Well, things are starting to improve after we had earlier delays really mount up on the inbound Hudson River tunnels. The checkpoints have been removed and as a result, it's eased down to just minor delays coming into the Lincoln Tunnel and the GW Bridge. Holland Tunnel's also getting better now. This is, uh, rapidly easing down to ten minutes or less coming in via the Holland. In and out of Staten Island no reported incidents. And the traffic on the Brooklyn Bridge still very slow Manhattan-bound. We've had delays on the Manhattan Bridge and on the Williamsburg too. The Midtown Tunnel still with lengthy delays of, um, lining up for those tolls, urm, maybe a thirty minute jam. And the traffic on the Queensboro Bridge has been slow Manhattan-bound too. Also still some slowdowns on the Queens-bound side of the Whitestone Bridge. And up on the Triboro Bridge Bronx to Manhattan-bound side has had extra traffic as well. Still taking a pounding up and down the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway. We've had lots of traffic on Manhattan's, uh, avenues coming downtown in towards the 90's, the scene of those earlier checkpoints. The West Side is still slow 150's into the 90's and the FDR Drive no reported incidents now. And as far as the, uh, ride on mass transit, well, LIRR is running but with twenty minute delays coming back into Penn Station. We're getting word that we still have delays on the Port Jefferson Branch as well, that's because of a broken rail in Greenlawn. And as far as alternate side goes, that will remain suspended but you will have to pay the meters.
Keep in mind, uh, that there are a number of bridges that do have designated bike and pedestrian lanes. Maybe you were unaware of that. Well of course the Brooklyn Bridge, we know about that, but how about the Broadway Bridge, the Henry Hudson Bridge, Macombs Dam Bridge and the Madison Avenue Bridge, Manhattan Bridge and the Queensboro Bridge, also with designated lanes for, uh, walkers and bikers, Third Avenue Bridge, Triboro Bridge more of the same, and University Heights Bridge, the Washington Bridge and the George Washington Bridge, as well as the Williamsburg Bridge. And if you use your bike, the Department of Parks and Recreation offers temporary bike storage at the following parks: Washington Square, Tompkins Square Park, Union Square Park, Madison Square Park and Bryant Park. Around the Five Boroughs, well, we’ve had, uh, some hard hit conditions along the BQE, uh, all day. Eastbound side is heavy coming off the Gowanus, all the way up past the Brooklyn Bridge and again at McGuiness-Humboldt, that’s where there is now a crash in the right lane. As far as what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels, heavy traffic on the Triboro Bridge, Bronx and Manhattan-bound. The Whitestone’s been slow going to Queens. Still very busy Manhattan-bound on the Queensboro Bridge. And the Midtown Tunnel, still about thirty minutes lining up for those tolls. Between Brooklyn and Manhattan, extra slow into Manhattan on the Brooklyn Bridge, the upper level of the Manhattan Bridge, and the Williamsburg too. Things have thinned out nicely across the Hudson. Minor delays delays at the Holland and Lincoln. Not too bad up and across the GW Bridge or the, uh, Tappan Zee. And the traffic is still, uh, a bit on the slow side in Westchester County along the, uh, southbound side of the Hutch in Scarsdale. We’ve got some road repairs in the right lane. LIRR fifteen to twenty minute slowdowns into Penn Station and delays on the Port Jefferson Branch because of a broken rail in Greenlawn. And alternate side remains suspended.

We’ll go right with what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels. We still have delays of close to a half an hour at the Midtown Tunnel coming back into Manhattan. And as I watch it live on the Panasonic Jam Cam, the Queensboro Bridge has been very slow Manhattan-bound as well. And coming back into Manhattan from Brooklyn, still extra slow on the Brooklyn, upper level of the Manhattan Bridge and the Williamsburg too. Not bad at the Battery Tunnel. Do watch for some delays on the Whitestone Bridge, heading over to, uh, Queens, and also on the Triboro Bridge, Bronx to Manhattan-bound. Now across the Hudson, things have eased very nicely at the Holland and Lincoln Tunnel. We’re not faring too badly up and across the GW Bridge or the Tappan Zee. The BQE still taking a pounding eastbound side Gowanus, uh, Canal up to the Brooklyn Bridge and the back to McGuiness-Humboldt, where there is a crash blocking off the right lane. Westbound slow at the Kosciuszko and back in towards the Tillary Street vicinity. Meanwhile, if you’re gonna be riding out to, uh, Long Island this afternoon, looks like so far we’re holding up pretty well on the LIE, The Northern and Southern States. Southern State is actually improving now, coming east into Islip Terrace with an accident cleared out of the way. Keep in mind Long Island Railroad, you do have scattered fifteen to twenty minute delays coming back into Penn Station and also a broken rail in Greenlawn is affecting service on the Port Jefferson Branch of LIRR. Alternate side is suspended around town but you do have to feed the meters.
Of course the evening rush looms large, but we've just gotten through the morning rush and things in general are easing up nicely. But for now getting a look from the East Side of the BQE, we've got heavy traffic from the Gowanus Canal, through the Brooklyn Bridge, easing out through McGuinness-Humboldt Street, an accident there has been cleared downtown, still heavy from the Kosciuszko to the Manhattan Bridge, extra volume there. Now street cleaning suspended today, but you still need to feed the meters. As we check over the westbound side of the Cross Bronx Expressway now, heavy traffic from the Bronx River Parkway through the George Washington Bridge. Let's take you out to Long Island for just a moment. And, uh, right now as you travel on the eastbound Northern State Parkway, picking up some delays near Lakeville Road, earlier problems there appear to be cleared and word is all construction work on Long Island roadways has been cancelled because of the holiday. Now, Long Island Railroad normal schedule in effect. Right now we've got scattered fifteen to twenty minute delays into Penn Station and a broken rail in Greenlawn which is, uh, causing some delays on the Port Jefferson Branch as well. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels. Hudson River crossings all looking pretty good as of now. Here's what we've got now: over the Queens-Midtown Tunnel still stuck there, about a thirty minute delay. As you head toward the city back out to New Jersey, actually looking, uh, pretty good at this, um, back, ah, back out to, uh, Queens rather, looking pretty good at this point. Brooklyn Bridge, kind of heavy across the span. Manhattan Bridge is a little bit slow as well, particularly on the upper level and, uh, Williamsburg seems to be doing OK. No problems to report now at the Brooklyn Battery Tunnel.

Let's get a look, first of all, at the northbound side of the FDR Drive. We're picking up heavy traffic from the Brooklyn Bridge on up through the Williamsburg. Both directions on the Major Deegan. Over in the, uh, Bronx, we've got heavy traffic coming in through the Cross Bronx Expressway, just a little bit of extra volume in there as of now. Now southbound over on Fifth Avenue, delays from West 57th down to West 47th. We do have street cleaning rules suspended today and for the duration of the holiday is what we're told but the, uh, meter rules still apply, so you still have to feed the meters. Back over on the, uh, eastbound side of the BQE, heavy traffic from the Gowanus Canal to the Brooklyn Bridge and then easing out from the Williamsburg in through McGuinness-Humboldt Street. An accident there has been cleared. Over on the westbound side it's heavy from the Kosciuszko Bridge in through the Manhattan Bridge. And, uh, here's what you need to know now about the bridges and tunnels. Pretty quiet over on the Hudson River now. Holland, Lincoln Tunnels in relatively good shape, across the st... uh, ur, across to the city. And the same goes for the George Washington Bridge, minor delays at the tolls now and a pretty good ride as you come across the span. East River, Queens-Midtown Tunnel, still looking at about a thirty minute delay on the way back into the city. Back to Queens looks pretty good. Brooklyn Bridge a little bit slow both directions across the span. Manhattan Bridge heavy on the upper deck. And the Williamsburg looks to be in, uh, fine shape in both directions. 59th Street Bridge still kind of loaded up, both into and out of the city as well at this point. As we, uh, get a look now up at the Throgs Neck Bridge, we've got a good ride there across the span. A little bit of construction work over at the Whitestone. Now Tappan Zee Bridge has a lane down as you head across the span into Rockland County for some midday construction work but not causing much of a delay as of now. As we take a look over back into New Jersey, east on Route 80, all lanes cleared out through Route 46 in Denville. Accident cleanup has been completed there. And we've been telling you about Long Island Railroad, still looking at fifteen to twenty minute delays into Penn Station now and a broken rail in Greenlawn that's causing extra delays on the Port Jefferson Branch.

12:51
Alright here goes. First of all we look at the eastbound side of the BQE at Broadway, Roosevelt Road construction there, shutting down the exit ramp. And we still do have some delays through the Kosciuszko Bridge but not as bad as they were before as that checkpoint seems to have disappeared, looks like things are starting to ease out a bit through that spot. Both directions Major Deegan, no problems to report as you come up through the, uh, Cross Bronx Expressway. George Washington Bridge area looking pretty good and, uh, westbound side of the Cross Bronx, uh, a little bit of heavy traffic from the Bronx River Park..., um, Parkway now over to the George Washington Bridge. Street cleaning rules suspended today throughout the Five Boroughs of the city. They will be suspended until the end of the holiday. Meter rules are still applying in the city so, you do still have to feed the meters. Now, here's what we, uh, need to tell you about the bridges and tunnels, currently, uh, as we check the, uh, Hudson River crossings, not too bad at Holland and Lincoln Tunnels, earlier checkpoints have been lifted, into and out of the city now. Looks pretty good at the George Washington Bridge through the tolls and, uh, pretty good ride across the span. Over on the East River, Queens-Midtown Tunnel still about twenty-five to thirty minute delays on the way into the city and on the way back out into Queens we're doing OK. Triboro Bridge construction work, Bronx-bound side, two of the toll lanes are shut down and traffic kind of heavy across the span now. Queens-bound side looks pretty good. Whitestone Bridge on the way to the Bronx, one lane down for ongoing deck replacement work and we do still have some minor delays there. Throgs Neck seems to be holding together pretty well as of now. We've got some delays on the Long Island Railroad. Scattered fifteen to twenty minute delays in through Penn Station. We've also got a broken rail in Greenlawn and that's, um, making for some delays on the Port Jefferson Branch at this point.

1:01
Alright and word from Long Island now all the construction work on the roadways has been cancelled today due to the big holiday. Thank you very much. And, uh, here's what we've got for you now as far as the Long Island Railroad's concerned. Uh, sch... normal schedule in effect for today. Right now still showing about fifteen to twenty minute scattered delays into Penn Station. And with a broken rail continuing to be a problem into Greenlawn, that's affecting the Port Jefferson Branch and we do have delays there as well for both city-bound and outbound trains. Take you back to New Jersey, eastbound Route 80 all lanes reopened through Exit, uh, Route 46 that is, in Denville, very bad accident cleanup there has now been completed. Uh, once up in Westchester County, uh, we've got westbound Fifth Avenue at Second Street in Pelham, a lane closed until further notice. We've had a partial building collapse through that area. They're working on getting that cleared up. Here's what you need to know now about the bridges and tunnels: pretty quiet all around at the Hudson River crossings now. George Washington Bridge, looking at it on the Jam Cam, pretty good ride in through the tolls and moving well across the span. No problems to report right now at the Holland or Lincoln Tunnels, either into or out of the city. As we take you over to the East River now Throgs Neck Bridge headed to Queens, no problems on the span looking good Bronx-bound side as well. Whitestone Bridge a lane down headed to the Bronx for some construction work, ongoing deck replacement there. Queens-bound side kind of heavy in through the toll plaza and across the span as well. At the Triboro Bridge construction work shutting down two of the toll lanes as you head Bronx-bound and, uh, that’s causing some heavy traffic across the span. Doing OK on the Queens-bound side as of now.

1:11
Alright and certainly because of the big holiday, right now Long Island Railroad schedule in normal effect for today, right now still showing scattered, uh, fifteen to twenty minute delays in through, uh, Penn Station. And a broken rail still a problem over at Greenlawn. That’s affecting the Port Jefferson Branch so you can expect delays and some, uh, service interruption there as well. All of the construction work, by the way, on Long Island roadways has been cancelled today because of the holiday. Let’s head to New Jersey now, eastbound Route 80 everything’s improving now through Route 46 in Denville, accident cleanup has been completed there, just some residual delays left over. And, uh, over in Westchester County, or rather make that Warren County, New Jersey, westbound Route 78 at Exit 4 in through, uh, Stewartsville look for delays, we’ve got some debris on the roadway in that spot. Here’s what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: currently pretty good at the Holland, Lincoln Tunnels, and the George Washington Bridge, no problems to report into or out of the city as of now. Still some delays over at the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, call it about fifteen to twenty minutes on the way into the city, back to Queens looking pretty good now. Brooklyn Bridge, inbound side is heavy back across the span, um, we’ve got no outbound delays right now. Actually things are looking kind of good there. And, uh, a good ride on the FDR Drive between the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridges in both directions as of now.

1:21
Let’s get a look, first of all, at the westbound side of the BQE coming in through Flushing Avenue, an accident taking down the left hand lane. Do be careful as you come through that spot. Looks pretty good on the, uh, eastbound side right now as we, uh, take a look at the southbound Harlem River Drive into the FDR. Kind of heavy from 116th Street down through Gracie Mansion. Once again we’ve got some delays in through 86th. The westbound side of the Cross Bronx a little bit slow as you take it from the Sheridan Expressway through the George Washington Bridge. By the way, GWB not bad either direction across the span. Here’s what you need to know about the other crossings: Holland and Lincoln Tunnels looking just fine, as a matter of fact I’m looking at the Lincoln Tunnel on the, uh, Panasonic Jam Cam, doing just great on the way into the city. No problems to report on the way back out, but again, watch for the building afternoon rush as folks make their getaway for the big holiday weekend. Here’s what we’ve got for you as far as, uh, Long Island Railroad, still showing scattered fifteen to twenty minute delays in through Penn Station, um, increased volume there, and also we’ve got problems on the Port Jefferson Branch because of a broken rail at Greenlawn. Here’s what we’ve got for you over in New Jersey; Northbound 23 at Ozone Avenue-Cedar Grove we’ve got road construction there, right lane’s closed and some delays in through that spot as well.
1:31
Alright, eastbound side of the BQE... make that westbound side of the BQE at Flushing Avenue... an accident taking down the left hand lanes, some delays starting to build in through that spot. From there we go to Long Island and, uh, right now, ah, out in Suffolk County, southbound on the Sagtikos Parkway southbound side at S3, Pine Air Drive in Baywood, an accident there, one lane is down. By the way, word from Long Island is all construction work has been cancelled today due to the holiday weekend. And, uh, Long Island Railroad right now running a normal schedule for today. Still scattered ten to fifteen minute delays into Penn Station. A broken rail continues to be a problem at Greenlawn as well, that's affecting the Port Jefferson Branch, although not badly as of now. As we, uh, check back in Westchester County, westbound Fifth Avenue at Second Street in Pelham, a lane closed until further notice as they work on clearing out a partial building collapse in through that spot. And, uh, northbound Route 31 in New Jersey, look for delays in through Parkside Avenue in Ewing, we've got a gas main break, Fire Department activity there at the moment clogging up the roads. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: currently at the, uh, Holland and Lincoln Tunnels into and out of the city we're doing well. George Washington Bridge not bad in either direction across the span, looking pretty good in through the tolls as well. And over on the East River, still about ten to fifteen minutes at the Queens-Midtown Tunnel on the way into the city, that's been that way all afternoon. Not too bad on the way back out to Queens, the Brooklyn, Manhattan, the Williamsburg, pretty normal delays.

1:41
And getting a look right now over on the westbound side of the BQE at Flushing Avenue, a bad accident taking down the left hand lane. Looks to be a flame-engulfed limo, blowing lots of black smoke. Crews haven't yet arrived on the scene. A big tie-up through that spot until they can get that cleared out of the way. By the way, street cleaning rules suspended today citywide, that's throughout the Five Boroughs, the rules will be suspended until the holiday weekend is over, meter rules are still applying, though. Word from Long Island, uh, that they've basically cancelled all of the construction work until the holiday weekend is over as well. Word from Suffolk County now, southbound on the Sagtikos, in through Exit S3, Pioneer Drive in Baywood, an accident. One lane is down and starting to build with some delays through that spot. LIE looks pretty good through Suffolk County. Take you to Orange County now, westbound on Route 84 at Exit 4 in Middletown, accidents, some injuries involved. They're working on getting that cleared up as well. Also, on Route 100, uh, Highway 100 now, at 134 in Yorktown, eh, uh, Yorktown, accident involving a rolled over vehicle and they're working getting that cleared as well. Here's what we need to tell you about the bridges and tunnels: Hudson River crossings pretty quiet, Holland, Lincoln and the George Washington Bridge right now. Triboro look for construction work and that takes down two of the toll lanes as you head to the Bronx, uh, that is causing heavy traffic on the span. Queens-bound side looks OK. Whitestone Bridge, a lane down as you head to the Bronx as they do some ongoing deck repairs there. No bad, though, Queens-bound side a little bit slow through the toll plaza. Looks good all around at the Throgs Neck.

1:51
We take you first to Westchester County and, uh, right now Highway 100 at 134 in Yorturn, uh, Yorktu... uh, I still can't say that, Yorktown, accident involving a rolled over vehicle in through that area. Westbound side of 84 coming through Exit 4 in Middletown, an accident with injuries, that's still being cleared. As we, uh, take you out to Long Island now, problems on the Sagtikos State Parkway in through Pine Air Drive southbound side at Exit S3, accident takes down a lane. Traffic is jamming back to Crooked Hill Road in through that spot. By the way, no construction work on Long Island for the duration of the holiday weekend. Right here in the city, street cleaning rules are suspended today throughout the Five Boroughs. Those rules will be suspended until the weekend is over as well. Meter rules, though, still apply, which means you still have to feed the meter. Back over on the westbound side of the BQE at Flushing Avenue, a fiery limo crash taking down the left-hand lane as they're still waiting for crews to arrive. And, uh, right now here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: we're looking at some delays on the East River crossings right now. The Manhattan Bridge right now kind of slow coming across the span leaving the city. Uh, we've got the Brooklyn Bridge a little bit slow in both directions, and the Williamsburg's not too bad as of now. Queens-Midtown Tunnel we've got about, uh, ten to fifteen minute delays into the city, back out to Queens looking just fine. And looking at the Hudson River crossings Holland and Lincoln OK. George Washington Bridge, on the Panasonic Jam Cam right now, moving well in both directions across the span.

2:01

Alright let's get you out to Suffolk County now. Southbound on the Sagtikos State Parkway at Exit S3 Pine Air Drive in Baywood accident cleared, traffic starting to ease out there. Word in Nassau County now the eastbound Northern State Parkway, kind of tying up into Glen Cove Road, Exit 31 in Westbury, heavy traffic. Some sort of debris being cleared up from the Parkway. Westbound side appears to be OK. Long Island Railroad, still about ten to fifteen scattered delays in through Penn Station, been that way most of the day. And they've still got a problem with a broken rail at Greenlawn and that's affecting service on the Port Jefferson Branch. No word as to when that will be cleared up. And here's the story right now over on the BQE westbound side at Flushing Avenue, accident there. Crews have finally arrived but it's still a mess, left lane is shut down. We do have alternate side of the street parking rules suspended today throughout the Five Boroughs. They will be suspended until the holiday weekend is over. Metered parking rules, though, are still in effect.

2:11

And right now we get a look at the westbound side of the BQE in through Flushing Avenue, what was a fiery limo that has now been tamed is taking down the left-hand lane. And a little bit slow as you come through that spot. Now, we head to Nassau County, eastbound Northern State Parkway in through Glen Cove Road that's Exit 31 in Westbury. Heavy traffic starting to build there. Apparently some debris on the roadway. They're working on clearing that now. Now, not affecting the westbound side of the roadway, at least not right now, but looks like a big cleanup job. Word from the Long Island Railroad, normal schedule in effect for today but still running about ten to fifteen minutes scattered delays in through Penn Station. Been that way, uh, pretty much all day. Broken rail in Greenlawn that's affecting the Port Jefferson branch, no word's as to when that will be cleared up. Uh, also Metro North running a normal schedule today. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: right now Holland, Lincoln Tunnels, George Washington Bridge into and out of the city doing just fine. Over on the Whitestone Bridge now headed to the Bronx, lane down for ongoing deck replacement work. Queens-bound side is heavy as well. Also, uh, word from Kevin, a member of our traffic team now, we've got heavy traffic over on the 59th Street Bridge, both levels, outbound appears to be in good shape, looks like just volume there.

2:21

Street cleaning rules suspended today and will be until the end of this holiday weekend. Meter rolls... uh... rules still apply, which means you still have to feed the meters. As we check out now in Suffolk County, Sagtikos coming in through Exit S3 southbound side accident cleared, traffic easing out there. Um, also on the eastbound side of the Northern State Parkway, uh, we've still got delays in through Glen Cove Road, traffic, uh, heavy there because debris is still being cleared up from all over the roadway in that area. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: right now Holland and Lincoln, George Washington Bridge, into and out of the city not bad at all. Over at the, uh, Whitestone Bridge headed to the Bronx, a lane down for deck replacement work there. We do have some heavy delays and a little bit slow on the way to Queens as well. Throgs Neck Bridge looks good in both directions and over at the 59th Street Bridge we've got heavy traffic inbound on both levels. Outbound side appears to be OK right now. And, uh, no problems to report at the Manhattan or Williamsburg Bridges as of now.

2:31

Well, still having troubles in Westchester County on the Saw Mill, southbound side of the Saw Mill Parkway at the Thruway. And in Elmsford there's an accident with a flipped-over car, emergency crews still on scene. And it looks like at least one lane is at least still out of service. As you, uh, make your way on 287, that's looking good over to the Tappan Zee Bridge. Tappan Zee Bridge, GW Bridge, Lincoln Tunnel all OK. It's the Holland Tunnel, though, where there's still some traffic going back to Jersey. Now, across the East River, it looks like, uh, the Whitestone Bridge is slow to the Bronx, you've got roadwork there. Also expect some company on the Brooklyn Bridge. And the, uh, BQE you've got, uh, right now delays exiting to the Long Island Expressway. The, uh, Long Island Expressway has been an absolute horror show, you've got delays now forming back at the BQE again. This delay goes bumper-to-bumper straight through to the Fairgrounds area. There may be something along the way past Queens Boulevard. Grand Central there was an accident being cleared over by the BQE on the westbound side of the Grand Central.

2:41

Well, looks like as you, uh, make your trip right now, uh, in Queens, the Grand Central's gonna start getting better. They're clearing that accident over by the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway, all lanes are being reopened. But the LIE, something's going on through Queens Boulevard, because it is much slower than normal, jam-packed from the BQE heading over toward Woodhaven and toward Queens Boulevard, that we see on the WINS Jam Cam. Now the BQE is getting better going up toward the Kosciuszko Bridge. And in the Bronx things are getting a lot better on the Cross Bronx west to the GW Bridge. Only hot spot across the Hudson, the Holland Tunnel there's still delays back to Jersey. If you use the Whitestone Bridge, be prepared for a little bit of traffic on the way to the Bronx. You've got roadwork in place. The, uh, Throgs Neck Bridge very good out of Queens into the Bronx. And, uh, be aware on the Saw Mill still in Westchester, southbound side of the Saw Mill Parkway right by 287 in Elmsford, there's an overturned car. Emergency crews still remain on scene.

2:51
Let the rush begin and let's see now what the roads are looking like in and around the city. And it's not so good over on the Tappan Zee heading into Rockland as I see it on the Panasonic Jam Cam, suddenly getting very slow. Not bad on the GW Bridge inbound on the upper and lower level. Lincoln Tunnel, you've got delays of maybe five minutes leaving town. The Holland Tunnel looks to be so far in, uh, pretty decent shape in, uh, both directions. In and out of Staten Island it's been rough. The Goethals going to Jersey, a stalled car. The Outerbridge is slow heading out back to Staten Island. Between Brooklyn and Manhattan, it's building to a jam on the upper level of the Manhattan Bridge to Manhattan as I watch it on the Panasonic Jam Cam. The Brooklyn Bridge is bad news either direction and I still see a lot of, uh, people traffic on the Brooklyn Bridge, a lot of walkers there heading across that span in either direction. Over to the Queensboro Bridge still slow in the lower level coming into Manhattan and watch for roadwork along the Whitestone-bound for the Bronx.

3:01
The traffic on the BQE westbound side is gonna be heavy into Atlantic Avenue with a stalled car in the right lane. Belt Parkway west at the Van Wyck, that's a crash in the left lane to watch out for. And the, uh, traffic on the Cross Bronx, still pretty heavy Jerome Avenue back to the GW Bridge, Harlem River Drive from the 150's on up. No reported incidents on the West Side Highway. Here's what you need to know regarding the bridges and tunnels: roadwork along the Whitestone, bound for the Bronx. Queensboro still a bit slow lower level into Manhattan. And between Brooklyn and Manhattan it has just been awful on the Brooklyn Bridge either way and the upper level Manhattan Bridge to Manhattan. Stalled car on the Goethals heading back to Jersey side to watch out for. And, uh, the Outerbridge has been slow going over to Staten Island. Across the Hudson River not bad on the tunnels. Inbound GW Bridge, uh, maybe a five minute delay. The Tappan Zee looks pretty slow crossing back into the Rockland County side. Jersey's 280 west, an accident's cleared in West Orange. And the, uh, traffic is still stop-and-go on Route 1 south in Edison with some lane painting that continues. Alternate side has been suspended for today.

3:11
Well, the traffic on the, uh, Tappan Zee is still crawling going into Rockland County as I see it here live on the Jam Cam. Farther down the Hudson River it looks like that traffic along the, uh, GW Bridge is not faring too badly into the tolls. The Lincoln Tunnel a bit slow leaving town. Holland Tunnel is heavy getting back out onto 1 and 9. And in and out of Staten Island we've had slowdowns on the Goethals going to Jersey and the Outerbridge getting back over to Staten Island. Meanwhile the Manhattan Bridge is still jammed on the upper level into Manhattan. The Brooklyn Bridge is crawling either way. And over to the Queensboro Bridge it's been crowded along the, uh, lower level coming back into Manhattan. The upper level looks to be fine. Big delays ahead. And there's still round-the-clock repairs on the Whitestone Bridge going to the Bronx. BQE westbound side Atlantic Avenue, watch for a stalled car, that one sits in the right lane. And there's a crash on the westbound side of the Belt and the Van Wyck, that one in the left lane.

3:21

Staten Island Expressway east is heavy to Todt Hill Road. It's a stalled car in the right lane. BQE west at Atlantic Avenue the stall's been cleared. There's a crash west on the Belt at the Van Wyck. And here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: still some roadwork on the Whitestone going to the Bronx. Queensboro Bridge slow in the lower level coming into Manhattan, as I watch it live on the Panasonic Jam Cam. Avoid the Manhattan Bridge upper level into Manhattan. I see delays on the FDR Drive heading downtown towards the Brooklyn Bridge which is crawling in both directions. Not too bad in and out of Staten Island, although we've had a stalled car recently cleared from the Goethals getting over to the Jersey side. And across the Hudson River, slow in the Holland getting back to 1-9. Lincoln Tunnel looks pretty good in each direction. Same deal with the GW Bridge, but the Tappan Zee is rather crowded crossing into Rockland County. Alternate side of the street parking has been suspended throughout the duration of the holiday weekend.

3:31

Well, here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: on the Staten Island Expressway east we're heavy to Todt Hill Road, all due to a stalled car in the right lane. The Queensboro Bridge remains slow in the lower level coming into Manhattan. The BQE west at Atlantic Avenue is moving once again after the stall's been cleared. There's a new crash west on the Belt at the Van Wyck that you want to look out for. On the Whitestone, there's still some remaining roadwork going back the Bronx. You'll want to avoid the Manhattan Bridge, upper and now lower levels into the city. Still delays on the FDR downtown, heading towards the Brooklyn Bridge. And you need to stay away from that one, its crawling in both directions. Looking across the Hudson River, we're slow in the Holland heading back to 1-9, but the Lincoln Tunnel is looking very good in either direction. The GW Bridge is not bad and further up the Hudson, we see some delays at the Tappan Zee headed towards the Rockland side. Staten Island looks good after that stall has been cleared, which had been clogging up the Goethals Bridge, Jersey-bound. Remember, alternate side of the street parking is suspended today and for the duration of the weekend.

3:41

Over in Staten Island, we're flowing following an afternoon of backups. Most of you will remember the chaos that one stalled car caused on the Goethals earlier. I'm happy to report that that's been cleared. Now we're moving on the Verrazano as well. But here's a new one you need to watch: Staten Island Expressway east is stop-and-go to Todt Hill Road, due to a stalled car westbound, heavy on in through that whole area. Over at the Hudson, well, it's better than it's been in a while, about five minutes over the GW Bridge and another five to ten at the Lincoln. Upriver, well, it's still slow over the span on the Tappan Zee on the way to Rockland. In Queens, the Whitestone, yep, watch out for that continuing roadwork to the Bronx. Looking at the Jam Cam, over between Brooklyn and Manhattan, we've still got heavy traffic on the upper level of the Manhattan Bridge coming into the city. And you'll want to steer clear of the Brooklyn Bridge in both directions. The 59th Street Bridge is very heavy on the lower level coming into Manhattan. Alternate side of the street parking is suspended today but you’ve still gotta feed the meters.

3:51
Live at the, uh, Panasonic Jam Cam and a view of the Belt Parkway. It’s getting very crowded on the eastbound side down beyond Pennsylvania Avenue, heading out towards Cross Bay Boulevard. A lot of westbound traffic at Lefferts Boulevard too. Staten Island Expressway east is on the brakes to Todt Hill Road, got a stalled car westbound. Heavy on in through that same area. And out to Long Island, Southern State very crowded Hempstead Avenue in through Merrick Avenue. LIE lots of slowdowns into Route 11. Now here’s what you need to know regarding the bridges and tunnels: Tappan Zee is still very busy crossing into Rockland County, although it is showing some signs of loosening up a bit. Across the Hudson otherwise, really not too bad, still under five minutes, Holland and Lincoln Tunnel and GW Bridge. In and out of Staten Island, it’s been a little bit slow getting over to Staten Island along the Goethals Bridge and the Verrazano no reported incidents. Between Brooklyn and Manhattan, still jammed on the upper level Manhattan Bridge to Manhattan. Avoid the Brooklyn Bridge in each direction. That’s still loaded up. And the Queensboro Bridge still heavy on the lower level coming into Manhattan. Round-the-clock repairs on the Whitestone going to the Bronx.

4:01
And already it’s getting bad in Midtown. We have the WINS Jam Cams in motion. We’ve got delays on Seventh Avenue that already stretch back to Central Park coming all the way down into Times Square. Broadway’s going to be impacted by that as well. You’ve got extra traffic on Sixth Avenue going into the 40’s, East Side. First, Second, Third Avenues gonna pick up a lot of traffic because there’s a lot of cross street traffic through the 40’s and 50’s. So, again, budget a lot of extra travel time getting through Midtown. Now, the West Side’s a very good way up to the GW Bridge. And across the Hudson, things are really not that bad. But across the East River, 59th Street Bridge, the lower level’s swamped coming into Manhattan. The upper level, both ways on the upper level are only going to be going Queens-bound. You got the Manhattan Bridge jammed right now into Manhattan. The Brooklyn Bridge is gonna be slow either way. As you make your way through Queens, it’s already bumper-to-bumper on the eastbound LIE toward the Fairgrounds. The Grand Central, as we, uh, switch cameras here right now, also picking up delays to Kew Gardens, coming off the Triboro, though it’s not that bad. Eastbound side of the Cross Bronx delays through Jerome and Webster Avenue but then the pace will start to pick up.

4:11
Remember how bad it was yesterday? Here we go again. West Side Highway delays now begin in the 70’s but it’s not going north. It’s fine going north. The delays are going south and they go all the way down into lower Manhattan and all the way through to the Battery Tunnel. You’re also gonna hit a lot of traffic on the East Side too. FDR Drive delays south of the Triboro into the 59th Street Bridge. More delays Williamsburg into the Brooklyn Bridge. The interior avenues already starting to take a beating. Seventh Avenue delays begin back at Central Park, goes all the way down through Times Square. Broadway’s obviously gonna be impacted by that too. A lot of East Side traffic on the avenues and the side streets through the 40’s and 50’s are an absolute mess. As you make your way across the East River already bumper-to-bumper each way Brooklyn Bridge. Manhattan Bridge is jammed either way. The Williamsburg is picking up traffic and the 59th Street Bridge is already taking a big beating going Manhattan-bound. Triboro Bridge is really looking good here on the WINS Jam Cam, an excellent way between Manhattan and Queens. Right now in Nassau County no accidents reported on the LIE or the Northern State Parkway. In New Jersey, we're off to a pretty decent start on the Turnpike and the Garden State Parkway.

4:21
And we are still gonna have to get through, uh, a pretty bad rush hour. Already we've got major delays on, uh, Seventh and Eighth Avenue as you, make your way through the Midtown area. Seventh Avenue delays begin right out of Central Park, all the way down through Times Square. Broadway's impacted obviously, Ninth and Tenth Avenues seeing more traffic as well, but not as bad as, uh, heading through the Times Square area. Meanwhile, on the East Side it's a torture test, because a lot of the, uh, side streets are taking a beating, especially through the 40's and 50's. That will impact traffic at the 59th Street Bridge, which is jammed coming into Manhattan. Right now you've also got jam-ups on the Brooklyn Bridge, bumper-to-bumper to Brooklyn but the lower roadway is wide open. The Brooklyn Bridge is swamped. The FDR Drive's not looking very good either, bumper-to-bumper right off the Brooklyn Bridge. Something's going on on the drive going north toward Houston Street. Meanwhile the West Side delays begin in the 70's and they go south all the way to the Battery Tunnel. Now, we've got something going on on the Belt Parkway. It's going eastbound. We had, uh, Tonya, we had Willie, uh, they both checked in, members of our traffic team and, uh, Michael too, said that the, uh, Belt was not moving off the Verrazano Bridge. As you make your way through Queens, we're also not moving on the LIE but the Grand Central seemed to have a little bit more give for now. Eastbound LIE by Woodhaven, we're getting reports of a stalled car.

4:31
Remember how bad it was yesterday? It's starting again. The, uh, East Side delays begin at the Triboro. It's pretty much one long line now all the way to the Battery. The West Side delays to the Battery begin back at the Boat Basin at 79th Street and we've got a ton of interior traffic in Midtown. Seventh Avenue, Times Square, that's the delay, that's where it's all going: it comes out of Central Park. Broadway's gonna be impacted by that. You're gonna see extra traffic on Eighth Avenue through the 40's and 50's. On the East Side, the side streets are packed through the 40's and 50's and that is why First, Second, Third and Park Avenue right now, an absolute mess. So, trying to get around Midtown, just like yesterday, is not gonna be easy at all. Across the East River already a ton of traffic each way on the Brooklyn Bridge. Now the Manhattan Bridge is fine coming into Manhattan, it's just jam-packed on the upper roadway to Brooklyn. But here on the WINS Jam Cam, the lower roadway will wind up being better. 59th Street Bridge is getting real bad, but the Triboro is looking good. And across the Hudson, you're good to go at the Lincoln and the Holland Tunnel. Trouble in Queens, eastbound LIE, Woodhaven Boulevard, that's a stall in the center lane. More traffic heading toward, uh, central Queens on the Van Wyck, you'll wanna get around that for now with the Grand Central. The Belt is jammed east off the Verrazano, some type of problem on the way toward Coney Island. And right now on Staten Island, delays right off the Verrazano, heading out toward Todt Hill Road. In New Jersey we're off to a pretty decent start on the Turnpike. And, uh, right now no transit delays, but just budget extra travel time taking the LIRR out of Penn Station.

4:41
Looks like it's gonna be just as bad as it was yesterday. Interior avenues in Midtown right now is in torture mode. You got delays on Seventh Avenue right into Central Park into Times Square. Of course that will impact Broadway too. Sixth Avenue's taking a beating coming up through the 40's. You've also got delays on Park Avenue, across the East Side because the side streets are all messed up through the 40's and 50's with a ton of extra traffic. Now this is also gonna impede the East River, you've got delays already at the Midtown Tunnel, about fifteen minutes either way. 59th Street Bridge coming into Manhattan, first of all you can't even get onto the bridge because it's jammed in Long Island City, then once you do, it's jammed across to the Manhattan side, where it's all jammed-up on the East Side. You want to avoid all those jams with the Triboro Bridge. But the problem? The FDR Drive. That's jammed from the Triboro into the 59th Street Bridge and then again from the U.N. all the way to the Battery. You've also got big delays on the West Side, 70's on down the Battery. And, uh, on the northbound side, it's about the One-teens all the way up to the GW Bridge. Brooklyn Bridge a mess either way. Manhattan Bridge better to Manhattan, but it's swamped to Brooklyn. But across the Hudson, there's nothing going on at the Lincoln or the Holland Tunnel. Karen is on Route 4, a member of our traffic team, said we've got real bad delays going west on Route 4, too many cars and trucks. Not enough Route 4 heading west over to Route 17 in Paramus. Those delays begin out of Teaneck.

4:51
And it's getting real bad again. Across the East River that delay at the Midtown Tunnel has got to be at least thirty minutes coming into Manhattan. It's probably going to be even worse if you take the 59th Street Bridge out of Long Island City. Just the streets in Long Island City are a mess. And then, of course, coming into Manhattan you've got a big mess to deal with too. On the East Side, it's just like yesterday. First, Second, Third Avenue taking a beating through the 40's, 50's and 60's. Side streets are all fouled-up. Getting into Times Square, both Broadway and Seventh Avenue, you can expect the delays to begin back in Central Park, right out of Central Park South. So, again, a bad rush hour just like last night. On the East Side, one long line of traffic. It begins at the Triboro Bridge at the FDR, it goes pretty much all the way down to the Battery. There's a little gap in the 50's, but other than that, you'll be on the brakes all the way through. West Side Highway delays begin south in the 70's and north now in the 80's up toward the GW Bridge. You've also got, uh, troubles right now trying to get across the, uh, Hudson River. There is something going on on the Tappan Zee Bridge. I think we got an accident Rockland County-bound, it's over toward the Rockland side, here on the Panasonic Jam Cam, but traffic is barely moving. And you've already got delays on 287 merging in with the Thruway out of White Plains. Lincoln, Holland Tunnel both in very good shape. And also watch out for big delays as you, uh, make your way along the Belt eastbound. There's a stall by Knapp Street in Sheepshead Bay. It's got ba... traffic backed up all the way onto the Verrazano Bridge.

5:01
Still real bad right now, especially along the East Side. The side streets through the 40's and 50's are packing it in. That's why the East Side, uh, avenues are having a tough go. And of course it's not easy coming across the 59th Street Bridge when the East Side's having a tough go. Queensboro Bridge is jammed right across the span into Manhattan. You've got at least thirty to forty minutes at the Midtown Tunnel Manhattan-bound. And big backups now, each way on the Manhattan Bridge and on the Brooklyn Bridge. You got, uh, looks like a decent ride on the inbound Gowanus heading toward the Battery Tunnel. But on the Manhattan side, it's a torture test. The, uh, West Side delays 70's on down and 80's on up to the GW Bridge. Meanwhile, you've got on the FDR Drive one long line of brake lights. Triboro into the 59th Street Bridge more traffic, 40's all the way down to the Brooklyn Bridge and down toward the Battery. Right now across the Hudson, though, the Lincoln, Holland Tunnel, they're both gonna be in good shape. In Queens, we've got troubles on the Grand Central. At least a two-mile delay east to Kew Gardens. You've got big backups here as you, uh, travel in the Bronx. On the, uh, Bronx River Parkway south at 233rd Street, a wreck leaves just the right lane passable. And also watch out for traffic on the Deegan north as you, uh, make your way up toward the, uh, check that.. the Deegan south around Willis Avenue, stalled bus is gonna be in the right lane. Right now, uh, in New Jersey, the Turnpike picking up a ton of extra southbound traffic down toward 15W in the western spur. Eastern spur slightly better going south. And alternate side parking, hey, we just got this in. Alternate side parking will be back in effect for tomorrow. We just got that in. There are no, uh, transit delays.

5:11

Uhh, let's go borough by borough. First you've got troubles in the Bronx on the Bronx River Parkway going south at 133rd Street, an accident, just one lane there is getting by. Because of that there's northbound traffic on the Deegan north, extra traffic on the way through Fordham Road. Also watch out for slow traffic south of the Deegan into Willis Avenue with a stalled bus. In Queens, Long Island Expressway, they're still working with a stall eastbound at Woodhaven Boulevard. It's jammed right off the BQE. You've also got traffic on the Grand Central, east into Kew Gardens. Uh, the Gowanus Expressway in Brooklyn better than you might expect between the Belt and the BQE. But on the Belt, you're jammed right off the Verrazano to Knapp Street, they just cleared a stalled car. And on the Staten Island Expressway, you've got delays west into Todt Hill. Big problems across Manhattan right now. East Side delays on the FDR Drive, Triboro into the 59th Street Bridge, jammed 40's all the way into the Battery. There's something going on northbound on the drive north of the Manhattan Bridge. I can see police on the way to it on the WINS Jam Cam. Meanwhile the West Side delays south 70's on down, northbound 80's on up. And you've also got, uh, big troubles right now trying to get through the interior streets of Midtown, especially Seventh Avenue, we're watching right now on the camera. Times Square is where it ends but it be... uh, the delay begins all the way back in Central Park. Across the Hudson, the Lincoln, the Holland Tunnel fine. At least twenty-five minutes for the GW Bridge into New York. And big delays across the East River from the 59th Street Bridge, uh, down to the Brooklyn Bridge. It's gonna be a mess no matter which way you go.

5:21
And one thing that you do need to know about tomorrow, alternate side parking will be back in effect citywide in all Five Boroughs. Meanwhile just trying to get around town is a grueling torture test almost like yesterday. Manhattan Bridge bumper-to-bumper both decks going over to Brooklyn. The Brooklyn Bridge is jammed each way, the Williamsburg is not looking very good, and the 59th Street Bridge, oh, that's particularly ugly here on the camera, you got right now the, uh, south upper roadway jammed on the way to Queens, you've also got a lot of lower level traffic too. There's a ton of traffic in Long Island City when you come off the bridge in Queens Plaza. There's also a ton of traffic on the East Side of Manhattan. That's why the Midtown Tunnel's got at least a thirty minute delay going Manhattan-bound. Your, uh, cross streets in Manhattan in through the 40's and 50's are a mess. The, uh, avenues are not looking very good either. You've got that gridlock situation back again. Seventh Avenue, you can expect delays right out of Central Park right down to Times Square and that's also doing a number on Broadway. Meanwhile, across the Hudson, the Lincoln, the Holland Tunnel, you wouldn't know anything's going on there. They're both fine. But the GW Bridge, because of slowdowns in the Bronx, you've got the GW Bridge delays of at least twenty-five minutes going into town. Slower than normal traffic Route 4 going west out of, uh, Teaneck going over to Paramus on Route 17. Slower than normal traffic on the Turnpike's western spur, south to 15W east, eastern spur better. And again, alternate side parking back in effect for tomorrow.

5:31
You know this may just be a case of a lot of folks trying to steer clear of Midtown and stay off the avenues. You've got the FDR Drive still packed in solid, Triboro Bridge into the 59th Street Bridge and from the 40's straight on down to the Battery. Delays on the West Side still back near the Boat Basin at Seventy-ninth Street all the way down into the Battery. And you've also got big delays north up toward the GW Bridge too. Now the Lincoln and Holland Tunnel are fine. Your, uh, Midtown areas, still a mess pretty much from, uh, Ninth Avenue all the way over to the East Side through the 40's and 50's it's really gonna be bad. And as you, uh, travel right now, uh, across the East River, Brooklyn Bridge, no matter which way you go you'll be, uh, riding the brake pedal, it is just jam-packed. The Manhattan Bridge, while it's good into Manhattan, it's horrible into Brooklyn on both decks. You got delays on the Williamsburg, at least a half an hour Midtown Tunnel into Manhattan. 59th Street Bridge, I wouldn't even go near that. The Triboro Bridge is not that bad -- that you can use. And, uh, right now in Queens, you can't really use the Grand Central, at least it's a two mile delay to Kew Gardens. Nassau County no major incidents along the LIE and Northern, just a lot of traffic east toward Westbury. As you, uh, travel Route 4, much slower than normal each way as you travel Queen Anne Road in Teaneck all the way to 17 in Paramus. Again, just a lot of traffic there. Remember alternate side street parking back in effect for tomorrow.

5:41
Oh we've got a lot more problems right now coming into New York. The GW Bridge is a mess. That's well over a half an hour express lanes 80/95 and every other approach now taking a beating except for the Palisades. The Lincoln, the Holland Tunnel, they're phenomenal across the Hudson. What isn't good, though, is the West Side. You've got massive backups right now on the, uh, West Side Highway as you, uh, travel northbound. Looks like, uh, the delays now are gonna begin in the 70's on up. The delays southbound begin right in the area of the sewer treatment plant in the 120’s and it’s one long ride all the way to the Battery. You’ve also got big backups on the East Side, too, FDR Drive from the Triboro on down, it’s just an absolute mess. Across the East River, absolute mess really doesn’t say it all. You got the Brooklyn Bridge bumper-to-bumper either way. Now, the Manhattan Bridge, if you take it into Manhattan it’s actually moving along pretty well. If you’re going back to Brooklyn though, you might as well just put the car in park for a while, it’s that bad. The, uh, 59th Street Bridge is taking a beating. The Midtown Tunnel’s gotta be at least a half an hour coming into Manhattan. Triboro Bridge is picking up some traffic on the way to Queens and that links up with a big delay in Queens on the Grand Central from La Guardia going over to Kew Gardens. The Tappan Zee, we have an accident on the span. It’s much slower than normal across to Rockland County. And, uh, right now as you make your way in New Jersey, extra company on the Turnpike as you travel south on the western spur at 15W. Eastern spur not great but better. Nassau County it’s the typical grind on the LIE and on the Northern Parkway heading east toward Westbury.

5:51
Still not having the easiest ride across the Hudson River. We're seeing a ton of traffic at the GW Bridge, well over a half an hour for the upper level. The lower level, well, the Port Authority says five minutes, but I’m thinking more like twenty-five minutes. The, uh, approach off the Palisades does look to be a lot better here on the Panasonic Jam Cam. Right now the Lincoln Tunnel back to Jersey, a lot of traffic off the, uh, Tenth Avenue, 40th Street approach, that’s actually the Eleventh Avenue to 40th Street approach, you’ve got a lot of buses there. So that’s why you’ve got, uh, the delay. The Holland Tunnel into the city starting to slow down. Across the East River, well, slowdown is the key word here. The Brooklyn Bridge jammed either way. As a matter of fact, let me just do the easy thing, let me tell you what’s actually moving. The Manhattan Bridge to Manhattan is moving, the Triboro Bridge going Bronx Manhattan-bound is moving. Everything else below the Triboro is not moving. And, uh, not moving also describes the West Side Highway. Bumper-to-bumper delays 120’s all the way to the Battery. Northbound delays 80's on up to the GW Bridge. And you’ve got big backups on the FDR Drive too, Triboro pretty much all the way down to, uh, the bumper-to-bumper Brooklyn Bridge. So right now the FDR Drive won’t help you. Interior Avenues, especially in Midtown through the 40’s and the 50’s are gonna be really messy from First Avenue all the way over to Ninth. And right now as you make your way through Queens, very slow ride Grand Central East all the way through to Kew Gardens. The LIE not great, slightly better once you get past Kissena Boulevard. Alternate side parking will be back in effect for tomorrow.

6:01
Probably the easiest way, uh, to talk about the East River right now from the Triboro Bridge on down to the Battery Tunnel is just to tell you what’s moving, and what’s moving is the Manhattan Bridge going into Manhattan, everything else right now is gonna be a slow ride no matter which way you go, including the Triboro, which is picking up a lot more traffic at this point. FDR Drive, you’re jammed right off the Brooklyn Bridge up to the 40’s with an accident. Southbound delays Triboro pretty much all the way down to the Battery now. And the, uh, West Side Highway is horrible. You got delays 120's going south and this delay goes way past Chelsea Piers, all the way down to the Battery. Yesterday it took somebody well over two and a half to three hours to cut through traffic like that. So budget at least two hours to use the West Side going south. And, uh, the interior avenues in the 40's and 50's still a mess, especially going east of Ninth Avenue. As you, uh, make your way across the Hudson, though, Lincoln Tunnel slower than the Holland Tunnel back to Jersey. There's a lot of 40th Street traffic at the Lincoln Tunnel right now. GW Bridge don't bother. The upper level's gotta be over a half an hour, lower level near that much. Palisades Parkway approach'd be better. On the Deegan south we still have that stalled bus by Willis Avenue in the right lane. And, uh, troubles on the Cross Island north now in Queens at Hempstead Turnpike. Tractor-trailer wandered on, that's along the right side. As we've been saying, alternate side parking will be back in effect for tomorrow.

6:11
Well, we've been telling you how bad the rush hour's been in Midtown and through Manhattan and it's only getting worse right now. We've been, uh, checking out the FDR Drive just south of the Triboro. This delay goes straight on down to the Brooklyn Bridge. And the northbound side, there was a crash in the 40's with delays right off the Brooklyn Bridge going north. And the West Side, I'm telling you, it can take you upwards to two and a half to three hours to sit in this mess from the 120's all the way down to the Battery Tunnel. I'm not seeing any movement at all right now around the Chelsea Piers area, around the 40's, up in the 90's. It's just horrible on the West Side. Eighth Avenue's gonna be bad, Teens all the way up to Columbus Circle. You got a ton of traffic right now on Seventh Avenue out of, uh, the area of Central Park, all the way down, going past Times Square. Broadway's being impacted by that too. On the East Side steer clear of Second Avenue. Because of the dump-off off the 59th Street Bridge and coming out of the Midtown Tunnel, you've got delays on Second Avenue from the 80's all the way down to the Teens. And the East Side side streets through the 40's and 50's are an absolute mess. Big problems right now across the East River. The only thing south of the Triboro that's moving is the Manhattan-bound Manhattan Bridge. Other than that, forget it. And right now off the Verrazano we've got troubles, Brooklyn-bound lower level there's an accident. It's a flipped over car, the Brooklyn-bound lower level of the Verrazano on the ramp to the Belt. This will impact the upper roadway too. So right now coming out of Staten Island coming off the Verrazano, it'll be very slow.

6:21
Well, across the East River it's just easy to sum it up like this: the Throgs Neck and the Whitestone Bridge are not that bad. And the Manhattan Bridge is actually moving along fairly well into Manhattan. Everything else is not gonna be moving at all. And especially avoid the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridge going over to, uh, Brooklyn, they've been, uh, just an absolute horror show. You got tons of traffic on the FDR Drive coming down from the Triboro all the way to the Brooklyn Bridge. And also major delays along the West Side from the 120's on down to the Battery. No joke here. It could take you two to three hours to cut through that kind of traffic. Also big delays, uh, north from the, uh, it looks like from the 80's up toward the GW Bridge. GW Bridge has gotta be about forty-five minutes now from the upper level into the city, we've been tracking this on a Panasonic Jam Cam, the, uh, lower level, maybe a half an hour. I'm telling you, off the Palisades it'll work. But a lot of this traffic going into the Bronx. Eastbound Cross Bronx is slow through Jerome and Webster Avenue. And of course then you've got the West Side to worry about coming off the GW Bridge as well. Big troubles coming off the Verrazano. The Brooklyn-bound lower level is now closed. Flipped over car on the ramp to the Belt. You will take the upper level, no choice, it's gonna be better, but a lot of traffic coming out of Staten Island because of it. And alternate side parking will be back in effect for tomorrow.

6:31

Well across the East River between the Triboro Bridge and the Battery Tunnel the only thing that has any movement to it is the Manhattan-bound Manhattan Bridge. Otherwise, we've got big jam-ups up and down the line across the East Side. Across the Hudson, while the Lincoln and Holland Tunnel are really not that bad, although the, uh, Lincoln Tunnel's 40th Street approach doesn't look very good off of Eleventh Avenue. You got big delays at the GW Bridge, about a forty-five minute wait coming into town on the upper level. Lower level, that'll cut it down to about a half an hour, but still you're better off at Palisades. Now the West Side by far your worst side. This is a two and a half to three hour delay, 120's down to the Battery, it's just not moving. On the East Side, it's from the 100's down to the Brooklyn Bridge going south. Your interior avenues are a mess, especially Eighth Avenue right now, heading up into the 40's it's jammed all the way back into the Teens. Ton of traffic on Seventh Avenue out of Central Park into Times Square. The East Side though the 40's and 50's are gonna be bad, especially worse is Second Avenue from the 80's down to the Teens, just a real slow go. You got all that feeder traffic coming out of the Midtown Tunnel and off the 59th Street Bridge. Still got big delays on the Verrazano. It's closed on the way to Brooklyn on the lower level. Flipped over car on the ramp to the Belt. Everybody goes up top. And something going on in Queens on the Grand Central going west. You're jammed up right now passing the LIE, the LIE going better right now on that eastbound side.

6:41

Well, traffic we sure have. That delay for the Midtown Tunnel now, I'm gonna call that at least forty-five minutes to an hour trying to come into Manhattan. And a lot of folks bailing out of the BQE which is swamped down to the Williamsburg Bridge. The only thing that's moving across the East River between the Triboro Bridge and the Brooklyn Bridge just happens to be the Manhattan-bound Manhattan Bridge. Other than that, it's gonna take you an awfully long time to cross the East River. Now, uh, the Brooklyn Bridge is getting a little bit better to Manhattan so that may be an option too. But Brooklyn-bound, both the Manhattan and Brooklyn Bridge a mess as we see them on the WINS Jam Cam. You've also got troubles across the Hudson at the GW Bridge, gotta be at least a forty-five minute delay to the city on the upper level. This links up with whatever the problem is on the eastbound Cross Bronx to Jerome and Webster Avenue, it's has been bad all afternoon. And, uh, right now the West Side a horrible side. Delays 120's all the way down to the Battery. That delay can easily take you more than two hours to cut through. A lot of traffic also through Midtown on every avenue at this point. As you make your way through Nassau County, the LIE, the Northern, no incidents reported, just some traffic going east toward Westbury. And on the Grand Central, whatever the problem is near Shea Stadium, it is doing a number on traffic westbound side right now, barely moving. And they cleared an accident off the Verrazano Bridge.
How can you tell when a roadway may be closed? Well, maybe it's because nobody is moving on the Grand Central Parkway, they're trying to, uh, mop up an accident on the westbound Grand Central by Shea Stadium. I don't see anybody moving. Back near, uh, the area of the LIE near Jewel Avenue, so the bottom line is you wanna go with the LIE. The LIE's gonna be better but only to a degree. There's a backup that begins at the BQE, right before it, that goes into the Midtown Tunnel. That's about a one hour delay. You've also got big backups just about every bridge and tunnel across the East River, from the Triboro on south. The, uh, Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridge, though, better on the way into Manhattan. And again, that Midtown Tunnel delay's gotta be about an hour. The BQE, uh, is jammed up down to the Williamsburg, that's still a mess. And across the Hudson River, GW Bridge right now, the epitome of mess, at least a forty-five minute delay for the upper level, lower level about a half an hour, best still off of the Palisades. And you've got a lot of company now if you're gonna make that trip on the West Side, 120's all the way down to the Battery, it's still jammed. The FDR Drive's not looking very good either going south 100's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. And you've got big delays on the interior avenues, especially on Second and Eighth, those two you've really gotta steer clear of. Seventh Avenue downtown into Times Square, that's a mess too. Nassau County, no accidents reported on the LIE or on the Northern.

Let's start across the East River where, actually, if you can believe this, it's getting worse in some places. This delay to the Midtown Tunnel has got to be forty-five to sixty minutes easily. It's bumper-to-bumper well before the LIE. Right now the, uh, BQE is jammed from Queens Boulevard down to the Williamsburg. Williamsburg's not looking very good. Now the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridge, they both are doing better on the way to Manhattan but they're both unbelievably jammed on the way to Brooklyn. Battery Tunnel smarting, the 59th Street Bridge isn't working out, and the Triboro Bridge has got delays too. Right now across the Hudson, GW Bridge is a mess, forty-five minutes at least upper level, lower level's gotta be a half an hour and growing. Now, here's the fun part: the Lincoln, the Holland Tunnel, no delays at all either way. And you still have a ton of traffic on the West Side 120's all the way down to the Battery. That delay alone can take you somewhere in the range of two to three hours to cut through. All the interior avenues taking a beating, especially in the Midtown area. Second Avenue worse going downtown, Eighth Avenue worse going uptown. And now we got a new problem on the Belt that I found here on the WINS Jam Cam. We got a stall westbound Belt, right off the ramp from the Van Wyck, he's in the right lane. This will cause a tight merge delay from the Van Wyck and a delay on the westbound Belt by JFK. Westbound Grand Central, they're still working with a big hit in front of Shea Stadium. That's got a couple of lanes knocked down. LIE's actually better going east at this point.

It has been torture right now trying to get through Manhattan. We still have those major delays, especially along Second Avenue going downtown. The reason Second Avenue's got the worst traffic on the East Side, you get all the traffic filtering in off the 59th Street Bridge and off the incredibly crowded Midtown Tunnel. Also, you've got major delays along Seventh Avenue getting into Times Square. Big backups on Eighth Avenue coming uptown toward the Port Authority. Very slow traffic too, uh, through the 40's and 50's on the side streets. And the West Side may by far actually be your worst side. The West Side Highway still slow traffic 120's on down to the, uh, area of the Battery Tunnel. Now, this delay can easily take you about two hours or more to cut through. Two to three hours. The traffic is, uh, packed in that badly. On the East Side FDR Drive delays 100's down to the Tr... the, uh, area of the Brooklyn Bridge. And across the East River, here's what you need to know: Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridge are both stacked up solid to Brooklyn but they're both better Manhattan-bound. The Williamsburg is still slow. The Battery... uh, the Midtown Tunnel, you've got delays in the Midtown Tunnel for an hour just trying to get into Manhattan. 59th Street Bridge, the lower level jammed on the way to Manhattan but the upper level's improving on the way to Queens. Of course the big problem is actually getting over to it. And the Triboro Bridge is still sluggish but moving traffic. And, uh, update on the Manhattan Bridge, now we're getting a better camera shot. That Manhattan-bound side's picking up more traffic. Across the Hudson, forty-five minutes solid GW Bridge into the city. Lincoln, Holland Tunnel no delays either way. They cleared a stall on the Belt westbound by JFK and they also cleared an accident on the westbound Grand Central in front of Shea Stadium. Right now in Nassau County the LIE, Northern still some sluggish traffic near Westbury. In New Jersey the Turnpike spurs are doing better.

7:21

Well, hopefully this will be our last brutal holiday-weekend getaway day. We still have massive backups across the East River. We've got delays at the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridges, jammed right now on the way to Brooklyn. The Manhattan Bridge is now picking up more traffic coming over Canal Street. Williamsburg Bridge won't work, the Triboro Bridge is still sluggish, 59th Street Bridge better to Queens but jam-packed Manhattan-bound. The, uh, local streets around Long Island City and of, uh, Second Avenue just a real mess in Manhattan too. And, uh, right now that Midtown Tunnel could easily take you an hour still trying to come into Manhattan. Meanwhile, across the Hudson, hard forty-five minutes at the GW Bridge, Palisades approach better but the Lincoln, the Holland Tunnel, as they've been pretty much through the day, both the tunnels are in fantastic shape. Matter of fact, the Lincoln Tunnel here on the Jam Cam, there's nobody going in off the 40th Street approach. Meanwhile, trying to get around Midtown is not easy. Every avenue's got some type of big delay except for Tenth and Eleventh. And, uh, right now you've still got big delays still on Seventh Avenue into Times Square, Eighth Avenue into the Port Authority. Second Avenue is just a horrible ride, 80's on down to the Teens. We have all that filtering traffic coming off the Midtown Tunnel and the 59th Street Bridge. And we've also got delays along the Belt Parkway. Westbound is jammed by JFK, after Cross Bay Boulevard it'll open up. The Cross Bronx is bumper-to-bumper east to Jerome and Webster Avenue. That's what's been doing a number on GW Bridge traffic. In New Jersey, better on the Turnpike, better on the Garden State Parkway. And alternate side parking back in effect for tomorrow.

7:31

Still having a real hard go across the Hudson at the GW Bridge, but not at the Lincoln or the Holland Tunnel. They've been phenomenal all day. It's that GW Bridge that still backs up nearly forty-five minutes on the way to New York on the upper level, Palisades approach better, lower level about a half an hour. And a lot of this is because of delays getting through the Bronx on the eastbound Cross Bronx to Jerome and Webster Avenue. The big problem on the West Side, well it is the West Side. The West Side Highway, delays, uh, start now on the southbound side pretty much, uh, from the, uh, 70's, which is actually an improvement, all the way down to the Battery Tunnel, still a mess to get through. The northbound side of the West Side in the 120's, there’s a stall. Interior avenues are taking a real bad beating. Eighth Avenue up to the Port Authority, Seventh Avenue, Broadway into Times Square, Second Avenue you don’t even want to go near at this point. And right now on the FDR Drive still plenty of traffic south heading down to the Brooklyn Bridge. Now across the East River, here's what you need to know, Brooklyn Bridge jammed right now both ways. You've got, uh, actually... check that, just Brooklyn-bound, Manhattan-bound it's getting better. The Manhattan Bridge is the one that’s jammed both ways. The Williamsburg still has traffic. The Midtown Tunnel could take you forty-five to sixty minutes to come into Manhattan. 59th Street Bridge better on the way to Queens but the big problem is getting there. All of the, uh, interior streets in Manhattan, they’re all fouled up through the 40's and 50's. And, uh, meanwhile at the Triboro Bridge things are getting a little bit better there now. Meanwhile the westbound Grand Central, they cleared a crash in front of, uh, Shea Stadium. As you, uh, travel in Nassau County, the LIE and the Northern getting better. And in Westchester County the main arteries 287 and 87 and 95, they’ve all improved. And alternate side parking in effect for tomorrow.

7:41

Well, still tough going right now trying to get around Manhattan. The worst places you could be driving is Second Avenue downtown, especially near the 59th Street Bridge and the Midtown Tunnel. Steer clear right now of, uh, Times Square coming down Seventh Avenue and Broadway, and also avoid Eighth Avenue near the Port Authority. You've got a ton of traffic to deal with still at the GW Bridge but the Lincoln and Holland Tunnel are good into and out of the city. Right now the GW Bridge to New York still thirty to forty-five minutes depending on your approach. And right now across the, uh, Bronx there’s still a lot of traffic on the eastbound Cross Bronx to Jerome and Webster Avenue, it’s been this way all afternoon. Across the, uh, East River, oh boy has this been bad, bumper-to-bumper traffic right now. We are still feeling the effects on the Brooklyn Bridge coming into Manhattan. The Manhattan Bridge is still jammed up either way. The Battery Tunnel, the Midtown Tunnel still both very slow, as a matter of fact, the Midtown Tunnel, forty-five minutes to an hour still trying to come into Manhattan, 59th Street Bridge better on the way to Queens, but a lot of local traffic on the East Side and also in Long Island City, when you come off the Queensboro. And the Queensboro is still jammed on the way to Manhattan. The Grand Central doing better around, uh, the area of LaGuardia and Shea Stadium with an accident cleared but still slow east into Kew Gardens. And also, uh, if you want to get through Queens, take the LIE, it seems to be in a lot better shape. Gowanus Expressway not bad in Brooklyn. The Staten Island highways picking up.

7:51

Well, uh, it looks like this may be the last of one of those days. Trying to get though Manhattan there's still extra traffic on the West Side, pretty much 40's on down to the Battery. Also, er, check that... make it 30's on down to the Battery, that's a big improvement. And, uh, on the East Side still plenty of traffic, FDR both ways into the 59th Street Bridge and down into the Brooklyn Bridge. And what you need to know across the East River is this: we still have a mess to deal with. The Triboro Bridge still extremely slow on the way to Queens. The 59th Street Bridge, still extremely slow on the way to Manhattan. 59th, ur... the Midtown Tunnel still take you forty-five minutes Manhattan-bound. You still have delays at the Williamsburg Bridge either way. And a bumper-to-bumper ride each way on the Manhattan Bridge, the one you absolutely must avoid. Brooklyn Bridge better to Manhattan but also jam-packed on the way to Brooklyn. Battery Tunnel sluggish either way. Now if you want to go across the Hudson River, go with the tunnels. The GW Bridge, still a huge backup trying to get into New York off the Express Lanes of 80/95. That was all because of delays getting through the Bronx. The, uh, all other approaches a little bit better but still the Palisades your best one as we see here on the Panasonic Jam Cam. Right now as you, uh, travel the avenues, they're getting better in Midtown. But still, watch out on the East Side, especially of the 59th Street Bridge to the Midtown Tunnel and also on the, uh, lower end of Manhattan, around the Battery and the Brooklyn Bridge. Right now in Brooklyn the Gowanus getting better as you make your way inbound but after that, outbound slow through Industry City. The Belt is still very slow by JFK. The Van Wyck is jammed south to Atlantic Avenue, that's leaving a two-mile mark on the Grand Central east into Kew Gardens. Alternate side parking will be back into effect for tomorrow.

8:01

Well, hopefully there will soon be an end to the traffic nightmare caused by this holiday weekend getaway, but it's not over yet. East River crossings are all jammed up and it's a mess getting there. Queens-Midtown Tunnel Manhattan-bound a forty-five minute wait. 59th Street Bridge, upper level is handling only Queens-bound traffic, not too bad as I check in on the Jam Cam. Manhattan-bound lower deck is heavy. Triboro is, uh, slow going both directions and it's pretty decent at the Throgs Neck and the Whitestone but getting to the Whitestone there's trouble. Whitestone Expressway slow from 20th Avenue to the bridge because of a stall. Brooklyn Bridge Brooklyn-bound very heavy, Manhattan Bridge, Brooklyn-bound is slow, and to Manhattan it's heavy on the upper level. Brooklyn-Battery Tunnel is all jammed-up Manhattan-bound. Williamsburg Bridge not too bad. At the Goethals, very slow going if you're Staten Island-bound. And not too bad at the Lincoln and Holland Tunnels. GW Bridge, however, if you're heading into town, and it's about a twenty minute delay on the upper level, about ten on the lower deck. Harlem River Drive southbound slow from the Triboro to the Brooklyn Bridge. Northbound it is jammed up from the 40's to the 60's. West Side Highway northbound, a stall at 125th Street that's being cleared and then you're OK to the GW Bridge. And it's better southbound too, those earlier delays easing to the Battery Tunnel. In Queens, the Belt Parkway very heavy westbound from JFK into Lefferts. Checking mass transit, LIRR delays up to fifteen minutes through Jamaica because of congestion. And street cleaning rules back in effect tomorrow.

8:11

Well, the East River crossings still feeling the hopefully last of the holiday weekend getaway crunch. At the 59th Street Bridge upper level is handling Queens-bound traffic only not too bad, but the lower level is jammed-up both Queens and Manhattan-bound. Queens-Midtown Tunnel, you'll have to wait forty-five minutes to get into Manhattan. Triboro earlier delays have eased out. Not too bad at the Throgs Neck, the Whitestone, but getting to the Whitestone you have to deal with slowdowns on the Whitestone Expressway from 20th Avenue up to the bridge because of a breakdown. FDR Drive slow southbound from the Triboro down to the Brooklyn Bridge, which is jammed Brooklyn-bound. Manhattan Bridge in view on the Jam Cam, it is crawling Brooklyn-bound, also slow Manhattan-bound on the upper level. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is, uh, very slow going Manhattan-bound. Not too bad at the Williamsburg Bridge but at the Goethals it's very heavy if you're Staten Island, headed to Staten Island. You're, uh, a heck of a lot better at the Hudson. Holland and Lincoln Tunnel no troubles there. GW Bridge Manhattan-bound on the upper deck, it's about a fifteen, twenty minute delay. Lower deck about half that, then it's slow on the eastbound Cross Bronx from the Bridge out to Jerome. In Queens, eastbound the LIE at the Cross Island, watch out for a disabled vehicle blocking a lane and causing lots of delays. And on the Grand Central eastbound, it is slow from the LIE out to the Van Wyck. And a slowdown on the Belt Parkway, westbound heavy from JFK out to Lefferts. Checking mass transit, LIRR delays up to fifteen minutes through Jamaica because of congestion.

8:21

Well, what a mess trying to get across the East River. The best on the list the Triboro, the Throgs Neck and the Whitestone except Bronx-bound from the Whitestone Expressway. Northbound it's slow 20th Avenue up to the bridge because of a stall. The Williamsburg Bridge is in decent shape. You wanna stay away from the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, it's in view on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam, Manhattan-bound a forty-five minute plus wait. 59th Street Bridge upper level only handling Queens-bound traffic now, not too bad. The lower deck is all jammed-up, both Queens and Manhattan-bound. And, uh, at the Brooklyn Bridge, it is very, very heavy Brooklyn-bound. Manhattan Bridge Brooklyn-bound is a slow go into Manhattan, it's heavy on the upper level. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is a slow-go Manhattan-bound. On the Harlem River Drive southbound, expect delays from the Triboro down to the Brooklyn Bridge and northbound it's slow from the 40's to the 60's. Not too bad now on the West Side Highway. And it's looking pretty decent at the Hudson River crossings. Holland and Lincoln Tunnels in fine shape, both into and out of town. At the GW Bridge inbound, we have about a ten minute wait on both decks, checking that on the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam. Then a bit slow on the eastbound Cross Bronx from the bridge out to Jerome. In Queens, the LIE eastbound at the Cross Island, a breakdown there blocking the center lane, causing some big delays. The Grand Central eastbound, very heavy from the LIE out to the Van Wyck. Checking mass transit, LIRR delays up to fifteen minutes through Jamaica because of congestion.

8:31

Well, the Williamsburg Bridge was one of the few East River crossings in decent shape until now. The Bridge itself is OK, but getting there, you can't do it off the BQE, the ramp to the bridge is closed with police department activity. Brooklyn Bridge Brooklyn-bound very heavy across the span. You're crawling on the Manhattan Bridge Brooklyn-bound and also Manhattan-bound it's heavy on the upper level. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is a slow go if you're heading into Manhattan. At the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, a little bit better there. Manhattan-bound, is still about a half hour wait. 59th Street Bridge upper level handling Queens-bound traffic only, not too bad there, but on the lower deck, you are, uh, slow going to Queens and also Manhattan-bound. Not too bad at the Throgs Neck and the Whitestone and it's better getting to the Whitestone Bridge on the Whitestone Expressway, a stall has been cleared from 20th Avenue to the bridge. Goethals is heavy Staten Island-bound. Not too bad at the Hudson River crossings. Holland and Lincoln Tunnel in fine shape. GW Bridge, earlier delays have eased out, it's clear sailing in both directions, but I do see an oversized load waiting to make its way across the inbound upper deck, so stick with the lower deck, it's in view on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. And then on the eastbound Cross Bronx, very slow from the bridge out to Jerome. On the East Side of town, still slow southbound on the Harlem River Drive from the Triboro down to the Brooklyn Bridge and northbound is slow from the 40's to the 60's. In Queens, eastbound the LIE at the Cross Island a disabled vehicle knocking out the center lane.

8:41
Well, I see a solid line of traffic at the Manhattan Bridge on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. Brooklyn-bound very heavy and Manhattan-bound very heavy on the upper level. Brooklyn Bridge Brooklyn-bound is a slow go. And the Williamsburg Bridge, access from the BQE is blocked because of police department activity, closing the ramp. At the bridge itself is not too bad. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is heavy Manhattan-bound. On the Harlem River Drive, FDR Drive southbound it's a slow go from Gracie Mansion down to the 59th Street Bridge, then it's a solid wall from the 40's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. At the 59th Street Bridge upper level only Queens-bound traffic, that's not too bad, but it's all jammed-up on the lower level both Queens and Manhattan-bound. The Queens-Midtown Tunnel, a half hour delay heading into Manhattan. At the Triboro not too bad there and you're good to go at the Throgs Neck, the Whitestone too. In Queens eastbound, the LIE at the Cross Island Parkway, disabled vehicle knocking out the center lane causing some significant delays. Along the Grand Central eastbound it's a slow ride from the LIE out to the Van Wyck. Hudson River crossings still in fine shape. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels no major delays to report. At the GW Bridge, coming off the span, the Cross Bronx is very heavy from the bridge out to Jerome. And in New Jersey, we heard from Michael from the phone force about a crash on the southbound Garden State Parkway at Exit 143.

8:51
Well, the 59th Street Bridge in view on the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam Queens-bound, a very slow go on both decks, both the lower and upper level. Looks like the upper level is easing out ever so slight, slightly. And also keep in mind that the upper deck is Queens-bound only. And, uh, we do have some emergency vehicles on one side of the, uh, bridge allowed only. Queens-Midtown Tunnel Manhattan-bound is a half-hour wait. Triboro, Whitestone and Throgs Neck in pretty decent shape but the Brooklyn Bridge Brooklyn-bound is, uh, very slow. Manhattan Bridge, you are crawling Brooklyn-bound and, huh, it is all jammed-up Manhattan-bound on the upper level. Williamsburg Bridge, the access from the BQE, you can't do it. It is blocked with some police department activity on the ramp. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel very heavy Manhattan-bound. On the Harlem River Drive, FDR Drive southbound, it's a slow go from Gracie Mansion to the 59th Street Bridge and then you're all jammed up from the 40's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. Not too bad still at the Hudson River crossings. Keep in mind, however, at the GW Bridge Manhattan-bound on the upper deck, it looks like an oversized load is waiting to make its way across the span. In Queens eastbound, the LIE at the Cross Island, a disabled vehicle has been cleared away, that's good news. Still slow at the Grand Central eastbound from the LIE out to the Van Wyck. And in New Jersey, southbound on the Garden State Parkway at 143 in Irvington there's a crash blocking the left lane. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

9:01
Well, you just can't catch a break at the lower East River crossings. Here's the way the delays stack up: at the Brooklyn Bridge very slow going Brooklyn-bound. At the Manhattan Bridge, it's in view on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam, you are crawling Brooklyn-bound, looks like delays Manhattan-bound are beginning to ease ever, ever so slightly. Williamsburg Bridge, access from the BQE, you can't do it, the ramp is closed because of police department activity. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is very slow Manhattan-bound. 59th Street Bridge Queens-bound crawling on both lower and upper decks, the upper deck is Queens-bound only. Queens-Midtown Tunnel Manhattan-bound, there's about a thirty minute delay. Not too bad at the Throgs Neck, Whitestone and Triboro Bridges. And on the Harlem River FDR Drive southbound slow from Gracie Mansion to the 59th Street Bridge, then traffic is stacked up from the 40's to the Brooklyn Bridge. And at the Hudson River crossings, there goes that oversize load at the GW Bridge Manhattan-bound on the upper deck. Expect some slight delays, might stick with the lower deck instead until that completely clears. Looks like it's heading out to the Cross Bronx eastbound now. That's why it's slow from the bridge out to the Deegan, um, almost to Jerome. Holland and Lincoln Tunnels both in fine shape, checking those on the Jam Cam live view. In New Jersey southbound on the Garden State Parkway at Exit 143 in Irvington, there's an accident blocking the left lane. Alternate side of the street parking rules are in effect tomorrow.

