very peaceful, he feels unwakable. It strikes me that the proportions of the glass, similar to a computer screen, have rendered him two-dimensional. Backlit, he looks like he’s been flattened into a JPEG. The reflective surface of the glass and the flatness of the guard is creating a buzzy cognitive dissonance, making me feel as if I’m in the stylized world of Grand Theft Auto rather than on the gritty streets of New York. I snap a photo of him on my device. Gazing at the JPEG I just took, I see that he is now literally flattened into an image. I walk away from the scene with him in my pocket.
My wife’s anxiety arises from the delicate play of public and private that happens on the streets of a crowded city. Walking down Fifth Avenue with a friend, we speak openly and loudly as if we were ambling down an isolated country lane. Yet many of us love to eavesdrop on these conversations, walking two steps in front or behind listening to these strangers’ narratives unwind block after block. We do the same with people shouting into hands-free headsets. Once, the only people who spoke to themselves were drunks; today, armies of people spout great soliloquies whilst traversing the sidewalks.

Sleeping in public is an odd gesture. "Odd gestures of any kind are automatically taken as a threat," writes Paul Auster of urban life. "Talking out loud to yourself, scratching your body, looking someone directly in the eye: these deviations can trigger off hostile and sometimes violent reactions from those around you. You must not swagger or swoon, you must not clutch the walls, you must not sing, for all forms of spontaneous or involuntary behavior are sure to elicit stares, caustic remarks, and even an occasional shove or kick in the shins." Or else they’re met with indifference, marking a person as crazy and dangerous; any interaction with them is a potentially unpredictable. Our sprawling homeless population exudes a mixture of passivity and aggression: they sleep, sprawled out on curbs, in our midst; yet they panhandle those same corners. With the combination of these gestures, they pose a double threat, causing us to walk by them as if they’re invisible. Addressing a packed house at Madison Square Garden, Pope Francis said, “In big cities, beneath the roar of traffic, beneath the rapid pace of change, so many faces pass by unnoticed because they have no ‘right’ to be there, no right to be part of the city... These people stand at the edges of our great avenues, in our streets in deafening anonymity.” The oxymoronic term “deafening anonymity” has echoes of Eno’s ambient music (unheard music) and Duchamp’s infrathin (unnoticed phenomena), which accurately describes the homeless as flickering between two states, at once painfully visible and conveniently invisible.

I enter a subway car and see a man who is sound asleep. He’s not laying down, but is sprawled across a few seats. He is emitting no odor and is dressed in reasonably clean clothes. He’s neither sleep talking nor mumbling; he’s just laying perfectly still, with the exception of his head, which sways in tandem with the jerks of the subway car. This is not a dangerous man; it is a sleeping man. Although the car is crowded, nobody will get near him. Oddly enough, almost everyone is huddled in the opposite end of the car, glued to their devices, replete with earbuds, in a state Breton would certify as being properly asleep (surrealistically speaking). While there are many seats available next to where the guy who is actually sleeping, the walking dead appear to have no desire to be anywhere near the authentic sleeper. I look at both parties and feel that in their own ways they each dreamily navigate the city in “deafening anonymity.”

Sometimes I go to a big Korean spa in Queens. It’s a wonderful lively place, filled with various pools and saunas. On weekends, it’s particularly crowded, packed with families: noisy children shriek with joy as they run from one water feature to another. Amid the noise and chaos is a public sleeping area that is separated from the cafeteria only by a low sheetrock barrier. It’s a large area, strewn with dozens of bodies of all sexes and ages, mostly clad in shorts, T-shirts, and bathing suits, all sound asleep. It’s always very crowded, with sleepers cheek to jowl, lying perfectly still. In the midst of life, it’s always surreal and lovely to see those in lost in dream space among the waking.
It’s past midnight, on our way home after seeing the sleeping guard in the window display, when I decide to invade someone’s personal space. A woman is standing outside a bar texting. The street is empty and I slowly approach, staring down at my phone. I zombie walk slowly toward her. I can feel her spying me out of her peripheral vision but she doesn’t budge. I move closer. She stays where she is until I’m almost literally shoulder to shoulder with this total stranger. In times past, she might’ve been scared, or moved away, or called the cops. But now, with our devices in hands, she senses that I am no threat; zombies don’t fear other zombies. She knows I am one of her own, much more interested in consuming my device than I am in consuming her.
Chapter 3: Our Browser History Is the New Memoir

The surrealists’ had a technique of constructing literature that they called “automatic writing,” in which the poet or novelist sat down and, without conscious thought, put pen to paper and just started writing. The hand wrote, with the writer unaware of the meaning of what was being written. The hand continued to write on its own. Soon enough, if the writer were truly able to let go, the words would flow from deep within the subconscious to the page. Words always have meaning, the surrealists reasoned, so if you could give up intention, meaning would remain, but perhaps differently than you intended.

They borrowed the term from nineteenth century spiritualists who, channeling voices of the dead, transcribed words they received. The most famous automatic writer was an American named Pearl Curran, who in 1913, began receiving messages on her Ouija board from a seventeenth century British spirit named Patience Worth. Curran would sit in front of her Ouija board and, letter by letter, receive Worth’s thoughts, which she would then set forth on paper. The missives began coming so quickly that Curran could no longer keep up. Moving away from the board, she found she was able to summon Worth all the same without the apparatus and, from that time on, she would simply sit and copy out Worth’s words—first with pencil and later with a typewriter—which spontaneously appeared in her mind. By the time she concluded her channeling, she produced a body of literature of over 400,000 words.

Echoes of both the surrealists and spiritualists can be found in the frozen sounds episode of Rabelais’s Gargantua and Pantagruel (1532), where a battle takes place in a setting so cold that the sounds themselves freeze and fall to the ground. There they lay silently until the springtime when they begin to thaw. As the sun heats them, they melt willy-nilly out of order, creating a cacophony of nonsensical sounds. Most of the words and ideas on the Web, too, are frozen into deep storage awaiting use, thawed when called upon by search engine queries. The mathematician Charles Babbage (1791–1871) theorized the air itself as a huge remote storage device, not unlike the way we think of the cloud, as “one vast library, on whose pages are for ever written all that man has ever said or man whispered.” The problem with Babbage’s model is that those words weren’t downloadable. Tapping a query into a Google search is like tapping a query into Babbage’s air except that all words and ideas imprinted upon it are not only stored but instantaneously recallable on demand.

A fusion of human and machine, we could even think of the Ouija board itself as an analog Internet, with the board as interface, the planchette as mouse, and the spirit world as the network, interfacing through the user’s body. The Ouija board works by amplifying mental thoughts and tiny movements of the human muscular system through the planchette. Known as the ideomotor phenomenon, it’s the sort of thing that happens when you extend your arm with a weighted string dangling from your finger. Just thinking of circles will cause your hand to move slightly in a circular fashion which, in turn, will cause the weight to circle in an exaggerated, visible way. Similarly, when we use a mouse, our micro-movements are amplified, both on the screen (the movements of the mouse) and through the network (when we use that mouse to hit send). Texts and emails similarly materialize on our screens out of thin air, as does, say, the downloading and printing out of a PDF into a stack of paper.

Could we think of our web browsing as another type of automatic writing? As we drift from site to site, our peregrinations are literally inscribed in our browser history. This is purely automatic writing, writing that writes itself. Let’s say, I’m doing research for an article I’ve been writing for the past week or so. It’s been a struggle to find just the right bits and pieces that will make the article really fly. Suddenly, I remember a line from something I read on the web a few days ago that just might be the thing I’m looking for. I try to google it, but the idea is rather germane and the words used to describe it are ordinary. The search gives me pages of results that aren’t getting me anywhere. Suddenly, I have an idea: check my browser history. I crack it open, and after much scrolling, I locate exactly the page I was looking for. But as I’m scrolling through my history, I’m seeing my entire week flash before my eyes. It’s a little bit embarrassing but there’s my entire life—everything I was thinking about, curious about, angry about, desiring of—laid out before me. I had forgotten about most of this stuff—recipes for dinners that were never made, a pair of shoes that turned out to be too expensive, and a subsequent search to try to find them cheaper. I see the people who I stalked on Facebook, the videos I watched on Vimeo, and was embarrassed by how many times over the course of a week I self-googled. Since I spend so much of my time online, I was able to reconstruct pretty much my entire week in the most granular way. Can we think of our browser history as the new memoir, one that is being written automatically, effortlessly, unconsciously? If you want to know anything about me, what I was thinking, what I was interested in, exactly what I did or was going to do, check out my browser history: my passions, my hatreds, my crushes, my hopes—my intellectual and emotional life—all there before me, going back years and years, in all its embarrassment and all its riches.

My search history is astonishingly detailed: last Friday, between 11:00 A.M. and noon, for instance, it shows that I looked at forty-two different pages. And if I strung them together, I could literally reconstruct exactly what I was doing, what I was thinking about, and the associative patterns that my thoughts took during that hour. And that’s just the time I was at my laptop. Chrome shows me my mobile browsing history from my phone and iPad as well, so not a click is missing. GMail keeps an exact record of every correspondence I’ve had and social media tracks everything I’ve said, liked, or commented on. If I add the dozens of SMS messages I sent during that hour, then taken as a whole, I could reconstruct a fairly accurate self-portrait. And even if there were gaps, just glancing at a web page inscribed in my history can spark a chain of memories, enabling me to recollect thought patterns and reconstruct memories.

Buddhist meditators use a technique that they call mental noting. As each emotion arises, they give it a name: fear, excitement, sadness. They also assign names to sensations: coolness, warmth, pressure. They feel that naming things anchors the emotions, keeping the meditator in the present. It also helps distance themselves from the pull of those emotions so that they don’t take on too much power, overwhelming the placidness of meditation. Noting is a way of making visible what is normally invisible, making something ephemeral concrete. Our browser history is doing exactly that and going further by not only naming, but also time-stamping and archiving these fleeting traces of data.

Our browser history could also be seen as a scrapbook, a textual and visual travelogue. Fifty years ago, William S. Burroughs began using scrapbooks as mnemonic devices for his writing. When he read something in the newspaper that reminded him of something he’d written, he’d clip it and paste it into a scrapbook alongside the words from his book. Sometimes, when he’d be walking down the street and see a scene that reminded him of something he wrote, he’d take a picture of it, scrapbooking the photo alongside his text. He said, “I do a lot of exercises in what I call time travel, in taking coordinates, such as what I photographed on the train, what I was thinking about at the time, what I was reading and what I wrote; all of this to see how completely I can project myself back to that one point in time.” Like surrealist techniques, the juxtaposition of related but disparate items were enough to kick off chains of richly associative thoughts and memories in Burroughs’s mind.

Echoes of these ideas—digital and analog—can be found in two famous books written between the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that are, in form and content, uncannily reminiscent of obsessive blogs or on active social media streams. One is the Diary of Samuel Pepys which was composed while Pepys was living in London, where he spent nine years—from 1660 to 1669—writing down every detail of his life and times. The diary totaled more than a million words and it’s the best account of what it was like to live day to day in the seventeenth century; reading it can transport you back three centuries. While it gives firsthand accounts of historical events such as the Great Plague and the Great Fire of London, it’s also rife with juicy illicit personal details—many of which were enciphered using a shorthand mashup of several foreign languages—such as gossiping about friends and chasing women. The other book that gives us similarly granular details of the life and times in which he lived is James Boswell’s biography, The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., a massive tome that is an accumulation of bits and pieces of the quotidian ephemera: letters, observations, patches of dialogue, and descriptions of daily life. Begun in 1763, when Johnson was fifty-four years old, it’s not really a complete life of Johnson, but rather an intimate portrait of him over his final twenty-one years.

During that period, Johnson became great friends with a woman named Hester Thrale, who was half his age and had an intelligence to match his own. Though their relationship stayed platonic, Boswell became jealous of their friendship. Seven years after Johnson died, Boswell published his massive biography—my edition is more than 1,500 pages long—and when Thrale got her hands on the book, she was shocked by just how wrong Boswell got it. In her copy of the book, she started scribbling corrections and comments in the margins, such as [ absurd! ] or [ I don’t recollect that ] and [ Johnson would not have liked to hear this of himself ]. By the time it was over, there were thousands of comments and annotations by Thrale in her copies of the book, which she turned into a small handmade edition, by obsessively scribbling marginal notes in one copy of a book after another, never changing her annotations from one copy to the next. Upon her death, her many copies were disbursed. One of them made its way to Boston and into the hands of poet Amy Lowell who, along with her pals, would spend nights howling with laughter at Thrale’s bitchy comments. Thrale’s trolling of Boswell is reminiscent, both in tone and combativeness, of the flame wars that erupt in web comment streams, and her self-publishing of her annotated editions was analog print on demand.

Can you imagine, were it possible, seeing Johnson’s or Pepys’s browser history? The weaving of small details into an account of a life was based on selective memory and subjective bias—as was pointed out by Mrs. Thrale—yet it’s these exact qualities that give these works their eccentric literary charm. I excitedly think of the potential of a modern-day Boswell or Pepys scraping browser histories into a literary biography or memoir. Similarly, might we imagine Facebook as a grand experiment in collective cultural autobiography? For future sociologists, historians, and artists, social networking provides in detail a portrait of a civilization at a moment in time on a scale previously unimaginable in all its glory, and, truth be told, in all its ugliness.

In the early days of the Internet before social media, one of my students e-mailed himself things he wanted to remember. It could’ve been anything as mundane as a pair of sneakers he liked to a profound philosophical insight. Over the years, he never looked at these e-mails but he kept sending them to himself nonetheless. For his final project in my class, he went back to the first year he had done this and scraped all those e-mails, laid them out in a page-design program, and had a print-on-demand book made of them. He called it Notes to Myself While the book wasn’t interesting to anyone but himself, he cherished it as a diary, a physical embodiment of a time gone by, created with little effort or intention. His plan is to print out every year of those e-mails and collect them into a master set, one volume per year, a massive work of automatic autobiography. This furious accumulation of detail and data, from a creative point of view, is reason to celebrate.
The vast amount of the web’s language is perfect raw material for literature. Disjunctive, compressed, decontextualized, cut and pastable, and, most important, archivable, it’s easily reassembled into works of art.

* * *

It’s a beautiful early summer evening and a group of us are sipping wine on a terrace with a dramatic view overlooking the Adriatic Sea on the Dalmatian Coast. It’s dark and I can see the outline of the town below us hugging the rocky coastline, articulated by strings of streetlights. In the distance I can make out the dark shapes of mountains that melt into the sea as thousands of stars dot the ink-black sky. The various members of our group are chatting, drinking, and texting when suddenly, a giant peachy-yellow moon crests over the mountains in the distance. It’s stunning and the group goes silent as the moon quickly starts to rise—except for one guy, who is glued to his phone, deep in a text conversation with his girlfriend. Our eyes keep moving from the moon and then back to this guy. We can’t believe he’s absorbed in his phone instead of being absorbed in the spectacular scene unfolding before our eyes. We’re taking the ancient poet Basho’s stance: “A haiku is like a finger pointing to the moon / If the finger is bejeweled, we no longer see the moon.” And he’s taking Marinetti’s stance: “Let’s murder the moonshine.” Finally, someone calls him out on it, to which he responds, “I can see the moon anytime, but this is the only time I can be having this conversation.”

His remark gives me pause. He’s right. Why is looking at the moon somehow perceived to be more “present” than looking at your phone? A specific text conversation happens only once, whereas natural phenomena, while they don’t always happen in such an extraordinary way as that moon, are recurrent; wait around long enough and you’ll see another spectacular moonrise. It struck me that as much as we were in the moment, so was he. Our moment wasn’t better because it was natural; it was simply different. It brings to mind an article I read about the practice of mindfulness, which stated, “Mindfulness in its original Buddhist tradition is not about being able to stare comfortably at your computer for hours on end, or get ‘in the zone’ . . . it’s about gaining insight into the human condition.” But don’t programmers get in the “flow state” all the time, spending hours in the hyperpresent?
One stray thought can lead to a wrong keystroke, botching a program. I know typesetters, graphic designers, painters, musicians, and illustrators who are similarly mindful. In fact, it’s hard to think of anyone deeply involved in work in front of a computer who isn’t starting at a screen and completely in the moment. In regard to our texting friend, how is using a piece of technology to have a deep conversation with someone you love not insightful to the human condition?

Being fully present in the moment is what happens every time you load a web page. Web pages don’t exist: they are spontaneously assembled at a split second’s notice upon a click. They appear for a moment, then dissipate once that window is closed until called on again. A web page is comprised of a series of disparate codes from various places—sometimes on the same server, other times pulled from distant geographic locations—which pull images, RSS feeds, CSS, style sheets, and other bits of code to form a temporary constellation, which appears in your browser as a unified page. On dynamic sites—such as social media or news sites—those constellations are refreshed often, becoming fully new sometimes within seconds. The idea of a “dialectical constellation” comes from Walter Benjamin, who theorized that in order to study history we’ve got to be able to freeze a complex and dynamic stream of systems into a still moment. When this happens, he calls it a “constellation”: “It’s not that what is past casts its light on what is present, or what is present its light on what is past; rather what has been comes together in a flash with the now to form a constellation” — which is a pretty good description of what happens when you click on a link, causing a web page to be spontaneously assembled. Similarly the Dada poet Raoul Hausmann wrote in his 1920 “Manifesto of PREsentism”: “To compress all the possibilities, all the givens of every second into a tangible energy. Wisdom. Eternity is nothing. Let’s seize each second today!”

Benjamin also wrote that “memory is not an instrument for exploring the past but its theater.” If memory is but a stage set for events that once happened but can never be accurately and realistically recalled, then those props populating the stage must be stored somewhere after the play has ended. That space, in the twenty-first century, is the web. Ceding vast tracts of our memory to the web in the form of photographs, videos, and status updates that never vanish, we’ve created memory banks in finer detail than our brains are capable of conjuring. With the birth of hyperrealistic memory (a version of total recall through documentation) comes the death of poetic license and selective memory, upon which some of the greatest works of Western civilization—Proust and Nabokov come to mind—are built. Instead, in a time of information surplus, we find ourselves in a condition of “directed forgetting,” the selective forgetting of outdated or irrelevant information in order to clear space for encoding new information on our brain’s hard drive. Like a surveillance cam, information is being scrubbed as quickly as it is being written, keeping us in an eternal state of Hausmannian presentism.

Many decry the loss of “real time” to capturing moments on-screen, claiming that the recording of memories as they happen threatens to replace the actual memories you have of that moment. I’ve read many articles in which parents bemoan the fact their kids were seeing family vacations through GoPro cameras, rather than actually living them. After a day on the ski slopes, they edit their raw footage into action-packed greatest moments and post it to social media, where it’s shared and commented on by their friends, hyperextending their time on the mountain. For a generation raised on reality TV to be able to replay those moments over and over through a mediated interface is a way of reliving an eternal present, loved for a moment then replaced by the next day’s upload. In this way, we’re simultaneously archiving and forgetting: archiving because we continuously upload media, and forgetting because we rarely go back to visit what we have uploaded. Today’s upload is the best upload and keeps us very much present and mindful in the here and now.

The fear of outsourcing our memory to the web—known as “digital amnesia”—has ancient echoes. Plato was apprehensive about the transition from spoken language to the written word. He was fearful that those who wrote would stop exercising their memory and become forgetful; they’d rely on externalized graphical notation instead of their innate capacity to remember things. He derided writing as a pharmakon or substitute, a cheap imitation of speaking. As a result of writing, he feared knowledge would become information. Since there was no individual there to speak it—and speak for it—writing would literally dehumanize wisdom. Speech, Plato felt, was high resolution and required full presence, whereas writing was low resolution and depended on absence. Memory was internal, writing external; speech carried the essence of knowledge, writing its appearance; spoken words were living, written marks were lifeless. We see similar fears in the digital age. Studies show that most people happily use the web as an online extension of their brains, and of those surveyed, half admit their smartphones are stand-ins for their memory.

Freud theorized rewritable memory when in 1925 he used a child’s toy he called the “Mystic Writing Pad” as a metaphor for the way human consciousness is structured. The pad consists of three layers: on the top there is a sheet of plastic, beneath there is a sheet of paper, and finally at the bottom there is a layer of wax. When you write on the plastic with a stylus, an impression is made both on the paper and on the waxy tablet. When you lift the paper up, the writing vanishes from it, but an impression is permanently embedded in the wax. Freud used this schema as a metaphor for how memory works: the stylus is the stimuli from the outside world, the two layers of plastic and paper are layers of consciousness, and the waxy bottom is the unconscious, where impressions are stored. Taken as an allegory for the digital age, the stylus is a metaphor for the material we’re downloading (data), the paper and plastic are our data being currently used (random access memory or RAM), and the wax layer is the deep storage (read-only memory or ROM) of our hard drives or cloud computing, invisible but able to be recalled on command. The paper and plastic memories are dynamic and rewritable, while the wax is accumulative.

There are two seemingly contradictory temporal metrics happening on the web: the archival and the hyperpresent. How many times have we cynically noted that someone has shared something we’d already seen posted a month, a week, a day, or even an hour ago? Social media’s architecture insists that everything always stays new. Facebook’s web interface turns every link, literally, into a newspaper headline. A feature photograph is captioned by a headline in large serif type, reminiscent of Times Roman, underneath which is a line of descriptive text in a smaller sans serif font. Below that, in all caps, but with a lighter font, is the name of the website. The entire link is bounded by a thin, one-pixel rule, making it feel just like an item in a newspaper. The result of this is that every link posted to Facebook, no matter how big or small, trivial or important, gives the sense that it’s breaking news: Bored Panda has the identical visual weight and import as the Washington Post online. Social media’s genius is its leveling quality: every voice has the same volume and every link is an urgent call to action. It keeps us glued: blink for a moment and you might miss something important.

The faster things get, the slower they become. In the midst of this dynamism, we are simultaneously archiving elements of each page in our browser’s cache. Similarly, when I’m reading on a device, every move I make—from my “page turns” to the speed at which I’m reading—is tracked and sent to a database, converting the fleeting experience of reading into something quantified. Automated spiders are also reading the web, silently and continuously. For them—the most voracious readers in history—reading is literally archiving as they indiscriminately index every word without ever “reading” any of it. The ecology of the web teeters on cusp of the hyperpresent and the eternal: Just think of the legions of sites built for now-expired academic conference or weddings that long ago ended in divorce that linger, visited only by the occasional spider.

While we have the illusion that things are speeding up, they’ve actually reached a point of stasis, of stillness. The technology theorist Paul Virilio claims that “there is a definite relationship between inertia and absolute speed which is based on the stasis which results from absolute speed. Absolute stasis leads—potentially—to absolute stasis.” When the speed of information moves at the speed of light, as it has with our fiber optic networks, accelerationism has bumped up against its speed limit, thereby ceasing to be accelerationist. Instead, it is static, signifying the end of the technological narrative of speed and the inevitable beginning of another: entropy.

Chapter 4: Archiving Is the New Folk Art

Of all the things known about Andy Warhol, the fact that he curated a show called Raid the Icebox 1 at the Rhode Island School of Design Museum in Providence in 1969 is one of the more obscure. In fact, combing my shelf of books by and about Warhol (twenty-eight in total), there’s not a single mention of it. It’s strange because, living his life as a celebrity under the glare of the media, not a moment was otherwise missed.

Back in the 1960s, Warhol traveled in wealthy circles and his great patrons John and Dominique de Menil had strong connections to the RISD Museum’s young director, Daniel Robbins. While trying to raise some funds for the museum, Robbins gave the de Menils a tour of the museum’s vast storage spaces, where they were wowed by the treasures that were languishing far from the public’s view. Many of the objects were in poor condition and so they hatched a fund-raising scheme, which involved inviting a hip artist into the storerooms to curate a show. The artist they chose was Andy Warhol. They had no idea what they were getting into. In short, it was a total disaster.