9:11
Well, we have a wee bit of relief at the Manhattan Bridge, Manhattan-bound and delays are beginning to ease Brooklyn-bound. Still crawling across the span Brooklyn Bridge, Brooklyn-bound. Very heavy at the Williamsburg. Access from the BQE is blocked, police department activity closing the ramp. Brooklyn Battery tunnel heavy Manhattan-bound. Speaking of the BQE, slow go into the Kosciusko, an accident quickly cleared away as I'm checking it on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. 59th Street Bridge Queens-bound, very heavy on both the lower and upper decks. Looking at the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, you still have to budget about a half hour if you're Manhattan-bound. Triboro, Whitestone, Throgs Neck in decent shape. Willis Avenue Bridge Bronx-bound, a disabled truck blocking the center lane, thanks to Leslie on the phone force for information on that one. Harlem River, FDR Drive slow from Gracie Mansion to the 59th Street Bridge, then from the 40's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels all check in trouble-free. At the GW Bridge those delays Manhattan-bound have eased out now that an oversized vehicle has made its way across the span. Checking mass transit, LIRR delays up to fifteen minutes at Jamaica because of congestion. And alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

9:21
Well, traffic is still a mess Brooklyn-bound at the Manhattan Bridge but much better at the Brooklyn Bridge, looks fine in both directions as I check it on the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam. But at the Williamsburg Bridge it's slow on the outer roadway Manhattan-bound. And the approach from the BQE shut down because of police department activity, delays stretch back to the LIE. At the Brooklyn Battery Tunnel, very heavy Manhattan-bound. Harlem River FDR Drive crawling from Gracie Mansion down to the 59th Street Bridge and then heavy traffic from the 40's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. 59th Street Bridge Queens-bound on both decks, very heavy across the span. And it's a slow go Queens-Midtown Tunnel Manhattan-bound, delays running about twenty, twenty-five minutes. Triboro, Whitestone, Throgs Neck still in pretty decent shape. Willis Avenue Bronx-bound, watch for a disabled truck slowing things down. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels all in fine shape. No delays to report in New Jersey. Big delays on the Garden State Parkway southbound from Exit 145 to 133 in Irvington, oh, that's 143 in Irvington, that's because of an accident blocking both lanes. Checking mass transit, LIRR fifteen minutes through Jamaica, that's because of congestion. And alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

9:31

Well, checking out the 59th Street Bridge on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam looks like the upper level now handling two-way traffic again. Big delays still on both decks if you're Queens-bound. And big delays at the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, still about a twenty to twenty-five minute delay into the tolls. Southbound on the Harlem Drive FDR Drive, a slow go from 86th Street to the 59th Street Bridge, again, from the 40's down to the Brooklyn Bridge. And on the northbound side, we're stacked up from the 59th Street Bridge up to the Triboro. The Triboro Bridge itself, not too bad and same with the Throgs Neck, the Whitestone Bridge. Queens-Midtown Tunnel, still delays if you are Manhattan-bound. And at the Manhattan Bridge, Brooklyn-bound is a very slow go. Williamsburg Bridge, access from the BQE still blocked with police department activity. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels all in fine shape. And in New Jersey, crash on the Garden State Parkway southbound at Exit One Forty-three has been cleared away. Alternate side of the street parking rules are back in effect tomorrow.

9:41

Well, it is a really slow ride on the East Side northbound the FDR Drive, heavy traffic from 63rd Street up to 116th because of a disabled vehicle knocking out the center lane, then a slow go to the Triboro. And on the southbound side, they're crawling from the 60's down to Houston Street. Lower East River crossings, Brooklyn Bridge heavy Manhattan-bound at the Manhattan Bridge, Manhattan-bound delays. And we have also Broadway-bound a solid wall of... uh, Broadway-bound... Brooklyn-bound, a solid wall of traffic in view on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. Williamsburg, you still can't get there off the BQE, the ramps are closed because of police department activity, delays on the BQE start at the LIE. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is very heavy Manhattan-bound. 59th Street Bridge slow on the upper deck if you're Manhattan-bound and then if you're Queens-bound, the slow ride is on the lower level. Queens-Midtown Tunnel's still about a twenty to twenty-five minute delay into town. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels, no troubles there. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

9:51

The delays Manhattan-bound at the Manhattan Bridge and Brooklyn-bound delays have been there all night, I'm checking it on the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam. Brooklyn Bridge slow go Manhattan-bound. Williamsburg Bridge, no access off the BQE, the ramps are closed with police department activity, delays stretch back to the LIE. Brooklyn
Battery Tunnel is slow Manhattan-bound. 59th Street Bridge Manhattan-bound lower level heads up on a disabled vehicle, then it's slow on the upper deck if you're heading into Manhattan. Queens-bound, the lower deck is the one to avoid. Queens-Midtown Tunnel you want to avoid that Manhattan-bound, there's about a half hour delay. Northbound on the FDR slow from 63rd to 116th, disabled vehicle blocking the center lane, then heavy up to the Triboro, then southbound 60's down to Houston Street. Hudson River crossings, no significant problems there. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

10:01

Well, here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: we have double trouble at the Brooklyn Bridge, Brooklyn-bound, a couple of disabled vehicles slowing things down and Manhattan-bound isn't much of a picnic either, as I check the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. At the Manhattan Bridge, you are slow in both directions. Williamsburg Bridge no access off the... from the westbound BQE, the ramp is closed with police department activity, delays now back to Meeker-Morgan. Brooklyn Battery Tunnel is clogged Manhattan-bound. 59th Street Bridge heavy Manhattan-bound on the upper deck and Queens-bound the lower deck is the one you want to avoid. At the Queens-Midtown Tunnel you want to avoid that Manhattan-bound, expect a half hour delay to the tolls. Slow ride on the East Side, northbound FDR Drive from 63rd to 116th because of a breakdown and slow up to the Triboro, and southbound it's sluggish from the 60's to Houston. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels no troubles. And northbound on the Bronx River Parkway at 233rd Street one lane is blocked with an accident. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.

10:11

We have a breakdown on the East Side of town. Northbound the FDR Drive, it's slow from 63rd to 116th because of a disabled vehicle blocking out the center lane, then it's slow to the Triboro. And southbound, a heavy ride from the 60's to Houston Street. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: Brooklyn Bridge, Brooklyn-bound, a couple of disabled vehicles slowing things down, then you're loaded up Manhattan-bound. And at the Manhattan Bridge, you're tied up in both directions. Williamsburg Bridge no access off of the westbound BQE, the ramp is closed, police department activity, delays now back to Meeker-Morgan. 59th Street Bridge, it's in view on the 1010 WINS Jam Cam. Manhattan-bound upper deck is slow and Queens-bound, it's the lower deck to avoid. Queens-Midtown Tunnel still thirty minutes into the toll Manhattan-bound. GW Bridge, Lincoln and Holland Tunnels in fine shape. And in the Bronx, Bronx River Parkway northbound at 233rd Street there's a crash. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect.

10:21

Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: it's better at the Brooklyn Bridge, Brooklyn-bound, a couple of breakdowns cleared away, but Manhattan-bound a bit of a slow go, checking it on the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam. Manhattan Bridge tied up in both directions. At the Williamsburg Bridge no access off of the BQE, the ramp closed because of police department activity. 59th Street Bridge heavy Manhattan-bound on the upper deck, and if you're Queens-bound, the lower deck is the one to avoid. Queens-Midtown Tunnel still Manhattan-bound delays into the tolls running about twenty-five minutes or so. Slow ride on the East Side still, northbound the FDR Drive heavy from 63rd to 116th, a disabled vehicle, then slow to the Triboro. And southbound, heavy from the 60's to Houston Street. GW Bridge, checking that on the Jam Cam, looks like on the upper deck heading into town some slight delays at the cash tolls, use the lower. Lincoln and Holland Tunnels no troubles. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect for tomorrow.

10:31
It is quiet on the GW Bridge here, as the numbers go. We're running about five minutes on 80/95 Express, which has significantly decreased from the earlier nightmare at the evening rush, so five from 80/95 Express and five minutes on everything else. Lincoln and Holland Tunnel, smooth sailing. 59th Street Bridge both decks are still heavy, upper deck Manhattan-bound can run you up to a half hour. And the Queens-Midtown Tunnel doesn't looks a whole lot better with delays Manhattan-bound at about twenty to twenty-five minutes. We've still got police department activity blocking off the ramp to the Williamsburg, causing delays on the BQE back to Morgan-Meeker. Brooklyn Bridge Brooklyn-bound looking better after breakdowns have been cleared, but inbound it's another story, still a half hour into town. Manhattan Bridge, Manhattan-bound upper deck looking good and the lower deck is still stacked to the BQE. Southbound FDR Drive, we do have an accident in the left lane at 59th Street, heavy all the way downtown to Houston Street. Northbound the FDR Drive heavy from 63rd to 116th, a disabled vehicle, then slow to the Triboro. Alternate side parking is in effect.

10:41
And here comes Hershel, down the southbound FDR Drive talking to us on a cell phone, and of course a hands-free device, I'm sure, and he reports that the accident is now cleared out of the way on that southbound FDR, just below the 59th Street Bridge. It's still heavy, just as it's been all day downtown to about Houston Street, but things should start to improve there soon. Northbound the FDR Drive heavy from 63rd to 116th, with a just-cleared disabled vehicle, but still slow to the Triboro. The BQE westbound we still see police activity on the entrance ramp coming into the Williamsburg, heavy out to the Kosciusko. And as we check the rest of our bridges and tunnels, we're running about five minutes on the GW Bridge from the 80/95 Express, five minutes or less from the remaining approaches. No troubles at inbound Lincoln Tunnel, maybe five minutes on the Holland. Whitestone, Throgs Neck, Triboro bridges really in fine shape. Just watch that right lane construction work on your Queens-bound Whitestone. 59th Street Bridge both decks are still heavy, upstairs to Manhattan can run you up to twenty minutes. And the Queens-Midtown Tunnel actually starting to improve with delays now into the city at about fifteen to twenty minutes. Alternate side parking's in effect for tomorrow.

10:51
Well, things are finally starting to unwind here on the East Side as the accident that had been gumming up the works has now been cleared out of the way on the southbound FDR near the 59th Street Bridge. Things easing up, but still moderately slow headed downtown to around Fourteenth Street. Northbound the FDR Drive still heavy from about 63rd to 116th, but with a cleared vehicle in the right lane, we should be looking better up to the Triboro. George Washington Bridge five minutes or less into the tolls, light on the upper deck. Great on the lower deck but no trucks on the lower deck, please. Five to ten minutes at the Holland Tunnel, Lincoln is smooth sailing. Triboro Bridge, Throgs Neck, OK. Whitestone Bridge Queens-bound a little slow with the right lane shut down, three lanes open to The Bronx. 59th Street Bridge, both decks easing out to Manhattan. We still have delays inbound at the Midtown Tunnel, could cost you fifteen to twenty minutes. And finally some good news from the Williamsburg Bridge, police department activity has ceased and we're just awaiting the opening of that on-ramp to the bridge into Manhattan. BQE, though, still backed up due to the earlier activity. Brooklyn Bridge starting to move as outbound breakdowns have now been cleared. But you're still gonna have to wait both directions on the Manhattan Bridge. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect.

11:01

It's been a long day here but there is an end in sight on the East Side as we are actually beginning to see movement on the southbound FDR for the first time in hours now that that accident's been cleared by the 59th Street Bridge. Downtown, though, you still need to watch out for slow patches around 14th Street, the lower Teens. And here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: Jersey-side looking fine with no delays to speak of at the Holland or Lincoln Tunnels. George Washington Bridge five minutes or less into the tolls, ten maybe from 80/95 Express with some slight congestion. Queens crossings also shaping up, but you've still got residual backups from earlier this evening in both directions on both levels of the 59th Street Bridge, particularly Manhattan-bound into the still heavy southbound FDR. Queens-Midtown Tunnel inbound still about fifteen to twenty, outbound no problems. A view of the 1010 WINS Panasonic Jam Cam shows the Williamsburg Bridge flowing again into Manhattan and the delays that stretched all the way back to Morgan-Meeker have now wound down, so that's good news. Wish I could say the same about the other lower East River crossings. Still trouble both ways of the Manhattan Bridge in both directions and the Brooklyn Bridge heavy inbound and outbound. No reported troubles between Staten Island and Brooklyn or at the Battery Tunnel. Alternate side parking will be back into effect for tomorrow.

11:11

Well, troubles still continue on the 59th Street Bridge, particularly on the upper deck inbound as we've still got some congestion on the FDR and near Second Avenue where the bridge lets out. Otherwise, let the traffic flow! Yes, you heard me right: I'm actually seeing movement on the southbound FDR from the Triboro all the way down to the Battery. And if you remember what it was like, oh, about six hours ago, you'll know what I'm talkin' about. Northbound, though, we've got intermittent slowdowns up from the 59th Street Bridge up to the Triboro which, by the way, is looking great to both Manhattan and to Queens. In Queens at the Midtown Tunnel inbound now down to anywhere between fifteen and twenty minutes, no problems outbound. Here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: in New Jersey, no real delays at both the Holland and Lincoln Tunnels. Up at the GW Bridge we've got five or ten into town and no problems leaving the city. Lower East River crossings, the Jam Cam showing things moving now at the Williamsburg Bridge and the BQE into the bridge, no problems to report. But still trouble both decks of the Manhattan Bridge in and out of the city. Brooklyn Bridge heavy, too, in and out. Back across the East River, we have no delays at the Verrazano or between Staten Island. Alternate side parking is back for tomorrow.

11:21
And a happy holiday to you. Well, troubles still continue on the 59th Street Bridge, particularly on the upper deck inbound as we've still got some congestion on the FDR and near Second Avenue where the bridge lets out. Otherwise the traffic appears to be flowing once again. We're really seeing things move on the southbound FDR, oh, from the Triboro, breezing all the way on down to the Battery. We've got some slowdowns northbound around the 59th Street Bridge area, but easing up to the Triboro. Earlier delays have significantly decreased at the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, I'm gonna say now down to about five to ten minutes. Now, here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: overall in New Jersey, we're looking swell with nothing to speak of at both the Holland and Lincoln. GW Bridge still moving nicely, nothing like this evening's rush, with, oh, maybe five to ten across the outbound span. Things easing at the Manhattan Bridge, but you're still gonna have to wait a few minutes in and out. Better to go with the Williamsburg if you can, where earlier delays have now vanished and the traffic is flowing freely in both directions. Brooklyn Bridge still heavy but we have no delays at the Verrazano or between Staten Island. Remember, alternate side parking is back for tomorrow.

11:31

We take you first to Westchester County and, uh, right now Highway 100 at 134 in Yorturn, uh, Yorktown. Accident involving a rolled over vehicle in through that area. Westbound side of 84 coming through Exit 4 in Middletown, an accident with injuries, that's still being cleared. And, uh, right now here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: we're still looking at slight delays on the East River crossings right now. The Manhattan Bridge right now still kind of slow coming across the span leaving the city. Uh, we've got the Brooklyn Bridge a little bit slow in both directions and the Williamsburg flowing now. Queens-Midtown Tunnel we've still got about, uh, five to ten minute delays into the city, back out to Queens looking just fine. FDR Drive in both directions finally easing out, not too much to talk about there except for a few knots northbound between, uh, 63rd Street and the Triboro. And looking at the Hudson River crossings Holland and Lincoln OK. George Washington Bridge on the Panasonic Jam Cam right now moving well in both directions across the span.

11:41

Long Island Railroad schedule in normal effect for today, right now still showing scattered, uh, fifteen to twenty minute delays in through, uh, Penn Station. Let's head, uh, over to Westchester County, with a bad accident in Yorktown, some serious injuries on Highway 134. You'll definitely want to avoid that. In and around town, much better on the 59th Street Bridge with traffic now moving in both directions inbound and outbound. And the FDR is also a much improved situation all the way from the Triboro down to the Battery. No problems to report on the West Side from the GW Bridge downtown. Over in Queens, the Midtown Tunnel is showing marked improvement from earlier with delays now knocked down, oh, to about five to ten into town and smooth sailing on the way out. Williamsburg and Manhattan both seemed to be moving relatively well. But there's still some backups on the Brooklyn Bridge headed to Brooklyn. Take the Manhattan if you're in a hurry. Over in Jersey, not too much to talk about, Lincoln and Holland breezing in both directions and minor delays at the GW Bridge. Alternate side of the street parking rules back in effect tomorrow.
11:51
Well, we're winding the end of a very long day here. Scanning the area on the Panasonic Jam Cam, things are really looking pretty good. The East River crossings are all finally in fine shape from the Triboro all the way down to the Battery Tunnel. The only slight snag might be outbound Brooklyn Bridge, but compared to what we saw earlier, it's minor, five minutes or so. Williamsburg, Manhattan and 59th Street Bridges all in fine shape. And so is the Queens-Midtown Tunnel, where I see no problems at all. Over on the Jersey side, it's looking just as good with no reported delays at either the Lincoln or Holland Tunnels. Even the George Washington Bridge is streaming well in both directions. Over in Westchester County, though, ambulances are on the scene with a bad collision on Highway 134 in Yorktown. Some serious injuries there. Alternate side of the street parking rules are back in effect.

12:01
We're over the hump and into the official holiday weekend. I want to wish everybody out there a safe and happy holiday, especially when traveling on the road this weekend. If you're trying to get out of town now, you're in for an easy time of it. No reported delays around the metropolitan area as I see it live on the Panasonic Jam Cam. Let's head over to the East River where we've got no reported delays running the length of the river from the Battery on up to the Triboro. FDR is moving nicely as well. No reported incidents on the West Side Highway which, if you recall, oh, say about six hours ago was simply not moving at all with delays up to three hours. Now it's deserted. And here's what you need to know about the bridges and tunnels: all the East River crossings moving well. No reported incidents at the Triboro, 59th Street Bridge, Queens-Midtown Tunnel. Looking down to the Williamsburg, Manhattan and Brooklyn Bridges, it's one big green light. And over in Jersey, it's never been better with traffic flowing smoothly across the Hudson at both the Lincoln and Holland Tunnels. Even the GW Bridge which has been choked for what seems like the last twenty-four hours is now flowing like water. Remember, alternate side of the street parking rules are in effect for tomorrow.
Sports
— 1 800 LAW CASH reminds you that this copyrighted broadcast is presented by authority of the New York Yankees and may not be reproduced or retransmitted in any form. And the accounts and descriptions in the game may not be disseminated without the express written consent of the New York Yankees. Have a lawsuit? Need money? 800 LAW CASH will get you money right now. Don't wait for your case to settle. You or your attorney should call 800 LAW CASH today. Well, the pitching match-ups are as follows: for the New York Yankees Sidney Ponson. It's his third start as a Yankee. He last pitched on the 11th of, uh, August, went three innings giving up five hits and three runs. His last start was on the 23rd of July in Toronto. He only went two and a third innings, giving up six runs. He's 0-1, 8.77 ERA. When I went down to do, uh, the postgame, I was in the back row coming up and Sidney was, uh, there pouring over scouting reports and just trying to take everything in. I don't think anybody can have any idea what they're going to see from Sidney Ponson. On the mound and now starting to take his, uh, warmup pitches in a minute will be 22 year-old John Lester, who is 6'4", about 200 pounds, and, uh, may be rushed a little bit to the big leagues. He's 6 and 2 with a 4.09 ERA, big strong lefty pitcher. Yankees generally have problems with pitchers they haven't seen before. John Lester throws a lot of pitches. He hasn't gone more than five innings and what they would like him to do is be more economical. He has very good stuff, um from, uh, from Washington State, he's got a fastball that can go in the mid-90s, with a great sink and tailing action, he's got a great curveball and, um, he's got a terrific, um, changeup. He's gonna be a very good pitcher at some point, whether it's now or not, you just don't know, they've been trying to be very careful with him. If you remember they brought up David Pauley in New York. He was in Double A instead of bringing up, um, John Lester. He was very good at the beginning and now has come down to earth a little bit and it's mostly because his pitch count is up. And, uh, he is 6 and 2, ERA now 4.09. He did throw a one-hitter against the Kansas City Royals and he is part of their future. Whether it is too early or not for John Lester, we will have to see. As we said, Bobby Abreu DH today, so he gets half an evening off and, uh, Bernie will be in right field, Sal Fasano behind the plate and Jason Giambi gets the evening off. For the Red Sox, very different lineup, Youkilis at third, Hinske goes to first base, Willy Mo Peña in right field, Coco Crisp stays in left, Doug Mirabelli behind the plate and Alex Cora is the shortstop. And you look at the Red Sox they have lost 8 of their last 12 games, they've lost 10 games in the month of August, which is the worst August they've had, um, in a while and, uh, they need to get going here. And as for the Yankees, what they would love to see out of Sidney Ponson is some innings. And I don't think that anybody knows and we're going to find out together. Well, Johnny Damon who just had an amazing afternoon steps up to the plate, gets boooed and stepping up to the microphone is the voice of the New York Yankees. Here is John Sterling.

— Why thank you Suzyn and once again, good evening everyone. Beautiful evening as we get set for baseball, game 2 of the day night double header. Johnny Damon was 3 for 6 with a homer, triple, single and four RBIs in the first game. So I guess the booing didn't affect him. And the pitch to Damon is a strike and we're underway.

— Tonight's game time temperature is 79 degrees and that's sponsored by Sheds USA at Home Depot, call 1 800 79DEPOT.

— Damon swings and misses at a fastball. Johnny's at .291, 19 homers, 63 RBIs. Well, the Yankees had a great Game 1. Just about everyone had two hits or more. Damon had 3, Jeter had 3, Abreu had 4 hits and now it's on to Game 2. And the young lefthander deals fouled-back. We'll give you numbers on Lester. He is 6 and 2, an ERA 4.09, 13 games in starts, 73 innings, 77 hits so just a few more hits than innings pitched. He's walked 36, about 4 1/2 for 9. The Yankees will try to be patient. He has struck out 54 and deals 0-2 foul, third base side out of play Opposing hitters hitting at .283 off Lester, he's given up 6 home runs. As Suzyn's said, a very different configured Boston defense with Youkilis at third, Lowell gets the night off, Cora at short, Gonzalez is not starting. Here is the 0-2 a breaking ball, low. Loretta is at second base and over at first base is Eric Hinske, who played right in the first game. The outfield Manny Ramírez who's at Little League depth in the line for Damon. Coco Crisp, a couple of steps over in left center, in center, and Willy Mo Peña in right and Doug Mirabelli catches Lester. Here's the 1-2 to Damon. It's popped foul third base side out of play and Damon broke his bat so he'll go off and get a new club. Yankees cannot obviously rest on their laurels, but as Suzyn said, a a a and so true, how do you know what you're gonna get out of Sidney Ponson? If the Yankees got five innings out of him, they would be deliriously happy. They'll fill in after that, if they're in the game after five. It'll be a 1-2 to Damon and pitch is foul third base out of play. Damon is wearing out Lester. Good start for the Yanks. You know Suzyn, it isn't like Ponson hasn't done anything, he's been a big winner in the American League, but he hasn't pitched any innings for the Yankees.

— I think that's exactly the point, it doesn't matter, you know, how great you're stuff is, you can have two great innings. He hasn't pitched more than a couple of innings, except for that first game where he pitched six. That's a long time ago.

— It was a long time ago, or is a long time ago. It'll be a 1-2 to Damon. The left-hander deals a slow breaking ball low, and the count 2 and 2.

— This is what Damon does so well, I mean it's just, seeing everything and all the first or f... first three guys in this lineup do that. Damon and Abreu really are taking pitches against everybody.

— Now the 2-2, lined hard and foul down the right field line. Damon gave the Yanks such a lift. First of all, he tripled to the, uh, the alleyway, in the 420 mark off deep center field, deep right center center and then scored on Jeter's single and then when the game is tied, he hit a two-run home run to give the Yankees a 3-1 lead, where they were headed. The 2-2 swung on and chopped up the middle, it's gonna be a base hit, fielded at deep short by Cora but he had no throw so Damon gets another base hit, a ground ball up the middle past Lester. Once it went past Lester it was a base hit. So Damon is now the double header 4 for 7 with a homer and 4 RBIs.

— And that was a ten-pitch at bat. What an at bat, John, and you know, we've said it all the time, that a lead-off hitter is supposed to take pitches so that everyone else that follows can see what the pitcher is throwing. And what a job Damon did. Ten pitches.

— Here's Derek Jeter. He's a .341, 10 homers, 72 RBIs. Derek was 3 for 6 with an RBI in Game 1. Damon a threat to go, he has stolen 22 out of 29. He has to pick up Lester's moves, which he's never seen. Jeter bluffs bunt and takes low and the count 1 and 0. Now Larry Bowa goes through all the signs. Yankees could very well play hit and run on this pitch. They've got a guy who handles the bat and they've got a guy who can really run at first base. And if Lester throws a pitch way off the plate, Damon can steal it. The pitch outside, 2 and 0. They obviously weren't playing in front. Heh heh. So the count's 2 and 0 on Jeter, who again looks down at his third base coach.

- He took three steps down there. These must be very complicated sides today.

- Hinske playing first holding Damon on. And the 2-0. There's a strike. Jeter taking all the way. Abreu's the on deck hitter. Now Giambi does not play in the second game. He'll be there to come on in a big moment if it's close in the seventh, eighth or ninth. So the Yanks played Bernie in right and giving Abreu the half night off, outfield DH. It'll be a 2-1 and the pitch is low and the count is 3 and 1. I don't think Damon figured out... left his move, cuz he was moving back. However Jeter's ahead on the count 3 and 1. Lester walks, as I mentioned, 4 1/2 per 9 so the Yankees would not mind a walk and then have two on and 0 and 0 That'll be a 3 and 1 to Jeter the pitch is a strike. Jeter threw the bat away. How do ya like that? It was a fastball in the middle of the plate, I guess Jeter thought it was low. That's embarrassing, Jeter threw the bat away. Hopefully he didn't hit Jim Wolf, the home plate umpire... Was it low?

- Yeah.

- Yeah. No wonder he threw the... we just saw a replay, heh it was about shin-high. No wonder he was... anyway the count 3 and 2. Damon will be going 3 and 2 Now the stretch by the left-hander and here's the payoff pitch, it's thrown to first and he just got back. So one thing, he hasn't figured out Lester's move and, you know they call it the lefty balk move and Damon just got back.

- He just got back and now he's talking to Tony Peña about what he saw, the lefty balk move. You know who did that better than anybody was Stennett. Great move and he just...

- Oh...

- Oh my goodness. He just he just got back.

- Now the 3-2. He struck him out swinging. The throw to second. He's out by a mile. Damon got a terrible jump. So John Lester's pickoff move really stopped Damon and it was a strike-'em-out throw-'em-out double play. Two away and here's Abreu.

- And he really does have that kind of move that's... that a Petit has and he's so tall that tha... tha... and so big and so many arms and legs and parts going that it looked like Damon really had no idea when he was gonna release the ball and he got a bad jump and as John said that's absolutely right.

- Here's Bobby Abreu with two outs. Bobby as a Yankee is 26 for 66, a homer and 6 RBIs. By the way that as an average that's .394, but we'll give it when he gets 100 at bats. And in the... pitch is a strike, in the first game, he was 4 for 5 with a walk, up six times, on-base five times. Look at his on-base percentage, Suzyn, it's .481 with the Yanks. It was .427 with the Phils. Now the 0-1, fouled straight back, now the count 0-2.

- I I thought it was interesting, John, during the pre-game when Bobby was telling me that one of the ways you learn about a pitcher you haven't seen before -- and it's hard to do if you're throwing strike after strike -- but you try and keep fouling pitches back, fouling pitches back, fouling them off so he has to expand his repertoire. He won't throw you the same pitch usually, so he finds what people throw by being able to go deep in counts and being able to foul pitches off.

- It'll be an 0-2 to Abreu. The pitch is popped foul, out of play. We are coming your way live from the Lowes broadcast booth, let's build something together. Uh, that was a big play the, um, the near pick off really stopped Damon from getting a lead and you know what? If you don't get a jump, you shouldn't run at all. Of course he didn't know
Jeter was gonna strike out... the 0-2, breaking ball, low, the count 1 and 2... and neither did Jeter. Jeter thought he could have walked on the 3-1 pitch. Who knows how that call would've changed the inning because if he calls it ball four they'd have two on, no one out.
Whaddya gonna do?
— What are you gonna do?
— Here's the 1-2. Swung on and lined toward center. Crisp is there to make the catch. Abreu hit it right on the nose. Yankees no runs, one hit, no one left. And at the end of a half inning, Yankees nothing, Boston coming to bat on the New York Yankees Radio Network.
You've got a lot of choices when it comes to gasoline and usually you base your decision on two factors: location and price. Maybe that's why so many people choose CITGO. Over ten million people stop into one of the more than 13,000 CITGO locations every day to fill up. They come to rely on CITGO for a good deal on good fuel and everything else they need to keep moving. Find out what so many of your neighbors already know. Ten million CITGO customers can't be wrong.
Captial Enterprises.
Charlie, it's Phil.
How did you know...
Your wife said you were at the office. On a Saturday? What are you doing?
I'm making copies of all my personal documents for my tax returns.
You're making copies on the company's digital copier?
I own the company, Phil.
Yeah, Charlie. But all your personal tax stuff. It's in your digital copier's memory. Your employees on the network? It's possible they can access those documents.
You're kidding. My CFO is using the digital copier for our corporate tax information.
I don't think your confidential documents are very confidential, Charlie.
So, what do I do now?
Be Sharp, Charlie, be Sharp.
Any time you send confidential documents to your digital copier via the network, it's possible that anyone can access them. Don't let this happen to you. Contact Central Business Solutions, New York's premiere source for reliable Sharp digital copiers and local service and support. Call Central Business Solutions today. Dial 646 223 1044. Keep your documents secure. Call Central Business Solutions.
— Now to the bottom of the first. Don't miss HBO's Boxing After Dark when Paul Williams takes on Sharmba Mitchell in a welterweight fight.
See it live Saturday, August 19th at 10 pm Eastern and Pacific, only on HBO. Now let's see what Sidney Ponson can do. The Yankees are a-hopin' and a-prayin' that Sidney can give 'em five innings. We'll give you his numbers as we go. Right-hander deals to Kevin Youkilis and the pitch low. You have to throw strikes to Youkilis. He has a great batting eye and takes pitches. He's hitting at .293, 13 homers, 61 RBIs, a right-hand hitter and there's a strike. Ponson has a good fastball, gotta get the curveball over and I guess that's biggest thing... And there's the 2-1 there's a strike ...although it didn't affect Wang, you really basically you have to get Youkilis and Loretta, because you have people on, it's tough to pitch to Big Papi and Manny Ramírez... it's tough to pitch to them anyway. There is the 1-2 and it's fouled off the first base side. Coco Crisp was the lead off hitter in the first game. They stopped him. Loretta had three doubles, but I guess the key to the game, Suzyn, was they got Big Papi out every time.
Well and this will be a test because when Big Papi comes up we'll tell you his numbers against, uh, Ponson and they're pretty scary.

Pitch. And it's a breaking ball, low. I guess that's scary for the Yankees.

Or anybody that's listening that, uh...

... is rooting for the Yankees.

Yeah.

Also you have to feel sorry for Ponson. He has not pitched a lot of innings as a Yank. The 2-2, lined right to A-Rod. One away. Whoa. A noisy out, a bullet right at A-Rod. Here are the Ponson numbers, now these are just the Yankee numbers rather than give you the Cardinal's numbers, and there's one good reason for it. It's been so long since he's pitched for the Cards, they don't mean anything. Most managers, coaches, they look at what's happened recently. Anyway, Ponson as a Yank 0 and 1 with an ERA of 8.78, 4 games, 2 starts, 13 innings, 17 hits, 6 walks, and 11 K's. The pitch to Loretta is a fastball, strike on the inside. Loretta .306, 4 homers, 46 RBIs, a left-hand hitter, 3 for 5 in the first game, he had three doubles. Boston was double crazy in the first game. Hinske had three doubles, Loretta had three doubles. The 0-1 the pitch low and the count 1 and 1.

You know when they made the trade for Loretta for Doug Mirabelli, I think everybody thought he was gonna be good and a good steady player. I didn't think, uh, I don't think that they thought he was gonna hit over .300 all of the season and play this kind of defense.

The pitch missed the outside corner and the count 2 and 1.

He's got great bat control and hasn't had... he doesn't have the greatest range in the world but if he gets to the ball he will make the play.

Yeah, he made a terrific double play in the first game. Here is the 2-1 to Loretta. It's popped foul down the left field line, out of play. Now the count 2 and 2.

And so far Ponson is, is getting that fastball over. It came inside there to Loretta there and turned on it just a little bit quick, so he doesn't look like he's afraid to throw inside so he must think his stuff is pretty good, John.

Well, you gotta trust your stuff. You're facing tough hitters in a small ballpark. The 2-2 fastball high and the count 3 and 2.

Now after the first game the Red Sox activated Keith Foulke from the DL and designated for assignment the starting pitcher Jason Johnson.

Now here's the payoff. A half swing. Did he go? He did. He struck out on a pitch that was away, off the plate. So Loretta, who does have good back control, chased the pitch low and away. Well, there are two outs and here is David Ortiz.

And here are the scary numbers. Big Papi off of Sidney Ponson 15 for 34, that's .444, 2 homers and 8 RBIs.

Of course Ortiz, you know, puts up numbers like that against, not a lot of people, but some. A left-hand hitter with great power and takes a breaking strike, the count 0 and 1. On the year, Ortiz at .283, 42 homers, 113 RBIs and he was 0 for 4 in the first game.

By the way, the next hitter hits 'em pretty well too.

The 0-1. A high fly to deep center! Damon back in the deepest part of center at the wall. It is off the wall. Ortiz goes to second with the double. That's in the alleyway, the triangle at the 420 mark. Hit it over Damon's head off the wall, backed up by Bernie and they held Ortiz to a double.

And that was a fine play by Bernie Williams who was in right center and came all the way across in front of Damon, saw immediately that the ball was gonna go off of the wall in in the triangle and it was gonna go over Damon's head and Bernie was right there. That is a fine defensive play.

— And we don't have to guess on how far the ball went because he hit it right near the 420 foot sign and if any other area of the ballpark - - if he pulls it or hits it a little bit towards left, it's a home run -- so the Yankees got lucky. Here's Manny Ramírez. Now here's Manny Ramírez's numbers against the Yankees this year: he's 18 for 36 with 6 homers and 15 RBIs. Now that is fabulous.

— It is. Wanna hear his numbers against Ponson?

— Yes.

— 17 for 45, that's .378, one homer, 10 RBIs. Only one homer, but 10 RBIs.

— Ponson deals. Ramírez takes a strike, fastball on the inside corner, the count 0 and 1. You know, I don't know if Big Papi got all that, but he extended the arms and had that great swing. Does he... is he powerful? Does he have strength? The pitch is fouled away. Now it sounds like he got all of it, it went 420 feet but he couldn't pull it. He just... he extended the arms into it and hit it dead center and he hit it 420 off the wall...

— Hmmm.

— ...and got just a double. Ramírez was walked intentionally twice because they got Ortiz out after Loretta's doubles, then Manny hit a home run down the right field line. Ponson ahead of Ramírez 0-2. The pitch is swung on and lined. Here's a base hit to right field. Ortiz rounds third, he'll score. It's a base hit and an RBI for Ramírez and the Red Sox take a 1-0 lead.

— Well, numbers don't always tell you what's going to happen but, uh, they've got Manny and Ortiz have had great numbers their whole career off of Sidney Ponson. Ponson has been around a long time. And that was a curveball that stayed up and John had talked about getting the curveball over and not hanging it and that's what he did that time. You know, it's not that hard, as John said, if you're gonna hang that... when you, when he needs... not to hang that curveball and he did and a hitter like Manny's gonna hit it.

— Now here's Eric Hinske, a left-hand hitter and there's a strike. Hinske had a great first game as a member of the Red Sox. He had not one, not two, but three doubles. 3 for 4 on the day. On the year he's hit .274, 12 homers, 29 RBIs. Now Ponson deals outside. And the count 1 and 1.

— Three hits and four standing ovations. That's not bad for a debut.

— What a debut.

— Ohhh.

— The Boston grabs their first lead of the day. They never led in the day game and they have a one nothing lead. The 1-1 is low. They're so good, Ortiz and Ramírez, that you're not even surprised.

— You know, when do you get to the point where you've got two outs and nobody on that you don't pitch to David Ortiz, when you've got numbers like this? Does it ever happen?

— But I don't know, but after the double maybe you walk Ramirez. The 2-1. Hit on the ground and grabbed by Ponson he knocked it down threw to first in time for the out, and it ends the inning. One run, two hits and one left. And at the end of one inning of play it is one nothing Boston on the Yankees Radio Network presented by AIG, the strength to be there, AIG.

Alright. I've got some great news from Foxwoods and it's real simple: play slots, get cash. I told you it was simple. Play slots, get cash. That's it. Four little words with big value. You can now redeem up to half the wampum rewards points you earn playing your favorite slot machines at Foxwoods for cash. You play slots, you get cash rewards. Life should be so simple. And if that’s not reason enough to go to Foxwoods, from now until September 7th, it’s our two and a half million dollar summer blast. We're giving away gas cards, gift cards, wampum rewards points and two million dollars in cash. It's the biggest giveaway in Foxwoods history. For more details you can go to foxwoods.com and yes, you do have to be 21 to participate. But for now, just remember four words: Play slots, get cash. Goodbye! Alright, six words. Meet me at Foxwoods. Foxwoods.

This week Pathmark and Marcal are teaming up to bring you savings on Maxi six roll paper towels below half price, just 3.99 for a twelve-pack bath tissue just 4.99 with your Advantage Club card.

AIG. For 85 years families have relied on AIG companies to secure for their futures. For insurance, for loans, retirement. AIG. The strength to be there.

WCBS and your Mercedes-Benz Tri-State dealers want to put a Palm Treo Smartphone in your pocket and send you to Tampa next March. Listen for the Mercedes-Benz Tri-State dealers Yankee trivia question during the game. Give us your answer at WCBS880.com and see the new 7 passenger Mercedes-Benz GL 450.

I’m meteorologist Craig Allen. Be sure to start your day with my weather forecast every ten minutes weekday mornings right here on WCBS Newsradio 880.

— Now here's A-Rod to lead off the second inning. And Lester deals low. A-Rod at .285, 26 homers, 88 RBIs. He was 2 for 5 with 2 RBIs in Game One. I mean, the first six hitters for the Yankees had no less than two hits a man. Jeter and Damon had three and Abreu had four. The pitch a strike. Now don't, um, think Ponson pitched badly. That’s a normal state of affairs for the Yanks, to give up a double to Ortiz and a single to Ramírez. Ponson hadn't pitched against Ramírez this year and he’s hitting .500 against the Yankees. The pitch is low and the count 2 and 1.

— You know, I know you don’t like to walk hitters in this ballpark, but when two hitters who do all the damage and you’ve got two outs, I, I don’t know. It is the first inning, I do understand.

— And here's the 2-1. Fouled back by Alex. Well, the count 2 and 2.

— Lester has, uh, been throwing that fastball about 93 to 95, has a curve that he'll use. That's good stuff, he just needs to put it together, another pitcher who has rushed cause of necessity.

— Now A-Rod backs up. Boston in -- I don't know when it is, a week? -- they're gonna get Tim Wakefield back. Now if he's healthy, that would obviously really help. The pitch, high and tight and the count 3 and 2.

— Well it would because now they've said they've, uh, designated their fifth starter for assignment so there's nobody there in that spot. I think the 27th is when Tim said that he's eligible to be activated.

— Now A-Rod runs the count to 3 and 2 and the Yankees are at least running up Lester's pitch count early. And there's the payoff. Inside. Ball four.

— And that is the problem with, uh, Lester so far. I talked to the Red Sox, that's exactly what it is that he has... that he is already, as John said, now he's up to 27 pitches here in the second inning and there's nobody out no matter how great he pitches you're not gonna let a 22-year-old go more than, uh, 90, 100 pitches at the most.

— Well, the Yankees have a runner on and here is Robbie Cano who is 2 for 5 with a couple of RBIs in the first game, hitting at .327, 7 homers, 36 RBIs. Youkilis is in at third and the pitch to Cano is in at a strike. Manny is playing in at Little League depth in left field. It would be very tough for Cano to hit a line drive hit. He might hit a single between third and short, he could hit a line drive down the left field line, Ramirez obviously playing off the line, but but he can almost catch any line drive hit there, he's so shallow. Now the 0-1 hit foul third base side, out of play and the count 0 and 2.

— Aw, Manny's got that one down to a science. He knows how far... with the wall in back in back it's such a safety net, it really is.
— Right. I I think this, Suzyn, he he probably believes and the Red Sox believe that more hits will be in front of him than will go over his head.
— Um hum.
— If it's really over his head it hits the wall anyway. There'll be an 0-2 to Cano. And that pitch low and gets away from Mirabelli and on to second goes Alex. So there's a runner in scoring position, the tying run. It was a wild pitch...
— ... and bounced in the dirt. Mirabelli couldn't get his glove on it and it went all the way back to the wall.
— Now if, um, Cano's able to pull the ball, he could get Alex over to third. So a walk and wild pitch. And that's the tying run with no one out. The left-hander Lester deals, swung on, base hit down third on the left field line, going to the left field corner. A-Rod scores easily, Cano goes to second with a double. So Cano lined one between Youkilis and the bag, a bullet line drive down the left field line. It's a RBI double for Cano and the Yankees have tied the game at one.
— And that was a fastball that was up on the outside part of the plate and Cano does what he just does so well, it's getting to be a broken record with us, and Cano, when he's late on a fastball, he's still got enough strength and enough bat control to get it into the left field corner and that's exactly what he did.
— The pitch was there, he went with it and bang! He lined a double down the line. Now here's Craig Wilson with the lead run now at second and no one out. Cano's 37th RBI. He's just a plain old good hitter.
— 23rd double.
— And here's another thing, Suzyn. Why would they bat him fifth if they didn't think he was a terrific hitter? They're batting him fifth tonight against a lefty. The pitch, a breaking ball low. Robbie Cano is a very unusual, young, left-hand hitter. He hangs in against lefties. It's his second year in the big leagues and they batted him fifth. Boy, that oughta tell you something. Wilson is 14 for 51 as a Yank, two homers, five RBIs. Now the 1-0. Now time is called...
— Whoa!
— ...and Lester threw the ball to the screen. Heh heh heh heh.
— Well...
— Well maybe when he found time was called he didn't wanna hurt him so he just threw it.
— I think that's exactly right. You don't want to stop your motion cause pitchers can get hurt like that and he saw it, home plate umpire Jim Wolf move away from the plate and he just let it go anyway. You don't want to stop your motion. You never know what you're gonna pull to try and stop something.
— It'll be a 1-0 to Wilson. The pitch a breaking ball low, and the count 2 and 0. And there's no question they're gonna be very patient with John Lester. I don't mean the Red Sox, the Yankees. They are letting him throw a lot of pitches.
— And he is.
And that... and he is... and that's not an accident. There is the 2-0. It's low outside and the count 3 and 0. Bernie Williams is on deck. The rest of the hitters are all right-handed. Wilson, of course, is right-handed, Bernie is switch hitter, Fasano a right-hand hitter, and Cabrera a switch hitter. We're tied at one, top of the second. It'll be a 3-0 to Wilson and the pitch is low inside, ball four. So Wilson walks the second walk of the inning, the second walk given up by Lester. Two on, no one out, here's Bernie.

And I've got a question for you, you can think about it. I'm trying to think -- and I can't -- I'm trying to think of a left-hand pitcher who gives Robbie Cano trouble. I'm not saying that he gets a hit off him all the time...

Right.

But you know what I mean? Like when O'Neill would face Randy.

Right. We'll there's no Randy...

Alright when uh, uh, Wade Boggs used to get fits given to him by John Candelaria. I mean, there's nobody like that.

No. Candelaria had that...

...swervy thing.

Yeah that, that, uh, uh, that sidearm. He threw hard. He was really nasty to lefties, obviously Randy was. No... The pitch to Bernie and he bluffs bunt and takes one, 1 and 0. But Cano really hangs in and he has an ability, which lefties have to have, of going to left and left center against lefties. If the pitch was going away from he is terrific.

Yeah, it really is. I'm racking my brains.

I can't think of that kind of lefty.

I'm all...

I don't know one.

I don't either. And I'm also trying to think of some lefties like Randy and John Candelaria that are in the league.

None.

They're gone too.

Yeah. Doug Mirabelli's now talking to his pitcher.

Now he, he can't be going anywhere for a while either cause you think the Yankees bullpen is shot? You should take a look at what's in there. I don't know where they go either. They don't know where they go. Francona, by the way, apologized to having to... having to keep Rudy Seanez in there, but he had just took one for the team.

It'll be a 1-0 to Bernie. And that pitch is low. So the Yankees are letting Lester get in a lot of trouble. Mirabelli walks the ball out and talks to him. And now Davey Wallace comes out.

They also wonder, now this is a prime prospect, just 22 years old, being rushed because so many people in the rotation got hurt and they needed him here and they didn't want to have to bring him up and as long as he's here, you know, he had, he had one hitter... uh, eight innings of, of, one hit ball and it ended by Pat Labon against Kansas City but a different kind of team. Kansas City doesn't take pitches, they're not as patient as the Yankees. This is tough for any youngster.

A walk wild pitch double by Cano scored the run. Wilson walked. The Yanks have two on and no one out and the 2-0 count to Bernie. Now Bernie oughta look for a pitch he can drive off the wall or into the Monster seats because you figure desperately Lester's gonna try to throw a strike. Now it'll be a 2-0 to Bernie. Caught on a miss. He was ready. And Lester threw a very good fastball, low and in. Bernie's at .280, 8 homers, 46 RBIs. It'll be a 2-1, pitched low and the count 3 and 1. So one more bad one, they'll be loaded up. Right-handed hitting Sal Fasano is on deck. Now Bernie, of course, is on his own and boy, is Manny Ramírez shallow in left.

— Hmmmm.

— I wonder if they will be able to take advantage of that. Runners lead first and second and now time is called for a moment. Cano's at second, Wilson's at first, there's no one out. Yankees have a run in, they've tied the game. It'll be a 3-1 to Bernie. The pitch is inside ball four, they'll load it up.

— Well, and still nobody out here and you just wonder how long they're gonna go here and the Yankees won't change their philosophy keep taking pitches, keep taking pitches.

— Now you know Fasano's a backup catcher and not a great hitter, no question about it, but he's strong and, you know, the saying in the dugout is you know if he can run into one, and if he runs into one, he'll hit a grand slam. He has good power. Fasano 3 for 20 as a Yank, no homers, 2 RBIs. And the pitch a breaking ball, strike. Yankees have an opportunity to take a lead, they have the bases loaded, no one out. Even the ground ball double play in the infield would give them the lead. Of course the Yankees would want a lot more than that. The 0-1 swung on and grounded to third. Youkilis comes home, there's one and that's all they get. So Fasano grounded to third, Youkilis made the right play and you know, Suzyn, I honestly thought it was gonna be a double play because when Mirabelli caught the ball, Fasano was only half way to first. I think Bernie, I think whoever slid in from third, Cano, got in the way of Mirabelli.

— Well, I think that's true. No, he he dropped the ball. He couldn't get the ball out of his glove and he went to transfer and I thought that too and I looked down we're looking at the replay now and Youkilis throws to Mirabelli and when he went to transfer the ball to his right hand, he dropped it.

— That's what happened. He didn't have an angle either, but he had Fasano. Fasano was only half way down the line. So bases loaded, one out, here's Melky Cabrera and the breaking ball is low. They threw a breaking ball for a strike and then Fasano hit the ground ball. They came back to the breaking ball, but he missed. Melky's at .288, 7 homers and 38 RBIs. The ball game's tied at one, we're in the top of the second, but the Yanks are threatening with bases loaded, one out. Now the left-handed Lester deals a strike on the outside corner, the count one and one.

— And I don't wanna state the obvious but I will. It would be terrible to waste this situation with a a young rookie on the ropes and if they let him off it.

— Bases are jammed. The 1-1. Caught him on a miss, flew by, good fastball, up, and the count 1 and 2. Wilson's at third, Bernie Williams at second and Fasano's at first and it'll be a 1-2 to Cabrera. And the left-hander's set the pitch, swung on and lined to left field, there's a base hit. Only one run will score. A line drive base hit, a RBI single for Cabrera and the Yankees take a 2-1 lead. Manny Ramírez plays so shallow that he had the ball on one hop before Bernie Williams got to third, so how's he gonna score? He he could've run the ball in. So anyway, but a, a big hit for Melky gives the Yankees the lead.

— And what was so good I think about that hit was that he... Lester really had him fooled. He looked like he was not gonna be able to hit that high fastball at all and Lester made the mistake and had the ball down low and Melky plonked it. That's a really... he really is learning day by day, isn't he, John?

— Yes, he's a very good hitter. The pitch to Damon is a breaking ball low. And you know, you, ya... as I said before, I don't know if a line drive could get in Manny's... that was a low line drive that hit way in front of Manny, that's the only reason the ball landed. If it was a longer line drive, he would have caught it. Damon singled to deep short his first time, right in back of the second base bag. Two runs are in, bases loaded, one out and the left-hander deals, inside and the count 2 and 0. One thing I will tell you about Lester -- I, I made the point about five times during the pre-game -- the Yankees would love Ponson to go five but, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah. Lester is about ready to throw his 49th pitch so I don't know even if he straightens out if he can go five innings. There's the 2-0, swung on and lined toward center field, Crisp on the run dives, can't make the catch, it rolls behind him. Bernie Williams scores, Fasano goes to third and they hold him up. So a single by Damon, Crisp dove, I think he might've had the wind knocked out of him, he's slow getting up, the ball went off his glove. Fasano had to hold up, he couldn't run because after all, Crisp did get his glove on it, he almost made the catch. So the Yankees going station-to-station. It's a base hit and an RBI for Damon and the Yankees take a 3-1 lead and they just want to make sure that Crisp is OK. I think he got wind knocked out of him for a moment.

-- Yeah, I think he do too. Well he hit it... oh, yeah, when he, he dove for that ball he hit his head, his chest and then his head almost bounced on that grass. He got hit, really bounced, and he lay there for a couple of minutes. Terry Francona half way out with the Boston trainer and, uh, Wily Mo Peña went over to see if Coco was OK. He just lay there but I think it's cause... John, you're right, he had the wind knocked out of him, hit his head on the grass.

-- In the double header, Damon is now 5 for 8 with a homer and five RBIs. And you know what? They're only in the second inning of the second game. Here's Derek Jeter with the bases loaded and one out. Fasano's at third, Cabrera's at second, Damon at first. And the pitch to Jeter cut on a miss on a high fastball, the count 0 and 1. Well, Lester has reached 50 pitches in two innings, and of course it's not two innings, it's only an inning and a third. Now the pitch, fouled off by Jeter and he's behind on the count 0 and 2.

-- Trying to think who's out there. Someone in the Red Sox pen is doing a little stretching. I wonder if it's Kyle Snyder, who could have blanked... if they decide...

-- Yeah, Snyder could come in but he went two innings in the first game. It'll be an 0-2 to Jeter. Jeter wanted to make sure that everyone's OK in the stands where the foul ball went. It hit someone, just to the right of the screen in other words, the ball didn't hit the screen. It went just... we're, we're over it, you have to stand up to see it... now Jeter's back. Bases loaded with one out, three in. It'll be a 1-2 to Jeter and the left-hander deals, swung on and fouled back, so the count holds one and two.

-- Tavares, I guess, could come in.
-- Yeah. He didn't pitch.
-- Right. Tavares, Timlin...
-- I would say the the likely guy would be Tavares. Seanez pitched and Snyder pitched well, Keith Foulke, but they would keep him for later in the game. It'll be a 1-2 to Jeter. And the fastball is high outside 2 and 2.

-- The first game was so long it seems like yesterday, doesn't it?
-- It was yesterday, was... wasn't it? No, it was early...
-- Ha ha ha.
-- They had the count wrong before. On the board they have 1 and 2. I thought that it was 1 and 2 but I saw the bulb lit up... What do I know? Let's call it one and two.
— Ha ha ha.
— The pitch to Derek is high, the count 2 and 2. You know they always tell you in those multiple choice tests in school to trust your first choice? Ah, I should trust my choice. I knew that he had thrown a ball before. Anyway, now it's 2 and 2 to Jeter, Fasano at third, Cabrera at second, Damon at first. Three runs are in, Yanks have a 3-1 lead with one out. It'll be a 2-2 to Derek. The pitch is swung on and fouled away. Off-speed pitch and Jeter double clutched and made contact and fouled it away. I don't know what the number is, Suzyn, I did see it, Jeter's hitting unbelievably against Boston this year, somewhere around .400 not hitting badly against the rest of the league. Now Lester to the plate, cut on a miss, struck him out swinging on a high fastball, two away.
— They had that fastball clocked at 91, but he put it in such a great place.
— Now two away and here's Bobby Abreu. Abreu socked it right on the nose his first time, but caught in center field by Crisp. Abreu hits lefties. He has no problem whether the guy throws lefty or righty. Bases loaded two out. Gee, uh, Suzyn, wh... what a lucky thing that Brian Cashman could make the trade.
— Ohhhh.
— You've never seen a ballplayer fit better into a team.
— You know I, I told Bobby after we were doing, uh, pre-game show and he was talking about how comfortable he felt and how everyone made him feel comfortable...
— The pitch. It's high and, uh, tight. It was a breaking ball. Abreu got out of the way.
— ...and, and you make your own comfort in a locker room if you come in and you, you're... you're the right personality. You know who was the last person I think walked into a clubhouse and immediately became part of the team? David Justice was the last one who really just walked in and became part of it instantly.
— The person who had been hit by the foul ball returned to their seat and that was the ovation. It'll be a 1-0 to Abreu. Lined like a bullet, base hit. Over first down the right field line, rolling to the right field corner. Fasano scores, Cabrera scores, Damon goes to third. Holding at second with a double is Abreu. Can you say more about Abreu? Bobby Abreu drills a two-run double down the right field line and the Yankees take a 5-1 lead. I mean, he is too good to be true.
— Eh, it's, it's amazing and you know what, John? There are now pitchers in... and the Red Sox are now starting their bullpen. And these are now pitchers that he hasn't, that he hasn't seen. He takes pitchers, he finds out very early as he, as he's doing it what they're throwing.
— Here's A-Rod. He began this with a walk, scored a run, and now has second and third with two out. The Yankees have scored five runs and have a 5-1 lead. The pitch to A-Rod is high. Abreu in the double header is now 5 for 7 with a walk. He is something. I mean, he is... as Julian Tavares up in the bullpen, so we we narrowed that down...
— Mmm, mmm.
— ...process of elimination. Lester holds and sets and deals, high and the count 2 and 0. A left-hand hitter Robbie Cano is on deck, but we've been down that path before. Cano in this inning had an RBI double.
— Let's see who he's pitched against...
— Damon off third, Abreu off second. Pitch, caught on and missed to and count of 2 and 1.
— ...well Lester won his last time out against Baltimore, went five innings. His problem anyway, even when he pitches we well, he goes five innings or six innings every time out.

— Well tonight, in two innings, not complete yet, he has thrown 61 pitches. Wow! A-Rod swings, it is a high pop to second. Loretta in the outfield grass makes the catch but the Yankees get five runs and at the end of two innings of play, the Yanks have a 5-1 lead on the Yanks Radio Network.

Some people really thrive under pressure. The tougher it is, the better they perform. So would they appreciate the convenience of Acela Express and its frequent departures, with the relaxing, spacious seating? Or the extra time to get work done, because they aren’t waiting in line? Of course they’d appreciate Acela Express. But if these people still crave pressure, they can always pretend they’re stuck in traffic. Call 1 800 USA RAIL or visit amtrak.com to book today. Fares, routes and schedules due to change without notice.

Chock Full O’ Nuts. Is that heavenly coffee? Is that heavenly coffee? Chock Full O' Nuts, is that heavenly coffee? Nothing revs you up like Chock Full O’ Nuts distinctively bold taste, made from rich roasted coffee beans blended to perfection. Better coffee money can’t buy.

— And we're going to, uh, the bottom of the second inning. Sidney Ponson now with a 5 to 1 lead so let's see what he can do with Wily Mo Peña, Coco Crisp and Doug Mirabelli. And, uh, while we're doing that I want to talk again about, uh, Jimmy Fund Day here, uh, at Fenway Park and I know that a lot of the Yankees have, uh, been taping messages and, uh, telephone and radiothon that’s gone on all day and the Red Sox have brought so many of the youngsters from the Dana-Farber Cancer Center here. And the Yankees have helped Mr. Steinbrenner who always calls in and pledges something. And if you want to help this wonderful cause 877 738 1234 or go online at www.jimmyfund.org and take a look at what they’ve done. And the Red Sox before the game had nine little children from the Dana-Farber Cancer Center out with the players for the National Anthem and it was sung by, uh, a cancer patient, a six-year old, uh, the National Anthem. Eh, it’s just been an extraordinary day here. They’re in, at a million and a half dollars and both the Yankees and the Red Sox are a part of this. Wily Mo Peña steps in against Sidney Ponson and fouls the first pitch back. 0 and 1 to Wily Mo Peña. Peña has been batting .312, he’s got 9 homers and 34 RBIs. If you remember, Wily Mo came over in the Bronson-Aroyo trade and wouldn’t Theo Epstein love to have Aroyo back right now. The 0-1 pitch to Wily Mo is popped up on the right side. Cano and Wilson going over. Who can get it? Cano? Did he get it? Yes he did.

— Well, what a catch!
— My goodness.
— What a catch! He got to the level of the seats and just snaked his glove in there and some... somehow made the catch. Suzyn, that’s a heck of a catch. Let’s watch it.
— It’s a tremendous catch and, uh, hee hee hee, he just snapped his wrist out...
— Oh.
— ...and got the ball away from the fans who were starting to come over the fence. What a great play! He saw a gentleman in... in a... in a green t-shirt start to go for it and he snapped that wrist and got the ball.
— So Peña pops out and here’s Coco Crisp who takes a pitch low. Yanks have a 5-1 lead in the second. Ponson deals to Crisp and that’s looped to center field. There’s a base hit. So Crisp with a one out single. We can't, uh, I have thought about this but you can't talk about it for a couple of more innings, but if, if Ponson can get outs that's the key thing if he can pitch O.K. and get outs, the Yanks have a four run lead now and they're not gonna try to stop scoring you get to the fourth or fifth inning and then Joe kind of platoon his bullpen which is rested, Farnsworth and Rivera particularly are rested, Proctor can pitch an inning, Malone can pitch an inning. One on, one out, here's Doug Mirabelli. Ponson throws to first.

- Of course no one would mind if Ponson pitched seven innings, and they didn't have to do any of, uh, that. He'd like to. I know he wants to contribute. Scoreboard update sponsored by Acela. Book your trip today at amtrak.com or call 1 800 USA RAIL. A final in Chicago, the Cards beat the Cubs 11 to 3. Third inning in Philadelphia, Washington leads the Phillies 5 to nothing.

- There's the first pitch to Mirabelli and the first pitch speed to Mirabelli is sponsored by Road Runner High Speed Online from Time Warner Cable. The pitch came in at 92 miles an hour. Mirabelli hitting .200 on the nose with 6 homers and 19 RBIs. Make no mistake, he can hit it out, he's got good power. The pitch, a strike a breaking ball strike from Ponson.

- They're in the forth inning at Shea, Colorado leads the Mets 2 to 1. Third inning in Cincinnati, Pirates over the Reds 5 to 1. Second inning in Florida, Atlanta holding a 5 to 1 lead over the Marlins. All tied up 1 apiece, Houston and Milwaukee in the second.

- The 1-1 fouled back. And the count 1 and 2.

- Later on Arizona at San Diego and L.A. at San Francisco. A final in Kansas City, Kansas City beat Oakland 7 to 1. They're in the sixth in Baltimore, Baltimore leading Toronto 6 to 2. Texas with a 2 to 1 lead over Detroit, they're in the seventh inning in Detroit at Comerica.

- Here's the 1-2 the pitch low and the count 2 and 2.

- Fifth inning at Tropicana Field, Cleveland leads Tampa 4 to 1. Second inning in Minnesota, Twins over the White Sox, 1 to nothing. Just underway, Oakland at Kansas City oh, there's two games Oakland at Kansas City the second game and Mariners at L.A.

- Ponson's 2-2 coming to Mirabelli and the pitch, just... no it's strike three! Excuse me, Jim Wolf takes a long time. So he looked at it, stood up, and then pumped him out. Second strikeout for Ponson. Two away, a runner at first base and he will score. Also Suzyn, you know what Joe Torre thinks, I won't repeat it again, but this would be a big inning for Ponson to get the third out. In other words it would preserve with a 5-1 lead.

- That's right 'cause Joe Torre always says it's not a 4 run lead until the bottom of the inning is over.

- Well, here is Alex Cora, left-handed, he takes outside. Cora, really having a pretty good year on the bench hitting at .278, no homers, 13 RBIs, has excellent speed, bunts a lot. He's just like his brother Joey.

- Hmmmm... he looks just like him, too.

- Ozzie Guillen third base coach... the pitch to Cora is low and the count 2 and 0.

- I've only called him Joey once today.

- Yeah, that's easy to do.

- They look so much alike. Well, they would be. They're brothers. But really and particularly when he smiles he looks just like his older brother.

- Crisp leads off first, the 2-0, there's a strike. I'll tell you one thing about Ponson which surprises me cause he's pitched so little as of late, I mean in weeks, that he's getting a lot of strikes on corners and you would think it'd be very tough to have that kind of control in the strike zone. So far, so good. It'll be a 2-1 to Cora and the pitch is low, inside, 3 and 1. The run Boston got, nothing to be ashamed of, a double by Ortiz and a single by Manny Ramírez. Now the right-hander is set and deals. Runner goes, pitch is grounded foul outside of first. I know it sounds strange to think that a runner is going down four runs but Crisp runs very well. He's stolen 16 out of 20 and I guess the feeling is if you're gonna get a jump, go now he's going, automatic 3 balls, 2 strikes, two outs. Yanks with a 5-1 lead here in the bottom of the second inning. Ponson is set and the 3-2, fouled at home plate. So the count holds at 3 and 2.

— You know Ponson always had great stuff. When he was in Baltimore, he'd pitch five or six innings, shut out the Yankees, then he'd lose it. And he, uh, we haven't seen you know, that great 95 mile-an-hour fastball he used to have. But he's a different kind of pitcher. He told me that he tries to get ground balls now, not strikeouts.

— The pitch is outside, ball 4. So Cora walks. And indeed the inning is not over and here's Kevin Youkilis. You know, we mentioned this about Jason Johnson in the first game. We'll give you a pitch count, but the pitch count is meaningless, because you know he's never gonna go more than five anyway and the Yankees, who'd have a celebration if he went five, anyway he's gonna throw his 38th pitch. Youkilis hit it hard his first time, he lined it hard to A-Rod at third. So two on and two out and Ponson deals. There's a strike right on the outside corner. Good pitch.

— Eh, you know he's less wild than I actually thought he would be after not pitching for, for so long. He hasn't started since the 23rd of July.

— Now the 0-1. Lined, base hit over third down the left field line. Crisp scores, Cora goes to third and it is a double for Youkilis. So Youkilis rips a double to the left field corner, a rippy double, and the Red Sox now trail 5-2.

— And Fasano is going out to talk to Ponson. That was one of his curveballs and it started too high. If you're gonna have it break you've got to start it at the waist and have it break down. He... that started at the letters and when it broke, it broke to the waist, which is obviously very hittable. Melky played the wall very well, because that wall, if it hits the side wall then it usually bounces off the back wall of the Green Monster and, uh, a lot of players have lost, uh, gotten lost out there so Melky played that well. So Youkilis's 33rd double of the year.

— And Youkilis who lined one to A-Rod his first time, hit the same ball only higher so it went down the left field line. Youkilis picks up his 62nd RBI. Here's Mark Loretta and there is a strike. You know the mistake in this inning? Walking Alex Cora. Cora's a singles hitter. Was that... when you said he hasn't started since July 23rd, that was the start in Toronto that...

— Mmm hmmm.

— ...he got shelled.

— Mmm hmmm, yep. That's the one.

— Well that's a long time. The 0-1 low and the count 1 and 1.

— You know he's in. The last time he came in the 11th of August as a... three inning... that peculiar three innings where balls kept bouncing off his body if you remember.

— This is a big batter in the ballgame. A base hit could make it 5-4. And the pitch, breaking ball, a strike and the count 1 and 2.
Loretta struck out his first time, he was called out on strikes. I think we're gonna be here a while.
— Yes. I do too.
— The three doubles that Loretta hit in the first game, he's done that three times in his career, three doubles in a game.
— Now Ponson deals inside and the count 2 and 2. You think Ponson should throw a strike? Well, the on deck hitter is David Ortiz. Heh heh heh... heh heh heh.
— Oh.
— Runners lead second and third, two out, 5-2 Yanks, bottom of the second. Now the right-hander's 2-2. Outside. Way outside. Not close. The count 3 and 2. Threw a slider. Well Loretta is in, as they say, a pretty good spot. There's second and third, two out, and if Ponson walks Loretta looming on deck is one David Big Papi Ortiz.
— Looming is a very good word.
— Heh heh heh...
— Sort of connotes a large shadow.
— It'll be a 3-2 to Loretta. Then pitch. Lined. Base hit. Down the left field line, rolling to the left field corner. Two runs will score. On his way to second is Loretta with a double. It's a two-run double for Mark Loretta and the Yankees lead is now 5-4.
— And another double for Mark Loretta and it looks like doubles is all he ever hits is doubles, three in the first game, another one here. Let's look on the replay and see what this pitch is, another breaking pitch that that broke and when it broke about thigh-high. Loretta has good wrist control and really good bat speed. And he just whipped it down the left field line.
— So Loretta in the double header is now 4 for 7 and all four hits have been doubles and all have been hit hard, too.
— And Ron Guidry going out to talk to Sidney Ponson and, um, scurrying. Both bullpens are scurrying, movement everywhere out there. Well, ya heard MVP chants at Yankees Stadium when Derek Jeter came up. There are now MVP chants in Fenway Park for Big Papi, David Ortiz.
— Big Papi hit one off the center field wall 420 feet away his first time for a double, scored on a Ramírez single. The Yankees then went out and scored five runs in the second inning but Ponson, who had a runner on and two outs, walked Alex Cora. The pitch, a foul third base side and Suzyn, he will long remember that walk. He walked...
— Hmmm...
— ...he walked a singles hitter, at best a singles hitter, and since then doubled Youkilis, doubled Loretta. It is 5-4 and here is Ortiz. Here's the 0-1. It's a strike. That's what they call the high strike. It was about at his eyebrows.
— Heh heh heh.
— It looked high.
— Oh my goodness!
— Oh, we... we're about a mile up but anyway...
— Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha.
— ...anyway, the count 0 and 2. It wasn't as high as we are but...
— Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha. It was... ha ha... it was close. Oh goodness...
— Loretta leads off second, the tying run with two outs. It'll be an 0-2 to Ortiz. High, fastball, 1 and 2.
— Hey John, they just had a note up on the board. There's really... I had to read it twice... 'cause it's it's hard to fathom. He's the first Red Sock in history Big Papi to have 105 RBIs by the end of July. You know how many great hitters have been...
— Oh no.
— ...on this team?
— Yes!
— Wow!
— The 1-2. Breaking ball low, 2 and 2. Ted Williams and Jimmie Foxx and Vern Stevens and Carl Yastrzemski and on and on...
— Jim Rice and... my goodness!
— That is a lot of RBIs for the end of July, though. The pitch it’s strike three called, a breaking ball caught him looking. So the Yankees still have the lead barely as Boston gets three runs on three hits and leaves one. And now at the end of two innings of play, the Yankees 5, Boston 4 on the Yanks Radio Network.

Time Warner Cable’s intro triple play. Three great services for just $99 a month. First you get digital cable with more than 150 channels and access to on-demand programming. Then rev up your computer with high speed online, a super-fast internet connection. Enjoy unlimited calling throughout the US, Puerto Rico and Canada with digital phone. Get it all for just $99 a month with Time Warner’s intro triple play. Call 1 800 OK CABLE. Outside of New York City, call Time Warner. Other restrictions may apply. Call 1 800 OK CABLE.

Jeep announces the return of employee pricing plus. Now everyone can save by getting our employee price. Plus get huge cash allowances of up to $2000 or zero percent APR financing for well-qualified buyers on most 2006 Jeep vehicles. Plus, qualified buyers get an additional thousand dollars bonus cash on Grand Cherokee and Commander when financed through Chrysler financial. Save on Jeep Grand Cherokee with a five-star government crash test rating. Pay for America's original four by four Jeep Wrangler, get our employee price on Jeep Liberty, with the government's highest side-impact crash test rating, or the seven passenger Jeep Commander. Now's the best time to save on America's most award-winning line of four by fours. Get all the info at askdrz.com for pricing with employees plus. Hurry, offers end August 31st. $500 to $2000 cash allowance depending on models. Zero percent APR excludes Wrangler. Based on major US national auto publications 1982 to 2005. Not all buyers will qualify. See dealer for details. Jeep is a registered trademark of Daimler Chrysler.

AIG. For 85 years families have relied on to help insure their futures on loans, retirement, AIG. The strength to be there.

Listen to WCBS every morning for traffic and weather together every ten minutes on the eights.

— Ford Explorer has a more powerful engine and a new luxurious interior, all the style and comfort that's made Ford Explorer the best selling SUV. Ask your Tri-State quality Ford dealer for a price that's even better. Robbie Cano grounds one foul outside of first. So Lester stays in, that's a sixty-second pitch, and he should stay in now that Boston has caught up. The Yankee lead is only 5-4 as Lester and Ponson have had big problems here in the first two innings. Cano had a RBI double his first up. Now Lester deals and the pitch high and the count 1 and 1.

— Hideki Matsui may be out but you don’t have to miss out. There's always a great show at Benihana, not to mention the delicious sizzling steak, chicken or shrimp. Benihana restaurants are proud to support Hideki Matsui and Yankees baseball.

— Now the pitch is popped foul, out of play, so the count 0 and 2. I’m sure each dugout is saying, "Don't stop. Keep scoring. Don't stop." This ballpark itself leads to runs but pitching is suspect, a nice way to put it. The 0-2... Hey! Struck 'em out swinging, one away.
— And struck 'em out with a 91 mile-an-hour fastball. And he throws harder than that. Let's see, let's look where this was... up and in. Up and in. Great pitch.
— Good spot. Really choked him inside. One away, here's Craig Wilson. Wilson walked in the second inning when the Yankees scored four. Yankees scored five in the second, Boston came back with three. Red Sox had scored a run in the first. 5-4 Yanks in the third. Craig Wilson cuts and misses. Now the pitch is inside, a fastball. And the count 1 and 1. I, I guess the bullpen's gonna have a lot to say about who's gonna win this ballgame, cuz neither starter seems like they'll go very long. There'll be a 1-1 to Wilson. The left-handed John Lester deals and that's a bouncer up there and the count 2 and 1.
— Tried to throw him a changeup, threw it about 57 feet.
— Probably held on to it too long, I guess. It's almost a perfect night, I mean, it's cool, ya... you're in your shirt sleeves, you're very comfortable. Great weather for the hitters. The pitch is grounded foul at home plate and the count 2 and 2 on Wilson.
— You know, a lot of guys were talking about that in the clubhouse between games. It's it's warm, but it's not too hot so you don't get overly tired cause of the heat and because it's warm and not cool, your muscles don't get stiffened up. Perfect weather today.
— Here's the 2-2. A high chopper over the mound, fielded at short by Cora, throws to first in time and there are two away. Hey fans. It's time for Yankees baseball and Black Bear beef franks. Black Bear beef franks deliver the snappin' taste that New Yorkers crave. So get that real home run taste by going to your favorite ShopRite for Black Bear beef franks. Now two away. Here's Bernie Williams, who walked his first time up. We're in the top of the third in Game 2. Yankees have a 5-4 lead. They won the first 12-4. And Lester deals a breaking ball strike on the outside corner and the count 0 and 1. Now the left-hander to the plate, hit on the ground to short. Cora fields, fires across. Lester has a 1-2-3. Three up, three down for the Yanks. At the end of two and a half, it's 5-4 Yanks, on the New York Yankees Radio Network.
Clifford Schweir was a 74-year-old mountain climber.
He learned that the arteries in his heart were blocked. His lifelong passion quickly became a memory. Doctors at a local hospital performed an angioplasty. There was no relief of the symptoms. The procedure was a success.
Clifford felt like an old man. He's discovered that walking two blocks is like climbing a mountain. He's rediscovered why there's nothing like climbing a mountain. Which hospital you choose can make all the difference in the world. Mt. Sinai. Another day, another breakthrough. For more information call 1 800 MD SINAI.
— Connecticut fans can buy or sell just about anything with a classified ad in the Bargain News. Ask for it at a newsstand or find them online. There's no news like the Bargain News. Well, we go to the, uh, bottom of the third Ponson has a one run lead, 5-4. He's given up a run in the first and three in the second. His big mistake, two outs and a runner on second, ain't no runs were in, he had a 5-1 lead and he walked Alex Cora. Boy, did he pay for it. When Bernie Williams grounded out to short to end the top of the third, that was the fifteenth out and GEICO wants to remind you that a fifteen minute call can save you fifteen percent or more on car insurance. Call 1 800 947 AUTO, 1 800 947 A-U-T-O for GEICO Direct. Manny Ramírez will lead off. Manny had a RBI single his first time and is 19 for 37 against the Yanks this year. The pitch it's lined, there's a base hit into left center field in the gap, going to the left center field wall. Manny heads towards second. He is there with a double. It's so simple for him. It's so easy. He's such a great hitter. I don't see Albert Pujols play very much but I don't know how anybody can be a better hitter than Manny Ramírez. He can hit for average, he can hit for power. He's just a flat out great hitter. And he isn't hitting as much against the Yanks Miguel Tejada is.

— I was gonna ask you because now he's 20 for 38. So Tejada is is better.
— Heh heh. I'd say.
— The pitch to Hinske is low. So there's the tying run at second with no one out.
— What do we figure, was he up to .618 at one point during the Baltimore series?
— Remember he was what, like, 21 for 38 or something like... some ridiculous number. Here's the 1-0 to the left-hand hitter. A grounder foul outside of first. Hinske grounded out his first out. Well, the third inning means it's time for the Time Warner Cable triple play contest. Now, if the Yanks turn a triple play in the third inning, Janet Lohman of Amityville New York will win $10,000 and Time Warner Cable's Triple Play Service free for a year. Ponson deals and it's fouled down the left field line, out of play. To enter, log on to www.WCBS880.com. Manny Ramírez the tying run at second, there's no one out, it'll be a 1-2 to Hinske. Hinske steps out for a moment. Hinske hit a hot shot his first time at bat but Ponson grabbed it, knocked it down anyway then threw 'em out. The pitch strike three. Good fastball.
— Ah, Hinske doesn't like the call and he has said something to Jim Wolf.
— So, one away. Now again, we are so far up. It's tough to tell high and low. We can tell the plate and that pitch had the plate. Let's see where it is. It was, up, maybe letter high. Obviously he's throwing high strikes.
— Well, it it was at the letters. It did cross the plate at the letters.
— Well, one away. Here's Wily Mo Peña. Ponson has four strikeouts and Peña takes a pitch, low, a sinking fastball, the count 0 and 1. It really doesn't matter about Ponson's pitch count because how far is he gonna go anyway but he's at 56 pitches. I think both managers would like five if they could. Now the 1-0 cut on and missed. Question is, Suzyn, what will the score be?
— Ah...
— But I mean, if it's, if it's like this, 5-4, 6-5, they'll take it and then...
—...right, and they'll move on...
—...yeah, hope their bullpen stops the other team.
— I think both managers are thinkin' the same thing.
— The 1-1. Half swing, an awkward swing, good fastball and the count 1 and 2.
— Willy Mo has tremendous power but a very free swinger, strikes out much too much, doesn't have the kind of bat control and the kind of eye at looking at pitches that, uh one would want.
— The 1-2 is inside, another sinker. And the count 2 and 2. Ramírez leaves off second, Cano plays near second, trying to hold his lead down. Peña, a right-hander, as Suzyn said, with fabulous power. The 2-2 is fouled off the end of the bat, first base side. So the count holds at 2 and 2.
— Let's see how old he is. I think he's pretty young 'cause when he was with, uh... yeah, he's only 24, still just 24.
— Is that right?
— Yeah. I remember he was 16 when he was with the Yankees.
— That's why.
— Yeah. 24 in January.
— Gee, I thought it was so long ago when I was 16...
— Ha ha ha ha ha.
—...but I got that wrong.
— Ha ha ha ha. You know one of you was 16.
— The 2-2 is low outside. And the count 3 and 2. It is an ability to throw strikes on the corners. That's an ability. So Ponson is trying but half the time he'll miss. Ramírez off second with one out. It'll be a 3-2 from Ponson to Peña. Swung on and lined to center. Damon charging, charging makes the catch! And there's the second out. So there are two away. Manny Ramírez is really funny. Here's what he did: Damon's charging, he caught the ball in shallow center. Now after the catch Ramírez started off second like he was going to third. Obviously he wasn't going to third. He only went a couple of steps, turned around, and as Damon was getting his equilibrium back, Manny Ramírez was yelling at him. I don't know what he was yelling but...
— Ha ha ha...
—...probably, one, he let the ball drop.
— Probably. That's probably sounds exactly like what he...
— Here's Coco Crisp and he takes a strike.
— ...when, remember when Melky made that great catch against Manny and they... and he was yelling at him, "You're supposed to let that drop! That's me up here!" "No, no. I wanna win," said Melky.
— Crisp had a single his first time with two outs, then Cora walked and all the fun began for the Red Sox. The pitch to Coco fastball inside, the count 1 and 1. One thing I will say about Ponson, he got pretty good stuff. He does not throw as hard as he did when he was with the Orioles. He throws hard enough. Now that's only one part of it, of course. The biggest part is control in the strike zone which is now called location. The pitch, a ground ball foul and a breaking ball, the count 1 and 2. And that is something that I don't think you can teach. I think that's ability. Ramírez led off the inning with a double but then Hinske struck out, Peña hit it hard but lined out to Damon in center, and now Ponson deals 1-2 to Crisp, hit hard on the ground to first and through Wilson! It went by him for an error to right field. Ramírez scores the tying run and on to second goes Crisp. Now that should have been the third out. A ground ball to first and it ate up Craig Wilson and it went through him for an error and the ballgame is tied at 5.
— Well that should have been, as John said, the third out. It just went right through his legs. He just didn't get the glove down on the ground and he's pretty sure-handed, that obviously is an error. E3 on Craig Wilson and that that actually, yeah, you're right John, that would have been the third out and he would've gotten out of the inning harmlessly.
— So the ballgame tied at 5, the go-ahead run's at second, that's Crisp, and here is Doug Mirabelli. The ball was hit hard but Wilson got there and I think if Wilson had to do it over again, he would've made sure that he knocked it down because he would've made the play. The ball was hit so hard, he would've made the play. Here's Mirabelli, a right-hand hitter and Ponson deals, a strike. Mirabelli stuck out his first time. Now the 0-1 is low and the count 1 and 1. Coco Crisp, who runs so well, is the go-ahead run at second. The pitch, there's a breaking ball, it's high and the count 2 and 1. I don't know if Lester's pitch count -- we'll give it to you at the beginning of the fourth -- but Ponson will now throw his 70th pitch. The 2-1, cut on and missed. He threw it right by Mirabelli. And the count 2 and 2.

— Mirabelli has pretty good power. He doesn't hit for average cuz he really doesn't have a good sense of the strike zone or as good as he could but he's got good power. If he connects, as the Yankees have found out through the years, he'll hit it a long way. He's getting to play a lot more regularly now that Jason Varitek is on the DL, obviously.

— Now here's the 2-2 a high fly to left, not deep. Cabrera comes in and makes the catch. Well, the Red Sox tie it on the error, one run, one hit, one error, one left. And now at the end of 3 innings of play, we're tied at 5 on the Yanks Radio Network.

When you need to know, we've got you covered with news, traffic, weather, business and sports on 880.

Hey Yankees fans. Head on over to your local Gristedes and Metro New York to pick up some Sam Adams lager, Sam Adams Light, or Sam Adams Summer Ale. Sam Adams, the official beer of the New York Boston rivalry on the Yankees Radio Network. Take pride in your beer. Take pride in your team.

AIG. For 85 years families have relied on the AIG companies to help them secure for their futures. For insurance, for loans, for retirement. AIG. The strength to be there.

Need to stop for gasoline? All Amoco fuels at BP are high quality and guaranteed in writing. Amoco fuels at BP.

Enter the WCBS home makeover contest. Log on to WCBS880.com slash Yankees and fill out an entry form and let the Yanks and WCBS turn your home into a castle. Sponsored by Garden State Brickface, East Side Floors and the New York Yankees Radio Network. Complete rules at WCBS880.com.

Hey Yankees fans. Now is the perfect time to load up the grill with Black Bear beef franks. They're prepared in the European tradition with fresh beef and all natural seasonings, never any poultry fillers or MSG. That's why Black Bear beef franks deliver the taste and snap New Yorkers appreciate. So if you love franks with your Yankee baseball, get to your favorite ShopRite and stock up on Black Bear franks before they're outta here. And don't forget Black Bear mustard. There are varieties and unique tastes for you too. Black Bear franks and Black Bear mustard, available exclusively at ShopRite.

Sometimes your commute in the Tri-State might be faster on a bicycle. Count on Tom Kaminski and Copter 880. For the fast way to get you to work and the best way to get home.

Keep me movin'...

Get the bird's eye view on traffic with Copter 880 mornings and afternoons only on WCBS.

I'm meteorologist Craig Allen. Be sure to start your day with my weather forecast every ten minutes, weekday mornings right here on WCBS Newsradio 880.

— John Sterling, Suzyn Waldman back at Fenway Park, top of the fourth, tied at 5. Sal Fasano swings and misses at a curveball from the dirt, count 0 and 1. And the Yankees scored five in the second, A-Rod walked and moved up on a wild pitch and Cano doubled him in. And that was the Yankees first run tonight the first run the Yankees scored in the game, sponsored by Fox News channel. Fox is where the news is. Now here's the 0-1. Fasano takes a strike on the outside corner and the count 0 and 2. Fasano bounced into a force-out at home with the bases loaded 5-2. Sal reached first and later scored a run behind Lester 0 and 2. Lester... this pitch for Lester will be his 75th fouled back by Fasano.

— And this is something, John, that Joe Torre does not like a big inning and not... then not being able to add on. That's why he was so pleased at the first game, keep adding on. In this place, you can't just score in one inning. It's never enough. Never.

— The 0-2 he struck 'em out swinging on a slow curve. So, uh, the Red Sox can hope now that Lester has found something. One away. Here's Melky Cabrera who singled and knocked in a run his first time, switch hitter batting right. I mean, by all rights Ponson should still have the lead. Wilson made an error. I mean, errors are all part of it. Cabrera takes low. I, I guess both managers -- we've been saying this -- are probably thinking the same thing: hey, 5-5 I'll take it. Get me through five and then we'll piece it together with the bullpen.

— Yep.

— No, uh, wait, you've gotta get a couple of scoreless innings to do that heh heh heh. The 1-0, Cabrera bluffs blunt takes a strike. Ran his hands up.

— Well, as you, as you said John, John Lester has found something here. He's got the side in in order in the third, struck out Fasano.

— Now he's retired five in a row. And the 1-1 is low and the count 2 and 1. Now the left-hander to the plate fouled back, first base side of home plate, the count 2 and 2. Johnny Damon is on deck and Lester ready to deal 2-2 to Cabrera swung on and fouled, first base side, out of play. Tomorrow's game is a Fox game, so instead of starting at 1:05, it'll start at 1:25. We'll be on there at 12:40 with a long pre-game.

— {Yawn} —

— Here's the 2-2 fouled at home plate Now, here's Lester's 2-2. Swung on, lined like a bullet! Base hit, center field! Oh, is Lester lucky! That ball coulda taken his head off! He just got out of the way. Well that would shake me up, I don't know if it's gonna shake Lester up, though. Vicious line drive right through the box.

— Well, he's walking all the way back to the shortstop position.

— That missed his head... -- Oh. -- ...oooooohhh, man. Ah, if that if that missed his head by two inches that's a lot. He ducked way down and he's 6'4" so he's a big big kid. Oh my goodness, that could've been awful.

— Oh boy, is that scary? It was even worse on the replay.

— Hmmh...

— Here's Damon, who is 2 for 2 and has five hits in the double header and 5 RBIs and a home run. Damon takes outside and the count 1 and 0.

— John talked about tomorrow afternoon, Josh Beckett and Randy Johnson.

— And I think both teams are hoping that they'll have better pitching on their team.

— Oh.

— Now the 1-0. Lined deep down the right field line toward the Pesky Pole it is gone! There's a two-run home run for Johnny Damon having a day that he'll never forget for the rest of his life! He's homered in both games! He has six hits! He has seven RBIs! A two-run Damon dinger and the Yankees take a 7-5 lead!

— You know John, Johnny Damon said to me when I said I, you know, you’re a human being, I know you want to do well here and he said, I don’t want to do well against every team. Well that may be so but you know, you know he’s loving this.

— Absolutely. He hit a line drive right down the line and into the seats near the Pesky Pole down the right field line. Another home run, another hit for Damon. And what a, what an afternoon evening for Johnny Damon. He’ll never forget this as long as he lives. Here’s Derek Jeter. Breaking ball low. So Ponson’s been given a two run lead. The Boston bullpen is up. It’s... what an unbelievable day for Damon. He’s answered back to boos the best way: performance. And here’s the 1-0, swung on, popped foul, out of play.

— And that ball went into the first row. It was caught by a man in the first row around that Pesky Pole.

— You know, it’s such an odd angle. When you walk in you can’t believe that a ball could go there. You could see it go straight, out a little bit, but it’s just... that’s a very odd pole. It’ll be a 1-1 to Jeter. Swung on and hit in the air, right down the right field line and it’s fouled to the seats and the count 1 and 2. Here’s what Damon has done he has six hits in nine at bats. He has two homers and he has seven RBIs. What an afternoon... evening... whatever this is... what a day!

— Heh heh heh heh heh...

— What a day. The 1-2. In side. And the count 2 and 2.

— This is getting to be the dead of night. We... I mean we’re... we’re... we might have to start the game... we might still be here.

— Well the Yanks have a 7-5 lead in the fourth with one out. Julian Tavares up in the Boston bullpen again. And the left-hander is 2-2. It’s grounded to second. Loretta will throw out Jeter and there are two away. Damon, lefty to lefty. Now, you know, Damon hits lefties, Abreu hits lefties, Cano hits lefties and Giambi hits for power against lefties but Damon has a single, a single, and a home run against a left-hander in this second game. Well, two away, here’s Bobby Abreu, he hits lefties very well too. Bobby has lined out and hit a two-run double down the right field line. Hey, the Yankees have worn out Boston. If they had any pitching, it’d be a double header sweep. They’re wearing ‘em out. The pitch, Abreu breaking ball low. The Yankees had 12 runs and 16 hits in the first game and in half the game, less than half the game, they have 7 runs and 7 hits. That’s... that’s 19 runs and 23 hits, you know, it should be enough, it’s not nearly enough but... the 1-0 is low, 2 and 0.

— It’s not enough.

— Awww...

— I don’t...

— Not even close to being enough...

— ...no, it’s not enough, trust me. So does Joe.

— Two outs, no one on, it’ll be a 2-0 to Abreu, the Yankees with a 7-5 lead, top of the fourth. Pitch there it’s a strike and the count 2 and 1.

— Abreu’s on-base percentage now, John, .481.

— Aw, that’s incredible, now he hasn’t had a lot of at bats, less than 100 with the Yanks but he was .427 with the Phils. There is a 2-1 lined base hit left field. Well, we’re seeing something. You know, uh, Abreu’s swing was... Suzyn, I know you know what I’m talking about. If this had happened in the 30's or 40's and we read about it, it would sound, wow, unbelievable. Well, it's happening right here.

— And Terry Francona has seen enough and he is coming out slowly to get the rookie John Lester and this call to the bullpen is sponsored by digital phone from Time Warner Cable. Check it out at timewarnercable.com.

Tired of getting zapped on your telephone bills? Get digital phone from Time Warner Cable, with unlimited calling to anywhere in the U.S., Puerto Rico, and Canada, all at a flat monthly rate. As low as $39.95 per month. Why that's... very affordable. Call 1 800 OK CABLE. Outside of New York City call Time Warner Cable. Get digital phone as part of Time Warner Cable's Triple Play. Three great services for one low price. Restrictions apply. Go to timewarnercable.com for details.

August is adopt a pre-owned Honda month at your official New York Long Island Honda dealer.

Oh, you're such a cute car. I want you.

Stop by or go to nylihonda.com for the most comprehensive list in the area of the cars with one of the best pedigrees in the business.

Pre-owned and certified used Hondas.

Wrap it up. We'll take it home.

Adopting a pre-owned Honda anytime is good. Now it's New York Long Island Honda dealers good. See nylihonda.com for details.

— And that call to the bullpen was sponsored by GEICO, where a fifteen minutes call can save you fifteen percent or more. Call 800 947 AUTO, 800 947 A-U-T-O, GEICO Direct. Well, Julian Tavarez is on for the Red Sox in relief of John Lester. We'll give you his stats: in 59 and two-thirds innings, 69 hits, so 10 more hits than innings pitched, 33 earned runs, 8 home runs, so 8 home runs in 59 innings, 25 walks and 30 strikeouts and hitters are batting .300 off of Julian Tavarez.

— Well John Lester goes three and two-thirds. He has give up 7 runs and he's responsible for Abreu. 7 runs, 8 hits, 4 strikeouts, 3 walks: he can lose it, he can't win it. Abreu, in the double header is 6 for 8 with a walk. Here's A-Rod who has walked and popped out in the same inning, the second. And Tavarez throws to first base to check on Abreu.

— When Tavarez is throwing well, he'll have a hard sinker and he'll get a lot of ground balls. Not having a great season.

— He's been around the pike, boy, he's been with a lot of teams. The pitch, swung on and hit in the air to shallow right. Charging in is Peña, coming hard, it drops for a hit. Abreu goes to second. Abreu made a base running mistake and he knows it right now. And he just looked at Larry Bowa and kind of hit his helmet. There are two outs. What was he doing? But, he made a mistake. We all make mistakes and he would've only gotten to third. He would not have scored. He knows it, he's shaking his head, looking at Larry Bowa.

— Larry Bowa's standing at third base with his hands on his hips.

— Pugnaciously.

— Yep. Well, you know, they know each other. He managed him for four years so he knows him and he hit his helmet. He knows him.

— Heh heh heh...

— Oh my goodness!

— Well he... the thing is, it didn't cause the Yanks a run. He could have only gotten to third, but he should be a third and there's a, you know, a fastball, a wild pitch kind of thing or and infield error, he won't score. Here is Robbie Cano. Well, I guess you can get away with that when you're 6 for 8. The pitch to Cano is low and inside. That was almost a wild pitch and Mirabelli made a nice scoop.

— Bowa's still talking and, boy, will he hear about it when he gets to the bench.
— You're right.
— Larry Bowa can get on people. I... I haven't heard stuff like that. He needles as well as anyone I've ever heard.
— Cano has a RBI double and has struck out, now facing a right-hander. Yankees have a 7-5 lead. The pitch high outside. And the count 2 and 0. You know that Joe and Gator are talking this over and if they can get a scoreless inning or two out of Ponson... that's a big question mark.
— They haven't gotten one yet.
— Heh heh heh heh heh heh heh heh. You're right. 1, 3 and 1 for Boston. There'll be a 2-0. Hit on the ground off the glove of Tavarez, fielded and short, throw to first in time for the out, a nice play. Very nice play. If that ball didn't hit Tavarez's glove that's a base hit to center field. For the Yankees they get 2 runs on 4 hits and leave 2. And now at the end of three-and-a-half innings of play, 7-5 Yanks on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

Hey baseball fans, when it comes to improving your home turf, you don't settle for less. Neither does Loews. That's why they carry the most complete line of John Deere mowers in home improvement, featuring ten models that include both riders and walk-behinds. When you purchase a John Deere rider at Loews, you get complete John Deere in-home service, from free delivery inspection to after-sales service. Now that's great teamwork. Loews. Let's build something together.

Road Runner high speed online from Time Warner Cable is faster than DSL, up to 100 times faster than dialup. Call 1 800 OK CABLE and get your first six months of Road Runner for just $29.95 a month with self-installation. Offer expires 12/31/06. Restrictions apply. Call for details.

GEICO just lowered their rates in New York and that's on top of our new car discount. Feel the love, New York. Go to GEICO.com or call 1 800 947 AUTO.

— Well, Sidney Ponson comes out for the bottom of the fourth inning. New York now taking a 7 to 5 lead and wouldn't you know that Joe would love to have a scoreless inning. Ponson gave up one in the first, three in the second and one in the third and he will face the bottom of the order, Alex Cora and then going around to the top and Kevin Youkilis and Mark Loretta. The big mistake that Sidney Ponson made in that second inning when the Red Sox scored three runs was the walk to Alex Cora. And here's Cora again. You know, you always wonder why pitchers just don't -- he's got great stuff -- don't try and nitpick on the corners. Alex Cora hasn't hit a home run all year. He probably isn't gonna hit one now. So to try and pick at the corners is a mistake and Ponson paid for it. So Alex Cora gets in the box as the Yankees have taken a 7 to 5 lead. And the first pitch is in for a strike, 0 and 1. That was a fastball, 88 miles an hour. Ponson has tried to have more control, not to just throw his hard stuff anymore. The 0-1 pitch to Cora is hit past the diving Jeter into center field and Cora is on again. That was a fastball 90 miles an hour and got too much of the middle of the plate to Alex Cora. Just right over the middle of the plate, and a little on the low side and he just smacked it past Jeter. Jeter dove for it but it went underneath his glove. That's a solid single for Alex Cora. Now Kevin Youkilis. Youkilis has an RBI double in the second inning. Youkilis spent most of the season, before as... when Coco Crisp was on the DL, as a leadoff hitter, did a great job there.

— Now Ponson deals and Youkilis takes a fastball high 1 and 0. So Ponson deals and Youkilis takes a fastball high 1 and 0. So Cora leads off first Youkilis the tying run. The pitch lined to left field base hit. A looping glider. So Youkilis singles and the tying runs are on. And Gator visits the mound. Now the Yankee bullpen is going. They have the lead and I guess they would go to their bullpen to try to hold on to their lead right now.

— Well, Brian Bruney, the youngster who came over from Arizona, up as a righty and Ron Villone, the indispensable Ron Villone, is up. He got a half a day off. That's enough for Villone. Now home plate umpire Jim Wolf goes out and, uh, getting Fasano back behind the plate.

— Well, the conference is over Villone and Bruney continue to warm. Here is Mark Loretta with the tying runs on and no one out, Lorttea and then, uh oh... The pitch is grounded foul and over third.

— I think uh oh is sufficient.

— I think people know who is coming up if I say uh oh.

— Scoreboard update sponsored by UPS, what can brown do for you. A final in Kansas City. The first game, uh, Kansas City beat Oakland 7 to 1. There's no score in the second game. They're in the fifth inning in Kansas City.

— Loretta has struck out and doubled. The pitch is low. And the count 1 and 1.

— Top of the ninth inning in Baltimore. Baltimore leads Toronto 7 to 2. Troy Glaus and Vernon Wells homered for Toronto. Melvin Mora hit his thirteenth for Baltimore. Texas leads Detroit 2 to 1. They go to the bottom of the ninth in Detroit.

— Now Loretta is tired of waiting so he gets out of the box. Cora at second, Youkilis at first, no one out, bottom of the fourth, already, and the Yankees have a 7-5 lead.

— Mark Teixeira had his nineteenth homer in that, uh, Texas Detroit game, Dmitri Young, number six. Cleveland leading Tampa Bay 5 to 3. They're going to the top of the ninth in Tampa. Travis Hafner and Andy Marté hit his first homer.

— The pitch is lined to right field. There is a base hit. Bernie fields and fires in. And the bases are loaded as they held up Cora. He could've scored easily. But if you've got David Ortiz and Manny Ramírez coming up, why chance it? That'll be all for Ponson.

— And this pitching change is sponsored by Foxwoods Resorts Casino, the wonder of it all in Mystic country, Connecticut.

Tired of getting zapped on your telephone bills? Get digital phone from Time Warner Cable, with unlimited calling from anywhere in the US, Puerto Rico, and Canada, all at a flat monthly rate. As low as $39.95 per month. Why that's very affordable. Call 1 800 OK CABLE. Outside of New York City call Time Warner Cable. Get digital phone as part of Time Warner Cable's Triple Play. Three great services for one low price. Restrictions apply. Go to timewarnercable.com for details.

Alright back to the phones here on Talk New York and we're talking about how to find a good used car. Here's Fred from Queens.

Hi, I needed a used van to start up a new business and a friend told me about carbuyersmarket.com. I logged on and found an incredible selection of vans on their website. You know, I found and bought one right here in Flushing. It was a snap. And I even saved a few bucks.

Thank you Fred. Now, let's talk to Dolores from the Bronx.

We needed a used car for our daughter who's going to Fordham. We bought a copy of Car Buyer's Market at the convenience store down the street. You know, there's over 200 pages of cars for sale from both dealers and private owners? We found her a really nice Honda with low miles at a great price. It sure beat driving all over New York City looking for one.

That's for sure Dolores. Say, good luck to your daughter at Fordham. Sounds like Car Buyer's Market is the best way to shop for a used car here in New York. It's online at carbuyersmarket.com or at the newsstands everywhere. Well, that's it for this week's Talk New York. See you next time.

— Well, the indispensable one Ron Villone is pitching again, coming in to face Big Papi. And with the, uh, bases loaded here and nobody out this is quite a job for anybody.
— Now, I, I must say this is quite a job.
— Well, you know what Joe says, John it's not a two runs complete...
— Right...
— ...until the bottom of the inning.
— So here comes Villone, lefty to lefty against Ortiz. Cora at third, Youkilis at second, Loretta at first and no one out. Ortiz and then Manny Ramirez. Yikes. Ortiz has doubled and struck out. Now Villone deals and the fastball high. Yankees play the infield back. They will gladly give up a run to get a double play. No overshift but Jeter plays just a couple of steps on the third base side of second. Now the left-hander deals, fouled back. And the count 1 and 1.
— In the National League, Mets are leading Colorado 6 to 3. Alfonso Soriano had his 39th home run, Ryan Zimmerman his 17th, Washington is leading the Phillies 6-3, they're going to the bottom of the seventh in Philadelphia. Pirates over Cincinnati 7 to 1, they are in the eighth. And Atlanta over Florida 6 to 1, they're in the bottom of the seventh. Everything else is later.
— Now Villone's 1-1. There's a strike. And the count 1 and 2. We'll give you the Ponson numbers, not very pretty numbers but we'll give them to you anyway. It'll be a 1-2 from Villone to Ortiz. Bases loaded, no one out. It'll be a 1-2 pitch. Half swing, a check swing foul. Pitch up and in, so the count holds and 1 and 2. You know, a couple of days ago I get to the booth and, and Suzyn tells me about Brian Bruney. It was the afternoon game, the Yankees got shelled in New York by Baltimore. He pitched an inning. Well, here he is warming up. He's about to come into a ballgame with the Yanks and Red Sox...
— Heh heh heh...
— ...amazing.
— ...yep.
— ...I mean really amazing. Villone holds the set and the 1-2 just missed low outside, the count 2 and 2. That was the Villone slider. Good pitch, I mean it missed, but Ortiz couldn't pull the trigger and I mean that was on the knees just off the outside corner I guess.
— I guess.
— 7-5 Yankees, bottom of the fourth, a wild second game. Now here's the 2-2, fouled back. Joe loves Villone for about 100 different reasons but one of them is he has no fear and you have to have a pitcher come in who doesn't have any fear, you know, the fear to fail, in other words. He comes in and he's gonna throw his fastball and slider and see if he can get you out. He's been doing a great job this year.
— I guess one of the signs, he's not trying to hit spots with Ortiz. He's going at him. If he misses, he misses. He's going right at him, you know, he's not trying to stay away from him and miss his back.
— It'll be a 2-2 to Ortiz. Villone deals, check swing, ground ball to short. Jeter, Cano one, on to first, double... safe. I'm sorry. Safe at first. A run scores, 7-6. Runners first and third, one out. It was a check swing, it wasn't hit hard enough, but Ortiz doesn't run well and they just missed getting the double play. So give Ortiz an RBI. Scoring is Cora. That run, of course, charged to Ponson. Youkilis goes to third. Ortiz picks up his 114th RBI. Here's Manny Ramirez now with a 7-6 ballgame, first and third, one out.
— And as John said, Ortiz didn't mean to hit that. He was trying to check a swing and Villone almost got it. It was hit a little too hard, but if he had gotten it, you could have a double play there but the ball was hit too slowly, even though Big Papi doesn't run very well, it was hit too slowly to cleanly turn the double play and he beat it out.

— Manny Ramírez has singled and doubled knocked in his 95th run. First and third, one out. And Villone deals, lined like a bullet, base hit, left field. Youkilis scores the tying run. Ortiz stops at second. It's a base hit and an RBI for Manny Ramírez. And the ballgame is tied at 7. Manny, he doesn't waste any time. He goes up. Bang! Base hit! Now even though Ortiz faced Villone, the force-out goes on a Ponson-base runner, so that is still Ponson's responsibility so we can't give you his numbers yet. Here is Eric Hinske, a left-hand hitter and Villone deals a strike. We're tied at 7, we're in the bottom of the fourth. 7, 9 and 1 to 7, 10 and 0. And this ballgame isn't half over. Now here's the 0-1 to Hinske, cut on and misses, the count 0 and 2. Hinske has grounded out and struck out. He had three doubles in the first game, his first game as a member of the Sox. The 0-2, he struck him out swinging, 2 away. Ten second station ID on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

Thank you for listening to the Yankees on 880. And remember to stay tuned for news, traffic, weather, sports and business on WCBS, New York.

— John Sterling, Suzyn Waldman at Fenway Park in Game 2. In the day game, the Yankees won 12-4. In the night game, we're tied at 7. Here's right-hand hitting Wily Mo Peña with Ortiz and second, Ramírez at first, and two outs. Boston has scored in every inning. 1-3, 1-2. The Yankees scored five in the second and two in the fourth. We're tied at 7. And Villone deals popped foul first base side, out of play.

— And this is Villone's fourth day in a row he's been in a game.

— And, you know Manny Ramírez is such a great hitter. He got a single, a lined single. Villone's really pitched well. Ortiz got a lucky check swing, grounded and knocked in a run, got a force at second. He struck out Hinske now trying to get Peña with the go-ahead runs on-base at second and first, two outs, bottom of the fourth. Here is the 0-1 and there's a strike on the outside corner and the count 0 and 2.

— Peña up to .312, now that's pretty much courtesy of, uh a hot streak he's been on, 15 for 43, that's .349, in his last ten games.

— Well, a pitch, a fastball, up and in. And the count 1 and 2. Ortiz on second, Ramírez on first. Now the left-hander Villone is set. Here's the 1-2. Lined foul to left field seats behind third. And the count holds at 1 and 2.

— And Wily Mo just too quick for that one. He recognized the slider but was a little out in front of it, so fouled it off.

— The seats behind third in the grandstand kind of bend around and face home plate, so back at third there are seats that are on top of the left field line. It'll be a 1-2 to Peña. Outside 2 and 2 fastball. And, of course the other thing that Joe loves about Villone, he takes the ball every time.

— Yep.

— Every time. It'll be a 2-2 to Peña. The pitch is fouled on the first base side of home plate, so the count holds 2 and 2.

— I did finally get him to admit this morning that he actually would tell Joe if, if he felt that he couldn't, cause he says he knows right away, so we were talking during the first game, he knows when he wakes up in the morning. He doesn't have to throw and stretch. He knows what he feels like and I says you wouldn't say you could do it if you couldn't? You seem like you wouldn't even... he says well I would be hurting the team. That doesn’t hurt anybody if I don’t think I can get people out to go out there. And he hasn’t said no yet. All year.

— Again, it’ll be a 2-2 to Peña. A groundball, right back to Villone, flips to first to end the inning. Well, Boston gets the tie. They get two runs on four hits and leave two. Now at the end of four innings of play we’re tied at 7 on the Yanks Radio Network, presented by AIG, the strength to be there. AIG.

Gear up and get ready to win your Mini Motoring School badge. Log on to greatergothammini.com and get behind the virtual wheel of a Mini Cooper. Then visit your local dealership to test drive a Mini Cooper and earn your Mini Motoring School badge today.

Hey Yankee fans. Looking for a new physician or specialist? Call 1 800 MD SINAI. That’s 1 800 MD S-I-N-A-I. Or visit them on the web at mountsinai.org. The Mount Sinai Medical Center. Another day, another breakthrough.

Here she is, the first million dollar winner in the new Daily News Scratch ‘n’ Match Millions Game.

Hi, I’m Donna Murphy. I just won a million dollars from Scratch ‘n’ Match in the Daily News.

How does it feel to win a million dollars?

It’s amazing. There’s still millions more to win.

So Donna, how do you win the Daily News?

Play it every day, every week and be consistent with it. You know, if you miss one day of it, that could be the day that had the lucky numbers for you.

Keep playing the Daily News Scratch ‘n’ Match Millions Game. The only newspaper game in town where you could still win one million dollars. There are more than 2,500 cash prizes, from $25 up to $100,000 available to be won each week. That’s more than $6 million dollars in prizes. Have you caught million dollar fever? Look for your Scratch ‘n’ Match game card every Sunday in the Daily News and play every day. Three one million dollar prizes offered. Pay over $25,000 for four years without interest. Odds one in 5.5 million. For official rules and how to play for free back of game card. Call 1 800 718 4037 or visit nydailynews.com. Subject to official rules.

You’re one of the many who wake up to WCBS 880. From New Canaan to Weston and Norwalk to Greenwich, more people start their day with us than any other radio station. We’ve got you covered. WCBS 880.

— Now here, uh, Craig Wilson to lead off for the Yanks in the fifth. Tavarez deals a strike. Wilson has walked and grounded out. The right-handed Tavarez will then face the left-handed hitting Bernie Williams who will try to turn around, and then Fasano. The pitch is a breaking ball. Strike.

— And it’s time for the BP Grand Slam Inning. Congratulations to Leo Hartz of Middletown, New York. You’ve instantly won a $50 AAMCO ultimate from BP Gas Card. If the fourth batter of the inning is a... hits a grand slam, Leo wins a Toyota, courtesy of Atlantic Toyota, located at 200 Sunrise Highway, Amityville...

— Here’s the 0-2. Swung on and hit in the air to deep left. That ball is gonna be caught by Manny right on the track in front of the wall. At first it looked like it might hit the wall, but it didn't have enough oomph. And Manny going back... now that was high enough for him to get back and he caught the ball, maybe a step or so from the wall, from the Green Monster, on the warning track, one away.

— ...visit them online at gotoyota.net. Now if he just... oomph is a good word, John, and if he just had put a little more in it... so many balls over the years have gone way high, fly balls that just get over the walls and, uh, now on the Monster seats.
— Now here is Bernie Williams with one out. John Lester went three and two-thirds, seven runs, eight hits, four strikeouts, three walks. Bernie takes low. Ponson went three plus, seven runs, nine hits four strikeouts. The pitch to Bernie, swung on, hit in the air to deep center. Crisp back, away back, on the track, looking up, it's all... it's gonna be a rule. Bernie heads toward second. He is there with a double. And he misses a home run by a few feet. He hit a bullet straight away. It just wasn't high enough to get out. The ce... the center field wall is high about, I'd say, 15 feet high, and that banged off the ce... center field wall. Oh, what a game! So Bernie hits a robust double to straightaway center.

— I'm just looking at the replay of that on the on the monitor. He really didn't miss a home run by much. Another five, six feet.

— Now there's Fasano with a runner at second, one out. And there's the pitch it's grounded foul off third. So Ponson three plus, seven hits, four strikeouts, one walk. And Lester three and two-thirds, seven runs, eight hits, four strikeouts and three walks. So they are not gonna be involved in the decision. It's a tie game and now here's Villone and Tavarez. Bernie, the lead run, leads off second with one out. It'll be an 0-1 to Fasano. The pitch hit on the ground... whoa, lined right to third, excuse me. Tavarez threw the pitch and Youkilis caught it off third, a little line drive, so two away and that'll bring up Melky Cabrera.

— Mirabelli going out to talk to Tavarez on, uh, probably how to pitch to Melky. The other thing is, with Bernie at second, they do change the signs. He's telling him what the sequence is going to be. Bernie Williams standing at second base can pick up the signals when Mir... Mirabelli puts them down. So that's, that's becoming more and more coming. You know, John, when you see Yankee and Red Sox fans, they do it all the time, cause I think they just play each other so so often, as soon as there's a runner at second you'll always see one or the other catcher going out to talk to the pitcher.

— And for that reason, too. Cabrera takes outside. We are coming to you live from the Loews broadcast booth. Let's build something together. Uh, it'll be a 1-0 to Cabrera, now turns around to the left side. He's 2 for 2 in game two. The pitch grounded foul at home plate. Last inning Johnny Damon hit a two-run home run, his second two-run home run of the day night double header. It was the first run -- the first home run -- the Yankees have hit in the game tonight. For that home run, the Eastern Region Hyundai Dealers will donate $150 to the Hope & Heroes Children's Fund, benefiting the Morgan Stanley Children's Hospital of New York Presbyterian. It'll be a 1-1 to Cabrera. The pitch is fouled, third base side, out of play. And the count 1 and 2.

— Well we thought this was gonna be this kind of game and all our fears have been realized.

— And it certainly is that kind of game. Now the bullpens will have a go at it. Bernie is the go-ahead run at second. There are two outs, there will be a 1-2 to Cabrera. And the pitch. Half swing. Did he go? No. Tavarez was running off the mound toward the Boston dugout. The third base umpire James Hoye said no swing. Of course Tavarez might have been trying to sell it too.

— Well he might've. It doesn't, uh... umpires don't like that. And of course protocol made it that, uh, James Hoye only gave his call after Jim Wolf asked him.

— There'll be a 2-2 to Cabrera. Foul, third base side, out of play.

— Usually, the home plate umpire will give a little sign, which you could miss it to ask the third base umpire for help. Jim Wolf really points go ahead, tell me what you saw.
— It'll be a 2-2 to Cabrera and the pitch low kind of boxed by Mirabelli, rolled away, but no advance, so the count 3 and 2 and you know who's on deck, Johnny Damon. I think it might be a mis... ah sh... the Yankees ask Damon to get another hit, but he has had a great day at Fenway Park. It'll be a 3-2 to Cabrera. Bernie leaves off second with two outs. He has to play it safe of course. Now the stretch and here's the 3-2. High. Ball four. So Cabrera is on. First walk given up by Tavarez. Now here is Damon, who in the nightcap has singled, singled to knock in a run, hit a two-run home run. And in the opener he was three for six, so the homer made four RBIs. So he is 6 for 9 with 2 homers and 7 RBIs. Well, wouldn't you like to ask these Boston fans booing, what do you think of Damon as a ballplayer?
— Well, they love him. That's why they're booing.
— Right. Just have... just have a Yankee uniform on, that's all.
Pitch is a strike. A fastball, the count 0 and 1.
— Um hum.
— Bernie Williams off second and Melky Cabrera off first. Now the 0-1 uh, strike, half swing. Called a strike by the home plate pire... the home plate umpire Jim Wolf and the count 0 and 2.
— I kind of feel that the other part of that, John, is that Coco Crisp has not been as advertised, he is not ha... having a good year for him here.
— They, they should've offered Damon more money. He would've stayed.
— That's exactly right.
— So it's their fault.
— Yup.
— It'll be an 0-2 to Damon. And Tavarez deals outside. And the count 1 and 2.
— You know, Joe was asked by one of the Boston writers between Da... games how Damon fits into the clubhouse, was he everything he expected and he said I expected everything as a ballplayer, but his demeanor in the clubhouse, his personality is so great for this team, he keeps everybody loose all the time even in the in the worst losing streaks they've had. He comes in and he's always smiling...
— It'll be a 1-2. Outside 2 and 2.
—...and that's very important, uh, this Yankee clubhouse, as you know, is pretty corporate, pretty buttoned-up and sometimes you need a personality like Damon, just loosen things up a little bit.
— Runners lead off of first and second. It'll be a 2-2 to Damon. He struck him out swinging. No runs, one hit, and two left. And now at the end of four and a half innings of play, the ballgame is tied at 7 on the Yanks Radio Network.
I'll never forget my wedding day. My car ran into a ditch because I didn't get my brakes checked.
Don't let this happen to you. Come into Meineke for our oil change special and receive a filter and five quarts of oil, a tire rotation, a balance check and a brake check for only $19.95.
This is George Foreman. For your wedding day or any day come into Meineke.
Now for most cars and light trucks at participating Meineke locations. Disposal fee and shop supplies may be extra. Ask store managers for details. Offer ends August 13th, 2006. Visit Meineke car care center for all your car care needs.
Ah, uh, guys?
Yeah.
I don't feel so good.
Oh.
Oh you're looking a tad green for a raccoon.
Yeah, you look like a tree frog.
I think it might be the taca rico burlito I ate.
You ate a what?
A taca rico burlito.
Why?
It was cheap.
Oh, you're paying for it now.
Yeah, in spades. Ohhhhh.
Look. I believe his stomach's growing.
Oh, that's gotta hurt.
Why eat junk at night when you can go to Wendy's? We make everything fresh right when you order. Like our new 99 cent crispy chicken sandwich. That's right. All white meat chicken for just 99 cents.
Ohhhhh.
Oh, Why didn't you just go to Wendy's?
Yeah, they make everything fresh.
What can I say? I'm weak. Weak and green.
Not a good combination.
No.
Heh heh heh heh heh.
Make it a Wendy's night and do what tastes right 'til one a.m. or later. Prices and participation may vary. Bacon and cheddar lovers cheesburger combo with any of seven delicious sides at no extra cost. Choose any side order, one of two sides of salad, with the old standby French fries. Don't compromise. Customize. Wendy's. Do what tastes right. Wendy's take out windows are open 'til one a.m. or later.
—Well, we go to the bottom of the fifth. And, this ballgame, as we get to the halfway point is now two hours and thirteen minutes old. And here's Coco Crisp to lead it off. 7, 10 and 1 Yanks. 7, 10 and 0 Boston. Ron Villone in relief of Ponson deals high to Crisp who turns around to bat from the right side. Here's Sam Gordon. We can ask him all of our questions. We'll get a lot of great answers from Sam Gordon of the Daily News and the Daily News Special.
—Sam, are you ready?
—You think that I'm that awake, John, that I am really able to be sharp and on top of things after a after a day, a day like this?
—The 1-0. Outside. Well, you know you're gonna write all this in tomorrow's Daily News. It's a night that Johnny Damon will never forget for the rest of his life.
—Uh, there's there's no doubt about it, I mean, he says that it's not a big deal about how he does against his former team and that he's kind of over that, but you look at the way he reacts and the way that he's coming up big for the Yankees tonight and you know that's just not true.
—The 2-0. Strike. He's human. Of course he feels that way. He's not gonna say it, but of course he feels this way. And they keep booing him.
—Heh heh heh heh heh. Who are they kidding?
—Whoa, no kidding and he, eh, I'm sure he welcomes the the boos at this point, I mean, he's having a terrific night, uh, and you know, not just, uh, at the plate too. He made a great play in the field and in, uh, Game 1 that, you know, uh, kept the Red Sox at bay and let the Yankees, uh, break it open shortly thereafter.
—The 2-1 is low to Crisp and the count, 3 and 1.
—You know what else, Sam, he also knows what his replacement has done and that Coco's having a very hard time here. The fans have been booing him. He's not doing at all the job that he would ever wish bad for anybody. I've got a question for you. Does Sidney Ponson get another start?
   — There's the 3-1. Outside, ball 4. Isn't that interesting? You know what I was gonna ask him?
   — What?
   — If Rudy pitches well again, when Lidle comes back for a start on Monday do they do they say goodbye to Ponson?
   — Well, why, eh, I'm gonna lead more towards Johnny Damon. I was actually, uh, gonna answer by saying I'm not sure if he can get another appearance, let alone another start. Uh, you know, obviously he's not gonna be helpful for them for the next few days cause he pitched today. So I think that, uh, the scenario, John, you just mentioned is very realistic. I don't really see, uh, the Yankees keeping him around as a, a long reliever. I mean, they could certainly use anybody else, uh, in that role. He just hasn't been effective, I mean, I think that, uh, you know, tonight was just the latest example. He just does not have it.
   — Here's Doug Mirabelli and the throw to first base by Fasano and Crisp is back. So Crisp walks, the first walk off Villone. Mirabelli is 0 for 2 and he has a count of 1 and 0. We're tied at 7 in the bottom of the fifth.
   — You know, the worst part of that is that it just doesn't effect tonight's game. Villone -- this is his fourth day in a row -- and you have to believe that he's going not to be available tomorrow, maybe even the next day...
   — Right.
   — ...I mean, this is a lot of pitches for him and so Ponson's bad outing tonight, you know...
   — Right.
   — ...could end up costing the Yankees this game but also, you know, the next one and the one after that as well.
   — A throw to first base. Well, Suzyn, why don't you tell Sam what, uh, Villone told you?
   — Villone told me that I asked him because we were kidding about him pitching every day, and don't you have to warm up and he said, I said, he knows when he wakes up in the morning whether he can pitch or not. He doesn't need to warm up and, um, and I said, well, would you ever say you can't pitch if Joe asked you cause... and he said no, yeah, I actually would if I couldn't because I wouldn't do anybody any good if I came in and I couldn't. But it hasn't happened yet. He hasn't said no yet all year.
   — The 1-0 is high. So Fasano trots out to talk to Villone.
   — Yeah, I mean that...
   — No go ahead...
   — ...I was gonna uh, yeah, you know that's, that's pretty common, ah, you know, it seems like there's rarely a pitcher who would admit that he couldn't pitch and Villone is a real tough, blue collar kind of guy, you know, who will always want to take the ball, you know, he remembers early in the year when he felt like he wasn't being used at all... enough. It's kind of hard to fathom that concept now the way he's been used the last month or so, but, you know, I remember at the start of the year this is a guy that barely got into the games at all when they counted. So you know, I think that, uh, he's a veteran. He knows what his body is capable of, what, you know, whatever he says, the workload he's gotten over the last four days is... is excessive.
   — Excessive.
   — It'll be a 2-0 to Mirabelli. High. 3 and 0. So Villone who walked Crisp is behind 3 and 0. Yankees have started their bullpen. That's Brian Bruney, the right-hander. And Villone is showing signs of fatigue here. I don't blame him. And he's behind Mirabelli 3 and 0. Well, you have to, Sam, earn Joe's trust. There'll be a 3-0. There's a strike. Let's put it this way: he's earned Joe's trust.

— Oh, no doubt about it, I mean, he almost, uh, very nearly had a double play ball in the last inning there and, you know, that would've been huge obviously. You know, and Villone is a key piece, you know, and that's why, you know, it hurts Joe to bring him in, you know, to the middle of games like this cause they love to have him in the seventh, you know, in the big spot uh, so he doesn't, but there really was just no other choice at this point.

— It'll be a 3-1 to the right-hand hitting Mirabelli. Crisp leads off first. The pitch is grounded to deep third and hit the bag and turned over the bag and toward left field. On his way to third is Crisp. He'll stop there. Mirabelli holds at first with a single. A ground ball that was going over third and it hit the bag and it carried over A-Rod's head. So the Red Sox have a great chance to take the lead. They have first and third and no one out and here is Alex Cora.

— You know, while we're waiting here, Sam, I've gotta ask you something about what Joe said in between games about Chien-Ming Wang, which struck me, which puzzled me a little bit. Now we noticed that he wasn't using his finger, that he was using mostly sliders and Joe, Joe had said that, uh, uh, uh, he didn't have good he didn't have his good stuff. That's three starts in a row that he hasn't had good stuff. And then he started talking about we're in uncharted waters with him as much as as pitches thrown and pitch count. Do you think in the back of their mind they're a little bit worried about Wang, ph... physically?

— Yeah. I mean, I, I think they have be. Uh, I think that it, eh, what, you know, what Joe said, like you guys have said and we've all, all, all are well aware, you know, that this is a kid who hasn't pitched that many innings in his career. Uh, he's being asked to do more than he's done in the past and, uh, that has to be a concern. I mean, this, this is a guy... let's not forget that missed two months last year with a shoulder injury, so to expect that he'd be able to make it through a whole season throwing more innings than he's ever thrown in his life, without an issue, I think, might have been a little bit unrealistic.

— The pitch to Cora is inside, 1 and 0. First and third, no one out, bottom of the fifth, the game is tied at 7, but Boston could take the lead with almost anything, almost anything.

— Well he, he could, actually, be going through, you know, you've you've heard guys going through dead arm periods around this time of year and I think that's... I think that's just waiting for him to come out of it, don't you?

— Well, that's what I was gonna say. It doesn't necessarily mean that...

— ...anything wrong...

— ...that he has something's debilitative, right.

— Here's the 1-0. There's a strike, count 1 and 1.

— ...but, I mean, you look at it and... and the number of innings that he's thrown in years past, he might not have even thrown enough to get to a dead arm period, you know what I mean? So this is, uh, like like you say, uncharted waters and clearly he's gonna have some issues with, uh, you know, the, uh, uh, higher workload. So I don't think it's unexpected. I think that the Yankees are concerned because they don't know exactly how, how, you know, a young player like he is is gonna react.

— Villone's 1-1 is low and the count 2 and 1. Cora has walked and singled and scored two runs. Cora is a a Punch and Judy, isn't it? But he's had some great games against the Yankees this year. Every time he plays he does something that works for Boston. The Yankees playing the infield back. They will look for two, though, gotta get a quick double play to double up the speedy Cora. Crisp off third. Mirabelli on first. Tied at 7. Bottom of the fifth. Now the 2-1. Swung on and lined to right field. There's a base hit. Scoring is Crisp. Mirabelli holds at second. It's a base hit and an RBI for Alex Cora. Boston takes an 8-7 lead and that will be all for Ron Villone, who is gassed. He has done as much as he can. He just ran out of steam. So Joe comes to the mound. We'll till he takes the ball to make sure he's taking him out. He is taking him out.

— And this pitching change is sponsored by the Tri-State Quality Ford Store. Check out the best selling Ford Explorer at your Tri-State Quality Ford dealer.

Every year we load up the kids and do a road trip. Our first stop? CITGO. While I'm fillin' up, the wife and kids go inside for all the necessary provisions, you know, cookies, candy, stuff like that. To us CITGO is like the trading post where the pioneers would go to stock up for when they hit the trail. Only with indoor restrooms. Every day over ten million Americans begin their journey with a stop at CITGO, for a good deal on good fuel and everything else they need to keep moving.

Dear Scott, It was great seeing you outside Tipper Pass. I love your new haircut. Your stylist obviously gave you good advice. You seem more confident. Look, I'd like to see you again. See, I only dumped you once you stopped going to Super Cuts. You looked uglier, like a rodeo clown. With mange. And it became too easy to make fun of the way you breathe and that stupid laugh. But now that you're hot, I love you tons. Super Cuts. Every time.

— Well, the youngster just brought up from Columbus property. Used used to be property of the Arizona Diamondbacks, Brian Bruney, and, uh, he pitched the other day -- he's been in one game -- one inning, one walk, and three strikeouts. He throws hard, had some problems in Arizona. While he's warming up Sam, uh, before the game, you know, when Joe was talking about the bullpen, one of the reasons they brought up T.J. Beam was because Joe, at least hinted at the fact, that Villone was not available and Dotel was not available... and and and Villone was in anyway.

— Eh eh eh, it goes to show you exactly how strapped their bullpen is, which is kind of amazing when you consider they have 13 pitchers on the staff right now and they're playing with a three-man bench and yet we're in a situation now where they had to use a guy that, you know, is pitching for the fourth day in a row, threw forty-something pitches yesterday and now thirty-something pitches today. I mean, as as durable and tough as Villone is, that's a little much for anybody, I think.

— A run in. Two on. No one out. Bruney deals, Youkilis takes low inside. It's an 8-7 ballgame, Boston. Oh, I think the Yankees kind of suspected this would happen, that's why winning the first game was a big game.

— Absolutely and you you can tell, I mean, they they used, uh, Joe used, uh, you know, all the good relievers, Myers, Proctor, the guys he trusts and and make sure they won that first game before they blow it out.

— Youkilis takes a breaking ball strike from Bruney. Bruney came in for an inning, now it was a throwaway game. It was 12... whatever, it was 12-2. But he threw very well against Baltimore and the Yankees thought, you know, basically, this guy throws pretty hard. So they bring him in here, two on, no one out. The 1-1. Youkilis hits a ground ball to third. Backhanded by A-Rod. The long throw is in time. A long throw by A-Rod from the foul line and the runners move up to second and third. So Boston has a great chance to add to their lead. They have second and third and one out and here is Mark Loretta who has struck out, doubled and singled. One more thing for Sam: um, some thoughts on, uh, I mean the guy has had a phenomenal double header, Bobby Abreu.

— Yeah, he's clearly not at all, uh, bothered by the the rivalry or the pressures of the rivalry. You know, he's a pretty laid back guy. I mean, he, you can kind of tell looking at him that not a whole lot bothers him to begin with.

— Pitch. Loretta takes low.

— You know, he was talking after the game. You know, hey, I've been in some rivalry games, Mets, uh, Mets Phillies, Philles Braves, that sort of thing and, you know, most players will say there's a big difference between the intensity, uh, but, you know, these games here or in those kinds of games there but, for sure didn't look like he was bothered by any of it and I think that's exactly what the Yankees are looking for, somebody who's calm under pressure...

— The 1-0 to Loretta is swung on and lined toward left center. It's a base hit. Two runs will score. Damon throws it in. It's a two-run single for Loretta and Boston takes a 10-7 lead.

— ...and and when Mark Loretta had to face Brian Bruney in the National League, he was one for three off him in the National League when, uh, Brian pitched for Arizona. And now he's two for four off him. You know, something, I know Bobby Abreu's had a great afternoon. How about Mark Loretta?

— Unbelievable.

— He is 6 for 9. I'll tell you another guy who's had a great day is Manny Ramírez. He goes up sees one pitch. Bang! Base hit.

— And that and that home run was the, uh, gift pitch don't forget too.

— Right. Thank you Sam.

— My pleasure.

— Gift pitch. I like that.

— You're welcome anytime. David Ortiz takes outside. So Boston scores three more. Boston's scored in every inning 1-3, 1-2, 1-3 and they have a 10-7 lead here in the bottom of the fifth. Ortiz has doubled, struck out and had an RBI ground out, pops it foul back. And the count 1 and 1.

— Well, you know, you you touched on it a minute ago and Brian Bruney got a taste of American League yesterday. But this this is different. I don't care who you are, you come in your first time and you're in this park in the middle of Yankees Red Sox, totally sold out and you're facing David Ortiz.

— Here's the 1-1. Caught on a miss. Major League fastball up. Major League did I say? 96. And that was thrown in a great spot. Ortiz has more trouble with pitches up than he does down. Down he drops the bat head on it with that great power and hits it out into any part of the ballpark. It'll be a 1-2, high fastball 2 and 2.

— I was talking to Ron Guidry about Brian Bruney and I I think he's gonna get a a shot here. Um when he got injured, he always just threw hard stuff but it was his walk ratio... Ron Guidry told me that in the minor leagues he had 100 innings and 80 walks. Hard to pitch like that.

— Here's the 2-2. Pop foul back. So the count holds 2 and 2.

— When the Yankees acquired him after the Diamondbacks, um got rid of him, they signed him and they sent him down to Tampa to work with Gil Patterson who, uh, is a great pitching coach and is now down in Tampa working there. He was pitching coach at Columbus, pitching coach for the Blue Jays for a while a great pitcher by himself and worked out mechanics and Guidry said that Gil smoothed him out so that he's not just raring back and throwing now, that he's starting to pitch.

- The 2-2. Outside. 3 and 2.
- And that is something you have to teach young pitchers and Bruney's still in his early to mid-twenties. You got an arm like that, you try and smooth it out a little bit and refine it and that's what Gil Patterson did with Brian Bruney and they hope that works up here.
- It'll be a 3-2 to Big Papi. Pitch is fouled, tipped at home plate. Fasano bangs his hand into his mitt, angry that he didn't hang on. The runner Loretta was going. A baseball guy -- and I can't think who it was... I talked to so many people today -- couldn't believe that Arizona would release a guy with an arm like that. If you have an arm like that you can work with it.
- Oh, there must've been other things that we don't know. How could anybody release Bobby Jenks?
- Oh, that's true. And Andrew Sisco.
- Yep.
- Here's the payoff. Inside. Ball four. First walk given up by Bruney third by Yankee pitching and here is Manny Ramírez who in the second game has singled, doubled and singled and Suzyn, I don't think he's taken a pitch.
- I know... well, you don't really... Manny is, uh... can hit from anywhere. He got... he does have a great eye but he can hit on all four quadrants, he can hit high balls, he can hit them low. He sees a ball he likes and it's a fastball and he'll smack it. 3 for 3, two singles, a double, two RBIs and a run scored.
- 1 for 2 in the first game, a homer and an RBI. And takes a strike. Loretta at second Ortiz at first with only one out in the inning, the fifth, Boston's already scored three times. They've taken a 10-7 lead. Now, the 0-1. Just missed outside. The count 1 and 1.
- Manny got the 1500 RBI on August 3rd. Only the 45th player in major league history.
- Now, the 1-1 inside. The count 2 and 1.
- I would think, John, wouldn't you, that Joe Torre and Ron Guidry also want to see how Brian Bruney reacts in this kind of situation. New to the team, new to the league and right in the middle of Yankees Red Sox.
- Here he is, the second day on the job. And it'll be a 2-1 to Manny. He swings and misses a slider. And the count 2 and 2. There's a left-hand hitter Eric Hinske up on deck. But right now Bruney has a lot to worry about at home plate, Manny. Loretta at second, Ortiz at first. The 2-2. Hit on the ground to short, off Jeter's glove to left field. Loretta rounds third. Melky fires home. He's gonna be a dead duck. Another outfield assist for... they're going back to first. Manny is safe. Melky Cabrera guns down another runner. I think he must lead in outfield assists and Melky has such a good arm. Wow! It was a hot shot off Jeter's glove to left. Cabrera came up throwing and I mean, and Loretta was a dead duck. He never got to home plate. Fasano blocked the plate. Fasano had the ball waiting for him. So, give Ramirez another base hit to left and Loretta is out 7-2. Ortiz went to second. Two on, two out, here's Eric Hinske. And the pitch is fouled away, third base side.
- And one of the best things about that play was, Melky threw the ball, it was right on target, almost on the plate. And that's what, uh, Lee Mazzilli works with when he works with an outfielder. Ya throw the ball so that it's not high so it... so that... they way Fasano's throwing to second. So it's on the plate, so the runner has to go into your glove.
The pitch is low. Well that was such a great throw by Melky. You can see that right in front of you. And Fasano was able to catch it and he was waiting and he dropped down -- Fasano did -- in front of home plate and Loretta had not where to go, I mean, he never got to home plate. Here's the 1-1. Fastball high and tight, count 2 and 1.

And all these people that are throwing now, in a way when Posada plays, when he throws to second base now it's on the ground so that you don't have to move the glove. That's what Melky did. On the ground. Fasano didn't even have to move.

That was a great throw. I don't know how many assists he has -- 11 or 12 -- but he is amazing. The 2-1 high, 3 and 1.

He's got 12...

... says Carlos Silva.

And he would know.

Our prolific producer and engineer. It'll be a 3-1. The pitch cut on and missed. He threw the fastball by him, the count 3 and 2.

That's a 96 mile an hour fastball. Good spot. 96 miles an hour.

Ortiz off second and Ramirez off first. Manny 4 for 4 in the nightcap. The pitch fouled back. Do you know that Ortiz snuck out to steal third and Manny behind him. Amazing.

Heh heh heh...

Ortiz is very very popular and as he slowed down, he just grabbed A-Rod around the waist and then circled around him and headed back towards second. 3 runs are in in the bottom of the fifth. There are two outs. It'll be a 3-2 to Hinske, 0 for 3 in the nightcap. And Bruney deals fouled back. So the count 3 and 2. And Ortiz... they're running 3 and 2... I kind of missed that. And Ortiz is doing the same thing with A-Rod.

Heh heh heh heh. He has such a good time playing. These two play their own game, don't they? Ortiz and Manny?

When you're talented...

...yes. And when you produce at every turn.

So again they'll be off on the 3-2 pitch. Now the payoff grounded foul. Hah hah hah hah hah hah. And Ortiz did the same thing. He's running -- they have to run 3-2, two out -- and he gets to A-Rod and he stops and he uses A-Rod to change his momentum to go back the other way. Puts his arm around his waist, circles around him...

Hah hah hah hah hah...

Once again, it'll be a 3-2. High ball 4, they're loaded up. So bases loaded, two outs. And here is Wily Mo Peña. Now, not to get overly dramatic, but this, to this point, could be the most important batter in the game. Yankees are only down by three in this ballpark, please but a base hit by Peña, it'd be a five run lead and an extra base hit for Boston to blow it open. Bruney deals. Peña takes a strike and the count 0 and 1.

And no movement at all in the Yankee pen. They're gonna see if Bruney can get through this.

The 0-1, cut on and missed with a fastball clocked at 95 up. I like the fact that he throws high fastballs.

Um hum.

Something in on top of that. I mean, you throw that hard. It'll be an 0-2 to Peña. High curve fastball and the count 1 and 2. It'll be a 1-2 to Peña. Swung on, popped foul, first base side, out of play. You know, in this inning, this is what Boston's done: against Villone, walk, single, single. And against Bruney, ground out singled, walked, singled, walked. That's a lot of base runners, but one of the outs came when Melky threw out Loretta. Pitch. He struck him out, swing, slider, down and away. Boston takes the lead. They get three runs on four hits and leave three. And now at the end of five innings of play, it’s 10-7 Boston on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

Jeep announces the return of employee pricing plus. Now everybody can save by getting our employee price. Plus get huge cash allowances of up to $2000 or 0 percent APR financing for well-qualified buyers on most 2006 Jeep vehicles. Plus, qualified buyers get an additional thousand dollars bonus cash on a Grand Cherokee Commander when you finance through Chrysler financial. Save on Jeep Grand Cherokee with a five-star government crash test rating. Save on America’s original 4x4, Jeep Wrangler. Get our employee price on Jeep Liberty with the government’s highest side-impact crash test rating. Or the seven passenger Jeep Commander. Now’s the best time to save on America’s most award-winning line of 4x4’s. Get all the info at askdrz.com. See your Jeep dealer today. Save with employee pricing plus. Hurry, offers end August 31st. $500-2000 cash allowance depending on models. 0 percent APR excludes Wrangler. Based on major US national auto publications 1982 to 2005. Not all buyers will qualify. See Jeep for details. Jeep and Chevy are registered trademarks of Daimler-Chrysler.

Today we have Leon Carter, sports editor of The Daily News in the studio. Leon, what’s your lineup for the All-stars?

Well, I got Mike Lupica leading off, John Pauperson, Dick Siegel and Bill Madden in cleanup. In the bottom of the lineup is the strongest and tough with Lisa Olsen, Anthony McCarron, Peter Botti, Adam Ruben and Philip Bondy. And of course, our DH Phil Gallo always gets a hit. That’s some lineup. It’s our All-star sports writing team. That’s why the Daily News keeps getting voted the number one sports section in New York.

Sounds like you’ve got a lot to celebrate.

And we are celebrating by we giving four free Yankee tickets when you sign up for the Daily News now for just $1.99 a week. You get the Daily News delivered to your home seven days a week and you get the best sports writing team in town. And you also get four free Yankees tickets. How do I sign up? Just call 1 800 531 1367.

And I get four free Yankee tickets?

If you call now. That’s 1 800 531 1367.

Cannot be combined with any other offer.

Yankees highlights are just the beginning. Sports at fifteen and forty-five past the hour on WCBS.

— We got to the, um, top of the sixth. Julian Tavarez has a three-run lead and faces Jeter who takes a breaking ball, strike.

— Time now for the injury report, sponsored by the Napoli Bern Ripka, the voice of experience in personal injury law. Call 888 LAW IN NY.

— Here’s the 0-1 from Tavarez. And Jeter hits a hot shot to second grabbed by Loretta. Throws to first. One away.

— Yankees have placed twelve players on the DL, thirteen times in 2006. Besides, uh, Cairo, Posano, Matsui, Sturtze, Sheffield and Razner, who are on there now, also Aaron Small, Sean Chacon, Bubba Crosby, Robi Cano and Octavio Dotel.

— There’s Bobby Abreu, who is two for three on the day in the second game, he was four for five the first game. So he and Damon have had great, great days as have had Manny Ramirez. And there’s the pitch Abreu takes a strike. In the second game Abreu has flipped out, doubled and singled, he’s knocked in two. Now, Tavarez comes set. Here’s the 0-1. Fastball. High, outside and the count 1 and 1. Abreu has provided vital signs, the vital signs sponsored by Amino Vital, the official amino acid sports supplement drink of the New York Yankees. Now Tavarez holds his hands just above the belt. And the 1-1 fouled back. In the double header, Abreu is now six for eight with a walk. No, he certainly has given the Yanks vital signs. Craig Hansen is starting to warm in the Boston bull pen.

— And it's still, amazing, every time you think of how seamlessly Bobby Abreu has made the transition into this clubhouse and into this lineup. New league, new team.

— It'll be a 1-2 to Abreu. He struck him out swinging, two away.

— Eh, you know what else, John? I keep thinking about, uh, all the time people were saying, we heard people writing in the press, well you don't need to go get a big, um, right fielder or big a slugger or big a player, whatever, because when Matsui and Sheffield come back, as if they were coming back tomorrow, and the longer this goes on and the less likely it looks like either one of them are gonna be back.

— And and that notwithstanding, they have Abreu. He's such a terrific player. I mean, Joe loves him. He's such a terrific player in every way, he does everything right. He fits seamlessly into this lineup. They have him.

— Yep.

— Ah, he's only 31 or 32. He'll be a Yankee for several years.

— Here's A-Rod with two outs. And takes a breaking ball, strike. Alex has walked, popped up and singled. 2 for 5 with two RBIs in the first game.

— And Tavarez, who generally has a terrible time with the strike zone has certainly found it in the sixth inning.

— Yeah, he has pitched really well, he's gone two and a third. The pitch there's a strike and the count 0 and 2. Well if you had asked any Yankee or Joe Torre, would they take 19 runs and 26 hits in two games, they'd say yes. They didn't know they were gonna have the pitching problems in the second game, but maybe they did.

— Well maybe if you were playing a different team too it would stand up.

— There'll be an 0-2 to A-Rod. And a little ground ball towards second. Loretta fields and throws out Alex and that'll do it. 1-2-3 go the Yanks in the sixth. At the end of five and a half, it's 10-7 Boston on the Yanks Radio Network.

Baseball players sure do a lot of waiting. Waiting for their turn at bat, waiting for someone to hit it to center field, waiting for the pitcher and the catcher to finish talking about whatever they're talking about. They wait so much we think they must like it. I mean, what is wrong with these people? At UPS, we know our customers hate waiting so we've made our ground shipping faster than ever. In many cases, we can deliver in under 48 hours. If you like waiting, well, there's baseball. Or those other shipping companies. UPS. What can brown do for you?

Real men of genius.

Today we salute you, Mr. Enormous SUV Driver. Your mammoth machine strikes the perfect balance between the towing capacity of a tractor-trailer and the sleek styling of a tractor-trailer.

Keep on truckin'.

You've got a tough choice to make: fill up the tank or relieve the national debt.

Fill 'er up.

So truck on home and grab a Bud Lite, Enormous SUV Guy.

Mr. Enormous Driver.

Hey fans, it's Yankees time again. Perfect time to pick up Black Bear beef franks at ShopRite. Black Bear beef franks deliver the snap and taste New Yorkers appreciate. So if you love franks with your Yankee baseball, pick up Black Bear beef franks at your favorite ShopRite.
— Let's take ten seconds for station ID on the New York Yankees Radio Network.
Yankees on 880. News on WCBS880.com. On air and online. We've got you covered. WCBS, New York.
— Now we go to the bottom of the sixth inning, Boston has a 10-7 lead and Brian Bruney is out there to pitch another inning. And he has to pitch well if the Yanks are to have a chance to come back. They're down by 3. That certainly is doable but...
— Scoreboard update sponsored by Foxwoods Resorts Casino, the wonder of it all in Mystic Country, Connecticut. Four finals in the American League... –

— Coco Crisp leads off and takes a strike.
— ...Kansas City beat Oakland 7 to 1. Luke Hudson with the win, Joe Blanton with the loss. Baltimore with a 7 to 2 victory over Toronto. Chris Benson with the win, Scott Downes with the loss. Texas with a 2 to 1 victory over Detroit. Kevin Millwood goes to 12 innings and Zach Miner takes the loss. He is 7 and 4 — Crisp take the pitch outside. Coco, batting left-handed against the right-hander Bruney, is 1 for 2 with a walk. He reached on an error as well. He's been on-base all three times.
— Tampa Bay has defeated Cleveland 6 to 5.
— Now the right-hander Bruney is set. Here's the 1-1. Cut on a miss. 2 and 5 and the count 1 and 2.
— They're going to the top of the ninth at the Metrodome. The Twins lead the White Sox 7 to 3. These are big games by the White Sox. Twins in Detroit for the last two weeks. And in the second game, 1 to 1, Oakland and Kansas City -- they're at Kansas City -- they're in the top of the eighth.
— Crisp hits a pop foul, third base side, it'll make the seats.
— Just underway Angels and Mariners. Angels scored one in the bottom of the first. They lead 1 to nothing, that's Jared Weaver. In the National League, all finals, St. Louis beat Chicago 11 to 3. Jason Marquis with the win, Carlos Marmol with the loss. Washington over the Phillies 6 to 4. Mets beat Colorado 6 to 3...
— The pitch to Crisp is cut on and missed. So Bruney strikes out Crisp, 1 away.
— ...Steve Trachsel goes to 12 and 5 with the victory. Byung-Hyun Kim takes the loss, he is 7 and 8. A 7 to 3 victory Pirates over Cincinnati. Ian Snell with the win, Chris Michalik with the loss. Uh-huh. Excuse me. Atlanta with a 6 to 1 win over Florida. Tim Hudson beat Scott Olsen.
— Now one away, here's Doug Mirl... Mirabelli. He is 1 for 3. A right-hand hitter. And Bruney deals and there's a strike on the outside corner.
— They're going to the bottom of the ninth in Milwaukee, all tied up 2 apiece. Milwaukee got their runs, one in the first, one in the fourth. Houston scored two in the second inning. San Diego leads Arizona in the third 3 to nothing.
— The 0-1 is low, outside.
— And the Dodgers are leading San Francisco 1 to nothing. They're in the bottom of the second inning in San Francisco.
— It'll be a 1-1 to Mirabelli as this game is about to hit three hours.
— Already?
— Pitch. There's a breaking ball strike.
And the fine columnist from the Daily News Bill Madden has come to our booth to impart his wisdom on this thirteen hour day so far in the ballpark.

He hasn't speeded up this game any, though.

Heh heh heh.

It'll be a 1-2 to Mirabelli. The pitch is grounded foul. Um you wanna give our fans a hint of mad mad mad mad mad world on Sunday? It is a mad mad mad mad world but...

Mad mad world. Well, um we got a lot about the Dodgers. Ned Colletti's done a remarkable job over there and, um, the National League...

Here's the 1-2. Caught on a miss and Bruney has... deserves a look because he can throw. That was clocked at 97. So you're gonna do a little bit on the Dodgers, then?

Yeah.

OK.

Hmmm... Tomorrow? I think we're all writing opuses for tomorrow.

Heh heh heh ah hum.

Now two away and here's Alex Cora.

Is there anybody at the paper? You're all here.

Heh. Oh yeah, we have the entire sports department up here covering this series.

The pitch to Cora is a strike and the count 0 and 1.

Like a blanket, they say.

Cora, who has good games against the Yanks, has walked and singled twice. The 0-1 is inside and the count 1 and 1. Two outs, no one on, bottom of the sixth, Boston with a 10-7 lead. Yankees won the opener 12-4. And Bruney's 1-1 is lined foul, down the right field line.

Well, and what we've seen of Brian Bruney, and obviously two innings isn't a whole lot, but he looks like he is more in control wh... when Ron Guidry was telling me about him going down and working with Gil Patterson you know, that gives you hope because Gil Patterson is a... is as good with mechanics as anybody around.

It'll be a 1-2 to Cora. And the fastball is high, the count is 2 and 2.

Because it certainly doesn't matter if you're throwing 97 miles an hour, the thing is if your minor league totals is 100 innings and 80 walks that, uh, doesn't matter if it's 97 if it's out of the zone.

Now the 2-2 fouled back. Craig Hanson is warming up, so he probably is coming in in the seventh. The Yankees have Cano, Wilson and Bernie Williams as the first three hitters due. Now the right-hander is set. It'll be a 2-2 to Cora. That's fouled off, so the count holds 2 and 2. A lot of pitches, a lot of runs.

Well, if Bruney hits Cora here, it'll be the first inning all night that the Red Sox have not scored.

Right. And also it'd be a 1-2-3 inning. Amazing. The pitch just missed inside and so the count 3 and 2.

Well he's throwing a lot of pitches also. Brian Bruney's next pitch will be his 50th. Yankees had a... a 5-1 lead in the second, two outs and a runner on and Ponson walked Alex Cora -- The 3-2 fouled away -- and, boy, was that a mistake because Youkilis followed with an RBI and Loretta followed with a two-run double and all of a sudden it was 5-4. It was a ballgame again.

Hey Bill Madden, Bill... quick question for you, yes or no. When Cory Lidle comes back does Sidney Ponson find himself out of work?

Well, you know, I I was tr...
Pitch to Cora, swung on, a little pop fly to shallow center. Damon coming on, coming on. It drops in for a base hit. So, a little bloop single for Cora... Yes, Bill?

I wonder if there's ever been a double header in which pitchers from both teams got released after the games they pitched?

Heh heh.

Situations where pitchers were sent to the minors, you know, they were up for one start but we may have a case here of two veteran pitchers getting released who have held onto their clubs just for the purpose of this double header.

Well it's possible because someone has to go when Lidle comes back and Bruney has showed he has a pretty good arm.

And also Ponson is not gonna be able to pitch, he's not going to be any good to you for Saturday and Sunday and Lidle's back on Monday.

Now here's the top of the order, Kevin Youkilis, a right-hand hitter. And the pitch is low. Youkilis is two for four on the night. Now Mike Myers is up in the Yankees bullpen. And if you're thinking ahead, you're right. He's there for Ortiz. Joe's trying to keep the game close trying, in case the Yankees have another rally in them. Here is the 1-0. It's low outside 2 and 0. Now the right-hander is set. It'll be a 2-0 to Youkilis and there's a strike. Youkilis takes a lot of pitches.

Uh hmm.

But Cora has... looks like a brilliant move by Terry Francona. He played Cora for Gonzalez in the second game and Cora has three hits and a walk. Now the 2-1. Runner goes, eh, no throw by Fasano. He... he lost the ball coming out of the glove. I think he had a great jump anyway, so the count 3 and 1.

Yeah, Cora was off an running as Bruney went into his windup. He's not particularly quick to the plate either. And Cora was going as he started into that windup and he... You know, the Yankees starting pitchers, none of them are very quick to the plate. Bruney no different very slow, deliberate.

Now Youkilis backs out.

Kevin Youkilis, nicknamed the Greek God of Walks.

And he's one pitch away from another walk. Cora dancing off second is bothering Bruney so Bruney steps off. Here's the 3-1 and it's low, so Youkilis walks so there's two on and two out.

And here comes Joe Torre. Now I was just watching it. Mike Myers was up in in deeper, but he just got up. So let's see if he makes the uh, I see the door opening so I guess that is Mike Myers gonna come in right now so the pitching change is sponsored by Foxwoods Resorts Casio. The wonder of it all in Mystic Country Connecticut.

People are constantly trying to get your attention. And sometimes that can be done with a single voice.

Dah dah dah dah. You might pay more attention if more voices were raised in unison. Dah dah dah dah.

That's because more often people tell you something, the more likely you are to remember it.

Dah dah dah dah dah. Dah dah dah dah dah dah dah.

So, if I am the only one...

Dah dah dah dah.

...to tell you that no gasoline was rated higher in quality than AMOCO you might be impressed. But chances are, if I told you that drivers in annual surveys across the nation rated AMOCO fuels number one in quality...