Warhol treated the museum as if he were on a shopping spree at a flea market, grabbing everything he could—shoes, umbrellas, blankets, baskets, chairs, paintings, pottery—and then casually displaying them in the museum. The paintings were stacked on top of each other the way they are in a thrift shop; the antique shoes were crammed into cabinets, vaguely resembling Imelda Marcos’s closet; the nineteenth-century parasols were hung from the ceiling, looking like a cross between slumbering bats and a surrealist assemblage; gorgeous colonial chairs were piled atop each other like in a cafeteria about to be cleaned; colorful Navajo blankets were stacked on top of a cheap table as if they were in a department store, with the cardboard boxes they came in shoved beneath the table. And that’s just the beginning.
The museum’s curatorial staff was offended by what they perceived to be Warhol’s irreverence in handling their treasures. They saw his choices as indiscriminately lazy and his presentation as preposterous. What’s more, Warhol demanded that only fake paintings be shown. “If that’s real,” he said, pointing to a Cézanne still life, “we won’t take it.” They thought Warhol was truly the ignoramus his public persona pretended to be. Hindsight is twenty-twenty. Over the next forty-five years, the art world would mold itself to Warhol’s vision, celebrating commodities, the market, and consumer excess. His own studio work also explored excess: Why make only one Brillo box when the supermarket has a stack? Why paint only one portrait of Ethel Scull when you can charge her for thirty-six? To a poor kid from the Pittsburgh slums, more was always better. And after Warhol’s death, more was what they found in his Upper East Side townhouse, which was crammed to the gills with unopened boxes of coats, watches, diamonds, rugs—you name it—piled up in rooms so stuffed you could barely enter them. In 1988, a year after he died, all of Warhol’s possessions were laid out for all to see on huge tables at Sotheby’s in New York: the whole thing—ten thousand items, from cookie jars to precious gems—eerily resembled Raid the Icebox 1.

But why should we care now? There’s something about Warhol’s obsessive cataloging and collecting, his archiving and displaying, that resonates in the digital age. Many of us raid the digital icebox every day, downloading more cultural artifacts than we know what to do with. I think it’s fair to say that most of us have more MP3s sitting on our hard drives than we’ll ever be able to listen to, and yet we keep acquiring more, not so different from the way Warhol hoarded cookie jars or delighted in displaying the dozens of pairs of shoes he found at the RISD Museum. In some ways, Warhol seems to be saying that quantity is more important than quality; it doesn’t matter what you have as long as you have a lot of it.

You could say that in the digital age, with its free flow and circulation of cultural artifacts, that the act of acquisition—raiding the digital icebox—has turned many of us into amateur curators and archivists. And now the reader is thinking of the results of his curation, the digital things he chooses and uploads and archives, all the while with Warhol in the RISD Museum in the back of his mind. We dig into the deep reserves of the web and arrange them, sometimes for a public (file sharing, MP3 blogs) and sometimes for oneself (the joys of collecting), and like Warhol, often for the sake of gathering itself. In this way, older arts of compiling such as commonplace books and scrapbooking have reemerged, inverting the predominant form of top-down cultural consumption of the twentieth century, when collections would consist as often of things bought—an LP or book—as things found. On the web, circulation has surpassed ownership: someone owns a material artifact, but who owns a JPEG? Commonplace books and scrapbooks combined democratic-based practices such as crafts, folk arts, and hobbies with the avant-garde tradition of the objet trouvé—found objects admired for their aesthetic qualities—which resonates with our current obsessions of archiving, arranging, hoarding, and sorting of digital readymades.

When asked, “How do you choose a readymade?” Duchamp replied, “It chooses you, so to speak.” One can imagine Duchamp drifting into the plumbing supply and letting the urinal choose him, one object among many lodged in a protosurrealist wunderkammer, unbelievably rich in its limited offerings. I think we can relate. How many times have we wandered into a record store, boutique, or bookstore and let objects choose us? In this way, Duchamp collapsed the distinction between artist and shopper and added a dash of surrealism. Yet if we really gave ourselves over to Duchamp's procedure and let objects choose us as we browsed the web, surely we'd be overwhelmed by the sheer number of artifacts. To manage the vastness, we employ guided chance via search engines. Let's say I'm looking for a specific image. To wait until it found me— in Duchampian terms— would be ludicrous. Instead, I plunk my term into Google Images search and then let one of them choose me. In this way, the web is a push and pull of opposites: intuition and intention, conscious and unconscious, drift and determination.

The play of conscious and unconscious is extended into the structure of the web itself. We could say that the mechanics that runs the web—from the code to the server farms—are the web's subconscious, while the software— the graphical user interface and all the activities that happen there, on the surface— is the web's consciousness. The unconscious, which is pure apparatus, is all hung on a grid, starting with binary code, moving to the pixel, and resulting in GUIs (graphical user interfaces). In this way, the web is an extension of modernism, reiterating a stasis that Rosalind Krauss claimed to be the hallmark of modernity: "The grid announces, among other things, modern art's will to silence, its hostility to literature, to narrative, to discourse." As an apparatus, the web is grid-like: static and even-keeled, a state more than a thing. On top lies a thin layer, the web's "content," which Krauss refers to as "literature, narrative, and discourse." All of the image archiving interfaces— Pinterest, Flickr, Instagram, Google Images—are gridded, from the rectangular format of the images to the lattices on which they are hung. While the images themselves may proffer organic subject matter, the interface and apparatus is entirely industrial.

When we use an apparatus extensively, it becomes invisible, as we become completely subsumed by content. In 2000, the media theorist Matthew Fuller wrote an essay addressing the dangers of this exact blind spot; the title of his essay was "It Looks Like You're Writing a Letter: Microsoft Word." A decade and a half later, we still take apparatus for granted, the way we might take breathing or our body's circulatory system for granted; clearly, it's what makes everything function, but when I look in the mirror, all I can think about is how I need a haircut.

* * *

Pinterest is a human-driven image-harvesting engine, one that is fast becoming the largest single-source image repository on the web.
When you pin an image from the web for one of your boards, Pinterest copies it to its own servers, providing you with a thumbnail and a link back to its original source. Therefore, should an image disappear from, say, a shuttered blog, it will remain on your Pinterest board. In this way, Pinterest is acting as an image redundancy and archive service, while at the same time building a vast proprietary image library.

Because each image archived is pinned by human librarians, the signal-to-noise ratio is high as compared to Google Images, which are culled algorithmically. The darker side is that every user is ultimately working for Pinterest; with each pin, the company's image database grows richer— as does the corporation's bottom line.

Pinterest is Duchampian in that users don't generate any original content; instead, all images are drawn from elsewhere on the web. As opposed to Flickr or Instagram, every photo on Pinterest is a ready-made or a collage of preexisting images. To achieve this, the site uses a data compression algorithm called deduplication, which is a way of reducing the size of images by outsourcing redundant chunks of data to a single file that can be inserted into an image on demand. So, let’s say that I’ve pinned an image of a dog with brown eyes. Housed in the Pinterest database is an untold number of photos of dogs with brown eyes. The algorithm scans all of those eyes and determines that in many cases portions of the pixel configurations are identical. So when I load my dog, the algorithm shoots a reference with that exact pixel set and inserts it where my dog’s eye is. My dog, then, is not a photograph of a dog in the traditional sense but instead is patched together from a database of preexisting elements on the fly. Each image is at once both unique and cloned, reverberating with modernism’s constructivist methods of collage and assemblage, as well as postmodernism’s mimetic strategies of appropriation and sampling.

But Pinterest’s emphasis on found and assembled materials also leads right back to the premodern notions of collecting and scrapbooking, which is no coincidence since the company claims that the platform is “built by hobbyists, for hobbyists” and that one of the partners’ “boyhood bug collection is the touchstone inspiration and the company’s founding myth.” Walter Benjamin, an obsessive collector himself, wrote about the close connection between collecting and making when he said, “Among children, collecting is only one process of renewal; other processes are the painting of objects, the cutting out of figures, the application of decals—the whole range of childlike modes of acquisition, from touching things to giving them names.” Pinterest’s CEO has described the site as “catalog of ideas,” which echoes Benjamin’s idea that “if there is a counterpart to the confusion of a library, it is the order of its catalog.” Pinterest’s apparatus converts the confusion of an image library into an order of a searchable catalog. While the users of Pinterest curate photo albums, the algorithms are the librarians, bots that sort the profusion of content.

The alt-librarian Rick Prelinger has proclaimed archiving as a new folk art, something that is widely practiced and has unconsciously become integrated into a great many people’s lives, potentially transforming a necessity into a work of art. Now, at first thought it seems wrong: how can the storing and categorizing of data be folk art? Isn’t folk art the opposite, something predicated on the subjective handcrafting of an object into a unique and personal statement, oftentimes one that expresses a larger community ethos? One need think of, say, the magnificent quilts of Gee’s Bend produced over many generations by a group of African American women who live in an isolated Alabama town. Each quilt is unique, while bearing the mark of that specific community. Or the spectacular cosmic visions of someone like Rev. Howard Finster, whose obsessive, emotional, hand-rendered religious paintings and sculptures could only be sprung from the unique genius of Finster himself.

Like quilting, archiving employs the obsessive stitching together of many small pieces into a larger vision, a personal attempt at ordering a chaotic world. It’s not such a far leap from the quilt maker to the stamp or book collector. In the digital age, our relentless “pinning” of images on Pinterest, curating of Instagram feeds, or compiling of Spotify playlists are contemporary expressions of folk archiving, ones that hearken back to predigital technologies. Pinterest’s main metaphor is the cork-lined bulletin board, itself a site of folk archiving, which John Berger wrote about in his 1972 book Ways of Seeing:

Adults and children sometimes have boards in their bedrooms or living-rooms on which they pin pieces of paper: letters, snapshots, reproductions of paintings, newspaper cuttings, original drawings, postcards. On each board all the images belong to the same language and are all more or less equal within it, because they have been chosen in a highly personal way to match and express the experience of the room’s inhabitant. Logically, these boards should replace museums.

In this passage, Berger positions the folk art of scrapbooking as high art, but the two have long been intertwined. Many artists in their studios have inspiration boards, not too different from what Berger is describing, pinned with postcards, inspirational notes, photographs, and so forth. And in the twentieth century, many libraries had “clipping libraries,” where cabinets were bursting full of photographs clipped from magazines, glued to cardboard backings, and arranged by subject. Berger’s deduction regarding the obsolescence of museums rings true for many; Pinterest’s images are more integrated into their daily lives than the occasional visit to the museum is. For many, the postcard or JPEG, in essence, has become the painting.

The founder of Whole Earth Catalog, Stewart Brand, has stated that “like everything else, [curating] has been democratized by the Net, in one sense, everybody is curating: whether you are writing a blog, it is curating . . . So we are becoming editors, and curators, and those two are blending online.” Even something as simple as bookmarking kicks off a chain of curation. When I instapaper a long-form article so I can read it later, it is added to my archive of articles. Oftentimes, due to the fact that things disappear from the web, if it’s an article I think is particularly worthwhile, I’ll convert it to a PDF and save a copy of it in my articles archive on my computer, creating my own personal library. As many users of MP3 blogs, file locker services, and streaming services know all too well, things vanish all the time. Sometimes users kill their blogs; other times, as in the case of Netflix, studio contracts expire, resulting in the disappearance of specific films, or regional geographical differences make their service unavailable in various countries. I went to a conference in China a few years ago where several of the conference “brought” their papers on Google Docs, only to find out that once they arrived in mainland China, Google was blocked. Same with their Gmail, Twitter, Facebook, and YouTube. And as much as Wi-Fi is ballyhooed, it’s still locked down in many places, making it less than reliable. Creating a robust local archive of digital artifacts is perhaps the most effective means by which to protect yourself against cloud-based instability.

Our archiving impulse arises as a way to ward off the chaos of overabundance. And yet even in the predigital age, the collector could never actually consume the sheer volume of cultural artifacts that could be collected. Anatole France (1844–1924), for instance, when asked of his vast library, “You have read all these books, Monsieur France?” answered, “Not one-tenth of them. I don’t suppose you use your Sèvres china every day?” The condition of too much far precedes the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first centuries. René Descartes (1596–1650) claimed that “even if all knowledge could be found in books, where it is mixed in with so many useless things and confusingly heaped in such large volumes, it would take longer to read those books than we have to live in this life.” The Harvard historian Ann Blair relates how Kant (1724–1804) and Wordsworth (1770–1850) were among the earliest authors who described an experience of temporary mental blockage due to “sheer cognitive exhaustion . . . whether triggered by sensory or mental overload.” Blair charts the rise of various indexing systems—as well as the invention of commonplace and reference books—as a way to order the impending chaos of overproduction and underconsumption. And like today, the ever-accumulating knowledge and the various attempts to manage it was felt globally across the centuries, from medieval/early modern Europe to the Islamic world and China.

The managing and sorting of information became an industry hinged on the illusion of control, which grew alongside increasingly codified systems of knowledge and rhetoric. Eventually, it evolved into a booming and lucrative industry, with the rise of everything from Johnson’s Dictionary—for which he was paid roughly the equivalent of $350,000 in today’s money—to the current crop of paywalled archives such as LexisNexis, ProQuest, and JSTOR, for which academic institutions spend between $10 billion and $20 billion annually. Information—who produces it, who consumes it, who distributes it, and, in short, who controls it—has been a contested space for centuries. While this is nothing new, when placed in the replicating digital ecosystem of the Internet—with its array of pirate and legitimate venues—these tendencies go into overdrive, creating new and unintended consequences in a variety of related areas such as copyright, intellectual property, historical contextualization, free culture, archiving, taxonomies, distribution, artistic practices, and curating, but to name but a few.

Prior to the digital age, a common metric for expressing the infinite was the Argentinian writer Jorge Luis Borges’s short story “The Library of Babel” (1941), which imagines a vast library that contains every book that could be written about every subject known to mankind. But one problem with Borges’s library was information management—finding anything was nearly impossible. In his story, such drudgery was ceded to teams of weary human librarians who perished in their lifelong efforts to locate specific books in the labyrinthine library. And yet Borges was an optimist: with the right combination of fortitude and luck, there was a chance that a librarian could overcome the greatest odds; even though it’s vast, his library is not infinite. And there are no duplicate copies of any books; every book is unique. But the problem is that many books are nearly identical, differing only in a single letter or a comma. Somewhere in that library, still yet to be found, would be one book that could contain all the world’s knowledge between its covers printed in miniscule type and on an infinite number of infinitely thin leaves. That book of books—the Library of Babel—turned out to be the Internet.

A twenty-first-century version of Borges might resemble an author named Philip M. Parker, who, with the help of computers, has churned out more than a million books on a wide range of arcane subjects. When someone wants to buy a book of his, an army of spiders is sent out to crawl the web for content. Upon being hauled in, algorithms determine and sequence the most relevant information. They are then assembled into books (slightly shifting the semantic order to avoid direct plagiarism), chunked into predetermined print-on-demand formats, and automatically posted to Amazon, where titles are fabricated only if someone wants to buy the book. The process is so automated that titles are listed that haven’t yet been written; if someone desires to have a book written on any subject, it is produced for them on demand. Parker’s is but one of many such projects, where perfectly semantic accounts of sporting events and financial transactions are generated from generic data sets and published in newspapers all over the world; no one has any idea that there isn’t a human writing these things. Both Parker and Borges play down content and quality, choosing instead to focus on quantity and the challenge of wrangling meaning—and in the case of Parker, money—out of such vastness.

Today we’re confronted with the abstraction of big data—large data sets, expressed in equally large and equally abstract numbers—and it’s assumed somehow that we can comprehend these. For instance, the WikiLeaks site contained 1.2 million documents a year after it was launched; and in 2010, it released almost 400,000 documents related to the Iraq War alone. The United States diplomatic cable leaks totaled 251,287 documents consisting of 261,276,536 words. A common complaint was that WikiLeaks released too damn much, prompting the journal Foreign Policy to call the release of such a vast amount of data “information vandalism”:

There’s a principle that says it’s OK to publish one-off scoops, but not 250,000—or for that matter 2.7 million—of them all at once? The former feels like journalism; the latter seems grotesque and irresponsible, more like ‘information vandalism’. . . . And even if responsible papers like the New York Times have a chance to review and contextualize them, there’s no way they can dot every i and cross every t in the time allotted. There’s just too much.

And with every new leak, comes a new metric of immensity: it is said that Edward Snowden initially leaked between 1.5 and 1.7 million documents.

To give an idea of how much this is, in 1969, the conceptual artist On Kawara (1933–2014) embarked on a project entitled One Million Years, which was a twenty-volume set of books that printed the name of each year in closely typeset columns (1856 AD 1857 AD 1858 AD, etc.). Each page contains five hundred years, and each book contains 2,068 pages. As an absurdist gesture, live readings of the work are occasionally given; the complete reading of the years could never be finished in one’s lifetime. If recorded, 2,700 CDs would be needed to complete the readings; if read aloud, it would take a hundred years to enumerate aloud the names of one million years.

Too much was the same accusation that drove the young hacktivist Aaron Swartz to take his life after being hounded by the United States Department of Justice for attempting to liberate approximately 4.8 million articles (or seventy gigabytes) from JSTOR, the paywalled academic database. It’s hard to imagine exactly what constitutes, say, 10,000 documents let alone 250,000 or 5 million. And yet it’s this metric that is propelling public discourse, not to mention legal policy. The immensity of the digital is hard to imagine. I shudder to think what my apartment would look like if every MP3 and PDF on my drives were to manifest itself as an album or a book, or if every video on my hard drive were somehow converted to film stock, wound on reels. I wouldn’t be able to move. Each day, as we shuffle our data from one place to another, we have the illusion of mastery, when in fact we are drowning in our own riches. Our data—the management, storage, organizing, and moving of it—owns us. Ask anyone who’s had to maintain a blog, Facebook page, or Twitter account: it’s a second job. In effect, many of us have unwittingly become both the authors of Borges’s “Library of Babel” and its lowly librarians.

I began to get curious about what immensity might look like and went in search of Swartz’s cache, which—predictably locked down by the Department of Justice—was nowhere to be found. However, a tribute action dedicated to Swartz the day after his arrest in 2011 appeared on the Pirate Bay in the form of a thirty-three gigabyte torrent that consisted of 18,592 PDFs from the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society,” a prestigious scientific journal with a history extending back to the 1600s that was illegally downloaded from JSTOR and posted publicly by a user named Greg Maxwell. The torrent was accompanied by a free culture statement, which, in part, read: “This archive . . . should be available to everyone at no cost, but most have previously only been made available at high prices through paywall gatekeepers like JSTOR. Limited access to the documents here is typically sold for $19 USD per article, though some of the older ones are as low as $8. Purchasing access to this collection one article at a time would cost hundreds of thousands of dollars."

A day later, upon unzipping one of the many files, I was faced with an overwhelming number of PDFs, ranging from 1 to 254 pages long. I couldn’t absorb more than the smallest fraction of what I had just downloaded—and what I had just downloaded was but a fraction of the 4.8 million documents that Swartz had liberated. The sheer size of this smallest corner of the Internet verged on a cosmic scale. This scale itself is an abstraction: certainly we can’t conceive of what Swartz’s 4.8 million “articles” might look like, never mind what we would do with them were we to actually have them in our possession. It seems that all we know for sure is that Swartz downloaded a lot. Maxwell’s gesture is at once a ghost of, and at the same time the only concrete realization of Swartz’s vision, one that is both symbolic and instructive. No one will ever read Maxwell’s trove (same with Swartz’s), but the fact of this material—and, in Maxwell’s case, its ever-present availability—competes with what practical applications we might render from it. Many media critics feel that content might be the wrong place to look for meaning.

Modernity brought with it the idea that there was this thing that could be extracted that represented the most valuable part of a text. Swartz’s gesture suggests that there’s no “information” in places like JSTOR and Elsevier. Any paper is as good as any other for a gesture like his, because individually these papers literally have NO audience—an average academic paper is read by maybe two or three people. So the gesture only matters when it’s done in bulk and it doesn’t matter of what the bulk consists. The offense is a corporate one; it has relatively little to do with individual authors because it assumes from the outset that the individual author isn’t all that important.

Aaron Swartz’s gesture was a conceptual one, focused on the power of making available sealed-off information. He wasn’t concerned with what he was liberating; he was interested in using the model of moving masses of information as a political tool, as if to say that the gesture of furiously pushing, moving, gathering, sharing, parsing, storing, and liberating information is as important as what’s actually being moved.

* * *

In 2010, Pamela Echeverria, owner of the LABOR gallery in Mexico City, held a conference called Who Owns the Image? that focused on the way images and their reception have been changed by digital culture. Echeverria, like so many of us, was living a double life: on one hand, she dealt in unique fine art objects at the gallery; on the other hand, she was downloading scads of infinitely reproducible artifacts from file sharing. The conference sparked numerous heated conversations, many of which Echeverria and I continued to discuss long after the conference ended.

In early 2013, shortly after Aaron Swartz passed away, Pamela asked me to curate a show dedicated to his memory at her gallery. When I began working on the show, I pondered the sort of immensity that Swartz and Assange (and later Snowden) were dealing in. What would it look like if their leaks were somehow materialized? And how would it make us think differently about them if we could physically comprehend their magnitude? With a more conventional exhibition in mind, I began by seeking artworks that explicitly sought to concretize digital data into physical objects. For instance, I discovered a huge book that consisted of every photograph of Natalie Portman on the Internet. I also found a series of twelve books that recorded all changes made to the Wikipedia article on the Iraq War; the volumes covered a five-year period from December 2004 to November 2009, with a total of twelve thousand changes. The set of books was nearly seven thousand pages long. Along similar lines, I came across a piece by an Iraqi American artist that was a collection of every article published on the Internet about the Iraq War, bound into a set of seventy-two books, each a thousand pages long. Displayed on long tables, they made a stunning materialization of the quantity of digital culture.

But somehow these gestures, although big, were not big enough. They were too precious, too boutique, and too small to get at the magnitude of huge data sets that I was seeking to replicate. I wondered how I could up the ante. The Iraq War books showed that printing out even a small corner of the Internet was an insane proposition. My mind made a poetic leap: what if I were somehow able to crowdsource printing out the entire Internet?

I leapt on social media and put out a call:

LABOR, UbuWeb, and Kenneth Goldsmith invite you to participate in the first-ever attempt to print out the entire Internet.

The idea is simple: Print out as much as of the web as you want—be it one sheet or a truckload—send it to Mexico City, and we’ll display it in the gallery for the duration of the exhibition, which runs from July 26 to August 31, 2013.

The process is entirely open: If it exists online and is printed out, it will be accepted. Every contributor will be listed as a participating artist in the show.

What you decide to print out is up to you: As long as it exists somewhere online, it’s in. We’re not looking for creative interpretations of the project. We don’t want objects. We just want shitloads of paper. We’re literally looking for folks to print out the entire Internet. We have over 500 square meters of space to fill, with ceilings that are over six meters high.

There are many ways to go about this: You can act alone (print out your own blog, Gmail inbox, or spam folder) or you could organize a group of friends to print out a particular corner of the Internet, say, all of Wikipedia, the entire New York Times archive, every dossier leaked by WikiLeaks for starters. The more the better.

Print out the Internet. Post it to Mexico City.

At the conclusion of the show, the entire archive will be recycled.

The response was overwhelming. More than twenty thousand submissions poured in from every corner of the globe, manifesting themselves in a ten-ton heap of paper that was nearly five meters high. The pile looked a lot like the Internet itself, crammed with spam, credit card reports, memes, in-boxes, news sites, and porn—lots and lots of porn. Overnight, countless blogs and international media outlets ricocheted the idea across the globe, sparking intensely negative reactions, accusing me of everything from igniting an arboreal holocaust to cynical careerism. An online petition sprung up pleading: “Kenneth Goldsmith, please don’t print the Internet,” which petered out at less than five hundred signatures. The project grew so furiously that in July 2013, it was made an official meme on the website Know Your Meme. By the time it was over, more than a thousand pages of commentary had been generated—ironically, making a thousand more pages of the web that needed to be printed and thrown onto the pile. As most people never made it to Mexico City to see the actual show, the idea itself and the conversation it generated became a stand-in. Fueled by rumor and hearsay, the pile of papers grew to monumental proportions in the public’s mind. It’s fair to say that the conversation around the show was more real than the show itself.

As speculation about the project grew, I couldn’t help but wonder what made people actually take something so ridiculously impossible so seriously? If you stopped even for a moment to think about it, printing the entire Internet is simply impossible. How can one even define the Internet, never mind freeze it for a moment to be able to print it? In the time it took me to write this sentence, an untold number of new web pages were generated, never mind the gajillions of photos, videos, and music that were just uploaded—each expandable to miles of source code, which in alphanumeric terms would mean oodles and oodles more pages. Trying to print out the entire Internet sounds like punishment meted out on a Promethean scale. The alarms tipped to near hysteria, resembling a twenty-first-century version of Dutch tulip mania more than the supposedly logical, levelheaded, contemporary world we imagine we live in.