Dah dah dah dah dah.
...you'd really be impressed. And that's what happened year after year. AMOCO fuels are rated number one.
Dah dah dah dah dah.
So now, you don't just have to take my word for it.
Dah dah dah dah dah.
You can take theirs as well. When it comes to high quality gasoline, go with AMOCO fuels at BP.
—Well, Mike Myers is in. A batter, uh, earlier than one would think, uh, but he'll face Mark Loretta and then Big Papi. Mike Myers came in a third of an inning and got uh, David Ortiz in the first game, but, but... and now Joe Torre has no no choice here. You can't... you've gotta keep this game within reach and the last thing that, uh... you know, Joe Torre would rather see a hit than walking somebody. When he walked Youkilis, that was enough for Brian Bruney. And Brian Bruney threw 56 pitches. Now that's a lot for a couple of innings so... So Mike Myers will come in and face Mark Loretta, probably not a match up that, uh, he is very used to. Mike Myers with the fastball and the slider on deception, but when you have the right-hand batter, the deception goes out the window. And then it becomes a matter of, uh, timing the pitch which will be coming in and you can really see it if you're the right-handed batter. If you're standing on the right-handed, uh, side of that batter's box, you can see what Mike Myers is throwing and he doesn't hit 80. And the last time, uh, the last, uh, game he didn't hit 76. In 42 games and ERA of 2.53, 21 and a third innings in 42 games. 20 hits, 6 walks, and 16 strikeouts. And he was gotten by the Yankees to face David Ortiz, righties or not his forte. But he probably said he could come in because this bullpen is really strapped today. So Loretta digs in and it's outside outside with a slider, came in at 68 miles an hour. Now, the count is 0... 1 and, uh, 1 and 0.
—Loretta has banged out three hits in each game. Um, he's had quite a a double header. Hmm... the pitch is a strike. The count 1 and 1. I just ran across Gordon Edes...
—Um hum.
—...of the Boston Globe. He says, amazing, the Yankees and the Red Sox in a double header. One team pitches Jason Johnson, the other pitches Sidney Ponson.
—Hah hah. I guess that's going to be the story line in the... in the New York papers and the D... and the Boston papers.
—You'd better believe it.
—Isn't that somethin'?
—The 1-1 upside and the count 2 and 1.
—You know it really is amazing that the dearth of pitching in this league that this is what, uh, this is what the Yankees Red Sox is today in a double header. It's amazing.
—Now, Myers deals and it's grounded foul outside of third and the count 2 and 2. Very rarely has Myers ever called in to face a right-hand hitter but I guess they figured that Bruney had exhausted himself.
—Well, 56 pitches I would say. Oh, now he's unavailable now for uh, a while. 56 pitches is a lot.
—Especially when you haven't pitched that much, huh?
—Uh huh.
—Here's the 2-2 outside 3 and 2. David Ortiz on deck. Cora leads off second. Youkilis leads off first, two out bottom of the sixth. Myers deals swung on and lined to center. Damon toward right center, makes the catch and ends the inning. No runs, one hit, two left. And now, at the end of six innings of play, it's 10-7 Boston on the Yanks Radio Network.
When the Yanks aren't playing, leave your radio on 880 for news, sports, business, plus traffic and weather together.

During Ford's model year clearance, the possibilities are endless. Right now at your Tri-State Ford dealer, lease a 2006 Explorer Eddie Bauer Edition 4x4 for $279 a month. That's just $279 a month for 24 months, red carpet lease on the best selling SUV in America for 14 years straight. Security deposit waved. 2873 dealer's signing includes first month's payment, acquisition fee, and down payment. Excludes taxes, title, license and registration fee. Not all buyers will qualify. Take retail delivery from dealer's stock by 8/31/06. For details, see dealer or call 1 888 556 FORD. And just announced, get extended power training coverage for five years or 60,000 miles on every 2006 Ford vehicle at no extra charge. Explore Eddie Bauer Edition 4x4's for just $279 a month and extended power train coverage for five years or 60,000 miles on every 2006 Ford vehicle at no extra charge. Only during Ford's model year clearance. Ford. Bold moves.

AIG. For 85 years families have relied on AIG companies to help secure for their futures. For insurance, for loans, retirement. AIG. The strength to be there.

Think your ride out is just for music? No. WCBS Morning news to go. Check out the podcast link on our website to hear morning and evening newscasts. On WCBS weather to go. Even the inside scoop on the Yankees. Yankees rewind.

That ball is high!

Yankees news on demand. On your iPod, on your computer. WCBS880.com.

— Well, 22 year-old Craig Hanson, Red Sox first round pick last year, the pride of St. Johns University from Glen Cove, Long Island, is in for the Red Sox. 22 years old. I remember when he was, uh, drafted by the Red Sox and the Red Sox were thrilled, thrilled, I tell you, that the Yankees did not take him. They could've taken him and didn't want to and some of the scouts were saying, you know, this kid'll be in Fenway Park in September and he was last year. And maybe rushed a little bit this year, he could've used some seasoning. Number one pick last year out of St. Johns. He throws hard 90 to 97 miles an hour sinking fastball, slider, curve and a changeup.

— Oh here are the numbers on Brian Bruney: two innings, no runs, three hits, three strikeouts, three walks. And the numbers on Tavarez: two and a third, no runs, two hits, two strikeouts, no walks. He pitched very well for Boston. The Red Sox have a 10-7 lead, we're in the seventh. And Robbie Cano takes a pitch inside. Well, it's time for the Yankees Power Report brought to you by Indian Point Energy Center, the region's most reliable source of electric power. Johnny Damon has been the power for the Yankees. He has hit a home run in each ballgame. He now has 20 home runs on the year and 66 RBIs. Pitch, a strike from Hanson. You know, I think that ties his career high in home runs, 20.

— Mmmmm...

— Boston with a 10-7 lead in the nightcap, Yankees won the opener 12-4. The pitch to Cano is a strike.

— Eh, not that this is over by any shot. Yankees still have three more sh... shots at it. Craig Hanson has been very hittable, another one of the youngsters that had great, great talent, great, great promise, is being rushed because they really are strapped for pitching. Probably should spend... you know, you know, a year ago at this time or a little... more than a year ago, he was pitching for St. Johns.
Now the 1-2 is outside and the count 2 and 2. That fastball clocked at 96.

Last eight appearances -- been used a lot -- last eight appearances he's got an ERA of 8, 11 hits and 10 runs in nine innings.

Cano backs out. Robbie has doubled in three trips, knocked in a run. Now the right-hander deals ur... grounded foul. One thing, Suzyn, the Yankees didn't have problems with, was facing a pitcher they had never seen before. They had very few problems with Lester.

Right. That's right. Just... now he, um, you know he didn't... he doesn't... usually... usually they have trouble with, with the lefties that change speeds...

Right.

... and hits spots. He throws hard.

Right. I would agree with that. That's a good point. They have trouble with the off-speed pitchers. Here is the 2-2. Hit hard on the ground to short fielded by Cora who throws out Cano, one away.

This certainly is why if this game holds up like this, 10-7. Nothing stays in this ballpark for either team. But that's why it's so important when you -- it's so hard to win double headers -- and that's why it's so important to get the first game. Joe Torre was talking about that between games.

And that's also why teams do everything they can to avoid double headers.

Mmm hmmm.

Now Jason Giambi will hit for Craig Wilson and he'll go in and play first base. Wilson was 0 for 2 with a walk. The pitch to Jason is inside. Jason had a very good first game. He had 2 hits and 2 walks and knocked in two runs. The pitch, a high pop down on the left field line outside of play. We are coming to you live from the Loews broadcast booth let's build something together. We're in the top of the seventh, one out, no one on, the Yankees are trailing 10-7 in the nightcap which is what I need. The pitch is outside.

Twenty after eleven in the seventh inning, I don't think so.

Now the count 2 and 1 on Jason.

And the remainder of the weekend, tomorrow we might just stay here and start the game pretty soon. Josh Beckett and Randy Johnson.

Giambi takes outside, 3 and 1. Overshift is on. Well, I know both teams will say the same thing, both managers. You know, we want length out of our starters because our bullpens are exhausted. One thing odd about the Yanks... it'll be a 3-1 outside ball 4, Jason's on... one thing is, is odd, if the Yankees don't make a charge here, they probably won't use Farnsworth or Rivera. It's so odd being a closer. They have the greatest closer in the world, you never have to lead you never use him and in the first game why would you use him at 12-4, they didn't use either of them. But the Yankees gonna try to make a charge, they've got a runner on with one out. Here's Bernie and Posada is on deck to hit for Fasano. The Yankees have so many pitchers, but they only have three men on the bench, so they're using their bench right here. Bernie takes the strike. Bernie has walked, grounded out and doubled. So Giambi gets a one out walk. Now the right-hander Hanson deals 0-1 and the pitch is low. Hanson's a big fella. What is he about 6'4", 6'5"?

He is 6'6", 210. 22 years old.

Is he from the New York area?

From Glen Cove.

Oh! Very good! On our network we have stations that have never heard of Glen Cove. It's on the north...

Hah hah hah...
— ... shore of Long Island. It's a very lovely town. It'll be a 1-1. There's a strike and the count 1 and 2.
— And yeah, he was a Yankee fan growing up. This might be one that got away. Passed on by the Yankees, they drafted C.J. Henry instead and the Red Sox got Craig Hanson.
— The 1-2 a little tapper toward first and it is a fair ball or a a foul ball? A Foul ball.
— Well, you almost couldn't for a minute, cause Yo... uh, Hinske got the ball and stopped. Bernie stopped. And the umpire stopped. They were halfway up the line, the three of them.
— Well, he fielded it. His glove was on the foul side of the line. I didn't see any umpire make any notation that it was foul.
— But I mean, yeah, hmmm...
— Everybody's stopped. It'll be a 1-2 to Bernie. Now Hanson deals lined hard, base hit, right field. Giambi goes to second and holds on. So, there's another base hit for Bernie left-handed. I don't know how it's all gonna shake out Suzyn, and obviously you don't, no one does. I hope there's a spot for Bernie next year. He can still play. He gets a lot of hits.
— Well, I don't know why they're... I really don't know why there wouldn't be. A switch hitting outfielder. He can DH, he can play a little center, if need be, he can play right, if need be. And he can obviously still hit. He told us that at, uh, in spring training, I can still play. He can still play. And Joe knows that.
— He was hitting .280 coming in. He had his 2 for 3 and tonight on his weaker side, the left side, he hit a line drive double to the center field fence and from there he hit to right. Here is Posada to hit for Fasano. And you know what Posada is? He is the tying run.
— Hmmmm. Oh my gosh.
— Posada for three. Mike Timlin gets up in the Boston bullpen. The pitch to Posada is low.
— Another milestone for Bernie. This one I, I... uh, missed. That was single number 1,531. You know who he just tied on the all-time list who's number one? Lou Gehrig.
— And he needs only one more single. He has... and then he'll have more singles than any other Yankee player in history.
— Oh my goodness.
— It'll be a 1-0 to Posada. That pitch is low and the count 2 and 0. Posada caught the first game was 0 for 4 with a walk. Fasano was 0 for 3 when he was in there. As I said Posada is the tying run. It's 10-7 Boston, 2 on and one out. Melky Cabrera on deck. And the right-hander deals high, and the count 3 and 0. You know, it's easy to say he's the tying run, which means if he hits a three-run homerun... But if Hanson throws one more bad pitch the Yanks will have the bases loaded and they'll have two really good hitters coming up, Melky and Johnny Damon... It'll be a 3-0 to Posada. The pitch strike. And a base hit, if that happens, and Posada has to get the walk first the Yankees'd be a base hit from being right back in the game.
— Absolutely. Hanson's been very hittable lately. He's allowed a run in the last of his five outings, but I already said 11 hits and 10 runs in nine innings over the last eight games.
— Here's the 3-1. Swung on. Base hit left field. Giambi will only go to third. As Ramirez threw the, heh heh heh, ball in. Giambi was just hitting third. So Posada, a little inside out swing smacked it between third and short, so walk, single, single. And, and believe me, I'm not knocking Giambi. If the Yankees had whoever you think their fastest player... If Johnny Damon was at second, he would have only gotten to third. Ramirez played so shallow, that is all now for Craig Hanson.
Anyways, the Yankees have bases loaded, one out, and a base hit could make it 10-9.

— This pitching change is sponsored by the Tri-State quality Ford store. Check out the best selling Ford Explorer at your Tri-State quality Ford dealer.

When you don't signal properly, bad things can happen.

Hey Mike! Over here in the dugout! I wanted you to steal second on the next pitch, but don't tell anybody. Otherwise they might throw you out.

Good plan, coach! He'll never know what hit him.

As you can see, proper signaling is important. It's even more important when you're driving. That's why Allstate encourages safe driving with deductible rewards. Part of your choice auto insurance. Only from Allstate. For every year of safe driving, you earn $100 off your deductible. Another year, another hundred off, up to $500, which means it pays to play it safe. It's time to make the world a better place to drive. With Allstate there, you are in good hands. Hey Yankee fans, call agent Beth Hamlin at 631-277-1700 today. You'll get $100 off your deductible the day you sign up. Feature is optional and subject to terms, conditions and availability. Deductible awards apply to collision coverage in Pennsylvania and New York. Deductible amount will not go below $100. Allstate Property Casualty and Insurance Company, Northbrook, Illinois.

— And 40 year old Mike Timlin in. He's, uh, 5 and 2, ERA of 3.13, 48 games, two saves, forty-six innings, 45 hits, 12 walks, 22 strikeouts. Now 40 years old. So 18 years older than Craig Hanson. Heh heh heh.

— Hah hah ha.

— But I'm sure he'll still be thrilled that I said that.

— Ha ha ha ha.

— Heh heh... it's amazing, isn't it?

— Well, Hanson just works a third of an inning and gives up two hits and one walk. So the Yankees have the bases loaded, at one out and they got two shots at a base hit that would bring 'em right back in the game. Boston, obviously, wants this game so they're hopin' that Timlin can get 'em through the seventh and into the eighth and then if they have to use Papelbon for four or five outs, I'm sure that they would. But Timlin is the next step to Papelbon and then there won't be anyone else coming in. Now the Yankees have the bases loaded, one out. They need a base hit. Melky has singled twice and walked. He stands in at .290. He's a switch hitter batting left. Giambi at third, Bernie at second, Posada at first with one out. And the fastball is inside, 1 and 0. Timlin's 40 but he still throws hard. He throws fastballs and sliders primarily. We're in the seventh. Now, the right-handed Timlin is set. The pitch is a strike and the count 1 and 1, fastball on the inside corner. Now the right-hander deals there's a strike on the inside corner and the count 1 and 2. Everything has been in to Cabrera. He missed with one, got two strikes, and now ahead 1 and 2. Bases loaded, one out in the seventh, Boston with at 10-7 lead. Yankees trying to get back in the game. Now the 1-2, fouled made contact on a 92 mile-an-hour fastball. Let's take a ten second station I.D. on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

Hey, this is Jared Max. You like sports? I've got all the highlights, top stories for you on fifteen and forty-five past the hour, right here on WCBS Newsradio 880.

— John Sterling, Suzyn Walmsley at Fenway Park. It'll be a 1-2 to Cabrera and the pitch foul ball popped back, so the count holds at 1 and 2. Both bullpens are quiet. As I mentioned, Timlin, they hope, is gonna be the step to Papelbon. Runners lead from every base. Now the right-hander is set. Here's the 1-2. Outside and the count 2 and 2. Fastball took off.

— Steady array of fastballs 91, 92 and 93, cuts it now and comes in with that slider.

— Johnny Damon on deck. It'll be a 2-2 to Melky. Low inside, 3 and 2. So now Melky's in the driver's seat. Pretty, good at bat. Now he's in the driver's seat. If Timlin has to throw a strike. He doesn't want to force in a run, that he really does not want to do. It'll be a 3-2 from Timlin to Cabrera, bases loaded, one out, top of the seventh. The pitch swung on, fouled back and the count holds at 3 and 2. His fastball up and away, Melky got a piece.

— And a pretty good at bat by Melky. He really has an idea there. He really sees the ball, hits the ball, got a piece of it there, as John said. Very impressive.

— All year long he's gotten big hits for the Yanks, lead inning hits. See if he can get one more. The payoff swung on and lined! It is a base hit right field! Giambi scores and they'll hold everyone else up. Ball was hit too hard. Shame on you, Melky.

— Heh heh heh.

— Now Melky comes through again with another base hit and an RBI and the Yankees trail 10-8 and the bases loaded, one out for Johnny Damon.

— And Wily Mo Peña was playing in. He wasn't playing far back at all and he charged that and there was no way that anybody but Giambi could have scored. That was just hit too hard. You're absolutely right. That was a shot.

— The 39th RBI for Cabrera. So Melky has three hits and a walk in the nightcap and here's Johnny Damon who has singled, singled, homered, knocked in four and struck out. Bases loaded, one out. Pitch low, 1 and 0. You could've, as they say, hung the wash out on that line drive by Melky Hit so hard that Bernie couldn't score from second. He had no chance. So it's 10-8 bases loaded, one out. And Timlin deals a strike on the outside corner. From their days before they were teammates, Damon is 0 for 12 against him.

— Hmmm...

— Berni is at third, Posada's at second, Cabrera's at first. Timlin holds to set now the 1-1. Swung on, a high pop down the left field line and it is caught by Manny, no advance, it was very shallow. So two away and that'll bring up Jeter.

— And a round of applause from the Fenway faithful. Somebody finally got Johnny Damon out in a thick spot.

— Well, I think Damon has had a pretty good night anyway. Here is Jeter. He also has terrible numbers against Timlin, 3 for 20. Timlin's been a very tough pitcher over the years.

— You know, Timlin you could understand being so tough in... on Jeter. I I was startled when I saw Damon's numbers.

— Yeah.

— Against a lefty? I would think he would see that unless he throws him an array of cutters. I wonder how Mariano's cutters work on lefties, that might look... be what he does. He's been a really good pitcher for a very long time, Timlin.

— Oh, here's Jeter with the bases loaded, two outs. Derek is 0 for 4 in the nightcap. He was 3 for 6 in the opener. Bases loaded, two down. And the right-hander Timlin set, deals and the pitch is low and away, 1 and 0. Runners lead. It'll be a 1-0 to Jeter. Breaking ball, strike, and the count 1 and 1. The Yankees do have 8 runs, 13 hits in the nightcap and they are losing but they, they certainly have done their share. Timlin just staring it now, you said. It'll be a 1-1 to Jeter and that's fouled off, first base side and the count 1 and 2.
Mike Timlin turns 40 in March. Came up as a rookie with, uh, Toronto. He was their number 5 pick out of Southwestern University. That's Texas way back in 1987, 19 years ago, Mike Timlin was drafted by the Blue Jays and a fine, fine career.

Now Timlin deals. Fouled off by Jeter, fastball up and in and with that inside out swing stayed alive.

And my favorite story, John, about about Timlin. When he was a rookie he got the final out in one of the Blue Jay's World Series when he was a rookie and I remember talking to him, asking him, I said, were you nervous and he said, no. What did you think of when you came in as a rookie? and he said, I pretended I was in Dunedin.

Heh heh heh heh

Dunedin the spring training home of the Blue Jays and their A ball team.

It'll be a 1-2 low, outside. Well the count 2 and 2. Timlin throwing cutters and sliders so the ball moves. Jeter has his buddies Bernie Williams at third, Jorge Posada at second Melky Cabrera at first with two outs in the seventh. Yankees have scored a run, they trail 10-8. Now Timlin is set. The pitch inside, almost hit him and the count 3 and 2.

Very disciplined at bat by Derek Jeter.

Well now that would give Posada a chance to score on a hit anywhere but left field, he'll never score on a hit to left. You oughta see how shallow Manny Ramirez is playing. It's amazing. It'll be a 3-2 to Jeter. A walk forces in a run and brings up Abreu. The stretch, the 3-2 fouled back, threw a fastball over the plate up and Jeter fouled it back.

He still has that good movement John, it moves at the... it crosses the plate, it really moves late like as the pitchers like to call it.

Well once again, it'll be a 3-2, bases loaded, two out. They'll be running on the pitch here in the seventh. The pitch swung on and lined, there's a base hit to right field toward the right field corner! Two runs score! On his way to third is Melky! They're gonna send him! Here he comes! No throw! It's a double for Jeter and Jeter gets back to second base. It is a bases clearing, three-run double by Jeter on a 3-2 pitch with two outs in the seventh. And the Yankees have come all the way back to take an 11-10 lead! How do you like that Jeter?! He hit a line drive down the right field line and all three runs scored.

Going the other way as he does so well. Wily Mo Peña goes to try and cut this off, it bounced off his glove. He had trouble picking it up, he's got a very good arm, but by the time the relay throw came in to Youkilis, the third run had already scored and he threw to second and Jeter just got back!

Now they'll walk Abreu go after Alex Rodriguez. An intentional walk coming up to Abreu. For Jeter the three-run double gives him 75 RBIs. A lot of RBIs out of the two hole, huh? So Abreu will walk. And now the Yankees get their bullpen up. Myers will pitch to Ortiz and then they'll go to Farnsworth, I guess.

Yeah that's Farnsworth up, out there. It's amazing. See? It's not enough. Ten runs are not enough.

And look what the Yankees have done in this double header.

Mmmm...

Well, they scored 12 runs in the first game and 11 runs in the second game. Well here's A-Rod with two on and two out. Alex is one for three in the second game two for five in the first. Well, what a big hit by Jeter, huh?

Mmm hmm.
— And a big hit by Melky. The pitch, cut on and missed. And the count 0 and 1 on Alex.
— And that's why everyone at Yankee Stadium yelled MVP when Jeter comes up. They're think... paying attention, they know what he's done he's done all year.
— Yanks now with an 11-10 lead but... a long way to go. The pitch. Hit on the ground over third. Base hit down the left field line kicking off the stands away from Ramirez! Scoring is Jeter, on his way to third is Abreu. A-Rod goes to second. No throw. It is a base hit and an RBI for Alex Rodriguez and the Yankees now take a 12-10 lead. It was a hot shot over the bag at third and I guess if it goes in the corner, Abreu had a better chance to score. The ball hit the stands that just out, kicked out to Ramirez but away from him and so Abreu goes to third, A-Rod to second. It's a single and he goes to second on the throw. It's RBI single. So Jeter scores, Abreu goes to third, A-Rod takes second on the throw and now here is Robbie Cano who began the inning. You know what one thing? Boston doesn't really have any options. This is the time they wanted to set up Papelbon. So second and third, two out, here's Cano. The pitch low inside and the count 1 and 0.
— And getting ready in the Red Sox bullpen in a hurry is Keith Foulke, who just was reinstated from the DL this afternoon, between games.
— The Yankees had a five-run second, they now have a five-run seventh. They had a two-run fourth and they have twelve runs for the second time today. The pitch to Cano lined hard. Base hit! Right center field! Scoring is Abreu! Scoring is A-Rod! Cano holds at first. It's a two-run base hit for Cano. The Yankees have scored seven runs in the seventh inning and they take a 14-10 lead. Is that amazing? Is that utterly amazing? Timlin has gotten racked. Dave Wallace, the pitching coach goes out. A single by Cabrera and after Damon flied to shallow left, Jeter a three-run double, Abreu an intentional walk, A-Rod an RBI single, and Cano a two run single and the Yankees have seven in the inning and a 14 to 10 lead.
— And with this bullpen, I was just looking at some of the Red Sox stats and they're... this bullpen has... is really overworked and they're getting shelled. Uh, Mike Timlin has given up 11 earned runs in the last 18 innings of the seventeen games. I mean, that's not Timlin-like. That's what happens when you get overworked and your missing pieces of your bullpen. Foulke's been gone most of the year, Papelbon has hit a little bit of a wall. He's had an awful lot of innings. Remember, he's a rookie also.
— You know there was one out, no one on. Cano grounded out to start the inning. The Yankees put up Giambi, who takes a, uh, slider inside 1 and 0. They put Giambi up. Might as well use your players. Giambi walked. Then Bernie singled. Well, they put up Posada for Fasano. He singled. And Timlin came in the game and he has gotten racked. So a runner at first, two out, the pitch to Giambi lined hard, fouled outside the pitch. And the count 1 and 1.
— He's fooling no one. That was a rip that Giambi had. Just a little early on it.
— Now the Yankees have taken a 14 to 10 lead and they have a chance now to sweep the double header. Myers will get Ortiz and I gather Farnsworth will come in try to get them through the eighth. Pitch. Grounded foul first base side. Let me put it this way I think Farnsworth would have the seventh and he would start the eighth and if he had problems Mariano would come in. Now that's... what a rally, huh?
— Mmm hmm.
That's a pretty fabulous rally. A lot of big two out hits here. It'll be a 1-2 to Giambi. The pitch, swung on, a high pop to shallow left. The third baseman is out and Ukules makes the catch. But the Yankees -- as the Red Sox get booed -- the Yankees get seven runs on six hits and leave one and now at the end of six and a half innings of play, the Yankees 14, Boston 10 here on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

People are constantly trying to get your attention. And sometimes that can be done with a single voice.

People are constantly trying to get your attention. And sometimes that can be done with a single voice.

Dah dah dah dah.

You might pay more attention if more voices were raised in unison.

Dah dah dah dah.

That's because more often people tell you something, the more likely you are to remember it.

Dah dah dah dah dah. Dah dah dah dah dah dah dah.

So, if I am the only one...

Dah dah dah dah.

...to tell you that no gasoline was rated higher in quality than AMOCO you might be impressed. But chances are, if I told you that drivers in annual surveys across the nation rated AMOCO fuels number one in quality...

Dah dah dah dah dah.

...you'd really be impressed. And that's what happened year after year. AMOCO fuels are rated number one.

Dah dah dah dah dah.

So now, you don't just have to take my word for it.

Dah dah dah dah dah.

You can take theirs as well. When it comes to high quality gasoline, go with AMOCO fuels at BP.

When you don't signal properly, bad things can happen.

Hey Mike! Over here in the dugout! I wanted you to steal second on the next pitch, but don't tell anybody. Otherwise they might throw you out.

Good plan, coach! He'll never know what hit him.

As you can see, proper signaling is important. It's even more important when you're driving. That's why Allstate encourages safe driving with deductible rewards. Part of your choice auto insurance. Only from Allstate. For every year of safe driving, you earn $100 off your deductible. Another year, another hundred off, up to $500, which means it pays to play it safe. It's time to make the world a better place to drive. With Allstate there, you are in good hands. Hey Yankee fans, call agent Beth Hamlin at 631-277-1700 today. You'll get $100 off your deductible the day you sign up. Feature is optional and subject to terms, conditions and availability. Deductible awards apply to collision coverage in Pennsylvania and New York. Deductible amount will not go below $100. Allstate Property Casualty and Insurance Company, Northbrook, Illinois.

Well Mike Myers is coming in to start the bottom of the seventh and he will face Big Papi and Myers is... I'm looking to see if Farnsworth is just starting to throw now. He threw a little bit in the other ring but he was just standing around home mostly as Myers now takes his warmups to Jorge Posada.

Well, I have trouble always with numbers and figuring this out. You should've seen my scorecard. Hanson goes a third of an inning and gives up three runs on two hits and a walk. So that meant that Timlin... well, he isn't done yet so we won't give you his numbers but if he would've given up four runs... So Timlin in essence, would be the losing pitcher if the Yankees hang on to the lead. However, it is 14 to 10 in the seventh. The Red Sox have three more at bats but I would gather that Myers will pitch to Ortiz and then you would see Farnsworth. That's what I would gather. It's an amazing day and night if the Yankees can pull it off. And you know what, Suzyn? This game is gonna go over four hours. You know what? We are gonna have to find out the record for the longest nine inning game. It's it's 11:53.

- Isn't that the Baltimore Yankee game in...
- Now there's a strike to Ortiz.

- '96?
- At 12:06, let's say, it'll be a four hour game. And we still have two and a half innings to go. The pitch to Ortiz, fouled back and the count 0 and 2. It's really an amaz... Again, if this was done in the 30s or 40s or 50s it and you've read about it, you'd say, oh I wish I had been there. I can't believe that it happened. And it's not over! It's not even close to being over. The Yankees won the opener 12-4 and they have a 14 to 10 lead in the second game. They have scored 26 runs and have 32 hits in the double header. Ortiz has doubled in three at bats. He has an RBI and a walk. And Myers deals, swung on and grounded to first. Fielded there by Giambi, takes it to the bag, one away. Posada's got in behind the plate obviously and Giambi's gone to first. They had pinch hit for Wilson and Fasano. How do you like this?
- Oh it is... looks like Farnsworth had just gotten out. He didn't throw in that six innings.
- So they're letting Myers go to Ramirez. You know the next batter up's a lefty hitter but I would imagine that Tito would go to his bench. He has a lot of right-hand hitters on the bench.
- So Myers stays... how do you like this? Here he pitches to Manny Ramirez, he can't be worse than anyone else has, the pitch is a strike. Manny Ramirez has singled, doubled, singled, and singled. So they have Myers pitch to Manny. Maybe all that slow stuff will get 'em off stride, huh? It's possible. The pitch is lined! There's a base hit center field! Well maybe not.
- Ha ha ha ha. Very little gets Manny off stride.
- Well, he's 5 for 5 in the nightcap. And now here is a pinch hitter for Eric Hinske to get a right-hand hitter in.
- And here comes Joe.
- Now Mike Lowell will hit for Hinske and now that they've used up a player and Joe will come on and bring in the right-hander.
- And this pitching change is sponsored by Foxwoods Resorts Casino. The wonder of it all in Mystic Country Connecticut.

Most people never even think about it, that the CITGO that they count on for a quick fill-up is also the company that The Muscular Dystrophy Association counts on to fill their kids with hope and the same company that's committed more than one billion dollars to protect the environment. We're proud of the commitment we've made to the communities we serve, both with our financial support and by rolling up our sleeves, volunteering at the local level. At CITGO, we're fueling more than your car.

Some people really thrive under pressure: the tougher it is, the better they perform. So would they appreciate the convenience of the Acela Express and it's frequent departures, with the relaxing, spacious seating? Or the extra time to get work done, because they aren't waiting in line? Of course they'd appreciate Acela Express. But if these people still crave pressure, they can always pretend they're stuck in traffic. Call 1 800 USA RAIL or visit amtrak.com to book today. Fares, routes and schedules subject to change without notice.
While Kyle Farnsworth comes on, ideally the Yankees would like Farnsworth to get five outs two here and then three in the eighth and then have Mo. But, eh, if he could get through this inning and maybe get an out, they could use Mo for five outs, he hasn't pitched in a couple of days. Eh, Mike Lowell will be the pinch hitter for Hinske. Yankees have a 14 to 10 lead in an improbable double header. And it is getting near the witching hour. And so it's a propitious time to take ten seconds for station ID on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

Listen to the Yankees on WCBS. For news log on to WCBS880.com. Streaming live. WCBS New York.

John Sterling, Suzyn Waldman back at Fenway Park. And the Yankees scored seven in the top of the seventh and have a 14 to 10 lead. Well Suzyn, I just found out some information: the American League record is the Yankees and Orioles, we were there...

Hm hmm.

...4 hours and 22 minutes.

Hm hmm.

The major league record is 4 hours and 27 minutes. I don't know who played. Heh heh heh. And, um, this game is gonna be four hours in a couple of minutes. The pitch to Lowell from Farnsworth is outside.

And there is, there is two and a half innings... oh, we've got plenty of time to beat that record. It's only a half an hour. We'll be in the eighth inning.

Heh heh heh heh heh...

Hum hum hum hum... I'm getting loopy.

The 1-0, lined hard outside of third, the count 1 and 1. Lowell is hitting at .283. He has 14 homers, 60 RBIs, having a terrific year. He made an error in Game One, which seemed like about a week ago and, um, it was his first error in 70 games. Think of that. Playing third base with all those hotshots down third. First error in 70 games. That is amazing. It'll be a 1-1. Fouled back and the count 1 and 2. It is midnight officially. I don't know... did you ever write down? I didn't... that... when the game started?

No.

I didn't either. 8:05, 8:06, 8:07 something like that. But we're only in the seventh inning. Hmmph. Of course Boston scored in every inning till last inning. Now the pitch is fouled away and the count 1 and 2.

Yeah, you wondered about Lowell when he had signed here. He hit .236 last year. He had one of those years and everybody said, oh this guy is probably through and when you think about it... he... when they got Josh Beckett, he had to be included in the deal or there wasn't gonna be any deal. And they absolutely were not sure that he was ever gonna recover from last year, .236 and look at what he's done this year. He's been tremendous for this team.

It'll be a 1-2. Lined in deep left field. Cabrera back. He has to play it off the wall and holding up at second is Manny. He wasn't sure the ball was... land in. Cabrera got too close to the wall. He did a good thing. When the ball came up he kind of blocked it with his body. So a base hit for Lowell and there's two on and one out.

Well, that was a... a breaking pitch that Lowell was absolutely waiting for. And that's that slider again and threw the slider through the middle of the plate is what happened. It went down but it didn't go in. And Melky... John, you're right. It... it... he made a bad play into a pretty good play 'cause he got too close to the wall but he blocked it with his foot. Oh, I don't think he did it on purpose, but it worked out well.
Yeah. Well, two on and one out, here's Wily Mo Peña and the pitch is lined, right off Farnsworth, recovers, throws to first in time. Now we'll see about Farnsworth. The runners move to second and third. It was a bullet by Peña. Here comes Gene Monahan and Joe Torre and Ron Guidry and all the infielders. I don't know where it hit him. He kind of turned. It may have hit him on the hip or... so, where do you think it hit him, Suzyn?

I think it hit him on the outside of the knee, on the right outside of the right knee. And they're walking around... he's walking around the circumference of the... I think they're taking him right out of this game. And it... it did indeed. It went right on the outer part of the right knee and they are gonna take him out of this game and, uh... no one.... they haven't made a move to the, to the bullpen to see who is coming in. Whoever... whomever it is they can warm up as long as they want and that's all the Yankees need is for something to happen to Kyle Farnsworth and it's... oh, he's being helped down the stairs by Mike Myers. Oh, this is... this does not look good. And maybe it just hurts and maybe it is just a stinger in there, but Mike Myers ran over and helped him down the stairs to go to the clubhouse and Robbie Cano is looking at everybody standing around, uh, the mound and Scottie Proctor is coming in and he will get as long as he needs to warm up and, uh, Robbie Cano, who is right there was shaking his head saying something to, um, Alex Rodriguez. And we're gonna see a replay of it here on our monitor and the ball comes right off the bat and hits him right on a line drive right on the side of that right leg, on the side of the knee and Gene Monahan and Joe Torre didn't even ask him how he felt. They just said you're out of here and he walked off and as he was going down the stairs Mike Myers actually ran over from the other side of the dugout and helped him get down the stairs. So... so this is, uh, we'll wait and see if we get anything. Certainly on the post game we will tell you what is going on with Kyle Farnsworth. That's all the Yankees need... lose somebody else. So Scott Proctor is in and he will get, as I said, as much as, uh, as much time as he needs because it is an injury and Scottie came in and went an inning and two thirds, two hits and no runs. And meanwhile here is... Scottie is is warming up. We've been talking about Jimmy Fund Day here and the pledges and everything and, uh, people have been calling in all from New England and I was told they were getting calls from New Jersey and New York and Connecticut. Well the Jimmy Fund tote board up there they have so far raised $2,556,998 for the Jimmy Fund. It is an unbelievable organization that has been part of this community for over 50 years. It was started by a wonderful man named Lou Perini who used to own the Boston Braves and, uh, when the Braves moved it became the Red Sox charity and it was the pet charity of Ted Williams and over the 50 years they have built quite a complex and they, uh, one little building is now two big city blocks with clinics and so many people from all over this county, so many children have been, uh, helped by the Dana-Farber Cancer Center, so over two and a half million dollars and I was told by the Red Sox announcers that they got so many calls from New Jersey and New York and Connecticut and they want to thank everybody and all those children wanna thank you too. So Scott Proctor is now warming up and he will get as long as he wants as, uh, we were talking about and we will wait and hear about Kyle Farnsworth. If nothing else, we will have something on post game because, uh, he's certainly needed help getting down those stairs. So when you go into the, uh, Re...
or nine stairs, very, very steeply and Mike Myers came over, as I said, and helped him down the stairs and maybe it's just stiff and hopefully nothing is is really wrong but that did not look good.

— Boy, what else can happen, huh?
— Ugh.
— Aw, did he get a bullet. Ah, we'll see, uh, Suzyn will have that on her clubhouse report. Well, two outs, second and third, 14 to 10 Yanks. Proctor now comes in and they hope he can give 'em... well, first of all, they hope they get them out of the seventh inning. Humph. Coco Crisp takes a breaking ball low.

— And Scott Proctor pitched in the first game and when we were talking to him after after the game, he said, well I can go an inning, I can go an inning in the second game. I'm sure he didn't expect to. He went an inning and two thirds giving up no runs and two hits in the first game.

— Crisp, a switch hitter batting left and Proctor deals lined deep down the right field line it is a foul ball. The Yankees got a break. Crisp hit a rocket down the line but it tailed foul into the seats.
— And Scotty did not mean to put that fastball there. That was middle in to Coco Crisp. Wanted to get it all the way in 95 miles an hour fastball, but not in far enough.
— Ramirez at third and Lowell at second. There are two out and here's the 1-1. Breaking ball, missed. And the count 1 and 2. So Farnsworth goes two batters one base runner is Myers and one base runner is Farnsworth. The pitch high and the count 3 and 1 on Crisp. Now, Proctor's 3-1. Fouled back. High fastball. Maybe out of the strike zone and the count 3 and 2.
— I think it was up around his neck. Those are so hard to lay off. Now the Major League record, 4 hours 27 minutes, that would be at 12:34. The American League record, that's what the Yankees have, 4 hours and 22 minutes, that's at 12:29. So, we're twenty minutes away from the American League record. Thir... twenty-five minutes away from the Major League Record.
— You may set a record, Suzyn, that no one may ever touch.
— Ha ha ha.
— And here is the payoff. Swung on and lined to center. Damon goes back he makes the catch to end the inning and the Yankees preserve their four run lead. No runs, two hits no errors, two left. At the end of seven, it's the Yankees 14 Boston 10 on the New York Yankees Radio Network presented by AIG. The strength to be there. AIG.

Honey, let's start looking for a car this weekend.
When? Josh has soccer on Saturday and Julie's got a swim meet, plus your parents are coming for dinner.

Relax, mbofsmihtown.com is just a click away. Here look.

Wow!

Mercedes-Benz of Smithtown streamlined everything about buying, leasing and owning Mercedes-Benz. That's right. Wherever you are, you're just a click away from mbofsmihtown.com. And look. They even have a club rewards program which lets you accumulate valuable points toward the purchase of your next vehicle. Shopping on mbofsmihtown.com is almost like being at the dealership. Why waste valuable time going from one dealer to another? Now you can get all the detailed information that you need on any new or certified pre-owned Mercedes-Benz before you come to the showroom, right from your computer. Take a virtual test drive, even explore financing options. So savor the experience at mbofsmihtown.com because wherever you are, we're your closest your Mercedes-Benz dealer. Mercedes-Benz of Smithtown conveniently located at mbofsmihtown.com.
AIG. For 85 years families have relied on the AIG companies to help secure for their futures. For insurance, for loans, retirement. AIG. The strength to be there.

Folks, that sound you hear is the Blue Diamond almond canon firing cans of fresh-roasted, delicious Blue Diamond almonds into the upper decks. The crowd is loving it. Fine taste. No cholesterol. Smart eatin' Blue Diamond. Have you had your can a week? There's no better baseball snack than fresh-roasted Blue Diamond almonds. They score big points on any occasion. That's why ShopRite supermarkets carries Blue Diamond almonds and all your game watching supplies, like beverages and cold cuts. Stop by ShopRite supermarkets today and pick up a can of Blue Diamond almonds.

Hi, this is Derek Jeter and you're listening to WCBS NewsRadio 880, home of the New York Yanks.

— Well, as we said earlier, Keith Foulke was, uh, reinstated from the DL today and here he is. Foulke has been on the DL since June 13th. He had right elbow tendonitis and, uh he's 33 years old. 2 and 1 with a 5.63 ERA and 29 relief appearances this season. His last appearance with the team was on June 11th when, uh, he's been trying to get through elbow tendonitis, he's had a bad back, and on that game in Texas before he went on the DL he allowed 7 hits and 4 runs in two innings. But he is back now and, uh, has to come in for the eighth.

— And pitches to Bernie Williams who pops it foul back. Bernie had two hits. He had a big hit in the seven-run seventh that had given the Yankees the 14 to 10 lead. Now the pitch to Bernie is cut on and missed on, a change fastball change. That's Keith Foulke. Timlin went two-thirds of an inning, two runs, four hits. He would be the eventual loser. Hmmph. Now the pitch to Bernie is outside. 14, 16 and 2 to 10, 16 and 0. And the Yankees in the first game, if I'm remembering right, had 12 runs and 16 hits. 26 runs and 32 hits, my goodness. The pitch, is low and the count 2 and 2.

— Foulke is never your prototypical closer, fastball and changeup, not the hard-throwing kind like Papelbon. He would fit in really nicely in back of Papelbon...

— The 2-2 is low and the count 3-2 to Bernie.

— ... actually in front of Papelbon. And during their World Series run in 2004, that's how Gino used him to get big outs and he didn't care where they were. He'd come in after a hard thrower like Schilling and get a few outs, changing speeds.

— Here's the payoff, strike three is called. Bernie is caught looking. One away.

— And that fastball was only 88. Bernie didn't like the call a lot, shaking his head, and made his displeasure known to Jim Wolf. But he doesn't get... he doesn't throw much harder than that 88 mile-an-hour fastball, fastball change. He can get a low 90s. He hasn't pitched in two months, so he probably won't tonight.

— Here's Posada, he pinch-hit in the seventh inning and singled. And he lines one to right center field in the gap. It's a base hit. It goes past Peña to the right center field wall. Posada will go to second with a double. Well, one thing, even though you have Proctor and you're gonna have Rivera after an out or two, if Proctor's in trouble -- I know we sound like a broken record -- you can never enough runs, especially in a game, a double header like this. So Posada rips a double to right center and that brings up Melky Cabrera who has had a great second game. 3 hits and a walk.

— A coupla RBIs, two runs scored, hmmmm....

— Now the pitch, a strike and the count 0 and 1.
That fastball at 87, right in a great place, right on the inside part of the plate. Right on the corner.

Now the right-hander Foulke is set and the 0-1 is low and the count 1 and 1.

Did you notice how, how this place has cleared out?
Yes.
Do you know why it happened? Besides the fact that they're losing by 4... 4 runs?
No.
A sign went up. They have commuter rails that go to the suburbs. They leave from outside Yawkey Way. The last train leaves at 12:35.

Ah!

It's twenty after twelve. And that's what... I looked and all of a sudden it was like a parade. Everybody was leaving. I mean, you can't park your car here so people take the commuter rails. It's the perfect train thing, and they stop right outside the park here.

It'll be a 1-1 to Cabrera. And the pitch is low. You know, I I'm glad you you told me that, you educated me. I thought, well, first of all, the game's going on for... forever. Secondly, Boston is losing and they got killed in the first game, so I figured people just packed up, but that's a... that's a real reason for relief.

It's a real reason. You know, you live a... an hour out of the city and you don't have a car...

Well, this is the record tonight. It's 12:17 on the board. We're only in the top of the eighth inning.

We're gonna fly by that record.

We're gonna kill that record.

Heh heh heh.

And, if we weren't sure of it, we are now because Mirabelli's gone out to have a talk with Foulke. The home plate umpire Jim Wolf will... must be delighted at umpiring this game...

Heh heh heh.

...goes out to talk to them as well.

They're really... they're having a conversation about something, really, wi... with the umpire. Hmmmph.

Now we're set to go and Melky takes low and he's ahead on the count 3 and 1. Remember Bernie was called out on strikes on a 3-2 pitch that he protested against, as much as Bernie protests anything. So now Cabrera, with a 3-1 count. The pitch fouled back.

They're having a countdown. 4 hours and 12 minutes.

Well, that's the longest game in Red Sox...

... in Red Sox history. Oh, they've got ten minutes to go to catch up to us. Baltimore.

Well, we have 3-2 to Cabrera, fouled back. Yankee bullpen is quiet. Proctor will start the eighth and they hope will finish the eighth. Now the pitch is fouled back. You know, Suzyn, if the Yankees hang on...

Um hum...

...to this game...

Umm...

...that they will leave Boston ahead on the loss side...

The reason I can figure it out is the standings...

Hah hah hah...

are on the scoreboard...

...but about 30 feet high, yes.

The pitch. Fouled back. The Yanks will be four up, only three games left...

Hmmmun...
...four from the loss side now and they only would... and they're only at three games left.
   Too bad the season doesn't end on them.
   Right. And, uh, it doesn't prove anything. You're absolutely right. They have so many games to play. Here's the 3-2. It's fouled back.
   You know, it's so interesting 'cause baseball as John says all the time is so different from any other sport. People talk about statement games. Is this a statement game?
   Right.
   It's not statement game!
   There are no statement games!
   Not in baseball.
   This is percentage. How many do you win out of how many? But I think if the Yankees win it, they'll be very happy.
   Yeah.
   Here's the 3-2. High, ball four. Cabrera walks.
   See even, I, I guess the point I'm making even the, even if, uh, people say, oh, the Red Sox lose, they're finished, well, no one's gonna tell Josh Beckett that they're finished...
   No.
   ...or Kurt Schilling...
   Yes.
   'cause they're the ones with the ball... the mo... as Shawn always says, the most important person on the field had the ball in his hand. That changes every day.
   Here's Johnny Damon who has three hits in both games and a homer in both games and takes a strike and the count 0 and 1. The 0-1, cut on and missed and the count 0 and 2. Damon began the, the double header with a triple. The pitch and he pops this one foul third base side, out of play.
   An afternoon for Damon. An afternoon and evening.
   Well, you just know it that it's a day that he'll never forget.
   Yep.
   Runners lead first and second, one out. Pitch popped foul back.
   Even though he says he always wants to do well and I'm sure he does, but this has gotta be special. He's... he'll never admit it because he doesn't want to admit that one game is more important than another. Most of them don't but they're human beings.
   Damon hits a high pop to left. Ramírez backs up a step or two. He makes the catch and there are two away. Now queued down here is Derek Jeter. Jeter was 0 for 4 in the nightcap, but his last at bat was a doozy. He hit a three-run double down the right field line on a 3-2 pitch from Timlin. Derek in the double header has four hits and four RBIs. And fouls the pitch off third base side. Someone made a great catch in the seats.
   Hmmm hmmm hmmm. Stands up and takes a bow.
   At Foxwoods Resort Casino, you'll find exciting places every day at six different casinos. Find out more about the largest resort casino in the world. Log on to foxwoods.com. It'll be an 0-1 to Jeter. Inside fastball, 1 and 1.
   Well, this isn't exactly turning out to be a night off for Jose Posada, who was supposed to get the day off or this game off. You look at him in the dugout.
   Runners lead first and second, 2 outs. Pitch is fouled off. Posada at second, Cabrera at first, two out and 1-2 comin' to Jeter. Yankees with a 14 to 10 lead here in the top of the eighth. Now the right-hander deals. It's squibbed on the ground to first fielded to Youkilis, takes it himself and that'll do it. No runs, one hit, two left, and now at the end of seven and a half innings of play, 14 to 10 Yanks, on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

This Yankees radio broadcast is brought to you by RE/MAX of New York. If you're looking to buy or sell a home, call 800 REMAXNY or click 800REMAXNY.com. Nobody in the world sells more real estate than RE/MAX.

Mah man, check out my ride. I got it all tricked out. I'm talkin' twenty inch chrome rims with the spinners, rocket boom boom bam boosters, hydraulics up to here.

These days everybody wants things customized.

Got a flat screen TV, DVD, DVR, CD, MP3, XYZ, up in this mug.

That's why Wendy's brings you combo choices. Pick any combo and pick from seven delicious sides at no extra cost.

I got the suede seats, saltwater aquarium, shoe rack, hat rack, mini fridge, espresso machine, yeah, I got cable.

Enjoy two new choices like baked lays and yogurt with granola or get a baked potato, chili, one of two sides of salad or French fries.

You think I should get a vanity plate? Or is that just pushing it?

So don't compromise. Customize. Do Wendy's. Do what tastes right.

Eat great even late at Wendy's pickup window, open 'til one a.m. or later with a full menu to choose from. Try one of Wendy's new deli fresh Frescata combos and choose any of seven delicious sides at no extra cost. Don't compromise, customize your combo. Do Wendy's. Do what tastes right.

— Well, Scott Proctor back out there as we're about to start the bottom of the eighth inning here at Fenway Park, Yankees leading 14 to 10. 14 runs, 17 hits, two errors for the Yankees. 10 runs, 16 hits for the Red Sox. So the Yankees in this game... in this, uh, game have the same amount of hits that they had in the first game. 17 first game, the Yankees had 12 runs and 17 hits, Boston had 4 runs and 10 hits. So 26 runs and 34 hits so far for the Yankees in this double header. I'm not sure anybody expected this, but they'll take it. Scott Proctor will face Doug Mirabelli Alex Cora, and then the top of the order Kevin Youkilis. Closing in on the record of the longest ga... game in both the American League and in Major League history. Proctor deals to Mirabelli, takes a strike on the outside corner. Proctor started 'em off with that slider, really starting to mix up the way his pitch patterns are going usually started them off last year... started people off with fastballs, now he could be a... a slider or a curve and he doesn't care. Swing and a miss by Mirabelli, also on the slider, 0 and 2. That clocked in the low 90s. Proctor has really learned how to pitch. Slider, slider, now probably come back with a fastball or he could come back with that curve. He has really learned what to do in this last year. Ground ball to Jeter up over to Giambi at first and one down. And Proctor puts his finger up and he's, uh, he knows, uh, this is a big game. He wants to get through this inning. And you know what, John? I don't see anybody even moving or stretching in the bullpen.

— Well, they're gonna, hope... obviously that... that Proctor gets through this inning then they can have Mo for... for the four... uh, ninth, with a 14 to 10 lead. Here's Alex Cora's had a perfect night, three singles and a walk. And Proctor deals a strike. However, what you find out in the clubhouse is is ultra-important. How badly hurt is Farnsworth? I mean, they can't go without Farnsworth.

— No.
— Cora swings and misses, the count 0 and 2.
— Here we go. Alright. Four hours, twenty-three minutes.
— Pitch popped foul out of play.
— This is now the longest game in American League history by one minute. We’re gonna shoot right by this record. Four hours and twenty-two minutes was the record. That was Yankees and Orioles. We were there. I remember it well.
— Do we know who, um the other two teams are?
— I, I, uh, I’m I’m gonna guess. I think it’s... wasn’t Oakland involved in one of those?
— The 0-2, a high pop in back of second. Jeter is there and on the grass he makes the catch and there are two away.
— We don’t know.
— Well...
— Yank... Yankees are now at four hours and twenty-three plus so anything now is gravy for the record.
— That’s the American League.
— Right.
— The National League, I think, is 4:27. So...
— Oh, I thought that was the major league record...
— Yeah.
— ...the National League?
— Yeah, it is.
— Well, it would be.
— Yeah.
— Of course.
— Now here’s Youkilis and he takes a strike. That’ll be a curve...
— ...yeah. Hah hah.
— ...too.
— Yeah. See it... yeah... If it’s not in the American League and it’s a Major League, so it has to be in the National League, Suzyn, yeah.
— Youkilis is two for four with a walk. Hey, it’s late. And it gets late earlier or something, Yogi. Heh heh heh...
— Uh, it’s getting early, early...
— Late... It’ll be an 0-1 to Youkilis. Pitch is inside, the count 1 and 1.
— Oh, Mariano is up throwing, some stretching.
— But when you look back on it, what a rally for the Yanks...
— ... hmmm.
— ...in the seventh inning. Seven runs a lot of hits.
— Youkilis grounds it foul outside of third where Mike Myers made the catch. Now the pitch is inside. Now the count 2 and 2. Two outs, no one on. We’re in the bottom of the eighth and the Yankees have a 14 to 10 lead over the Red Sox. And Proctor deals to Youkilis. Lined and Proctor knocked it down with his glove, fields, throws to first and the inning is over. Giambi caught the ball, lying down on the ground. Ha ha ha ha. So Proctor gets ‘em one, two, three, gets it four outs in a row. He’s OK, that ball hit his glove and at the end of eight innings of play, it’s 14 to 10 Yanks on the New York Yankees Radio Network.
— Ball four. Did you know that you’ll gain about two hours of life expectancy for each hour of walking you do? Take a base. The American Heart Association urges you to start walking Yankees fans. Visit americanheart.org.

WCBS and your Mercedes-Benz Tri-State dealers want to put a Palm Treo Smartphone in your pocket and send you to Tampa next March. Listen to the Mercedes-Benz Tri-State Yankees trivia question during the game. Then give us your answer at WCBS880.com. While you’re there, see the all new seven passenger Mercedes-Benz GL 450 SUV on the Yankee trivia link. Daily winners will receive the all-in-one Palm Treo Smartphone and one grand prize winner will win a trip to Tampa next March. Only from WCBS and your Mercedes Tri-State dealers. We understand. We live here too.

And they're off. Out of the gate it's Backyard Barbeque with Beautiful Day and All Beef Patties. Now here comes Charcoal Grill with Open Flame. But Open Flame is fading fast. And here comes the favorite, Lighter Fluid. Lighter Fluid is all over Charcoal Grill and no no, it's Let Light A Match. And now it's Kaboom and Eyebrows are nowhere in sight. Where the heck did Eyebrows go? And from out of nowhere comes Thunderstorm, with Thunder, Lightening, and Get Out Of The Pool and in the end, it's Running For Cover, Let's Order Chinese, and Did Anyone Remember To Bring In Grandpa.

For a better time, go to the track. Horse racing. We bet you love it. Come out to beautiful Belmont Park for heart-pounding excitement every Wednesday through Sunday at the Taj Mahal of American racing. Bring the entire family on Sundays for Belmont's fabulous Family fun days. It's the best value in New York sports. General admission is only $2.00. First race 1:00. Belmont is a proud member of the NCRA. Who do you like today?

— Hah hah hah hah hah.
— It was a Dodger Giant game in 2001 did he say?
— Yes he did. On October 5, 2001, San Francisco at L.A. The Dodgers won and I think he said in the eleventh inning and I think he said that Alex Cora played in that game too.
— The 0-1. Abreu takes it inside.
— Oh, that's funny.
— Yanks have a 14 to 10 lead. Mo will pitch the ninth. Abreu takes inside. Bobby had four hits in the opener and he has two hits and a walk in the nightcap. One thing. We're so close to it now... the 2-1 is high... that, you know, you just know it's been a long day and two wild games, but they'll remember this double header for years.
— Yeah, I think everybody associated with it will on both sides, by the way.
— They sure will. Here's the 3-1 to Abreu. Fouled third base side out of play. Abreu grounds it foul, so the count remains 3 and 2 on Bobby. Abreu, A-Rod, Cano here in the ninth. The longest Major League nine inning game in history, right here.
— Hmmph.
— Now the payoff. Outside ball 4. Abreu's on. In the double header, the Yankees have scored 26 runs and have 33 hits.
— And of course in less than twelve hours they face... in exactly twelve hours just about, we will be on the air again.
— Hmm... The pitch to A-Rod is outside.
— Go back to the hotel, take a shower and come back, start working on this afternoon's game.
— A-Rod has walked, popped up, singled, grounded out, and singled. And the pitch is high and the count 2 and 0. Now the right-hander Foulke holds to set and here's the 2-0, a high pop in the middle of the diamond. Mike Lowell behind the mound makes the catch and there's one away. Yankee Stadium is for more than just baseball. With year-round availability, the Yankees are currently taking reservations for corporate outings, parties, meeting, weddings, and more. For more information, call Gina Chindemi at 718 579 4416 or email events@yankees.com. Here's Robbie Cano with one out and one on, Abreu at first. And he hits a high pop right around the pitcher's mound, Youkilis the first baseman calling makes the catch and there are two away.

— You look at Keith Foulke and, you know, they signed him as a closer. He throws his fastball at about 87 miles an hour. That change, which he popped up, was 76, so you know, he really is... it doesn't matter how hard you throw. He hasn't hit 90 yet and doesn't.

— Giambi takes a strike.

— OK. We have a, uh, update... so far he was about... on Kyle Farnsworth examined by Yankees team doctor Stuart Hershon. He has a contusion of the right lower leg. His X-rays taken here at Fenway were negative...

— A throw over and Abreu gets back.

— ...he is, uh, day-to-day, and, uh, will be re-examined tomorrow.

— Giambi takes outside and the count 1 and 1. Giambi played a big part in the rally. One out, no one on, bottom of the seventh, Yankees down 10-7, he pinch hit and walked. Bernie singled, Posada pinch hit and singled to load 'em up, Cabrera singled in one after Damon popped up, Jeter... that pitch is fouled away doubled in three, so that's four runs Abreu walked, A-Rod singled in a run, that's five and then Cano... A-Rod took second on the throw... Cano then singled in two for the seven runs. Now here's the 1-2. Popped foul, third base side out of play.

— This is improbable if Mariano gets through the bottom of the ninth inning. This really is an improbable double header.

— Yes. Unbelievable. Yeah. And as I mentioned, it will be written about and talked about for years. Here's the 1-2 to Giambi. A high fly to left. Manny Ramírez drifts back. He's there to make the catch and that ends the top of the ninth. No runs, no hits, one left. Now at the end of eight and a half, it's 14 to 10 Yanks on the New York Yankees Radio Network.

I'll never forget my wedding day. My car ran into a ditch 'cause I didn't get my brakes checked.

Don't let this happen to you. Come into Meineke for our oil change special and receive a filter, up to five quarts of oil, a tire rotation, a balance check and a brake check for only $19.95.

This is George Foreman. For your wedding day or any day come into Meineke.

Now for most cars and light trucks at participating Meineke locations. Disposal fee and shop supplies may be extra. Ask store managers for details. Offer ends August 13th, 2006. Visit Meineke car care center for all your car care needs.

These days everybody wants things customized.

Got a flat screen TV, DVD, DVR, CD, MP3, XYZ, up in this mug.

That's why Wendy's brings you combo choices. Pick any combo and pick from seven delicious sides at no extra cost.

I got the suede seats, saltwater aquarium, shoe rack, hat rack, mini fridge, espresso machine, yeah, I got cable.

Enjoy two new choices like baked lays and yogurt with granola or get a baked potato, chili, one of two sides of salad or French fries.

You think I should get a vanity plate? Or is that just pushing it?

So don't compromise. Customize. Do Wendy's. Do what tastes right. Eat great even late at Wendy's pickup window, open 'til one a.m. or later with a full menu to choose from. Try one of Wendy's new deli fresh Frescata combos and choose any of seven delicious sides at no extra cost. Don't compromise, customize your combo. Do Wendy's. Do what tastes right.

— Well, Scott Proctor goes an inning and a third, no runs, no hits. Mariano comes on. Ponson, Villone, Bruney, Myers, Farnsworth, Proctor, Rivera. Nick Green goes to first base for the Yanks. I don't know if he's ever played first but the rule of thumb is that if you're a middle infielder or a third baseman, you can field ground balls, you can make throws to second and so why can't you play first? And over the years, the Yankees have used Luis Sojo and Miguel Cairo and infielders like that at first so, Nick Green takes over at first, for the ninth. Mariano comes in to get the final three outs. If he does, the Yankees sweep the double header and will move up by three and a half and by four on the loss side. Now here's uh... Mark Loretta to lead off and he hits a high pop to first. Nick Green in foul territory makes the catch. One away. Boston used Lester, Tavarez, Hanson, Timlin, and Foulke. So one away and here is David Ortiz. And Rivera deals a strike. Yankees have a 14 to 10 lead in the bottom of the ninth, one out, no one on. Ortiz one for four. He hits a high drive to right. That ball is high. It is far. It is gone! Into the Yankees bullpen, a long home run for Ortiz and the Red Sox trail 14 to 11. For Ortiz, his 43rd homer, his 114th RBI. And now here is Manny Ramírez who has singled, doubled, singled, singled, and singled. He is five for five. Rivera deals a strike to Manny. Now Rivera deals and the pitch is grounded to third, off the glove of A-Rod an error for A-Rod. So one on and one out, Yanks with a three-run lead 14-11. A-Rod he kind of let the ball play him. Kind of backed up and played it to the side, it went off his glove. So here is Mike Lowell. Now Rivera holds to set and deals a strike. Lowell takes inside, the count 1 and 1. Road Runner high speed online from Time Warner Cable, that pitch came in at 95 miles an hour. Now, here's the 1-1. Fouled back and the count 1 and 2. Now Rivera deals low outside. It'll be a 2-2 to Lowell. Rivera swung on, hit in the air to right. Bernie moves to right center. He's there to make the catch and there are two away. Here's Wily Mo Peña, Boston's final hope. Peña's 0 for 4 on the night. Rivera deals. Inside and low, the count 1 and 0. Now the pitch. There's a strike. And the count 1 and 1. The Yankees with a 14 to 11 lead here in the bottom of the ninth with two outs. The 1-1 fouled back and the count 1 and 2. Now Rivera deals. Grounded wide at first, fielded by Green. Goes to Rivera covering. In time for the out. Ball game over! Yankees win! The Yankees win!
Seven American Deaths and Disasters
See the Wheeler Dealer.
God bless you sır.
That’s alright, buddy. We all feel the same. Anybody who has the courage to marry somebody named Eunice can’t be all bad.
See the Wheeler Dealer, won’t you? Now showing at showing at two theaters in downtown Dallas, the Capri downtown Dallas and The Hollywood in downtown Fort Worth. Don’t forget, President Kennedy’s speech today has been billed as a major event. KLIF news, of course, will be bringing you excerpts of that speech throughout the afternoon.
OK? I’m Andy Fine and away we go on the Rex Jones show.
The first of the two most glorious holidays of the year is coming.
So it won't be long until you make a most important meat purchase. Yes, Thanksgiving is only days away and this happy holiday will be just a little better this year if a little forethought goes into the purchase of a traditional turkey. Naturally, you want a turkey that gives you extra meat per pound. And if you’re like most families, you’ll want a turkey that offers the most sweet, absolutely delicious white meat per pound. There are turkeys that meet these requirements. You’ll find them at your grocer’s bearing the famous Armour Star. Yes, ma’am, I’m talking about Armour Star broad breasted turkeys, government inspected and graded to give your family a very special treat this Thanksgiving.
Armour Star turkeys have moderately deep, well-rounded breasts with extra white meat, plenty of dark meat too. When you shop at your grocer’s for that Thanksgiving turkey, get an Armour Star broad breasted turkey. Government inspected and graded to assure you of the very best. Armour Star, best by far.
I know what he’s talking about. Twenty-two-and-a-half minutes now away from one o’clock. Alright, now let’s take a little bit of time out here. Everybody to the icebox, let’s get a beer.
The teams are on the field, the game time’s here. Let’s kick off the fun with a Falstaff beer. A great teammate for all your good times.
Premium quality Falstaff, coast-to-coast for the most refreshing taste in beer, this is the one. Light, brisk Falstaff. For extra convenience, buy Falstaff in no deposit, no return cans in handy packs of six.
Falstaff. This is the one.

(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom)
I have a boyfriend
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
Met him a week ago
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
He's my forever
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
Last night he told me so
He's the boy that I adore
Never felt like this before
And I know I'll never let him go
I have a boyfriend
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom)
(Whoo-eee-whoo)
We’ll never say goodbye
(Boom-sh-boom)
(Boom-sh-boom)
He made a promise
(Boom)
(Whoo-eee-whoo)
He’ll never make me cry
(Boom-sh-boom)
Every time we kiss goodnight
Feels so good to hold him tight...

This is a KLIF bulletin from Dallas. Three shots reportedly were fired at the motorcade of President Kennedy today near the downtown section. KLIF news is checking out the report. We will have further reports. Stay tuned.

... up in the sky
(And someday I know) oh-oh, yeah
(We'll walk down the aisle)
Yes, we will (so much in love)
Whoa-oh-oh-oh (wearing a smile)
Every time we kiss goodnight
Feels so good to hold him tight
Oh-oh, I'm so glad I have a boyfriend
I have a boyfriend
Whoa-oh-oh-oh-oh, whoa-oh-oh-oh
I have a boyfriend, yeaaaaah, I do
Oh yeah, I Have A Boyfriend is the name of that one by The Chiffons. And I think that is a real winner. As a matter of fact, you must think so too, already voted #36 on the instant Top 40 on KLIF.

We're doing our Christmas shopping at Robert Hall this year.
We're saving on clothes for Christmas at Robert Hall this year.
More quality for low prices
On gifts for one and all.
There's a wide selection,
A bigger collection
Where America goes for family clothes,
It's Robert Hall this year.

For the lady who wants more fashion at less cost, Robert Hall has a delightful array of holiday dresses priced as low as $7.97. Other Christmas features are the elegant three-piece wool suits priced from only $12.97. Robes and pajama sets are priced from only $3.97 at Robert Hall, gift center for the family.

You bet your sweet life. Hey fellas, get the aristocrat suit, the Julliard worsted suit, nationally advertised in Look and Life magazine.
Robert Hall now features the Julliard suit at just $46.95. Don't forget. Alterations definitely are included.

KLIF 1190.

Hello, we have 63 degrees in Big D at the moment, going up to...

The best meat from the farmer goes to Armour and from Armour to the butcher to you. If you want the best from the farmer ask for Armour and do what the butchers do. Be sure it's Armour, the meat the butcher brings home. Say, if you fix lunches for the family every day, there's a mighty happy solution to the variety problem. Armour Star lunch meat.

Why, there are so many varieties, you could go for a couple of weeks without ever repeating. Nourishing? Four slices of Armour lunch meat in a couple of sandwiches pack all the wallop of a bowl of beef stew. Get Armour Star lunch meat for the kids. The sandwich meat that sticks to your ribs. Lots of different kinds. Easy to make. So for goodness sake, be sure it's Armour. The meat the butcher brings home.

Six minutes away from the hour of one o'clock right now on the Rex Jones show. This is Tommy Roe. He includes just about everybody.

Everybody, everybody,
Everybody's, had a broken heart now...
Here is a further report after we have just received word that shots have been fired at the Kennedy motorcade. We just talked to the police department. Here is that conversation.
Several persons arrived at Parkland and no information is being given at this time.
But you did have a report of shots being fired.
We have reports, yes sir.
KLIF news. On at Parkland Hospital to confirm the reports that someone had been wounded in the firing of shots in the Kennedy motorcade at downtown Dallas. Stay tuned for more news.

...everybody, everybody,
everybody's, blue when they're lonesome.
Everybody, everybody,
everybody's had the blues.
One time or other everybody listen to me,
you lose somebody you love.
But that's no reason for you to break down and cry.
I said a hey, everybody, everybody,
everybody's, had a lonely moment.
Everybody, everybody,
everybody's had the blues.
One time or other everybody listen to me,
you lose somebody you love.
That's no reason for you to break down and cry.
I said a hey, everybody, everybody,
Everybody's, had a lonely moment.
Everybody, everybody,
everybody's had the blues.
Here he goes. And that's Tommy Rowe, of course and that one's called Hey Everybody and that's instant survey number one for about the fourth day in a row.

Refreshing as a glass of water, that's the taste, fresh taste that Hamm's has captured. Rural Texas, the people of Hamm's say thank you.
Yes, thanks for making Hamm's beer such a favorite. It's got that famous taste that thousands of Texans are enjoying every day. In fact, somewhere in Texas, someone is opening and enjoying a Hamm's beer every three seconds. This weekend is the perfect time to refresh yourself with a cold Hamm's beer. Thanks again for the spectacular welcome. May we suggest you stock up for the weekend with Texas brewed premium Hamm's beer at popular Texas prices. Refreshing as a glass of water, that's the taste, fresh taste of Hamm's.

Hey, be sure that you stock up for this weekend with Texas-brewed premium Hamm's beer at popular Texas prices.

And now we take you to KLIF Mobile Unit No. 4 in downtown Dallas.
The latest information -- and things are rather confused at this moment -- shots definitely were fired at the presidential motorcade as it passed through downtown Dallas. All squads are converging code three in the area of Elm and Houston in downtown. There is a tentative description of the shooting suspect. A man, a white male believed to be approximately 30 years old, reportedly armed with a .30 caliber rifle. How many shots were fired, how many persons if any were struck and wounded, we do not know yet. Very closed-mouthed officials are clamping down on the entire story. We'll bring you what details are available just as quickly as they come into our possession.

Sandra Dee has her troubles. Listen. A lot's been said about the wild teenage thing. But wait till you see the scrapes my dad Jimmy Stewart gets into. Yikes! You just wouldn't believe it. Can you picture Jimmy Stewart battling the police? Get 'em boy! Now! Oh no you don't! Mixed up with a French cutie. Holy Chihuahua! Doing a strip-tease. Yikes. You've just got to see our new picture, Take Her, She's Mine, to believe it. The wonderful Broadway smash is even funnier on the movie screen. Take Her, She's Mine, the hilarious story of a baby who suddenly becomes a babe. So take her, take him, take the family to see James Stewart and Sandra Dee in Take Her, She's Mine, co-starring Audrey Meadows. From Twentieth Century Fox in color by Deluxe. Take Her, She's Mine.

I'll do it friend, if you don't watch me very closely. It's the surprise fun show of the season now held over for a third big week at Interstate Palace Theater in Dallas.

You know that once upon a time
I didn't need you so
It would have been so easy then
For me to turn and go
But now there's no leavin' you
I know that for a fact
I'm at the point of no return
And for me there'll be no turning back
I told myself you'd always be
A habit I could break
But now a day without your kiss
Would be so hard to take
You just can't get off a train
That's movin' down the track
I'm at the point of no return
And for me there'll be no turning back
Once I could have said "goodbye" but that was at the start
Now I think I'd rather die than be the one to say "We'll part"
Maybe you will break my heart
Or maybe you'll be true
No matter what the future brings
I've got to see it through
Maybe your love for me is nothin' but an act
I'm at the point of no return
And for me there'll be no turnin' back
Yeah, for me there'll be no turnin' back
Unh, unh, unh, unh, unh, unh

That's Gene McDaniels with a KLIF classic. And ladies and gentlemen stand by at 1190 on your dial for further developments in the reported shooting during the motorcade of President Kennedy on his visit to Dallas, Texas.

Are you hoping that someday you'll find something that's really good for pimples and a bad complexion? Search no more. Baker's Beauty Lotion is what you need. A brand new, modern formula. Safe, easy and pleasant to use. Mrs. H.W. Henchbeth, 1044 Garden View Drive, Dallas, says: My grandson had pimples all over his face and Baker's Beauty Lotion sure has done wonders for him. I highly recommend it for pimples and skin blemishes. Baker's Beauty Lotion is a part of the old reliable Baker's Hair Tonic for dandruff. For pimples and bad complexion, Baker's Beauty Lotion is the best yet. It's a new formula containing no harmful or unpleasant ingredients. It's easy and safe to use. Those who use Baker's Beauty Lotion face the world with a clear face. Or your money back.

And now another report from downtown Dallas.

Details on the chase and search in downtown Dallas. An unidentified man fired several shots from what apparently was a high-powered .30-30 caliber rifle at the presidential motorcade. So far, the authorities are not releasing details on who, if anyone, was hit by any of the bullets or how badly they were injured. Parkland Hospital, being very closed now about the situation, but the search now centers at the area of Elm and Houston near the old Texas Schoolbook Depository building and there is a possibility that the would-be assassin is still inside that building. All of the available downtown units are converging at emergency speed to that area. The entire area has been blocked off and is roped off now. No one allowed in or out as the search for this would-be presidential assassin continues in downtown Dallas. What has been a very smooth journey to Texas for the president and his, uh, wife and other officials, Vice President and Mrs. Lyndon Johnson now has turned into another black smear. And we are keeping up to date on all the details through official police sources and we'll bring you full details as soon as they're available.

I do 90 percent of your work. I'm Bab-O cleanser. Grease dissolving, stain removing, powerful new Bab-O. Now do you believe me?

KLIF, 1190. Break in!

This is the KLIF newsroom. The police department is still trying to confirm the fact that President Kennedy and Governor John Connally have been wounded, perhaps tragically in a late-morning shooting in in the downtown area. According to the latest reports, both have been cut down by at least three bullets that pierced the atmosphere as the motorcade made its way from Love Field through the downtown area to the Trade Mart where President Kennedy was to speak at a luncheon. They were riding in an open automobile when the shots were fired. The bubble had been discarded when the sun broke through the clouds here in Big D. The president, his body cradled in the arms of Mrs. Kennedy, has been rushed to Parkland Hospital. We are still waiting word from Parkland the extent of his injury. We just talked with the police department just a moment ago. Here was the conversation.

Can you give us confirmation that the president has been shot?
No sir.
Can you give us the description again, please, ma'am?
Well, we're busy right now. Did you get it off the radio or, uh...? It's a white male, .30-30 caliber rifle and, uh, uh, I believe it's at Elm and Houston where it came from. Now, I don't know definitely and I don't like to say...

That was the police department, Mrs. Shrimpton saying they have not received a confirmed report. And now we'll switch you to the downtown area of Dallas and this is Joe Long.

This is the latest unconfirmed report we have -- and we must stress that this is unconfirmed but it comes from a very high placed official who refuses to be quoted -- it is now reported that Governor Connelly and the president have perhaps been wounded in this assassin's attempt. It is an unofficial report that both the president and Governor Connelly were wounded in this event of the shooting in the downtown area during the passing of the motorcade. The automobile in which the president was riding reportedly sped out to Parkland Hospital and, uh, we do not know if Mrs. Kennedy or Mrs. Connelly suffered any injury.
The first report we had said that both of the men were lying prone in the automobile in the caravan limousine at the time it made its way rapidly to Parkland Hospital. We have no further details. Parkland Hospital is being placed off limits to reporters at this time but those details that are available will be brought to you just as quickly as we possibly can. Very briefly recapping, there has been an assassination attempt in downtown Dallas. Shots fired from a high powered rifle at the presidential car in the motorcade as it was en route to the Trade Mart for a scheduled presidential speech. All of the security precautions have been taken and now this happened. And, uh, the police are converging on and surrounding the area of Elm and Houston, the Old Technical Schoolbook Exchange building where they believe they may have trapped the would-be assassin. We'll bring you further details momentarily. Joe Long with Mobile Unit No. 4. 1190 and out.

We're back at the KLIF studios issuing the bulletin again for the man armed with the .30-30 caliber rifle. He was described as about 5'10", 165 pounds, a slender build, about 30 or 35 years old. This tragic incident occurred at Elm and Houston as the motorcade was en route to the Trade Mart for a noon luncheon. The president, of course, was to deliver a speech during his appearance in Big D. Newsmen, uh, some five car lengths behind the president heard what sounded like three bursts of gunfire. Secret Service agents in the auto following the president quickly pulled out automatic rifles. The bubble, as we'd mentioned previously, on the president's car was down when the shots rang out. The president slumped over the back seat, face down. Governor Connelly lay on the floor of the rear seat. Wounds in the governor's chest were clearly visible. The wounds indicated that an automatic weapon had been used. Police say this is believed to be a .30-30 caliber pistol, er, rather rifle. Three loud bursts of gunfire, a possible tragedy on this November 22nd in Big D. We're going to switch now to the Trade Mart and, uh, here is a statement from Gordon McLendon.

Gordon McLendon at the Trade Mart in Dallas. Here the scene is of wild pandemonium as 2,000 guests waited anxiously for President Kennedy, Governor Connelly, and the vice president. Now, rumors run rampant. No one here knows what has happened, but the rumors continue to circulate that the president and Governor Connelly have both been shot. And, here at the Trade Mart, we have nothing but rumors and a wild scene of chaos. This is Gordon McLendon from the Trade Mart in Dallas.

That was Gordon McLendon from the Trade Mart in Dallas. Again, we are still trying to get confirmed reports from Parkland Hospital that President Kennedy and Governor Connelly have been cut down by an assassin's bullet, a fusillade of bullets at the intersection of Elm and Houston in downtown Dallas. It is impossible -- and it was impossible at that time -- to tell where the president was hit, but bullet wounds in Connelly's chest clearly indicated that he had been wounded in that region. There were three loud bursts visibly heard by members of the motorcade of the president, who quickly leaped off their bikes and raced up a grassy hill. That description again, a man about 5'10", 165 pounds, about 30 years of age, he was armed with a .30-30 caliber rifle. He was of slender build. The police department has thrown out an extensive dragnet. We are still trying to get in touch with Parkland Hospital, where we hope to have confirmation. The latest report that we have from one press source, Clint Hill, a Secret Service agent assigned to Mrs. Kennedy said, he's dead, as the president was lifted from rear of the White House touring car. Mr. Kennedy was rushed to the Parkland Hospital emergency room. Other White House officials
The incident occurred at Elm and Houston in the downtown area as the motorcade wended its way through the region. Newsmen in the motorcade did hear the three bursts from the automatic rifle. It is impossible and was so at the time to tell where the Chief Executive was struck by the bullets. We are now in contact with, uh, one of our news units and we are going to switch you now for another report from the downtown section of Dallas.