Printing out the Internet was a physical manifestation of every skeleton in our digital closet, tumbled out, and splayed across the floor, pushing us out of house and home, forcing us to confront the fact that we are hoarders of the worst sort, even if that hoarding is now invisible. Printing the Internet was a grade-B zombie film, a cheap version of War of the Worlds, the return of the repressed, a physical expression of the irrational fear that all this stuff will one day come back to haunt us. I’d like to believe that Printing Out the Internet was an unarticulated fear of abundance, of too much, of trying to comprehend a scale so large that no human brain could process it. Instead, we needed to invent, imagine, and enact the smallest slice of this problem in order to even contemplate purging ourselves of it.

The project was a slanted and swerved tribute to Aaron Swartz, filtered through the poetic lens of Jorge Luis Borges. It was a fleeting “dialectical constellation” of the Internet, materialized and frozen for a moment in a gallery in Mexico City, only to be blown apart, pulped, recycled, and reconstituted into some other form. The outcry from the public was misplaced, having demanded real solutions to what was an imaginary problem—imaginary because it never really happened. What happened instead was a global conversation about a proposition—a tear in the curtain—one of those strange moments when strands of magical realism, ‘pataphysics (the science of imaginary solutions to imaginary problems), and meme culture collided, fleetingly materialized, and just as quickly vanished from the face of the earth.

* * *

In his introduction to his short story collection Ficciones (1941), Borges wrote: “The composition of vast books is a laborious and impoverishing extravagance. To go on for five hundred pages developing an idea whose perfect oral exposition is possible in a few minutes! A better course of procedure is to pretend that these books already exist, and then to offer a résumé, a commentary . . . I have preferred to write notes upon imaginary books.” It’s no surprise that both “The Library of Babel” and “Pierre Menard, Author of the Quixote”—in which an author spontaneously re-creates Don Quixote word for word, having had no prior knowledge of the book—appear in this collection. Textuality is objectified, not to be tampered with, frozen into baubles to be handled either by librarians or duplicate authors. The last thing on Borges’s mind is the text itself and what it means; what it means is implicit in the managing of it. In “The Library of Babel,” we never know what books the librarians are searching for and why, rather they’re concerned with how to locate, extract, and manage preexisting knowledge. Similarly, it’s taken for granted that Quixote is a classic text and therefore unassailable; instead, the emphasis is on the hermeneutics of how such a perfect replica came into being in the first place. As early as 1941, Borges is proposing that content is no longer king; instead context and reception are the new sites of meaning, an idea that was explored in the theoretically authorless practices of 1960s conceptual art.

There’s a Borgesian slant on artist Lawrence Weiner’s famous 1969 declaration: “THE ARTIST MAY CONSTRUCT THE WORK / THE WORK MAY BE FABRICATED / THE WORK NEED NOT BE BUILT.” There’s a Borgesian slant as well as in Sol LeWitt’s 1966 notion that “in conceptual art the idea or concept is the most important aspect of the work. When an artist uses a conceptual form of art, it means that all of the planning and decisions are made beforehand and the execution is a perfunctory affair.” As if to say that if all fictions are, in fact, fiction, then perhaps it’s just as good to propose them as to realize them. Borges questions labor and value in a realm where perspiration is plentiful and remuneration is scarce. Why bother? Borges echoes the Parisian radical May ‘68 sloganeers, when they scrawled across city walls: “NEVER WORK” and “PEOPLE WHO WORK GET BORED WHEN THEY DON’T WORK. PEOPLE WHO DON’T WORK NEVER GET BORED.” Perhaps, then, in a Borgesian sense, it’s best not to write but to propose: propositions are gateways to utopias.

All of this is a far cry from the activism of Aaron Swartz, Chelsea Manning, Julian Assange, and Edward Snowden, where theoretical propositions are not an option. These four individuals enacted Michel Foucault’s notion of parrhesia—the impulse to speak the truth at whatever cost—and they paid dearly for it: Manning in prison, Snowden in exile, Assange in limbo, and Swartz with his life. And it’s here where the distinctions between activism and art, politics and poetry, fact and fiction become clear. I am reminded of Ludwig Wittgenstein’s admonition: “Do not forget that a poem, although it is composed in the language of information, it is not used in the language-game of giving information.” Such is the freedom and beauty of poetry. Politics, however, is another matter.
Chapter 5: Dream Machines and Eternidays

A figure is staring intently at a device cradled in his hands. His shoulders are rounded, his back is hunched, and his head is bowed at the neck. Both elbows are flat against his body, bent at forty-five-degree angles. His fingers are moving about the surface of the device. While the world goes on with its business around him, he is completely oblivious; he can’t stop staring at the device. This is a magical device, for it has the ability to transport him to exotic and faraway places: exciting sea adventures, lumbering hippopotamuses wading in rivers, colorful rice fields halfway around the world. The device completely engulfs every inch of his being, when suddenly, in an instant, he raises his head, pauses for a moment, and places the device—a small book—on top of a jumble of other books in a cramped bookstall on the Seine. The camera zooms out, showing us rows of men in the same exact posture, all of them, heads bowed, deeply absorbed in small books they’re reading, oblivious to the world around them. These men, in formation, posture, countenance, and absorption bear a striking resemblance to the lines of people I see hunched over their devices on the platform of the West Fourth Street station waiting for their rush hour trains home.

This film, Bookstalls, is by Joseph Cornell, the American surrealist, and was cobbled together at his kitchen table on Utopia Parkway in Queens, New York, in the late 1930s. Like most of Cornell’s films, he didn’t shoot a thing; this silent film was assembled from found footage taken from his vast collection of early cinema reels that he kept in his basement. What Cornell shows us in this film is that dreaming in public is nothing new. Be it books or smartphones, these wondrous devices have the capability of lifting us out of our everyday circumstances and transporting us elsewhere without our ever having to move an inch. Although Cornell rarely traveled—in his lifetime, he never journeyed farther than New England—he was able to span the globe and time travel across centuries through his artworks: films, boxes, assemblages, and collages. Peer into a tiny Cornell box and you’ll be magically transported to some other world created entirely from scavenged flotsam and jetsam—old prints, maps, Ping-Pong balls, shattered wineglasses, sand—that Cornell salvaged from his ramblings in junk shops and bookstores, which he then assembled into his famous dream machines.

There’s much about Joseph Cornell’s life and work that anticipates our digital age. The origins of our computer interfaces and operating systems, with their delicate balance of logic and absurdity, mirror the surrealist aesthetics of Cornell’s boxes. The Internet’s grassroots ethos of sharing, open source, and free culture were in full swing on Utopia Parkway. His varied artistic output could be called multimedia some seventy-five years before it became the digital norm. An early adapter of indie culture, his living room became a pop-up cinema for like-minded film buffs in the 1930s who had no access to already-forgotten silent classics from the turn of the century. Even after he became world famous, Cornell was a one-man gift economy, giving many of his boxes away to neighborhood children as toys. He was self-educated before it became common. Although he became one of the most famous artists of the twentieth century, he didn’t attend art school or have any other formal training. In fact, he never even finished high school, preferring instead to teach himself philosophy, poetry, history, and aesthetics by devouring books from libraries, the way we harvest web-based educational resources from the comfort of our couches. Our relentless management of information—downloading, cataloging, tagging, duplicating, and archiving—was expressed in this early modernist’s working and collecting habits. By the time he died, his little house had become his own library—he private Wikipedia—prompting one observer to quip that he was “a kind of curator of culture, and his house on Utopia Parkway a bureau of which he was trustee, director and staff.” And, like many Internet fanboys, he was a geeky loner, more comfortable with distant correspondence than he was with face-to-face encounters; although his meatspace social network was wide, he died a virgin.

Born in 1903 into an upper-middle-class family, his father, a traveling salesman, died young, sending Cornell, his handicapped brother, and mother into a downward spiral of poverty. They ended up in a modest working-class house on Utopia Parkway where Cornell spent the rest of his life. Devoted to his mother and acting as a caretaker for his brother, Cornell eked out a living for the family by working a series of low-level jobs during the day and working on his art at night. Due to his familial and financial burdens, he didn’t travel much farther than Manhattan—a twenty-minute train ride from his home—so he invented a series of self-sustaining measures that made it possible for him to create and live in a world of his own.

Cornell was a massive collector, verging on hoarder, who stockpiled all types of ephemera and meticulously organized them by arcane but precise systems so that anything could be retrieved at a moment’s notice. By the time he died in 1972, his tiny house was jammed with cultural artifacts: “three thousand books and magazines, a comparable number of record albums and vintage films, enough diaries and letters to now fill more than thirty reels of microfilm, and tens of thousands of examples of ephemera—from postage stamps to clay pipes, from theatrical handbills to birds’ nests.” When he wasn’t working his job, he was out gathering materials for his boxes, trolling the vast used bookstores of Manhattan’s Fourth Avenue, hunting for illustrations that might be incorporated into his work. He became an ardent collector of media—films, in particular—making trips to New Jersey warehouses where Dumpster’s full of reels were being unceremoniously tossed, regarded as artistically worthless, salvageable only for the silver nitrate they contained. In this way, Cornell was able to assemble one of the largest collections of early cinema in America. The steady stream of cinephiles who passed through his house trading films with him in the 1930s hadn’t a clue that Cornell was an artist. To them, he was an eccentric homegrown archivist.

He was most famous for his box constructions. Made of wood, they’re often no wider than a laptop, and no deeper than a few inches. Often they are divided with wooden slats into multiple compartments. Each compartment contains an element, object, or image: in one section is an image of bird clipped from a Victorian lithograph, in another is a collection of small seashells, in a third a few strands of ribbon. Depending on the theme of the box, the images tangentially relate to one another. In one box, most of the elements are naturally themed, in another they are celestial, in yet another they are classical. But not always. There are always odd things thrown in—compasses, clay pipes, marbles—that gently disrupt the overarching themes, nudging the box into the realm of dreams.

The same way our devices are launching pads for web voyages, Cornell’s boxes are launching pads for interior voyages. Each box has an interface, its own operating and navigational systems through which we may experience it. It’s no coincidence that Cornell extensively used maps and globes in his work. From the repeated rows of iconic imagery to the way the space is divided into small windows, they are structurally reminiscent of the way our desktops are ordered. In a way, they seem like primitive computers. The names of web browsers—Navigator, Safari, and Explorer—could equally be applied to Cornell’s boxes.

My desktop resembles a Joseph Cornell box. It’s at once a coherent space and a fractured one. My operating system unifies everything, but each window has its own agenda, shattering any real sense of accord. Like Cornell’s boxes, I never have just one window open, I always have many. And like his compartments, each window represents its own world. Sometimes those windows contain related content—right now my Facebook page and Twitter app are showing much of the same stuff—and other times, they’re really disjunctive: in one window is a dull spreadsheet, while another is streaming a slick music video.

My screen is cluttered with graphic images, from the icon-festooned dock at the bottom to the pull-down menus at the top, where various icons show me the time, weather, my battery life, Wi-Fi strength, and so forth. The windows on my screen are piled on top of each other so thickly that I can only see fragments of each. Yet, there’s nothing confusing about this. Somehow, I understand where everything is and what each window does, even in this chaotic, cluttered, and shattered environment. And then there are worlds within worlds. In one of my windows, I’m streaming CNBC’s Squawk Box, whose video stream itself is divided into no fewer than fourteen windows all going at once, each showing something different. The main window has an image of the three hosts sitting around a table in a studio that itself has dozens of screens, computer monitors, and whose physical stage set is crowded with reflective surfaces. The hosts’ window is ringed by more boxes showing various stock charts and numbers; there’s a clock, a logo, and a title box. Along the bottom are two crawls, one with news, the other with market numbers, one on top of the other. On the right side of the window are stacked boxes with market numbers and charts. The entire landscape is moving and fluid: new words and numbers continue to appear and just as quickly disappear. A network logo and HD+ symbol reside in the lower-right corner. There’s a strong visual connection between both Cornell’s boxes and what my computer screen looks like at this very moment. My screen and the many windows contained therein feeling like an M. C. Escher drawing—worlds within worlds within worlds.

Cornell predicted this. Boxes and screens are everywhere, from guys that work on Wall Street literally enveloped in flat-screen monitors to sports bars where every surface is showing a different game. In 1969 Andy Warhol said, “Everybody should have two television sets. So you can watch two at a time. Every time you see the President, he has three.” Sometimes I feel like all this distraction is life training for a distracted world—which is not always a bad thing. Running contrary to popular opinion that we’re losing our ability to concentrate, the Princeton historian Michael Wood calls distraction another kind of concentration: “The distracted person is not just absent or daydreaming, he/she is attracted, however fitfully, by a rival interest.” Wood says that distraction contains certain elements of concentration, but not enough to make it respectable. When we concentrate, we’re no longer curious—we’re concentrated, after all—foreclosing on surprises that distraction can bring. True, distraction might mean missing the main event. But what if nobody knows anymore what or where the main event is?
Seeing ourselves and our lives reflected in our interfaces is a key part of the reason we stay so attached to them. Cornell thought it was important to include his viewers in his boxes, which is why they often contain mirrors. Glimpse into his boxes and in one or two of his “windows” you’ll find an image of yourself. The myth of Narcissus, who mistook his own reflection in the water for another person, underlies the success of social media. The psychologist Jacques Lacan had a name for this, the “mirror stage,” which says that when an infant sees him—or herself in a mirror for the first time, there is an immediate identification with that image. Up until that point, the baby has no knowledge of itself as an individual, unified being; instead, wholly dependent on others, it has only a fractured sense of self. From that time on, according to Lacan, the image of oneself as a whole person is intoxicating; we become hooked on external representations of ourselves, which goes a long way toward explaining why we love to find ourselves tagged in Facebook photos or have our tweets retweeted. If the Internet is a giant copying machine, then every time we see ourselves reflected in it, we are more drawn to it. It’s no surprise that we can’t stop self-googling or try as we might, we can’t leave Facebook. There’s too much of us reflected in it to walk away from.

Interface designers know this well. Each time I open my Twitter feed, I see an image of myself—a flattering one, after all, I chose it—in the navigation bar. And on Facebook, my little avatar shows up next to every comment box at the end of every single thread. Scrolling down my Facebook feed on my computer, I see me—rendered as an icon—repeatedly and endlessly. It’s no wonder I feel I have a vested interest in every conversation happening there. Every time I open a social media app, the first thing it shows me is how I am reflected in it: how many times I’m mentioned in comments, how many likes I got, how many retweets and favorites I have amassed. This accumulation is social media’s capital, a symbolic currency for which “I” is the metric of valuation.

McLuhan theorized that the insertion of one’s self into media was a basic precept of electronic media. Commenting on the myth of Narcissus, he claimed that “this extension of [Narcissus] by mirror numbed his perceptions until he became the servomechanism of his own extended or repeated image. The nymph Echo tried to win his love with fragments of his own speech, but in vain. He was numb. He had adapted to his extension of himself and had become a closed system. Now the point of this myth is the fact that men at once become fascinated by any extension of themselves in any material other than themselves.” If there’s a better description of the mechanics of social media, I don’t know it.

Cornell spent an enormous amount of time drifting around the streets of Manhattan, where he would see his reflection in the glass of shop windows. Like social media, when we see ourselves reflected in a window display, we become entwined—literally overlaid—with what is being sold to us. Shop window displays invoke Renaissance scholar Leon Battista Alberti’s dictate that the proportions of the spectator and the display figure should be nearly the same, creating a symbiosis between the consumer and the desired object. In 1435, Alberti wrote a treatise about perspective and painting called De pictura. In it, he positioned the human figure as the basis for the division of the canvas into proportional parts. He was among the first to imagine the canvas as being a transparent window on to the world—like a plate of glass—upon which an image could be literally traced, resulting in accurate representations of reality. In doing so, he theorized the idea of perspective: if the canvas was indeed a transparent glass or window, we could look into it toward a vanishing point far in the distance. For Alberti, the canvas/window was a twofold surface that was both opaque (canvas) and transparent (illusionistic).

Alberti’s ideas percolated throughout Europe over the centuries. In the 1680s, for instance, when Versailles was built, the vertical casement window—which still reflected Alberti’s human proportion as a standard—was extensively employed, resulting in a national idiom called the French window. This type of window remained the standard in classical French architecture for the next 250 years until the early 1920s when Le Corbusier introduced the horizontal window, a concept that was widely attacked as being unpatriotic. Le Corbusier, of course, was part of modernism’s thrust toward “flatness,” which reached its zenith in the 1950s when Clement Greenberg insisted that the surface of a painting was not a space of depiction for anything other than the act of painting itself. His hard-core anti-illusionism was exemplified by the abstract expressionists, for whom flatness was the gospel.

As consumer technology evolved, it also adopted an ethos of flatness. Similar to modernism, it strove to strip away vestiges of cumbersome apparatuses. When televisions first appeared, they were encased in wood, posing as pieces of furniture, an attempt to seamlessly integrate the cold, mechanical technology into cozy domestic environments. By the 1970s, led by the smart design of Sony’s Trinitron, TV sets were freed from their furniture function, and like modernist painting, were able to become what they were, leading the way for today’s floating flat screens and plasmas. Similarly, each subsequent release of smartphones and tablets is thinner. Yet contradictorily, there is a drive to render believably illusionistic depths of field on these flat surfaces: video games and virtual reality interfaces seek to literally move you through “worlds” in hyperdimensional detail.

It’s been said that as interface design has progressed, it’s grown more childlike with each passing iteration. The first computers were unquestionably made for adults. Their command lines required you to know how to read and how to type. But with the introduction of graphical user interfaces, operating systems migrated to large and overly simple iconic representations of complex phenomenon—so simple that children could operate them. When interfaces were strictly linguistic, their languages tended to be logical, with a one-to-one correspondence between command and functionality: the “ls” command in Unix or “dir” in DOS listed your directories—and that’s all it did. But once GUIs appeared, the visually expressed commands became interpretative and vague. Every icon set is drawn by a graphic artist and is therefore interpretative, with each operating system attempting to visually distinguish itself from the others: think of Windows’ recycling bin as opposed to Mac’s trash can. But neither is accurate: computer documents are not permanently deleted. In truth, they are partially overwritten.

The idea that the content of any medium is always another medium is expressed in the metaphor of the desktop. From the very beginning of GUIs—screen interfaces displaying icons and folders, etc. which mask the lines of code that actually run your computer— it’s as if the entire contents of a mid-twentieth-century office had been dumped on your computer. There are stacks of “paper” you can click on, “notepads” you can write on, “folders” where you can store your “documents,” “calculators” that have “buttons” you can “push.” To this day, I still edit my documents in the program “Office” while browsing web “pages.”
(I often ask myself what exactly constitutes a web page. I still haven’t found the answer.) The office DNA is so embedded in our computing operating systems that even our mobile devices, bereft of desktops, still bear its predigital iconography. On my iPhone, my Notes app depicts a square legal pad, my camera icon looks like a 1950s Nikon, my Mail app is a standard number 10 white envelope, and my Phone app shows an outline of an mid-twentieth-century telephone receiver.

Early graphical icons were flat, nondimensional representations. A folder—based on a classic manila folder—was a simply drawn outline of a tabbed folder. With successive iterations folders became dimensional, modeled with drop shadows. Later on, when you’d click on that 3-D folder, it would animate, literally opening itself up to show its paper contents before spinning off into a new window. (And now, on Apple products at least, everything’s flattened back out again in the latest OS.) While these animations and heavy graphics slowed systems down, they also opened up the role of the interface and graphic designer to inject playful surrealist elements into the once-dry textual environment. It’s hard to imagine an interface designer not wanting to reference Dalí’s melting watches when creating desktop icons (even the clock icon on my iPhone is depicted by a clock with hands). The title of his famous painting The Persistence of Memory has echoes of RAM (temporary data such as files that can be easily deleted, altered, or overwritten) and ROM (permanent data such as your operating system, that can’t be easily deleted, altered, or overwritten), the foundation of our computers. About his painting Dalí wrote: “I am the first to be surprised and often terrified by the images I see appear upon my canvas. I register without choice and with all possible exactitude the dictates of my subconscious, my dreams.” Substitute the words “upon my canvas” for “in my browser,” and it becomes clear how surrealism and its ethos are hardwired into the very core of our computing experience.

* * *

Floating in the middle of my screen is a series of vertical blocky gray images, one atop another, on a jet-black background: a birdhouse with two holes in it, a bell that tilts to the right, an envelope that has the stem of a speech bubble protruding from its bottom-left corner, a series of three vertical dots next to a series of three vertical lines, a head without a neck, and a magnifying glass tilted to the left. All are the same size and all are rendered in the identical style. Like a rebus, I could assemble them into some sort of a narrative or simply enjoy their playful visuality, their randomness, their absurdity. They hang in the space of my screen the way a moon and stars poetically dangle in a Joan Miró painting or how vaguely abstract figures hauntingly populate a desolate Yves Tanguy landscape. But there’s very little that’s artistic or poetic about it; it’s a description of the navigation bar on my Twitter app.

The icons in the dock that runs along the bottom of my screen are equally surreal. If I turn on the magnification function and enlarge them, I’m surprised at what I find. Several times a day I use my Preview app to view PDFs and images. As an icon no larger than a cufflink, nestled in my dock with all my other icons, I think of it as “the blue one with a few lines through it.” I click on it, it does its job, and I never think about it again. But if I scale it up, a bizarre and rather incomprehensible series of images reveals itself. The icon consists of two photographs printed on “paper” with a white border, each skewed, laid atop one another. The photo on the bottom appears to be picture of an old yellow stone wall and the photo on top, the most prominent image, is of a child standing on a beach, framed by a crisp blue sky. As the waves crash behind him, he’s got his hands clasped in what could be interpreted as a quasi-religious salutation, the sort of thing you always see the Dalai Lama doing. He’s got a sort of beatific half smile and his hair, in cowlicks, is soaked as if he just got out of the water. He’s clothed in a gray garment that is open at the chest, which could either be a raincoat (why would anyone wear a raincoat on the beach on a sunny day?) or a drenched gray karate gi (a gi is a strange choice for a beachwear). On top of the photos sits a magnifying spyglass, the type used to examine photographs or media spreads while editing them. It strikes me as odd that that the imagery in this icon refers to dead media: printed photographs and a spyglass. After all, Preview examines only digital imagery and if you wanted to zoom in on what you’re looking at, you’d click a button, not gaze through a lens. A similar nostalgia permeates contemporary art as well. “Today, no exhibition is complete without some form of bulky, obsolete technology,” observes the art historian Claire Bishop. “The gently clunking carousel of a slide projector or the whirring of an 8-mm or 16-mm film reel . . . Today, film’s soft warmth feels intimate compared with the cold, hard digital image, with its excess of visual information (each still contains far more detail than the human eye could ever need).

While these Preview app images tell a certain story, they also refuse to tell a story, a textbook example of the nineteenth-century poet Comte de Lautréamont’s definition of surrealistic absurdity: “a sewing machine and an umbrella on a dissection table.” Like a Cornell box, they’re suggestive: of place, ethos, nature, environment, corporate values, positivism, world peace, and religion, while deftly avoiding taking an explicit position on any one of them. The icon is evocative, not narrative; and its style of evocation is grounded in the disjunctive surrealist tradition. The icon gives two conflicting messages: functionality (it reads documents really well) and non sequitur (I can’t figure out why these images represent a functional program). They’re not really in conflict with one another—they seem to work quite well together, if bizarrely—but it points to the fact that underlying the strict surface “logic” of our operating systems is a subconscious irrationality or sentimentality.

* * *

Your computer’s ROM is the basement, attic, or toolshed of your computer, where stuff goes into deep storage. Cornell’s house was one big hard drive, particularly his basement, where he stored his vast collection of ephemera, much of which went into making his boxes. Down in the basement was also where he kept dossiers stuffed with scads of flotsam and jetsam on various starlets like Greta Garbo and Hedy Lamarr, with whom he was obsessed. When he attended film premieres or spent evenings at the ballet, he’d return home to his basement media collection to pore over his archived images of the stars he’d seen, ultimately incorporating their images into his boxes.