Joe Long again from Mobile Unit No. 4. The police cordon and the wide search net continues. We still do not know whether this would-be assassin is trapped in the building or in the area at all. The search continues. We're going to vacate this mobile unit momentarily and we'll be back in touch with you just as quickly as possible. KLIF newsmen and mobile units are spread throughout the strategic spots, uh, covering this story. We'll bring you full details momentarily. Joe Long, Mobile Unit No. 4. 1190 and out.

The possible tragedy came after President Kennedy arrived three minutes late at Love Field as his big jet plane with Number One on its side floated down to earth and the sun broke through the clouds. After the president was ten minutes away leaving Fort Worth, he was ten minutes late... he was three minutes late arriving at Dallas Love Field. An estimated 250,000 persons lined the streets this afternoon as the president's motorcade moved through the streets. Then at 12:50 pm central time, acting White House news secretary Malcolm Kilduff was asked whether the president was dead. He said, I have no word now and that is the word we are awaiting. I have no word now, the latest. Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth had just said that both President Kennedy and Governor Connelly were seriously wounded in the attack but were alive. This is the latest: Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth has said that both President Kennedy and Governor Connelly were seriously wounded but were still alive and now here is KLIF's Joe Long.

Still no official word from Parkland Hospital. We were en route from Love Field. We had described the arrival of the presidential party and that is when the first word of the shooting came out. We have been in the deep downtown area in the area of Elm and Houston and the dragnet continues. So far Parkland Hospital has not released an official statement of President Kennedy and Governor John Connally. We do know now, however, that both of these men were wounded in the assassination attempt. And the dragnet and search continues. We are finding these details slow in coming. We have many official and unofficial comments coming from various sources, but at this moment, let's summarize it this way: As the presidential motorcade made its way through downtown Dallas, at least three shots rang out in the vicinity of Elm and Houston and one child reportedly was a witness to the shooting, uh, a young colored boy, who said that as he heard the first shot, he looked up at the fourth floor window of the Old Texas Schoolbook Exchange Building and saw a man leaning from the window and then he fired at least two more shots. The report we had from witnesses at the scene said that both the president and Governor Connelly were lying prone in the presidential limousine as it had sped to Parkland Hospital. From Parkland, Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth said that both Kennedy and Connelly were seriously wounded but are still alive. However we must stress that this is an unofficial report. It is not a medical report. Here is a description now, of the man who fired the shots.

Well, we're busy right now. Did you get it off the radio or, uh...? It's a white male, .30-30 caliber rifle and, uh, uh, I believe it's at Elm and Houston where it came from. Now, I don't know definitely and I don't like to say...

That was an official police department dispatcher description of the man we believe fired the would-be deadly shots at the presidential motorcade. There were about 250,000 persons lining the downtown streets at the time this incident took place. As the motorcade made its way toward the triple underpass, the crowd would break up and flood into the streets. But still it was an orderly crowd, held back from the streets at the time the shooting occurred. Obviously this had to be a high-powered rifle for there to have been such a degree of accuracy on the part of the assassin firing bullets into both the president and Governor Connelly. It was approximately 12:50 our time when acting White House news secretary Malcolm Kilduff was asked whether the president was dead. He said I have no word at this time. That is acting news secretary Kilduff who made the trip instead of the usual White House news corps. Vice President Johnson was in the car behind the president and there was, uh, no indication at all that he was injured. Also, we do not have any indication whether the First Lady, Mrs. Jackie Kennedy or Mrs. John Connelly suffered any injuries.

The report we have now, here it is, officially Mrs. Kennedy apparently is safe, Mrs. Connelly also safe it appears to those witnesses at Parkland Hospital and, um, to say it mildly, both women extremely stunned. Mrs. Kennedy reportedly had cradled her husband's head in her lap during the speedy trip to Parkland Hospital. Kennedy, according to a member of his staff, was still alive ten minutes ago. Ten minutes ago we had word that the president was still alive. The blood was spattered all over the inside of the limousine, which had been flown in specially to carry the president. Ordinarily there is a huge plastic bubble which allows the public a view of the president and those in the car with him, but gives those inside the limousine protection from the weather and would-be assassins. But because of the rapid, beautiful turn in today's weather, the bubble had been removed and the president and all those in the limousine were fully exposed not only to the public and the elements, but also to these would-be killer bullets. Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth, as we told you earlier -- he, in addition to Kilduff, would be perhaps the most official source we've been able to contact so far -- told us that both Kennedy and Connelly were seriously wounded, but as of 12:55, eleven minutes ago, both were alive. A call has been sent out for some of the top surgical specialists in the city. A call also has been placed for a priest to report to Parkland Hospital.

Now, let's summarize this so we can bring you up to date and give you full details of all the facts that we have available at our disposal at this moment. President Kennedy arrived in Dallas at approximately 11:35. He received a rousing welcome from some 2,000 spectators at Dallas-Love Field. Then the motorcade began its trip through downtown Dallas to the Trade Mart, where he was scheduled to address some 2,500 spectators and supporters. But just short of the moment he would have left the downtown area, as the motorcade began its trip toward the triple underpass at Elm and Houston, three bullets rang out, apparently fired from a .30-30 caliber rifle. The assassin supposedly was in a building about three or four stories up when he unleashed the deadly veil of bullets. We said deadly. That word was ill-advised. We will correct that. We do know, however, that the president and Governor Connelly, both riding in the presidential limousine were wounded. As they departed Love Field, the president and Mrs. Kennedy sat on the main back seat and Governor Connelly and his wife were on the jump seat. The Secret Service men and the chauffeur were in the front seat, but as witnesses stated, both men were prone in the vehicle. They did not bother with ambulances. The police escort made its way immediately to Parkland Hospital where top surgical specialists have been summoned. A call also has gone out for a priest. At this moment, word is that both men are still alive as of 12:55. The picture in downtown Dallas is one of extreme activity on the part of the police. There was that sudden call: all units report Code 3 to the downtown area of Elm and Houston. They are trying to surround this building and close it off in case this man still would be there. He is approximately 5'8" tall, weighs about 160 pounds, and is a white man. He was carrying a .30-.30 caliber rifle. We're going to call Roy Nichols in one of the KLIF mobile units downtown to see what details he has on the search for the would-be killer.

We have just left the corner of Elm and Harwood where the shooting took place. There is no information to be gained at that point right now other than what Joe has just told you. Police are still looking for the would-be assassin. We will be at Parkland Hospital in just a moment to see if we can gain any information from Parkland at all. Of course Parkland is not putting out any information at the moment as to whether the president and Governor Connelly have been critically wounded or not. But we will be there in just a moment and will bring you the official word from Parkland Hospital as soon as it is released. At Elm and Harwood, of course, police have converged on the area, still searching for the would-be assassin. We'll be at Parkland in just a moment and we hope to have an official report as soon as we get there. Roy Nichols, Mobile Unit No. 4. Out.

We now have received word from Parkland Hospital that the president is still alive. No official report yet on Governor Connelly's condition, however, both men were alive at 12:50. We do now have information that both -- or rather that President Kennedy -- is still alive. Word from Hyannis Port Massachusetts, just handed to us. Word is that President Kennedy's mother and father have been advised that he has been shot here in Dallas. They are presently at Hyannis Port. And from New York City, only minutes after the president was shot, stocks moved actively lower, but a few issues stayed on the upside.

The search continues through downtown Dallas for the man who today loaded a gun and intended to snuff out the life of the President of the United States and the Governor of the state of Texas, John Connally. How closely he has come to accomplishing his devious aim we do not know. We do have word that the president is still alive but the true extent of his injuries and what his present condition might be, we have not yet received official word on that. Top surgical specialists have been summoned to Parkland. A priest also has been summoned there. The president and Governor Connelly, riding in the same car were rushed directly to Parkland Hospital as the motorcade broke up once this shooting incident took place. The First Lady and Mrs. Connally, neither of them suffered any injuries from the gunfire. That's the latest word we have on their condition but both women, of course, in a high degree of agitation and state of shock over the wounding of their husbands. It was reported to us by one bystander that as the vehicles sped toward Parkland Hospital, the first lady cradled the president's head in her lap. Governor Connelly and the president were prone in the automobile. Having been past the intersection of Elm and Houston quite a number of times, if you will recall the old Texas Textbook Exchange building, it sits only some 20 to 30 feet from the edge of the street where the presidential motorcade would have been passing. And from a three storey... third storey window, accuracy could be pretty well counted upon if a person knew how to use a weapon at all. Also, it would have been a very devastating shot, should it come into contact with the person for whom it was intended. So we still are awaiting more official word on how critically the president has been injured.

Everything seemed to be going well for Dallas today. The weather cleared up, everything cleared up, and the crowd was orderly at Love Field when the president arrived. It looked like Dallas was going to have a smoothly operating presidential motorcade and visit and speech and then departure this afternoon. And then suddenly, a black cloud descended on Dallas as the president and Governor Connelly were wounded. We have only two official sources with whom we have been able to be in contact within the presidential party itself. Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth is one of those. He says that both the president and the governor have been seriously wounded but they are still alive. However, Clint Hill, a Secret Service agent assigned to protect Mrs. Kennedy had a much more critical description of the president's condition but, as we say, these are individual opinions and we have yet to receive direct official word from the surgeons at the hospital.

It is now reported to us by Parkland that president Kennedy is receiving blood transfusions. The president now receiving blood transfusions as a result of these assassin's bullets that tore into his body today. Three shots reportedly were fired at the motorcade.

And now we have word that a 25-year-old man has been caught at Field and Elm Street. He obviously is a suspect in this assassination attempt. He has been captured at Field and Elm and is being taken directly to police headquarters. We will be in touch with our reporter at police headquarters to let you know precisely, how accurately this man might be fitting the description of the man for whom they've been searching ever since the shots were fired that struck the president and the governor. Although Dallas has been regarded as a stronghold of political opposition to Kennedy, the heavy street crowds between Love Field and the scene of the shooting were overwhelmingly friendly. They were friendly at Love Field. There were a few derogatory signs but there were no physical incidents of, uh, any note at all. There were numerous Welcome Kennedy signs, a few anti-Kennedy signs, but all in all, the crowd was very orderly... all but one person. And that person is the subject on the lips of the world at this moment, as he has pumped bullets into the body of President Kennedy and Governor John Connelly, both of whom have been rushed to Parkland Hospital. Our reporters are in direct touch with the police department and Parkland Hospital. The search through the downtown area continues as we attempt to determine who has done this, has he been caught, and in what condition are we finding the president and Governor John Connelly.

The latest word from Parkland Hospital is that the president is receiving blood transfusions. He has been wounded, but he is alive. And the downtown area is not the place to be this moment unless you are on official business because the police department, the Secret Service, the highway patrol and the sheriff's office are making one of the biggest manhunts in all Texas -- in fact all the nation -- as they attempt to find the man who fired these shots at the president. One man perched on the roof of his car had held up to the president a sign saying that, because of Kennedy's socialistic beliefs quote, I hold you in complete contempt. That was one of the few derogatory signs that we have found in the downtown area. And now, back to Gary DeLaune.

The police have reported that they arrested a man about twenty-five years of age, fitting the description broadcast earlier by the Dallas Police Department, 5'10", 165 pounds. This last report stated that the president is undergoing emergency transfusions at this time at Parkland Hospital. The last word that we had shortly before 1:00, about two minutes before one is that both the president and Governor John Connelly were fighting for their lives. The man armed with a .30-30 caliber rifle was perched from a building at Elm and Houston as the motorcade made its way to the Trade Mart. Now it is a very dejected, depressing, desolate room where the luncheon was to have taken place. A city in great apprehension this afternoon. The New York Stock Exchange closed operations after word of the assassination attempt against the president and Governor Connelly. The Cotton and Wool Exchanges also closed. We are still awaiting word from Parkland Hospital as to the immediate condition of the president. As of sixteen minutes ago he was still battling for his life, undergoing blood transfusions. There have been, uh, many incidents in Big D in recent weeks that have tarnished the reputation of Dallas and this morning it appeared that the city in Texas we call The Gateway to the South was going to have a chance to redeem itself. The sun broke through the clouds and about 2,000 persons gathered at the airport to greet the president. Departing from political procedures somewhat, the president left the limousine and walked behind the car. Mrs. Kennedy did likewise. They shook hands with well-wishers alongside the Love Field fence. Then the president and Mrs. Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, Governor and Mrs. Connelly greeted their cars and made their way to the downtown area. At twenty minutes before one, approximately, the dastardly deed was done here in Dallas -- that was the approximate time we received the news. One man was perched on the roof of his automobile. He held out toward the president a sign saying that because of Kennedy’s socialistic beliefs, I hold you in complete contempt. And now we're going to turn you back over to Joe Long.

Let’s summarize again precisely what has occurred here today. President Kennedy and his official traveling party took off from Fort Worth Carswell Air Base this morning shortly after 11:00. He arrived in Dallas shortly past 11:30. Everything went smoothly. The rain cleared away, the sun came out, there was a good crowd on hand, well-behaved. The president departed from protocol. He left the official limousine, walked along the fenced area shaking hands with the spectators. Then the motorcade departed and the trip had just about concluded when the three shots rang out from an assassin’s rifle, striking the president and Governor John Connelly. Both men rushed to Dallas Parkland Hospital by emergency speed. Official surgical reports are not available at this moment. A special carton of blood, apparently for transfusion purposes, has been rushed into the emergency ward. Two Dallas police officers carried that carton. The president’s body was limp as he was carried into the hospital, cradled in the arms of his wife. He was rushed to Parkland Hospital. The governor was also taken there. The surgical specialists have been called in. A Roman Catholic priest also has been sent for. Shortly after the shooting, Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth said both the president and Connelly were alive, but seriously wounded.

And now here’s a late report from Dallas police. One Secret Service agent reportedly was killed in the assassin’s attempt. The Secret Service men have been in Dallas throughout the week, paving the way for this trip, hoping that it would go smoothly but, no, this has not been the case today. In fact, it has gone tragically at this moment. We now have reports that a 25-year-old man has been arrested in the downtown area, a hot suspect in this case. The assassin apparently fired his shots from a .30 caliber rifle from a third floor window of a schoolbook exchange building, just before the presidential motorcade was to go under a triple-overpass, then out on to the main Stemmons Expressway, along to the Trade Mart, where the president was to have lunch and give his address. Blood was spattered all over the White House car. Mr. Kennedy was slumped over the back seat. Governor Connelly lay on the floor at the rear of the seat. Mrs. Kennedy apparently was not hurt. Mrs. Connelly was safe. The witnesses in the downtown area said there were three loud bursts of gunfire. The motorcycle police who were escorting the president quickly jumped from their bikes and raced up a grassy hill to take up position for possible action against the assassin. At the height of the emergency room drama, a weeping Negro woman bearing a small bloody child rushed into the hospital, where a nurse and intern went quickly to her side. The business of Parkland Hospital emergency room is continuous, 24 hours a day, but never has it been so busy with such a distinguished pair of patients as they have received there today -- Governor John Connelly and President Kennedy, both wounded in an assassination attempt in downtown Dallas. One man has been arrested as a prime suspect. He fits fairly closely the description of the man who supposedly fired these bullets. He was arrested in the vicinity of Elm and Houston where the dragnet has been for some 45 minutes now and is being rushed to police headquarters for further questioning. There was absolutely no warning that this would take place. Of course these things always come so spontaneously. Should there be any warning, then the president would be better protected and an alternate route could have been prepared. But everything had gone smoothly to this very moment. Then, the three shots rang out and the vehicle bearing the president and the governor rushed to Parkland Hospital, both men prone in the back seat area of the vehicle. The president's head was cradled in the First Lady's lap. We repeat -- both Mrs. Kennedy and Mrs. Connelly apparently escaped any injury from this assassination attempt. But it is now official, both President Kennedy and Governor Connelly have been shot and wounded. At Parkland Hospital, top surgical specialists have arrived, a Roman Catholic priest has arrived, and a few moments ago, a special shipment of blood was brought in by two Dallas police officers. Bill Tomlinson, an assistant to Governor Connelly talked from the operating room -- this is late word from Parkland -- saying that the governor had been shot just below the shoulder blade in the back. Tomlinson said he asked Connelly how it happened and he said, I don't know, I guess from the back, but they got the president too. Congressman Jim Wright of Fort Worth says that both men were still alive as of 12:55 Dallas time, approximately thirty minutes ago, but all indications -- according to the extensiveness of the treatment at Parkland Hospital -- every indication we have is that the wounds possibly are of a serious nature. The latest report from United Press International leads off this way: President Kennedy has been shot. He is perhaps fatally wounded. But we must keep repeating that there is no official word that the president is in critical condition at this time. However, he was slumped over in the back seat from the impact of the high caliber bullets that were poured into the back seat of the presidential limousine.

The last shooting incident involving a president occurred in 1950, when President Harry Truman was in office and living in Blair House in Washington when The White House was being renovated. Two Puerto Rican nationalists tried to gun their way into Blair House and assassinate Truman, who was taking a nap at the time on the second floor. One White House officer was killed in that assassination attempt and another was seriously wounded, and one of the assassins was cut down in the blaze of defensive gunfire on Pennsylvania Avenue. The Senate has adjourned in Washington upon learning of the assassination attempt. The American Stock Exchange closed its operations today after word of the attempt and the New York Stock Exchange took an expected dip.
Late word from Parkland Hospital. A Father Huber of Holy Trinity Church in Dallas has administered the last sacraments of the church to the president. This does not mean that the president has died. It is a religious precaution for those persons who are seriously ill or who have been seriously injured. But a Father Huber of the Holy Trinity Church of Dallas has at Parkland Hospital administered the last sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church to the president. There have been many reports coming from Parkland Hospital, some of which we have been able to confirm, others we have not. But we must stress this: KLIF is only accepting news from official sources, those with whom we are in contact with daily, those persons we know and can be absolutely certain of the reliability of their statements. So what you hear us broadcast, please bear in mind it is all of official nature or of eyewitness detail.

Sheriff's officers took a young man into custody at the scene. They are questioning him behind closed doors. But the word from Parkland is that a Roman Catholic priest has administered the last sacraments of the church to the president. The sacrament was administered shortly before 1:00. However, we have received no further word on the severity of the president's condition. There are reports circulating by other news media in Dallas that the president has been killed, but we have yet to receive our official source word on this from Parkland Hospital or any of the other officials involved in this operation. A prime suspect in the assassination attempt is in custody.

And now, we will see if Roy Nichols has made his way back into the mobile unit. He has been at Parkland Hospital and at the search scene. Perhaps we can contact Roy Nichols now. Roy obviously is out of the unit at Parkland Hospital checking with emergency sources there at this time. But at last report, the president and Governor Connelly both have received transfusions. A Roman Catholic priest has administered last sacraments of the church to the president. We do not know how seriously he was injured but Governor Connelly was conscious in the hospital emergency room. One of his aides, Bill Stinson -- he's an assistant to the governor -- says that he talked to the governor in the hospital operating room and said the governor was shot just below the shoulder blade in the back. Stinson said he asked Connelly how it happened and he said, I don't know, I guess from the back, but they got the president too.

So that's the situation to this moment as we await further official word on the condition of President Kennedy, who has been rushed to Parkland Hospital after being shot, bullets crashing from a high-powered rifle in the downtown Dallas area, almost at the conclusion of a near-perfect reception and motorcade from Dallas-Love Field. It was headed for the Trade Mart, where some 2,500 supporters and well-wishers stood by waiting to greet the president and to hear the address he was to give there this afternoon. So that is the situation to this moment. One suspect is in custody. The last rites of the church have been administered to the president. Another priest, who declined to give his name, said the Chief Executive still was alive at the time the sacrament was administered shortly before 1:00 Dallas time. Sheriff's officers have a young man -- the prime suspect in custody at the scene -- and are questioning him behind closed doors at this moment. The dragnet was all over all of the downtown Dallas area, but most of all, it was concentrated in the vicinity of Elm and Houston Streets, where the bullets were fired. The presidential car immediately sped the president and Governor Connelly to Parkland Hospital. Emergency blood supplies have been brought in, top surgeons have been called in, and two priests -- two Catholic priests who were summoned to the scene -- one has administered the last sacrament of the church to the president, but at last report, he apparently is still alive and how critical his injuries may be we have not yet been able to determine.

There is, uh, a strong rumor that the president is dead, Joe, but until Parkland says it is official... but there is... is strong indication that the President of the United States is dead.

This is the strong indication. We have received several reports to that effect but as we have outlined before, until the official word is received, KLIF is withholding any stern and final pronouncement on that.

Were that true, Joe, it would be the second time in American history that a Johnson had seceded to the presidency from the death of a president, the last time having been, of course, the assassination of President Lincoln and he was, of course, seceded by Andrew Johnson. We have word that Vice President Lyndon Johnson is somewhere in Parkland Hospital. It has been impossible to determine his precise whereabouts at this moment. He was reported, of course, badly shocked by the shooting. Doctors were trying to keep him as quiet as possible. Vice President Johnson occupied the limousine directly behind the president's car. He is now under heavy Secret Service and police protection. Throughout the Texas trip, when Kennedy and Johnson had been in the same motorcade -- as an obvious security measure -- they have ridden in separate cars as they did today. The Johnson car has always been some distance behind the presidential car. Senator Ralph Yarborough, in a nearby car said he saw the president's lips moving at a normal rate of speed while he was being rushed to the hospital.

Gordon McLendon has just returned from the Trade Mart, where the scene that had been so beautifully set there for the president's arrival, the luncheon, and his speech this afternoon is empty now. Gordon, what was the effect on those, some 2,000 people waiting there?

Stunned, of course, Joe. There was a wild scramble for transportation out of the Trade Mart, particularly by reporters from throughout the United States seeking to get transportation some way, somehow, to Parkland Hospital. By the time we left, which was approximately ten minutes after the shooting, the giant Trade Mart had been more than half-emptied of the 2,000 people who had been assembled there to see the president, the vice president, and the remainder of the luminaries. Rumors ran rampant. At first it was, uh, thought that Vice President Johnson had also been shot in the attack. I can only say that no one at the Trade Mart knew very much, but now everyone is fully aware. Malcolm Kilduff, the acting press secretary -- he is in charge of press relations on this tour -- says he cannot say at this time whether the president is still alive and cannot say where he was hit. Says Kilduff, there are just too many stories at this time. Perhaps it was a gap in the motorcade, which we mentioned earlier, that saved Johnson from being a target today. These are the security precautions that they've been taking to keep the president and the vice president separated. The priest that accompanied Father Huber did not go into the emergency room itself. He said that he understood the president's condition was critical but was still alive at 12:55.

We're in direct contact, Joe, with Parkland Hospital. We are in direct contact. We have been unable yet to verify the rumors -- and to this point they are strictly rumors -- that the president is dead. We will not know until the word comes through officially, but there have been strong indications that the president has expired but, uh, again we repeat, it is unofficial. President Kennedy and Governor John Connelly of Dallas, Texas having been cut down by assassin's bullets today at lunch. They were shot as they toured downtown Dallas in an open car. Specialists are arriving at the hospital -- which I might mention is the scene of wild pandemonium. As we were coming from the Trade Mart a moment ago in a Dallas police car, there was a call for twenty additional police units at Parkland Hospital. And, incidentally, on the fifth floor of the downtown building, from which the president and the governor were shot, they have now discovered empty rifle hulls and there is also indication that more than one man is involved in the attack. Joe?

We have had descriptions of three men, actually -- two white men and one colored man -- as being possible suspects in this shooting, but at present, a 25-year-old white man has been taken into custody. He is behind heavy security guard at this time and is undergoing extensive questioning, but it obviously had to be a high-powered rifle in order to have the almost deadly effect it had from that distance. And it was just... you could say the motorcade was almost home free at the time this took place.

It was almost there. It was leaving the most congested area of downtown. From there on, the route would have been relatively free of bystanders because it was a major expressway.

Clint Hill, a Secret Service agent assigned to Mrs. Kennedy, said as the president was lifted from the rear of the White Ho... House touring car at Parkland Hospital, he's dead. However, that again, comes under the category of an unconfirmed statement. We can only give you unconfirmed statements at this point. There are strong indications that the president has expired, but there has been no bulletin to that effect, and as Joe has told you, the last rites and sacrament has definitely been administered.

Correct. Two Catholic priests were summoned to the scene. Only one of them visited the president. That was the Father Huber and the word was that the president still was alive at the time the sacrament was administered, shortly before 1:00 Dallas time. Several of the surgeons have arrived. Blood plasma -- a special carton of blood plasma -- was brought into Parkland emergency not too long ago by two special Dallas police officers. Our KLIF reporters are in the downtown area where the search has been conducted for the would-be assassin, also at Parkland Hospital and at police headquarters and the sheriff's office to bring us the very latest and most official word that we are able to gather on this assassination attempt on the president's life today.

It would be the first time, of course, since the assassination of President McKinley that such an event has taken place in the United States and it would also be the second time in American history that a Johnson has seceded to the presidency upon the death of a president by assassination, the last time, of course, having been the secession of Andrew Johnson after the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. Joe?

At the time of these three shots -- and that is a little confused right now as to how many there were, but we do know of three because that's the consensus of witnesses who were there -- at the time the shots rang out, the motorcycle escort immediately jumped from their bikes, dashed up the grassy hill to the parkway just across the street from the old Texas Schoolbook Exchange Building and began their perusal of the building. One policeman fell to the ground, pulled his pistol and screamed, get down. And a man across the street standing in the crowd snatched up his little girl and ran. This was the man the police first chased because he had panicked and run at the hearing of the shots.
The building, incidentally Joe, the correct name of that building -- although it is the Texas Book Depository -- is the Sexton Building.

The Sexton Building.

Correct. And it is a very strategic point in the parade route. Whoever pulled this devious act knew that he was choosing a key location for his attempt on the president's life.

Well of course the major attention is being focused on the condition of the president. No one yet has any authoritative report on the nature of the wounds to Governor Connelly. Bullet wounds were plainly visible in Connelly's chest, so we know that he was shot in the chest. His condition, however, remains more of a mystery that that of the President of the United States. The president is clearly gravely, critically, and perhaps fatally wounded. There are strong indications that he may already have expired although that is not official. We repeat, not official. But the extent of the injuries to Governor Connelly is a closely shrouded secret at the moment.

President Kennedy is dead, Gordon. This is official word. The president is dead. The president, ladies and gentlemen, is dead at Parkland Hospital in Dallas.

The shock, uh, of an incident like this, particularly to those of us of the press, radio, and television corps, who had seen the president alive only a few moments ago, uh, can never be described. At Dallas-Love Field he arrived. He was his usual smiling self. He even deviated from protocol and went to the fence and shook hands with the people. So did Mrs. Kennedy. So did Vice President and Mrs. Johnson. And then the motorcade began its trip and then rang out the deadly bullets from the assassin's gun.

Ladies and gentlemen, the president of the United States is dead. The new president of the United States, by secession, is Lyndon Johnson. It will be the second time in American history that a Johnson has seceded to the presidency upon the assassination of the president. The last time being of course, uh, in the post-Civil War days upon the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, when Andrew Johnson seceded as president. And you will recall that this is the second assassination of this century, the last having been the assassination of William McKinley in 1901. President Kennedy and Governor John Connelly of Texas, cut down by assassin's bullets, the condition yet of Connelly undetermined. We know he's been shot in the chest. We do not know whether he has been shot once or twice but bullet wounds were clearly visible in his chest. We repeat, ladies and gentlemen, the flash of a moment ago -- and you get these flashes once in a lifetime -- the President of the United States is dead.
Robert F. Kennedy

I.

My thanks to all of you and it's on to Chicago and let's win there. We want Bobby! We want Bobby! We want Bobby! We want Bobby! Senator. How are you going to counter Mr. Humphrey in his, uh, backgrounding you as far as the delegate votes go?

Senator Kennedy has been... Senator Kennedy has been shot! Is that possible? Is that possible? It could... is it possible, ladies and gentlemen? It is possible he has... not only Senator Kennedy... oh my god! Senator Kennedy has been shot. And another man, a Kennedy campaign manager. And possibly shot in the head. I am right here. Rafer Johnson has a hold of a man who apparently has fired the shot. He has fired the shot. He still has the gun. The gun is pointed at me right at this moment. I hope they can get the gun out of his hand. Be very careful. Get that gun! Get the gun! Get the gun! Stay away from the gun!

Get the gun!

Stay away from the gun! His hand is frozen. Get his thumb! Get his thumb! Take a hold of his thumb and break it if you have to! Get his thumb! Get away from the barrel! Get away from the barrel, man!

Watch it with the gun. Watch it with the gun!

Look out for the gun! Okay. Alright. That's it, Rafer! Get it! Get the gun, Rafer!

Get the gun! Get the gun!

Okay now hold on to the guy!

Get the gun! Get the gun!

Hold on to him! Hold on to him! Ladies and gentlemen, they have the gun away from the man. They've got the gun. I can't see... I can't see the man. I can't see who it is. Senator Kennedy right now is on the ground. He has been shot. This is a... this is... what is he? Wait a minute. Hold him! Hold him! Hold him! We don't want another Oswald! Hold him Rafer, we don't want another Oswald! Hold him, Rafer! Keep people away from him! Keep people away from him! Alright ladies and gentlemen, this is... now... Make room! Make room! Make room! Make room! Make room! Make room! The Senator is on the ground. He's bleeding profusely... from apparently... clear back!... apparently the senator has been shot from the, ah, in the... frontal area. We can't see exactly where the... where the senator has been shot, but... c'mon. Push back. C'mon. Grab a hold of me. Grab a hold of me and let's let's pull back. That's it. C'mon. Get a hold of my arms. Let's pull back. Let's pull back. Alright. The Senator is now... the ambulance has been called and the ambulance is... Bring the ambulance in this entrance! And... this is a terrible thing. It's reminiscent of the Valley the other day when the senator was out there and somebody hit him in the head with rock and people couldn't believe it at that time, but it is a fact. Keep room! Ethel Kennedy is standing by. She is calm. She is raising her hand high to motion people back. She's attempting to get calm. A woman... with a tremendous amount of presence. A tremendous amount of presence. It's impossible to believe. It's impossible to believe this. There's a... certain amount of fanaticism here now as this has occurred. No one... they're trying to run everybody back. Clear the area! Clear the area! Right at this moment... the senator apparently... we can't see if he is still conscious or not. Can you see if he is conscious?

What?
Can you see if he is conscious?
I don't know. He is half-conscious.
He is half-conscious. And ladies... we can't see, ladies and gentlemen. One of the men, a Kennedy, apparently a Kennedy supporter is going first.... C'mon. Out! Out! Out! Is there some way to close these doors? Is there any doors here?
Get out! Get out!
Out through the... out through the exit. Let's go. Out we go.
Out.

Unbelievable situation. They're clearing the halls. One man has blood on himself. We're walking down the corridors here. Repetition in my speech. I have no alternative. The shock is so great. My mouth is dry. I can only say that here in the kitchen of The Ambassador Hotel, the back entrance, from the podium, in the press room, the senator walked out the back. I was directly behind him. You heard a balloon go off and a shot. You didn't really realize that the shot was a shot. And yet a scream went up. Two men were on the ground, both bleeding profusely. One of them was Senator Robert Kennedy. At this moment, we are stunned, we are shaking, as is everyone else in this kitchen corridor at The Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles. They're blocking off the entrance now supposedly to make room for the ambulance. That's all we can report at this moment. I do not know if the senator is dead or if he is alive. We do not know the name of the other gentleman concerned. This is Andrew West, Mutual News, Los Angeles.

II.

... about 350. David Hayward with 260 and Walter Tucker with 235. For the Republicans in the 17th, Richard Howard has about 300 votes. In the 22nd, uh, congressional district, James Corman, incumbent, is having no trouble at this point with his reelection bid in the primary in any event. He has about 84 percent of the vote. The leader for the Republicans is Joe Holt with about 55 percent of the vote. In the 29th congressional district, in...

Jerry I'm sorry we're going to have to interrupt you. We have to go to Ray Williams right now to Kennedy headquarters in The Ambassador Hotel.

Right, Bob, and here we have a situation. Senator Robert Kennedy has been shot. The man is now calling for a doctor.

Is there a doctor in the house?
We don't know exactly who did the shooting or how it happened. The rumor we have is that, in the midst of some hysterical teenagers, a shot rang out. There was a noise. No one knew at the time whether it was a balloon or just what, but the senator has been shot. Exactly what his condition is, we don't really know. However, our producer has gone over to check and see if he can find out anything, but there is complete pandemonium here at the Embassy Room at The Ambassador Hotel. Women are hysterical, they have been screaming.

The best thing that anyone can do here...
No one really knows who did it, whether they have apprehended the person who shot him or what.

...is to leave the room in an orderly way.
They're now asking for everyone to leave the room in an orderly fashion. Perhaps once they clear this room, then we can begin to probe into this drastic incident that is taking place here, find out exactly what it is.

We don't know what has happened.
Right now the gentlemen in charge of the Kennedy party are trying very hard to retain their composure, hoping that this will affect the crowd and help them to move out in an orderly fashion.

Would you please clear the room? Would you please clear the room in an orderly fashion?

Bob, it's unbelievable, what has happened here at the Embassy Room. We now have our producer coming this way with a youngster who evidently was very close to what was going on. We should be able to find something from him. Bring him over here.

Please leave the room.

What happened?

I saw this man go in the back. He started running back. And I saw and I heard he's been shot. That's all I heard.

What, uh, what man was it?

It was young... it was a young person. That's all I saw. Run back... I saw... I just saw somebody run back and then I heard somebody say he's been shot. And that's all I heard.

There were two people that people ran back.

That's all. I saw this man run back there.

There has... has been a chase after that man?

Well, everybody started...

Nobody said anything...

Nobody said anything.

... and then a bunch of people who ran out said he's been shot... he's been shot. I saw this man run in. Everybody started running after him and said, he's been shot and that's... oh!

Did you hear him shot?

I heard... just, like, it was... like a balloon pop... a balloon pop... it was a muffled sound. That's all I heard when I was back there.

I was going back there but they threw me back inside.

That was actually somewhat of an eyewitness report as to what has taken place here at the Embassy Room. This young man is completely exhausted. Evidently he was tossed around pretty good by those around the senator. We're going to switch back to you, Bob, and we ourselves are going down into this crowd and see if we can find out any more.

That was Ray Williams giving a very graphic description of a tragedy that's occurred on this night of the election, the Democratic presidential election. We say tragedy in the sense that Senator Kennedy has been shot. As Ray pointed out, he has no knowledge as to the extent of the injury or the extent of the wound, only that eyewitnesses said the senator had been shot. As you heard, uh, it is pandemonium. Officials there are trying to clear the room so that they can ascertain exactly what did happen or what did not happen. All we can go on at this time is the report that Ray has and, as you heard, it was fragmentary, as it must necessarily be in the scene of such confusion and such drama. So we will be standing by here.

It would be strange if, indeed, to have this California election primary -- which has been filled with a great deal of drama and a great deal of excitement from the time that it started -- to culminate in a disaster, meaning the expiration of the senator. We have no idea how seriously he has been wounded. We hesitate... we hasten to assure you that we will bring you that information just as soon as it's possible.

Boyd?

Well, Bob, you said the word disaster and whether it was only a flesh wound, it's still a disaster to think that such a thing could happen in a crowded hotel room surrounded, as he undoubtedly would be, by admirers and by aides. How could such a thing happen? One just wonders how much tragedy one family can stand, the Kennedy family. Now let's go back to the Kennedy headquarters and Ray Williams.

Boyd, we have here our own Ray McMackin who was right there and he's going to fill us in exactly on what happened. Ray?

Boyd, I am sorry, but I can't hold back the tears. He's been shot right in the head. And he's not moving. There are several people back there who have also been shot, one right in the head. Excuse me... I just can't control it... He's not moving. His eyes are not open... and he's shot right in the head. He's laying on his back and there's two other people wounded, just bystanders. And I can't understand it... I was right there and it just... the doctors... It's just mass confusion. It's terrible. And there you have it, a reporter that was standing right next to the incident, an eyewitness report.

Ray? Ray? This is... A disaster has occurred here at the Embassy Room.

Ray? This is is Bob Arthur. Ray? Happiness has now turned into tragedy. The men on the stage are requesting more doctors. If what Ray says is true -- and we have no cause to doubt his word -- Senator Kennedy has suffered a severe head wound. Bob, I'm going to switch back to you and see if we can find out anymore as to what's going on.

And there is another chapter in this drama that's unfolding. As you can tell, Ray McMackin, KNX reporter overcome by emotion as he tried to report on what he had seen. From what we can gather, Senator McCarthy has been shot.

Senator Kennedy.

Senator Kennedy, I beg your pardon, yes. Senator Kennedy has been shot. It is a head wound as we understand and Ray McMackin said two other persons had... bystanders have also been wounded in the shooting. At this time we have no information as to who might have committed this crime, other than the fact that a man had been seen running from the scene. We're standing by waiting for Ray to return to the microphone. He's trying to investigate, to make a determination as to exactly what did happen to get as much information as possible so that he can relay it on to you.

Bob, from, uh, what Ray McMackin said, with two others wounded, apparently there would have to be more than one shot fired. And the first fragmentary reports that we got from Ray Williams said was that it sounded like a balloon popping. And that would lead us to believe that only one shot had been fired. Now it appears that more than one shot was fired. Do you have something from the wire services there?

Yes, but this is one of those things that usually adds to the confusion in something like this. Ray McMackin was there and said that the senator had been shot in the head. The Associated Press is saying that he was shot in the hip as he left the platform from which he made his victory statement. We are going to switch back right now to The Ambassador, where the PA system is operative enough to pick up the announcements as they are being made. It may be slightly chaotic, it may not be all connected, but you at least will be at the scene and then you will hear what we hear as it develops.

...mortal wounded and who are back in, uh, the anteroom now. There are at least three doctors there, two of whom were out here in the auditorium, the victory celebration room, listening to the Kennedy statement. Just a few minutes ago.

Everybody, please move out of here.

Take it easy...

This is Jerry Dunphy back at KNX election headquarters. We do have a little more definite information. Many people are reluctant to talk to the reporters on the scene. Senator Robert Kennedy was shot in the hip tonight in Los Angeles as he left the platform on which he made a victory statement, the statement you saw just about seven minutes ago. The scene at The Ambassador Hotel right now is one of shock and terror, really. Many shots were fired, as you heard. Senator Kennedy, brother of the assassinated President John Kennedy, lay on the floor of the hotel kitchen. Blood streamed over his face, his eyes were unseeing.

That's the report that we have.

We are informed that the senator's assailant, as yet unidentified, has been... or is being held a few feet away by a half dozen of the Kennedy supporters. Bob Ferris is outside the lobby on the telephone line. He has more information. Bob, come in.

Yes, we just saw a tremendous amount of people come out of the Embassy Room, actually. There were three or four policemen who had a young Negro person. They had their shotguns drawn, and were trying, uh, to get him out of the hotel. I do not know whether he was a suspect or not, but apparently he was. The crowd at least thought that he was and closed in on the police. There were several fistfights that broke out here in the lobby and finally, police and firemen shunted away the crowd, which was eager to get at this, suspect -- if it was a suspect -- and he was carried down the stairs and actually out of the hotel. So, at this point, it appears that one of the suspects -- I can only say that it appears that one of the suspects is a young Negro youth who was cringing in the midst of this cordon of policemen with sawed-off shotguns -- was finally carried down the stairs and out of the hotel. There is pandemonium in the lobby out here. People are crying openly, weeping and people are saying, oh no, oh no. And there are fistfights around as various people just plain get too emotional and attack each other. This is Bob Ferris now in The Ambassador Hotel lobby. I'll go out and see if I can find out what is happening now.

Back to you Bob Arthur at KNX news headquarters.

Thank you Bob. We're going to go back inside The Ambassador now to Ray McMackin, an eyewitness. Ray, come in.

Bob, Ray McMackin is right here next to me. We do know that one lady who has suffered a head wound is being treated here in the Embassy Room. Again, they're asking the press and everyone else to back up so that they can turn off some of the lights. The lights make it awful hot. Here's Ray now, more composed, to give us more of what he saw. Ray?

It was, uh, well, I'm a little more composed. I was right there. I hope I never see a sight like that again. Ah, this won't be a newsman's type of report, it will be quite biased. It was terrible. Absolutely horrible. There was a man wounded in his side, a young boy. I... I before I cracked up here I... I... I had time to interview him. He was not severely wounded. Right on the left side, uh, the right side of his hip just above the, uh, bone there, and he's he's alright. There was another man that was shot right in the stomach. He had blood all over his white shirt, from his chin all over the floor and he looked in bad shape. There was a woman that was shot right in the stomach. He had blood all over his white shirt, from his chin all over the floor and he looked in bad shape. There was a woman that was shot right in the forehead. When I saw Senator Kennedy, he was laying on the... after he fell... there was just, uh... it was just terrible... he was laying there... it was just, all over again, uh, the Dallas thing. Er, his, uh, eyes were closed, he was not moving. It took, uh, two, with three minutes to get a doctor. It seemed like hours, but they finally got a doctor in there and then they partitioned it off and all the newsmen were trying to back people off. It was mass confusion. I'll try to describe Senator Kennedy, but I'll never forget that sight as long as I live. He was lying there just... just... I hate to say it, but he was just dead still. His eyes were closed and there was blood, blood, blood all over the side of his head.

Ray’s description, Bob, of exactly what he saw. As we said, in addition to treating this woman for her head wound, they are also searching suspects. Now, I would imagine that no one is going to be allowed to completely leave this hotel. I would imagine that it’s completely sealed off at this particular time. Perhaps some of our men on the outside can give us more information on that. Bob, back to you now.

Ray Williams at the Kennedy headquarters in The Ambassador Hotel.

Now we switch over to our sister station KNXT. Another eyewitness report.

... had some medical attention at that point?
No. I... no. I really I couldn't.
Was there... did he appeared to be conscious?
No. He didn't appear to be conscious, no. He might have been...
He was conscious and coherent. I gave him a pair of rosary beads, which are from Ireland. I told him and he looked straight up. I was wondering what this meant. I got a little frightened to see him looking straight up but, he looked at me. I said the act of contrition. I am a Roman Catholic. A Roman Catholic is trained to do this in case of any serious accident. I said to the president the act of contrition slowly and audibly and he heard it, I’m sure of it. He was breathing, he was alive. Please God. And I said to him, Mary, queen of peace, pray for us and with that he took my hand in the rosary beads and tightened.

Where was this, at what stage?
This was right after he was shot. I heard a balloon pop and I said to some woman, what a terrible thing to have around here. These these sounds, I said, it's not good for another Kennedy. And the woman said, don't be silly. And that's when I realized it wasn't a balloon.

Was he... was he conscious when you left him?
He was conscious. I was pushed away from him. I didn't need to do... do any thinking about his consciousness. I did what I believe I could do...

Did you see where he was wounded, if he was wounded?
He was wounded. The blood came from his hand and from his ear. I believe he was shot in the rear of the neck. I'm not sure. His blood came...

Are you certain that it was the senator? Are you certain that it was the senator?
It was Senator Kennedy.
You definitely saw that?
I know it was Senator Kennedy.
Did you see anyone else shot?
I saw someone else.
Who was it? Do you know?
Was there a woman shot?
Did they get the suspect?
There was someone else shot. I did not look at... because I looked to see Senator Kennedy.

What did the person look like? Was it a man or woman who shot him?
I really cannot tell you. I... I didn't... I didn't take notice. I was looking for the senator. I’m a Catholic, uh... a little slightly moody, I guess.

Do you know how many people were shot?
I don't think more than two were shot. I don't know about the one who did the shooting. All I know I... they had him up on some bins, some towel bins.
It was a him? It was a he, right?
I saw curly hair. Yes and it was a male.
Was it a male, curly hair?
I don't know about any woman.
Was it blond hair? Black hair?
Hey, I don't... I just did what I could do. Thank you.
I've spoken... I've spoken to several eyewitnesses...

This is Jerry Dunphy back at KNX, the election headquarters. We have this late report. If you're finding it hard to see your television pictures at home, it's because the lights have gone out in the Embassy Ballroom at The Ambassador Hotel. The Kennedy campaign managers have asked reporters to leave and dim their television lights. When they wouldn't leave, they turned the lights out in the ballroom, just after Senator Kennedy was shot. We also have this note. An ambulance from Central Receiving Hospital was sent to The Ambassador Hotel to remove Senator Kennedy. That's all we know at this time. We don't know exactly where the senator was shot, whether it was the head, whether it was hip, how many people were shot, we don't have that, or how seriously injured the woman who was shot was hurt.

This is Bob Arthur at KNX election headquarters. Ray McMackin, KNX radio newsmen, was on the scene, an eyewitness. And you heard his very emotional report a few moments ago. Ray, as an eyewitness, said at least three persons were shot -- one shot in the arm, another shot in the stomach, and that still another had been shot...
... a young man, yes... he said was shot in the hip and a woman shot in the head. So that would be, uh, four all together.
Yes, we're trying to piece all these things together.

Even as emotional as Ray McMackin was, I would tend to put more credence in his report than in the report that we just heard, which was the interview on television that four persons actually have been wounded. Whether or not any have expired, that will have to await further developments.

We do know, as Jerry Dunphy just said, that the senator is being rushed to Good Samaritan Hospital. John D. O'Connell, KNX radio newsmen, is right behind the ambulance, and he will give us a report just as soon as he possibly can from the scene. We have a report added to this -- Kennedy's brother-in-law, Stephen Smith, was one of those that was reportedly shot. The gunman, according to one report, was said to have been captured by Rafer Johnson, former Olympic decathlon champion and a Kennedy aide. This tragedy occurred right at a moment of triumph for Senator Kennedy -- at least an appearance of triumph -- because it has been pretty well established by the major news reporting services, including CBS and NBC, that Senator Kennedy had won the Democratic presidential nomination here in the California area, with something like 50% of the vote to McCarthy's 39%. We are more or less flying as blind as you are on the subject because, as you have heard, the reports have been anything but complete. Probably the most complete report is that of Ray McMackin, our reporter, who was an eyewitness, but there is still some confusion in the minds of a great many people. To recap, Senator Kennedy was stepping from the platform, had just made what had appeared to be a victory statement thanking a great many individuals who had helped in his campaign, including Rafer Johnson, who had reportedly captured the gunman. And as he started to leave, he was shot along with at least three -- possibly four -- other persons.

Bob Ferris, reporting from outside The Ambassador Hotel, said that heavily armed police had rushed a young man -- and his report said a young Negro man -- from the scene, apparently with the idea of getting him away as possibly could. Now we switch to John D. O'Connell on the mobile unit and here is his report.

Right Bob. The news bad at this hour. I've just pulled up behind the ambulance at Central Receiving Hospital. Senator Kennedy has been brought in on the stretcher here at Central Receiving Hospital. About sixteen police cruisers are also on hand here. The streets are now being roped off. I do hope everyone in the audience who can hear my voice will not come over here. It will only harm, rather than do any good. Senator Robert Kennedy is here at Central Receiving Hospital. He's been rushed into the emergency room. I'll report more as the news develops. This is John D. O'Connell at Central Receiving Hospital for KNX radio news.

John D. O'Connell on the scene and, as he said, he will relay to us whenever new information becomes available. This much we do know, recapping again, because we're going from fragmentary reports -- Senator Kennedy, brother of the assassinated president John F. Kennedy, was shot in The Ambassador Hotel, lying on the floor of the hotel kitchen after the shooting, blood streaming over his face, his eyes reportedly opened but unseeing. The Senator's assailant, as yet unidentified, apparently was captured by Rafer Johnson and a half dozen of Kennedy's supporters. Police reportedly, heavily armed, have rushed the young man or the suspect away from that scene apparently for interrogation. Boyd?

Bob, a thought just struck me. One of the last remarks that Senator Kennedy made, when he was making what appeared to be a victory statement, was a joking remark that he had received a message from his old adversary Mayor Sam Yorty that he had stayed too long. And little did anyone know at that moment that he had indeed stayed too long. I'm wondering if Ray McMackin has been able to compose himself, and whether we can reach him down at at Kennedy headquarters, or whether or not we have been, uh...

I'm signaled that we cannot at this moment Boyd.

I would imagine that one of the first things they would try to do would be to move all of the news people out of there, and as we heard from Jerry Dunphy, they shut off the power so that the TV crews didn't have any lights anymore, removing some of the carnival atmosphere. Unfortunately, that's what always appears to be happening when all of the bright lights are on. Now we can go back to Kennedy headquarters. Here's Ray Williams.

Right Boyd. What's happening now is that evidently we're going to be ushered out of here very shortly. They want this room completely empty. They are now asking the television crews to remove their equipment, to conduct their interviews on the outside. No new evidence has come our way as to just what occurred or who was involved. All persons evidently involved in the shooting -- those being shot as well as the suspects being apprehended -- have been removed from the premises. The whole room is going to be cordoned off. Outside in the halls, we know it's complete bedlam. We understand that they've completely blocked off this building. The police are coming through now and they're making motions that it's going to be time for us to go.

Well, there was a request for another doctor, so we might still have one of the injured persons on the inside yet. But the big problem is that some of the Kennedy workers are still here. They're causing more confusion than the press. Members of the press are running around taking, in some instances, rampant reports that have no credence whatsoever, but that's the way it goes in a moment of tragedy like this. That's about the scene here at the Embassy Room -- much quieter, much sadder, quite a bit more tragic that it was just an hour ago. Back to you, Bob.

Ray Williams there. We have added information and it's fragmentary, of course, that the apparent assailant, a man about 25 years of age, curly-haired and, according to this report, of Latin appearance, was captured by Kennedy supporters. He was rushed through The Ambassador Hotel lobby by police. If we dovetailed these reports, this will coincide and correlate with what Bob Ferris was saying from the outside. He had watched the armed police come rushing out with a suspect apparently in custody, and at that time, there was a number of fights that also broke out as people became excited and as rumors spread, as they always do in a case of this nature. Unfortunately, no one seems to have a clear and concise idea as to who the individual might be. We earlier had a report that it was Negro. Now it is of Latin American extraction, and we would hope that all would bear with us until we can sift out this fragmentary information and try to bring you a complete and accurate report as we possibly can. Ray McMackin was an eyewitness to it. He said the senator had been shot and he said in the head. Three other persons have also been shot -- we had a report that one was Kennedy's brother-in-law, Stephen Smith, another a woman, another a small child.

Bob, the thought occurs that something like this very definitely had to be premeditated. Someone with hate in his heart had to have thought to himself that this was what he wanted to do. He had to arm himself undoubtedly with a revolver, something that would be easily hidden. We'll now go to Senator McCarthy's headquarters.

Bob, I am witnessing a silent procession from the grand ballroom of McCarthy headquarters here at the Beverly Hills Hilton. The Senator just sent down word about a minute and a half ago. He asked for a moment of silent prayer for Senator Robert Kennedy. There were probably about 150 still left in the grand ballroom. That wish was acknowledged. The moment of silent prayer ended just a few seconds ago and the senator asked that each, in his own way, then go home and meditate and say a few more silent prayers for Senator Robert Kennedy. So far, those are the only comments from Senator McCarthy. The grand ballroom here at the Beverly Hilton is very quiet, it is very solemn, it is subdued. That moment of silent prayer has been extended into several moments, not only for the supporters of Senator McCarthy, but for the newsmen from all of the broadcast media. This is Dennis Bracken from the grand ballroom, McCarthy headquarters. Back to Bob Arthur at KNX election headquarters.

The shooting of Senator Kennedy occurred right after he had spoken to about 1000 supporters in that crowded ballroom. His wife Ethel, who was with him was not injured.

Ray, you were pointing out a minute ago that someone had to premeditate this action.

Yes. Someone had to have hate in their heart and arm themselves with a weapon that could easily be hidden so they could get into this place and someone also had to figure out where the senator would be so he could intercept him. Someone very definitely planned this, someone with hate in their heart.

We would point out that that Senator Kennedy's appearances had been delayed throughout the course of the evening. As we know, he had been expected from almost 10 o'clock on, but had delayed his appearance in The Ambassador Hotel so that he could watch the returns, and listen to the returns as they were broadcast checking, obviously, with his lieutenants up and down the coast to make some sort of determination as to whether or not he was, in fact, the winner of the California
Democratic primary. When he became convinced in his own mind that he had won, then he did make that appearance. So, whoever did lie in wait for the senator apparently had been there for quite a long period of time, knowing the senator would eventually make some sort of an appearance and some sort of a statement, whether in victory or in defeat.

We have late information that has just been handed us. We had not yet been able to make contact with Central Receiving Hospital. The phone was finally answered after a great many tries but only silence followed, then taking that phone off the hook. We do know that John D. O’Connell of KNX news radio is at the hospital and just as soon as it possible for him to give us some information, he will.

Don Schulman, a witness, said that Senator Kennedy was walking to the kitchen when he was shot -- and here's another report -- three times by the gunman who stepped out of the crowd. We do know there was were a flurry of shots fired, and we that know others were also wounded. Shulman, who witnessed the shooting, said the gunman was shot by Kennedy bodyguards and taken into custody. This is in conflict with other statements that we've had. This we have found, in our experience as a newsmen, is the thing that normally happens in such a tragedy like this or when there are rapid-fire events taking place. A great many witness have a great many ideas and it takes some time in order for the true reports to come out. We had this recently in the case of Dr. Martin Luther King, who was shot fatally in Memphis. At that time, first reports had Dr. King being shot and wounded as he sat in a car outside the hotel, then later on shot on the balcony. As it turns out, that was the correct report.

Well, even more recently, Bob, when the senator was here on a campaign tour, he had made several stops and several appearances. And after a rally out in The Valley, when he was returning to his hotel, there were all sorts of reports that the senator had been hit with some sort of a missile or some such thing. I asked the senator himself about it at that time. He said nothing had happened. I got it then from another reporter who said that what had happened was that some youngsters standing on an overpass had wanted to drop some candy into the senator’s car as he went by. The candy fell. Some of it apparently touched the senator. He was shocked and he sat down. And this led to all kinds of reports that the senator had been hit by a missile, he was hit in the head, he was hurt, and so on and so forth. So we do in these instances, have all sorts of conflicting reports. I say again Ray McMackin -- a trained reporter on the scene there -- should very well have given us a true picture of what is going on. Now we’ll go back to Kennedy headquarters at The Ambassador Hotel. Ray? Is Ray McMackin there? Or Ray Williams? At The Ambassador Hotel?

We were expecting... apparently they are not making contact right now. We’ll stand by and complete that call just as soon as we possibly can.

It would seem, as a result of this tragedy and other tragedies that have taken place in the last few years, that there will be greater and tighter security for the nation's major political candidates, no matter what the occasion, Boyd. There are many who have called for greater security in times past. Of course a candidate’s appeal is that of being able to mingle with the crowd, to say hello, to shake hands, and to speak a few words. This, of course, puts him -- under these trying circumstances -- puts him in grave danger, as we know here. Of course, who would think for a moment that a victory celebration, such as the one that the senator was enjoying, that this would turn into a personal tragedy and personal injury to him? How you could possibly screen everyone at a victory celebration is the unanswered question. Obviously, you could not, unless candidates appearances are confined, away from large crowds and into appearances on television or appearances on radio. This again, takes the senator or the candidate -- whoever he might be -- out of that personal contact with the people. You must have contact in order to influence a voter and influence those who would cast their ballots. Now we’re going to swing back to Kennedy headquarters to Ray Williams.

Well, Bob, my producer Marshall Boyd has been out in the crowd all evening getting people to interview. Just as Kennedy was leaving the platform, there was quite a bit of pandemonium that broke out. He immediately ran over to see what was happening as the females there were hysterically screaming. And he came back with the word that there had been a shooting. Now, he has talked with a friend of his and he will now tell us exactly what it was his friend related to him in connection with this tragedy.

Yes Ray, I saw a fireman friend of mine who wanted to remain anonymous, and he confirmed that Kennedy had been shot, that he had been taken to Central Receiving Hospital. He said the suspect was apprehended and that Kennedy fans and Kennedy supporters literally tried to beat the suspect to death -- they were really giving him quite a pummeling on the ground.

Well, this was somewhat evident at the time that you ran over, that there was at least a fight in progress or some unnecessary commotion.

As you know, Ray, I went over there on a wild thousand-to-one shot trying to get Kennedy to go on microphone, and I heard screaming, which I thought were Beatle-type screams from young fans and I heard breaking glass and... and then people crying and saying that he had been shot... he had been shot and...

From that point on, Bob, we know just about the same thing that you know. The Embassy Room is pretty well barren now of supporters of Kennedy. The majority of the people here are the press. We have been told that that's it, we should move on. And actually that's about the story, tragic as it is, from here the Embassy Room at The Ambassador Hotel. Back to you Bob.

Ray Williams there. Boyd, as happened in the aftermath of the assassination of President Kennedy, the scene of shock and turmoil here was nationally advertised and televised, just as it was when Jack Ruby shot Lee Harvey Oswald. The television reporter said the man who fired the shots was just about 10 feet from Senator Kennedy at the time. Reporters said that Stephen Smith, Kennedy's brother and campaign manager, also was shot. The American Broadcasting Company said its unit manager, William Weisel, was shot. Kennedy, of course, has been taken to a Los Angeles hospital and John D. O'Connell, KNX radio newsman, is on that scene and will report to us just as soon as possible.

Of course, the major emphasis is on the results of the treatment of Senator Kennedy, but I would also like to know what happened to the other people involved -- Steve Smith and this woman Ray McMackin said he saw shot in the head. They they set up an emergency operating room apparently in one of the kitchens there at The Ambassador Hotel. Perhaps Ray Williams or Ray McMackin can get in there and see if we have any report on the others involved.

We understand that five doctors treated the senator before he was removed to the hospital. Another witness of the shooting said he fell down right away. He just lay there. Gabor Kadar, who said he was waiting at the rear exit to the room to shake hands with the senator, heard four or five shots and saw Kennedy and a woman fall to the floor. Kadar said Senator Kennedy was holding the right side of his chest and there was also blood on his head. A priest, before the senator was removed from the hotel...

Back to Kennedy headquarters for more information from Ray Williams.

Well, Bob, we have a young lady here that just informed us that Steve Smith, the Kennedy campaign manager, was not shot. If you would come over here, please, with us and let us have your information.

Uh, Stephen Smith, the senator's brother-in-law was not shot. I was right there at the time and he was standing up on a table. He was rather angry and rather distraught, but he certainly was not shot. He's perfectly all right. He seemed to be going with the senator to the hospital.

Fine. Thank you very much. And so, that clears up the point on Stephen Smith, Bob.

Thank you, Ray. We'll be standing by for any late information that you might have. A priest, as I started to say, before the senator was removed from the hotel, said he attempted to give the senator final rites of the Roman Catholic Church, but the surging crowd pushed him away. The priest said, I did give him the rosary and he clenched it tightly. As I was pushed away, there was blood on his head. The arrested man was hurried through a lobby, throngs still yelling and screaming at the news of the shooting. Kill him, lynch him, many in the crowd shouted, and many tried to reach the man, as we know from Bob Harris's report, there were some fights that broke out at that time.
Police did manage to hustle him out of the lobby and down the stairs to an exit. We have no information as to who the man was. Two reports surfaced, one that he was Negro, another that he was Latin American. We will not know until police issue an official report on that.

I would imagine in this case, Bob, that the police are not going to be issuing very many reports for some time, in order to remove the carnival atmosphere that surrounded the assassination of President John F. Kennedy in Dallas. Police, as we say, captured a man believed to be the assailant, about 25 years of age, curly hair, and olive-skinned.
They hustled him out through the lobby of The Ambassador Hotel, a shotgun at his back. The gunman was caught standing on some sort of a box. The shooting occurred in a small anteroom off the main ballroom.
Only those near the door knew at first there had been a shooting. Five doctors, as we mentioned earlier, treated the senator before removal to the hospital. Several Kennedy supporters called for towels immediately after the shooting. A news reporter hastily stripped off a velvet tablecloth and rushed into the kitchen area, jammed with the shouting political supporters of the senator. The scene was complete confusion.
Television cameramen and men carrying tape recorders stood on serving tables and tried to hold their equipment close to where first aid was being applied to the wounded, who were shot and bleeding. A tablecloth was used to stem the flow of blood from a blond man, who was stretched over a chair, his shirt up, bleeding profusely around the body.
Kennedy's eyes were reported to be open. KNX news reporter Ray McMackin, who was an eyewitness to that scene said they were open, very definitely, but that he was not moving. The wife of one of the doctors said his condition seemed not to be critical, however. As we say, there have been a number of conflicting reports as to who was shot and who was not shot in this case. We hope to have information on it.

Bob, those reports that we have from the wire services seem to confirm what Ray McMackin said about a blond man being shot somewhere in the waist area. He told us that someone -- one of the victims -- may have been shot in the waist. He also told us about a young man being shot apparently in the hip. We also had the report of a 17-year-old youth being taken to Central Receiving Hospital by a friend, but apparently not seriously wounded. And the 17-year-old shot being in the hip would apparently clear up some of the confusion over some of the earlier reports that Senator Kennedy had been shot in the hip. We are waiting for John D. O’Connell to report from the hospital to try to give us some further information on Senator Kennedy’s condition. There’s absolutely no report available as yet on his condition.

This is the CBS radio network.

This is KNX, 1070 news radio, Los Angeles.

And this is Boyd Harvey, along with the entire election coverage here. Bob Arthur is with me in the studio as we’re trying to piece together the facts that have occurred. A tragedy of major proportions at the Kennedy headquarters here in Los Angeles, where Senator Robert F. Kennedy and apparently three others were shot by an unknown assailant, who has been apprehended by Los Angeles police. The condition of Senator Kennedy is still not known. He is at Central Receiving Hospital in Los Angeles. Bob?

Senator Kennedy’s wife, Ethel, was at his side during that victory talk that he had made just prior to the shooting. He mentioned his dog Freckles and said the pet had been maligned during the campaign. Kennedy then waved to his supporters and was ushered backstage through a kitchen passageway en route to a room where he was to hold a news conference. And at that time, as best as we can piece together, four or five pistol shots rang out. Reporters ran into the kitchen passageway and saw the tumultuous scene and such exclamations as -- oh my god, not again, no, no -- cries from the crowd were heard. Stand back, give them room -- others shouted as they tried to make space around the fallen candidate. KNX and CBS reporters are on the scene trying to glean what information they can, trying to get information from the Los Angeles Police Department, without success. We have been told that one of the other victims in this tragic episode at The Ambassador Hotel was an assistant director for the American Broadcasting Company. He was identified by ABC as Bill Weisel. His wounds were said to be superficial. He is from the Los Angeles area. This, the climax of a California presidential primary, regarded to be one of the most important and the important...

III.

There’s been no new word on Senator Robert Kennedy’s condition, no official word for more than eight hours now although a bulletin is expected shortly. There have been a lot of rumors. Now we will cut to the hospital auditorium where apparently a bulletin is forthcoming.

Here is that bulletin.

I have a short announcement to read, which I will read, uh, at this time. Senator Robert Francis Kennedy died at 1:44 a.m. today, June 6, 1968. With Senator Kennedy at the time of his death were his wife Ethel, his sisters Mrs. Stephen Smith, Mrs. Patricia Lawford, his brother-in-law, Mr. Stephen Smith, and his sister-in-law Mrs. John F. Kennedy. He was, uh, 42 years old. Thank you.

And that was the word, Frank Mankiewicz making a very quick, a very short announcement that at 1:40 this morning Robert Francis Kennedy died at Good Samaritan Hospital in Los Angeles. He was 42 years old. At his bedside, Ethel Kennedy and Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy. Again, that very brief, very short bulletin. John... er, Robert Francis Kennedy died this morning at 1:40 at Good Samaritan Hospital in Los Angeles. In the press room at this time, reporters have rushed to the phones to make calls overseas to inform the rest of the nation what has happened here tonight. It was reported earlier that Senator Kennedy was very near death, apparently he was paralyzed on one side. And an earlier medical bulletin had said that there wasn't much hope for Senator Kennedy. He was not improving and conditions did not look good. So, very early this morning, his Press Secretary Frank Mankiewicz his eyes... tears in his eyes, announced that Robert Francis Kennedy, Senator from Massachusetts, had died this morning at Good Samaritan Hospital at the age of 42. There's word other than that. There is not much to say other than that except that America has lost a man, has lost a senator, and has lost an image that perhaps will not be replaced.
John Lennon

I.

John Smith is on the line and I don't care what's on the line, Howard Cosell, you have got to say that we know in the booth.

Yes we have to say it. Remember this is just a football game no matter who wins or loses. An unspeakable tragedy confirmed to us by ABC news in New York City. John Lennon, outside of his apartment building on the West Side of New York City, the most famous perhaps of all of The Beatles, shot twice in the back, rushed Roosevelt Hospital, dead on arrival. Hard to go back to the game after that newsflash. Frank Gifford?

Indeed it is.

...for scenes on December 10, 1938, the first scenes from the film Gone With The Wind. The burning of Atlanta sequence lights the sky for miles... We interrupt this program to bring you a special bulletin from NBC news. Former Beatle John Lennon is dead. Lennon died in a hospital shortly after being shot outside his New York apartment tonight. A suspect is in custody but has not been identified. Again, John Lennon is dead tonight of gunshot wounds at the age of 40. We now return to the Tonight Show.

In the latest report that we've got from the Associated Press, a police spokesman says a suspect in the killing of Lennon is in custody but he would give no further details. The spokesman did say it was not a robbery and that Lennon was killed most likely by a deranged person.

It's 11:15 right now and we're gonna be doing a full hour of The Beatles in lieu of Boston on Moon Rocks tonight.

It's 18 minutes after 11 o'clock on this, a rather gloomy Monday now for, uh, I was going to say for fans of music, but certainly anyone. John Lennon, former Beatle, shot to death in New York City this evening. It happened outside his apartment building on the city's Upper West Side. Lennon, who just had his 40th birthday in October, was rushed by police to Roosevelt Hospital and pronounced dead upon arrival. According to police, the shooting took place outside The Dakota, the century-old luxury apartment building where Lennon and wife Yoko Ono lived. Police have a suspect in custody. They describe him as a, quote, local screwball. And they say there doesn't seem to have been any motive for the shooting. It was just two months ago that John released his first single in more than five years, ironically titled Just Like Starting Over. John Lennon, dead tonight in New York at the age of 40.

... I would imagine Beatle fans, at this point, just fans of John Lennon who, for no other reason, are all shocked and just felt they wanted to come here and... and be close to him.

... every other song for the remainder of his hour will be, uh, a track of music by The Beatles, as we kind of, uh, shall we say, think or exist in memorial for the death of John Lennon.

... his wife Yoko Ono was with him when he died. They do have a suspect in custody but the police have released no other details at this time. We will keep you posted on that situation of course.

John Lennon was shot tonight in New York and, uh, he is dead. And I think if you're looking for a radio station tonight that's not playing Beatles music, you will have a long hunt.

Stereo 101 doing a complete hour of Beatles songs, some written by Lennon some written by Lennon and McCartney, but John Lennon was a part of them all. It's 11:49 right now and in case you haven't had your radio on, former Beatle John Lennon was shot and killed in front of his home on Manhattan's Upper West Side tonight. He was 40. Police said Lennon was shot three times about 11 o'clock tonight New York time and died in the Emergency Room at Roosevelt Hospital. His wife Yoko was with him when he died. A police spokesman says a suspect is in custody, but he had no other details available on the circumstances of the shooting. The spokesman did say that it was not a robbery and the person who shot Lennon was most likely deranged. A witness says a man in his mid-30s with quote almost a smirk on his face gunned down the singer as Lennon, his wife, and several other people walked into the vestibule of the apartment building where the Lennons lived. The witness says the residents of the hotel told him the man had been in the vestibule for hours before the shooting. According to the witness, the man quoted just walked out and shot Lennon. Lennon, who celebrated his 40th birthday on October 9th, just released an album, Double Fantasy, that he made with his wife in what was to be a comeback for the pair. Once again former Beatle John Lennon was shot and killed tonight at his Manhattan Upper West Side apartment. He was 40.

WWDC remembers a rock 'n roll legend, John Lennon.

Standing in the dock at Southampton, tryin' to get to Holland or France.

John Lennon was brought to the emergency room of the Roosevelt St. Luke's Hospital this evening shortly before 11 p.m. He was dead on arrival.

That is Stephen Lynn, a doctor at Roosevelt Hospital who just a little while ago confirmed that John Lennon has been shot and killed in New York City. Lennon and his wife Yoko Ono were on their way back from The Record Plant, a recording studio in New York City. Their limousine pulled up to their apartment building, The Dakota on New York's Upper West Side, and as they were walking into The Dakota, Lennon was shot apparently seven times in the chest. Lennon was shot reportedly by a white male who has been taken into custody. His identity has not been released but local police have described him as a local screwball and that's about all they've said so far. After Lennon was shot, he was taken by police car to Roosevelt Hospital in New York City. According to witnesses, there was blood all over the place but there was absolutely nothing that anybody could do. Lennon was pronounced dead on arrival at around 11:30 p.m. Eastern Standard Time. With me is Source correspondent CD Jako, who has just come back from Roosevelt Hospital. CD, you had an opportunity to hear the doctors explain what happened. What did they say?

The doctor, Stephen Lynn, told us that there was absolutely no chance for John Lennon. He said, in his medical opinion, that he was probably dead before he hit the ground. He had seven massive wounds in his chest at close range. The caliber of bullets he couldn't ascertain, but that the shots apparently ruptured most of the internal blood vessels and major organs. A policeman who was there, however, told me that Lennon was conscious after being shot. When he asked him -- are you John Lennon? -- Lennon replied, yes, before being put into the police car and rushed to Roosevelt Hospital. The doctor said he informed Yoko Ono, who was at the hospital at the time and that she, in his words, found the news very, very difficult to take. She has been rushed from Roosevelt Hospital, possibly back to The Dakota. He said it was massive chest wounds and that there was absolutely nothing anyone could do. We spoke to Jack Douglas, who was Lennon's producer on the new album Double Fantasy. He said that Lennon had been, as you said, at the Record Plant working on a new single and that that new single was to have been mastered by John Lennon tomorrow. Mr. Douglas obviously was completely distraught, as were most of the people there.

Thanks, CD. John Lennon, of course, was one of the architects of The Beatles, one of the most important rock 'n roll bands in the history of rock 'n roll -- that probably goes without saying. Lennon had been in retirement for about the last six years, and in just the last few months, Lennon had gone back into the recording studio to record a new record with Yoko Ono called Double Fantasy. And again, John Lennon was shot dead tonight on his way inside his apartment in New York City.

We'll be doing a Devo / Hall and Oates concert starting at 12 o'clock and any news about the Lennon situation that we have, we'll be interrupting the concert as soon as we get the news. Okay? Let's try some material from the former Beatle, John Lennon at KQ92.

Straight quote off the police report: a local screwball. And they say that there doesn't seem to have been any motive at all for the shooting. It was just a couple of months ago that Lennon released his first single in more than five years from the Double Fantasy album which he recorded with Yoko Ono. That record is now in the Top 10. And in light of Lennon's death tonight, the title is ironic: Just Like Starting Over. Record producer Jack Douglas tells us that he and the Lennons had been in a studio called the Record Plant in midtown Monday night and that Lennon had left about 10:30 to get a bite to eat and then go home. A man named Sean Strub says he was walking south near 72nd St. on the Upper West Side, when he heard four shots ring out. He said he went around the corner to Central Park West just in time to see John Lennon being put into the back of a police car. Strub said some people heard six shots. Others said Lennon was hit twice. The NYPD said he was hit in the back. Reports from the various wire sources say then he was taken to Roosevelt Hospital in Manhattan and pronounced dead on arrival. But they did try various resuscitation efforts and revival efforts for approximately 15 minutes -- even to the point of blood transfusions and special hookups to see if they could revive his heartbeat -- but obviously to no avail. Other witnesses say that the assailant had been crouching in the archway of The Dakota, the Lennon's apartment complex in Manhattan. Police described the suspect -- who is in custody at this point -- as a pudgy kind of man, aged 35 to 40 with brown hair. He was put into a police car with a smirk on his face -- that's a partial quote from the police report.

CBS news. Former Beatle John Lennon was shot and killed tonight in New York City. Police say a man with the gun apparently had been waiting in the entrance of The Dakota, the apartment building where Lennon lived. Just as Lennon got out of the car, the man opened fire. Lennon was brought to Roosevelt Hospital's emergency room shortly before 11 p.m., according to Dr. Stephen Lynn, director of emergency room services. He was dead on arrival. Extensive resuscitative efforts were made, but in spite of transfusions and many procedures, he could not be resuscitated.

Where was he shot, Doc, and how many times?
He had multiple gunshot wounds in his chest, in his left arm, and in his back.

Lynn said there were seven wounds in Lennon's body, although he could not say how many shots were actually fired. Lennon died, said Lynn, from damage to the large blood vessels in his chest. He probably died, Lynne said, almost instantly. Lennon's wife, Yoko Ono, was with the singer when he was shot and later at the hospital. According to Lennon's record producer, Jack Douglas, Lennon had been at a recording session, then had taken a break to go home to get something to eat. He was shot in the entrance to his apartment. One witness, Sean Strub, says the man who shot Lennon had what was described as almost a smirk as he pulled the trigger and he describes the suspect.

Between 30 and 40 years old. He was kind of fat. He didn't look like a groupie or, you know, anything like that. He almost had a sort of smear on his face, I mean, he was almost proud of what he had done apparently. Uh, he scuffled with them... getting into the police car, uh, you know, his... his head was... was... was held high. He had... he had... kind of a sort of a smile almost. One person that lives across the street said he had seen the guy there on the sidewalk, like, all week, just been kind of hanging around. I think he intended to kill John Lennon. I mean I... I... I don't think it was a robbery or anything like that.

One police spokesman says the gunman, in his words, is a local screwball. Lennon has a single record in the Top 10 now. It's called Just Like Starting Over, from an album he recorded with Yoko Ono entitled Double Fantasy. It's the first single that Lennon has released in more than five years. It's been out just two months. Repeating, former Beatle John Lennon was shot and killed tonight in New York City. He was 40. More CBS news in a minute.

Initial police reports say the world renowned singer-songwriter was returning to his exclusive Manhattan apartment building, The Dakota, with his wife Yoko Ono when a man opened fire on Lennon. Eyewitnesses say that the man had been loitering in the area and started shooting the ex-Beatle for no apparent reason. Police say Lennon died shortly after the shooting. Police have a suspect in custody. Dozens of shocked fans, hearing the news on the radio, began arriving here at the hospital. Some spontaneously sank to their knees when Lennon's death was announced and began praying.

II.

KQ92 at 10 in front of 7. That is Jackson Browne from Hold Out. Well, I'm sure a lot of you people are kind of just getting the sleep bugs out of your eyes and are getting up to a new day. You might be interested to know that, uh, John Lennon was shot and killed yesterday as he was entering his New York apartment. We'll have a complete report from The Source in just a moment. And we'll have another special report from them that will occur at a little bit after 7:30. And, of course, John Lennon is the morning feature. We'll be hearing from him next on KQ92.