Joseph Cornell was the ultimate fanboy. In the mid-1950s, for instance, Cornell became obsessed with Allegra Kent, a gorgeous young ballerina he had read about in Newsweek. Finally, he got the courage up to meet her by writing and asking her to appear in one of his films. She agreed to see him at her home in Manhattan, but the meeting didn’t go well. “He was terribly thin, a strange, gaunt, intense-looking creature,” Kent recalled. “I noticed his hands which were discolored from perhaps shellac or varnish. I immediately sensed that he really liked me, which was a little scary. Fans can be crazy. You don’t know what to expect from a fan.” On the spot, Kent told him that she wasn’t interested in appearing in his film and sent him on his way.

Cornell’s crushes remind me of Internet fanboy culture, in particular, of Harry Knowles, the founder of the influential website Ain’t It Cool News, a vast repository of geek culture, comics, as well as information on sci-fi, fantasy, horror, and action movies and TV shows. Like Cornell, Knowles built his site from his bedroom, where in 1994 he started posting to newsgroups, swapping rumors about upcoming films. He ended up writing film reviews on the newsgroups, which formed the basis for his website, which he launched in 1996. Quickly, the site drew hundreds of collaborators, many of whom leaked scandalous insider information about Hollywood—rumors, secret film scripts, advance screening reviews—much to the chagrin of the Hollywood studios, who up until that time were able to keep a tight rein on the publicity surrounding films before they were released.

A 1997 New York Times profile on Knowles sounds like it could almost be describing Cornell: “Harry Jay Knowles is sprawled on the edge of his bed, clicking at the keyboard of his Packard Bell computer. It’s 10 A.M., and he is just starting his day in a tiny airless room crammed with videos, unread film scripts, movie posters (“Bride of Frankenstein,” “King Kong,” etc.) and 8-by-10 glossies of Marilyn Monroe, Britt Ekland, Ray Milland and the original Superman, Kirk Alyn. A grinning Vincent Price shrunken head lies in a box on the floor.” Knowles’s parents ran a movie memorabilia shop in Austin, Texas, where he grew up, that was crammed with pulp fiction, fanzines, and comics. They would set up shop on weekends at comics conventions and film festivals. “I was their experiment,” Knowles said in an interview. “They unleashed everything on me. I saw porn, all the Universal monster movies, all the Charlie Chan films, all the Sherlock Holmes things, all the Fred and Ginger movies. Film for me became how I related to everything else.” Like Cornell toiling in his cramped basement, Knowles created his empire from the confines of his bedroom, at the helm of a vast correspondence network that was done mostly from afar.

A 2012 pilot for a YouTube show, Ain’t It Cool with Harry Knowles, is shot in his father’s Austin, Texas, basement (these guys love basements) and features Knowles—a heavyset man in a loud Hawaiian shirt, goatee, and chunky black-framed glasses—seated behind a desk talking to a camera, surrounded by piles of ephemera. Aping the style of Pee-wee’s Playhouse, Knowles shows old movie clips, opens a mailbox where he finds a catalog for a Captain America auction filled with props for sale, converses about comics with an animated cardboard boiler, and browses through a leaked film script. Information flies at him from all directions, all without him ever having to leave his chair. It’s a meatspace enactment of the vaporous networks that made Knowles famous, while forwarding Cornell’s methodology into the heart of the digital age—accumulating and organizing vast amounts of information, not into the art economy of boxes, but into websites, hits, and likes.

As “free culture” geeks, both Cornell and Knowles share an elastic sense of copyright. In Knowles’s case, he leaked once-private information, posting documents in full. Cornell, too, subscribed to the idea of “borrower’s rights,” or, as his friend the poet Mina Loy put it, “A contemporary brain wielding a prior brain is a more potent implement than a paintbrush.” Stuck in Queens, Cornell never got to go to Paris or Florence to see the masterpieces he loved so much. Instead, he surrounded himself with reproductions of them, which came to stand in for the originals, similar to how our crummy AVI rips become more beloved than the “real” 35-millimeter version of a film that we’ll probably never see in a theater. In the early twentieth century, the networks that fed Cornell’s proclivities were the United States Postal Service; his exposure to much of the world’s great art came to him through printed reproductions in books and magazines. When he wished to incorporate an image into one of his boxes, he would photostat it, preserving the original in his archive. To him, the copy was a natural thing, more real than the original. While remix culture is commonplace today, it was much rarer when Cornell began his artistic life. He had one rule about his art—that no element in it could be original. Everything he used had to be found or reproduced.

Cornell might’ve been the only filmmaker in the history of film who never learned to operate a camera. Instead, his early films, like Bookstalls, were all recomposed from found footage. His 1936 film Rose Hobart is an ancestor of the Internet supercut—those fast-paced montages that compile, say, every swear word uttered in Deadwood or every scene in Talladega Nights in which the phrase “shake and bake” is roared with an accompanying fist bump. To make Rose Hobart, Cornell took a trashy grade-B jungle flick and, with scissors and Scotch tape, cut it up and put it back together out of order. The clichéd story line was happily disposed of and in its place appeared a series of disconnected fantasy sequences. When Cornell screened it, he projected it through a pane of deep-blue glass, imparting a dreamlike quality to it. The film was accompanied by a campy soundtrack from warbly 78 rpm discs that Cornell would hand crank.

Rose Hobart was an influential film that spawned genres of “cut up” films, the best known of which is Christian Marclay’s The Clock (2010), a twenty-four-hour film that is literally a clock, displaying in real time the passing minutes of a day. Comprised of thousands of recycled film clips, The Clock is an epic work of montage. To create it, Marclay and his assistants watched thousands of DVDs and extracted scenes that had clocks somewhere in them. They collected them until every minute of the day was accounted for, then strung them together chronologically. Narrative, genre, or style were of no concern; the only thing that mattered was the presence of a clock in the shot. These scenes were edited down to exactly one-minute lengths and synced to real time so that if you, for example, entered the theater at 4:34 P.M. and looked up at the screen, the clock in the background of the film at that moment would read 4:34. Walk into the cinema at noon, a clock would read 12:00; the following minute the clip changed and another clock would show 12:01. The entire project was mellifluously sequenced by Marclay, so that one scene seamlessly melded into another, binding the entire enterprise into a smooth, sensual, and riveting experience. In one way, it’s a giant work of montage; in another, it’s actually a clock that tells the correct time.

Befittingly, the film has been widely celebrated and crowds around the globe continue to this day to queue up to view the piece in person. Critical praise has been superlatively lavish: Roberta Smith, writing in the New York Times, called The Clock the “ultimate work of appropriation art.” What’s more, The Clock manages to bridge the art world with popular culture, which might account, in part, for its popularity. While Marclay contemplated crowdsourcing the project on the web, he felt that the supercut’s jagged and rough editing style would be at odds with the seamless quality he was after.

So far, so good: a massively popular work constructed in the style of broad-based web trends, which is also acclaimed, valorized, funded, exhibited, and collected by the most powerful art world institutions. And yet, the elephant in the room is copyright: few have mentioned that Marclay hasn’t cleared any permissions with Hollywood for his work.
Marclay explained his idea of copyright in an interview with the New Yorker: “If you make something good and interesting and not ridiculing someone or being offensive, the creators of the original material will like it.” It’s something he’s stood by for the past three decades, weaving a career out of sampling, appropriation, remixing, and plunderphonics; clearly, for Marclay, it appears to be working.

Yet there seems to be a schism between popular culture and the museum. While Marclay’s actions are hailed, media policing agencies like the MPAA (Motion Picture Association of America) and RIAA (Recording Industry Association of America) have been waging an ongoing campaign against file sharers who create remixes out of copyrighted material not unlike what Marclay does. The Clock is a product of the digital age—it’s hard to imagine it being constructed out of celluloid—but, for a work borne of preexisting material and exuding free culture frisson, The Clock is tightly controlled: a full-length version can’t be found on YouTube or on the Pirate Bay. Instead, like a conventional market-based work of art, there is only an expensive, limited edition available to a select few institutions that can afford its half-million-dollar price tag. More so, at a time when much cultural power is based on multiplicity, nongeographical specificity, and wide dissemination, The Clock can only be viewed during special times under pristine conditions—often for a steep museum admission price—which sends mixed signals to the Internet-savvy public. Although the work is predicated on a complex computer program that syncs the film with the actual time in any given location, one assumes that a web version that does the same thing wouldn’t be too hard to create, a move that would satisfy both worlds.

Time is an obsession that both Marclay and Cornell share. There’s something both temporal and atemporal about The Clock: it tells the exact time of day, but as an artwork it has no expiration date. Since it’s comprised of used and mostly classic materials, the work the work has a timeless feel, riding an edge between the momentary and the eternal. Furthermore, its site specificity ensures that it’s always current: when it shows at noon, there are usually big crowds in the theater, but at 4:00 A.M.—if the museum is open—just a few diehard fans are scattered about. Those quiet moments in the middle of the night belonged to Cornell, who was an insomniac. To him, every day was—as he called it—an eterniday. He came up with this idea by working all day at a crummy job, and then coming home to take care of his mother and brother. Then, when the house quieted down, he would stay up all night doing his work in a sleep-deprived dream state—a state between states—half-asleep, half-awake. Like his antecedents the sleeping surrealists poets, he came to prefer being in that twilight zone and later, when he was able to quit his job, would nap sporadically throughout the day so that he could work all night.

Cornell was 24/7 before we were 24/7. When I address a global audience late at night on social media, I am acutely aware that the people I am addressing may be on the other side of the world, wide awake in the middle of their day. I sometimes tailor the content of my posts to appeal directly to that audience across the planet, forsaking my local community because I assume them to be sleeping. The digital age has ushered in atemporality; the hum of the computer and the grinding of the network exists outside of subjective, personal, local, traditional, and even communitarian, traditions of time, a condition explored in Jonathan Crary’s book 24/7: Late Capitalism and the Ends of Sleep. Crary gives a Cornellian example of where labor, technology, sleeplessness, and the cosmos meet. He tells of an effort in the 1990s by a space consortium to build and launch satellites to reflect sunlight back on the earth with the intention of creating, literally, an eterniday. (The company’s slogan was “Daylight all night long.”) Outfitted with paper-thin reflective material two hundred meters in diameter, it would have the capacity to illuminate a ten-mile-square area of the earth in the middle of the night. Originally intended so that miners working in Siberia would have more “daylight” hours under which to toil, it was quickly embraced as a way of extending office hours in cities. There were protests, however, from groups who argued that the night sky was “a commons to which all humanity is entitled to have access, and the ability to experience the darkness of night and observe the stars is a basic human right that no corporation can nullify.” The project was killed, but that didn’t stop us, our machines, and our networks from working eternidays.

In the winter of 1955 through 1956, Cornell held an exhibition of boxes in a New York City gallery entitled Winter Night Skies, which incorporated star charts of constellations. The series was stark: white boxes with deep-blue images of night skies, framed in architecture he called Hôtel de l’Étoile. Joseph Cornell loved the winter stars at night. Gazing out his kitchen window at 4:00 A.M. at the bright stars embedded in the pitch-black sky over a silent Queens, half-asleep, half-awake, he was an armchair voyager traveling the cosmos basking in—as he called it—“light from other days.”
Chapter 6: I Shoot Therefore I Am

Like Joseph Cornell's basement, my many hard drives are packed with downloaded books, movies, images, and music. While I spend a lot of time downloading them, copying them, renaming them, and organizing them into their respective folders. But once they’re neatly filed away, I tend to forget about them because there’s so many of them. Rummaging through them, I’m often surprised at what I find, as was the case when I was recently in the mood to listen to the music of the American midcentury composer Morton Feldman. I dug in to my MP3 drive, found my Feldman folder, and opened it up. Among the various folders in the directory was one labeled the Complete Works of Morton Feldman. I was surprised to see it there; I didn’t remember downloading it. Curious, I looked at its date—2009—and realized that I must’ve grabbed it during the heyday of MP3 charity blogs. I opened it to find seventy-nine albums as zipped files. I unzipped three of them, listened to part of one, closed the folder, and haven’t opened it since. In the digital ecosystem, the apparatuses surrounding the cultural artifacts are often more engaging than the artifacts themselves. In an unanticipated twist to John Perry Barlow’s 1994 prediction that in the digital age we’d be able to enjoy wine without the bottles, we’ve now come to prefer the bottles to the wine.

Back in 1983, the media critic and philosopher Vilém Flusser (1920–1991) described this exact phenomenon in a little book called Towards a Philosophy of Photography. Flusser claimed that the content of any given photograph is actually the camera that produced it. He continued with a series of nested apparatuses: the content of the camera is the programming that makes it function; the content of the programming is the photographic industry that produces it; and the content of the photographic industry is the military-industrial complex in which it is situated, and so forth. He viewed photography from a completely technical standpoint. In Flusser’s view, the traditional content of the cultural artifact is completely subsumed by the apparatuses—technical, political, social, and industrial—surrounding, and thereby defining, it.

Although he was writing about analog, print-based photography, Flusser’s ideas go a long way to explain our changing relationship to the cultural artifact in the digital age, reminding us of Moholy-Nagy’s prediction that “those who are ignorant in matters of photography will be the illiterates of tomorrow.”

The mistake most make in reading Flusser is to assume he’s talking about analog photography. Yes, he is, but that’s the least relevant part. Imagine, instead, that everything he’s saying about photography he’s saying about the digital. This requires an act of imaginative translation on our part, but once you make that leap, you realize that this 1983 text astonishingly directly addresses our situation some three and a half decades later. For instance, Flusser claimed that the camera was the ancestor of apparatuses that are in the process of “robotizing all aspects of our lives, from one’s most public acts to one’s innermost thoughts, feelings, and desires.” And when we look at social media—from blogs, to Twitter, to Facebook, and to Instagram—we can see he was correct. Like the camera, the Twitter apparatus coerces us, seducing us to tweet, and we dutifully obey. Once we’re hooked in to the game, we become compulsive: the more we tweet, the more we enrich the program, thereby increasing its standing within the larger social media apparatus and ultimately boosting Twitter’s share price. In Flusserian terms, it doesn’t really matter what we tweet (content); it just matters that we keep tweeting (apparatus). For Flusser, the content of any medium is always the series of apparatuses that produced it.

In fact, content plays little role in Flusser’s writing. A photograph is not a carrier of memories—your baby pictures are interchangeable with a million other baby pictures—but a predetermined artifact spit out by the camera apparatus. The camera is a voracious, greedy device, programmed to stalk images the way an animal stalks prey: the camera smells blood and (literally) snaps. On Instagram, the more you shoot, the more you become addicted to the photographic apparatus, which Flusser likens to opium addiction or being on a “photograph-trip.” In the end, you end up working for the camera and the industry that produced it. The more people who use an apparatus, the more feedback the company receives about its camera, the smarter it becomes, and the more users it draws to its base, thereby increasing the manufacturer’s bottom line. For this reason, Instagram keeps adding new filter sets and features in order to retain and broaden its users. To Instagram, what people are photographing is beside the point; the real point is that they keep posting.

Photography is easy. Anyone can push a button and produce a good photograph without having a clue as to the inner workings of a camera. A recent Apple ad underscores this: “Every day, millions of amazing photos and videos are shot with iPhone. That’s because the iPhone makes it easy—for everyone—to shoot amazing photos and video.” If taking good photos were difficult—once upon a time it took a great deal of mastery to take a good photograph (f-stops, light meters, shutter speeds)—Instagram would never be as popular as it is today. The programmers of cameras also strive to keep their interfaces as simple as possible, to discourage experimentation outside of its parameters. The simple interface keeps the photographer pushing the button so they can produce, in Flusser’s words, “more and more redundant images.” The free cost of digital photography keeps the photographer playing the photographic game. (How many people snapping photos with a smartphone only take one shot of any given scene?) Those photos are uploaded to the cloud, where ever-more-redundant photos are stored. Your photo of the Eiffel Tower on Flickr is identically redundant to the millions already stored on Flickr, yet you keep on snapping them (just as I keep downloading MP3s).

I shoot therefore I am. The camera doesn’t work for us. We work for the camera. Our compulsive behavior leaves no scene undocumented. When we take a holiday to a foreign country, the photos don’t show the sights we saw, they show us the places where the camera has been and what it’s done there. We think we’re documenting our own memories, but what we’re actually producing is memories for the apparatus. The digital photograph’s metadata—geotagging, likes, shares, user connectivity, and so forth—proves much more valuable to Instagram than any subject matter it captures. The image is irrelevant in comparison to the apparatuses surrounding it.

Once we buy into a specific apparatus, it’s awfully hard to leave it. Your cultural artifact is locked within that system, constrained by its programming. Notice how an Instagram photo can’t be resized, e-mailed, or downloaded to your hard drive. It can’t exist within any ecosystem other than Instagram’s. Notice how easily Instagram can be integrated into the interface of its parent company, Facebook, but how difficult it is to share on Twitter, a competitor’s platform. While we play the Instagram game by liking and reposting photos, the apparatus knows otherwise: a like is a way for the shareholder to verify that there are consumers populating the program; the greater and more verifiable the user base, the more valuable the apparatus.

Unless the market determines otherwise, the physical value of most printed photographs are negligible: they’re just pieces of paper with information on them—cheap, ubiquitous, unstable, and infinitely reproducible. As opposed to paintings, where the value of the objects resides in their singularity, the value of photographs lies in the information on their surface. Their surface is ephemeral and, in the digital age, rewritable. The photograph is a pivotal artifact, bridging the industrial and postindustrial, embodying the transition from the physical to the purely informational. How that information is distributed determines much of its meaning.

When an image was printed on paper, its ubiquity in physical space was its distributive metric. But even then, the content in a poster or handbill was somewhere other than its image. Flusser writes, “The poster is without value; nobody owns it, it flaps torn in the wind yet the power of the advertising agency remains undiminished . . .” Depending on context and distribution, an image printed on paper could take on different meanings. Unlike, say, an image displayed on a TV screen, a photograph published in a newspaper could be clipped, stuffed into an envelope, and sent to a friend. Passed hand to hand, the movable photographic artifact anticipated our image-sharing networks.

The camera resembles a game of chess. It contains what appears to be an infinite number of possibilities, but in the end those possibilities are prescribed by its programming. Just as every possible move and permutation of a chess game has long been exhausted, every program of the camera too has long been exhausted. In the case of Instagram, with a user base approaching half a million users, its programs are instantly exhausted, resulting in updates that include new features in order to retain users. Although finite, the apparatus must always give the illusion of infinity in order to make each user feel they can never exhaust the program. Or as Flusser says, “Photographs permanently displacing one another according to a program are redundant precisely because they are always ‘new’ . . .” Your cell phone still makes calls, but you’d be foolish to think that it is about being a telephone in the same way you’d be foolish to think Instagram is about expressive photography. But criticize Instagram, says Flusser, and that critique becomes absorbed in its apparatus: “A number of human beings are struggling against this automatic programming . . . attempting to create a space for human intention in a world dominated by apparatuses. However, the apparatuses themselves automatically assimilate these attempts at liberation and enrich their programs with them.”

The only hope? Those who attempt to break the system by doing something with the camera that was never intended by industry: taking intentionally boring photos (Instagram is full of boring photos, but how many of them are made to be intentionally boring?) or blurring images beyond recognition. Twitter is trickier to break. Attempts at self-reflexive critique within the Twitter apparatus are instantly absorbed by the apparatus and celebrated by the corporation to highlight the diversity and playfulness of its expanded user base (once again making the company a more valuable entity).

Flusser’s forays into media have framed, theorized, and unpacked the new complexities of our digital world. By empirically questioning received knowledge and recasting it within crisp lines of history and logic, he’s made the digital legible in a time when its theorization is occluded and murky to say the least. When Willem de Koonig said, “The past does not influence me. I influence it,” I am reminded me of Flusser and how prescient his twentieth-century investigations proved to be for our digitally-soaked twenty-first.

* * *

A precursor to Flusser’s ideas about apparatus was the Soviet avant-garde filmmaker Dziga Vertov’s 1924 concept of the Kino-Eye. Vertov’s argument revolves around the idea that the camera’s eye has a neutrality that the unaided human eye lacks. It’s the difference between you walking down a city street and you looking at an image of that same city street. The image can be contemplated in ways that your eye on the street can’t. On the street, the hyperactive and restless human eye is connected to an equally active brain, one that is instructed to see and process images in very specific ways, whereas the camera lens—a superhuman eye—is connected to a machine, one that records with cool precision what it is programmed to capture. Like Flusser’s apparatus, Kino-Eye democratizes every image it sees—one image is as good as another—cataloging a visually chaotic world by transforming it into information and creating a stockpile of images for later use, exactly what Google Street View does today. On a darker note, Kino-Eye predicted the rise of the surveillance camera, which restlessly and indiscriminately devours all that passes before its lens. London’s ring of steel is Kino-Eye at its most dystopian.

In 1971, the conceptual artist Douglas Huebler set out to make a pre-Internet work of art based on Kino-Eye. His proposition, a cross between sociology and visual art, read: “Throughout the remainder of the artist’s lifetime he will photographically document, to the extent of his capacity, the existence of everyone alive in order to produce the most authentic and inclusive representation of the human species that may be assembled in that manner.” Understanding the futility of the project—naturally, it remained incomplete at the time of his death—Huebler attempted it anyway, roaming the streets of cities around the world with a film-loaded camera, photographing random passersby. He shot the multitudes from the roofs of buildings and rephotographed pictures of crowds from the day’s newspaper. On the web, absurdly totalizing projects like Huebler’s are common: one could imagine crowdsourcing digital photos of “everyone alive” on a Tumblr, yet oddly enough, it hasn’t yet happened.

The photographer Penelope Umbrico creates huge photo sets from preexisting images she finds on the web. In 2006, she began an ongoing series of collecting images of sunsets posted to Flickr, where she crops out everything but the image of the sun itself, prints them out as 4x6 prints, and arranges them in galleries in massive grids. The variety and subtlety of images are stunning. What could be more banal and clichéd than an image of a sunset? Yet Umbrico’s suns are all completely different: some are purplish, some are blue, and others are green. Some suns are tiny dots and others fill the picture frame entirely. Some have halos around them, while others are poetically obscured by wispy clouds. In many, the lens pointed at a bright object creates dramatic solar flares, making them look more like meteorites than suns. A search on Flickr for “sunset” reveals that there are more than twelve million of them housed there, a fact that isn’t lost on Umbrico. Echoing Flusser, she states, “Perhaps part of the beauty of taking a picture of a sunset is that while you are doing it it’s likely that a million other people are doing it as well—at exactly the same time . . . While the intent of photographing a sunset may be to capture something ephemeral or to assert an individual subjective point of view—the result is quite the opposite—through the technology of our common cameras we experience the power of millions of synoptic views, all shared the same way, at the same moment. To claim individual authorship while photographing a sunset is to disengage from this collective practice and therefore negate a large part of why capturing a sunset is so irresistible in the first place.”

The artist Eric Oglander has an ongoing Tumblr called Craigslistmirrors, which features only images of mirrors that are for sale. On first glance, it’s a bit perplexing why he’d want to post a bunch of banal, crappy snapshots of mostly ugly mirrors, but it quickly becomes clear that folks selling their mirrors haven’t always stopped to consider what those mirrors are reflecting. Some reflect vast landscapes and clear blue skies; others reflect curious pets and, in many, the photographers themselves unwittingly appear, oftentimes in various states of undress. “Either the photographer is going to be reflected in the mirror or the inside of their home will be,” says Oglander. “It’s like an invasion of privacy almost, and I think that’s why people bring the mirrors outside.”

Oglander’s work references the seminal 1960s mirror constructions by artist Robert Smithson, which he called displacements. Robert Smithson didn’t make paintings of the sky; instead, by simply placing a mirror in a grassy field faceup, Smithson literally displaced an image of the sky, dropping a square of blue into a sea of green. Blazing azure one day, smoggy grayish-yellow the next, Smithson’s gestures were at once formal color studies, quiet meditations on nature, and political statements on ecology. The mirror is a displacement machine that appropriates all that passes before it. A preprogrammed automaton, the mirror employs no judgment or morals; it indiscriminately displays all in the most democratic manner possible. The mirror works around the clock, reflecting a dark room all night long when its inhabitants are sleeping, or an empty apartment all day long when its inhabitants are at work. Like its cousin the surveillance camera, the mirror displays scads of dark data, but unlike the CCTV, the mirror has no memory: every image passing across its surface is ephemeral. Great crimes are committed before mirrors; no one is ever the wiser. The mirror, then, is closer to a movie screen than CCTV, a surface upon which images are projected—and then reflected in reverse. Like the CCTV camera, the mirror never goes dark. Smash the mirror; disperse the image. Toss the pieces in the trash; they continue to dumbly reflect.

Since 1996, a group of actors/activists called the Surveillance Camera Players have been staging subversive plays adapted from books such as George Orwell’s 1984 and Wilhelm Reich’s The Mass Psychology of Fascism in front of CCTV cameras. While it’s not known if anyone is watching them, their performances—often interrupted by the police—are exhaustively documented by their own cameras in addition to being documented by the surveillance cameras. The Players’ message is a political one: “We protest against the use of surveillance cameras in public places because the cameras violate our constitutionally protected right to privacy. We manifest our opposition by performing specially adapted plays directly in front of these cameras . . . Down with Big Brother!”

The cars festooned with cameras that capture Google Street View drive around the world sucking up images. Meant to provide panoramic views of neighborhoods and buildings to accompany their maps, the cameras often capture unexpected and bizarre occurrences, such as women giving birth on the sides of roads, drug deals in progress, or tigers caught prowling suburban parking lots. One artist, Mishka Henner, scoured online forums where people share the whereabouts of sex workers. He then put those map coordinates into Street View, and indeed, on some of those corners, found images of scantily clad women standing by the sides of the road in isolated areas. He collected these images as a series of photographs that he calls No Man’s Land. While one might presume these women are sex workers, there’s no definite evidence to support that claim. Instead, it’s a mix of conjecture culled from the forums with the visual evidence compiled from Street View that gives the story credibility, one that could easily be misconstrued by legal authorities to arrest these women on charges of prostitution. Henner’s project underlines the Promethean social and political circumstances that arise when nearly every inch of the planet has been surveyed and posted online and acts as a warning for its potential abuses.

Other artists stage performances for the Street View car as it drives through their neighborhoods. Ben Kinsley and Robin Hewlett have staged seventeenth-century sword fights, hired marching bands, and dressed people up in giant chicken costumes, all for the sake of creating strange images that will be incorporated into Google’s official map culture. One online video shows a Street View car approaching on a narrow, rain-slicked Pittsburgh street. The car is forced to drive through a parade with brass bands and baton-spinning majorettes. As the car approaches the parade, it is showered with confetti. Leaving the parade, the car encounters a group of absurdly dressed joggers who animatedly approach it from the opposite direction. Undeterred, the car drives through the spectacle, continuing its recording, seemingly oblivious to the exotic circumstances. Until the car passes this street again, those staged happenings will be preserved on the Google Street View record.

* * *

The first popular photoshopped image was of a dark-haired topless woman in white bikini bottoms sitting on a sandy beach in a tropical paradise with her back to the camera. Her name was Jennifer and on that day in 1987 she was photographed gazing out on a picture-perfect landscape, replete with pale turquoise water and a lush tropical island floating to her left on the horizon line. Puffs of clouds hang in a blazing azure sky. This photo came to be known as Jennifer in Paradise, and was taken by a software developer named John Knoll of his fiancée while they were on vacation in Bora Bora. Shortly afterward, Knoll went on to create Photoshop and this image was distributed with early versions of the program. For many people using Photoshop, Jennifer in Paradise was the first digital image they ever manipulated.

Jennifer’s inclusion in Photoshop was casual, even serendipitous. When the demo package was coming together and sample images were needed to digitize, Knoll just grabbed the nearest photo at hand—a 4x6 photograph on paper that happened to be his fiancée in Bora Bora—and tossed it on a scanner. Spontaneously and unwittingly, an icon was born. An online video from 2010 shows Knoll reenacting the Photoshop demonstrations he used to give in order to show the power of his photo-editing suite. Knoll fires up an ancient Mac and pulls up the image of Jennifer. He runs some primitive functions on Jennifer: first he clones her; then he copies, resizes, and pastes a duplicate image of the island and drops it on the horizon. It’s kind of creepy: you’re watching a reenactment of the future of the image unfurl before your eyes at the site of its inception. And he’s not cloning just anything: he’s cloning his topless wife, who would be cloned endlessly by the first generation of geeks to get their hands on Photoshop.
Constant Dullaart is an Internet artist who has mounted exhibitions based on the photograph. “Given its cultural significance just from an anthropological point of view I thought it would be interesting to examine what values the image contains,” he says. “The fact that it’s a white lady, topless, anonymous, facing away from the camera. [Knoll] offers her, objectifying her, in his creation for the reproduction of reality.” Dullaart suggests that the negative of that photo should be given to the Smithsonian, to celebrate the time when “the world was young, as it still naïvely believed in the authenticity of the photograph.”

As late as 1973 Susan Sontag could still state: “A fake painting (one whose attribution is false) falsifies the history of art. A fake photograph (one which has been retouched or tampered with, or whose caption is false) falsifies reality.” A decade later, Samuel Beckett said the same thing for literature, regarding Duchamp’s ready-mades: “A writer could not do that.” Thirty or forty years ago, fakeness was still the exception, not the rule that it is in today’s digital world. The binary of true/false art/reality bespeaks a less complicated time, before appropriation in the visual arts, digital sampling in music, Internet avatars, and reality TV was the norm. A photographic print was just that: an emulsified surface that clung to a piece of paper. Once out in the world, these physical artifacts tended to be stable objects like newspapers, photographic prints, and bound books. The only way to reconfigure them was with a razor blade and a pot of glue. But even then, they remained paper-bound stable artifacts. These copies often bore signs of their original context: a Xerox of a newspaper photograph, for instance, still carried benday dots and signature typefaces like Imperial in the New York Times. Photographs appearing on the pages of a newspaper had proper authorial accreditations and captions that made their sources readily identifiable and verifiable. Today, photographs emanating from newspaper websites are regularly reblogged without attribution or context; oftentimes the caption doesn’t travel with the photograph, nor does authorial accreditation. These are free-floating artifacts, detached from the anchored signifiers and contexts that first birthed their meaning. A thousand new contexts and meanings emerge from the viral nature of photographic distribution in the digital age.

In Jennifer in Paradise, Dullaart sees embodied a more innocent and hopeful time: a time before the Internet was steeped in surveillance, when few worried about the politics behind software design, the digital divide, the colonizing of the digital commons, and the invasion of privacy; a time before social media and all the venom that came with it. It’s a complicated image. While there’s something touching and pure about it in an idealistic web 1.0 way, it’s also filled with blind spots in terms of race, class, gender, and colonization.

In his artwork, Dullaart often warps Jennifer beyond recognition, radically applying Photoshop’s own tools to her until the iconic image becomes an abstraction. His 2014 online video “Jennifer in Photoshop” is a loop of step-by-step Photoshop filters applied to the image until she is nothing more than a blur, then in reverse until she reappears in full resolution, set to the strains of Bobby Sherman’s 1971 easy-listening song “Jennifer.” In his artworks, Dullaart uses the image of Jennifer in Paradise without Knoll’s permission, something that angered the developer when he found out about it. Knoll claimed, “I don’t even understand what he’s doing.” But it seems like Knoll is the one who is lost, seemingly unable to grasp the full complexity of the forces his software package has unleashed, which is exactly the subject of Dullaart’s work. When Jennifer was asked about Dullaart’s art, she was sympathetic, offering a more realistic assessment: “The beauty of the Internet is that people can take things, and do what they want with them, to project what they want or feel.”

A decade before Jennifer, a group of artists known as the Pictures Generation critiqued the ways mass media images were reproduced and circulated. One of their primary tactics was to rephotograph preexisting photographs and claim them as their own. Inspired by the pop artists, who painted images of mass-produced consumer goods, the Pictures group wielded a camera instead of a paintbrush, entirely removing the hand of the artist. They called into question the nature of originality: can we say there is an original when it comes to an infinitely reproducible medium like photography? Their work was as much critique as it was practice. Long before the Internet, they questioned traditional ideas of authorship, setting the stage for today’s image macros and memes. So you had Jeff Koons rephotographing billboards of brands like Hennessy and Nike and re-presenting them unaltered on the walls of galleries. Sherrie Levine rephotographed reproductions of Walker Evans’s iconic black-and-white photos of Depression-era sharecroppers, then claimed she was the author of those images. Richard Prince did the same with Marlboro ads of leathery-skinned men on horseback in glorious natural settings of the American West. Simply by removing all ad copy and logos, and titling his series Cowboys, they were a sly reference to the dawn of the Reagan era, when the photos were made. All of these works asked the same question: if artists photograph an image—any image—are they the authors of that image? Certainly they pushed the button that created it. If blame is to be ascribed, perhaps the apparatus is guiltier than the artist.

Building on these earlier strategies, Richard Prince recently turned his eye to the Internet when he began appropriating other people’s Instagram photos in a series entitled New Portraits. He downloaded them without permission, printed them out on large canvases, and hung them on gallery walls, adding only a few comments in the comment stream, which he printed along with the images. Each carried a price tag of $90,000. Upon hearing this, the Instagram community went nuts, accusing Prince of exploiting regular people’s photographs for his own financial benefit. One Instagrammer whose work was reproduced by Prince said, “What Prince is doing is colonizing and profiting off a territory of the Internet that was created by a community of young girls,” referring to the Instagram account of SuicideGirls, the alt-erotica stream with more than three million followers, from which Prince liberally poached. Yet what Prince did was perfectly legal. Instagram’s privacy policy states: “Once you have shared User Content or made it public, that User Content may be re-shared by others.” Those offended might have been wise to read Flusser. They were fooled into thinking that their Instagram feeds are private photo albums of their most beloved and cherished images, rather than a façade that feeds a series of voracious apparatuses. What was as remarkable as the amount of money he made from appropriating other people’s photos was the fact that with this one small gesture, our naiveté about the apparatus was so sharply critiqued and exposed.

In 2008, Prince made the series of paintings Canal Zone, which incorporated black-and-white photographs of Rastafarians that were taken by a little-known photographer named Patrick Cariou nearly a decade earlier. Prince took Cariou’s photos and, like the Instagram pieces, blew them up large and printed them on canvas. But instead of just straight appropriations, he added and subtracted elements, at times cutting and pasting images on top of each other, other times isolating Cariou’s images so that they floated in empty fields. Prince also painted heavily on top of some of the photos. In one of the most reproduced images from the series, Prince took a photo of a shirtless Rasta standing in a forest with dreadlocks draping down to the ground, and pasted a blue electric guitar in his hands. He also blotted out the Rasta’s eyes and mouth with blue circles. The paintings generated more than $10 million worth of sales. Cariou, who made about $8,000, from his book, sued. The case went back and forth in court for several years, with the art world hoping for vindication of its long-standing tactics of appropriation, and the photography world hoping to regain control of their medium in a time of ubiquitous digital imagery. In 2013, the court decided in favor of Prince, saying he had transformed Cariou’s photos and it was therefore considered fair use. The irony is that this battle was being played out during the digital age on two analog mediums: paintings stretched on canvas and photographs printed in books. At the heart of the case was neither painting nor money; it was photography, which Flusser presciently called “the mother of all reproducible apparatuses.”

A few months ago, a friend pulled a book off of her bookshelf that was a new appropriation work by Prince, one as radical and daring as anything he’d done. The premise of the book was achingly simple: it was a reproduction of the first edition of The Catcher in the Rye, identical in every way to the iconic first edition, except that everywhere Salinger’s name appeared, it was swapped for Prince’s. The production value of the book was astonishingly high, a perfect facsimile of the original, right down to the thick, creamy paper stock; even the typeface on the book’s pages was identical. The text on the dust jacket—replete with the familiar line drawing of the angry red horse—begins: “Anyone who has read Richard Prince’s New Yorker stories, particularly A Perfect Day for Bananafish, Uncle Wiggily in Connecticut, The Laughing Man, and For Esmé—with Love and Squalor, will not be surprised by the fact that his first novel is full of children.” It’s a dead ringer through and through with the exception of the following disclaimer on the colophon page: “This is an artwork by Richard Prince. Any similarity to a book is coincidental and not intended by the artist.” The colophon concludes with: ©Richard Prince.

For Prince, the book was modestly priced: a few hundred bucks for a limited unsigned edition, with a copy signed by Prince selling for several thousand, matching the identical price of what the signed first edition by Salinger goes for on that day. Remarkably, Prince took a bunch of copies of his pirated edition, spread them out on a blanket on the sidewalk in front of Central Park, and sold them for forty dollars each. It’s unknown how many—if any—he sold or how a presumably befuddled public might have responded to this performance.

Prince is openly pirating what is rather valuable literary property—American literature—practically begging the estate of Salinger to sue him. One imagines that if Salinger’s estate went after him, he’d have the money to settle with them. And, yet—probably because this is a low-profile, low-income-generating project—nothing ever happened. But this gesture, played out on a relatively small scale, on paper, is not really as much about Salinger as it is about the status of the cultural artifact in the digital age, its infinite reproducibility, and our changing notion of authorship and authenticity in the twenty-first century.

* * *

Images on the web take on a Wittgenstein-like character, flickering back and forth between the semantic and the visual, being both at once.
We search for images based on key words that summon images, yet it’s in this interval—between typing and clicking—that the correspondence between the two begins to slip. I enter the word “red” into Google Images and the first result is of a red square from Wikipedia. I assume that the image is from the Wikipedia entry to the color “red” but when I go to the page, I find that it is, in fact, the entry for “Red flag (politics),” which reminds me of Wittgenstein’s claim that “the two propositions, ‘Red is a primary color’ and ‘Red is a color in many flags,’ wear the same linguistic dress.” The tension between language and image on the web is the subject of a recent project by the London-based artists King Zog (Felix Heyes and Benjamin West) called Google, Volume 1, which takes the entire Oxford English Dictionary and replaces every word with the first image displayed when searched on Google Images. The result is a 1,328-page tome that begins, obviously enough, with an image of an aardvark and ends with mysterious scientific-looking diagram, which the book’s index tells me is zymase, an enzyme that catalyzes sugars into ethanol and carbon dioxide.

When I search the book for the image “red” trying to find the r’s I flip through the pages and stumble across an image of a red flag—a Nazi flag, to be specific—and think that I have found the entry for “red.” It is only until I look to one side of it and see an image of a “sweater,” which is followed by a broom “sweeping” that I realize I am looking at the entry for “swastika.” I flip backward, then, trying to find the r’s and when I do, I land on the page with a poster for the movie The Recruit, followed by a medical illustration of a “rectum.” Nearby, I see an image of an open book with the words “verso” and “recto” on it and I know I must be getting close. Sure enough, I turn the page and there is the image for “red,” which is not a solid square of red referencing a red flag, as Google Images today tells me it is, but instead is a movie poster for film called Red. Evidently back in 2013, the day the authors sought the first entry for “red” in Google Images, the movie poster was the top hit. Today, things have changed. Tomorrow—or even later this afternoon—the top hit on Google Images for “red” might very well change again. Printed in an edition of only three hundred copies, each subsequent edition will scoop the top images search terms from that printing date, resulting in an entirely different book each time it’s published.

Baltimore-based artist Dina Kelberman produced a similar project called I’m Google, which is a collection of images she finds on the web and meticulously organizes according to their formal and lyrical properties. Displayed in a seemingly endless scroll, the project visually resembles both Google Images and Pinterest, which, according to her artist statement, “results visually in a colorful grid that slowly changes as the viewer scrolls through it. Images of houses being demolished transition into images of buildings on fire, to forest fires, to billowing smoke, to geyers, to bursting fire hydrants, to fire hoses, to spools of thread. The site is constantly updated week after week, batch by batch, sometimes in bursts, sometimes very slowly.” At first glance, Kelberman’s project feels like she created the most perfect algorithm, one that is able to match perfectly the semantic and visual qualities of images in the most poetic fashion. Yet the truth is that she’s meticulously picking and arranging these images by hand, one after the next. In this way, she’s closer to Christian Marclay’s The Clock than she is Google’s search function that allows you to find images that are visually similar images. Google is a smart formal algorithm but it misses the nuances of what only a human can bring to a project: humor, subtlety, irony, perversity, playfulness, and poetry. It’s not enough to simply “raid the icebox,” and display the treasures because they are there. Instead, it’s Kelberman’s artistic sensibility—her “order of the catalogue,” as Walter Benjamin would put it—that makes a striking counterpoint to the “confusion of a library.”

* * *

Over the course of the year when I was named MoMA’s first poet laureate in 2013, I was fortunate enough to spend a lot of time in the museum among great works of art. Prior to my appointment, as a visitor, I would stand in front of certain paintings, lost for what seemed to be an eternity, completely oblivious of my surroundings. For me, the content of MoMA was its glorious collection; the apparatus surrounding the collection was something I barely noticed. But once I was there every week, I began to see how MoMA itself—its history and its narrative of modern art, the fact that it was MoMA—was influencing what I was looking at and the ways in which I was seeing it.

I found myself filtering my experiences through the lens of “institutional critique,” an art practice that like Flusser’s apparatus takes as its subject matter the way institutions frame and control discourses surrounding the works of art they exhibit rather than focusing on the content of the works themselves. A more traditional approach would be to isolate a work of art and to appreciate its aesthetic values, while ignoring the context in which it is being displayed and the factors that brought it there. Like Flusser, institutional critique claims that the structures surrounding the works are actually what gives the work much of its meaning, oftentimes controlling the reception of a work in ways we as viewers are unaware of. While institutional critique began in the museum, the practice evolved over time to include everything from the production and distribution of art to an examination of the corporate offices or collectors’ homes where the art was hung. By the 1980s, it roped in art criticism, academic lectures, and art’s reception in the popular press. Around the same time, art schools began offering classes in poststudio practice, where the study of institutional critique became an act of making art in and of itself.

So you get works like Hans Haacke’s 1970 MoMA Poll, which was literally a poll that asked viewers: “Would the fact that Governor Rockefeller has not denounced President Nixon’s Indochina Policy be a reason for your not voting for him in November?” Haacke then provided two Plexiglas boxes into which the YES or NO ballots were cast. While, aesthetically, the piece fit into the information-based art of the period, Haacke meant to shed light on the fact that Nelson Rockefeller was a member of MoMA’s board, thereby making visible the normally hidden play of money, power, and politics behind the institution. Another tactic is to take objects from a museum’s collection and rearrange them in ways that highlight the biases of the collection. For instance, in 1993 the African American artist Fred Wilson critiqued the Maryland Historical Society’s collection in relationship to Maryland’s history of slavery. For this show, he regrouped specific objects from the museum in order to speak of, in Wilson’s words, “a history which the museum and the community wouldn’t talk about: the history of the exclusion and abuse that African-American people experienced in that area.” Other works have focused on the physical institution itself. Andrea Fraser, a performance artist, often acts as a docent, leading groups at museums on false tours, not of the works on the walls, but of the security systems, water fountains, and cafeterias. In 2003, Fraser performed what was perhaps the ultimate work of institutional critique in which a collector paid twenty thousand dollars to sleep with her, “not for sex,” according to Fraser, but “to make an artwork.”

What I witnessed at MoMA was institutional critique, being performed not by artists, but by the museum’s visitors. While I was there, I noticed something odd happening in front of Les Demoiselles d’Avignon and other paintings in the museum, something that signified radical shifts in the nature and structure of the museum itself brought on by technology. Instead of reverently standing there in front of Picasso’s masterpiece, scads of visitors were turning their backs on the painting, snapping selfies, and uploading them to social media. I noticed that more visitors were paying attention to their devices than to the artwork on the walls. In every gallery, benches intended for the quiet contemplation of modernist masterpieces were co-opted by smartphone users hunched over their devices. While technology originally claimed to enhance the viewer’s museum experience with one-way audio guides—those high-toned narrators walking you through the collection instructing you how to view the art—today technology works to destabilize the work on the walls. Instead of the official voice of the museum on people’s headphones, now it’s Beyoncé, NPR, Spotify, or any number of different podcasts.

This shift, driven by technology, is happening everywhere in culture now, from the massive open online courses (MOOCs) in higher education to crowdsourced knowledge bases like Wikipedia. In the museum, the artwork—along with the museum’s once unassailable top-down museum narrative—for most visitors has become secondary to the experience of actually being there. The art on the walls is the pretense that draws people to the museum, but once they get there, they’re elsewhere: on their smartphones, facebooking, instagramming, vineing, tweeting, periscoping, texting, faceting—everything, really, except for paying full attention to the art on the walls. The artwork now often acts as a backdrop, evidence that proves to the world you were, in fact, there. Museums in general are alive and well—the Metropolitan Museum of Art reported a record 6.3 million visitors in 2014—but the function of the space has been transformed into a social rather than artistic one: a town square, a place to gather, a place to party, a place to dance, a place to hear music, a place to eat, a place to drink, a place to network, a place to be seen on First Wednesdays and Free Fridays.
Chapter 7: Lossy and Jaggy

Back in college in the late 1970s, I was never the kind of person who brought high-end audiophile equipment into the dorm. In those days, kids would show up to school with speakers the size of refrigerators, chunky solid-state receivers, and turntables that resembled chrome-plated turbine engines. They would set this stuff up to be blown away—literally—hoping to re-create the iconic 1978 Memorex ad in which a shaggy-haired dude in dark shades holds on to his chair for dear life as a hurricane of sound coming out of the speakers threatens to blow him straight back. Inevitably, these people had mediocre taste in music; they were more concerned with how their music sounded than with the music itself. Being a bit of a punk rocker, I tended to go in the opposite direction, listening to crummy lo-fi umpteenth-generation cassette tapes and scratched vinyl, which I played on a cheap all-in-one console that had a turntable, cassette player, radio, and two bottom-end speakers the size of Pop-Tarts boxes. It suited me just fine. I was raised on the trebly sound of AM radio squawking out of transistor radios: for me, if the music couldn’t sound great coming out of tiny speakers, then it wasn’t worth listening to. Later, when CDs came out, I plugged a Discman into that system and the CDs sounded no different than my LPs and cassettes, which sounded no different than the radio. All I heard was the music.

Little did I know that in the digital age, my listening habits would win out. In an era when music went portable, music went lo-fi. In order for it to soar across our networks and quickly settle on our devices, music had to lose a good chunk of its sound due to digital compression. While most of us can’t really tell the difference between an MP3 and a CD—particularly when played over a portable device through tinny white earbuds—not everyone is thrilled about this. For years, Neil Young has grumbled about our digitally degraded audio experience, complaining that even our CDs are compromised. According to Young, they contain only 15 percent of the recording information found on the original analog master tracks. MP3s take that down to 5 percent. He even went so far as to make it the theme of a recent roaring half-hour jam called “Driftin’ Back,” which, like many Neil Young songs, is a paean to how much better things were in the past. “We live in the digital age,” Young moans, “and unfortunately it’s degrading our music, not improving.”

What happened to the other 95 percent? It was knocked out by the compression it took to make MP3s tiny enough to fly across the networks. Uncompressed digital formats were full resolution: you got 100 percent of the sound but they were unwieldy and huge. In the 1990s scientists witnessing the explosive growth of the web began working on a solution that would create listenable audio files that would be small enough to be streamed or downloaded quickly. They used a technique they called lossy compression, in which redundant or unnecessary information was eliminated (hence the technological etymology: “loss”). When you rip a CD to MP3s, the encoder that converts your disc is a lossy one, removing all the sounds that are either humanly inaudible or are so close together the human ear can’t discern one from another. The compression is a sleight of hand, resulting in a venetian blind version of the song: the missing pieces are then bridged by your ear and brain’s natural ability to fill in the missing gaps, resulting in the illusion of full and continuous sound. In lossless compression formats like FLAC (Free Lossless Audio Codec)—good for downloading but not for streaming—the original, uncompressed data is re-created from the compressed version.

When MP3s were in development, the lossy technique was being tested on big, bombastic tracks like late 1950s Nelson Riddle–arranged Sinatra tunes. And they were sounding pretty good: there was so much going on in them that the missing information was unnoticeable. But one day, a scientist working on the compression algorithm was walking down a corridor in the lab and the radio was playing “Tom’s Diner,” Suzanne Vega’s sparse 1981 a cappella song. He stopped and wondered how compression technology would sound on something this stripped down. He saw it as a litmus test for the technology: if an unadorned and unaccompanied human voice like Vega’s was not noticeably altered when compressed, then anything else it was applied to would also pass. After some tinkering, it worked and as a result, the song earned Suzanne Vega the awkward title Mother of the MP3, presumably an appellation she never asked for.