Good morning. Former Beatle John Lennon was shot to death in New York City last night. It happened just outside of his apartment building on the city's Upper West Side. Lennon, who was just having his 40th birthday, had been rushed by police to, uh, Roosevelt Hospital and there he was pronounced dead. According to police, the shooting took place outside of The Dakota -- that's the century-old luxury apartment house where he and his wife Yoko Ono lived -- and, uh, police have a suspect in custody. They described him as a local screwball. They say there doesn't seem to have been any motive for the shooting. When the suspect was put into the police car, he had a silly smirk on his face. It's a terrible tragedy. It's clear and 13°.

... they didn't want to make the move until four years later because, in his words, he quote, just didn't have the guts. After The Beatles broke up in 1970, Lennon continued writing songs and recording but in 1975, he dropped out for five years, saying he wanted to be with his son Sean and his wife Yoko Ono. It was not until last summer that he returned to music. His 14-song album Double Fantasy was released last month. Ironically the record -- which is in the Top 10 -- has a single which is titled Just Like Starting Over. This is from Abbey Road.

Something in...

...1971. Uh, good question for everybody to ask themselves, uh, when they are going over this event in their minds, I would say, particularly those of you that are hovering around 30 -- between 25 and 35 maybe -- ask yourself where you would be, what you would be thinking, how you would look, possibly -- even today -- if it wasn't for John Lennon?

Mutual News. Former Beatle John Lennon was shot to death last night outside his apartment building in New York's Manhattan. Authorities say Lennon was rushed in a police car to a nearby hospital and was pronounced dead shortly after arriving. Doctors say he suffered seven severe wounds in his chest, back, and left arm. Mutual's Bernard Gershon has been following the story over the last few hours and says New York City police have now identified the suspect in the assassination of John Lennon as Mark David Chapman, a 25-year-old man they believe is from Hawaii. New York City police believe the suspect came to New York a week ago and got an autograph from John Lennon on Monday afternoon. On Monday evening he shot John Lennon to death, they believe. This is John Hanrahan, Mutual News.

The music world was rocked by the sound of gunshots. John Lennon is dead. I'm Bob Madigan from The Source. John Lennon preached peace and nonviolence but last night outside his New York City luxury apartment building, John Lennon was gunned down by someone he probably thought was a fan. John and Yoko were taking a break from a recording session. They decided to head home for a late night snack. John walked from the limo to the apartment building and just as he was getting to the door, a man called out -- Mr. Lennon! John turned. The man crouched into a combat position and unloaded his revolver. Five shots. He fell to the ground, mortally wounded, moaning, I've been shot. A short time later, John Lennon was pronounced dead at Roosevelt Hospital. In the moments before the police arrived, the doorman of the building kicked the weapon out of the way and the gunman just stood by. Police booked the man immediately on murder charges. Reporters stood by, waiting to find out more. In an emotion wrought moment, the chief of detectives, James Sullivan, handled it with typical Jack Webb dryness.

We have arrested Mark David Chapman of 55 South Kukui--K-U-K-U-I--Street, Hawaii, for the homicide of John Lennon. He's a male Caucasian, tan complexion, 5 feet 11, 195 pounds, brown hair, blue eyes and he's 25 years of age.

Chapman reportedly had been hanging around the Lennon's home for almost a week, had even gotten Lennon's autograph earlier in the day. This morning, a crowd several hundred strong remains outside the Lennon's apartment. One of those -- one of the few outside Lennon's tight circle of friends who made contact with Lennon -- said, I delivered groceries to his apartment and he was a gentleman, he was a genius, he was an artist. He wasn't a politician that got shot. He was an artist and he was a great man. And, uh, god bless him, the lord’s with him. John Lennon is dead at 40. He was murdered last night outside his New York City apartment house. And that’s news. I’m Bob Madigan from The Source.

And the weather for today, uh, chance of maybe a snow flurry this morning. It'll be mostly cloudy. Variable cloudiness and cold for tonight and tomorrow, 23 the high today, lows tonight down to about 5.
And tomorrow’s high up to about 20. Right now, we have 15 degrees under a cloudy sky. Three minutes in front of seven o’clock. It's Wally Walker and, uh, well, we are gonna be playing more John Lennon tracks throughout the day today. As a matter of fact, I think I’m gonna do a John Lennon mini-concert right now. We have John Lennon as the morning feature, so you’ll be hearing a lot of Beatles tracks and John Lennon’s solo stuff throughout the morning. And we also hope to have that Source report for you at about 7:40, a little bit later on. And we're gonna start off with a 25-minute jam from the man himself...

... and the world will live as one.

None of us will probably ever forget where we were and what we were doing when we first got word, when we heard the first reports that John Lennon, the man who gave birth to The Beatles was dead, felled by a lone gunman in front of his New York City home. Correspondent CD Jako has been with this story since it began and tells us of John Lennon’s last day.

John Lennon and Yoko Ono left their apartment in New York's famous Dakota apartment building Monday afternoon headed for the Record Plant, a local studio. They were preparing to cut a new single. They may not have noticed a young man standing on the street. Neighbors say he had been hanging around The Dakota for several days. Only hours before, he had asked John for an autograph on an album. Lennon signed it. About 10:30 at night, John and Yoko returned from the studio. They stepped out of their limousine and started inside. The young man who had been hanging around, called to them. John turned. The young man was in a military firing position, both hands around the grip of a Charter Arms
.38 caliber revolver, his knees bent. He emptied the gun into Lennon.
Lennon staggered several feet and collapsed in an office area.

I saw John and Yoko get out of the... get out of the limousine.
They... they walked into the gate and, oh god... let me just... and then I heard four or five shots. It was ear-shattering, ear-shattering. And then I heard Yoko... I heard a woman screaming... it was Yoko. She was screaming, help me!

Police cars raced to The Dakota, where officers found Lennon and lifted him into the back seat.

I saw the cops wrestling with the guy in the tan jacket and tinted, uh, tinted glasses. He had a kind of brownish-blonde haircut, heavyset, and they, uh, threw the cuffs on him and put him into a police car.
Moments after that, I saw four officers carrying, uh, John Lennon and, uh, he was bleeding in the mouth and he looked very unconscious. And they put him into the back of the police car and they took him to the hospital.

The squad car was driven at top speed to the emergency room of Roosevelt Hospital, about a mile away. Dr. Stephen Lynn is in charge of that emergency room.

John Lennon was brought to the emergency room of the Roosevelt St.
Luke's Hospital this evening shortly before 11 p.m. He was dead on arrival.

Dr. Lynn broke the news to Yoko.
I did, uh, tell his wife that he was dead, and she was most distraught at the time and found it quite hard to accept.
Outside The Dakota hundreds of people, shocked and stunned, gathered in the warm New York night.
Woo! Woo!
All we are saying is give peace a chance...
Local New York radio stations played nothing but Beatles songs. The faithful lit candles, wept in each other's arms, laid flowers on the building grillwork and cried for John Lennon and for that part of our youth that had died.
I imagine I started to cry and then I called my sister and she started to cry and it was horrible.
To a lot of people... something like this... you know... to millions of people, this has the impact of a presidential assassination. There's no question about it.
The first thing that went through my mind... like... this is for me like John Kennedy. Because I remember I was, like, seven at the time and I remember my parents crying and stuff like that. And this is the first time this kind of impact has occurred on me. I just... I don't know... I can't imagine the world without him. I really can't.
And amid the sorrow, confusion. Who shot John Lennon? Why? The young man who had been hanging around for a week just stood there after firing, threw the gun down and was grabbed by the doorman. He was taken to 20th Precinct headquarters nearby.
We have arrested Mark David Chapman of 55 South Kukui--K-U-K-U-I-- Street, Hawaii, for the homicide of John Lennon. He's a male Caucasian, tan complexion, 5 feet 11, 195 pounds, brown hair, blue eyes and he's 25 years of age.
Mark David Chapman, three names straight off the police blotter.
Three names like many accused assassins -- Lee Harvey Oswald. James last week, allegedly with a .38 caliber revolver police say he'd bought in Hawaii. He supposedly stayed at YMCAs and at local hotels and walked back and forth in front of The Dakota. Mark David Chapman has been charged with the first-degree murder of John Lennon.
I delivered groceries to his apartment and he was a gentleman, he was a genius, he was an artist. He wasn't a politician that got shot.
He was an artist and he was a great man. And, uh, god bless him, the lord's with him. John Lennon is dead at 40.
I read the news today, oh boy
About a lucky man who made the grade
And though the news was rather sad
Well I just had to laugh
I saw the photograph
John Lennon was born in Liverpool, October the 9th, 1940. By the time he was a teenager, his father was gone and his mother was dead.
But in 1958, he struck up a friendship that was to change his life and all of rock music, because that's when he started playing with Paul McCartney, traveling in 1959 to Hamburg, Germany with a new band. John, Paul, drummer Pete Best, and guitarist Stuart Sutcliffe. Best was soon replaced with Ringo Starr and Sutcliffe died. Then back to Liverpool and a booking in a cellar club called The Cavern, where the band was discovered by Brian Epstein, the man who was to become The Beatles’ manager. By 1963, The Beatles were performing for the Queen. A year later they were honored by being named members of the Order of the British Empire.
Oh yeah, I'll tell you something,
I think you'll understand,
Then I'll say that something,
I wanna hold your hand,
I wanna hold your hand,
I wanna hold your hand.

It was during this time that John first became a father. His son, John Julian Lennon, was born to his first wife Cynthia. But by 1968, that marriage was gone, Yoko Ono announcing to the world that she would bear Lennon's second child fully a month before his divorce was finalized. As Lennon's life was starting over, The Beatles were falling apart. In 1967, Brian Epstein died and along with him with the only thing keeping the band together. Writer Laurence Shames remembers those times.

Lennon in the 60s -- although on the one hand, he was already tremendously wealthy and powerful and famous -- was really in... in many ways, uh, terrifically naïve and an incurable idealist. And that idealism carried over into politics.
All we are saying is give peace a chance.
All we are saying is give peace a chance.
Ev'rybody's talking about Bagism, Shagism...
You know you have peace and staying in bed for peace. Do something that can't be smashed.

In the early 70s, John Lennon became the target of deportation. The U.S. government argued that he was ineligible for permanent residency in the country because of a 1968 drug conviction. Lennon fought the government and won.
This is the land of the free, right? And... and since the last hundred years, all the artists -- major and otherwise -- have been attracted to this country. And although initially it was on... I came as a Beatle, it was Yoko's influence that got me to look at it as a... a place to be in rather than just scoot in and run back with the loot.
Ultimately, it was only money that kept The Beatles together or at least kept the four members talking to each other. But in 1977, when they tried to end even that tenuous relationship, Paul McCartney remembers they couldn't even agree on that.
Basically, the three of us, uh, George, Ringo and myself, are ready to sort of get settled and ready to, uh, finish up and get it all cooled out, but, uh, John has got certain objections at the moment. And, uh, lord knows what they are, you know, but, uh, he's been a bit funny at the moment.
Between 1975 and 1980, John Lennon didn't even record, turning his time and energy instead toward his personal wealth, buying homes, buying land, and even some prize-winning cows.
Whatever gets you through the night 'salright, 'salright
It's your money or your life 'salright, 'salright
Don't need a sword to cut through flowers oh no, oh no
Again, writer Laurence Shames.

When Lennon was singing in the streets and and... and giving his support to... to radical causes, he opened himself to a lot of criticism and... and he showed himself to have this sort of leftist working-class anger. Uh, in his later years, with his tremendous resources and... and his decision to invest and to try to build security for himself and his family, obviously that's something of a different side of him.

People say I'm crazy doing what I'm doing
Well they give me all kinds of warnings to save me from ruin
When I say that I'm o.k. well they look at me kind of strange
Surely you're not happy now you no longer play the game
People say I'm lazy dreaming my life away
Well they give me all kinds of advice designed to enlighten me
When I tell them that I'm doing fine watching shadows on the wall
Don't you miss the big time boy you're no longer on the ball Soon John and Yoko came to call New York City their new home, buying into the very expensive and very exclusive Dakota Apartments.

One of the things, uh, that characterized him and Yoko golf was a real love-hate for the city and a love-hate for the whole idea of being that well-known and recognized. I think that although Lennon genuinely did want his privacy, he couldn't really just go somewhere where he would be obscure and unknown -- he just he just couldn't quite make that break.

Lennon really liked New York. He'd travel the streets in public, often showing up at local clubs, but always in the shadows, lurking more than strutting the way that some stars did. And now this star shines no more. The dream is over and with it, a part of us is also gone. One day before John Lennon died, he and Yoko recorded their annual Christmas message for the BBC.

And so this is Christmas and what have you done. Ha ha ha. Another year older etcetera, etcetera. It's nice to be here. Hi. We're pretty damn steady, as they say. We're... we're in good condition. Thank you very much. It's great to talk to you and it's not kindness. We want to sell the record. And we want to tell the English to play Happy Christmas. Happy Christmas.

I read the news today oh boy
Four thousand holes in Blackburn, Lancashire
And though the holes were rather small
They had to count them all
Now they know how many holes it takes to fill the Albert Hall.
I'd love to turn you on.
Okay, you're on the air at CBS-FM. Do you have a question?
Uh, I have, uh, a few comments.
Okay.
I would like to say that I can't think of anyone who, uh, who deserves more to live for what they have given us. And, uh, another, un, feeling that I have is that he is very, uh, consciously with us because he remains in my consciousness. I would also like to encourage the news media to never publish the name of the man who assassinated him.

Well, there's an idea because of the fact that that could be exactly what he's looking for. Unfortunately with the structure of news media that we have today, I would feel this that would be pretty much impossible. Don't you Eric?

Yeah. I don't think there's chance in the world, although it's a nice thought.

Blackbird singing in the dead of night.
... the sound of a revolution.
... in so many ways. But now these days have gone...
... the English army had just won the war.
We'll be doing The Beatles from A to Z in a special tribute. We'll be back with She Loves You in just a moment.

Okay and again, I'd like to say this is a bit of a tribute to John.
He just had an interview in Playboy. I don't know if you've read it or not, but he mentioned a few things about death that I'd like to read to you. They asked him, what about death? What about rust never sleeps, Neil Young's thing about how it's better to burn out than to fade away?
What did he say? I hate it, he said. It's better to fade away like an old soldier than to burn out. I don't appreciate worship of dead Sid Vicious or dead James Dean or dead John Wayne. It's the same thing, making Sid Vicious a hero. Jim Morrison is garbage to me. I worship the people who survived. Basically, he doesn't want to be worshiped. He wants to be remembered and I think that's about it. And of course everyone is taking this tragedy with shock and disbelief, but none hard probably harder than Yoko Ono, John's wife, who was said to be back at The Dakota Hotel in a state of shock. Of course, she was with John until the end. And also at The Dakota Hotel, it appears an impromptu memorial is being staged right now. There's hundreds of Beatles fans outside mourning. They'll probably be out, uh, all night, while still just a few feet away is the puddle of blood left from the attack. I guess it's kind of a reminder of the sickness of any violence, especially as senseless as this.

... I am, I'm only sleeping...

But it was always for peace.

Good afternoon, everybody. My name is Arne Fogel. John Lennon. The name itself is enough to bring about an instant flash of memories of a lifetime -- not just his lifetime, I'm talkin' about your lifetime, too. Sitting as a kid in front of the TV screen during an early Ed Sullivan show or an even earlier Jack Parr program, the memories of the radio stations as they would tease you by playing a choice cut or two from the latest Beatles album two or three days before it was available. And later on, when you first began to study him and his three partners, the revelation that they weren't newborn the first time you saw them with Sullivan, but that they had a history, long nights of playing for next to nothing in the dingy cellars of Liverpool and Hamburg, Germany.

... let me tell you about a girl I know. Woo. Thank you.

You learned that the voice of John Lennon was first recorded in 1961 and the first Lennon composition to be recorded was an instrumental also from 1961 called Cry For A Shadow.

Oh ain't she sweet...

Ain't She Sweet, Cry For A Shadow. It was all nearly 20 years ago. No need to go into a long rehash of the recent facts, suffice it to say that John Lennon at age 40 is dead, cut down by an assassin's bullets in the flush of success of his first album in nearly six years. It's a tremendously sad time for those of us who treasured his work and career and for those like myself, who literally idolized the man and all he stood for. John was a brilliant man, a witty man, and perhaps the most important popular musician of the last 35 years. And in compiling the celebration of his life, I'm happy to report that I have been studying him, laughing a little, and listening a lot.

We didn't break up because we weren't friends. We just broke off out of sheer boredom.

Merry Christmas everybody.

Christmas cheer from John, Paul, George, and Ringo in 1963. A tribute to John Lennon today. We'll be here till four o'clock and we'll be doing another John Lennon tribute tomorrow from two to four. Once again my name is Arne Fogel. His name is John Lennon.

And it tends to get into a format, you know? Because we were together much longer than the public knew us.

No reply.

And now a demonstration of the voice that over the last 20 years has often been described as one of the greatest rock 'n roll voices in the history of the music: angular, lean, passionate, and infinitely emotive. Here's John Lennon interpreting the classic rock 'n roll of composers other than himself.

Oh yes, wait just a minute mister postman
Wait, wait mister postman
Mister postman look and...
He's in Bellevue Psychiatric Center in New York City right now. He won't be back to court until January 6. That's because the judge says Chapman needs to go undergo psychiatric tests. Who is Mark David Chapman? He's 25, 5 feet 11, 190 pounds, brown hair, blue eyes. He'd been living in Hawaii for several years and before that had lived in Texas and Georgia. He worked as a security guard and a printer in Hawaii. He graduated from Columbia High School near Atlanta in 1973 and Lucy Badgett was a classmate.

I met him in eighth grade he was real, um, very straight, alright I mean, you know, he was very into, uh, school work and everything and, you know, just real straight. And then he just changed over the years. And I know he played in a band, a local band. Senior year he was more into religion and everything.

Just last week, Chapman supposedly borrowed $2000 for from a friend to fly to New York. Robert Connell is the superintendent of Chapman's Honolulu apartment building.

I didn't even know he was gone. In fact, uh, I just saw him last week out in front out in front of the condominium and did not speak to him at the time, but I saw him out there and I just couldn't believe that he was in New York for this. So it was probably a... one of those spur of the moment deals that he went to New York for what purpose god only knows.

Mark David Chapman allegedly gunned down Lennon with that snub nosed revolver that he bought October 27th in Honolulu. It was legally registered at the police station down the street from the gun shop. Richard Lester, who directed Lennon in A Hard Day's Night.

It seems appalling to me that all this time nobody has spoken about the problems of people having guns in America and the problem that people can shoot a man on the street and when... how many more public figures will be killed before some sensible gun control will be passed?

But the gun Chapman supposedly used was registered. He was able to register it, Hawaii police say, because he had no known a narcotics record in Hawaii and because he had no known felony record anywhere in the country. So now Mark David Chapman is being looked at by psychiatrists and John Lennon is dead.

The reaction to the word of Lennon's murder was quick. With that story, Bob Madigan.

Almost as soon as the news of Lennon's death hit the air, people began to flock to The Dakota. It was too late to help -- they knew that -- but the vigil was sincere. Signs went up almost immediately telling Yoko Ono she was not alone in her grief. Flowers began to arrive before dawn. Photos of John were tacked to the iron gates, gates closed to keep the milling mourners out of the luxury apartment building's courtyard. Through the night the crowd grew but remained quiet, talking among themselves in hushed tones. But every so often the emotions would become so intense that the crowd would break into song.

All we are saying is give peace a chance.
All we are saying is give peace a chance.
We don't love anyone as much as you.
When you're not near us, we're blue.
Oh John we love you.

Of the thousands gathered at The Dakota, everyone appeared bewildered. They couldn't believe the news. And many seemed to be looking for spiritual answers to what happened. That's why they were drawn to the fashionable address opposite Central Park.

I imagine I started to cry and then I called my sister and she started to cry and it was horrible.
To a lot of people something like this, you know, to millions of people this has the impact of a presidential assassination. There's no question about it.

The first thing that went through my mind... like this is for me like John Kennedy. Because I remember I was, like, seven at the time and I remember my parents crying and stuff like that. And this is the first time this kind of impact has occurred on me. I just... I don't know... I can't imagine the world without him. I really can't.

That feeling was shared by many others. Steve Soroka.

I guess I owe the man something. He's done a lot for me all these years and I don't know... I was in kindergarten when John Kennedy got shot and, uh, this day just keeps reminding me of the day Kennedy got shot. In fact, the impact is even twice as bad.

The main reason people gravitated to the Lennon's home was because they didn't know what else to do. They lost a friend, someone they had known intimately, though never met. Michael Allerman was one who stood in the rain.

All I have ever wanted to do was to meet him once. An autograph was secondary. But just to say thanks, because I thought I owed it to him and some guy just robbed me of my opportunity. It's just an awful, awful thing. And I... I mean I wish I could say something to Yoko. I mean, but no chance. I feel so bad for her.

Some of the people came from far away. Richard Perkins was at home in Ohio when he heard Lennon had been shot. He headed to the Toledo airport, flew to New York City, and took a cab to The Dakota to be part of the vigil.

I'm 31 years old and, you know, I've grown up with The Beatles since I was, like, in eighth grade, freshman year of high school, all through college, and, uh, you know, their life is part of mine. And, so, I had the opportunity, I figured I ought to come.

What were you doing when you heard ?

I guess I just turned on the TV, uh, getting dressed and all of a sudden I heard about it and I was pretty shocked, uh, it's like a little bit of your life has been taken away from you.

Andrew Gelpman felt the same.

I just sat there for, like, an hour, just listening to The Beatles music and it's just, like, I didn't understand why anyone would want to do something, you know, just go out and kill someone because they're famous or something.

And the neighbors were shocked. Joe Plava lives but a stone's throw from the Lennon's apartment.

Well, for five years I've seen John and Yoko around a lot of times, very, uh, very nice people, always nod, always wave, always say something, just... just blows me away.

John Lennon was always a man of peace and love. Perhaps even for the man who took his life. In 1969, John was asked what he thought of capital punishment.

I can understand people thinking, uh, it's the only way to deal with them because I... I understand those people. I don't think they're right because it doesn't help murderers to hang them or help violent people to be violent to them. That's... it is all they understand really. It doesn't... I don't believe... violence begets violence, you know.

Hours after his death, John's widow and son released a statement to the press and his many fans. Yoko and Sean said that there'd be no funeral for John, just time set aside for a silent vigil to pray for his soul. John loved and prayed for the human race, they said. Please pray the same for him. John Lennon died December 8, 1980, and with him died a little bit of each of us.

And in the and the love you take is equal to love you make.

III.

Good afternoon. This just in. Thousands of people, many bearing flowers and candles in their hands and tears in their eyes gathered today in New York's Central Park for a last farewell to slain Beatle John Lennon. Millions more around the world joined the observance. Some attended local memorial services like the one in New York, others simply paused for a few moments as hundreds of radio stations joined in a vigil of silence and quiet music. Lennon's widow, Yoko Ono, asked that the world pray for John's soul for 10 minutes, which started at 2 p.m. Eastern Standard Time. That was one hour ago. Police originally estimated as many as a half million people would attend the gathering in Central Park, but freezing temperatures and biting winds apparently kept away all but the faithful. For 10 minutes, not a whisper or a word was heard in the heart of New York, the adopted home of the man who helped shape the thinking, singing, and living of an entire generation.
Space Shuttle Challenger

This is a special report from Channel 4 News. Good morning. The Space Shuttle Challenger is just a few seconds away from blasting off from the Kennedy Space Center near Cape Canaveral, Florida. Challenger finally getting ready to leave KSC, its launch delayed a couple of times because of weather and mechanical problems.

T minus 15 seconds...
That's the voice of Launch Controller Hugh Harris of NASA.
10...9...8...7...6... we have main engines starting...
4...3...2...1 and liftoff... liftoff...
Solid booster rockets kicking in...
...and liftoff of the 25th Space Shuttle mission and it has cleared the tower.

Challenger going into its roll. That's planned. Watch it spiral away from pad 39B. The first launch at 39B since the old Apollo days and the Skylab missions. It's chilly here in Florida. Icicles formed on the pad overnight. NASA engineers were concerned that they might have broken off during the launch and have affected the fragile heat protection tiles which protect the Shuttle on its way back in during reentry.

...will travel down to, uh, 65% shortly.
I don't know what the effect might be yet. The astronauts might take a look later on during the mission.

Engines at 65%. Three engines running normally. Three good fuel cells. Three good A.P.U's.

A.P.U's are the auxiliary power units.
...257 feet per second, altitude 4.3 nautical miles, downrange distance 3 nautical miles.

It's always amazing to hear how quickly the Shuttle moves. It's already more than four miles downwind as we just heard.

Challenger throttling up. Three engines now at 104%.

Challenger go with throttle up.
This Shuttle mission will launch...

My god! There's been an explosion!

...velocity 2900 feet per second, altitude nine nautical miles.

Down range distance seven nautical miles.

This is not standard! This is not something that is planned of course! I can see a solid rocket booster has broken away from Shuttle Challenger. I cannot see the Shuttle itself! I don't know if it's able to continue on one rocket booster! If it's able to jettison that rocket booster, it will be able to return to the Kennedy Space Center. Perhaps the Shuttle engines are not enough to power the Shuttle back down and they'll have to shut down.

We're looking very carefully at the situation. Obviously a major malfunction.

I hope they were able to survive! I hope the astronauts... we have absolutely no sign at all of the Shuttle itself. All we saw was that one explosion only about a minute into the flight and we saw the solid rocket booster. Now here's something coming down. I don't know what that is! I don't think that that's the Shuttle. I believe that that's a piece of debris that's coming back earthbound. I don't know. It's too small for the Shuttle itself. Pieces falling out of the sky in the Florida morning. It's about twenty till noon in here Florida. There are contingency plans for the Shuttle when something does go wrong, when something goes terribly wrong.
We have a word from the Flight Dynamics Officer that the vehicle has exploded. The director confirms that. We are checking with the recovery forces to see what can be done at this point.

We hear from Launch Control the vehicle has exploded, that's the orbiter itself. The Shuttle Challenger, has exploded. We must...

Emergency procedures are in effect.
...assume that the crew is not alive. This is unheralded in the history of the space program! Ladies and gentlemen, I... I have covered space Shuttle launches since the very first launch since before the first launch itself going way back and nothing like this has ever happened. Of course, there was the Apollo fire on the ground at the Kennedy Space Center -- the Apollo 1 fire that killed three astronauts during a test run back in the '60s -- but the Shuttle program itself, to this time, has been untouched by any human problem. But this is a major problem which developed just a few moments ago. We could see it happen. There seemed to be some kind of a, uh, of a, uh, of an explosion aboard the rocket and all of a sudden all communication with the spacecraft was lost. Obviously it is going nowhere at this point. It looks as if debris is falling out of the sky. It almost appeared as if one of the solid rocket boosters or one of the spacecraft main engines went awry and something happened.

The Flight Director confirms that that we are looking at checking with the recovery forces to see what can be done at this point. Oh! A great tragedy here! Christa McAuliffe the first private citizen in space. And the rocket has apparently exploded in the first minutes of flight.

Emergency procedures are in effect.
We're trying to get some information by listening to Mission Control.

We will report more as we have information available. Again I repeat we have a report relayed through the Flight Dynamics Officer...

Oh! A terrible thing!
...that the vehicle has exploded. We are now looking at all the contingency operations and awaiting word from any recovery forces and the downrange field.

A terrible thing! Debris falling out of the sky -- falling slowly, painfully, tragically slowly -- toward the Atlantic Ocean, just a few miles offshore. This flight was to have been such a bright chapter in the history of the manned spaceflight program, but it turned -- in a flash of an instant -- into a terrible, terrible tragedy. Of course Mission Control is only giving very scanty information as they scramble to try to find out what happened and to determine exactly what the status is. But as you heard them say, apparently the Shuttle Challenger exploded within the first minute or so of flight and the fate of the crew members is unknown but it does not look good at all. The smoke just, um... crazy patterns in the sky, contrails from bits of debris going... going down toward the ocean, still falling. People in the grandstands -- fans who had come from many miles from all over the country to wish Christa McAuliffe well -- are sitting stunned, some of them leaving and shaking their heads in disbelief. We can see them from where we sit. It's an awful sight.

This is Mission Control Houston. We have no additional word at this time.

A terrible sight and one that I certainly had hoped that I would never have to see. NASA is looking at its contingencies at this point, but really it looks absolutely awful. It looks like there is no hope for any of the people aboard that flight.
Reports from the Dynamics Flight Officer indicate that the capsule apparently exploded and impacted in the water at a point of approximately 28.64° north, 80.28° west. The worst fears of all of us who have covered space for a long time were realized this morning at Cape Canaveral. We are waiting for verification as to the location of recovery forces in the field to see what may be possible at this point. It appeared as if the debris from the exploded Challenger Shuttle came down...

... and we will keep you advised as present information becomes available. This is Mission Control.

... just a few miles offshore. So of course they will be rushing to that area to try to see what they can find. A most terrible sight! The most terrible event! Naturally, a great deal of confusion as we try to piece together exactly what did happen and so far, there has been no specific word on what caused the malfunction -- what caused the explosion aboard Challenger. It just seemed to be going perfectly as we watched it leave. We had thought all was going well, but within ten seconds after the launch of Challenger, a bright orange flash in the sky, one piece of the rocket seemed to break off from the rest of the main assembly. The main engines were still going on the Challenger itself and then this spark, it seemed, an ember almost flipped out to the side, and all of a sudden the smoke contrails were no longer straight and true. They were haywire and going crazy in the sky, and it was obviously and immediately apparent that an awful disaster had just been made. Still now we can see smoke as the wind starts to carry it -- its patterns are dispersed in the bright blue Florida sky. It was an absolutely perfect day for a launch and everything seemed to be going well. And all of a sudden it happened. Christa McAuliffe and her crewmates, the pilot Mike Scobee; astronauts Michael Smith and Judy Resnik; Mission Specialist Ellison Onizuka -- a Mission Specialist who'd flown before; Ronald McNair, a black American astronaut -- a Mission Specialist who had also flown before; Gregory Jarvis, Payload Specialist; and, yes, Christa McAuliffe, the 37-year-old Concord, New Hampshire school teacher from Concord High, listed as a Teacher Observer on this flight, but of course she was more than that. She had been picked from over 10,000 teachers who had applied to be the first private American citizen in space -- a mission which had been called for by President Reagan some time ago -- and had spent many months in training for this moment. She and the rest of the crew had suffered many delays as the Challenger sat on the launch pad and waited out the weather for three days in a row, some mechanical snafus, which, uh, at the time we thought were embarrassing but now, of course, all of that has shrunk into insignificance alongside of this awful, awful tragedy. We can see people running from the, uh, the NASA headquarters building here...

This is Mission Control, Houston...

...trying to get a better look at the water.

...recovery forces are in the field...

That news that the, uh...

...equipment, recovery vehicles intended for the recovery of the SRB in the general area. Those parachutes believed to be paramedics going into that area.

...paramedics are now parachuting into the Atlantic in the area where the debris from Challenger fell.

Chris, this is Judy Muller in New York.

To repeat, we had an...

We are following this with you.
apparently normal assent with the data coming to all positions being normal up through approximately the time that the main engine throttled back up to 104%...
Mission Control saying now that everything on the instruments reading in the log centers seem to be looking all right.
...on the flight, there was an apparent explosion. The Flight Dynamics Officer reported... the tracking reported that the vehicle had exploded on impact with the water in an area approximately located at 28.64° north, 80.28° west. Recovery forces are proceeding to the area.
Chris, we just saw the parachutes going into that area.
Yes, Judy. Those are -- according to Mission Control -- they are paramedics who are parachuting into the area where the debris fell in the Atlantic.
...flight controllers are reviewing their data here at this point.
What they will find there is not known.
...we will provide you with more information as it becomes available.
This is Mission Control, Houston.
So the gleanings from that Mission Control report was that everything was looking normal as far as the instruments were concerned and that this apparent explosion aboard Challenger just happened in a flash with no forewarning and no instrument indication that anything was amiss, as the Shuttle headed out downrange over the Atlantic in the first minute of its flight.
Chris, as you know, the voice of NASA, the voice of Mission Control, whatever voice we hear, is always calm. But... but today, of course, we hear a different note of terrible...
Well it's a... it's a steely tone, I think, one that is, you know, a forced calm, the way you get when you are faced with an intensely emotional and tragic situation and try very hard to cover it. I must admit I feel the same way.
Here in New York we see the pictures on the monitor that NASA sends up of Mission Control and the faces in that room just tell it all.
Certainly do. Grim. Everybody sitting still, very little movement.
This is the first such first failure in 56 such manned space missions.
Never before has there been one like it and I very much hope that there will never be again.
We have come to accept this nominal idea, we're so used to things -- except for minor glitches that we've been hearing about in recent launches -- we're so used to this going almost flawlessly, that we, I think, have taken it for granted almost.
That's true. The hard part of this is, I think, that they plan so carefully for emergency situations. They can turn around immediately after launch and come back and land at the Kennedy Space Center if anything goes wrong. They can have an abort across the Atlantic at any one of numerous landing sites in western Africa. They can abort once around the world and then come down again in California or even back here at the Cape if they have an emergency in the first orbit. They can abort to orbit if something goes wrong just before they get there. They can go up and get into a preliminary orbit and then see what they're gonna do -- as a matter of fact, they've done that once -- but to have this happen without any warning whatsoever, uh, without any chance...
With all those computer backups telling them when anything goes wrong, even a hatch problem, it's... it's amazing that something wouldn't have shown up. I wonder in all that debris if they'll ever know.
I don't know. I don't know how deep the water is at that point, but I imagine that it's probably still well within the limits of the continental shelf and it's probably not too deep for salvage operations. There has been, of course, no official word on the fate of the crew, but from our vantage point and from what we could see -- and we could see it at all, albeit it was several miles away -- it did not look like they had a chance. It doesn't appear that any of them could've survived.

This would be tragic if it involved anybody -- a member of NASA, an astronaut -- but it is especially tragic with the first civilian in space aboard. I imagine her family was watching or is at the Cape.

Indeed they were, husband and children. And many dignitaries from all over the country and literally hundreds of educators and school kids who had come here to watch a person that had become something of a hero to them fly away into history. Perhaps history was made here today, but it's not the pleasant variety, not the glorious variety at all. This was to have been, of course, NASA's most ambitious year. They had more than a dozen Shuttle flights planned, which would far and away top the number that they've ever been able to launch in a single year before. What's going to happen to those plans now? What this is going to mean to America's manned spaceflight program or to the space program in general, of course, remains to be seen. Right now there's no talk of that, only of determining what happened and getting the official word on the fate of the seven man crew.

Chris, this happened just about a minute after launch. Did it not up to that point -- since I was not there -- could you describe what did it look like right up to that point?

Oh, it looked perfect, I mean, it looked like every other space Shuttle launch that I've ever seen -- and I've seen about ten, I think. Everything was going very smoothly. Mission Control was sounding very, very confident. The Shuttle was climbing up into a very clear blue, cloudless Florida sky and all of a sudden... Flash! The one bright flame that we can usually spot as the spacecraft carries out over the Atlantic for dozens and dozens of miles, became two bright flames. It looked almost as if one of the solid rocket boosters had exploded and split off from the spacecraft, sending it off course in a crazy, spiraling pattern for a few seconds. Then debris started to fall out of the sky into the sea.

Of course they have search and recovery people standing by for all these missions but it's almost become assumed that they would never going to action. It... it must be terrible for them too.

Well, they've always been ready and certainly they had people parachuting into the crash site into the water within, I would say, two or three minutes after the event, so they were ready and they did perform as they were supposed to. But there seems little chance that they'll find anybody alive out there.

For those who may have just tuned in, could you go over who the crew members are again?

Yes, of course. Frank Scobee, the Commander of this mission, Michael Smith, the pilot, Judy Resnik, a Mission Specialist, Ellison Onizuka, a Mission Specialist, Ronald McNair, a black astronaut and also a Mission Specialist, Gregory Jarvis, who is a Payload Specialist and, uh, uh, Sharon Christa McAuliffe, the 37-year-old high school teacher from New Hampshire who was to have been America's first private citizen in space.

And for those of us who have covered the Space Program for several years, some of those names are firsts in themselves. Ronald McNair, the first black astronaut in space, Judith Resnik was the second woman, I believe, in space or the third, she's among the first certainly, um, Dick Scobee, a veteran of space flights.
Yes he is. Well, Mission audio has been silent for a few minutes now and there has been no word specifically on what happened. All about all that Mission people have said is that there was an explosion aboard the Shuttle Challenger and, of course, the crew members at that point are very securely strapped into their seats. They have no ejection seats or anything like that, any kind of life saving device like that, which you might expect to find in a fighter plane when something like that happens. It's, uh, it's just the end. There is nothing they can do about it. They don't wear parachutes. There wouldn't be any way for them to get out of the spacecraft if they had the chance to do that anyway. They're sealed in there until they land.

As we see in NASA's optics, the Atlantic is just a stretch of blue calm belying what has just happened here. I see no debris. I see nothing as we scan the horizon there.

No. I'm looking at, uh, the video picture too and I... I can't see anything like that either.

You mentioned the solid rocket booster seemed to explode and burst away.

Well, I was, you know, tracking it with my eye and it seemed that something popped out to the side. Another flaming rocket piece popped away to the side of the spacecraft and the main body of it carried on for a little while longer and then started gyrating and twisting in the sky and finally started plunging straight down.

There was, of course, a crowd of spectators in the stands...
Hundreds of them.
... hoping to celebrate Christa McAuliffe's triumph today.

Yes, it was, uh, pretty grim. I looked over that way as soon as I could tear my eyes away from that terrible tragedy in the sky and people were just... just leaving, you know, what else could they do? They were getting out of the grandstands and walking away. Some of them seemed to be shaking their heads in disbelief, but there didn't seem to be any hysteria, no running. It was just like they could not believe what their eyes had just recorded in their minds.

A terrible thing for you and everyone there and I think, uh, it will take some time for the shock of this to sink in.

Yes indeed. Let's just recap here. We haven't gotten much additional information from NASA recently and we'll just say that within one minute of what appeared to be a perfect launch, there was an explosion this morning aboard the Space Shuttle Challenger carrying teacher Christa McAuliffe and six crew members into orbit. The rockets seemed to spin wildly in space for a few seconds and then plunged into the Atlantic.

We have with us now NASA spokesman George Diller and perhaps we can get some more additional information from him. George can you add anything to the reports we received from Mission Control?

Uh, not a great deal. One of the problems at this point is that before we can send any emergency team in to see what state the orbiter is in -- if it is, in fact, intact -- is that there is debris that falls from that altitude that takes a considerable amount of time to impact the ocean. Normally that is 15 minutes after any mishap. There is the possibility that we have gotten some paramedics into that general area but most aircraft and ships will stay clear until the period of the debris ends because the debris falling out of the sky, obviously, endangers the planes and the ships that would be going in to do whatever rescue attempt can be done. So we don't know what the state of the orbiter is at this time and as soon as, by calculation, we know that the debris has cleared, then we can go in and check the impact area, because we will know from Flight Dynamics Officer that it’s past the point of vehicular impact.

Now, this very painful question: Is it possible that anyone could have survived an accident like this?

It depends on whether or not the orbiter is damaged. If the orbiter did not explode and it is not seriously damaged, it will float for a period of time. That’s why we try to get crews in as soon as we can because there is, I believe, about an hour, where there’s no problem.

Gary, I guess President Reagan is watching -- as we all are -- in shock and disbelief, waiting to find out if there’s any possibility that the orbiter might have landed intact. And, going back to Chris, that was the question I suppose we’ll know, um, soon -- will we not?

Well, it’s difficult to say. If there is the possibility that the orbiter could have remained intact and have plunged into the sea intact, then it becomes a question of finding the orbiter -- how deep is it? How quickly can we get divers down there to see what’s going on? Now, don’t forget, at the same time, even if the orbiter were to have, um, survived the explosion intact, it was falling from an enormous height. I don’t know exactly how high it was at the at the moment of the explosion but, it was falling from a very, very great height and gaining speed as it came down and, uh, when it impacted on the water, it would be sort of like driving into a brick wall. It’s not just, uh, a swan dive -- it would be falling and impacting with enormous force on it. So, even if it did survive intact, what could be the likelihood that anyone could have survived the fall from that height? I don’t know the answer to that and NASA, of course, is spending every possible ounce of energy to try to find the answer to that question. We can hope for the best but it does not look good.

How long do you think it will be before they know one way or the other?

Well, he said it was 20 miles offshore or so and they do have rescue teams on the site. I don’t know how they are equipped or whether they’re equipped to do any deep sea diving. It takes about 15 minutes for something to fall from the sky at that altitude. It appeared to my eye -- as I watched the debris falling toward the Atlantic -- that it was approaching the surface of the water much more rapidly than that, but of course I could be wrong. I did not see anything large enough to appear to be the main body of the Shuttle. Now we do have here in our studios with us now Jim Rivers who is with WKXL in Concord, New Hampshire. Jim, can you give us your impressions of what’s happened and how the folks in Concord must feel?

Well, as you can expect, Chris, utter, utter shock at the, uh, tragedy of the situation. At Concord High School, uh, party hats and noisemakers and New Year’s Eve types of things had been handed out. The student body had lined into the auditorium and it had become just a festive affair. From the moment the countdown got down to the final minute, the cheering began and it began to build until liftoff. Even a minute in, when the explosion came, there was cheering… and then all of a sudden… silence. Just moments ago, at Concord High School, the auditorium was littered with party hats and noisemakers. The students have filed out. The media, too, has been asked to leave the high school. The situation right now, as you would expect, in the city of Concord, not only for Christa McAuliffe but for the entire crew is… is… just pray to God that they’re somewhere…

And the state of New Hampshire and the nation and -- without a doubt, the entire world -- is mourning this great tragedy.

Jim, any further insight into the way that Concord feels about this?
Well, Chris, I've been in contact with the city and it's desolate. We talked to a caller on a talk show this morning and he said you would've thought that the town had been evacuated. Everybody was in front of TVs. So this is an event that people aren't just going to read about in the papers. It's something that everybody saw as it happened. And a lot of us in Concord are rookies seeing this, so when we saw the ball of fire we thought it was part of the whole event. And everybody's just sitting back and praying and hoping that there are seven people out there in the water somewhere. We've had a couple of calls in the studio in the last few minutes from concerned people. We had a call from a young boy who wanted to talk to someone. He asked if the apple had anything to do with it.

A member of the closeout team outside the rocket just before Christa McAuliffe got aboard this morning handed her an apple for the teacher. This young listener said -- did anyone check the apples? So everybody's saying, why? What happened? What went wrong?

Chris, anything new from the Cape at all?

No Judy. It's really... it's calm here. Of course, we're sitting in the position from which we watched the space launch and it's a benign looking scene. About the only reminder of this tragedy within our eye's range is still the traces of those awful clouds that formed as the rocket exploded, still drifting in the sky, with no wind today to push them out of the way.

Things have just been going so badly for NASA and this is bound to set back the program. It would seem to me to be a long time before they send another civilian into space.

I don't think they'll be sending anybody into space for quite a while, Judy.

The last tragedy anywhere near this magnitude, of course, was the Apollo launch explosion. That was on the pad in which Gus Grissom, Edward White, and Roger Chafee were killed.

Yes, that was not a space flight. It was a training mission. It was a static Apollo module and the situation at that point -- I think it was in 1967, if I'm not mistaken -- was that there was a flash fire inside the command module -- the Apollo command module -- and before anybody knew what was happening and they could get them out, they were all asphyxiated and subsequently burned to death.

It was, interestingly enough, January 27, 1967.

Nineteen years ago. Exactly. There never been to my, uh, recollection any space flight tragedy of this dimension in the history of manned space flight for any nation. Of course the United States has never had anyone die in flight before, only those, those three -- Chafee, White, and Grissom -- who died on the pad here at Cape Canaveral. But the Soviets did have a couple of losses of life. I seem to recall sometime back -- and I'm picking my memory for fifteen-year-old details here -- but two Cosmonauts were killed on a landing attempt. Something went wrong there and, of course, the Soviets are very hesitant about explaining publicly any tragedies. And even at the time there was very little information on that, but I do recall that happened. And that's about the worst previous in-flight manned space incidents I can think of.

The debris does appear to have cleared at this time and they are sending in crews now to see whether or not the orbiter may by some chance be intact. And we don't know what state the orbiter itself is in so it's premature to speculate that we've lost it. We really don't know.

Given a fall of a of a body that massive from that great altitude, is it possible it could have survived the impact in one piece?
Well, it depends on, you know, what the nature of the explosion was. Was it the solid rocket boosters or was it the orbiter? The orbiter could float for up to an hour if it's intact and not damaged. If the orbiter is damaged, how long it will float for is undetermined. It is NASA's hope that somehow, some way, the orbiter survived the explosion intact and might have been able to perform a successful ditch into the Atlantic. Rescue teams are moving to the craft site now and what they will find there is anyone's guess at this point. But from the eyeball view of it and from all indications so far -- the lack of communication and anything else -- it did not appear that anyone survived, uh, the explosion this morning.

Well, it was nearly an hour ago that Shuttle Challenger, less than a minute and a half off the launch pad exploded in flight. The fate of the crew is still officially unknown. It was an awful long way down and the water there is quite deep -- they're about 20 miles offshore -- so it's going to be a long time before we get any from information on what has happened to the crew, but it does not appear too bright for their survival at this point.

So far the main recovery efforts underway are by the Coast Guard. They have a couple of ships in the area there along with aircraft to see what they can achieve there. At the same time, the Navy says two ships that happened to be in the general vicinity -- they weren't there on station, they weren't there on duty, but they were in the general location -- are now rushing toward the disaster area. One, we're told, is about 45 minutes away -- a hydrofoil -- which carries about 21 men. Another ship, a U.S. guided missile frigate with 200 men is steaming toward the location, but that ship is a good two hours away. A Navy official said that, as best they could tell, there were no Soviet ships in the immediate area. We don't know if the Soviets at this time were off the Florida coast -- well off the Florida coast I should say -- watching this launch. They have been out there in the past. Whether they were there this time is unknown. And as best the Navy can tell, there were no ships anywhere around because area had been cleared prior to the launch.

Chris, any new news?

No, nothing new Judy, only to say that at this point, nothing is known for sure. It just happened. We did, however, receive word that the Senate has scheduled a prayer session for this afternoon. Of course it seems so long -- so agonizingly long -- since this happened that those of us were waiting and hoping wonder what's going to happen now. What will happen now?

It's hard to say. What was immediately apparent was what we could see with our eyes. This rocket appeared to be going so well without warning -- to the eyes or to instruments of any kind -- then it just blew apart in the air.

Christa McAuliffe was, of course, aboard that flight -- the first citizen in space, the first teacher in space -- and she was thrilled when she accepted her choice as the first private citizen to fly on the Shuttle. The parents of the New Hampshire teacher, of course, were on the scene at the Cape when the disaster occurred. They stared in utter disbelief as they watched the Shuttle explode. There was cheering before the explosion, there was happiness, and then -- oh my god! Oh no, said one. And with looks of shock, the Corrigans -- Edward and Grace Corrigan of Framingham Massachusetts, the parents of Christa McAuliffe -- were taken to another room by NASA officials. She had said long before the flight that what she really wanted to do -- the real reason that she wanted to go into space -- was to demystify NASA and space flight. She herself said it's a safe place to be.
I want to prove that this is as safe as walking across the street. Christa wanted to show ordinary people and generations of young Americans that there was a place for them in space and a reason that they should be going there, and I think her words are ironic and, uh, especially tragic today given the scope of this disaster which we have seen before our eyes. This from her White House speech.

It's not often that a teacher is at a loss for words. I know my students wouldn't think so. I've made nine wonderful friends over the last two weeks. When not Shuttle goes they might be one body, but there's going to be 10 souls that I'm taking with me. Thank you.
Yes. I am a teacher at Columbine High School. There is a student here with a gun. He has shot out a window. I believe one student, uh, um, um, I’ve been, um, I don’t know if it’s... I don’t know what’s in my shoulder, if it was just some glass he threw or what.

Has anyone been injured, ma’am?
Yes! Yes!

Okay.

And the school is in a panic and I’m in the library. I’ve got... students down! Under the tables, kids! Heads down! Under the tables! Um, kids are screaming, the teachers, um, are, y’know, trying to take control of things. We need police here.

OK, we're getting them there.
Can you please hurry?
Who is the student, ma’am?
I do not know who the student is.
Okay.

I saw a student outside, I was in the hall-- [sound of shots being fired out in the hall; Patti begins to panic] Oh, dear god! Okay! I was on hall duty, I saw a gun. I said what’s going on out there? And the kid that was following me said it was a film production, probably a joke, and I said well, I don’t think that’s a good idea and I went walking outside to see what was going on. He pointed the gun straight at us and shot and... my god! The window went out and the kid standing there with me, I think he got hit!

Okay.
There’s something in my shoulder.
Okay. We’ve got help on the way, ma’am.
Oh, god! Stay on the line with me. Oh, god! Kids, just stay down!
Do we know where he’s at?
I’m sorry?
Do we know where he’s at?
I’m in the library. He’s upstairs. He’s right outside of here. He’s outside?
He’s outside of this hall.
Outside of the hall or outside...
He’s in the hall. I’m sorry. There are alarms and things going off.
There’s smoke. My god! Smoke is, like, coming into this room.

Okay.
I’ve got the kids under tables here. I don’t know what’s happening in the rest of the building. I don’t know. I’m sure someone else is calling 911.

Yes, we have a lot of people on... Okay. I just want you to stay on the line with me, I... we need to know what’s going on.

Okay.
Okay?
I am on the floor.
Okay. You’ve got the kids there? Okay?
In the library. And I’ve got every student in the library... ON THE FLOOR! You guys STAY ON THE FLOOR!

Is there any way you can lock the doors?
Um, smoke is coming in from out there and I’m a little... [More shots, louder this time] The gun is right outside the library door, okay? I don’t think I’m going to go out there. Okay?
Okay. You’re at Columbine High School?
I've got... I've got three children...
Okay. We've got it.
Okay, um, I'm not going to go to the door. He just shot toward the door. I've got the kids on the floor, um, I got all the kids in the library on the... Yes. I mean... He's... I can't believe he's... not out of bullets! He just keeps shooting and shooting and shooting!
Okay. Yeah. We have a police officer on scene. Okay. Just try and keep the kids in the library calm. Is there any way you can block the door so no one can get in?
I think... I do not...
Okay.
I... Yeah. I guess I can try to go, but, I mean like, he's right outside that door. I'm afraid to go to the door.
That's okay.
That's where he is. I'm afraid to go there.
Okay.
Okay. I told the kids to get on the floor. I told them to get under the tables. All of the children are on the floor, under the tables. Um, um, yeah, they're all under the tables.
Okay. As long as we can just try and keep...
...I'm just trying to keep calm. No one's saying a word.
Okay. As long as we can keep everyone there as calm as we can...
I hear some yelling out there going on right now! Yeah, we've got alarms going off now as well. Yeah, there's alarms. This room is filled with smoke!
Okay. Okay. Keep everyone low to the floor.
Yeah. Yeah. Everyone's... uh, everyone stay on the floor! Stay on the floor! Stay under the tables! Um..... I... I don't know. I...
Okay, I know. Just...
I don't know. I didn't... I said... what... what has that kid got? He was outside at the time. And... and... and, um, I was on hall duty.
[Explosion] Oh, God! Um, he was going like woo-hoo-hoo! They're getting shots off.
Who was the student?
I do not know who the student was. I don't even... I saw him. He was wearing black. He looked very large, um, male student, um, he was out there shooting. [Another explosion] It looked like he was... out shooting and somebody... I said what is that? [Another explosion]
Mm-hmm.
I said what's going on out there? Well it's probably a cap gun. Probably a video production, you know, they do these videos...
Right.
And the kids... Well, I said, that's not, you know, a play gun, a real gun, I was goin' out there to say no, and I went... [Another shot, very loud] Oh, my God! That was really close! That just rattled me.
Okay.
One of the shooters: YEAH! [Another shot]
[whispering] Oh, God. I'm really... frightened. [More shots, extremely close] I think he's in the library.
What's your name, ma'am?
[whispering] My name is Patti.
Patti?
Okay. I have him in the library shooting at students and... the lady in the library, I have on the phone.. Okay. Try to keep as many people down as you can.
World Trade Center

I.

This just in. You are looking at obviously a very disturbing live shot there. That is the World Trade Center, and we have unconfirmed reports this morning that a plane has crashed into one of the towers of the World Trade Center.

We are right now just beginning to work on this story, obviously calling our sources and trying to figure out exactly what happened. But clearly, something relatively devastating happening this morning here on the south end of the island of Manhattan.

This is, once again, a picture of one of the towers of the World Trade Center.

And as we can see in these pictures, obviously something devastating that has happened. And again, there are unconfirmed reports that a plane has crashed into one of the towers there. We are efforting more information on the subject as it becomes available to you.

Right now we've got Sean Murtagh -- he is our producer -- on the telephone. Sean, what can you tell us what about you know?

This is Sean Murtagh. I just was standing on the vice president of the vice president of finance.

Sean, we're on the air right now. What you can tell us about the situation?

Hello?
Yes, Sean, you are on the air right now. Go ahead. What you can tell us?

I just witnessed a plane that appeared to be cruising at slightly lower than normal altitude over New York City, and it appears to have crashed into -- I don't know which tower it is -- but it hit directly in the middle of one of the World Trade Center towers.

Sean, what kind of plane was it? Was it a small plane, a jet?

It was a jet. It looked like a two-engine jet, maybe a 737.

You are talking about a large passenger commercial jet.

Where were you when you saw this?

I am on the 21st floor of 5 Penn Plaza.

Did it appear that the plane was having any difficulty flying?

Yes, it did. It was teetering back and forth, wingtip to wingtip, and it looks like it crashed into, probably, 20 stories from the top of the World Trade Center, maybe the 80th to 85th floor. There is smoke billowing out of the World Trade Center.

Sean, what happened next? Does it appear to you that the plane is still inside the World Trade Center?

From my angle -- I'm viewing south towards the Statue of Liberty and the World Trade Center -- it looks like it has been embedded in the building. I can't see, from my vantage point, whether it has come out the other side.

Sean, what about on the ground or any debris that has hit down there?

My vantage point is too far from the World Trade Center to make any determination of that.

Did you see any smoke, any flames coming out of engines of that plane?

No, I did not. The plane just was coming in low, and the wingtips tilted back and forth, and it flattened out. It looks like it hit at a slight angle into the World Trade Center. I can see flames coming out of the side of the building, and smoke continues to billow.

Generally, is that a trafficked area in New York for aircraft?

It is not a normal flight pattern. I'm a frequent traveler between Atlanta and New York for business, and it is not a normal flight pattern to come directly over Manhattan. Usually, they come up either over the Hudson River, heading north, and pass alongside, beyond Manhattan, or if they are taking off from LaGuardia, they usually take off over Shea Stadium and gain altitude around the island of Manhattan. It is rare you have a jet crossing directly over the island of Manhattan.

For our viewers who are just tuning in right now, you are looking at live pictures of the World Trade Center tower, where, according to eyewitness Sean Murtagh, the vice president of finance and eyewitness to what he describes as a twin-engine plane or possibly a 737 passenger jet, flying into the World Trade Center. It appears to be still embedded inside the building.

Sean, are you in a position to hear whether any sirens are going, any ambulances, any response to this yet?

Not from my vantage point. I am probably 1½ to 2 miles from the World Trade Center.

It is a remarkable scene. Flames are still coming out of the windows, black smoke is billowing from what appears to be all sides. Obviously, windows are shattered and steel is jutting out from the structure right now.

Sean, we are looking at these pictures. Yes. I see them in my office. I have them on all my TVs. And you are telling us you believe the plane remains embedded? I can't tell from my vantage point.

Sean, thank you so much for your eyewitness account there. Right now, we want to go to our affiliate NY1, reporting on this as we speak.

... a little girl in his arms?

Did you see what happened, sir? Did you see what happened? What happened?

I was in the PATH train, and there was a huge explosion sound. Everyone came out. A large section of the building had blown out around the 80th floor.

Was it hit by something, or was it something inside?

It was inside.

It was inside.

It looked like everything was coming out. All the windows and the papers.

What is on the sidewalk?

I didn't see anything. I just ran, and everyone on the passenger train just ran. I don't know if anyone was hurt, but I assume they were because the windows were all blown out.

Thank you.

You have to assume a very, very terrible situation if that is indeed the case, because I'm sure there were people up there.

We have lost... again, our transmitter is on top of the World Trade Center. So we, apparently, have lost contact...

Again, you are looking at pictures now. We understand from our vice president, Sean Murtagh, who was an eyewitness to this, that a commercial jet has crashed into one of the towers of the World Trade Center. You can see the smoke billowing out. There are flames billowing out there, a commercial jet crashing into one of these towers. At this point, we do not have official injury updates to bring you. We are only now beginning to put together the pieces of this horrible incident.

We want to go to an eyewitness on the telephone right now.

Jeanne, what can you tell us what you saw?

I can tell you that I was watching TV, and there was this sonic boom, and the TV went out. And I thought maybe the Concorde was back in service, because I've heard about that sonic boom. And I went to the window -- I live in Battery Park City, right next to the Twin Towers -- and I looked up, and the side of the World Trade Center exploded. At that point, debris started falling. I couldn't believe what I was watching.

Can you hear anything from your position now -- ambulances, sirens?

Absolutely. Positively. There are crowds of people downstairs in Battery Park City. Everybody's come out from the buildings. This is the financial area in Manhattan. There are a lot of fire engines -- I can see them from my window.

Jeanne, I don't know if you can tell which tower it is that is on fire, or the kinds of services that are inside that tower.

I can't tell what is inside. It's the northern tower versus the southern tower, and it seems to be all sides of the building, from what I can tell. The west side, the south side, and it looks like smoke's coming from the east side as well.

Jeanne, can you see any of the debris currently on the ground area? Absolutely. It's continuing to flutter down like leaflets, and at first there was tons of debris, and it continues to fall out. And it looks like these uppermost floors are definitely on fire.

Can you see any actual people in that area who may have been hit by any of this debris or were not able to get out of way? Can you see any crowds that are maybe too close to where they should be? Anything like that?

No, I don't think so. It's not a highly trafficked area at the base of the World Trade Center. So that is one fortunate thing.

Jeanne, we are continuing to look at pictures of this devastating scene. Sean Murtagh, vice president of finance, witnessed what he described as a twin-engine plane, possibly a 737. He was almost absolutely sure it was a large passenger jet that went into that.

Jeanne, you are saying you didn't see anything initially. You didn't see a plane approach the building?

I had no idea it was a plane. I just saw the entire top part of the World Trade Center explode. So I turned on the TV when I heard them say it was a plane. It was really strange.

Were you living in New York during the World Trade Center bombing?

No, I wasn't.

Fortunately so. When you say a sonic boom, did you feel anything? Were things shaking in your apartment?

Yes, you could feel it. It was a gigantic sonic boom. The TV went off for a second and went back on. And the windows -- you felt the vibrations on the windows.

You were saying it's not a highly trafficked area usually. You can guesstimate how many people may be in an area like that at this hour of the morning?

It would be hard to say. There is a huge courtyard between the two World Trade Center buildings, and the only issue might have been tourists or business people out in this courtyard area, and they possibly would have been hit. But the people that are immediately around the base of the World Trade Center, I would say, at any given time, you're talking about maybe 20 or 30 people at best.
We were talking with Sean Murtagh earlier, and he said this is not normally an area where you would see some sort of aircraft, certainly, obviously, that low. That is not a high traffic area in terms of flights?

I don't know about flights. I have a balcony down here in Battery Park City, and they have that needle sticking out of the top of the World Trade Center, and I have always wondered if anyone would get too close to the building and accidentally bear into it.

Jeanne, tell us a little bit about that area and how emergency crews would be able to access that area? Would that be relatively difficult or easy to access for emergency people?

I would imagine it would be slightly difficult because to get around the base of the World Trade Center building there is really only the one street entrance. The other sides of the building are surrounded by other buildings in the courtyard, and so it's just the West Side Highway, the one major street that runs up the west side of Manhattan that makes it accessible for the fire engines. And you know, it's amazing to sit here and watch this building on fire and you've got this tiny little fire engine that I'm watching.

That's all you see right now, is the one fire engine?

Well, where the fire engines are it's a little bit obscured by other buildings.

Right. Jeanne, let me ask -- I know I'm asking you to be a bit of an expert on the World Trade Center -- but there's a famous viewing deck for tourists on one of the towers. When you say that this is the North Tower, is this the one that services a lot of the tourists to get to the view and get to the restaurant at the top?

As a matter of fact it is. And, as I'm sure you can see, there's a ton of smoke coming out right now.

I'm just guessing, the fire seems to be worse on -- it looks like it's about 15 floors down from the top of the building.

Yes. One of the eyewitnesses -- one of our affiliates I was talking to -- said that she thought this was on the 80th floor. We know there is an open air deck 110 stories high and the glass enclosed observatory is on the 107th floor. So there is the possibility that people may very well be trapped up there.

Now, when you say a huge hole, one of our earliest witnesses, Libby Clark, said not much of the plane came down off the building, much of it went...

No, it went totally into the building.

It's in the building, from what you can see?

Right, yes.

Now, can you see if there is a lot of debris downstairs, Jeanne?

No, because it looks like it's inverted. With the impact everything went inside the building.

Inside?

The only thing that came out was a little bit of the outside awning. But I'd say the huge... the hole is... let me just get a better look right now...

OK, go ahead.

I'd say the hole takes about... it looks like six or seven floors were taken out.

And there's more explosions right now! Hold on! People are running.

Hold on!

We should hold on just a moment. We've got an explosion inside.

The building's exploding right now! You've got people running up the street!

Hold on, I'll tell you what's going on.
OK, just put Jeanne on pause there for just a moment...
OK, the whole building exploded some more, the whole top part! The building's still intact, people are running up the street! Am I still connected?
This would support probably the idea that perhaps the fuselage is in the building. That would cause a second explosion like that.
Well, that's what just happened then.
That would... certainly...
People are running up!
We are getting word that perhaps...
OK, hold on, there some people here... everybody's panicking!
All right, Jeanne, you know, let me put Jeanne on hold for just a moment.
OK. How much longer are we staying on? I'm inside of a diner right now.

Well, Jeanne, you know what, if you could give us a call back... I just... don't panic here on the air.

Goodbye, Jeanne.

We thank you very much for your insight. Why don't we take a quick look at traffic. Debbie, I'm sure traffic has got to be a mess. Debbie, are you there?

Yes I am. Um, traffic is a nightmare. All the bridges and tunnels getting into the city are being shut down right now. Lincoln, Holland, George. Shut. Forget about it. Turn around. Go back home. Fifty-ninth Street Bridge. Closed. Brooklyn Bridge, Williamsburg, Brooklyn Battery Tunnel, again the Manhattan Bridge, uh, everything being closed heading into the city. And of course you want to avoid the area of the Twin Towers right now. You have tons of emergency vehicles there. And also all the area airports are closed, uh, Newark, Kennedy, LaGuardia, all the major airports are shut down. So again, avoid this area of the city. It is a nightmare.

Thanks, Debbie. Best to stay right where you are. And a reminder to folks trying to watch this on TV in the metropolitan area. Most of the television broadcast antennas are on top of the World Trade Center towers, so you're most likely not going to be able to get a picture. Your best bet is satellite dish or radio.

And we're showing you live pictures now. Smoke and fire taking place in both towers of the World Trade Center. It is a terrible scene. People are just walking down the street with their hands covering their mouth in disbelief. They can't believe it. And then you hear the sirens and people screaming as they look up at the building and see people trying to get out and some people jumping. Now, the EMS is here, fire personnel, police, everyone's here trying to keep calm and get everyone away from the building and keep it safe. Let's listen.

... but, um, I did see someone jump. I did. And I talked to someone and in her own voice you could hear it and she just lost it...

... they... they're throw themselves off the building. Oh my god.

II.

There are explosions right now! Hold on, people are running! Hold on!

Hold on just a moment! We've got an explosion inside!
The building is exploding right now! You've got people running up the street! Hold on, I'll tell you what's going on.
The whole building just exploded some more, the whole top part! The building's not intact! People are running up the street! Am I still connected?

People are running out.

Joe? Joe! There's been another explosion now...
Oh my gosh!
... at the World Trade Center.
Oh! Oh my god!
This is on the right hand side?

Yeah. Oh! Oh my gosh. The entire building... it looks like the side of the building has collapsed. Oh my gosh, this is horrific, absolutely horrific. How could that have happened? How could that have happened unless there was some sort of secondary explosion within those planes? Now this, uh, Ed, was the World Trade Center 2. Oh my gosh! This is... this is absolutely...

Uh, Joe, we can't... I can't tell from my perspective, eh... exactly what's... what's happened here... how much of the building is still standing.

But... but... but... but... Ed... but Ed... it looks like the side portion of that has totally fallen and there is just a huge cloud of dust that is encompassing several city blocks. Oh god... eh... eh... what... this... this... would... this would fall into the area of Lower Manhattan toward, uh, the eastern portion of the World Trade Center. It looks... now... uh... eh... is that? I'm trying to look... Can you see? Is that building still there?

I... I can't tell.
I don't see it!
I don't see the building because there's an awful lot of thick smoke.

Oh!

Ed, it doesn't look like the building is there!

I can't see because of the thick smoke so I don't know the answer to that, Joe, but it does not appear... and the only thing I can see is that police helicopter overhead... that smoke is so thick it has now drifted off to Lower Manhattan to the East River.

Oh! Ed?

We just received word that the south tower has collapsed!

OK.

Wow.

You'd almost think there was some type of secondary explosion..

Ugh! Oh! I mean that's... that's... that's...

That would... that would... that would... and you have to wonder how that...

Let's just think about this logically.

There is no logic.

Oh my god!

... uh... uh... a hijacked air... air...airliner.

The scene, I mean, Ed, Ed... I mean, it's... it's horrific. Clouds and clouds of dust for blocks and blocks. Oh! I mean, people who were on the street near that building, um, are... are definitely in peril.

It... it... it... you probably can't even breathe right now just given the amount of smoke. This... this building is collapsed!

This smoke, Joe, is now so thick. You're... you're correct. The building has collapsed! It's gone as much as eight to ten city blocks, so I can't see the top of any of the other buildings down there at all. That's how thick the smoke is.

Oh!
Oh my gosh! Oh my gosh! I... I... You're listening special coverage of what is a catastrophic, um, day. This is beyond belief that the United States, uh, could be under attack. The Pentagon attack, now the south tower of the World Trade Center, um, has collapsed with, I'm sure, enormous, enormous loss of life.

There are two different types of smoke. First, that grayish-black smoke that was burning from the top of the Trade Center. Then, I would say below 70 stories, it's all white, which means there's been some type of collapse and debris.

Oh my gosh! This is terrible and, um, as we heard earlier... alright, we're just getting something else here, Ed. Police are advising people who live in lower Manhattan, such as Battery Park City, to try to evacuate as soon as possible although...

Try to evacuate.

Yes, I mean, this, um, I'm sure they fear other explosions but, um, this... this... this... debris and... and smoke... I'm not quite sure how far the debris has... has spread but, uh, the collapse has encompassed much of lower Manhattan. If... if you wanted to sort of put a landmark in in your head... in your face... you're facing Lower Manhattan, you're facing two World Trade Center towers on the west side of Manhattan, World Trade Center 1, the one with the tower, the one closest to the Hudson River is still standing, billowing from smoke. The second one has, uh, disappeared or, uh, the top portion has disappeared in this huge, huge cloud of, uh, smoke, white, black, yellow and it's... it's... it's... that sort of, uh... the collapse is spreading towards the eastern and southern portion of Manhattan and a huge cloud has just enveloped a lower part of the city and, uh, god help anybody who is in that area.

I don't know about you, Joe, but I got the shakes.

Uh, we... we should point out that the... we do have confirmation that the east building has collapsed. Is it building 2 that has collapsed?

Yes, tower 2, the south tower has collapsed. The south tower has collapsed.

The amount of smoke, which has billowed, reaches as high, as does the still-burning tower 1.

Well, oh boy, oh boy! This is, uh, this is, uh... it's not over yet and you know what? Un... un... unfortunately this is just going to get, um, worse and worse throughout the day as we get a closer look at the devastation that has been wrought on, uh, New York City and Washington and... and... and America in general as the smoke continues, uh, to billow out of the, uh, World Trade Center 1, the one that is still standing. And the, uh, dust is still, um, rising into the air from the collapse of the south, uh, World Trade Center building. It's just a, uh, eh, it's... it's... it's... this is a day that will live in infamy.

Yeah, you're... you're... right. That's, um, not overstating it... the morning of this day... the 11th of September, 2001... will live in infamy. There's almost no textbook for any of us here on the radio to figure out just what to say. There are no words at all to express this.

III.

Everybody here is panicking. There's a huge crowd outside. There are hundreds of people on the streets that come from south to north. I mean literally thousands of people have been running from inside these building. It's a very heavily trafficked area in downtown. Many of them were inside the building when they felt the explosion. And they say there was just pandemonium -- no warning, no alarms, no anything.
Everyone just raced from their desks, ran downstairs and now there is a steady stream of folks running away from the building, fearing that there will be another collapse. And when they saw the second plane, they were convinced that this was dangerous. There is an actual flood of folks escaping downtown midtown Manhattan right now. Right now, honestly, there are scores of people literally running behind me. There is debris on the base of the building that has continued to fall, as you know, as far as several blocks away from the building. And what's happened is everyone seems to have figured out that there's ongoing danger, and there's just a stream of folks running as quickly as they can uptown away from this.

IV.

What's that sound? There's another sound! Something is happening! There's a big sound! I don't know what this says...

It appears that... It appears, again there is a lot of smoke... it appears that the remainder of the World Trade Center Tower has collapsed to the ground!

We're in the worst place we can be. We can't see a thing!

It's gone! Are you saying it's gone?

It's gone! It's gone! We can't see anything! All this smoke is moving and there's no towers standing there anymore.

We do have confirmation, that the, the north tower... has collapsed.

Oh, yes, it's not there!

It is not there.

It is not there.

People are running up Broadway again. Whatever was left has now...

We just heard another big explosion it sounded like a subway rumbling, but louder. And suddenly we looked up and it had come down!

So then I got in my stomach, like, this knot, like, oh my god, oh my god, when? And where? Am I going to hear it? Or see? Or feel it?

Oh God!

Indeed, nothing remains. Virtually nothing remains of the two World Trade Center towers. There are no World Trade Center towers at this moment.

There's smoke coming up lower Broadway. You can't see the Brooklyn Bridge. We can't see anything but what we can tell you is that there are no towers standing. I would presume that this latest explosion that we heard and all the smoke was caused from the tower coming down. Did it sound like an explosion or perhaps the sound of collapsing building materials? Can you differentiate?

It did... it did... you know, you know, when they tear down a building, you know, a building that's been planned to come down... and you hear that explosion sound? It almost sounded like that or like the rumble of the subway.

There's somebody standing here with me right now. Come here. Tell us your name.

David Donovan.

I see you're covered with...

... smoke, dust, dirt, you name it. I was on the 87th floor and, uh, something hit. Uh, we didn't know exactly what it was when we were coming down. Somebody said it was a plane. Two planes at the building. We walked down 87 floors. As we were coming out, uh, the first roof collapsed and I lost everybody. I don't know where anyone is. All is I heard was the building shake and it filled up with smoke and fire. We didn't know what to do. We were going to stay there and then finally we got too much smoke and it took about 15 minutes to start walking. As you stand there right now...

... I'm shaking.
Can you believe it?
I... I can't. I just see dust. This is insane. I'm shaking. I'm covered in dust and stone. My clothes are all ripped.

The World Trade Center has been virtually eliminated to nothing by virtue of these terrorist attacks this morning. Two buildings are not in evidence as I sit and look at what is the outline of half a moon just over, uh, midtown Manhattan.

La... ladies and gentlemen, the World Trade Center buildings are gone. The World Trade Center buildings are gone. They are ashes. And, um, it's... it's... it is a situation beyond description.

V.

... and who were there because they were working when this attack occurred describe it as a "war zone." One fire marshal, a gentleman by the name of Mike Smith says everyone was screaming, crying, running, cops, people, firefighters, everyone. One businessman said, I just saw the building I work in come down. And that of course is the World Trade Center, which is... which has just collapsed in clubble... uh... in rubble behind him. Dust and dirt is everywhere and it still is everywhere covering, uh, nearly all of Lower Manhattan, ashes two to three inches deep in places, uh, people were wandering around, just dazed and terrified. It a horrifying, horrifying picture. Karen?

And President Bush has called it both a terrorist attack and a national tragedy. Attacks on American landmarks with American Airlines airplanes. We have the two Trade Towers coming down, we have a plane flying into The Pentagon, which has been evacuated and is still burning at this hour, and we also have a report of a plane down -- a large plane -- in Western Pennsylvania, a 767. The FAA is also still trying to locate several planes that are still missing and may be hijacked. Officials also say it is still too soon to speculate who may have been behind this. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has denied responsibility, condemned it and has called it unbelievable, unbelievable, unbelievable. Jim?

The, uh, the stories that, uh, people are now telling about, uh, what happened this morning are... are now coming and the eyewitness are telling, um, oh, these horrifying stories. People, before the two buildings collapsed, uh, jumping out of windows, uh, falling to their deaths, uh, trying to escape, the burning, uh, plane and the and the smoke. One, uh, eyewitness, uh, a man by the name of Kenny Johanamen, uh, tells us what he saw when when he was, uh, in in the building... Uh, eh, do we have Kenny? Apparently we don't have Kenny Johanamen there. Kenny, eh, said that he was in the basement, ah, apparently of the World Trade Center, uh, when the building just came down and the elevator just blew up. There was lots lots of smoke. He says, I dragged a guy out, his skin was hanging off. I dragged him out and I helped him to the ambulance. For many other people, unfortunately, there was to be no help because both buildings collapsed upon them.

And recapping what we've told you, we have America under attack, a terrorist attack is what President Bush is calling it. Both World Trade Center towers have collapsed. The scene in New York is one of disbelief. Smoke is now obscuring the entire skyline of Manhattan. All Fel... Federal buildings in New York and Washington D.C. are closed.
There have been attacks in Washington as well. We have a report of The Pentagon being struck by a plane, the fire is still burning there. There was a report of a car bomb outside of the State Department. That has since been shot down. We also have a report -- we had a report -- that there was a bomb at the Capitol Building, but that has since been, uh, shot down as well. Most of the, uh, Federal Buildings in Washington have been evacuated -- the Treasury Department, the Capitol, even the White House, where reporters were hurriedly herded out of the building where a plane was circling overhead -- are empty.

It's unclear who was responsible for these attacks and... and... that, um, will become clear in the weeks and months ahead but, uh, clearly this was a coordinated attack. It happened in rapid fire fashion, uh, one plane and then another, uh, into the World Trade Center in New York and then a third plane into The Pentagon in Washington and a fourth plane crashing in Pennsylvania. We believe it may be connected, we don't verify that yet. This all happened very quickly and the reports came in just as quickly.

We are boarding Air Force One. They have bomb squads out here checking all of our gear.

Here on Capitol Hill. We've just been told that the Capitol is being evacuated and that all reporters follow the...

America Under Attack. War coverage continues from WABC radio news. This is WABC, New York City.