Recently a doctoral music student named Ryan Maguire did a project called “The Ghost in the MP3” in which he took all of the audio that was removed from the MP3 compression on “Tom’s Diner” and re-presented it as his own composition. Apropos of its title, it’s an eerie thing. It’s as if Vega’s song was chopped into small pieces and then flung into outer space. You can still vaguely discern the structure of Vega’s song but it’s been disassembled and scattered, awash in faint echoes and lots of reverb. Shards of Vega’s voice, interspersed with random digital glitches, come through loud and clear, then suddenly vanish without explanation. The overall feeling of Maguire’s piece is indeed ghostly, like listening to the inverse of Vega’s song or perhaps an avant-garde ambient remix of it.

Still, Neil Young is right: we’re missing most of the richness from our listening experiences. But the surprise is that many people don’t seem to mind. The marks technology leaves on our cultural artifacts—as ugly as they may be to some ears—become Proustian madeleines that plunge us down involuntary memory tunnels. From Phil Spector’s 1960s Wall of Sound, to the chunky Fairlight synthesizers in eighties pop music, to the recent blur of Auto-Tune, entire generations get hooked on these musical tropes. Jonathan Berger, a music professor at Stanford, has noted that his students actually prefer the sound of MP3s to higher quality formats because they signified the sound—they call it the MP3’s “sizzle”—of their generation. This particular sound of MP3 compression is as much the hallmark of their youthful audio experience as the cracks and pop of vinyl were mine. When CDs came out, the sounds of LPs—skips and pops—were often dropped in as both nostalgic and ironic gestures, warming up the icy digital format. Sometimes, CDs began with the sound of a needle dropping onto a vinyl record, a reminder that new technologies are haunted by the ones that proceed them.

The MP3 is the latest in a long line of compressed artifacts and technologies. For most people, the pleasures of portability—remember Apple’s enticing tagline for the first-generation of iPods, “1,000 songs in your pocket”—have outweighed the full-spectrum listening experience we’ve lost. Meanwhile, Neil Young tried to remedy his 5 percent problem by developing his own audio format and player called Pono, which restored the full spectrum of missing audio in a semiportable way. It was met with mixed reviews at best: one focus group in a blindfold test couldn’t tell the difference between the Pono and the iPhone, and when used with headphones, the sound of the MP3-based iPhone actually won out. Streaming music services aren’t much better. In order to deliver their music swiftly, they have to compress it. Neil Young recently pulled his music from services like Spotify, claiming that “streaming has ended for me . . . It’s about sound quality. I don’t need my music to be devalued by the worst quality in the history of broadcasting or any other form of distribution . . . When the quality is back, I’ll give it another look. Never say never.”

* * *

In the late nineteenth century, visual art set out to shatter romantic preindustrial notions of coherence. In an age when industrial products were being spit out piecemeal on an assembly line, how could one ever again depict the world as unified? So, in his still lifes, Cézanne painted all sides of an apple at once, putting an end to the idea that the world can be seen from our—and only our—point of view. Instead, all objects and ideas are open to multiple interpretations, a Pandora’s box of possibilities. The ante was upped by the cubists who, taking Cézanne one step further, went from one individual seeing an object from many angles, to the many eyes of a crowd seeing many objects from many angles. Their shattered picture planes represented a fourth-dimensional way of seeing, with all perspectives represented simultaneously. Theirs was a networked vision, harnessing the power of the crowd as opposed to the isolation of the individual. In this way, cubism anticipated common computing ideas from crowdsourcing to “hive minds” and “swarm intelligences.” They also were inspired by cinema, in both its experiments with rapid-fire montage and its mechanical mass distribution of imagery. In his book The Language of New Media, the historian Lev Manovich has eloquently written about how cinema is hardwired into the DNA of computing. Alan Turing’s Universal Turing Machine, for instance, was operated by reading and writing numbers on an endless tape, similar to the way a projector reads data from celluloid film. It’s no coincidence that one of the earliest computers, built in 1936 by the German engineer Konrad Zuse, was run off of discarded 35 mm movie film.

Similar to the cubists, the Italian futurists began incorporating primitive forms of animation in their paintings. Giacomo Balla’s painting Dynamism of a Dog on a Leash (1912) shows a dachshund’s feet blurred in a whir of motion. In fact, everything in the picture that is moving is depicted as such: the leash is like a series of ghostly threads waving multiple times through the air; the person’s feet walking the dog consists of dozens of flying shoes; even the dachshund’s tail is spinning out of control. Futurism celebrated motion-based technology, depicting frame by frame the speed of the motor car, the rhythmic pounding of the assembly line, and the rat-a-tat of the machine gun.

It’s not a far cry from Balla’s early twentieth-century oil on canvas depiction of motion to today’s animated GIFs. The GIF, like the lossy MP3, is a low-resolution format, known in computing terms as jaggy, named for the jagged-edged pixels you see when you zoom in on a lo-res image. Like flipbooks, animated GIFs are made by sequencing a series of still images, hearkening back to the earliest days of cinematic animation technologies like magic lanterns or zoetropes. The best animated GIFs are like pocket cinema, with narratives and punch lines, all unfurling in a matter of seconds, then infinitely looping. And because they have no sound, they have to express strong ideas entirely through visual images, the way silent films did in the early part of the twentieth century. Their brevity, too, has echoes of Edison and the Lumière Brothers, whose reels were often no longer than thirty seconds.
The animated GIF is haunted by earlier technologies like painting, cartoons, and cinema. Yet creating animated GIFs is a modern-day craft. Even today, there is no real shortcut to making a dazzling animated GIF, which still must be constructed more or less in a hands-on way. They’re meticulously woven, frame by frame, much as they were two decades ago, which might help to explain why they’re still cherished: the collaboration between human and machine has kept animated GIFs alive as a sort of technological folk art.

There’s a theory that the moment something verges on obsolescence, it’s also on the cusp of revival, ready to reincarnate itself into new forms and uses. For example, when the horse was rendered obsolete as a mode of transportation, it found a new role in recreation. Or, in a cellular age, when everyone carries a clock in their pocket, the wristwatch evolved from timekeeper to luxury status object. And while magazines were once a source of information, today they’ve come to resemble highly produced coffee-table books, more to be browsed than read. In a similar way, just as the GIF was on the verge of being rendered obsolete by streaming video, it was taken up as an artisanal craft by a small community of GIF builders, who quietly refined them from a jaggy way of communicating information into an art form. Their jumpy low-res frames had been transformed into lushly looping image streams, depicting a tremendous amount of rich information in an insanely compressed form. Whereas in the beginning they were used to convey actual messages, that task had been usurped by streaming video and Flash, so they were free to become playful and artistic, functioning very much the way that image macros do—visual devices for quick and punchy commentary.

It was at this point that they caught the attention of Tumblr founder David Karp, who was so dazzled by the new generation of animated GIFs, that he opened up his platform to them, spurring an explosion of them. Today, Tumblr claims to have twenty-three million animated GIFs uploaded to it each day, and Facebook, which recently started supporting the format, says that five million animations daily are sent through its messaging app. Like emojis, they can convey a great deal of information in a compressed format, the proverbial picture worth a thousand words.

An animated GIF is what McLuhan termed cool media. All forms of low-resolution imagery are cool; all forms of high-resolution imagery are hot. Hollywood is hot; animated GIFs are cool. A hot medium does a lot of the work for you. In the cinema, you’re presented with gigantic images in the highest resolution available. McLuhan claimed that as a result cinemagoers are passive spectators, with hi-res there’s not much left to the sensual imagination. All the blanks are filled in for you; you just have to sit back and enjoy. Narrative complexities are carried particularly well in hot media. A sweeping story coupled with beautiful cinematography displayed on a gigantic screen is what we think of as an optimal film-going experience.

Low-resolution, or cool media, requires you to do some work, as in the case of MP3s, where your ear has to fill in the blanks in order to give you the illusion that you’re hearing it in higher resolution. Visual forms of cool media include comic strips, in which your mind is forced to make the connections between sequential frames, or television in which your eye must patch the mosaic of benday dots in order to give the illusion of a coherent and rich visual experience. We could say that the entire Internet—a huge compression machine—is a cool medium, one that demands an endless amount of participation In this way, cool media has a web-based DIY ethos, one that invites you to customize, tinker with, and remix its artifacts.
We could say that hot media is “strong” and that cool media is “weak.” But in this case, strong doesn’t mean good and weak doesn’t mean bad; it’s actually just the opposite. For the past decade, art historians Hito Steyerl and Boris Groys have written in favor of “weak images,” claiming that in the digital age, a weak or cool artifact is more democratic than a strong or hot one. The Internet and the artifacts that circulate through it—MP3s, GIFs, JPEGs, AVIs—are all, relatively speaking, low-resolution or weak artifacts. What makes the weak artifact powerful is not its resolution or quality but its abundance and availability—the fact that everyone can possess it, whenever one pleases, often for little or no cost. Think of clicking on a freely available but weak lo-res YouTube video from the comfort of your home versus going out to a cinema to pay for a strong visual experience. Obviously they’re completely different experiences, but Steyerl and Groys argue that the weak experience is stronger because of its low-impact economics and the sheer fact of its availability. Due to its high compression rates, even HD streaming video is weak as compared to broadcast HD or DVD video.

Of course this is nothing new: bootleg VHSs and street-stall DVDs have long been a part of the democratic nature of weak images, trading hands for a few dollars and shown under less-than-optimal conditions. Taking cues from both street culture and the counterculture, Steyerl frames the so-called weak image as a type of resistance against consumerism: “In the class society of images, cinema takes on the role of a flagship store. In flagship stores high-end products are marketed in an upscale environment. More affordable derivatives of the same images circulate as DVDs, on broadcast television, or online as poor images.” Politically, she says, the strong image is on the side of “official” culture: capital and corporations. The “poor” image is on the side of “unofficial” culture: file sharing and individuals. Her classification of image quality takes a political turn: “The poor image is a rag or a rip; an AVI or a JPEG, a lumpen proletariat in the class society of appearances, ranked and valued according to its resolution. The poor image has been uploaded, downloaded, shared, reformatted, and reedited.”

There’s a humanistic strain to Steyerl’s logic. File-sharing networks create communities, bridging people from all over the world through the exchange of cultural artifacts. And every time a film is ripped, reformatted, remixed, shared, subtitled, and resubtitled, that artifact bears a human trace, marked by human intention. In this way, these altered weak images are palimpsests, containing records of human experience in ways that official out-of-the-box culture, sealed and protected, can only bear one mark—that of the corporation.

Because weak artifacts are in circulation, they’re useful and dynamic, as opposed to the moldering reels of 35 mm films that languish in the dark archives of institutions, trotted out on occasion as part of a film festival that few will see. The bootleg is distributed with use-value in mind. In the late 1960s, the Cuban director and screenwriter Julio García Espinosa wrote a manifesto called “For an Imperfect Cinema,” in which he went so far as to claim that “perfect cinema—technically and artistically masterful—is almost always reactionary cinema.” Perfect cinema was made by Hollywood; imperfect cinema could be made by anybody. “Film today,” he complained, “no matter where, is made by a small minority for the masses.” That would change with the advent of Super 8 cameras and escalate in the 1970s and ’80s with the widespread availability of video recorders. But Espinosa was prophetic: in the YouTube age everybody—in the famous words of German conceptual artist Joseph Beuys—is an artist. Weak images, then, are popular images in that they can be made and viewed by the many. Because compression makes it possible for weak images to travel long distances efficiently, they lose information and gain speed. Steyerl claims that “this is precisely why they end up being perfectly integrated into an information capitalism thriving on compressed attention spans, on impression rather than immersion, on intensity rather than contemplation, on previews rather than screenings.”

So the problem becomes one of quantity. Who has the time to consume all of these artifacts? It’s all well and good that “everybody is an artist,” but what use is it if no one will ever see your works? Boris Groys puts a twenty-first-century spin on Espinosa: “Whereas before, a chosen few produced images and texts for millions of readers and spectators, millions of producers now produce texts and images for a spectator who has little to no time to read or see them. Earlier . . . one was expected to compete for public attention. One was expected to invent an image or text that would be so strong, so surprising, and so shocking that it could capture the attention of the masses, even if only for a short span of time.”

* * *

The GIF was succeeded by the JPEG, a compressed format that is able to render images with much greater finesse than its predecessor. The jaggy compression works similarly to the way lossy MP3s do, relying on human psychovisual systems to fill in missing information. When these images are printed, most of the information that makes them look good on the screen is lost, resulting in blocky pixelation, which is why our photographs don’t look as good on paper as they do on our devices. But for some artists, the distortion of low resolution (a cool or weak image) is a gateway to twenty-first-century abstraction.

Since 2007, the German photographer Thomas Ruff has taken jaggy low-resolution JPEGs from the web and blown them up to monumental proportions, exhibiting them as framed megaphotographs. His process is one of devaluation: he takes JPEGs from the web and renders them even lower resolution than he found them, compressing them further so that they are, in his words: “worst possible quality JPEGs. Then I get my image.” The dramatic change in scale—from a thumbnail to more than seven feet tall—is shocking, as is his subject matter, which runs the gamut from porn to images of disaster from news sites, such as the burning Twin Towers or Baghdad during the shock and awe siege. Like Steyerl’s weak AVIs or Professor Berger’s students who love the sizzle of MP3s, Ruff’s photographs are a play of human intervention and technology’s fingerprint. When blown up so large, you can really see the compression algorithm at work, as any semblance of visual cohesion is overwhelmed by the complex shades of pixelation at play. One thing these photos reveal is that the underlying structure of our digital images is the grid, a rather basic system of binaries, which when run through an algorithm trick the eye into patching together a seamless image. Because of the play between an iconic image like 9/11 and the blocky pixelation, Ruff’s photographs flicker back and forth between realism and abstraction, being both and yet neither.

For his Nudes (1999), giant blowups of porn JPEGs dissolve objects of desire into pixelated nightmares. Ruff seems to be saying that on the web, porn—up close and enlarged—is nothing more than a pile of pixels, an illusion. What fuels your fantasies is technology, not flesh. When you see works from Nudes from across the room you see a coherent image of eroticism, but the closer you get, the more they fall apart. By the time you’re standing in front of them you feel like Austin Powers when he realizes that the beautiful women surrounding him are not women at all, but are actually fembots.
Ruff's work reifies compression technology as the basis for an artistic investigation, one that is at the heart of our daily experience. He asks, "How much visual information is needed for image recognition? A pretty small quantity of data will go a long way for the brain and the computer, both of which take shortcuts for the sake of speedy comprehension . . . Our brain is very brilliant at interpreting even the lowest resolution, it creates images."
Chapter 8: The Writer as Meme Machine

“It was while looking at Google’s scan of the Dewey Decimal Classification system that I saw my first one—the hand of the scanner operator completely obscuring the book’s table of contents,” writes the artist Benjamin Shaykin. What he saw disturbed him: it was a brown hand resting on a page of a beautiful old book, its index finger wrapped in a hot-pink condom-like covering. In the page’s lower corner, a watermark bore the words “Digitized by Google.”

Shaykin was an MFA student in graphic design at the Rhode Island School of Design when he was given an assignment to choose a book from Brown University’s library that would serve as the basis for a series of projects. Even though he had the physical books readily available, he found it easier, as many people do, to access them through Google Books. Once he came across the first hand, he was hooked, and started digging deeper into Brown’s Special Collections library, which was digitized by Google. He came upon many more anomalies. “In addition to hands and fingers, I found pages scanned through tissue paper, pages scanned while midturn, and foldout maps and diagrams scanned while folded,” he explained. “The examples were everywhere. I quickly became obsessed, and filled my hard drive with gigabytes of downloaded PDFs.”

He collected his strangest findings in a book called Google Hands, which ended up as one in a series of a dozen small hand-sewn books, each focused on a different type of glitch. Through social media, he came into contact with like-minded collectors, and they began swapping artifacts.

There are several collections of Google hands around the web, each one as creepy as the one Shaykin saw. A small but thriving subculture is documenting Google Books’ scanning process in the form of Tumblrs, printed books, photographs, online videos, and gallery-based installations. Something new is happening here that brings together widespread nostalgia for paperbound books with our concerns about mass digitization. Scavengers obsessively comb through page after page of Google Books, hoping to stumble on some glitch that hasn’t yet been unearthed. This phenomenon is most thoroughly documented on a Tumblr called “The Art of Google Books,” which collects two types of images: analog stains that are emblems of a paper book’s history and digital glitches that result from the scanning. On the site, the analog images show scads of marginalia written in antique script, library DATE DUE stamps from the midcentury, tobacco stains, wormholes, dust motes, and ghosts of flowers pressed between pages. On the digital side are pages photographed while being turned, resulting in radical warping and distortion; the solarizing of woodcuts owing to low-resolution imaging; sonnets transformed by software bugs into pixelated psychedelic patterns; and the ubiquitous images of workers’ hands.

The obsession with digital errors in Google Books arises from the sense that these mistakes are permanent, on the record. In 2013, Judge Denny Chin ruled that Google’s scanning, en masse, of millions of books to make them searchable is legal. In the future, more and more people will consult Google’s scans. Because of the speed and volume with which Google is executing the project, the company can’t possibly identify and correct all of the disturbances in what is supposed to be a seamless interface. There’s little doubt that generations to come will be stuck with both these antique stains and workers’ hands.

One of those was Paul Soulellis, the proprietor of the Library of the Printed Web, which is housed in a pristine industrial space in Long Island City. Soulellis, a graphic designer turned book artist, has built a library that consists entirely of stuff pulled off the web and bound into paper books. One book is nothing more than dozens of images of highways rendered flat by flaws in Google Earth’s mapping algorithm. There are grubby, stapled zines consisting of printed Twitter feeds, books of CAPTCHAs (an acronym for “Completely Automated Public Turing test to tell Computers and Humans Apart”) presented as visual poetry, collections of photos of dogs with glowing eyes culled from Flickr, and lots of books where “photographers” like Mishka Henner have selected uncanny moments from Google Street View. While most of them are cheap, print-on-demand editions, a few are highly produced art books. One of the most beautiful books in the library is a collection of hundreds of crummy JPEGs of variations on the Mona Lisa (think the Mona Lisa morphed with E. T., made by a fourteen-year-old), printed on thick, handmade paper, and accordion folded into an expensive slipcase; the combination of the crappy and the crafted is weirdly effective. Then there are absurdly large projects, such as a ninety-six-volume set called Other People’s Photographs, which scoops up material from random Flickr pages.

Amusing and titillating as these images are, it’s easy to forget that they’re the work of an army of invisible laborers—the Google hands. This is the subject of an art work by the Brooklyn-based artist Andrew Norman Wilson called ScanOps. The project began in 2007, when Wilson was contracted by a video-production company to work on the Google campus. He noted sharp divisions between the workers; one group, known as ScanOps, were sequestered in their own building. These were data-entry workers, the people to whom those mysterious hands belonged. Wilson became intrigued by them, and began filming them walking to and from their ten-hour shifts in silence. He was able to capture a few minutes of footage before Google security busted him. In a letter to his boss explaining his motives, Wilson remarked that most of the ScanOps workers were people of color. He wrote, “I’m interested in issues of class, race and labor, and so out of general curiosity, I wanted to ask these workers about their jobs.” In short order, he was fired.

His video later became an art installation called Workers Leaving the Googleplex, a play on the title of the first film ever shown in public, the Lumière brothers’ Workers Leaving the Lumière Factory (1895), as well as a remake by the German filmmaker Harun Farocki with the same name. Wilson’s Google experiences have also resulted in a series of beautiful gallery installations, with large, saturated color photos of those same workers’ hands. Wilson reminds us that we, too, are contributing our own labor to the company’s bottom line. He writes, “Everyone who uses the free Google perks—Gmail, cloud-storage, Google Books, Blogger, YouTube—becomes a knowledge worker for the company. We’re performing freestyle data entry. Where knowledge is perceived as a public good, Google gathers its income from the exchange of information and knowledge, creating additional value in this process. Google, as we know it and use it, is a factory.”

Soulellis calls the Library of the Printed Web “an accumulation of accumulations,” much of it printed on demand. In fact, he says that “I could sell the Library of the Printed Web and then order it again and have it delivered to me in a matter of days.” Since the advent of electronic readers, there’s been a lot of hand-wringing about the demise of the printed page. And for a while, it looked like things were headed in one direction as bookstores folded and e-book sales soared. In an unanticipated twist, in 2015 e-book sales began slowing and print sales began climbing again. It turns out that people read both formats—the Kindle on the train and the paper version at home. In addition, cheap print-on-demand services like Lulu, which offer free PDFs along with physical copies for sale of any given title, have made it possible for people to publish and to buy the kinds of books Soulellis traffics in and proves once again that we’re neither one way nor the other. Straddling the physical and the digital, we’re inhabiting many spaces at the same time in ways that were unthinkable just a decade ago.

* * *

What if the poetic has left the poem in the same way Elvis has left the building? Long after the limo pulled away, the audience was still in the arena screaming for more, but poetry escaped out the back door and onto the Internet, where it is taking on new forms that look nothing like poetry. Poetry as we know it—sonnets or free verse on a printed page—feels akin to throwing pottery or weaving quilts, activities that continue in spite of their cultural marginality. But the Internet, with its swift proliferation of memes, is producing more extreme forms of modernism than modernism ever dreamed of.

These are the ideas of the Canadian media scholar Darren Wershler, who has been making some unexpected connections between meme culture and contemporary poetry. “These artifacts,” Wershler claims, “aren’t conceived of as poems; they aren’t produced by people who identify as poets; they circulate promiscuously, sometimes under anonymous conditions; and they aren’t encountered by interpretive communities that identify them as literary.” Examples include a Nigerian e-mail scammer who writes out the entire Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets in longhand, a data engineer who renders the entire text of Moby Dick into emoticons, and a library scientist who converts Ulysses into QR codes.

Wershler calls these activities “conceptualism in the wild,” referring to the aspect of 1960s conceptual art that concerned reframing, and thereby redefining, the idea of artistic genius (think of Duchamp’s urinal). Conceptual projects of the period were generated by a kind of pre-Internet OCD, such as Sol LeWitt’s exhaustive photographic documentation of every object, nook, and cranny in his Manhattan loft, or Tehching Hsieh’s yearlong practice of taking a photo of himself every hour, on the hour. Today’s conceptualists in the wild make those guys look tame. It’s not uncommon to see blogs that recount someone’s every sneeze since 2007, or of a man who shoots exactly one second of video every day and strings the clips together in time-lapse mashups. There is guy who secretly taped all his conversations for three years and a woman who documents every morsel of food she puts into her mouth. While some of these people aren’t consciously framing their activities as works of art, Wershler argues that what they’re doing is so close to the practices of sixties conceptualism that the connection between the two can’t be ignored.

And he’s right. Younger writers find it stimulating: they are reclaiming this “found” poetry and uploading it to the self-publishing platform Lulu. They create print-on-demand books that most likely will never be printed but will live as PDFs on Lulu—their de facto publisher and distributor. These are big, ridiculous books, like a 528-page book that reprints every single tweet that contains the word “McNugget”; or a book that appropriates more than 400 pages’ worth of Discogs listings of small-bit session players from long-forgotten 1970s LPs; or a project that converts Gertrude Stein’s difficult modernist text Tender Buttons into illegible computer code; or a fifty-eight-page list poem of poets’ names followed by their presumed economic status: “John Ashbery is a rich poet.” “Amiri Baraka is comfortable.”
Quality is beside the point. This type of content is about the quantity of language that surrounds us, and about how difficult it is to render meaning from such excesses. In the past decade, writers have been culling the Internet for material and making books that are more focused on collecting than on reading. It’s not clear who, if anyone, actually reads these, although they are often cited by other writers working in the same mode. There are few critical systems in place to identify which books are better than others. For now, these authors function on a flat, horizontal field creating a communitarian body of work in which one idea or one author is interchangeable with another.

This ethos is evident on the smart art blog the Jogging, where artworks in the form of JPEGs are posted semi-anonymously and, like all blogs, last only until they are pushed off the page by newer works. It is an ephemeral amnesiac data flow, one that swaps the art world’s market-driven frenzy for networked global visibility. On the Jogging, it isn’t really the individual posts that count: the blog’s métier lies in its ceaseless and restless stream of information. The best images on the Jogging are the ones that walk a fine line between sharp humor and weird ambiguity, such as a hacked black-and-white iconic photo of Fidel Castro chomping on his famous cigar. The only alteration the artist made to the found image is a photoshopped blue dot at the end of his cigar. The title is the reveal: Che Guevara Smoking an E-Cig. Not obviously funny enough to be a meme, it’s a sly twenty-first-century mutation of a twentieth-century icon, one that welds critiques of power, commodity, history, advertising, and technology into an Internet ready-made. Another image is entitled wlan router under water, which shows exactly that: two wireless routers photoshopped onto the floor of a swimming pool while the legs of swimmers dangle nearby. It looks like something out of Jaws, ciphered through the digital age. The surreal warping of entertainment and technology—hallmarks of the Jogging—conflate leisure with danger: Wouldn’t plugged-in routers electrocute everyone in the water, killing them faster than sharks would? Or is this a new technology that allows Wi-Fi underwater so that the swimmers could tweet while diving? For now, it’s a sci-fi idea, but in the forthcoming “Internet of things”—where intelligent everyday objects such as appliances communicate with one another over the web—we’ll surely be able to tweet underwater while swimming via a network that’s hardwired into the architecture of a pool.

These works are meant to be quickly favorited, reblogged, and forgotten. They embrace the blips and flickers of the screen, celebrating the life span of a meme as a metric for artistic legacy. Yet the irony is that because the blog ended in 2014, they are now preserved for eternity—or at least until somebody pulls the plug on Tumblr. By then the images hosted there will have been indexed, spidered, and mirrored so many times that their eradication will be virtually impossible, ensuring them a place in a virtual pantheon. In the twentieth century, many artists who claimed to want to burn down museums ended up enshrined in them. The same remains true for the twenty-first: young artists wishing to skirt conventional valorization by the art establishment have, by posting their works on the web, inadvertently become preserved for posterity by the search engine.

Fifty years ago, when Andy Warhol said things like “I want to be a machine” and “It’s easier not to care,” he was romanticizing the formal and emotional cleanliness of machine-based production. Humans, after all, court messiness. Warhol’s salvo is extended by today’s Internet poets, who resemble zombies more than inspired bards, gathering and shoveling hoards of inert linguistic matter into programs, flipping switches, letting it rip, and producing poetry on the scale of WikiLeaks cables. Imagine the writer as a meme machine, writing works with the intention for them to ripple rapidly across networks only to evaporate as quickly as they appear. Imagine poetry that is vast, instantaneous, horizontal, globally distributed, paper thin, and, ultimately, disposable.

* * *

R. Sikoryak is a fifty-one-year-old graphic novelist who has been drawing unoriginal comics for more than a quarter of a century. Inspired by a mix of Raw magazine (to which he contributed) and John Cage (he once drew a strip version of Cage’s aleatory work Indeterminacy), Sikoryak meticulously redraws well-known historical comics and mashes them up with classic works of literature. His book Masterpiece Comics includes strange works like Dante’s Inferno drawn as a series of Bazooka Joe bubblegum comics, and Camus’s The Stranger as the story line for a Superman strip.

His most recent project takes a more conceptual twist. This time, instead of classic literature, he’s matched appropriated comics with the complete text of the iTunes Terms and Conditions for a total of seventy pages, published in three comic books. “Instead of taking an important book that no one has read,” Sikoryak says, “I’ve taken an agreement that none of us have read and have made an unreadable book out of it.” All of the classic comics protagonists—Charlie Brown, Dilbert, Spider-Man, Richie Rich—have been redrawn to resemble Steve Jobs, replete with scraggly beard and round glasses. Each page presents a different cartoon style; every source is cited in a bibliography in the back of the book. There are lovely details: Snoopy’s doghouse is branded with an Apple logo; Hellboy, posing as Jobs, is battling a monster listening to an iPod with white earbud cords dangling from his head.

Why would someone want to do this? Sikoryak, when I asked him, had an avant-garde response: “What would be the most absurd text to put into a comic, the least likely thing to do?” He also selected the legal code because—somewhat surprisingly, given the nature of his work—he’s never had any legal problems. This got him wondering whether those miles of tiny legal print ever really amount to anything.

Sikoryak’s book also speaks to how, after decades of scanning, file sharing, and cutting and pasting, notions of copyright and authorship in the comics world have relaxed. Bill Kartalopoulos, a comics historian and series editor of the Best American Comics series, told me that pirating, copying, bootlegging, and plagiarism have been around since the beginning of modern comics history. “The foundational nineteenth-century graphic novels of Swiss cartoonist Rodolphe Töpffer were pirated in France, England, and elsewhere,” Kartalopoulos says. “At that time, if the French wanted to produce a pirated edition of Töpffer’s Swiss book, someone would literally have to redraw and re-engrave his images onto wood blocks. Later, in the nineteen-thirties and forties, small bootleg comic books called ‘Tijuana Bibles’—also referred to at the time as ‘Fuck Books’—were sold under the table, featuring famous cartoon characters like Popeye and Little Orphan Annie in explicit sexual situations that didn’t normally present themselves on the daily newspaper page.”

By the sixties and seventies, with the counterculture in full swing, everyone from the situationists—who whited out speech balloons and filled them with political text—to the Air Pirates, a collective of Bay Area hippies, were copying and repurposing famous comic strips. The Air Pirates adopted the styles of an array of historical cartoonists as their own (including Krazy Kat artist George Herriman and turn-of-the-century cartoonist Frederick Burr Opper). In Air Pirates Funnies, they took on the Disney entertainment empire and redrew Mickey, Minnie, and company Tijuana Bible–style: smuggling drugs and having orgies. Wanting to stick it to the man, they made sure Disney was aware of their activities. Disney, predictably, sued. They later settled with Air Pirate Dan O’Neill and made him promise never to draw Mickey Mouse again.

Thirty-year-old Blaise Larmee may best exemplify that stick-it-to-the-man attitude. Mostly, he uses web platforms to mess with the comics establishment. Modeling his practice on the situationists, he adores misattribution, altering other people’s comics by inserting his own texts into speech balloons, which end up getting reblogged as authentic artifacts. He once pretended he was named editor for Best American Comics and posted his announcement on a bogus Chris Ware Tumblr he created. He added a note that promised: “If you reblog this Tumblr image, your work will be included in the book.” Asked why he does these things, he answers, “Because I can.”

His most perplexing work may be Labor Day Comic a series of screenshots of mundane tasks that he performed on his computer over the course of one Labor Day. He strung these images, one after another, onto a blog, and called it a comic strip. Frame by frame, we watch him download a Vangelis album from MediaFire—taking screen caps every step of the way—then uploading these images to Flickr, and finally posting the whole process to Blogger. The title suggests a political edge: is this what labor looks like now?

The Greek artist Ilan Manouach takes a more directly political stance in his work. He’s most famous for his book Katz, which is a reinterpretation of Art Spiegelman’s Maus except that all the characters—Nazis, Jews, Poles—are drawn with cats’ heads. (In the original, Jews are drawn as mice, while non-Jewish Germans and Poles are drawn as cats and pigs, respectively.) Besides this, not a single word or image was added or removed. The book caught the legal ire of Spiegelman’s French publisher, Flammarion, and the entire run of one thousand copies was pulped. He did something similar with Les Schtroumpfs noirs (The Black Smurfs), a comic originally published in 1963. In the story, a Smurf village is infected by a black fly that bites all the villagers, turning them from their natural blue color to black, and making them go mad. A cure is finally found and every Smurf is restored to blue. When the book was later turned into an animation, the Smurfs were changed from black to purple to avoid the racial subtexts. Manouach made a facsimile of the original, but transposed each of the book’s four colors onto the cyan plate, resulting in a book that is entirely blue.

For his most recent project, Tintin Akei Kongo, Manouach took the most popular Tintin adventure in Francophone Africa, Tintin au Congo (1931), and had it translated for the first time into Lingala, the official Congolese dialect, without the permission of the publisher. The pirated book will never officially be distributed in the Democratic Republic of the Congo—only one hundred copies have been brought to Kinshasa so far—but for Manouach: “It’s the idea, the provocation, the critique, that is important.” Manouach sees himself as an agitator, a sort of Hans Haacke of the comics world. Trained as a conventional comic book artist, he grew restless by what he perceived to be the limits of the comics world. “There’s not much critical discourse in comics and not much questioning of convention,” he says. “Instead, there’s a lot of nostalgia, which has kept comics politically and aesthetically conservative.”
“Certainly there are many issues connected to fair use that are still in flux, and these artists are all troubling those waters in interesting ways,” says Kartalopoulos. “Comics have historically been considered part of commercial popular culture, and existed to the side of modernist developments for much of the twentieth century. What’s most exciting to me is that now there is a growing critical mass of well-rounded comics artists who are comfortably bringing their avant-garde legacy to the form.” There is also, these days, a renewed sense of the political power of cartooning, in the wake of the attack on Charlie Hebdo and the debates that have followed. These artists’ strategies—Sikoryak’s remixings, Manouach’s recontextualizations, Larmee’s provocations—bring a contemporary set of conceptual tools to the making of comics, tools that could prove helpful in navigating the swift-moving waters of the Internet age.

***

The Internet is indeed changing our ways of reading and writing. Few want to read War and Peace sitting in front of a computer screen; it’s the wrong place for in-depth, lengthy reading, which is better done offline, either on paper or on our devices. When we are in front of a computer hitched to a fast web connection, the last thing we want to do is stop, slow down, and do only one thing. Idling on a highway is antithetical to the medium. Instead, our time in front of a machine is active time: we’re clicking and seeking, harvesting and communicating. Our ways of reading and writing, then, while on the web, reflect this active state. Offering coping strategies, any number of articles tell us to keep our e-mails short, that lengthy e-mails will most likely go unread. They offer suggestions like “commit to making every message five sentences long—or less” and “treat all email responses like SMS text messages, using a set number of letters per response.” The migration to short forms of writing and reading that we’re witnessing—shorter e-mails, tweets, SMS messages—are the latest in a long line of compressed language: hieroglyphs, ideograms, haiku, Morse code, telegrams, newspaper headlines, the old Times Square news zipper, advertising slogans, concrete poems, and desktop icons.

Writing on electronic platforms is transforming aspects of our daily communication into constraint-based writing, a method of writing according to predefined rules initially explored in the 1960s and ’70s by a group of French writers who called themselves the Oulipo (Ouvroir de littérature potentiel / Workshop of Potential Literature). They devised formulas for writing that were more akin to mathematics than they were to literature. A famous Oulipian constraint is called n+7, which involves replacing each noun in a text with the seventh one following it in a dictionary, so that the Declaration of Independence run through an n+7 operation, as the poet Rosmarie Waldrop did in her poem “Shorter American Memory of the Declaration of Independence” begins: “We holler these trysts to be self-exiled that all manatees are credited equi-distant, that they are endured by their Creditor with cervical unanswerable rims.” The writer, bound by the constraints, accepts the results, regardless of how unappealing they may be to one’s own literary sensibilities. Perhaps the most well known work of Oulipo writing is Georges Perec’s La disparition, a 300-page novel that never uses the letter e. (The English translation of the book, A Void, which also doesn’t contain the letter e, is an equally stunning feat.) Other methods used by the group include anagrams, palindromes, and Fibonacci sequences.

By swapping more traditional compositional methods for mechanically inspired ones, the Oulipo anticipated some of the ways we’d use language in the digital age. Every time we tweet, using a 140-character constraint, we could be said to be composing an Oulipian poem. When Twitter gives us a constraint, we agree to comply with it, bending our language suit to its agenda. Few people throw up their arms and say, “I’m refusing to write in 140 characters. I will only write in 190 characters.” Instead, by adapting ourselves to its platform, we find it a perfectly adequate way to express ourselves under a tight constraint. The parameters of Twitter are far from arbitrary: the 140-character constraint emerged from SMS culture, in which the standard character limit is 160 characters, minus 20 characters for the username. (There is talk of Twitter increasing the character limit to 10,000 characters. The preview tweet will show 140 characters with a Read More button. Should this happen, the constraint will be changed from “make the most of what little you’ve got” to the craft of writing journalistic headlines, as the 140 characters will be an enticement to read more. In any event, the nature of the writing will still be determined by the rules set by the apparatus.)

People often grumble that on the web we’ve lost the craftsmanship of writing. But on Twitter, I often see a great deal of craft going into the composition of tweets. The constraint alone brings craft to the fore: how can I say something with such limited real estate? And then there is the game of the compositional method itself: watching the character count dwindle, then precisely editing and revising the tweet so it will fit into its allotted space. We substitute ampersands for “ands,” delete commas, double spaces, and redundant words, use hashtags, and employ URL shorteners to craft the most compressed language possible. Many of our tweets go through this highly edited process, finally arriving at a perfect tweet, one in which a punchy statement is made with no characters left. Sometimes at the end of this process when we hit Send, we feel like we’ve posted a small literary jewel.

Twitter doesn’t come with a how-to manual. We learn it by playing it. We tailor our writing to the game: be pithy, be clever, be polemical, and there’s a chance you’ll be read and retweeted; be mundane, be dull, only retweet others, and you’ll most likely be on the lower end of the game. As novelist Sheila Heti put it, “You know within a matter of seconds if your tweet was successful.” Twitter is reminiscent of Wittgenstein’s concept of language games, in which he tried to tease out the unwritten rules of how we use language. Wittgenstein conceived of language as a board game involving, at the minimum, two players: a sender and a receiver. Speaking a sentence, he said, is like moving a piece on a board; the other player’s response is the next move. What ensues is a conversation, an elaborate demonstration of the rules, structures—and inevitably, the faults and failings—of human language. Almost like an alien discovering language for the first time—William S. Burroughs referred to language as “a virus from outer space”—Wittgenstein questioned basic linguistic tenets: how our rules were developed, acquired, accepted, their various uses, and importantly, how they can broken. A language game, Wittgenstein informs us, is a delicate one: failure to play well will result in potentially tragic misunderstanding.

Social media sets up the game board, gives you the structure, pieces, and a stage on which to play, but outside of some underlying rules—edicts prohibiting impersonation, violence, threats, violation of copyright, etc.—it comes with no instructions. Like language itself, its norms evolve through community engagement; trial and error shows what works (what people respond to well) and what doesn’t. The rules of the game continually change with the platform, which is constantly tweaked to accommodate those ever-evolving rules, along with user feedback and investor concerns. The language itself inscribed into the interface is determinative of the platform’s tenor. The word “follower” on Twitter or Instagram means something very different than Facebook’s “friend.” Followers imply that there are leaders—a vertically quantifiable power dynamic—whereas the concept of friendship is more ambiguous and horizontal. On Twitter and Instagram, there’s always someone with more followers than you, making them more powerful than you, as opposed to Facebook’s limit of five thousand friends, an accomplishment attainable by many, therefore roughly democratic at heart. While we often use Twitter followers as a metric of power, we rarely do the same with Facebook friends. Followers, a synonym for sycophants, are endlessly expansive, emphasizing the underlying cutthroat power dynamic in play.

These same power dynamics are expressed throughout some of the most popular forums in digital culture. Take the tech blog Boing Boing, for instance. They’re one of the most visible blogs on the web, but they create very little original content. Rather they act as a filter for the morass of information, pulling up the best stuff. The fact of Boing Boing linking to something far outweighs the thing they’re linking to. The culture of citation and name-checking on the web has resulted in a cascade of “re-” gestures: retweeting, reblogging, regramming, and reposting. Good citation determines the worth of, say, your blog or your Twitter feed, warping the once-disdained idea of name-dropping into a widespread, powerful practice.

Social media is an economy of citation rather than engagement. For instance, on the UbuWeb Twitter feed—which is connected to the site of avant-garde artifacts I’ve run for the past two decades—we’ll tweet out something very obscure, lengthy, or difficult. Within a matter of moments, it’s been retweeted hundreds of times. No one had the time to actually engage with what we’ve tweeted, rather it’s something they’ve heard or knew about—name-checking—and were eager to pass along to their followers. Twitter’s tweet activity dashboard shows this to be true. On a tweet that had 31,861 impressions, was retweeted 151 times, and liked 245 times, there was only 66 actual engagement with the content I was linking to. And from that one tweet, the feed only garnered one new follower. This point is made in an even more direct way when I mistweet a broken link. No matter. Broken link and all, it’s still retweeted ad infinitum.

While word of mouth has always been the way certain types of information have been passed along, in the digital world, strong cultural capital is accumulated being the originator of something that is widely retweeted or regrammed. As social media evolves, it gets twitchier, charting micromovements in ever-subtler ways—I now see who has retweeted a tweet I have retweeted—which keeps us in the game tallying up the likes and glued to the screen.

* * *

Twitter’s linguistic roots lie deep in modernism. James Joyce’s Finnegans Wake, perhaps the most unreadable book ever written has, uncannily, set the stage for hashtags. Joyce’s book, published in 1939, was written as a linguistic dreamscape (it was labeled by one critic as “dreamspeak”), one that sought to bring the language of dreams and sleep to the page. To write Wake, Joyce crammed notebooks with random thoughts and snippets of language he heard spoken on the street, on the radio, or read in newspapers, which became so dense and thick that even Joyce himself, with his notoriously bad eyesight, couldn’t decipher them. Instead, he began transcribing exactly what he saw in its messy state to a typewritten page. He then further mangled the language by splitting up some words and recombining others, forming complex compound words, not dissimilar to the way the German language works. So you get compound neologisms like supershillelagh, happygogusty, soundhearing, smellsniffing, and neverheedthemhorseluggarsanddistiletomine. They’re all readable; you just have to be patient and read them closely, carefully deciphering each word. Because hashtags and URLs allow no spaces, compound words became necessary. Some examples of long, Joycean domains are:

http://www.thelongestdomainnameintheworldandthenosomeandthenesomemoreandmore.com/http://www.abcddefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyzabcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyzabcdefghijk.com/http://llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwllllantysiliogogogoch.co.uk/ (named after a Welsh village) http://3.14159265358979323846264338327950288419716939937510582097494592.com/ (the first sixty-five numbers of pi)

Throughout Finnegans Wake, Joyce punctuated the text with ten one-hundred-letter words that he called thunderclaps, which are comprised of words in various languages etymologically, visually, and aurally that relate to the theme of thunder. He uses these words to break up the book into several chapters, referring to various periods of cultural history, from the fall of Adam and Eve:

bababadalgharaghtakaminarronkonnnbronntonnerronntuonnthunntrovarrho unawsksawntoohooohoorodenenthurnuk

. . . to Thor, the Norse god of thunder . . .

Ullhodturdenweirmudgaardgringnirurdmolnirfenrirlukkilokkibaugimandodrrerinsurtkrimmgernrackinarockar

. . . which has 101 letters, and is thus able to fit in a 140-character tweet with thirty-nine characters left to spare.

The first Twitter hashtag, published by the former Google designer Chris Messina in 2007, was #barcamp, referring to a technology conference called BarCamp. Notice, though, how Messina dropped the capital letters, making it less readable and more perplexing; by stripping out the capitals, he landed himself squarely in Joycean territory. Today, Twitter and Instagram are flooded with words that could be straight out of the Wake: #photooftheday, #follow4follow, #iphoneonly, #dylanobrienfanpage, or #themazerunnermovie.

Aping the speed of technology, linguistic compression was at the heart of modernism. In 1906, the anarchist art critic Félix Fénéon published anonymously composed three-line novellas as filler in the Paris daily newspaper Le Matin. They were intended as sidebars or distractions to the bigger stories of the day, compressed as digestible sound bites of the day’s news:

Responding to a call at night, M. Sirvent, café owner of Caissargues, Gard, opened his window; a rifle shot destroyed his face.

On the stake where they tied him up, four amateur policemen beat with sticks the young thief Dutoit, of Malakoff, whom they caught.
As her train was slowing down, Mme. Parlucy, of Nanterre opened up and leaned out. A passing express cracked both her skull and the door.

Fénéon’s faits divers were much more than newspaper filler. Delicately meshing form with function, they were tiny poems in the guise of compressed Zolaesque potboilers, meant to quietly explode on the newspaper page snuggled among more “important” stories. Intended to fly under the radar, they were subversive and, like well-honed tweets, gorgeously crafted. It’s no wonder that a century later they’d be recognized as poetry. Predictably, Fénéon’s “novellas” today have their own Twitter feed.

Perhaps inspired by gestures like Fénéon’s, a group of Italian futurists in 1915 claimed: “It’s stupid to write one hundred pages where one would do.” It was advice that Ernest Hemingway would heed when he composed the shortest novel ever, consisting of six words—a mere thirty-three characters (spaces and punctuation included)—which he penned in the 1920s:

For sale: baby shoes, never worn.

Allegedly written on a lark as a bet among a group of drunken writers in a New York restaurant as to who could write a six-word novel, Papa scribbled his quickly down on a cocktail napkin and won. While it displays all of Hemingway’s characteristic wit and brilliance, research has shown the story to be apocryphal. These words had been kicking around in various forms in newspapers and advertisements before Hemingway snagged them. In 1906, an ad read: “For sale, baby carriage; never been used. Apply at this office.” And in 1912, another ad, perhaps inspired by the first, said: “Baby’s hand made trousseau and baby’s bed for sale. Never been used.” Like a game of telephone, variations on this theme continued throughout the early twentieth century. Clearly, Hem—a newspaperman—dug into his vast mental knowledge of the field and, on the spot, reframed preworn ad copy, claiming it as an original—and brilliant—novel story. Hemingway’s gesture is a reminder that all language is preexisting and that smart recontextualization can often make used words new. On the web—an environment where language is cut and pastable—claiming originality is a tricky game. If you can think of it, it already exists on the Internet, which is why people often come up with the identical concept at the same time, a phenomenon known as multiple discovery. As the mathematician Farkas Bolyai noted: “When the time is ripe, these things appear in different places in the manner of violets coming to light in early spring.”

***

Since 2010, Steve Roggenbuck has been producing poetry that is made, distributed, and viewed almost exclusively on the web, taking the form of Facebook posts, YouTube videos, and image macros. He became best known for a series of videos that show Roggenbuck either in bare apartments or out in the forest, manically improvising poems that celebrate the cosmos and our place in it. In one video, he screams at a gray sky: “Make something beautiful before you are dead . . . Maybe you should stand in the rain! You’re alive right now!” But this ain’t no tree hugger or Iron John. There’s an intensity and an edge to his work verging on violence, which is at once terrifying, hypnotic, and completely moving. Roggenbuck uses shaky handheld cameras, hazy inspirational background music, and rough jump cuts. Purposely aping the look of amateur videos strewn across YouTube, they are meticulously crafted infomercials for poetry. In another video, Roggenbuck, with his boyish acned face, thick eyebrows, and scruffy hair, stares intensely into the camera and asks: “I’m interested in marketing, but I’m mainly interested in marketing the moon. Do you love the light of the moon, sir? And if you don’t, can I convince you?”

Along with Tao Lin, Roggenbuck is one of the bright stars of Alt Lit, an online writing community that emerged in 2011 and harnesses the casual affect and jagged stylistics of social media as the basis of their works—poems, stories, novels, tweets, and status updates. Its members have produced a body of distinctive literature marked by direct speech, expressions of aching desire, and wide-eyed sincerity. (“language is so cool. i can type out these shapes and you can understand me,” or “Yay! Dolphins are beautiful creatures and will always have a wild spirit. I have been very lucky because I have had the awesome experience of swimming with dolphins twice.”) The poems and stories, published on blogs and Twitter feeds, are usually written in the Internet vernacular of lowercase letters, inverted punctuation, abundant typos, and bad grammar. While other web-based poetry movements exploit appropriated text—cutting and pasting or scooping vast amounts of preexisting data—Alt Lit tends to use emo-heavy, homespun language that bears the urgency and candor of a status update; no sentiment is too trite to be repurposed as poetry.

This type of writing has deep roots, extending back to the cosmological visions of William Blake, through the direct observation poems of the imagists, the anti-art absurdities of Dada, and the nutty playfulness of surrealism. In the second half of the twentieth century, a major touchstone is the beats, particularly Allen Ginsberg’s spontaneous mind poems, Jack Kerouac’s unfiltered spew, and Gary Snyder’s environmental consciousness. The concrete poet Aram Saroyan’s purposely misspelled single-word poem “lighght” is a model for much of the wordplay that occurs here (gorgeous moments like the reimagining of the words “can’t” and “youuuuu”). But there’s a punk-inspired outlaw energy rippling through much of the work here.

Alt Lit and its siblings Weird Twitter (a group of writers who abuse the platform’s 140-character conventions) and Flarf (an early Internet poetry movement), cull poems that feel like the Internet itself, jammed with screen caps of Twitter updates, image macros, and photoshopped collages that appear between lineated verse, short stories, and blog entries.