It just blew up. A big explosion... people started running, it was chaos everywhere.

An eyewitness describing the scene in what used to be the World Trade Center towers in New York City in Lower Manhattan. Both towers hit by airplanes this morning. We were told an American Airlines jet crashed into one of the towers, then incredibly, both 110 story towers collapsed. They crumbled, bodies falling from the buildings. American Airlines now says it lost two planes, around 160 people on board both of those planes. They are gone. New York City is closed down. Then in Washington, another plane crashed into The Pentagon.

This is one of those things that you dream of in your worst nightmares. It appears that a large jet aircraft, perhaps the size of a large passenger plane came, uh, very low, clipping off light posts as it approached The Pentagon and it slammed into the side of The Pentagon and it drove itself from the outer ring all the way to the inner ring. The area of the building that it went into burst into flames. Um, there are many, many floors of destruction, deep into the heart of The Pentagon.

No casualty numbers yet but they're sure to be very high. Another large plane has crashed in southeastern Pennsylvania in Somerset County. Apparently that may be a United jet that was hijacked out of Chicago. The FBI is now trying to determine who is responsible for today's attacks. All planes are grounded around the country.

A gargantuan explosion! Oh my god! I don't believe it!

An eyewitness to an unbelievable disaster in the past hour. A plane apparently hit one of the towers of the World Trade Center in lower Manhattan in New York.

America Under Attack. Our coverage continues. WABC News. This is WABC, New York City.

VI.
Airliners do not fly into the World Trade Center. I mean, it just doesn’t happen unless they are directed that way by its pilot. Obviously this is not something that’s accidental. I think it’s interesting, too, that Manhattan island is completely locked down.

We’re locked down. Those of us who are on Manhattan can’t get off and those of us who are not on this island cannot get on. And for good reason: they’ve shut down virtually every major transit route onto or off of the island. And it almost reminds me of February of 1993, where there was the first act of terrorism directed at the World Trade Center, when the Rider van that rolled into a parking lot there with 1,500 pounds of nitrate explosives, took out five floors, rocked the foundation, close to half a dozen deaths, thousands of injuries, but the building was able to withstand that blast and stay tall. In this particular case, John Gambling, both towers collapsed almost within a half an hour of each other.

I’m not, uh, a construction expert, but it just seems to me that that was awfully rapid for it to have been the result of just the airplane crashes and the fire. Although the fires were very intense, obviously, fueled by the jet fuel that was on board both of those aircraft.

I think the other thing that we have to understand here is that this is the first time in American history that our government has really gone into exile. I mean, our government at the moment, is in control and they’re controlling things and they’re… and they’re… discussing, um, everything, but they are in exile.

Is it okay if a few of us start to assume that is a terrorist attack?

Well, you know, you can assume it. But I don't agree, based on what G.W. Bush is talking about.

He is the President of the United States, Ron.

I know that, but he’s not often the most well informed guy around, Bill.

Well, but right now you would think he would be locked in to the information pipeline.

You would think.

And you would even hope. I’m just not assuming, Bob.

I think it's fair to say that people in the Middle East have declared America to be the big Satan and...

Wait! Not only have we called them terrorists, but now we're pointing fingers, okay?

Well, excuse me, Ron. Who had targeted the World Trade Center before?

I remember when the Murrah building went up and for a day and a half everybody was talking about, yes, the terrorist cells right there in Oklahoma, a hotbed of Middle Eastern Arabic activity. Nobody doubted these were Arab terrorists who blew up the Murrah Building. Well, it turned out to be blond-haired, blue-eyed, corn-fed country boys.

Ron, can we talk probabilities, though? Is it more likely this might have had something to do with the Middle East than it does with the Michigan Militia? Wouldn’t it be more likely?

Well, that would've been the case in the Murrah Federal Building, too. It absolutely would have been more likely that terrorists blew up the Federal Building in Oklahoma when it was in fact a bunch of neo-Nazis.

Ron, as you know, in radical Muslim literature, they refer to New York City as sort of the Jewish capital of the world, even larger in scope than Tel Aviv.
Well, certainly the Twin Towers were specific targets of the original bombing and they specifically talked about the importance of hitting the Trade Center as a target of American wealth and power.

Lawrence Eagleburger, former Secretary of State, just said that this was a total intelligence breakdown and that with the magnitude of the attack he considers this a total act of war and that there hasn't been anything like this since Pearl Harbor. He equates this devastation to Pearl Harbor and said that basically only Osama bin Laden would have the capacity to coordinate this. He says an attack like this takes months or years to coordinate and that's why, he says, there was a total breakdown in our intelligence. He also pointed out the obvious, that we thought that we had licked hijacking in this country and apparently, at least, it appears on the surface that we have not licked hijacking. Whether they had weapons or if they just rushed the cockpit or whatever did, if they did that it still remains a possibility here in the United States. So, Lawrence Eagleburger said that George Bush needs to respond quickly and go after terrorism where ever terrorism exists, indicating that even if we don't know for sure that they were the people directly responsible, we must go after those who support Osama bin Laden and who have done so in the past.

Well, so Lawrence Eagleburger advocated attacking who?

Well, he said our first target should be Osama bin Laden. He also talked about the Taliban and the government in Afghanistan. Uh, we have warned them, apparently according to him, though our State Department and through Washington that, should anything in the future occur against any American targets, they would be held responsible if bin Laden was implicated or found to be responsible.

We would have attacked Osama bin Laden already if we knew where he was.

Well, that's what I was just going to bring up. Several weeks ago, maybe several months ago -- you know the way time flies -- I remember saying on the air that Osama bin Laden was handing out promotional video tapes to the media. Osama bin Laden was interviewed by I don't know which network but that means they...

But you're saying we know where he is.

Well, they... we have to know where he is.

Well, I don't think he's having a news conference today.

No, not today.

Well, I don't know where he is. I don't know that he's responsible, with all due respect to former Secretary of State Eagleburger, if this was a matter of three people coordinating hijacking of three planes, you don't need a huge infrastructure and a lot of money. This was not a particularly hi-tech terrorist attack, although it was obviously a very well coordinated and very well planned one, but you don't need 100, 200 people. You don't need...

But Ron, Afghanistan has consistently given sanctuary to Osama bin Laden and his minions. They have been warned about this, not just by the United States but internationally, and also by some of their fellow Muslim countries who also fear Osama bin Laden because of his radical fundamentalist ways. And if you're providing a base, a haven, a sanctuary for a terrorist who has targeted the United States and Israel, well then, you're just as culpable because you do nothing to sort of relieve yourself of that.

Again. We've made a leap here that I don't think is justified in making yet, which is we've assigned blame to Osama in Laden.

Well, I can bet you he's got a big smile on his face right now.

Yeah.
Either way, he's probably happy, but you can't kill a guy for being happy.

Oh, actually given the way I feel right now you probably could.

Well, maybe you should just take the day off.

I'm not a huge fan of U.S. military power, but it would be nice to see aircraft or a military jet sort of flying around the perimeter of Manhattan.

Absolutely. You'd expect to see that at any moment. You'd expect to see U.S. military flying around the World Trade Center and also perhaps the Empire State Building or any other monument that we have.

Well, in fact, the only times we've ever had airline crashes or planes crashing into buildings here in New York -- obviously there are very high buildings and planes are constantly flying overhead -- is in times of fog. But today is...

... a clear day. Blue sky. That's not what this is.

Couldn't be, even if navigation systems failed.

I'm appalled at, uh, what we're gonna find out as the day goes on in terms of the loss of life. It is going to be dramatic and, um, you know what? With all due respect to the president, it's not good enough to say, at this point, we're gonna hunt them down and find those responsible. I mean we got to get them and get them fast.

I've just been trying to think back. After Pearl Harbor there were about two thousand, twenty-five hundred American casualties on American soil. Uh, there were a couple of instances, I believe, in California during World War II -- more accidental than anything else -- where there were some people who were killed, but that's it. This country has remained impervious to this sort of attack ever since that time.

All of that has ended today.

I said earlier that this is a day that will live in infamy. This is this is one horrific day. And given the enormity of the situation the organization of these attacks, Ed, this is not one lunatic. Right away we're gonna think Osama bin Laden, maybe Osama bin Laden is behind this, and if he is, then, he's gonna get it. But you know what? It isn't one man. It isn't Osama bin Laden and a couple of cronies in some tent somewhere in Northern Africa or wherever. This is an organized attack against the United States which can only be state-sponsored terrorism. This isn't one lunatic with a lot of money doing anything on the scale that we are seeing unfold before our eyes here today in New York and around the nation.

You're right, Joe. The instinct for bloodlust, for retribution is extraordinarily strong. They may not be done.

VII.

George Weber is near the scene of the World Trade Center now. George? Tell us what you know at the moment.

Bruce I've now moved a good way east, I guess, out of sheer curiosity. A giant plume of black and white smoke is blowing across downtown. This afternoon, they're not letting reporters anywhere close to the area where the two World Trade towers collapsed earlier today. I'm standing right next to the Manhattan Bridge, which is one of the entry points where they're bringing in ambulances and emergency personnel. We still periodically see some U.S. military aircraft doing flybys. This is the sound that you hear... hour after hour down here.

And just below me is a park right near the edge of Chinatown. And while there's some curiosity among these people, they continue to play their card games. They continue to chat as if nothing is going on.
Their markets are open. They're shopping, they're... they're... they're buying their fish. Uh, it's... it's as if this little corner of New York City was totally unaffected, but you know it's at the top of their minds. They're talking about it. They're pointing up in the air periodically and they're continuing with their card games. So it's, uh, just a little snapshot of, uh, a piece of New York as they deal with this immense tragedy.
I.

Wow, it's weird cause, uh, I'm hearing this music and I'm seeing online this video of the three Charlie's Angels running out of a door, you know. Uh oh. Jeff McKinney's running into the room.

Well, much talk today about Farrah Fawcett certainly, but now there is news that Michael Jackson has been rushed to a hospital, um, I think it's in Los Angeles, I'm not sure. The CBS newsroom just came on saying that there is a special report coming up for Michael Jackson's physical condition, which apparently is, uh, dire at this moment.

It's so interesting. Before we came on the air today -- I hope this is not the case -- but Jimmy and I were talking about how things happen in threes. We just lost Ed McMahon, today we lose Farrah Fawcett, now we're hearing Jeff McKinney walking in telling us...

I'm saying he's ill. I'm saying he's ill. I don't know how dire he is but the indication is that he is quite ill. They're gonna run a special report. They don't do that lightly, the folks back in New York. So we're gonna do this in about ten seconds here. We're gonna get the latest on Michael Jackson.

Boy, there's a lot, a lot of curiosity here. Alright so let's take it away. It's 4:15.

This is a CBS News special report. I'm Dan Raviv. We are receiving word from Los Angeles that the pop superstar Michael Jackson has been rushed to a hospital. The Los Angeles Times website says it got some confirmation from the L.A. Fire Department that Michael Jackson was not breathing when paramedics arrived and took him to the hospital. Let's go to the CBS newsroom in Los Angeles. Correspondent Steve Futterman, what are you learning?

Dan, we're just hearing these reports, still nothing confirmed. Reportedly Michael Jackson has been taken to the UCLA Medical Center, which is not far from his home, but nothing official yet from the UCLA Medical Center. According to the L.A. Times, Captain Steve Ruda, who's with the L.A. Fire Department says that paramedics responded to a call at Jackson's home around 12:26 local time -- that's just under two hours ago. According to The Times, he was not breathing when they arrived. The paramedics, according to the newspaper, performed CPR and took him to the UCLA Medical Center. The website TMZ says that Jackson was in cardiac arrest and that paramedics administered CPR in the ambulance. According to TMZ, Michael Jackson's mother is on the way or may be there already at the UCLA hospital to visit him. But again, we want to emphasize that there has been no official confirmation. Two reports, one from the L.A. Times, one from the website TMZ, both of them saying that Michael Jackson has been taken to a hospital.

Jackson, by the way, is age 50. This comes on the same day that the actress and star Farrah Fawcett died of cancer in Los Angeles at age 62. CBS News special report. I'm Dan Raviv.

Okay. So as far as we know, Michael Jackson is still alive but there are two reports saying that he was in cardiac arrest when, uh, EMT got to him and they were administering CPR as they rushed Michael Jackson to the hospital. Shocking to hear that Michael Jackson is 50 years old.

I was just thinking of that. We were talking earlier about how, you know, it seems like yesterday we were watching Farrah Fawcett in her youth and beauty -- and 62 years old to me is still young -- you don't think of Farrah Fawcett being 62 years old. You don't think of Michael Jackson as being 50. It's... it's just strange.

There's some real parallels between these two people -- Farrah Fawcett and Michael Jackson -- in that they both had overwhelming, huge effects of popularity in their heyday.

Um hum. Um hum.

I mean, Michael Jackson did have the same sort of... different effect, but he had the same sort of all encompassing effect on... on the world as Farrah Fawcett did, you know?

When he... when he was at his height...

...1983, 1984...

... his peak, it was like nothing you'd ever seen. I mean, it was...

But you could say the same for Farrah Fawcett, though.

Yeah, you could. I... I think it's... yeah, you're right. You could. You absolutely could say the same thing for her. And then she went and married, uh, Steve Majors? Steve Majors? Remember she became Farrah Fawcett.

Six Million Dollar... Lee Majors.

Yeah. Lee Majors. Why did I think it was Steve Majors? Next thing you know I'll say Paul Majors, but no it was Lee Majors.

Farrah Fawcett herself as well, I mean, there is, you know, in... in her heyday...

For a brief period of time...

Excuse me?

For a brief period of time she had at least, domestically... she was about as famous as you can get within the confines of the United States of America.

Absolutely. Charlie's Angels was the biggest hit on television. That poster, the famous poster of her...

The poster, yeah.

...was the biggest seller. I mean, she did she did a spread for Playboy in the 90s and that was the biggest selling issue of the decade. I mean, she was a big star as well.

Do you know what kinds of health problems Michael Jackson had?

I didn't know he had any.

He has had occasional fainting attacks and things like that. We've always heard that. I mean, he's certainly never looked robust, Michael Jackson, to say the least.

No.

But I think this is the first indication we we've ever had that Michael Jackson has any sort of serious health issues and this appears to be a very serious health issue.

Two updates that have come to TMZ here in the last few minutes. A Jackson family member tells TMZ that Michael is in, quote, really bad shape and that the brothers are now headed to UCLA.

Well, that sound very unofficial, of course.

Yes. And then there's another update from TMZ saying that they've just got off the phone with Joe Jackson -- that's the father, Michael's dad -- who says he is, quote, not doing well.

OK.

So?

So, Farrah Fawcett has died, the great superstar of the 70s. And now, the great superstar of the 80s -- equaling her superstardom -- there are reports, that he has been in cardiac arrest this afternoon and has been rushed to the hospital in Los Angeles. So, stay tuned, I guess. We'll continue to get news throughout the day on that.
There are probably at least a thousand people outside the hospital right now where he is in Los Angeles. Evidently, they're gathering and they're in a perfect rectangle, I guess holding a... some sort of séance?

Not a séance. A, uh, vigil.
Well, a séance would make more sense for him. He's got plenty of eccentricities, but the music...
Well, he doesn't anywhere close to the talent Elvis had.
We're not talking about talent. We're talking about influence. I'm just saying that Elvis's influence overshadows his by 100 times.
I... I don't know about that.
I do.
Well, OK, I'm saying between 1980 and 1990, I mean, doesn't he have like five of the all time top ten records sold?

Jeff. Jeff. There are still people who want to sound like Elvis!
There's nobody who wants to sound like Michael Jackson. Not the impersonators. I'm talking about real bands, I mean, you know, not Elvis impersonators.
Elvis will be impersonated for another hundred years.
It's got nothing to do with impersonation. You've got real rock bands out there who still love Elvis and are trying to do music like Elvis. Without Elvis, is there rock 'n roll? You know? What is Michael Jackson responsible for? What did he come up with that's so special?
He created a video channel, essentially. If not for Michael Jackson videos, MTV wouldn't be on and what it is today.

So we can blame him for that.
On the other hand, The Jackson Five...
Ladies and Gentlemen, please welcome up on stage, The Jackson Four!
It doesn't have the same ring.
No, it doesn't.
Well, this is gonna be a bizarre day if this story continues to develop. I mean, if he stabilizes, we can all sort of breathe a sigh of relief and say...
...speaking of which, did you hear that the World Climatological Society has issued a, uh, wind alert this afternoon?
No.
Yeah, all of the children across the world let out a collective sigh of relief.
I've got more! I've got more!
That's enough.
What a week! Ed McMahon, Farrah Fawcett...
...and Michael Jackson.
Uh, guys. He's still with us. He's, uh...
...as far as we know.

II.

This is a CBS news special report. I'm Dan Raviv. About an hour after first word that pop music star Michael Jackson suffered a heart attack in Los Angeles, it's now reported and, reliably reported, that he has died. The Los Angeles Times website says Michael Jackson, age 50, has died. He was in a coma when taken from an expensive rental home in Los Angeles. The website TMZ.com has also been reporting that Jackson died. We go live to Los Angeles. CBS news correspondent Steve Futterman.
Well, Dan, if all this is correct, it's just a shock here in Southern California and around the world. The L.A. Times, as you said, saying that, uh, Michael Jackson was pronounced dead -- this is according to the L.A. Times -- by doctors this afternoon after arriving at the hospital in deep coma. The L.A. Times is quoting city and law enforcement sources. The L.A. Times, uh, a very reliable newspaper.
Obviously the website TMZ, which also has been very reliable in the past, had earlier reported that Jackson had died. Now we had reports confirmed by Los Angeles Fire Department Capt. Steve Ruda that Jackson was not breathing when paramedics arrived at his home. All this began around three hours ago, that's when the 911 call was made, exactly 3 hours ago. Paramedics came to the home -- that's when Jackson reportedly was not breathing -- and was taken to the UCLA Medical Center. Now, as we've heard, both the Los Angeles Times and TMZ are reporting that Michael Jackson, the pop star, the legendary pop star, known by millions of fans around the world has died.

Steve Futterman reporting live from CBS News in Los Angeles.
Michael Jackson was 50 years old. Here's a look back at his career from CBS's Dave Browde.

They called him the King of Pop. At least his fans did. But that nickname was his publicist's invention, a kind of tabloid label for the prodigiously talented but, bizarrely behaving, superstar. They called him Wacko Jacko. Michael Jackson, the son of an Indiana steelworker who'd started an astonishing show business career at the age of five as the lead singer of the Jackson Five, the group featuring Michael and four of his brothers. The Jackson Five turned out fourteen albums of hits. Michael broke out with four solo discs. But he truly became a superstar and thrilled the world in 1982. Michael Jackson's Thriller broke all records, selling some 50 million copies worldwide. Jackson broke more new ground in the then-fledgling music video field with his fourteen-minute Thriller video, in which Jackson began displaying the remarkable dance skills that would again launch his career over the moon. But Jackson's increasingly reclusive and bizarre behavior -- along with his reported multiple plastic surgeries -- made tabloid headlines surpassing his sales, as did an incident in which his hair caught fire during the 1984 filming of a soda commercial. Then there was Jackson's purchase of the ranch he called Neverland, which he stocked with animals, amusement park rides, and a constant flow of children. Suddenly, swirling accusations exploded. In 1993, Jackson released a video denial that he'd molested a 13-year-old boy who visited Neverland.

These statements about me are totally false.
Jackson reportedly settled by paying the boy's family millions.
Please welcome Mr. and Mrs. Michael Jackson.
Jackson's marriage to Lisa Marie Presley almost immediately thereafter, was seen by many as a desperate ploy to rehabilitate his image -- it broke up after only nineteen months. Jackson's next album was a disappointment, despite a duet with superstar sister Janet. After another album -- his first complete flop -- Jackson married again to a nurse, Debbie Rowe. The couple had two children in as many years, followed quickly by divorce, fights with his record company, litigation over allegedly canceled appearances, and apparently, even more plastic surgery. Jackson explained his changing skin color as the result of a disease of vitiligo. Then, Jackson's most incredible public incident:
dangling his 11-month-old son, Prince, over a balcony, followed quickly by Jackson's arrest on charges of molesting a 12-year-old cancer patient. Jackson's denial this time on 60 Minutes.
Totally false. If I would hurt a child, I would slit my wrists. I would never hurt a child.

Jackson's behavior while facing the criminal charges, redefined eccentricity. Jumping on his limo to delighted fans one day, showing up late in pajamas another. Ultimately, he was acquitted, but despite many loyal fans, his image was in tatters.

That CBS's Dave Browde. If you've just tuned in, Michael Jackson, at age 50, has died. He suffered a heart attack -- an apparent heart attack -- in Los Angeles. Michael Jackson died, yes, on the same day that Farrah Fawcett died of cancer in Los Angeles at age 62. We turn to Anthony DeCurtis who has written about music for so many years for Rolling Stone magazine. Uh, Anthony, uh, indeed it's the music we should focus on because that... that's what will last.

Well, absolutely. I mean it's, you know, with all the scandals and all the problems and all the weirdness that Michael represented, you know, it's easy to lose sight of the music and the music is extraordinary. I mean, this is somebody who is as important a figure of as popular music has produced.

And, just the way he went at age, at age 50, I guess we realize there was something wrong with his health, with his behavior, or with the advice he got from others.

Well, it's, you know, I mean, Michael's life... it's been a struggle, I think, in recent years, you know, I mean, he's been attempting these comebacks, they never really gain any traction and I mean, obviously, you know, if he's getting set to do the shows in London, you know, a run of 50 shows, you know, clearly that's not going to happen. You know, we don't really yet have enough information on, you know, what exactly, you know, created the situation but, you know, you know, there's been a kind of tragic aspect to what, you know, Michael Jackson's life has been, you know, without any question.

Anthony DeCurtis has written about music for so long for Rolling Stone magazine.

Let's turn to the media critic and historian Robert Thompson of Syracuse University. Michael Jackson may have had, well, a tattered image at times, but when it comes to the music and the dancing he gave pleasure to tens of millions of people. Robert?

Not only pleasure, but I would put him right up there with Elvis Presley, Frank Sinatra, Bing Crosby, and P.T. Barnum. I mean, this guy was far and away one of the greatest American at entertainers that has ever lived in this country since the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock. I mean, he was not called the King of Pop for nothing. He was a superstar. I'll never forget when I watched the moonwalk on that Motown 25th anniversary show in 1982 and it literally made my jaw drop. Nobody had moved like that before. And what he did for MTV and the art of music videos, what he did for all kinds of performance styles in the 80s. He was really a superstar.

Well, Robert, what about the image part of it? You know, if there's a pr... problem with his personal behavior, does it take away from the way we'll remember Jackson the musician?

Well, I think for, uh, at least 50 years, yes. As long as anybody's around that remembers the trials and dangling the kid off of the balcony and all of this kind of stuff, we'll never be able to separate those. However, 100 years from now -- and I'm convinced we'll still be listening to the Thriller album 100 years from now -- when nobody is making all of those connections, I think his musical legacy will probably last a lot longer then the legacy of his multiple peculiarities. But we shouldn't ignore them. I think this was really one of the great American stories of what celebrity can do to a human being. I think this guy became so famous, I think he became such a huge celebrity, that he was isolated from the real world as most people know it. He was living on Planet Michael and he called it Neverland, of all things. And I think that if anyone else behaved like that, someone would tell you to knock it off and you'd have to get your act together, whereas Michael Jackson was almost free to live in a world where he made up and lived by his own rules. It's a really almost a Greek tragedy-like story.
Capital: New York Capital of the 20th Century
Facilis descensus Averni:
Noctes atque dies patet atri ianua Ditis;
Sed revocare gradium superasque evadere ad auras.
Hoc opus, hic labor est.

— Virgil, Aeneid
Chapter One. He adored New York City. He idolized it all out of proportion. Uh, no, make that, he-he . . . romanticized it all out of proportion. Now... to him... no matter what the season was, this was still a town that existed in black and white and pulsated to the great tunes of George Gershwin. Ahhh, now let me start this over. Chapter One. He was too romantic about Manhattan as he was about everything else. He thrived on the hustle, bustle of the crowds and the traffic. To him, New York meant beautiful women and street-smart guys who seemed to know all the angles. Nah, no . . . corny, too corny . . . for . . . my taste... I mean, let me try and make it more profound. Chapter One. He adored New York City. To him, it was a metaphor for the decay of contemporary culture. The same lack of individual integrity to cause so many people to take the easy way out . . . was rapidly turning the town of his dreams in — No, it's gonna be too preachy. I mean, you know . . . let's face it, I wanna sell some books here. Chapter One. He adored New York City, although to him, it was a metaphor for the decay of contemporary culture. How hard it was to exist in a society desensitized by drugs, loud music, television, crime, garbage. Too angry. I don't wanna be angry. Chapter One. He was as tough and romantic as the city he loved. Behind his black-rimmed glasses was the coiled sexual power of a jungle cat. I love this. New York was his town. And it always would be.

A – Dream City

Enough leeks to coat all Fifth Avenue with vichyssoise.
Brook, p. 53.

A Good Humor bar gooily obstructing Park Avenue.
Conrad, p. 316.

A violin crafted from wood from an old house in Elizabeth Street.
Berger, Eight Million, p. 164.

The Library lions refuse any longer to guard people who believe that wisdom lies in books and vow that they’ll repatriate themselves to Africa, “where there is still some freedom.”
Conrad, p. 203.

The statue of Father Duffy in Times Square, mumified on his pedestal by a shroud of plastic sheeting, bundled in his sacking against his cross, against a sky of streaming neon and balletic peanuts.
Ibid., p. 169.

When the south tube of the Lincoln Tunnel was officially opened on December 12, 1937, it had already been sanctified by the legend that its glass roof was intended to give travelers a good view of the fishes in the North River.
Federal Writers, p. 407.

On Sutton Place a man fishes out his eighteenth-story window for eels.
Talese, p. 48.

If it were blood pouring out of the hydrants, would people stanch the flow?
Atkinson, p. 229.

A naked butcher on a roof in Hester Street.
Mitchell, Ears, p. 189.

Dogs wag their tails up and down instead of sideways in the Flatiron Building.
Barnes, New York.

Sea monkeys from a curio shop peddling twentieth-century Americana, and these sea monkeys mutate into King Kong-sized jumbo shrimp that almost destroy the futuristic city of New New York.
Bennett, p. 41.

An urban science fiction.
Koolhaas, p. 15.

A thick-hipped and swollen-breasted nude ignores the snow on the Museum of Modern Art courtyard, tilting her pelvis at the muffled landscape.
Cloud-descended, these Venuses in transit between the sky and the streets land on the city’s rooftops.
Ibid., p. 174.

What is a ship, in fact, but the great skyscraper turned upon its side and set free?
Sanders, p. 279.

Los Angeles is just New York lying down.

skyscrapers / filled with nut-chocolates Williams, Collected, p. 187.

An evening on up on the Empire State roof—the strangest experience.
The huge tomb in steel and glass, the ride to the 84th floor and there, under the clouds, a Hawaiian string quartet, lounge, concessions and, a thousand feet below, New York—a garden of golden lights winking on and off, automobiles, trucks winding in and out, and not a sound. All as silent as a dead city—it looks adagio down there. [Death] [Silence]
Powell, p 12.

The Seagram Building fountains dissolve into snowflakes, I enter a revolving door at twenty and come out a good deal older.

The buildings, as conceived by architects, will be cigar boxes set on end.
White, Here, p. 55.

Dalí’s New York is a laboratory of intensified entropy, where things become surreal in a thermodynamic malaise.
Conrad, p. 146.

One of Oldenburg’s 1965 projects was an ironing board, canopying the Lower East Side. The board replicates the shape of Manhattan and with its shadow blesses the former ghetto. Its baldachin testifies to the “million miles of devoted ironing” done beneath it by immigrant mothers sprucing up their offspring.
Ibid., p. 318.

He would love to pad Central Park and the slope of Park Avenue with green baize, in homage to the grass of the former and the merely titular vegetation of the latter, and to use them as pool tables. Colored balls would be sent bumping through the park to roll down the declivity of the avenue. They’d be collected at Grand Central and shipped back uptown on the underground railroad tracks. At 96th Street they’d pop into view again, ready to resume the game.
N. cit.

Christo during the 1960s planned the packaging of three New York buildings, 2 Broadway, 20 Exchange Place, and the Allied Chemical Tower in Times Square.
Conrad, p. 312.

Bill told me he had been walking uptown one afternoon and at the corner of 53rd and 7th he had noticed a man across the street who was making peculiar gestures in front of his face. It was Breton and he was fighting off a butterfly. A butterfly had attacked the Parisian poet in the middle of New York. (cf. Federal Writers’ Project: “An occasional butterfly pirouettes through Wall Street’s canyon.”[Nature])

Denby, p. 3.

Breton continued to live in New York City; he remained totally French, untouched by his residence in America, almost as through he had never left Paris.

Myers, p. 37.

As reality goes into hiding in the prudish city, realism becomes an illicit art. Sometimes Marsh was denied permission to sketch in the burlesque houses, so he taught himself to scribble on paper concealed in his pocket.

Conrad, p. 97.

He wishes that some aesthetic tyrant would make amends for the grayness of New York by decreeing that all the avenues be painted in contrasting colors.

Ibid., pp. 139-140.

The patterning of tracks in Washington Square after a blizzard is decorative rondure.

Ibid., p. 175.

Surreal New York is a pornotopia, a jungle of regression or an infirmary of the psychologically maimed.

Ibid., p. 142.

Invading New York, the modernists put it through a succession of iconographic torments. It’s demolished by the cubists, electrified by the futurists, sterilized by the purists. Cubism piles up New York’s architectural building blocks only to capsize them. Surrealism carnivorously interprets its stone and steel as flesh, of which it makes a meal. Inside the body, the surrealist city rots; purism arrests that fate by setting its temperature at a sanitary degree zero. But the radical muralists, unrelenting, inscribe on the city’s walls a prophecy of doom.

Ibid., p. 127.

Tex Rickard built a giant swimming pool in Madison Square Garden in 1921. The giant white-tiled pool was 250 feet long by 100 feet wide, two-thirds the size of a football field. The water tank held 1,500,000 gallons of water. The ends of the pool had a depth of three feet and sloped to the center for a depth of fifteen feet, an area that served amateur and professional swim and dive competitions on Thursday evenings. A cascading waterfall was incorporated into the design at one end.

Aycock, p. 137.

On the side of a blazing warehouse is a proud advertisement for the food products manufactured therein: “SIMPLY ADD BOILING WATER.” And the fire occurs, to make the joke even crueler, on Water Street.

Conrad, p. 291.

Astronauts from the future discover that the mysterious world on which they have landed actually sits atop a post-apocalyptic New York—the ruined Grand Central has become the temple for a future race; a wide, double staircase serves as the altar. Like Luthor's lair, this set is not a reconstruction of the real building, but a rather free interpretation that takes advantage of the enormous familiarity of the station's design, manifested in details as simple as the shape of an arch or a style of lettering. In such details resides Grand Central's power as an almost universally recognizable "place," even as it offers a superb springboard for fantasy. How many other structures could be so universally identified by a few fragments of their graphics?

Sanders, p. 284.

Stephen Crane's description of the sensation of riding in an elevator, written in 1899: "The little cage sank swiftly; floor after floor seemed to be rising with marvelous speed; the whole building was winging straight into the sky."
Crane, Active, p. 32.

Transference of night imaginations to the daytime world—a way of forcing the impressions gained on the radically-changed night streets back upon the "real" world.
Haden, p. 49.

The city is a built dream, a vision incarnated. What makes it grow is its image of itself.
Conrad, p. 207.

I am going to carry my bed into New York City tonight complete with dangling sheets and ripped blankets; I am going to push it across three dark highways.
Stern, p. 55.

A dream, not a place.
Pomerance, p. 3.

These New Yorkers are often shunted to the margins of a spectacle that is half like a poster and half like a dream. They exist in an urban-scape made up of just bits and pieces that have little in common but their amputation by the frame.
Kozloff, n. pag.

Sleep... is where you find it. But the other fire escape is somewhat overcrowded... it's not so bad sleeping that way... except when it starts to rain... the back to the stuffy tenement rooms.
Weegee, Naked, p. 20.

Both Kansas and Oz, both black-and-white and technicolor, with wicked witches on both sides of town, and good ones too, showing up in bubbles every so often—if you know how to blow them.
McCourt, p. 79.

Battery Park, the rendezvous of dreams.
Reisenberg, p. 13.

Absent-minded city of unconscious revelations in our mental age of the nightjar and the candle.
Ibid., p. 206.

I stopped in this restaurant down on 2nd Avenue, sat at the counter for a moment and ordered a cup of coffee, feeling kind of warm and happy, the remnants of some dream from that morning still in my head.
Wojnarowicz, p. 187.

There were tracks of iron stalking through the air, and streets that were as steep as canyons, and stairways that mounted in vast flights to noble plazas, and steps that led down into deep places where were, strangely enough, underworld silences. And there were parks and flowers and rivers. And then, after twenty years, here it stood, as amazing almost as my dream, save that in the waking the flush of life was over it. It possessed the tang of contests and dreams and enthusiasms and delights and terrors and despairs. Through its ways and canyons sand open spaces and underground passages were running, seething, sparkling, darkling, a mass of beings such as my dream-city never knew.
Dreiser, p. 1.

Here, in this ever renewed dreamland of the city, the comic-book shadows and cinematic styles of 1930s Manhattan are always present, always available, beckoning us to a mythical past.
Kingwell, p. 200.

Cinema

A thousand movie screens flickered in New York from morning to midnight.
Jones, Dynamite, p. 200.

Wandering through the souk of the Lower East Side, you could find the Palestine, the Florence, the Ruby, and the Windsor (among many others, most of which were nicknamed The Itch); they, too, died, driven into the Lost City with the great Yiddish theaters: the Grand, the Orpheum, the Yiddish Arts. Out in Queens, around 165th Street, the Loew's Valencia closed, along with the Alden, the Merrick, the Jamaica, the Savoy, and the Hillside. On East 14th Street in Manhattan, there was a place called the Jefferson, where we went to see the Spanish movies and vaudeville acts, improbably trying to learn the language from Pedro Infante and Jorge Negrete, lusting for Sarita Montiel, laughing at the comedy of Johnny El Men, while ice-cream vendors worked the aisles. Gone. In Times Square, the Capitol disappeared, the Roxy, the Criterion, the Strand. The Laffmovie on 42nd Street played comedies all day long, but now, where Laurel and Hardy once tried to deliver Christmas trees, the movies are about ripped flesh. Who now can verify the existence of the old Pike’s Opera House on 23rd Street and Eighth Avenue (converted first to vaudeville and then to movies after the Metropolitan Opera established itself at 39th Street and Broadway)? It was torn down to make way for the ILGWU houses, thus eradicating the building where Jay Gould once had his office and where Fred Astaire learned to dance. And most astonishing and final of all, the Paramount itself was murdered in its sleep.

You should not begin with the city and move inwards to the screen; you should begin with the screen and move outwards to the city.”
Baudrillard, America, p. 56.

The view of Manhattan’s skyline emerging, walking on the Brooklyn Bridge to Manhattan: However far the stranger has come to see this view, he will almost certainly feel that it has been somewhere in his background for most of his life, courtesy of the cinema or (as likely) the television screen.

Moorhouse, p. 19.

When they shoot, no one dies. The Pop city is becoming a kindergarten.

Conrad, p. 310.

From a brownstone wall to carved wood paneling to a limestone facade. Dozens of these panels stood drying outside the shop, awaiting the artful painting that would assure their verisimilitude. The thick plantings of a soundstage Central Park—either real or, more likely, artificial—could be provided by the nursery’s greensmen; the enormous plate-glass windows of a mythical Fifth Avenue department store readily supplied by the studio glazier. The Chinese or Yiddish store signage that graced the Lower East Side’s streets were no challenge for artisans of the paint-splattered sign shop, while the lacy ironwork of a Gramercy Park balcony was probably not iron at all but inexpensive “pot” metal, cast from a plaster original produced in the high, glassy sculptor’s studio.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 67.

With lobby, elevator, and hallway behind us, we at last open the door and enter the apartment itself—and therein find the single most familiar interior in New York movies. As in the real city, where apartments are by far the most common kind of domestic interior, the movie apartment long ago became the standard setting for middle-class New York life, the background of hundred upon hundreds of films.

With its relatively simple and standardized layouts, the movie apartment’s importance has often been less a space in itself than the neutral canvas for a decorating scheme bent upon revealing its occupant’s personality.

Ibid., p. 199.

“New York Street”—half a dozen can be found around today’s Los Angeles: at the height of the studio era, six decades, almost twenty such “streets” stood around Southern California, on lots large and small, celebrated and obscure.

Ibid., p. 143.

Brick facades and brownstone stoops, canvas awnings and fire hydrants and street lamps evoke a New York that is, if anything, a little too real, even brick popping out with intense clarity. But soon discrepant details start to creep in, like the strange incongruities of real dramas. There are few people, no traffic, and a very un-New York sense of quiet. Through the upper windows can be glimpsed not bedrooms, but snatches of blue sky. Views of good-sized hills and, yes, snow-peaked mountains appear beyond the building cornices. As in a dream, these peculiar details hint at something about the experience we are having (something, in fact, we already know).

But meanwhile the street continues to beckon, encouraging us to stay within its surreal confines. At the end of the block we spot another street, crossing ours. We turn the corner and find ourselves on a new street, somewhat different in style and mood but still plainly part of the same city. Ahead there is another intersection, and another block; by now we realize that the term “New York Street” is something of a misnomer: this is not one street but many, an entire matrix of streets, in fact, meeting at odd angles and T-shaped intersections and spreading over several acres.

Eventually, however, we wander a few steps too far, and catch sight of the buildings from the back—not to be instantly confronted by the secret they tried so hard to keep: that they are not buildings at all, but merely false fronts, propped up with bracing. Nothing could be farther from the conscious urban clarity of the façades than this behind-the-scenes thicket of raw lumber. The front doors and entries, so prominent from the sidewalk, are from here hardly visible, leading not to actual parlors or lobbies but, we now see, to vestibules just big enough for an actress to kiss the leading man goodnight before scampering down the steps and onto the next scene. Behind the upper-floor windows, meanwhile, are narrow platforms stretched below the sills, allowing grips and stagehands to install curtains or flower pots, or rig lights, or cover the windows with sheets of non-reflective cloth, called duvety, to keep the sky from poking through and destroying the illusion. And no matter what elaborate materials are implied up front—granite, limestone, brick—from behind it is plain that these “buildings” are all made of the same stuff: plywood sheets, overlaid with molded veneers of plaster staff or fiberglass. This is a street just inches thick.

It has always been thus, ever since Hollywood first started reconstructing New York on a large scale in the early 1920s. To do so, the city’s urban fabric had to be sliced in two—the outer layer of its buildings neatly sheared away from the interiors, which were shot inside enclosed soundstages, some distance away. The reason lay in part with the nature of film stock itself, which responds very differently to natural and artificial light: the higher “color temperature” of the sun’s light makes it difficult to blend with that of electric lamps. From this technical constraint arose an entire production strategy, separating the movie city’s exterior skins from everything else. Lacking any internal structure, the “buildings” of New York Street formed a membrane-like container, a vessel of space that encompassed only the public, outdoor life of the city—a reality with some provocative implications of its own.

Ibid., pp. 143-5.

Night scenes on the New York Street were rarely filmed after dark, when expensive overtime provisions would be in effect, but during the day, with sections of street darkened by black tarpaulins stretched from timber frameworks rising above the facades on either side. The result was an almost surreal sight: a cocoon-like enclosure, blocking out the bright sun of a California day to create a sleek, velvety Manhattan night.

[...]

In this light, it was worth taking a last look at the New York Street itself, still standing in the California sun. For clearly it was a place with its own distinctive reality, less a copy of the real city than a vigorous interpretation. This was especially true of its layout, more picturesque than the notoriously rectilinear Manhattan street grid, where except for a few blocks in Greenwich Village and another couple near Wall Street, the streets are arrow-straight, flying off into infinity. The blocks of Hollywood’s New York Street, by contrast, had a gentle bend midway in their length, or met each other in T-shaped intersections very unlike the real city. Though the effect may have been picturesque, the motivation was anything but: bending the street, or having it intersect another, served to close down the vista and eliminate the need for expensive additional streets trailing into the distance.

The curious result, evident in countless films, was to give a distinctly small-town scale to one of the world’s largest cities. In doing so, the filmic street illustrated one of the more surprising characteristics of New York: that what outsiders see as endless stretches of avenue actually break down for residents into small overlapping neighborhoods, each just a few blocks in size and encompassing the shops and services of daily life. The New York Street’s great conceit, that it could condense the urbanism of the sprawling metropolis into a few blocks, thus made manifest what most New Yorkers know to be the truth, that their “city” does in large part consist of the few blocks around them.

Ibid., pp. 176-7.

The apartments all had to be separately wired to allow their lights to be switched on or off individually, as they would in a real city. A subtle lighting design was required to ensure that the apartment interiors did not appear artificially bright, like shop windows, when seen from outside. And the huge space of the courtyard itself had to be bathed in the glare of a summer day.

Ibid., p. 237.

Los Angeles’s horizontal endlessness... would be avenged by movie New York’s overwhelming verticality. If the real New York had many tall buildings, it had plenty of low ones as well, especially in its outer boroughs and residential districts. But the dream city would seem to be all vertical, every scene playing in a penthouse, on a terrace, in a rooftop nightclub, every window looking onto a glittering view of rising towers.

Los Angeles’s sleepy boulevards, meanwhile, would be retaliated against with an imaginary New York street life that surpassed almost anything the real city could offer. The lowliest side-street would have scores of pedestrians rushing purposefully across the frame; dozens more sat on stoops and played on the sidewalk. The quiet landscape of Los Angeles’s bungalows or the orange groves of the San Fernando Valley would be shattered by the backlot cries of the Italian hurdy-gurdy man, the Irish cop, the Jewish pushcart vendor, as if packing, by scripted instruction, all of New York’s human diversity onto a single block. And on these streets, leading men and women would constantly bump into one another, chance encounters that not only served the needs of the plot—but worked to demonstrate how a real city worked.

With the twilight, imagination took a special leap. The dream city would burn most brightly after dark, would indeed seem to live by night, as if to exorcise Los Angeles’s dreary early-to-bed puritanism. The rain-slicked streets, the bright glow of the theaters as audiences spilled out, the warm interiors of the supper clubs, the sequence of overlapping neon signs (“Panorama Club,” “Casino Moderne,” “Café Intime”) that signified a romantic dusk-to-dawn, all these would feed the projected fantasies of the ex-New Yorkers. The movement, by turns languid and urgent, of the demimondaine through a nocturnal cocoon of dark, slick exteriors and luminous interiors would give movie New York its most dreamlike aspect.

The characters moving through these evenings, walking these streets, surveying this skyline from its upper precincts were in some sense the greatest creation of all: idealized “New Yorkers,” polished and elegant, or exquisitely rough-hewn, and equipped with all the wit and style that had once graced the Round Table and its like. In these filmic New Yorkers—Gary Grant and Katharine Hepburn, Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, Myrna Loy and William Powell, Jimmy Cagney and Bette Davis—the style of Café Society was wed to the verbal agility of the Algonquin crowd to create an elite worthy of populating the impossibly grand city that the writers were inventing. As Pauline Kael has noted, apropos of one of the greatest of these “New Yorkers”: “Sitting out in Los Angeles, the expatriate New York writers projected their fantasies of Eastern connoisseurship and suavity. Los Angeles itself has never recovered from the inferiority complex that its movies nourished, and every movie-going kid in America felt that people in New York were smarter, livelier, and better looking than anyone in his hometown. There were no Cary Grants in the sticks. He and his counterparts were to be found only in the imaginary cities of the movies.”

If shooting the real city was impossible, Hollywood would simply rebuild New York.

Ibid., p. 63.

Tall file cabinets bulged with thousands of special photographs of New York, taken by crews regularly sent back East to shoot parts of the city for a specific film or to supplement the general collection. They recorded everything, from the broadest skyscraper views to the homeliest details of streets and sidewalks, creating a file-cabinet panorama that comprised one of the most exhaustive urban portraitures ever realized.

Many of the collection’s images were prosaic, at least when looked at individually. But they gained a kind of cumulative power from the sheer volume with which they were assembled. Nothing was beneath the studio’s notice, not even the humblest elements of the civic landscape: the lampposts, fire hydrants, police call-boxes, street signs, and manhole covers that constituted New York’s municipal “street furniture,” even down to the granite Belgian blocks that gave the street bed its distinctive cobbled texture. Other views showed the various building fronts that lined the city’s streets: the awnings and show windows of department stores, the classically carved names over the entrances to banks and office buildings, the elegant stenciled lettering on the glazed storefronts of modistes and jewelry shops. The images sought to catalog every element of the urban landscape, both inside and out: the riveted columns and ornate staircases of the El; the benches, water fountains, and statuary of Central and Bryant Parks; the canopies, taxi lights, and uniformed doormen of Park Avenue apartment houses. And onward, through hotel lobbies and elevator cabs, bars and restaurants, tenement hallways and the observation deck of the Empire State Building. Probably never has any living city been documented quite so obsessively, in thousands of sharp, large-format photographs carried across a continent to be assembled, labeled, and filed into an encyclopedic collection, all for the purpose of rebuilding any and every portion of it on a moment’s notice.

Ibid., pp. 66-7.

Against shooting on location in New York. Studio telegram to director hoping to shoot in NYC: A TREE IS A TREE, A ROCK IS A ROCK, SHOOT THE PICTURE IN GRIFFITH PARK.

Ibid., p. 332.
This being Manhattan, a totally made-over rock with barely a patch of what is natural left upon it, it is taken for granted that what does not exist can spontaneously be created.

_Ibid._, 143.

Rosalind Russell: “I had the same set in I don’t know how many pictures! Ten or fifteen!! The opening shot was always an air shot over New York. Then it would bleed into my suite of offices on the fortieth floor of Radio City. Out of the window behind me was always a view of the Empire State Building, in order to identify the setting. I used to say to cameraman Joe Walker, ‘Joe, where was the Empire State Building in the last picture?’ He would say, ‘I had it a little to the left.’ I’d say, ‘Well, this time throw it over to the right.’

_Ibid._, p. 62.

Hitchcock quietly sitting between takes of _Rear Window_ in different spots around the set, as if to more fully enjoy the “city” he had brought into being.

_Ibid._, p. 238.

The year of _Rear Window_’s release, 1954, also marked the construction of a landmark in postwar urban design: the Pruitt-Igoe Houses in St. Louis, a design similar to most postwar housing developments across the country. A series of freestanding slabs poised in open space, it offered no hierarchies at all outside the apartment door. There were no rear windows at Pruitt-Igoe. Or front windows, for that matter. Every window was the same. Everything existed in a field of open space, equal to everything else. As an expression of the professional understanding of cities at the time, it represented what can only be described as a profound impoverishment of urban vision, a broad failure of imagination that transcended this particular project’s notorious social failure, which resulted in its state-sponsored destruction by dynamite, two decades later.

_The Naked City_ (1948): the first feature shot on location in New York since the late 1920s... two hundred thousand New Yorkers turned out to watch the camera crews; at one point the producers turned to a professional juggler to help distract the crowds while the actual shooting was completed.

Unable to find a suitable freestanding tenement on the Lower East Side, the designer for _batteries not included_ (1987) and his crew spent ten weeks constructing a four-story exterior set on a bombed-out lot in Alphabet City, built on three sides and wide open in the back, whose façade of brick-patterned fiberglass was “aged” by burning, chipping, and staining. The result looked so authentic that passersby inquired about available apartments and the sanitation department emptied prop garbage cans in front of the building.

_Trager_, p. 430.

One day, probably early in 1980, a film crew commandeered Eleventh Street between Avenues A and B and, with minimal adjustments, returned the block to the way it had looked in 1910. All they did was to pull the plywood coverings off storefront windows, paint names in gold letters on those windows, and pile goods up behind them. They spread straw in the gutters and hung washlines across the street. They fitted selected residents with period clothes and called forth a parade of horse-drawn conveyances.

When I walked down that street at night, with all the trappings up but the crew absent, I felt like a ghost. The tenements were aspects of the natural landscape, like caves or rock ledges, across which all of us—residents, landlords, dope dealers, beat cops, tourists—flitted for a few seasons, like the pigeons and the cockroaches and the rats, barely registering as individuals in the ceaseless churning of generations.

Sante, “My Lost City,” N. pag.

Sprayed with graffiti and strewn with garbage, streets in Toronto and Montreal became blandly familiar stand-ins for crime-ridden “New York” neighborhoods.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 381.

It was rewarding for filmmakers to cast middle-class citizens into a loft setting and show them trying, and often failing, to find their bearings.

Ibid., p. 215.

Battery Place and the Bay are operatic, the stage for a thrilling fairy spectacle.

Conrad, p. 74.

Photographed in the spring or fall, the city proved a cinematographer’s delight, with its complex cloud formations, its lucid sea-washed air, and its relatively low sun angles, which softened the daylight and cast long shadows on the buildings’ ornamented masonry—offering unbounded visual richness and texture that registered handsomely on black-and-white film. [Weather]

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 333.

During the day, his New Yorkers pine for the oblivious dark. The movies sell them an artificial night: many of them go to matinees just to sleep.

Conrad, p. 274.

People are waiting in line in the cold to see the new Gloria Swanson picture.

Filmmakers that represent NYC as a city of ethnic and racial groups: Allen on Jews; Scorsese on Italians; and Spike Lee on African Americans.

Halle, p. 487.

The exterior of a movie theater, its marquee saying: “Inagaki’s Chushingura; Dovzhenko’s Earth.”

Allen & Brickman, Manhattan, N. pag.

(They move into the ticket line, still talking. A billboard next to them reads “INGMAR BERGMAN’S ‘FACE TO FACE,’ LIV ULLMANN”)

Ibid.

I’m not in the mood to see a four-hour documentary on Nazis.

Ibid.
The movies being shot all over SoHo tonight are backing up traffic everywhere.

From 1977 to the present there is only one ethnically themed New York hit movie, the comedy Coming to America (1988). In it, an African aristocrat travels to New York City seeking an untraditional wife.
Halle, p. 487.

I like the idea that people in New York have to wait in line for movies. You go by so many theaters where there are long, long lines. But nobody looks unhappy about it. It costs so much money just to live now, and if you’re on a date, you can spend your whole date time in line, and that way it saves you money because you don’t have to think of other things to do while you’re waiting and you get to know your person, and you suffer a little together, and they you’re entertained for two hours. So you’ve gotten very close, you’ve shared a complete experience. And the idea of waiting for something makes it more exciting anyway. Never getting in is the most exciting, but after that waiting to get in is the most exciting.
If, as Walter Benjamin said, the capital of the nineteenth century was Paris, then the capital of the American Century was New York.
Shefter, p. 1.

Skyscrapers and swing, action painting and modern dance, Beat poetry and Pop art, Partisan Review and West Side Story, the Living Theater and the Guggenheim Museum: if Paris was, in Walter Benjamin’s famous phrase “the capital of the nineteenth-century,” then New York surely has become the capital of the twentieth.
Wallock, p. 9.

New York is not a capital city—it is not a national capital or a state capital. But it is by way of becoming the capital of the world.
White, Here, p. 55.

There it was, the Rome, the Paris, the London of the twentieth century, the city of ambition, the dense magnetic rock, the irresistible destination of all those who insist on being where things are happening.
Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 78.

John Lennon: “If I had lived in Roman times, I would have lived in Rome. Where else? Today America is the Roman Empire and New York is Rome itself.”
Norman, p. 682.

Walter Winchell: “New York is a glorious monument to the 20th century.”
Ibid., p. 9.

Now I live in New York City, which I believe to be the center of the world.
Haring, Journals, p. 90.

Imperial Rome was one-eighth the size of New York.
Caro, p. 838

Athens at the height of its glory was never larger than Yonkers.
Ibid., p. 838
Manhattan was the unchallenged center of the planet. Political decisions were made in Washington, but most of the other decisions that counted in the United States—those involving the disposition of money and fame and the recognition of literary and artistic achievements—were made on that rocky island, that diamond iceberg between rivers. Eight major papers made everything that happened in the five boroughs, the matter how trivial, some great inconsequential, while a battalion of gossip columnists made the city seems smaller than it was with their breathless chatter about the famous, and those who would like to be famous.

Bockris, Warhol, p. 78.

Whatever the cause of the New York turnaround, it would not have been possible without Robert Moses. Had he not lived, or had he chosen to spend his productive years in isolation on a beach or a mountaintop, Gotham would have lacked the wherewithal to adjust to the demands of the modern world. Had the city not undertaken a massive program of public works between 1924 in 1970, it had not built an arterial highway system, and had it not relocated 200,000 people from old law tenements to new public housing projects, New York would not have been able to claim in the 1990s that it was the capital of the 20th century, the capital of capitalism, and the capital of the world.

Ballon, p. 68.

Greenberg plotted modernist art's relocation from Paris to New York City as the “main premises of Western art... migrated to the United States, along with the center of gravity of industrial production and political power.”

Bennett, pp. 12-3.

In 1948, Jack Kerouac writes, “What a great city New York is! We are living at just the right time—Johnson and his London, Balzac and his Paris, Socrates and his Athens—the same thing again.”

Trager, p. 565.

A metropolis without being a national capital or even symbol.

Bender, p. xi.

Not representing the nation but rather its own culture and economy.

Bender, p. xi.
No wonder that one accustomed to the rich memories of the Old World thinks he has come upon an eighth wonder—a city without a past!
Jospehy, p. 52.

I had witnessed the growth and expansion of New York... and therefore I was feeling entitled to interpret the titanic efforts, the conquests already obtained by the imperial city in order to become what now she is, the center of the world.
Sharpe, p. 199.

While Europeans still shivered, exhausted in their damp monochrome deprivation in the aftermath of the ruinous war, New Yorkers assumed world leadership with a cool sophistication that they'd previously granted to Paris, Rome or London. In the excited, urgent chatter in the new air-conditioned offices, in the packed bars and increasingly worldly restaurants, in the crammed theater lobbies and Fifth Avenue stores there was a new confidence gained from global domination. New Yorkers basked in the health and wealth reflected back at them in the glass and chrome of their elegant bustling streets. They reveled in the status as citizens of the busiest, noisiest, fastest growing, most advanced, most cosmopolitan, coolest, most desirable and most photogenic city in the world.
Cracknell, pp. 16-7.

The sun is rising overhead, the sun which once shone brightly on Europe alone and threw slanting rays merely upon New York. The sun has moved across the Atlantic. The far coasts of Europe still shine with light. But they shine mildly, softly, like eastern coasts in late summer afternoon when the sun commences to slope toward the western sea. And behind us, over the American hinterland, morning rays slant where deep, impenetrable murkiness lay, and begin to unveil the face of a continent. But over New York dayspring commences to flood his fruity warmth.
Rosenfeld, p. 471.

The returning troops marched up Fifth Avenue and girls were instinctively drawn East and North toward them—this was the greatest nation and there was gala in the air.

There was a certain romantic grandeur to American pessimism that was different from anything found in Europe.
Money was flowing again. the ash-in-your-eye bleakness of New York in the Depression was lifting.

Stevens & Swan, p. 297.

Manhattan is the sun at the center of all the wealth in the universe. No power on earth, or in the rumored colonies of the moon and the planet Mars, is greater than the power emanating from Manhattan. If there was a Golden Age of Babylon, in which all that made it a name of infamy had not existed, Manhattan is that Babylon. There are streets of gold in Manhattan.

Abbott, p. 78.

New York always asserts itself. Gathering into itself all ships and all flags, New York makes a summary of and a distillation from the world, equalizing all nations and all creatures, as cubism does in showing them all to be recombinations of a few unitary and universal forms. Abstraction, like New York, is a melting pot.

Conrad, p. 117.

It is the place were all the aspirations of the Western world meet to form one vast master aspiration as powerful as the suction of a steam dredge. It is the icing on the piece called Christian civilization. That it may have buildings higher than any other, and bawdry shows enough, and door-openers enough, and noise and confusion enough—that these imperial ends may be achieved, millions sweat and slave on all the forlorn farms of the earth, and in all the miserable slums, including its own. It pays more for a meal than the Slovak or a Pole pays for a wife, and the meal is better than the wife. It gets the best of everything, and especially of what, by all reputable ethical systems, is the worst. It has passed beyond all fear of Hell or hope of Heaven. The primary postulates of all the rest of the world are its familiar jokes. A city apart, it is breeding a race apart. Is that race American? Then so is a bashi-bazouk American. Is it decent? Then so is street-walker decent. But I don’t think that it may be reasonably denounced as dull.

Mencken, p. 188.

A poem compresses much in a small space and adds music, thus heightening its meaning. The city is like poetry: it compresses all life, all races and breeds, into a small island and adds music and the accompaniment of internal engines. The island of Manhattan is without any doubt the greatest human concentrate on earth, the poem whose magic is comprehensible to millions of permanent residents but whose full meaning will always remain elusive. At the feet of the tallest and plushiest offices lie the crummiest slums. The genteel mysteries housed in the Riverside Church are only a few blocks from the voodoo charms of Harlem. The merchant princes, riding to Wall Street in their limousines down the East River Drive, pass within a few hundred yards of the gypsy kings; but the princes do not know they are passing kings, and the kings are not up yet anyway — they live a more leisurely life than the princes and get drunk more consistently.

White, Here, pp. 29.

Paris

New York is not and will not be Paris.
Bender, p. xi.

Gertrude Stein: "Paris was where the twentieth century was."

Manhattan is a counter-Paris, an anti-London.
Koolhaas, p. 20.

Manhattan, the other of Mont-Saint-Michel.
Federal Writers, p.10.

Instead of being a province of Paris, or even an imitator of Paris, New York in the 1940s became Paris.
Bender, p. 335.

The New Yorker dreams of Paris while the Parisian wonders about New York... They all remain unreal for us.
[Flâneur]
Parsons, p. 152

New York’s new identity is as the American Paris. It becomes cultured by its importation of vice.
Hawes, N. pag.

Instead of being a province of Paris, or even an imitator of Paris, New York in the 1940s became Paris.
Bender, p. 335.
Park Avenue, like Paris, is finished. It will never be changed.
Hawes, N. pag.

"On the Champs-Elysés," he said, "or in Mayfair, I feel myself a part of the street. Spiritually I seem to own a piece of it. Park Avenue—beautiful, yes, and absolutely American—but a little scornful. In Mayfair and in the fine districts of Paris and Rome, you see facades, but in Park Avenue only walls. A façade welcomes; a wall forbids. A curious manifestation in a democracy, isn’t it?"
Irwin, p. 220.

Seen from Broadway, the massacres in France seemed like a colossal advertising stunt for the benefit of some giant corporation.
Jones, Modernism, p. 57.

The city’s transformation is Parisian in the wrong way: the old bits of the city are taken over by the rich while the poor and the unwashed are crowded right off the island.
Gopnik, p. 11.

Paris represents "years to think," he writes, "in New York one fall too easily in the habit of working without thinking on account of the amount of work there is to do."
Koolhaas, p. 162.

They’ve planted sycamore trees on Third Avenue: by 1960 it’ll look like the Boulevard St. Germain and the only eyes that scope you being seen on the second floor will be the little eyes of nesting sparrows. [Nature]
McCourt, p. 95.

Without notable exception, the gray-stone or cream-brick buildings are of French Renaissance architecture. Their builders have even adapted that trick which the French so well understand, of making the façades to these marts of luxury a trifle more ornate than would seem tasteful for public buildings or office structures. Fifth Avenue adapted its street-lamps, stretching their double line of twin saffron globes over the curve of the hill, from the Bois de Boulogne; and even the graceful traffic towers took their inspiration from the court accessories of Louis XIV. In the nineteenth century the French put their stamp on the creation and distribution of luxury goods the world over. The glory is now passing from Paris to New York, from the Rue de la Paix to Fifth Avenue. But they have had a partial revenge. This successful rival has itself become half French.

Irwin, pp. 185–6.

The world’s second metropolis.
Dos Passos, p. 11.

city of cities
I feel you a thousand times more than chaotic Paris more than the prey of any naked starving girl at the Folies Bergere
Meyer, p. 296.

In 1930 the Chrysler Building was the first structure to rise higher than the Eiffel Tower, which was erected in 1899.

Trager, p. 453.

The Abstraction Expressionist painters felt that New York City, especially with the influx of European painters during World War II, had replaced Paris as the art capital of the world. Their belief was that expressed by O’Hara: “New York is everywhere like Paris!”

Gooch, p. 191.

As a poet of the New York School of Poetry, O’Hara also lived aesthetically under the umbrella of the Cedar painters, who had coined the phrase “New York School” to cover their own painting as a sort of joke-cum-power-play on the “Ecole de Paris.”

Ibid., p. 212.

“You know, Paris has been limping along as the world center of art since 1936.” But what will replace the school of Paris?” I asked. “The place where the money is,” he replied, “New York.”

Myers, p. 66.

Always desperate for the café life of Paris, for their own version of Picasso’s Au Lapin Agile, the painters had gathered during most of the 1940 season at the Waldorf Cafeteria at Sixth Avenue and Eighth Street where they drank coffee and talked leftist politics and modern art.

Gooch, p. 214.

Living near Washington Square because the rooftops there remind him of Paris.

As Gramercy Park seems a bit of London and Stuyvesant Square a corner of Philadelphia, so this is a piece of Paris. A taller Paris, if you will, and a richer Paris but bearing the stamp nevertheless.
  Irwin, p. 185.

A fashionable modiste told me once that her French seamstresses, landing from the boat, go at once to a cooperative French boardinghouse, thence to the job. From that time forth, the work-room, the boarding-house, and the Woman’s City bound their lives. They never seen and American newspaper—not even a tabloid—but the girls in the house combine and subscribe fro Le Matin and the Courrier des Etats Unis. Three or four years of this, and then Mlle. Parisienne suddenly packs up her modest trunk and goes home by steerage. She has saved up a dot; now she can marry and live happy ever after in her dear Paris!
  Ibid., p. 188.

One of the special characteristics of New York is that it is different from a London or a Paris because it’s the financial capital, and the cultural capital, but not the political capital.
  NY Journal, p. 65.

Ginsberg’s poetry walked down the streets of New York in the black cloak of French poetry.
  Bennett, p. 18.

I miss New York when I’m away. Paris is a city of monuments and streets with buildings that are so symmetrical, they look like stranded ocean liners. But I cannot find that great, brooding mix of aces, that sense of a constant carnival.

I must dip into these depths, if it proves possible, later on; let me content myself for the moment with remembering how from the first, on all such ground, my thought went straight to poor great wonder-working Émile Zola and his love of the human aggregation, the artificial microcosm, which had to spend itself on great shops, great businesses, great “apartment-houses,” of inferior, of mere Parisian scale. His image, it seemed to me, really asked for compassion—in the presence of this material that his energy of evocation, his alone, would have been of a stature to meddle with. What if Le Ventre de Paris, what if Au Bonheur des Dames, what if Pot-Bouille and L'Argent, could but have come into being under the New York inspiration?
   James, p. 82.

The Grand Concourse was an experiment in boulevardism. A Bronx mirror of Park Avenue—but without the "Park." In Brooklyn, both Eastern and Ocean parkways, laid out by Frederick Law Olmsted, designer of both Central and Prospect parks, were intended as boulevards and still serve as great auto routes without the tall and grand buildings intended in the Parisian manner.
   White, Physical, p. 121.

The Grand Concourse, from whose heights I watched and thought, was our borough's closest thing to a Parisian boulevard.
   Berman, Solid, p.

On the development of Park Avenue: The treatment of a whole area, residential buildings interacting with a great symbolic monument at their center, was not unlike Napoleon's plan for Paris.
   Hawes, N. pag.

Park Avenue was insulated against the ruder aspects of city life. Its park malls, landscaped with undulating walkways to suggest a leisurely stroll, looked like trim little European gardens.
   Ibid.

Park Avenue buildings looked like clusters of houses or small European villages.
   Ibid.

And the express elevators take forty-five seconds to go from the bottom to the top, that is, for sixty-five stories, a time equal to that taken by our elevators, sanctimoniously installed in the Haussmann stairwells, to go to the sixth story.
   Corbusier, p. 45.

Paris bistro, you disappointed me on my return from Manhattan, with your faded charm. It's too old, too old, saddening!
   Ibid., p. 46.
Let's throw a bridge across the Atlantic. New York is the city nearest to Paris.

_Ibid._, p. 92.

What are we in our flat cities? What is our response to the skyscrapers of Manhattan? Versailles and Fontainebleau, Touraine with Chenonceaux and Chambord? They came to study all that at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts in Paris, and they have made skyscrapers out of them!

_Ibid._, p. 95.

The USA is no longer the purchaser of "French good taste."

_Ibid._, p. 95.

The Americanization of Europe: Paris, capital of the _Valutaschweine_, became the bourne of good and gay New Yorkers.

_Federal Writers_, pp. 3-4.

I wish I were reeling around Paris instead of reeling around New York

_O'Hara_, p. 328.

World City

New York is really the oldest city in the world. Meaning it is the oldest _modern_ city. It was born modern. Rome only becomes a modern city after the war, with the 50s boom. London and Paris too. Beijing, a truly ancient city, only becomes modern after the “open door” policy in the 80s. Within the frame of modernity, New York what is ancient. It is a kind of living archaeology of modern urban forms.

_Wark_, email.

Unlike London and Paris, the two other great capital of bourgeois civilization, Manhattan has never really been symbolized by middle-class housing. The sweep of semi-detached houses in Knightsbridge or Kensington, the long boulevards filled with bourgeoisie in the sixteenth and eighth _arrondissements_ of Paris, sum up the image of those places. New York, on the other hand, is famous for William Randolph Hearst’s penthouse and Sister Eileen’s basement apartment, or, more recently for the Trump Tower aerie and the Tribeca loft. A nuclear family living in a little house in Manhattan is a sight. The old enclaves of the true bourgeoisies, Riverside Drive and York Avenue, were on the margins of the island, and their high period was a short one.

Gopnik, p. 33.

New York is nothing like Paris; it is nothing like London; and it is not Spokane multiplied by sixty, or Detroit multiplied by four. It is by all odds the loftiest of cities. It even managed to reach the highest point in the sky at the lowest moment of the depression. The Empire State Building shot twelve hundred and fifty feet into the air when it was madness to put out as much as six inches of new growth. (The building has a mooring mast that no dirigible has ever tied to; it employs a man to flush toilets in slack times; it has been hit by an airplane in a fog, struck countless times by lightning, and been jumped off of by so many unhappy people that pedestrians instinctively quicken step when passing Fifth Avenue and 34th Street.)

White, Here, pp. 30.

Those who have Paris or Vienna or Budapest or Mexico City or Buenos Aires (or one of many other cities) in their minds as proper metropolitan centers will be disappointed by New York. From such a point of view New York has not yet completed its progress to full metropolitan status.

Bender, p. xi.

In 1930 a journalist comparing the transit systems of the world concluded that New York's subways were more an expression of itself than any in Europe. "In no European city," he said, "would the subway be chosen as a symbol of urban life." The subway represents New York City as surely as the freeway represents Los Angeles.

Brooks, p. 3.

It is all very well for someone who has never been much in Italy to say that the Italian quarters of New York resemble Naples; they do not. They resemble New York where some Italians live . . . and grow less and less Italian.

Ford, America, p. 97.

While viewing the Bay of Naples, you dream of New York Bay.

Reisenberg, p. 188.
New York does not have white sunlight, white housefronts, white plane trunks—nor indeed does it have the Mediterranean just round the corner of the square.

Ford, America, p. 288.

But the life of the city, it must be confessed, is as interesting as its physical aspect is dull. It is, even more than London or Paris, the modern Babylon, and since 1914 it has entered upon a period of luxuriousness that far surpasses anything seen on earth since the fall of the Eastern Empire.

Visitors from Europe view New York with more astonishment than any tourist could possibly feel in “doing Rome.”

Hood, p. 192.

Washington Square is the Latin piazza where pleasure becomes performance.

The collision and the intermingling of these millions of foreign-born people representing so many races and creeds make New York a permanent exhibit of the phenomenon of one world. The citizens of New York are tolerant not only from disposition but from necessity. The city has to be tolerant, otherwise it would explode in a radioactive cloud of hate and rancor and bigotry. If the people were to depart even briefly from the peace of cosmopolitan intercourse, the town would blow up higher than a kite. In New York smolders every race problem there is, but the noticeable thing is not the problem but the inviolate truce. [Apocalypse] [Unrest]

White, Here, p. 47.

Marcel Duchamp could praise New York for a deracination which was the condition of the migratory modernist, who must be a world citizen: “The artist,” he said, “should be able to work in one place quite as well as another.” [Art]

Conrad, p. 115.

Duchamp, on arriving in New York in 1913, declared “New York is itself a work of art, a complete work of art.” Europe, he thought, was finished. This view was shared by Francis Picabia: “New York,” he famously declared in 1913, “is the cubist city, the futurist city. It expresses in its architecture, its life, its spirit, the modern thought.”
In a manner, New York may be said to be the essential America: acutely conscious of itself as an entity and yet composed, as no other city in the world is composed, of a thousand alien elements. On the other hand, the capital of every country in the world is something quite "other" than the country itself, and this may be said even more of America and New York than of England and London, France and Paris, Italy and Rome. In the United States, each State has its capital and its own tradition, while New York represents the cosmopolitan world which is growing up on the western shores of the Atlantic.

New York contains more people than the other eight greatest cities of America combined. In fact, it is only possible for a percentage of the population to be out of doors at the same time. Failure as unminded, everyone must laugh and grow rich in the town built upon commerce. The idle leave it, the elite escape from it. Ezra Pound, leader of the young poets, has not returned in twenty-five years.

Herbert Croly's visions for the construction of New York in the 20th century: "If New York was built like a grand and important city, it would function like one."

I can think of no great city of this world (putting aside Rio de Janeiro, Sydney and San Francisco) that is set amid scenes of greater natural beauty than New York, by which I mean, of course, Manhattan. Recall Berlin on its dismal plain, Paris and London on their toy rivers, Madrid on its desert, Copenhagen on its swamp, Rome on its ancient sewer and its absurd little hills, and then glance at Manhattan on its narrow and rock-ribbed island, with deep rivers to either side and the wide bay before it. No wonder its early visitors, however much they denounced the Dutch, always paused to praise the scene! Before it grew up, indeed, New York must have been strangely beautiful. But it was the beauty of freshness and unsophistication—in brief, of youth—and now it is no more. The town today, I think is quite the ugliest in the world—uglier, even, than Liverpool, Chicago or Berlin. If it were actually beautiful, as London, say, is beautiful, or Munich, or Charleston, or Florence, or even parts of Paris and Washington, the New Yorkers would not be so childishly appreciative of the few so-called beauty spots that it has—for example, Washington Square, Gramercy Park, Fifth Avenue.
and Riverside Drive. Washington Square, save for one short row of old houses on the North side, is actually very shabby and ugly—a blot rather than a beauty spot. The trees, year in and year out, have a mangy and sclerotic air; the grass is like stable litter; the tall tower on the South side is ungraceful and preposterous; the memorial arch is dirty and undignified; the whole places looks dingy, frowsy and forlorn. Compare it to Mt. Vernon Square in Baltimore: the difference is that between a charwoman and a grand lady. As for Gramercy Park, it is celebrated only because it is in New York; if it were in Washington or London, it would not attract a glance. Fifth Avenue, to me, seems to be showy rather than beautiful. What gives it its distinction is simply its spick and span appearance of wealth; it is the only New York street that looks well-fed and clean. Riverside Drive lacks even so much; it is second-rate from end to end, and especially where it is gaudiest. What absurd and hideous houses, with their brummagem Frenchiness, their pathetic effort to look aristocratic! What bad landscaping! What grotesque monuments! From its heights the rich look down upon the foul scars of the Palisades, as the rich of Fifth Avenue and Central Park West look down upon the anemic grass, bare rocks and blowing newspapers of Central Park. Alone among the cities of the East, New York has never developed a domestic architecture of any charm, or, indeed, of any character at all. There are neighborhoods in Boston, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore and in many lesser cities that have all the dignity and beauty of London, but in New York, the brownstone mania of the Nineteenth century brought down the whole town to one level of depressing ugliness, and since brownstone has gone out there has been no development whatever of indigenous design, but only a naïve copying of models—the skyscraper from Chicago and the dwelling-house from Paris. Along Fifth Avenue, from the Fifty-ninth Street corner to the upper end of Central Park, there is not a single house that looks reposeful and habitable. Along Park Avenue— but Park Avenue, for all its flash of creamy brick, is surely one of the most hideous streets in all the world!

Mencken, pp. 179-80.

Politicians ritualistically praised New York as the largest Irish city, the largest German city after Berlin, and the largest Italian city after Rome.

Peretti, p. 3.

We saw the mystic city of the New World appear far away, rising up from Manhattan. It passed us at close range: a spectacle of brutality and savagery. In contrast to our hopes the skyscrapers were not made of glass, but of tiara-crowned masses of stone. They carry up a thousand feet in the sky, a completely new and prodigious architectural event; with one stroke Europe is thrust aside.

Corbusier, p. 109.

Well, one hears eternally that New York is not America. It is obviously not Europe—the Atlantic lies between. Is it, then, the outer fringes of America—or the end of Europe? Perhaps, the one overlapping the other, here we have the beginning of the world.

Ford, America, p. 48.

Sometimes Europe doesn’t compare well. London slows you down. Rome is too crowded. Munich is a showcase. Zurich hems you in.

Balliett, p. 89.

The city is a center like every other point upon the circumference of the globe. The circle of the globe commences here, too. The port of New York lies on a single plane with all the world to-day. A single plane unites it with every other port and seacoast and point of the whole world. Out of the American hinterland, out of the depths of the inarticulate American unconsciousness, a spring has come, a push and a resilience; and here where Europe meets America we have come to sit at the focal point where two upsurging forces balance.

Rosenfeld, p. 471.

It was beauty in America one wanted, not in France or in Switzerland. It was the towers of Manhattan one wanted to see suddenly garlanded with loveliness.

Ibid., p. 467.

We had been sponging on Europe for direction instead of developing our own, and Europe had been handing out nice little packages of spiritual direction to us. But then Europe fell into disorder and lost her way, and we were thrown back on ourselves to find inside ourselves sustaining faith.

Ibid., p. 472.

It seems so much easier to entertain in Europe than in New York. You just throw open the doors to the garden and eat out in the open air with flowers and trees all around. Whereas New York is funny, most of the time things just don’t come off. In Europe, even having tea in the back yard can be wonderful. But in New York it’s complicated—if the restaurant is nice, the food can be bad and if the food is good, the lighting can be bad, and if the lighting is good, the air circulation can be bad. [Light] [Air]

Warhol, Philosophy, p.159.

At that time we all talked a great deal about scale in New York, and about the difference of instinctive scale in signs, painted color, clothes, gestures, everyday expressions between Europe and America. We were happy to be in a city the beauty of which was unknown, uncozy, and not small scale.

Merrill, p. 820.

This waterfront, seen so, always raises in me an emotion so subtle and complex as to defy analysis. There is a sense of romance in it, and awe; and beyond all that, a curious longing to do or experience something violent. That element in emotion is akin to what I felt once at Verdun when for the first time I stood among two thousand guns pouring curtain-fire.

Irwin, p. 16.