One prominent Weird Twitter poet is Jacob Bakkila, then a BuzzFeed employee who between 2011 and 2013 wrote under the pseudonym of @Horse_ebooks, a feed that was widely presumed to have been written by a spambot. The feed was widely followed; people were charmed that a bot could’ve come up with lines like: “Their negativity only served to push me deeper into the realms of soap making” or “HOLY COW!! . . . DOG TOYS ARE GETTING EXPENSIVE WHY NOT.” In 2013, Bakkila announced that the feed was indeed authored by him and that the project was finished. When @Horse_ebooks was thought to be a machine, the misspellings, non sequiturs, and fractured sentences were charming, the by-products of an inferior literary “mind” whose struggle to get it right humanized it.

In his video “‘AN INTERNET BARD AT LAST!!!’ (ARS POETICA),” Roggenbuck talks about his debt to the past. “Five and a half years ago, I read Walt Whitman and it changed my life,” he says. “Walt Whitman had made me appreciate my life more actively than I had ever appreciated it before. Walt makes you step back and say, the world is wonderful, this whole thing that is going on is wonderful. Pay attention to what is going on.” Technology is the key. “The purpose of the Bard is my purpose,” he says. “This is the dream for poets, to be a poet when the Internet exists. Man! We got an opportunity!” The video concludes with Roggenbuck connecting the past and present: “You know that Walt Whitman would die for this, that Walt Whitman would be on a TweetDeck, kicking his legs up, and going ha-a-a-ard.”

In 2014, the visual artist Cory Arcangel published a book about procrastination called Working On My Novel, which was repurposed from his Twitter feed, which only retweeted tweets that contained the phrase “working on my novel.” He then culled the best of them into a paperbound book. Each page contains one tweet:

Currently working on my novel and listen to really nice music.
Yeah I’m a writer deal with it.
Sierra Brown –1:25 AM –1 Dec 12
I’m working on my novel again, and it feels good, you guys. I love my mind.
Stephen Mangol –11:44 PM –23 Sep 12

As Arcangel explains, “Part of the fun was that if you’re twittering about how you’re working on your novel, you’re probably not working on your novel! I love these situations.” What were they doing instead of writing? Wasting time on the Internet—which is exactly what Arcangel was doing when he wrote this book, though artists routinely waste time as part of their creative process, thereby cleverly and selfreflexively conflating procrastination with production.

In 2010, the Pulitzer Prize–winning fiction writer Jennifer Egan published an 8,500-word story consisting of tweets—one tweet a minute, in one-hour-daily bursts—over nine days on the New Yorker website.
Although the text was written beforehand, Egan’s story was as much about critiquing distribution—isn’t Twitter supposed to be spontaneous?—as it was about what she was writing. But what she was writing was good: each tweet stands alone as a self-contained tweet, yet builds, tweet by tweet, into a narrative. Her Twitter novel begins:

People rarely look the way you expect them to, even when you’ve seen pictures.
The first thirty seconds in a person’s presence are the most important.
If you’re having trouble perceiving and projecting, focus on projecting.
Necessary ingredients for a successful projection: giggles; bare legs; shyness.
The goal is to be both irresistible and invisible.
It ends 607 tweets later with:
You won’t know for sure until you see them crouching above you,
their faces taut with hope, ready to jump.
Egan’s twitter novel is a lovely rebuttal to Arcangel’s book. She had actually been working on her novel for over a year, but then distributed it quickly and “spontaneously,” blasted out in crystalline perfection over social media.

Coda: The Revolution Will Be Mobilized

AT&T recently ran a series of ads promoting its merger with DirecTV that had the tagline: “The revolution will not only be televised, the revolution will be mobilized.” One ad opens by showing various nighttime locations in New York City with lots of screens—places like Times Square and sports bars. At the same time the denizens of those locations are all glued to their mobile devices. It’s a hyperconnected, superdistracted world; everyone is furiously multitasking, keeping one eye on their device and the other on the huge public screens. Suddenly, without warning, the screens glitch and go black. In the silent darkness, the camera pans across legions of bewildered and frightened faces that look up from their devices hoping for some explanation. Then, in another instant, the screens blink and flash back to life. The camera pans across the crowd, visibly relieved. Their smiling faces are now glued to the reactivated screens, which display clips from films like The Matrix, with Morpheus saying, “After this, there is no turning back.” A user picks up his smartphone to find Mr. Spock proclaiming, “History is replete with turning points.” A woman swipes a giant touch screen that displays a jubilant fist-pumping A-Rod, as a voice-over screams, “When fantasy becomes reality!” The ad ends with the final scene of Casablanca, projected on the skyscrapers of Wall Street: “Louie, I think this is the beginning of a beautiful friendship,” ballyhooing the convergence of TV and mobile media. The future has arrived and it’s better than we expected. In that one glitch, it’s as if the entire world got a huge reboot into the future.

The ad, with its mix of hope, fear, and redemption, brought to mind the Y2K hysteria. Just past midnight in 2000 on that New Year’s Eve when the world didn’t end, my sister-in-law, a historian at Berkeley, explained to us that traditionally a moment of doubt occurs right before cultures fully embrace new circumstances. She compared the Y2K crisis to previous millennial frenzies, suggesting that our thousand-years’ fears this time around were being displaced not on God, but on technology. She added that cycles of guilt, repentance, and grace often accompany such trials, which always turn out to be nothing more than fear-fueled mirages. The Y2K introspection was the final barrier to our full embrace of technology, which was collectively vanquished that evening. With the dawn of the new millennium, we were poised to move into—in the words spouted by a cartoon character on the AT&T ad—“The future, to the glorious future!”

The theorist Paul Virilio has a concept he calls the “integral accident,” which says that every time a technology is invented, an accident is invented with it. So, when the ship is invented, you get a shipwreck; the train, a train wreck; the airplane, the plane crash. These early technological accidents impacted a geographically specific area: the woods where the plane went down was affected in isolation. But when it comes to electromagnetic waves, such as radiation from a nuclear accident, the results of that accident are no longer felt locally but have networked implications. When the Fukushima reactor melted down, the radiation traveling through the Pacific Ocean food chain endangered fish on the West Coast of America. Similarly, market meltdowns in China crash Western economies. A virus in an electronic network can act with devastating results, infecting many, not just one. The integral or whole accident moves from local to general.

Little did we know that a mere year and a half later, an older technology—airplanes—would engender an integral accident in ways that Y2K could not. On 9/11 in New York City, overloaded cell phone networks went dead and overtaxed sites like CNN.com and NYTimes.com refused to load. Subways, buses, and commuter trains—many of them controlled by computers—stopped running. The island was sealed off from the rest of the world, thrown back to the darkness of earlier times. Broadcast television for much of Manhattan was unavailable as the giant TV antennas atop the Twin Towers were no more. Like those screen-added citizens in the AT&T ad, we sat there in the dark bereft of our devices, huddled close to our transistor radios trying to get the latest news as if it were the great New York City blackout of 1965. For the next week or two, our technology barely worked; even our data-driven stock markets went dark. Lower Manhattan, closed to vehicular traffic, resembled a cross between a nineteenth-century village and post-WWII Berlin. We languidly ambled down the great avenues as if they were country lanes, while in the background great plumes of acrid smoke spewed from the Lower West Side.

Without distraction from our technology, we rediscovered each other, looking into faces rather than screens, slowing down for person-to-person chats while we sat in silent parks, soaking in the glorious mid-September sunshine. There was an eerie silence in the city, one that was punctuated only by the frequent wailing of sirens. It was an escape from the stress of recent events, an enforced return to a lost time, but one that could not last. As the networks sprang back to life and the transportation began running again, we picked up right where we had left off, roaming the streets with Blackberrys glued to our palms, each in our own bubble. Over the next few years, crises like blackouts and hurricanes would plunge us back into darkness for short periods. These enforced digital detoxes became more harrowing than refreshing. During Hurricane Sandy, impromptu charging stations powered by generators sprung up on the streets, as groups of New Yorkers huddled together in the cold, waiting an eternity for their devices to charge before they headed back to their primitive dark caves.

AT&T’s ads of course were riffs on Gil Scott-Heron’s 1970 song “The Revolution Will Not Be Televised,” which proclaimed that media would play absolutely no role in the forthcoming social and political revolutions that had begun in the 1960s. Forty-five years ago, Scott-Heron had seen how all experience had been influenced, framed, and saturated by media, robbing us, he felt, of our human experience. We had been turned into zombies, bent on consumerism and stripped of our political import. He was pleading for deprogramming, hoping we might reject media spectacles and instead take to the streets, where the revolution would happen away from the cameras, in “real time,” where there would be no “instant replay.” After all, if the urban riots of the 1960s showed anything, they demonstrated that highly technological civilizations could be plunged into darkness and chaos with basic means: the striking of a single match or the throwing of a Molotov cocktail. AT&T’s snarky usurping of Scott-Heron’s political message proclaimed total victory; corporate-sponsored technology was now a foregone conclusion and there would be no turning back. Ever. The future had arrived, and it looked an awful lot like Big Brother.

But the truth is more complex than that. AT&T’s ads showed us a one-sided, oversimplistic, skewed vision of the “revolution.” At a Black Lives Matter panel I attended recently called “The Fire This Time,” an audience member asked why and how the movement emerged when it did. One of the panelists responded by simply reaching into his pocket and holding up his smartphone. In an unanticipated twist to both AT&T and Scott-Heron, the revolution is, in fact, both televised-uploaded to social media and replayed endlessly—and mobilized (people mobilized by mobile media) in the service of justice. The corporate technological apparatuses that Scott-Heron had so rightly feared had now been distributed among the citizenry to record trespasses that not long ago went unnoticed, able to bring light to the darkest and most unjust corners of the world. The fire this time is a digital flame, capable of illuminating darkness and torching unjust systems.

Many articles I read yearn for a return to solitude and introspection, quiet places far removed from the noises of our devices. But those places, away from the rabble of the street, are starting to remind me of gated communities: highly patrolled spaces where discourse is circumscribed and vetted. What they are ignoring is that for many communities, the presence of cameras to record and distribute events that entrenched powers that be would rather not have anyone see, are tools of social justice, crucial to pointing out abuses of power. I read that our devices are removing us from life, but when a device records an injustice, it’s an indicator of presence, not absence.

In another one of those AT&T ads, the line between presence and absence is obliterated as image after image is shown of people watching their devices while they are doing something else. A guy in a stuffy concert hall sneaks a peek at his smartphone while a voice-over decries: “Flip between the fight, the game, and the ballet you didn’t want to go to!”; or someone sweating it out on a treadmill, phone in his hand: “Binge while you lose weight!”; a surfer in the curl of a wave: “Channel-surf while you surf!”; or a mountain climber dangling in midair: “Enjoy a good cliffhanger while you hang from a cliff!”

Like many, AT&T would like you to think we use our devices in one way only: to indulge in frivolous media while we are doing things we don’t want to be doing. However, the truth is more complicated. Our use of media mimics our circadian rhythms, as we cycle through periods of being awake and being asleep. We are neither complete zombies, nor completely present: usually it’s a mix of the two. The smartphone that captured the police shooting death of Walter Scott might have been, just a moment before, playing Candy Crush Saga, and right afterward, wasting time on the Internet.
Appendix: 101 Ways to Waste Time on the Internet

What follows is a set of ideas on how to waste time on the Internet. They were authored by my class in the initial offering of Wasting Time on the Internet at the University of Pennsylvania, January–April 2015.

1. Have one person browse the Internet while connected to a big monitor. A group stands behind that person loudly screaming what to click on. It would begin by one person at a time yelling commands: Click that link! Type this into the status update window! Then it gradually increases to a polyphonic cacophony of unbearable intensity.

2. Instagram something with the intention of it being taken down by Instagram. Take a screenshot of it; keep a record of it. Instagram the screenshot. Screenshot that Instagram. If it is taken down again, repeat the process until all you’re posting is a screenshot of a screenshot of a screenshot . . . of the original photo.

3. Pass your laptop to the person next to you. For one minute, they can open anything on your computer. Once something is opened, it must be left opened. You may not alter or delete anything, just expose. At the end of one minute, you pass that laptop to the person on your left and they get one minute with it. By the time it arrives back to you, everyone will have had their turn with your laptop. Everything that people have opened will remain open on your screen for you to see.

4. Delete as much as you can from Facebook. Avoid deleting friends, and avoid deleting your account. Keep a tally and see among your friends who can delete the most.

5. In a group, skype a person not in the group. Refuse to answer any questions about why you did this.

6. In a partner’s Facebook account, find their oldest message and who it was sent to or by. On your own account, message that person and have a conversation.

7. Go on Netflix, and look at the first suggestion for your Top Picks. If you’ve already seen it, then pick the next suggestion. Read a generic Wikipedia article about the show/movie, and write a Facebook status using what you’ve learned (develop an opinion or a question or a statement). The status should not mention that you haven’t seen the show/movie. Tag at least one person in the status.

8. For a period of hours, record your face with your webcam as you use your computer. Choose a long enough time span that you will forget the camera is on.

9. Delete your Facebook profile picture and leave it blank for as long as you can.

10. Attend a lecture, meeting, performance, meal, or movie and be on your smartphone the entire time.

11. Sit in a circle with a group and open your laptops. Plug your headphones into the computer to your right. Play music for your partner with this goal: Make the listening environment as annoying as possible. Play music the person hates. Play several songs at once.

12. Browse only using the earliest version of Internet Explorer you can find, for as long as you can. You may not close any pop-ups or tabs that appear.

13. In a group, sit in a circle with laptops. Plug your headphones into the laptop of the person to your left and play music for your partner. Let the vibes of the music your partner plays determine the next song you play for your partner. Try to get the circle to reach an equilibrium.

14. In a public place, have a partner receive instructions on their cell phone from the other partner sending them. Have the receiver do whatever the instructions say while the sender watches from the side.

15. Find a music mashup online and write a serious review of it as though you are a New York Times theater critic.

16. Post something to a friend’s Facebook wall as if you were talking to someone else. Be as specific as you can.

17. Find a piece of audio you believe summarizes and represents the entire Internet.

18. Find a social media profile of someone you know or do not know and re-create their profile on your own page.

19. Make a dating profile for a partner and get them as many dates as you can.

20. On an online shopping website, attempt to fully re-create what you are wearing. Then find photos of other people wearing those clothes and collect them in a folder. In a group, compare to see who can find the most photos of their current outfit.

21. Take a resume from LinkedIn or an online resume sample site and apply for several jobs using this resume, as well as an online sample cover letter if one is required. Apply to these same jobs with your own resume and cover letter.

22. Display provocative captions on a projector and cycle through them quickly. Have a group post a Facebook status impulsively to each one.

23. Take a screenshot of as many viral YouTube videos as you can. Make a slideshow that displays the images as rapidly as possible.

24. Place a camera in a heavily used room. Make sure everyone who goes through the room is aware that the camera could record them, but that it may not. Covertly turn on and off the camera during the period of time.

25. Find a very public space, sit in a closed circle with your laptops. One person selects a video from Pornhub. At the count of three, everyone clicks on the video and watches it together.

26. Find your biggest fear on the Internet and send it to a friend.

27. Think of ten friends who have different ideas about the Internet than you. Send a message to each of them asking what there is to do on the Internet. See what they tell you to do. Do nothing until one of them responds, then do it as quickly as you can, and ask another. While waiting for responses, think about what you asked them, how you phrased it, and why some did and did not respond.

28. Watch people in a public area and write down their physical attributes as if you were writing a crime report. Then look online at public police postings to find a crime with a suspect description that matches yours. Determine if they committed the crime or not.

29. Take an article you vehemently disagree with, post it as your Facebook status, and then say how you align yourself with everything it’s saying. Like this status. Share it. Post it on other people’s walls. Do the same thing on Twitter.

30. Interview a person for six seconds using Vine. Do not tell them the interview will last six seconds.

31. In a group, play different songs from as many devices as you can. Try to write down what you can discern from the noise.

32. With a partner, watch a short video in turns with one both recording the other with a camera as well as taking notes on the other’s affective response. Put the original video, and the two reaction videos side by side in a new video.
33. Find a room or space that is reserved by someone else. Convince them there was a booking error with the online system and that it is actually yours.

34. Collaboratively take turns reading from each member's Facebook feed. Write the lines into a document as a poem.

35. Spend hours writing a document with a group however you like, but delete it when anyone leaves or enters the room.

36. Find sites of relaxation on the Internet. Spend some time on these sites and relax. When you are done, find rain sound audio on YouTube and listen to it while you write about drowning. Keep writing and writing until you cannot write more. Then delete everything you have written and move on with your life.

38. Use a screen recorder like QuickTime to record your computer screen as you browse the Internet for eight minutes. Call a friend on Skype and make sure that's included in there.

39. Using their publically available online profile, create a fake obituary for someone you know.

40. In public, open a laptop and surf the Internet. Have a partner watch you and the way people respond to you and the way you respond to others.

41. Ask each other about passwords. Talk about how you picked your password. Ask how other people picked their passwords. Share your password if you want and explain what you like and don't like about it.

42. Venmo $1,000 to the person to your right. They must then Venmo $1,000 to the person to their right and so on until your money goes full circle and returns to you.

43. Find a database of scary stories generated on the Internet. In a group, collaboratively write a new story by each taking deliberate lines from the database and stitching them together.

44. Ask as many people in a public place how happy they are, and graph happiness relative to location on Google Maps.

45. Find a Facebook friend and message as many of their friends as you can asking them what they think of your person.

46. Take a compatibility quiz online with a partner. Then, check your answers by comparing your compatibility to whether your zodiac signs are compatible.

47. Create an Instagram account and use whatever means necessary to get followers.

48. Find a YouTube video and make it viral.

49. Work in a group to invent a rumor. Spread the rumor on as many social media sites as possible.

50. Go on a video chat website like Omegle and ask people to put a shoe on their head. Share the screenshots.

51. Check out as many books as you can from a library. Compare how the information differs from a commonly used websites on the same subjects.

52. Create a Twitter account that only posts lyrics from a specific lyricist. Do this for as many lyricists as you would like to get to know. Have each account follow each other, plus some other accounts of your choosing.

53. Open a text document and raid a partner’s computer with as much text as you can from their personal files. Send your text document to your friends.

54. Clog as much as you can. Clog online forums for your school or work. Post a series of blank posts on your Facebook feed, send a bunch of blank e-mails to everyone you know, open a bunch of blank tabs, and just clog everything. CLOG. What does it feel like to apply force to the Internet?

55. Within the constraint of two hundred words, try to offend as many people as possible in a Facebook post.

56. Narrate the life story of the person across a table from you using only GIFs. Make it as long or short as you want but make sure to highlight what you think might have been key moments in that person's life or even better, make something up. Do not caption your work.

57. Snapchat your surroundings to a partner with the timer on one second. Send only one Snapchat each minute. Try to guess where the other person is.

58. Find the first friend you made on Facebook and have a conversation with them.

59. In a library, find someone who is wasting time on the Internet. Ask them what they are doing and what they would be doing if they were being productive.

60. Go to a random urban location on Google Street View. Share this with another person and see how long it takes them to determine the location. Consider what factored into the time and ultimate guess the person made.

61. Cross arms with people in a group and use your hands to type on the laptops in front of your left and right partners as they type on your own. Try to navigate.

62. Send a Snapchat to buddies of a partner but not to them.

63. Like twenty posts on a single person's Facebook wall from that person's account.

64. Plan the most expensive three-day vacation in the world to the dollar amount using travel websites.

65. Watch a video and consciously misinterpret it. Spread your misinterpretation as far as you can.

66. In a group, attempt to find the shortest route from one Wikipedia article to another by clicking on links in the page.

67. Generate a random phrase using an online generator. For every letter in the phrase, find a song that begins with that letter. Compile the results into a playlist named after your phrase.

68. Write a travel review for a trip you didn't take. Post it, then delete it and reflect on the memory of your trip.

69. In a group, have one person choose two behavior rules. Distribute one rule to all but one of the other members of the group, and the other to only one. Make it discreet so you do not know who got the majority rule and who got the minority. In a chat room, have everyone type and act according to the rule they were given. See if the majority can identify the minority and vice versa, and if they can determine each other's rules.

70. Take as many pictures of the room you are in as possible. Upload the pictures to social media. Consider new ways to capture a space to re-create it elsewhere.

71. Pick a genre of music you don't usually listen to or that you dislike. Listen to five minutes of it without doing anything else. Once you pick a song, you have to listen to the whole thing. Don't touch the computer as you listen. After the five minutes, write about what you felt/were thinking about. How did it feel to do nothing but listen to something you don't like?

72. Charge fifteen people publicly on Venmo for $0.01–$3,000 for reasons you make up.

73. Exchange phones with a partner and text someone from that phone whatever you feel like.
74. In a group, choose one person to be the “gimp,” so to speak. This person must have every avenue (social media, e-mail, different chat programs such as Skype, Google Chat, Canvas, etc.) Flood this person with as much spam as possible. Do what you will. The victim must copy and paste every message into a Word document.
75. Give your Facebook password to a partner and have them delete your account.
76. Open three video chat platforms at once and talk to three separate people.
77. Skype a buddy during one class for the whole class. Have the video chat muted but talk to them through text the entire class.
78. Sit down in the middle of a crowded walkway and open your laptop to surf the Internet.
79. Click on a spam advertisement and try to claim whatever promotion it’s offering. Get yourself that iPhone for $20 or a free $100 Walmart gift card.
80. Look through your Facebook messages and go back as far as you can. Find the oldest message to which you never responded. Write back. Make the responses really long and detailed. Make it super awkward. Don’t explain why you’re writing back now or apologize for not writing back earlier.
81. Open an image on a screen and use as many devices as you can to iteratively take a picture of that image. Use as many people and as many cameras as you can, but plan it so that it takes the shortest amount of time for the image to travel from the first screen to the last. Configure the cameras and screen in physical space cleverly to do this.
82. Send as many people as you can lyrics from a song. Keep sending them even if people ask you to stop.
83. Using TV Trope, describe the people around you as tropes from the website.
84. Graffiti the Facebook wall of the person to your left. Post anything you want and everything you want. Vandalize it. Make it so their grandmas on Facebook call them asking what’s wrong.
85. As a group, choose a popular album of music. Find the worst possible versions of each song on the web, be it a terrible cover on YouTube, a bad quality download, a virus-laden download, a misheard lyrics version, or a horrible remix. Reconstruct the album out of these new versions.
86. Choose a partner and flood their social media accounts with the phrase “I love you” as many times and in as many specific places as possible. The partner must respond to each instance with the phrase “I love you too” as quickly as they can. Repeat with “I hate you.”
87. Go onto ChatRoulette or Omegle and try to get people to tell you a secret. Post it to YouTube.
88. Find an interesting person in a different country and completely re-create their social media profile through your own Facebook. Proceed to comment on ten posts on your newsfeed only in that person’s native language. If you don’t know their language, that’s even better: use Google Translate.
89. Join a chat room anonymously and admit as many secrets as you can.
90. Ask everyone around you to send you a picture of themselves they haven’t posted online.
91. In a group, have everyone put their addresses in a bowl in the middle and each person draws one at random. Go on eBay and buy that person a present for less than one dollar.
92. In a public place, record the noise you hear with your phone. Then go to a silent private place and listen to it. Send the noise to a partner and ask them where they think it is from.

93. Using Google Patent Search, find schematics of interesting devices. Post them to Instagram with a description in which you hashtag every other word.

94. In a group, select a person to take notes on the emotions, facial tics, and affects of a group of users surfing the Internet.

95. Find a niche piece of media that you love and find a place on the Internet where people are discussing it as recently as a month ago.

96. Delete a photo from the phone of a partner and do not tell them which you deleted.

97. Do a background check on the person to your left. Find every detail about them: addresses, schools, e-mail, hobbies, groups, publications, work, criminal record, family members, etc. Find everything you can by any means necessary. Hack into their accounts if necessary. Save what you find in a document. Send it to them.

98. For fifteen minutes, see who can tally the largest dollar amount by putting things in their Amazon shopping cart. The one with the most at the end of the time wins. Delete everything in your cart. Or don’t.

99. Delete any document on your partner’s computer. Don’t tell them which one you erased. Then give them your laptop and have them do the same to you.

100. Make a website and fill it with spam.

101. Make a BuzzFeed account and post lists of how you waste time on the Internet.