An apartment was… a rare laboratory in which a tenant might try out strange paraphernalia reserved for a modern life. Its gadgets and gimmicks and services distinguished it from the European counterparts, which had served as the models of design and urban behavior and had once been the source of all inspiration. In Paris or Vienna, apartments were still simple houses coincidentally built one on top of the other, as Hubert and Pirsson had phrased it twenty years earlier.

Hawes, N. pag.

He suffers from the delusion that there are no health resorts or mineral springs or natural scenery in his own country comparable with those of Europe.

Girdner, p. 55.

No monumental malls, no colonnaded boulevards or pompous segmented circuses, only a bare minimum of statued squares.

Our city is unquestionably the most marvelous that so far has appeared in civilization. There is nothing in the annals of history to compare with its incomparable growth, its commercial importance and its remarkable activities in a thousand directions. When it is recalled that our City Directory is only one hundred thirty-six years old, while the directories of London and Paris are nearly one thousand, you get some idea of the tremendous growth of our city in a very, very short time. It seems to be reborn almost every quarter of a century. It is quite within bounds to say that almost ninety per cent of the buildings now standing were not in existence fifty years ago; and the building at which we gaze to-day with so much pride and exultation will doubtless follow their forebears within the next half century.

The City of New York in 1860 might have been placed on another continent, compared with what it was twenty-five years later, and in any comparison with to-day’s aspect, there are absolutely no words adequate for the description. Brown, Valentine, p. 155.

While New York was rising into the air, London and the towns of Germany were satisfied with the illusory idea of garden cities: a rural humanity, living idyllically in cottages, served daily by a purgatory of transportation systems.
Corbusier, pp. 36-37.

London is a wide flat pie of redbrick suburbs with the West End stuck in the middle like a currant. New York is a huge rich raisin and is the biggest city I can imagine.
Behan, p. 12.

When it’s three o’clock in New York, it’s still 1938 in London.
Hamann, p. 11.

In Algiers, a single skyscraper will suffice.
In Barcelona, two skyscrapers.
In Antwerp, three skyscrapers.
Corbusier, p. 68.

The opulent shops, with their immense show-windows, remind one of our own boulevards; but the electricity which flows in rivers, and dominates everything, is a thousand times more aggressive than it is with us. Everything seems to vibrate, to crackle… One is himself electrified almost to the point of quivering under the stimulus… The apparitions flash out, move, fade away, quickly, very quickly—so quickly, indeed, that the eye barely follows them. From time to time, some enormous advertisement perched on top of a dark sky-scraper, almost invisible in the murky atmosphere, breaks out into red flame, like a constellation, hammers some name in your memory, and then as quickly vanishes.
Sharpe, p. 198.

The physical changes in the city are even more amazing than the atmosphere changes. All cities alter somewhat in the course of time, but they alter slowly. In Rome we can follow the trend of these alterations through the last two thousand years, a souvenir of every century remains. Medieval Paris has entirely disappeared, and there are comparatively few traces even of the eighteenth century in modern London, but what has happened in the way of demolition and construction in these two cities has happened separately and not unexpectedly. New York on the other hand is in a constant state of mutation. It’s a city conceivably may be compared to a liquid, it may be reasonably said that New York is fluid: it flows.
Van Vechten, p. 137.

It is truly the city of Now.
Atkinson, p. 262.

Out into the sunlight of Fifth Avenue and the Plaza, a gargantuan white chateau rising in the middle of the island like a New Money dream of the Old World.
McInerney, p. 151.

The minarets of Ellis Island.

Morocco, which is contemporary with New York, is not under the sign of the new times.
Corbusier, p. 36.

In New York, precisely because it is so polyglot and international, the walker-writer can turn a corner and imagine being in Prague, say, or Montevideo. [Flâneur] [Psychogeography]
Lopate, Waterfront, p. 200.

You smell brown fog on the East River, even though the sun is burning you in Calcutta or in Singapore.
Reisenberg, p. 188.

A book of verse:
"Under the stone I saw the flow express Times Square at five o’clock eyes set in darkness"
read in a sheepherder’s hut in New South Wales.

[Psychogeography]
Federal Writers, p. 3.

Cosmopolis

The map of Europe is reproduced in New York by the different nationalities living here; each nationality having as neighbor the same that it has in Europe. Thus the Greeks, Turks, Syrians, and Italians are close neighbors in Europe and also here. The same thing applies to the Russians who are neighbors with the Roumanians the Poles the Austrians and the Germans. [Psychogeography]
Bercovici, pp. 52–3.

New York, an immense seaport, is as landlocked for its inhabitants as Moscow.
Corbusier, p. 190.

The Syrian Quarter on the lower west side: Tins of olive-oil with gaudy labels in French and Arabic... water-pipes, their stems tassled in scarlet and bright lemon... Prussian blue... golden-brown taborets inlaid with white woods like ivory... heaps of cream and purple egg-plant and russet pomegranates... big, flat cakes shaped like artists’ palettes or like doughnuts seen in the distortion of a magic mirror, their surfaces dusted with fine seeds... appetizing piles of yellow, white, and pink nougat... rows of glass jars brimming with strange, big seeds—whether used for food or for medicament, I do not know... streamers and foamy pikes of fine-meshed lace... buff earthen oil-jars in the classic form of a Greek amphora... Turkish vases, their enamel an intricate kaleidoscope... Buddhas of glazed pottery or enameled metal in green, tawny-red and gold. The eye grows weary with color.
Irwin, p. 32.

But when I walked out of Malouf’s store, boys were just lighting the paper lanterns for a block dance. Across the street hung a big war poster with famous sayings penned underneath.
As if lit by a huge flying glow-worm, the torch of the Lady of Liberty in bronze pointed to the flitting stars. Dark-eyed men and women returned home, to the Orient from the Occident. Night was coming.
Bercovici, p. 85.
The East Side housewife can within a few blocks shop at will in Italy, Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, or Palestine. The East Side housewife can within a few blocks shop at will in Italy, Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, or Palestine. Conrad, p. 261.

If you ever find yourself on Thirty-fourth Street near Seventh Avenue, don’t fail to hunt up a certain Spanish table d’hote restaurant. This section of New York is like a border town on the lower Pyrenees in France. People speak French with the Spanish accent and Spanish with the singsong of Southern France.

Sitting on the broad steps of the fine old massive brown stone houses of the district, children of old Catalonia, Dons and Doñas from Madrid and Barcelona using a Latinized English all their own exchange stories and opinions with their French neighbors.

Chords struck on a guitar to accompany a subdued voice high colors on the window curtains a mixed odor of garlic incense and heavy-scented perfumes suggest something indefinably Moorish Alhambresque; slow yet passionate like cold fire.

And lo! the mirage vanishes! You are out of the district The modest warm curve of the Orient has disappeared the arrogant cold straight line of the Occident stares at you. You are in the heart of busy old New York. [Sound] [Smell] Bercovici, pp. 22-23.

You hear people talk about the disadvantages of living in New York. Personally, I cannot think of greater happiness than being in this great metropolis if only for the reason that I can be all over Europe in one night. Five cents carfare lands you in the French district. Five more minutes reading of the “Subway Sun” lands you in Hungary; from whence you can tramp in fifteen minutes to Italy or Greece or Turkey, as the spirit moves you, or inclination dictates. You can eat your breakfast in a Russian restaurant on East Fifth Street; have caviar and Bolshevik talk; go for lunch in China, on Mott Street, where they will serve you tea grown on the highest mountain of Asia; for dinner, you can have your choice between Persian, French, Hindu, or Greek menus, and still have the cuisines of a dozen other foreign nationalities to choose from if you are alive the next morning. Ibid., pp. 54.
Manhattan Island

When the rest of the world thinks about New York, they mean about Manhattan. The odds that partygoing Manhattanites are more likely to have dined, drunk, and danced in boîtes in London, Paris, St. Moritz, Miami, and Los Angeles than in Queens, Brooklyn, the Bronx, and Staten Island bounce off the scale.

Manhattanites have a whole xenophobic repertoire to deal with humans who happen to dwell in the outer boroughs. They mock their accents, deplore their dress codes, and have names for them—BBQs (for Brooklyn, Bronx, and Queens), Bridge and Tunnels (for the ways in and out of the city), and 718s (for the Brooklyn and Queens area codes.) In Saturday Night Fever John Travolta’s arrival at Manhattan is depicted as though a Neanderthal were suddenly to find himself stumbling among Homo sapiens, and Melanie Griffith, the commuter from Staten Island in Working Girl, is shown supporting her big hair, leather coat, and lots of jewelry, like the totems of some peculiar tribe.

Haden-Guest, p. 17.

When I say “New York” in these pages, I have to mean “Manhattan Island.” Greater New York is too big to write about. If I were to attempt to include all the other boroughs that make up the city—Queens, Richmond, Brooklyn and the Bronx—I would find myself in trouble… Manhattan is my world; Manhattan is where I was born and raised. When I write about New York, I had better stick to that.

Atkinson, 15.

Beyond Manhattan, the movie city all but dropped off the map: Brooklyn was reduced to a handful of picturesque blocks, while the Bronx, Queens, and Staten Island scarcely existed at all.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 176.

Manhattan is not a decent city. Salt Lake City is a decent city. There is no mad rush of human beings to go to Salt Lake City, either. Unless we carefully define what we mean by the word culture, we cannot seriously say that there is culture in any “decent” city.

And then, again, I think of all the powerful or semi-powerful men and women throughout the world, toiling at one task or another—a store, a mine, a bank, a profession—somewhere outside of New York, whose one ambition is to reach the place where their wealth will permit them to enter and remain in New York, dominant above the mass, luxuriating in what they consider luxury. [Power] Dreiser, p. 4.

Then he came to New York; don’t we all? Douglas, Honesty, p. 73.
C - Antiquity

Prehistoric

The asphalt paves a jungle.
Conrad, p. 287.

when the pavement was grass, when it was swamp, through the age of tusk and mammoth, through the age of silent sunrise
Severini, p. 49.

New York had all the iridescence of the beginning of the world.
Fitzgerald, Crack-up, p 25.

The cockroach and the ginkgo tree are the oldest things on earth.
Lesueur, p. xiv.

The ginkgo rates as a fossil growth—it has gone unchanged for millions of years, and is exactly like specimens found in Paleozoic, Triassic, Jurassic and Tertiary formations.
Berger, New York, p. 95.

Roaches as prehistoric relics.
Bladford, p. 7.

The greatest of cities towers above prehistoric depositories of garnet, beryl, tourmaline, jasper, muscovite, zircon, chrysoberyl, agate, malachite, opal, rose, smoky and milky quartz—even minute veins of gold and of silver.
Berger, New York, p. 54.

By day New York turns to practicality, to the provident tasks of survival. But at night ancient Manhattan comes back as a ghost from a deeper world still living but unwisely forgotten.
Caldwell, p. 353.

The tradition of dumping the grotesque elastic heads worn by Thanksgiving Day parade flankers in the basement of the Museum of Natural History, right alongside stores of brown dinosaur bones and other prehistoric relics.
Berger, New York, p. 112.
He visits the Museum of Natural History to estimate his adversary and sees there the stranded, lumbering skeletons of prehistoric beasts. He wonders at the forces which produced them, the indifference, apparently, with which they had been allowed to die. Nature’s atavistic unconcern about its creatures corresponds to the modern city’s carelessness of its harried inhabitants.

Conrad, p. 178.

Suring the excavations for the Cortlandt Street subway station in 1916, the workers suddenly came across the remains of an old vessel, a ship that arrived from the Netherlands in 1613. Part of the ship obstructing the subway dig was salvaged. The remainder, along with the other old artifacts (a canon ball, tools, pipes, shards) were reburied. Although archeologists were assigned to look for the vessel when the area was excavated again during the construction of the World Trade Center, they were unable to locate the rest of the ship.

In the midst of all this—the wealth of things that have disappeared and the little (or much) that has survived (names, memories, signs)—one presence has survived down the centuries and millennia to the present day. A silent, stern witness to events, it can be touched with a hand. Erupting from the deep, dark heart of the earth, the black, shale rocks that sprout from the green knolls of Central Park, and the clear dolomitic rocks that rub shoulders in the primeval forest at the northernmost extremity of the island, have always been here: they proceeded and accompanied the recent history of natives, the Dutch, the Huguenots, the Africans, the Jews, the English, and the Americans.

Maffi, pp. 9-10.

Leon Trotsky: “Today, not only in peasant homes but also in the city sky-scrappers, there lives alongside the twentieth century the tenth or the thirteenth. A hundred million people use electricity and still believe in the magic power of signs and exorcism.”

Brass, p. 189

I tried. I stared out at the uncountable thousands of windows in the sooty sides of hundreds of buildings, and down at the streets nearly solid with car tops. I tried to turn it back into a rural scene, imagining a man down there with buckles on his shoes and wearing a pigtailed white wig, walking along a dusty country road called the broad way. It was impossible.
Finney, p. 66.

Adam and Eve, naked and panicky, were stumbling across the Brooklyn Bridge away from Manhattan, with a great Godly hand in the sky sternly pointing them the way... There was no reason at all to suppose, looking at this static moment, that Adam and Eve would be stopping on the other side of the East River. Might they not have to wend their way all the way out the L.I.E., into Nassau, and then Suffolk Counties, and thence maybe by ferry into the upper reaches of Connecticut, even Massachusetts?
Pomerance, p. 10.

Bowling Green: a small clearing in the primeval forest.
Bunyan, p. 6.

In ancient New York, everyone shared walls.
Delgiannakis, N. pag.

Antiquity

The first—and only—simulated Greek temple to adorn the city’s skyline sat anachronistically and incongruously atop 50-52 Wall Street. A penthouse of forgotten gods, the structure could best be seen from the air.
Moscow, p. 110.

The Royal Insurance Company Building at 150 William Street (1931) balances a Greek temple on its head, while the Bank of New York at 48 Wall (1929) has for its headdress a copper eagle with upraised wings... The Cunard Building (1921) at 25 Broadway raises the ocean to roof level, setting atop itself a Nereid frisking on sea horse among a ruffled bed of waves.
Conrad, p. 200.

The Standard Oil Building on Lower Broadway: “Two wings extend toward you, like the paws of a sphinx. Over these the tower; topped by a pyramid and a single glorified chimney which streams a plume of smoke line incense, and flanked by four obelisks. The group of which this tower is the crown creates an illusion not uncommon among the building-masses of Manhattan. It seems impossible to believe that one is not beholding a splendid hill-city, like the Acropolis... There is another view of this group even more stirring to the imagination; but to see it as its best, you must pick your day and hour. Some morning when the skies are overcast and the air is perfectly still, go to Telegram Square under the elevated, put your back to the westward walls, and look up again. The tower with its obelisks just peeps above the bizarre elevated structure and the roofs to eastward. All the lower buildings about it are streaming columns of white smoke against the violet-gray skies. It seems then like the exalted altar of some strange rite; an altar beyond the conception of man—raised by the gods to a greater god.”

Irwin, pp. 14-5.

On an upper East Side rooftop in 1956 a Greek nymph, clutching her lyre as she surveys the city: her terrace is a chapel, sacred to a Mediterranean cult of physical delectation.

no.cit.

The slogan on the General Post Office on Eighth Avenue is a mistranslation of Herodotus. Herodotus says: “No snow, nor rain, day’s heat, nor gloom hinders their speedily going on their appointed rounds.” This reference in Herodotus was to Persian couriers who figured in the to-do between the Greeks and the Persians five centuries before Christ. It was translated by William Mitchell Kendall, senior architect for McKim, Meade & White, who designed the building just before WWI as: “NEITHER SNOW, NOR RAIN, NOR HEAT, NOR GLOOM OF NIGHT, STAYS THESE COURIERS FROM THE SWIFT COMPLETION OF THEIR APPOINTED ROUND”’ and boldly added the signature HERODOTUS. The quotation was approved by the Post Office. Kendall, an amateur linguist, combed all the English translations: Rawlinson’s, Macauley’s, Carey’s, but thought they hadn’t quite caught it. (cf. Glanz and Lipton on Tobin’s redacting of Emma Lazarus poem on the Statue of Liberty. [Monument]) [Textuality]

In her 1981 hit song “O Superman,” Laurie Anderson further misquotes Kendall’s mistranslation: Neither snow nor rain / nor gloom of night / shall stay these couriers / from the swift completion / of their appointed rounds.

Anderson, “O Superman.”

A third-rate Babylon.
O’Connell, p. 303.
There were Babylon and Nineveh; they were built of brick. Athens was gold marble columns. Rome was held up on broad arches of rubble. In Constantinople the minarets flame like great candles round the Golden Horn... steel, glass tile, concrete will be the material of the skyscrapers. Crammed on the narrow island the millionwindowdowed buildings will jut glittering, pyramid on pyramid like the white cloudhead above a thunderstorm.

Dos Passos, p. 12.

In our ramble amid the arguments of Abaddon, loud with the disputes of meum and tuum, the wranglings of poverty and wealth, we are lifted by a taut wire a speed without effort and at a moderate charge, to the topmost terraces of Illium, the high stage of this Radian City, the Thirteenth Wonder of an Amusing World.

Reisenberg, p. 92.

In this forest of glass, steel and cement, in this extraordinary New York so difficult to define you will rediscover, O voyager, the gigantic masks of the antique gods, you will rediscover the eternal sadness of the plaster Antinous and the immense solitude of the Pantheon on summer nights, beneath the great sky all streaming with stars.

Fifth Avenue, an Elysian Fields with flags as its foliage.
Conrad, p. 87.

New York as a cemetery of immemorial Titans, whose gravestones are the granite house-tops. [Death]
Conrad, p. 74.

Stained glass panels in the Empire State Building include the Colossus of Rhodes. Chares of Lindus, who designed the massive bronze Colossus in 278 B.C., committed suicide when it far overran its construction budget.
Kingwell, p. 30.

New York is becoming as much a vanished city as Atlantis or the lowest layer of Schliemann’s Troy.
Trager, p. 483.

We will somehow escape Manhattan, fleeing like the last Trojans, in a sailboat, gliding out past the Statue of Liberty. [Apocalypse]
The green and red guide lines in the subway shuttle system stem directly from the legend of Theseus' slaying of the Minotaur in the labyrinth in Crete.

Once Robert remarked that when he got on the Fifth Avenue bus, he felt he was in reality the King of Crete.

Holleran, p. 6.

“Prometheus in Rockefeller Center,” is greeted by an idolatrous crowd: the gilded bringer of fire, having leaped perhaps from the top of the skyscraper above (which is as hubristic as he), lands in the ice rink, and the pirouetting skaters dance for joy on their blades or abase themselves in adoring, humbled heaps.

Conrad, p. 100.

Out on Fifth Avenue, in cold candent light, reflected by the mocking moon, lies Melpomene prostrate before the toes of Atlas, and a grinning Momus sits upon his brazen head.

Reisenberg, p. 92.

For us the city was inevitably linked up with Bacchic diversions, mild or fantastic. We had no incentive to meet the city half way.

Realize that the East and North rivers, with a little assistance from the Harlem Ship Canal, ring Manhattan island exactly as Phlegethon and Cocytus ring Hades, and that we are all of us alive on this island of fallen souls. We entered under Cancer—the island’s sign and must depart under Capricorn, in the cold of the year and the dead of the night.

McCourt, p. 154.

My coming to New York had been a mistake; for whereas I had looked for poignant wonder and inspiration in the teeming labyrinths of ancient streets that twist endlessly from forgotten courts and squares and waterfronts to courts and squares and waterfronts equally forgotten, and in the Cyclopean modern towers and pinnacles that rose blackly Babylonian under waning moons, I had found instead only a sense of horror and oppression which threatened to master, paralyse, and annihilate me.

Joshi, N. pag.
Roman

The great hall of Penn Station: Designed after the Tepidarium of the ancient baths of Caracalla.
Lancaster, p. 63.

Externally, Pennsylvania Station resembled an ancient Roman, Doric temple.
Morris, Incredible. p. 289.

The soot-stained travertine of Penn Station’s interiors, reputed to be the first used in this country, was from quarries in Tivoi employed in buildings the Eternal City. Its mellow, golden cream was used in the Colosseum in the first century A.D. and St. Peter’s 15 centuries later. New York could be called the Mortal Metropolis.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 50.

The raw, massive hole that will become Pennsylvania Station is partially lit by arc lamps, partially plunged into a deep darkness punctuated by a raging fire around which huddle minute workers in the bottom of the pit. Like a battlefield at night, the scene gives evidence of a terrible and costly struggle; it is by turns garish, gloomy, infernal.
Sharpe, p. 187.

The station, as he entered it, was murmurous with the immense and distant sound of time. Great, slant beacons of muted light felt ponderously athwart station’s floor and the calm voice of time hovered along the wall and ceiling of the mighty room, distilled out of the voices and movements of the people who swarmed beneath. It had the murmur of a distant sea, the languorous laps and flow of waters on the beach. It was elemental, detached, indifferent to the lives of men. They contributed to it as drops of rain contribute to a river that draws its flood and movement majestically from great depths, out of purple hills at evening.

Few buildings are fast enough to hold the sound of time, and... there was superb fitness and the fact that the one which held better than all the others should be a railroad station. For here, as nowhere else on earth, men were brought together for a moment at the beginning or end of their new memorable journeys, here one saw their greetings and farewell, here in a single instant, one got the entire picture of human destiny. Then came and went, they passed and vanished, all were moving through the moments of their lives to death, all made small tickings of the sound of their lives of time—but the voice of time remained aloof and unperturbed, a drowsy and internal murmur below the immense and distant roof. [Time] [Light] [Weather] Wolfe, You Can’t, p. 43.

If you can forget the spindling steel pillars supporting the outer runways of the Brooklyn Bridge, these odd cave-shops have a Roman sturdiness, a very simple beauty of proportionate building grown ripe with use. They much resemble, indeed, the dwellings of the Theater of Marcellus in Rome over which the New York tourist raves, in ignorance that we have almost a replica at home. [Simulacrum] Irwin, p. 73.

The Judson Church is a cream-colored variant of Santa Maria Cosmedin. Irwin, p. 117.

The window panels of the Cornell Medical Centre are deliberately modeled after the Palace of the Popes. Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 66.

He likens the New York skyline to that of San Gimignano. Conrad, p. 75.

Looking down on the electric luminosity at midnight, undulating stream of blue and grey and frosty white as the tonalities of Venice. But it's a Venice gone wrong, dessicated and petrified, a Venice of receded seas, a spun-steel Venice, sans hope, sans faith, sans vision. Ibid. p. 73.

Huneker's heroine imagines New York as a stony Venice, from which the seas have despairingly receded. De Casseres liquefies it again and believes it to be afloat on an ocean of alcohol. He nicknames it a Booze Venice and dubs its main thoroughfare the Great Tight Way.
The streets turn into rivers of molten tar, like a Venice from hell, with crazed cabdrivers careening like possessed gondoliers.

SoHo was supposed to be a Venice of the New World.
[Downtown]
Anderson & Archer, p. 13.

The past, even the immediate past, in New York is organized more or less like the cemetery in Venice: The skeletons are buried and then, after a dozen years, dug up and evicted and thrown onto a second island in a mixed-up heap of remembrance. New Yorkers live on that second island and sort through crazy heaps of memory to find a past. There are compensations for our indifference, though. Freed from its connection to its origins, the past has more carry. [Dream City]
Gopnik, p. 109.

In 1905, the story went around of two strangers meeting in the city: “What do you know of New York?” said one wanderer to another. “Only what I have read in Dante,” was the bleak reply.
Sharpe, p. 201.

Later, Isabel Bishop would paint Dante and Virgil in Union Square (1932).
Ibid., p. 201.

Leonardo da Vinci would turn subways into pipe galleries and transport tunnels for dry rubbish, instead of human beings. He would start at Houston Street and level the blocks between Second and Third avenues, with a park space in the center, and, young-thinking Leonardo, ages ahead of the experts, would cut down blocks of crosstown houses, at suitable intervals, making true express streets and subsurface parking areas, plus grass parks with benches.
[Surreal]
Reisenberg, p. 71.

A 1919 view of the Cortlandt Street ferry from the Jersey shore uses the interior of the ferry house with its chains and pulleys as a Piranesian vault, a carious, overgrown prison which consumes the Manhattan skyline across the river.
Then there are fastidious people from up-town, some of them bringing with them thoughts and half memories, dim and splendid, of things they had seen in Rome and Greece, in many a noble little Italian town, and in the mysterious and race trodden homes of men in the Orient.

Hapgood, pp. 369-71.

Roman dungeons or attic walls of Montmartre propped against the Seventh Avenue sidewalk outside of the Met.
Morris, Manhattan '45, p. 203.

Today Long Island makes better rope than the Romans did.
Simpich, p. 281.

Today there are new symbols for a new age. The modern traveler, fed on frozen flight dinners, enters the city, not in Roman splendor, but through the bowels of a streamline concrete bird, as a Tran World Airline’s Kennedy International Airport terminal. Classical columns are replaced by catenary curves. (Reminiscent of Vincent Scully’s remark about the new Penn Station: “One entered the city like a god. One scuttles in now like a rat.”)

Huxtable, History, p. 50.

Gothic, Medieval

As one walks north from the Battery, one moves through and beyond a medieval street plan, one populated in our time by skyscrapers.
Bender, p. xvi.

Broadway looked so medieval
It seemed to flap, like little pages
Television, “Venus.”

We have not, in a modern city like Brooklyn, such marked specimens of magnificent architecture as the ancient or mediaeval cities, many of whose ruins yet remain.
Christman, p. 57.

Steely New York has a Gothic cellarage.
Conrad, p. 288.

A five-room furnished suite at a luxurious hotel, its walls practically invisible under her aggregated Vermeers, Rembrandts and Italian primitives. These were indisputably more authentic than her Scotch and gin. A "little Gothic nest" high up in the Ritz Tower.

Morris, Incredible, p. 297.

In the twenties, an age that was celebrating the lightness of being, the medieval was still popular, and many of the social elite abandoned their town houses for the twelfth floor of an apartment house, only to expend great effort in the elaboration of vaulted vestibules, stone arches, and Gothic stairways. They were still seeking the reassurance of the heavy and permanent, albeit encased in the steel skeleton of a fifteen-story skyscraper. [Simulacrum]

Hawes, N. pag.

Maybe there is no city left, and these familiar comedies of density are busy parts of a soon-to-be consigned past; we are in a Brueghel painting and not wise enough to know it yet. New York, which was lost, and then found, and then lost again, only to be found again, at least for now, may be as doomed as the dodo no matter what we do or whom we do it for.

Gopnik, p. 293.

The Macy Parade is moving between the cliffs and buildings; its great helium-filled giants... its dragons and nameless monsters blot out the sky, held to earth by medieval soldiers and fairly-tale characters.

no.cit.

Egyptian

From the ruins, lonely and inexplicable as the sphinx, rose the Empire State Building.

Fitzgerald, Jazz, p. 28.

I glimpsed the Queensborough Bridge as if through a haze or smoke, first an edge, then the top—but which I now suddenly saw whole! It was a PYRAMID, the real thing, resembling those the Egyptians built. Not the mightiest, perhaps, but undoubtedly the last of all the pyramids erected on earth.

Lobas, p. 91.

The Triborough Bridge. Its anchorages, the masses of concrete in which its cables would be embedded, would be as big as any pyramid built by an Egyptian Pharaoh, its roadways wider than the widest roadways built by the Caesars of Rome.

Caro, p. 386.

The anchorage of the Hell’s Gate Bridge: “Immense things they are, beside the Nile they would pass for pyramids.”

Ibid., p. 397.

The Brooklyn Bridge’s pylons were conceived in the style of the gateways to the temples at Edfu and elsewhere along the River Nile.

Moorhouse, p. 22.

The whole of it stretched out and illuminated by the silvery gray light of the afternoon. I had never seen New York from such a vantage point. Its skyscrapers became minarets, it seemed to float on a low-lying mist. It was Baghdad.

Myers, pp. 73-74.

In 1904, O. Henry began characterizing New York as “Baghdad-on-the-Subway.”

Fitzpatrick, Subway, p. 5

American Indian, Archeological

Here is the last survival of prehistoric man (brought from his habitat in Lodi, New Jersey).

Reisenberg, 154.

The Telephone Building and all its brothers on Manhattan seem descendants from the very earliest native school of architecture. The building is only a sophisticated and glorified version of the old Southwestern Indian pueblo. Except for some remnants in Acoma, Sister of the Eagle, only two exemplars of that style survive—the twin pueblos at Taos.

The Summer House at Taos might have suggested this building, as Strasbourg Cathedral probably suggested the Woolworth Building. In cold fact, the two styles have no historical connection. Adaption to use is the first law of successful architecture. The Indian pueblo builders raised their structures high because they must needs huddle for defense against raiding enemies; the New Yorker, because he must get all he can out of the most expensive land in the world. The Indian narrowed each successive story partly because he had not found how to build a frame for a square, multi-storied structure, and partly because he wanted sun-balconies for each apartment; the American, because he wanted light in the lower windows. Perhaps, however, one common subtler influence moved them both. As artists, they may have felt rather than perceived that this form harmonizes somehow with the shrewd, violent light of the American continent. But there it is, the accidental culmination of that art which budded in the Mesa Verde caves before Christ was born.

Irwin, p. 19.

The Manhattan Savings Bank at Madison Avenue and Forty-seventh Street is offering in its lobby this week authentically garbed Puritan choristers against a seventeenth-century New England setting, singing Thanksgiving music. The solo is, a pretty contralto in Indian maiden garb is Hoté-Mawe, a Cherokee. She sings ancient traditional dawn and sunset songs, the butterfly dance, the happy song of her tribe and a moving invocation to the sun god, all against the background clink of coins going into and out of, the tellers' cages.

Berger, New York, p. 300.

On razing Madison Square Garden in 1925: “There is probably no other nation in the world which could lament a thirty-year-old building as an ancient relic of a forgotten age.”

Aycock, p. 164.

No place for antiquarians. There are no ruins, and never will be. They would be too costly. New York is exactingly different because it insists that you live precisely in the present, with all your capacities stretched to the limit.

Brook, p. 285.

Those places are fragments still remaining, of days which once lay out there as real as the day lying out there now: still-surviving fragments of a clear April morning of 1871, a gray winter afternoon of 1840, a rainy dawn of 1793.

Finney, p. 67.
In the real country, far from other people and the cozy hum of electric generators and the clatter of traffic, I am often frightened. The nights are impossibly dark, and the animal noises from the deep woods where coyotes chase rabbits and owls pick off their prey terrify me. Nature in the country is not so cute. I listen to something howling in the trees on the other side of a flimsy cottage wall, and I feel utterly defenseless. I long for the safety of the city, where nature is so beautifully and spectacularly kept on a leash. I long for Manhattan, where my door is locked at night and the noises are the comforting human noises of car and crowds.

Astonishing city free of microbes and captive elephants.

It’s difficult to see in the Manhattan of today any trace of that primeval island. But not impossible. Perhaps the place to start is with a pair of trees: two gaunt pines growing close together, just west of Broadway, in the south graveyard of Trinity Church. Almost hidden in the corner between the walls of the church and the sacristy, they’re nearly always in shadow. But at the right time, seen from the right vantage point, they make it possible to imagine the island of the Lenape and the earliest Dutch, surviving spectrally amidst four centuries of development.

Standing at the corner of Broadway and Rector Street on a clear late winter afternoon, these pines loom starkly against the brown stones of the church. The steeple rises above, and above that an expanse of sky. When darkness falls, the pines sink gradually into the shadows between the church and attached chapel, the spire and the buttress in sharp relief behind. Ignore the skyscrapers (easily done from there) and you see something what would have been there in 1700. In darkness the brownstone church loses its shape: imagine it gone (the original church opened in 1697), multiply the pines in your imagination, and you see it as it was even in 1650—a graveyard, among the earliest in New Amsterdam.

Caldwell, p. 10.

When most Americans think about environmentalism, they picture wild, unspoiled landscapes—the earth before it was transmogrified by human habitation. New York City is one of the most thoroughly altered landscapes imaginable, an almost wholly artificial environment, in which the terrain’s primeval contours have long since been obliterated and most of the parts that resemble nature (the trees on side streets, the rocks in Central Park) are essentially decorations.

Owen, p. 11.

The last relics of the a primeval forest that blanketed Manhattan when the white man first arrived survive precariously on forty acres along the Bronx River gorge in the South Bronx. The trees, stately Canadian hemlocks, rise on one of the few sites in the nation that have never been logged. The virgin forest dates back to the end of the Ice Age some 20,000 years ago.

Moscow, p. 125.

In the stoniest pavement of the city there are cracks. And out of the bleakest soil, between these cracks, a few blades of grass will sooner or later show, whose seeds are borne by the birds; here, even, the germ of a tree will take root and spring up, if no foot disturbs it.

A city is not a tree.

Kittler, p. 720.

The New York I lived in, on the other hand, was rapidly regressing. It was a ruin in the making, and my friends and I were camped out amid its potsherds and tumuli. This did not distress me—quite the contrary. I was enthralled by decay and eager for more: ailanthus trees growing through cracks in the asphalt, ponds and streams forming in leveled blocks and slowly making their way to the shoreline, wild animals returning from centuries of exile. Such a scenario did not seem so far-fetched then. Already in the mid-1970s, when I was a student at Columbia, my windows gave out onto the plaza of the School of International Affairs, where on winter nights troops of feral dogs would arrive to bed down on the heating grates. Since then the city had lapsed even further. On Canal Street stood a five-story building empty of human tenants that had been taken over from top to bottom by pigeons. If you walked east on Houston Street from the Bowery on a summer night, the jungle growth of vacant blocks gave a foretaste of the impending wilderness, when lianas would engird the skyscrapers and mushrooms would cover Times Square.
Sante, “My Lost City,” N. pag.

There were vacant lots everywhere, sometimes whole blocks of them, and occasionally, a farm or a farmhouse. There were working railroad tracks below Riverside, from which the smell of the cattle en route to market would rise with the eastern wind. There were barnyard animals and apple trees that bloomed in May at the corner of 79th and Broadway, on the farm on the Astor property. Above 125th Street, agricultural tracts, interspersed with roadhouses and beer gardens, where Sunday cyclists downed schooners of beer for five cents.

Hawes, N. pag.

A southern view from Sherman Square, at 72nd Street, taken in 1897, shows how lush and carefully tended the middle islands of Broadway are—the grass as thick and even as a lawn, the flowerbeds enclosed in ornate stone planters.

Ibid.

Where Canal Street cut west of Broadway, meadows were flooded by the evening tide.

Ibid.

In the old days when this whole seething turbulent spot was quiet meadows sloping to the East River.

Campbell, Darkness, p. 89

The Bronx between Claremont Parkway and Bronx Park has known Hirsh Roth of the firm of Hirsh Roth & Co., wholesale and retail liquor dealers for the last twenty years. He was there a believer in the Bronx when it was yet all rocks and farms with a few scattered wooden shacks. He was there when the downtown people moved to the Bronx because the doctor said they needed country air and higher ground.

Bercovici, p. 186.

The fuss and hubbub over the sites for the Lincoln Center for Performing Arts, for a Fordham University campus and for a Lincoln Square housing project would have been way beyond the wildest imagining of the husbandmen and gentlemen farmers who settled the area almost 300 years ago.

They could not have dreamed that their Bloemendaal (Dutch version) or Blooming Dale (later English form) their Valley of the Flowers—would one day be a tight and untidy huddle of weathered brownstones and decaying tenements swarming with contending hosts of middle-class and impoverished city dwellers.

Eighteenth and nineteenth-century visitors and guidebook scribblers thought that the Valley of the Flowers, with its lush gardens, fruit orchards, great-girthed elms and dreamy views of the lordly Hudson, was one of the loveliest spots on earth.

Frances Trollope drove the five miles from City Hall in 1831 to visit with gentry who had summer homes there. She wrote later: “Hardly an acre of Manhattan but shews some pretty villas or stately mansions... Among these perhaps, the loveliest is one situated in the beautiful Village of Bloomingdale.”

Dutch farmers broke Lincoln Square soil and ran ox-drawn plows across Indian trails down to the Hudson as early as 1660. Indians and mynheers alike found monster oysters, giant lobsters, sturgeon, shad and crabs. There was good hunting, too.

Flocks of passenger pigeons would virtually shut out the sky some days. Foxes, wolves and bear roamed the woods. Blooming Dale made ideal country seats for English squires who owned great numbers of slaves. Silver streams, branches of the Great Kill that came in at Forty-second Street, were alive with fish.

The squires hunted wild foxes, raised blooded horses; lived pretty much as they had in Merrie England—until the American Revolution. The war tore neighbors apart. James Delancey’s Bloomingdale farm was burned by patriots. After the war it went, at auction, to John Somerindyke.

The Reign of Terror in France brought royal refugees into the area. Mme. D’Auliffe, lady-in-waiting to Marie Antoinette, built a French cottage near Broadway, a half-mile above Lincoln Square. She and her daughters entertained Talleyrand there and Louis-Phillipe, King of France. Louis-Phillipe taught school in Bloomingdale in 1799.

Edgar Allan Poe wrote “The Raven” in Bloomingdale’s upper reaches. George Pope Morris’ “Woodman, Spare That Tree” flowed from his pen in Bloomingdale after he and an unidentified “old gentleman” on a walk in the Flowery Vale had paid $10 between them to persuade a woodcutter to swing his axe at some lesser giant than the primitive elm he had set his heart upon.

The area’s loveliness was doomed from about 1825 when J. L. Norton, William De Peyster and others of the gentry allowed the City Fathers to put the first streets through. In 1826 a stoneyard was built on the lovely river bank between Fifty-eighth and Sixtieth Streets. Squatters filtered in during the Fifties.

Hip-to-hip brownstones and cobbled pavement hid a good part of the Valley of Flowers by 1885, although there were still some wide spaces in and around Lincoln Square. The gentry's family gravestones were kicked over in the frenzied population push that came with the subway cut-through around 1904. Then new theatres threw their brazen lights, but they were death candles. The area turned slummy.

Now the Valley of the Flowers will change again. Metropolitan Opera stars will lift their voices where the larks sang. Fordham undergraduates will walk green sod where the crude plow and the ringing axe echoed three centuries ago. [Ancient] [Primeval]

Berger, New York, pp. 252-3.

Skyscrapers as tendril-covered shoots bursting from urban soil.

Sharpe, p. 228.

Plants sprouting from a brick cliff beneath Tudor City.
Conrad, p. 175.

Palms may soon sprout in Central Park. The climate of New York may be undergoing change.
Reisenberg, p. 185

Washington Square, Gramercy Park, Madison Square, Tompkins Square are all located on one-time swamps.

A short distance to the west, and formerly in the densest woods, is the location of a veritable freak of nature, the mysterious Black Swamp, in whose dreaded and notorious waters, feared since the days of the Indians, so many blooded cattle have met their death. For the longest time this marsh defied all efforts to fill it up. Thousands of tons of earth and rock would be dumped into its deep maw. Success was apparently in sight, but when the next day dawned all would have disappeared as if by magic, leaving only the dark waters in sight, smiling in the morning sun. Human persistence backed by more thousands of tons of material, at last proved triumphant, and now Morris Avenue reigns supreme.

Topography

The city had crystallized itself, had set itself. The sky was different... The people were etched with a sharper acid.
Douglas, p. 59.

The largest garnet crystal ever found in the U.S.A. came out of a ditch on West 35th Street, and for some time was used as a doorstep.
Granick, p. 17.

I do like stones to be covered with moss or ivy and that, in consequence, Paris round the Arc de Triomphe de l’Etoile really repels me. The stones of New York are no less machine-sawn, hard and antiseptically resistant to the growth of lichen. [Empire] [Europe]
Ford, America, p. 108.

"Is there any danger of Manhattan sinking under the weight of its skyscrapers?" we asked Mr. Alfred Rheinstein, our favorite New York builder. He says not, since what is put onto the earthy usually weigh less than what has been taken out.
Josephy, p. 64.

The red sandstone for Manhattan’s brownstones was mined at Sneden’s Landing, a very private and small community along the Hudson just twelve miles north of the George Washington Bridge. Residents included Orson Welles, Noël Coward, John Dos Passos, John Steinbeck, Aaron Copland and Jerome Robbins.
Gooch, p. 241.

He sketched a stone he had picked up in Central Park. It already had the shape of a skull.
Conrad, p. 148.

Framed in the spirit that called for "the conquest of nature" instead of an accommodation between nature and man, he preferred to iron out the hills of Manhattan by force rather than attempt to blend them into the contexture of a more habitable city. [Robert Moses]
Federal Writers, p. 405.

"There aren’t any mountains in Manhattan," she points out.
“Tall buildings,” he replies.
“Same thing.”
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 359.

Where Broadway stood, a rocky ridge once ran diagonally up across the island like a sash. [cf. Struabenmüller, “The ridge of rock running in the general direction of Broadway is the backbone of the island.” [Body] [City as Body])
Hawes, N. pag.

Momentarily he is gazing straight along Broadway. It slashes the building-mass clean and sheer and narrow, suggesting infinite heights and mysteries. Man, you would say, had nothing to do with it; the hand of nature, working through eons, eroded this gorge.
Irwin, p. 39.

In New York City 690 men and women are employed in the “extraction of minerals.”
Conrad, p. 249.

From Park Avenue at 93rd Street, Manhattan drops away in geologic, economic, and spiritual degrees. On that spot the city’s ancient bedrock rises to one of its highest points. To the west shine the sycamores in the park and the Eldorado’s lights. Southward lies the magisterial city, flanking the broad, solemn avenue with Harry Helmsley’s flashing gilding at its foot. To the east there is a hill banded by the gray river; as you descend it, the granite facades become brownstone and then red brick and yellow, and the doormen and fine food shops disappear.
Trebay, p. 226.

A 1932 photograph of Rockefeller Center under construction: “The aged and weathered, almost fleshly formations of rock are gouged out and carted away, to be supplanted by the riveted skeletal steel of the rising buildings.”
Conrad, p. 167.

Long stretches of road it’s like the Bowery or Broadway actually retracting ancient trails atop the summit of hills (later level down in the wake of property speculation), over water meadows and marshlands. [Primeval]
Maffi, p. 4.

The skyscrapers of New York and Chicago are made of stone and not of glass. Whole quarries have been fastened to their steel skeletons by means of cramps, quarries suspended in empty space. It is inconceivable. I thought that I would find an erect city of steel. Not at all! It is a city of stone.

Corbusier, p. 66.

Gleaming richery exploding out of the ground. Curtained glass and radiant jewels.

Donleavy, N. pag.

The many faces of Jesse James resplendent on a rock at Spuyten Duyvil.

Berrigan, p. 92.

Jumping off a high rock on the north side into the currents of Spuyten Duyvil and letting the currents carry you across to Manhattan.

Trebay, p. 350.

The bottom of Spuyten Duyvil is manmade and endless, dredged in the earliest years of the century as the Harlem ship channel. No one ever hit it. The motorboats that thud across the surface now are like bugs on a pond.

Ibid. p. 350.

Flora

Probably the most active farm in New York City lies, incongruously, in the East River. It is on Riker’s Island, and is worked by men from the city’s penitentiary and workhouse.

The farm by 1930, with the accumulations of city waste dumped on its margins has grown to about 500 acres.

Last year, felon farmers raised 10,895 pounds of chickens and gathered 5,917 dozen eggs; they brought in a vegetable crop that came to 59,315 pounds. They’ve grown 75,000 trees for the Park Department and 70,00 flowering shrubs. They have a sizable peach orchard—268 trees—and get a crop from that, too.

The farm output is for city institution kitchens, mostly for city prisons. The bakery on the island turned out over 2 million loaves last year from prisons and public school lunch rooms. [Prison]

Berger, New York, p. 156.
Prisoner work farms on Riker's Island in the 1930s. A sixty-acre farm cultivated by prisoners is being steadily enlarged; the renowned prison piggery produces more than fifty thousand pounds of pork every year.

New York is pastoral only to those who are out of work.

Conrad, p. 171.

One penthouse hostess offered her dinner guests the novelty of corn harvested from her "little farm" on the thirty-second floor.

Morris, Incredible p. 297.

Pump-house crews eat from a vegetable garden in Central Park: tomatoes, lettuce, sweet fennel, fresh scallions, and cucumbers.

The Bronx has had its own Johnny Appleseed for fifty-four years. He has planted fig trees, peach trees, finochio, hot peppers, sweet peppers, miniature tomatoes, eggplant, beets, corn, lettuce, long squash, round squash, garlic, onions, string beans, carrots, basil, Swiss chard.

He has sown seeds of his own all these years. He has grafted apples onto pears, pears onto apples. He has preserved enough each fall to feed himself, his wife, his two sons, his daughters and sons-and-daughters-in-law and their five children. He has kept his neighbors in fruits and vegetables. He toils from sunup to sundown. He is a contented man.

The garlic shakes when the Pelham trains rumble by. If he passes an empty lot, he stops dead and his eyes come alive. He always says: "There is a sin."

He kept saying: "Where is the grass? Where will I keep my chickens? Puta madre! There is no grass?"

Hughes, Big Sea, p. 80.

I stared out over a strange astonishing view of farm after tiny farm clear to the Hudson.

Finney, p. 176.

Here they are—the farmers and livestock raisers beside the elegant Dakota doing their chores, the kids playing, the animals foraging for whatever they could find among patches of half-melted snow.
The last Manhattan farm ceases operations at the corner of Broadway and 213th Street in 1930.
Trager, p. 456.

New York is sad before it is busy, it is a kind of inverted garden, with all the flowers blooming down in the basements.
Gopnik, p. 110.

synthetic avenues, streets, and gardens gardens that grow shit plastic trees and phony grass
Last Poets, “NY, NY.”

The world’s smallest garden in a three-room flat in Brooklyn. Planted lemon seeds, orange seeds, grapefruit seeds, podocarp, ardisia, and begonias in toothpaste-tube caps and thimbles. Watering is done with an eye-dropper; main garden tools are a razor-blade and toothpick.
Berger, New York, p. 240.

There is a green world high above the pavement that city groundlings rarely see. Familiar and exotic growths flourish in this sky acreage. The same birds, insects and crawling things that invade open countryside plantings climb to apartment house and skyscraper gardens—as high as thirty-eight floors at Radio City—to rob or destroy crops...
The Schwartzes, like most other crow’s-nest horticulturists, grow thousands of annuals and perennials. They put their fruits and berries up in jars. They fight off crows, woodpeckers, bats, pigeons, aphids, tent caterpillars and go after all sorts of crawlers with spray guns. They grow magnificent orchids. Their pet dachshund, Penny, cremated, sleeps inside a miniature grave fence under an olive tree... The Rooftop Gardeners eat under whispering leaves with flower scent drifting across their candlelit tables. Some sleep in their gardens, under the stars. Some have forsaken the country entirely; just live on their green roofs.
Ibid. pp. 254-5.

A housewife from the Jacob Riis projects favors tropical zebra plants from Woolworth’s.
Trebay, p. 215.
The East Village, on 9th Street at Avenue D, on 8th Street farther west, in lots tucked up between tenements and fenced off from the debris, is alive with produce: lettuce leaves, collard from the sun and rats, grows in one plot beneath a stuffed sock-monkey effigy. On a stake in another patch, a plastic hobby horse is impaled: he snorts mid-air over a plot of beans.

A local witch grows medicinal herbs in her 6BC plot.

In the Channel Gardens in Rockefeller, Swiss chard, broccoli, carrots and sweet corn were growing as Victory Gardens. Two hundred tomato plants grew in beds along the rim overlooking the Lower Plaza skating rink.

Diehl, p. 151.

The exit of the BMT subway in Brooklyn Heights is guarded by an old church made of red flagstones and surrounded by a heavy black iron gate. Imprisoned behind these gates are five bushes I remember from my childhood, bushes so ugly that you would wonder why they had been planted at all, until one spring day when they blossomed into thousands of yellow flowers called forsythia. As I emerged from the subway my monochrome vision suddenly registered yellow; all five bushes were bursting with flowers. I couldn't understand it. It was midwinter and freezing. Snow was still on the ground.

Wornov, p. 221.

Once the tree tips and the eaves of roofs met, their height equal, and they would lend an extra quality to each other like two friends, two women meeting to share the substance and bake a cake: like a woman just about to take a bath, like a woman always just about to be refreshed, oh like moonlight on snow it was then, like furnaces pouring out their plentitude of heat to the iced streets, and birds nestling between the rows of houses and warm bars, and warm feelings.

Coleman, p. 207.

A tree in a treepot in Times Square has to make oxygen for a million people. In New York you really do have to hustle, and the trees know this, too—just look at them. The other day on 57th Street, I was walking and I was looking at the new, sloping Solow building across the street and I walked straight into a treepot. I was embarrassed because there was no way at all to carry it off. It just fell on top of this tree on West 57th Street because I wasn’t ready for it to be there.

Television aerials look like pruned and spiky saplings, sunning themselves in the hope that they too may grow.

Conrad, p. 175.

Flags look like a vegetative outgrowth on the dour stone of the buildings.

The leafbud stragglies forth toward the frigid light of the airshaft

Below the shops in Madison Square Park a lone tree stood in the darkness, a happy beacon; then comparative loneliness and unlighted windows to a point below Fourteenth Street.

Plants grew pale and died in the air-shaft window.

There are no trees in the city! That is the way it is.
Corbusier, p. 71.

Even plants hardy enough to thrive in a thin bed of city dust and soot need watering.
Brennan, p. 32.

New Yorkers who lash each other using twigs of birch and premature chrysanthemums—with the means of sensual arousal and of chastisement.
Conrad, p. 198.

Gasoline or vibration or both combine hereabout to blight all vegetable life; the scattered trees of Bryant Park are very sick.
Irwin, p. 196.

There isn’t much vegetation here, apart from packets of marijuana.
Brook, p. 12.
Electric glamour of tree boughs.
Galwey, p. 421.

The Hamptons: Manhattan with pruned and pristine trees and aquamarine pools.
Blandford, p. 183.

Doubtless Connecticut is magnificent right now in its plump vermillion and yellow plumage, but so too is Central Park.
Ibid. p. 120.

One need never leave the confines of New York to get all the greenery one wishes—I can’t even enjoy a blade of grass unless I know there’s a subway handy, or a record store or some other sign that people do not totally regret life.
O’Hara, p. 197.

A block or two west of the new City of Man in Turtle Bay there is an old willow tree that presides over an interior garden. It is a battered tree, long suffering and much climbed, held together by strands of wire but beloved of those who know it. In a way it symbolizes the city: life under difficulties, growth against odds, sap—rise in the midst of concrete, and the steady reaching for the sun. Whenever I look at it nowadays, and feel the cold shadow of the planes, I think: “This must be saved, this particular thing, this very tree.” If it were to go, all would go—this city, this mischievous and marvelous monument which not to look upon would be like death.
White, Here, p. 56.

No tree was to be seen, but as if by a miracle little heaps of twigs and blown leaves gathered in the gutters.

The rocky base of Manhattan, always unkind to live, steadily lost its filament of soil. The trees in the streets became more infrequent as the city grew; and their leaves grew sear before autumn came... while only the ailanthus tree, quick growing and lean living, kept the back yards occasionally green, to gladden the lonely young men and women from the country, who faced their first year in the city from hall bedrooms on the top-floor rear of unamiable boardinghouses.
Mumford, Empire, p. 22.

Ailanthus trees, the Tree of Heaven. [Cosmic]
We were fascinated to learn that a skyscraper may contain the following exotic woods, whose very names would make a Kipling poem if they could be rhymed up a bit: Satinwood from San Domingo; Makassar ebony from the Dutch East Indies; bubingo wood from South America; English gray harewood; padouk from the British East Indies; avodire from the French Congo; East Indian rosewood; Australian sandalwood; Brazilian burl; and South African madrone.

Woolworth heiress Barbara Hutton turns 18, November 1930. Debut ball at Ritz-Carlton Hotel, whose first floor has been transformed with white birches, eucalyptus trees from California, mountain heather, scarlet poinsettias, and 10,000 American beauty roses (workmen have labored for 2 days and nights to create the opulent bower).

Here, the flowers themselves have forgotten nature, and enter heartily into the artifices of a sophisticated society.

Often enough city roses are attached to a padlocked chain.

As far as I can tell, the rose bush outside the brick apartment house at 305 Madison Avenue has no official affiliation.

At this moment it is a red rose giving its voluptuousness all to the residents of Chinatown.

Daniel Coetzee recently took charge of the Jefferson Market Library garden, where some of the rose bushes are nearly 20 years old, practically ancient in New York.

Perhaps New York City itself is an unexpected place for a rose, but they seem to thrive here in lots reclaimed from pulverized rubble, dumped tires, auto parts, and in soil fertilized with shredded bread wrappers, condoms, and poison-green puddles of antifreeze.
Outside a tenement in the East 80s, for instance, there's a leggy, cascading Golden Shower; by a Chelsea stoop, a rare Zepherine Drouhin; in a rigidly tasteful Greenwich Village commons, an example of Aloha; and not far from the Claremont stables on West 89th Street, I once spotted an unidentifiable climber—possibly the old-fashioned white named Dr. Van Fleet—that looked fat and happy, maybe from a diet of rotted manure.

Girls tittering in a nickelodeon are a bouquet, an untended growth garnered from the arboreal paradise which was the impressionist city.

Conrad, p. 114.

Fauna

It is a city with cats sleeping under parked cars, two stone armadillos crawling up St. Patrick's Cathedral, and thousands of ants creeping on top of the Empire State Building.

Talese, p. 2.

It's the Bronx. It has woods, deer, fish, muskrats, possum, owls, snakes.

Donleavy, N. pag.

You can swim in the rivers without fear of disease, and even swim at night with the seals in the Prospect Park Zoo. You can trust the oysters from Long Island Sound.

Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

If you were to take a wild lion or a tiger or a hippopotamus or an elephant and force it to ride the New York subways in rush hour every day for a week, the poor creature would have a nervous breakdown.

Atkinson, pp. 18-19.

Sometimes a bewildered cat or dog gets into the Lincoln Tunnel. Occasionally a duck or hen falls from a poulterer's truck. The inspector remembered when a steer dropped off a cattle truck in the tunnel.

A clowder of some sixty to seventy semi-wild cats, mostly tiger-topped and white-bellied, prowls the yards and fences back of the chip-faced brownstones on the north side of Fifty-first Street between Eighth and Ninth Avenues. The block legend is that the cluster never leaves the yards, that it has lived there sixty years or so. All the cats have six claws on each paw. Weird, primitive thing to run into so near Times Square.

A six-month-old civet cat, who had escaped from his cage at the antelope house, was captured in the service entrance of Bergdorf Goodman store, at Fifty-eighth Street and Fifth Avenue. He ducked through the wheels of a victoria and crossed Fifty-ninth Street. He swept passed the Plaza Hotel, over Fifty-eighth Street, and headed for the entrance of Bergdorf Goodman. The cat doubled back and sped down the service entrance to the store.

Peyton, p. 11.

Ladies screamed and ran in all directions this morning at eleven thirty when a big snake crawled out of a crack in the masonry of the retaining wall of the reservoir at Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street and started to cross the sidewalk.

Dos Passos, p. 19.

Out of the subway grilles a plethora of snakes filled the sidewalks.

Mueller, p. 247.

The stuff from which Confusion Dust is made does not grow on bushes in Central Park and they will lock you up if you try to steal the snakes in the Reptile House in the Bronx.

At 608 West Forty-eighth Street you can rent a lion for $250 a day.

Talese, p. 48.

In this delicious sweltering fatigue, New York seems almost pastoral. He expects a flock of sheep to turn the corner. (cf. Jacob Wrey Mould’s sheepfold in Central Park; “Moses getting tired of waiting for the sheep to cross the streets on his drives through [Central Park].”)

Conrad, p. 197.
We have to get to sheep fast before maggots get to them. Dead sheep have a horrible odor, much worse than horses.
Talese, p. 80.

A city is a place where you are least likely to get a bite from a wild sheep.
Behan, p. 12.

Fifth Avenue and 91st Street in 1901: wild game, wandering goats, and a clear blue horizon.
Hawes, N. pag.

the centre of the wholesale fur trade, starred with teepees of ermine and peopled with foxes, the ground dotted with deer-skins—white with white spots

In 1999 a carriage horse was electrocuted when it stepped on a Con Ed cover near Park Avenue.
Jones & Yaniv, N. pag.

Each week an average of four horses will drop dead in the city.
Talese, p. 79.

This decline of the horse removed one especially potent experience of monstrosity in the city—that of seeing and smelling dead horses in the street (15,000 were worked to death in 1900 alone, dying in the street). The smell of a dead old horse in the night air was said to be appalling...
“When a horse died, its carcass would be left to rot until it had disintegrated enough for someone to pick up the pieces.”
Haden, pp. 57-8.

A three-bell signal means that an animal has dropped dead somewhere in New York.
Talese, p. 80.

In 1905, horses were grazing in Elmhurst on a site that is present-day Queens Boulevard.
Winkleman, p. 30.

Until 1800 cows grazed on the site of the first Waldorf. (cf. Conrad: “1893—The Waldorf Hotel opens / 1897—becomes Waldorf Astoria” [Empire State Building])
Koolhaas, p. 150.
Fat pigs, scarred from fights with wandering dog packs, slopped and grunted through Broadway mud, rooting for dainties.

When Times Square was a dark spot, when pigs, steers and mustangs were herded from barges down Eleventh Avenue.

A nine-foot shark was removed that someone left one night on Park Avenue and 150th Street in the Bronx.

Talese, p. 79.

Today I drove from the appointment onto the West Side Highway through the tunnel to Brooklyn. I wanted to film the beluga whales. These whales are so beautiful. Pale, almost gray-white bodies, streaming through the sun, luminous waters of a giant tank viewed from the side in a darkened building.

Wojnarowicz, p. 204.

George I. Schwartz’s specimens he dug out of his own backyard on Fifty-ninth Avenue in Queens: assorted beetles, cicadas, snails, slugs, butterflies, garter snakes, DeKay’s snakes, toads, mantises, moths, pill bugs, water bug, caterpillars. Mr. Schwartz knows a man who found 350 snakes within thirty square feet in Flushing.

Berger, New York, p. 27.

Since newspapers reported about ten days ago that a little girl in Flushing, Queens, had been nipped by a black widow spider she had picked up with a stone, the Health Department in town had been getting quite a collection of live black widows. More than thirty have been turned in… New York has always had black widows, at least since the mid-eighteenth century.

An occasional butterfly pirouettes through Wall Street’s canyon. (cf. Denby: “It was Breton and he was fighting off a butterfly.”[Dream City])

Federal Writers, p. 34.

The tiger swallowtail butterfly grazing in a patch of threadleaf coreopsis on the Bowery carries a sheen on his wings that indicates he’s local, newly emerged from his cocoon.
Rockefeller, whose lifelong hobby was collecting beetles.
Glanz, p. 11.

Mrs. Astor reports bedbugs in the Ritz.
Reisenberg, p. 20.

Do you know what’s eating this city. Besides envy and graft. The cockroach.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Baby cockroaches sneak back again behind the basin.
Ibid., N. pag.

The eternal New York war against the cockroach is being waged with J-O Paste and Flit.
Hamill, “Lost,” n. pag.

And I killed a roach and it was a trauma. A very big trauma. I felt really terrible.
Warhol, Diaries, p. 682.

I know, I know—yesterday I was so worried about killing a cockroach. But this is different—the cockroach didn’t do anything to anybody, and I didn’t kill it right so it was squirming and it was so big, it’d lived to be so big.
Ibid., p. 684.

BOCKRIS: Up at the Natural History Museum there is a woman studying the international roach population, spending nights with them, and doing very close-up portraits of them. She obviously knows what’s going on, whatever it is. These roaches are widespread and venomously effective.
BURROUGHS: Widespread they are, yes.
BOCKRIS: They’re brave and aggressive creatures, because what chance do they stand against you when they come out?
O’BRIEN: Some of them are smart, some of them learn to jump at the right time.
BURROUGHS: Some of them have wings.
BOCKRIS: You stated flatly that all waterbugs had wings.
BURROUGHS: As far as I know, although they may undergo various cycles.
O’BRIEN: They eat plastic.
BURROUGHS: Yes. They eat glue, they eat the bindings out of your books.
BOCKRIS: We’re closer to roaches than almost anything else in New York and we don’t know anything about them, their habits.

BURROUGHS: I think you’re a bleeding heart do-gooder; you think we should get to know more about roaches. I doubt it, frankly.

Bockris, Burroughs, pp. 176-7.

There’s a big fly in here and I’m going to open the window to let it out, there’s this black guy across the street with plastic bags going from door to door ringing. Could he really be a dry cleaner? One door just opened, I’ll wait to see if he comes out with more bags, but if I pull the shade so the fly will stay out, then I won’t be able to see out, oh, here he comes, yes, he’s got another bag, but, he’s going toward Park with it.

Warhol, Diaries, p. 580.

… while on the mountain-sides of Harlem Park are still a few squirrels, last survivals of an almost extinct race, the rest having been shot and their skins sold by the Harlem Negroes.

Beaton, New York, p. 167.

And then there is a whole race of pigeon and squirrel feeders, whose generosity stuffs to bursting the gluttons in parks and public places. These scatterers of grain may not all be lonely people, of course, but they give the impression that the pigeons and the squirrels fill a large part of their lives. I never see an elderly lady toting a bag of earnestly collected crumbs and crusts to her part-time pets that I do not reflect on the injustice of the situation. These gentle ladies, feeding the never-satiated birds, make me feel that it would be far better if the situation were reversed. A nice roast pigeon would make a nourishing meal for one of these kind women and I’d be willing to do something about it. A squirrel pie would fatten and redden the pale cheeks of elderly gentlemen who doubtless deprive themselves of small comforts to feed those ungrateful gray rodents, the squirrels. Pigeons and squirrels give these lonely people the illusion of being needed and loved.

Atkinson, p. 264.

Pigeons rise from the airshaft and scatter.

Conroy, p. 44.
New York is not on the whole, the best place to enjoy the downright miraculous nature of the planet. There are, I do not doubt, many remarkable stories to be heard there and many strange sights to be seen, but to grasp a marvel fully it must be savored from all aspects. This cannot be done while one is being jostled and hustled along a crowded street. Nevertheless, in any city there are true wildernesses where a man can be alone. It can happen in a hotel room, or on the high roofs at dawn.

One night on the twentieth floor of a midtown hotel I awoke in the dark and grew restless. On an impulse I climbed upon the broad old-fashioned window sill, opened the curtains and peered out. It was the hour just before dawn, the hour when men sigh in their sleep, or, if awake, strive to focus their wavering eyesight upon a world emerging from the shadows. I leaned out sleepily through the open window. I had expected depths, but not the sight I saw.

I found I was looking down from that great height into a series of curious cupolas or lofts that I could just barely make out in the darkness. As I looked, the outlines of these lofts became more distinct because the light was being reflected from the wings of pigeons who, in utter silence, were beginning to float outward upon the city. In and out through the open slits in the cupolas passed the white-winged birds on their mysterious errands. At this hour the city was theirs, and quietly, without the brush of a single wing tip against stone in that high, eerie place, they were taking over the spires of Manhattan. They were pouring upward in a light that was not yet perceptible to human eyes, while far down in the black darkness of the alleys it was still midnight.

As I crouched half asleep across the sill, I had a moment's illusion that the world had changed in the night, as in some immense snowfall, and that if I were to leave, it would have to be as these other inhabitants were doing, by the window. I should have to launch out into that great bottomless void with the simple confidence of young birds reared high up there among the familiar chimney pots and interposed horrors of the abyss.

I leaned farther out. To and fro went the white wings, to and fro. There were no sounds from any of them. They knew man was asleep and this light for a little while was theirs. Or perhaps I had only dreamed about man in this city of wings—which he could surely never have built. Perhaps I, myself, was one of these birds dreaming unpleasantly a moment of old dangers far below as I teetered on a window ledge.
Around and around went the wings. It needed only a little courage, only a little shove from the window ledge to enter that city of light. The muscles of my hands were already making little premonitory lunges. I wanted to enter that city and go away over the roofs in the first dawn. I wanted to enter it so badly that I drew back carefully into the room and opened the hall door. I found my coat on the chair, and it slowly became clear to me that there was a way down through the floors, that I was, after all, only a man.

I dressed then and went back to my own kind, and I have been rather more than usually careful ever since not to look into the city of light. I had seen, just once, man's greatest creation from a strange inverted angle, and it was not really his at all. I will never forget how those wings went round and round, and how, by the merest pressure of the fingers and a feeling for air, one might go away over the roofs. It is a knowledge, however, that is better kept to oneself. I think of it sometimes in such a way that the wings, beginning far down in the black depths of the mind, begin to rise and whirl till all the mind is lit by their spinning, and there is a sense of things passing away, but lightly, as a wing might veer over an obstacle.

Flagpoles attract them; so do pillars, perhaps from some primeval instinct for guarding one's rear. They also like to form in a line abreast at the curb, facing inward toward the action.

It is curious that, in the most modern of cities, the most ancient form of messenger service should be employed. At the half-time siren at distant football or baseball matches, a flock of pigeons will be released to fly with the latest photographs of the match back to the roof of Mr. Hearst's building Downtown; and I believe that the latest Paris fashions are flown from the Atlantic liners straight to Harper's Bazaar.

Vreeland Archive, NYPL.

Where pale pigeons unleash trifling indignities splattering on balconies and window sills.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Lapping the leaves outside my window where a pair of pigeons were flapping and screwing.
Perhaps New Yorkers cannot find time to look from windows. Perhaps it is only on Sundays that they see the pale yellow sky, the sunset of rose and opal, and the pigeons. A distant flock of black, brown and white specks vanishes completely each time it wheels back and forth over the same three blocks of skyscrapers. Soaring, dipping and weaving in unison, the pigeons repeat, continuously, their conjuror's trick of disappearance and reappearance, until their leader drops to rest on a rooftop, where an Italian boy comes to feed them. [Air]

Beaton, New York, p. 40

For one thing has always caused a note of sadness to me—the fact that I seldom see a bird here. And for me a city without a bird is like a house without a piano—something a little deadened. I seldom see—practically never—see even the humble, troublesome sparrow in New York. Even years ago that fact used to impress me. One went along the streets and never saw a bird. There were, however other beautiful flying things. A great moth with a wing-spread larger than that of a sparrow. And, after that I used to take pleasure in observing those fine things floating with the boldest and most beautiful flight in the world—smoother than that of the finches and more floating than the swallows—over the buses on Fifth Avenue or round and round the trees of Madison Square in an autumn season. I have not seem them lately—but that, I am aware, is no proof that they are no longer there. For sitting the other day with a lady in the window of the National Arts Club looking down over Gramercy Park—which in London would be called a square—I remarked to her that New York had for me always a certain note of sadness because there are no birds here—not even sparrows. She remarked drily: "If you will give yourself the trouble to look down you will see at least seventeen." And there they were—at least seventeen sparrows fling across the gray winter grass of the square.

Brooklyn Bridge aerial workers never disturb birds' nests up in the towers if the nests hold eggs. Craft superstition says the destruction of eggs means ill fortune.

In early evening when thin winter light begins to fade in Chambers Street, starling flights drop through the dusk to twittery homing in the portico of the Old County Courthouse just north of City Hall. They roost there in thousands and their bedding song is as of thousands of nail files, synchronized.

The nine City Court justices who have chambers in the structure are accustomed to starling features floating in on their papers. They say it gives them the feeling they are in the city, but not of it.

Ibid., p. 234.

The most clamorous show in New York’s wintry dusk is the mass return to nesting of starlings from city parks and other open spaces that are bird feeding grounds. The flocks move in dark masses, blacker than thunder cloud.

Uptown, coming from Westchester, they have a way-stop at Trinity Cemetery in 155th Street off Broadway. Downtown, they swoop into the Municipal Building arches and into courthouse porticoes off Foley Square, usually a little after 5 P.M. Their combined twittering startles city dwellers who’ve never heard all that sound before. The flocks take off for their feeding grounds again in frosty dawn with the same outcry.

Ibid., p. 125.

Yesterday at 4:30 p.m. a group of starlings swerved around the rigged of elevated billboards along Riverside Drive, swung abruptly about a large gas tank and then swooped below the underpinnings of the 125th Street viaduct to roost for the night.

Peyton, p. 8.

A storm which swept the Atlantic coast late in 1932 brought a swarm of Arctic birds, called dovecies, and dashed many of them against the skyscrapers. Thousands were found all over the city, their limp bodies draped on telephone wires, in the streets, on the lakes and lawns of the parks.

N. cit.

A songbird of the canary family, the house finch (Carpodacus purpureus) has been taken illegally by nets in the Sierras and sold through the 1930s to dealers at a few dollars per hundred: it will propagate itself throughout New York… entertaining the city with arguably the most musical call of any wild bird.

Trager, p. 525.

Hartz Mountain founder arrives in New York in 1926 from Germany with 5,000 singing canaries.
_Ibid._, p. 471.

More ducks than people live on Long Island.
Simpich, p. 281.

A monkey was captured in the subway in 1960.
Kennedy, _Subwayland_, p. 107.

“Say, what is it anyway?”
He says he understands it’s “some kind of gorilla.”
“Ain’t we got enough of them in New York already?” she demands.

_N. cit._
The words "United Artists, a Transamerica Company," appear in white over a silent black screen, cutting almost immediately and suddenly to a series of shots of the New York City skyline. As "Rhapsody in Blue" is heard over the scenery, the images flash on and off: the skyline at dawn, the sun silhouetting the Empire State Building, jutting skyscrapers, parking lots, crowded streets, the Brooklyn Bridge, neon lights advertising Broadway, Coca-Cola, various hotels, the snow-covered and lamp-lit streets of Park Avenue and Central Park, the garment district, an excited demonstration downtown . . . As the music swells over the Manhattan scenery, Ike's voice is heard, as if reading aloud from his writings.

Allen, Manhattan, p. 181.

We sweep the turquoise haze of contemptuous Palisades, gazing unwinking at the young intruder city. We see the Park, a parallelogram of green; the Hudson slinks off to the north. But south, done to a turn, below our eyes spreads an impossible nightmare. It is the Floor of Hell. It is the cockpit of a ghoulish ideology, a blind era that winks at the malnutrition of children, while boosting the prices of groceries by destroying food.

This before us, and around us, is Big Headquarters, the city of office men and agents, middlemen and lawyers, exempt crooks, public relations fakirs, venial judges, priests, police, and the victims of circumstances.

We look down on a hallucination, a mad Halicarnassus sacked each night by the cohorts of Comus, entered by thieves and saved from time to time by temporary Galahads. The sneering city curls brown smoke from its chimney censers; the bitter incense carries a faint odor as of burning sacrificial flesh. [Antiquity] [Smell]

Reisenberg, pp. 92-3.

Over the decades, the New York skyline has opened countless feature films—more films, probably, than any other single place on earth. The specific shot varies all the time, of course: a view of midtown from the East River in one film, downtown Manhattan from Brooklyn in another; a sweeping aerial of the entire island in yet another. We may see the city by day, its towers rising tall and solid, or by night, those same towers dissolved into the tracery of a million points of light. Accompanying the view might be that familiar “big city” theme music—its brisk tempo, dissonant brass, and bustling xylophone conjuring up busy streets, taxi horns, and rushing crowds. Or a haunting blue melody, a saxophone and orchestra evoking a kind of sweet urban sadness. Or simply a medley of city sounds—traffic, police sirens, a tolling church bell.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 67.

The summer traveler swings in over Hell Gate Bridge and from the window of his sleeping car as it glides above the pigeon lofts and back yards of Queens looks southwest to where the morning light first strikes the steel peaks of midtown, and he sees its upward thrust unmistakable: the great walls and towers rising, the smoke rising, the heat not yet rising, the hopes and ferments of so many awakening millions rising—this vigorous spear that presses heaven hard.

White, Here, pp. 31.

The city seen from the Queensboro Bridge is always the city seen for the first time, in its first wild promise of all the mystery and the beauty in the world.

Fitzgerald, Gatsby, p. 68.

One becomes aware of Manhattan itself in the distance, a shimmering silvery-blue mass, mountainous and buoyant, like a bundle of Zeppelins set on end; and, though one sees it now for the hundredth time, one feels like a little boy witnessing a skyrocket ascend, one wants to greet it with a cheer. As architecture, New York ought to be in fact what it seems so surely at a distance: the most exhilarating embodiment of modern form. Unfortunately, it is not. As one walks through the streets of the city once more, amid such a mass of new and almost new buildings, one has a fresh sense of shame over all this misapplied energy and wasted magnificence.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 85.

From the river, the Woolworth tower shows its most airy metamorphosis; a needle, stitching the clouds—as Howells said of the Palazzo Publico in Siena, not so much a tower as a flight. [Antiquity]

Irwin, p. 17.

X looks at lower Manhattan. The city gleams in clustered cliffs of jewels.

Jolas, p. 474.
A colossal hair-comb turned upward and so deprived of half its teeth that the others, at their uneven intervals, count doubly as sharp spikes.
James, p. 136.

“Someone to Watch Over Me” is still playing as the film switches to the 59th Street Bridge. It is almost dawn and the scene has a nearly perfect feel of light and beauty to it. Mary and Ike, their backs to the camera, are sitting on a bench looking out over the water.

marvelous geometropolis clinging to manhattan island’s arm
and caressing the sun with rectangular skyscraper fingers
Farfa, p. 296.

The sun has risen behind Brooklyn. The windows of Manhattan have caught fire.
O’Connell, p. 141.

Squares after squares of flame, set and cut into the ether.
Sharpe, p. 130.

Sparkling with windows like mica.
O’Connell, p. 139.

Gradually mellowing, the scene at night is most significant of all. Then the towering mass of the island deepens to a rich silhouette against the sky, luminous with the city glow. The lower end is deserted, and looms mysterious and awful in its empty vastness. To one who goes in for rich effects there can be nothing more impressive of the value of New York, as a unique city, than a study of the various and bizarre pictures it makes from such vantage points as the Brooklyn Heights, the ferries, or from any of the several bridges. There, comfortably ensconced, one may ponder at one’s leisure upon its most curious unsubstantial quality as of some gigantic Luna Park, its outlines traced by prodigal dots of light, its features illumined in so strange a fashion as to make them appear translucent; the whole high strung to the strident note of perpetual fête.
[Coney Island]
Henderson, pp. 18-19.

Laid back in the calm of the night, the moving Hudson River at our backs and sides... movement of lights coiling and fracturing on the dark surface of the water, looking back through the darkness towards the skyline, Empire State Building, shafts of illuminated sides of darkened windows, spheres of luminous streetlamps, barely illuminated water tanks, the moon half full and blazing out there in its loneliness: some kind of barometer of the senses depending on time and distance you feel. Normandy moon has a clear foreign sense. New York City moon not so remote and wondrous.

Wojnarowicz, pp. 115-16.

As if squeezed from myriad rainbows, here float infinite vistas of color, some painted walls blending so gradually into a skylike blue that sometimes it's hard to tell where man's work ends and real sky begins.

Simpich, p. 281.

I had seen it in the sunset from a bridge, majestic above its waters, its incredible peaks and pyramids rising flowerlike and delicate from pools of violet mist to play with the flaming clouds and the first stars of evening. Then it had lighted up window by window above the shimmering tides where lanterns nodded and glided and deep horns bayed weird harmonies, and had itself become a starry firmament of dream, redolent of faery music, and one with the marvels of Carcassonne and Samarcand and El Dorado and all glorious and half-fabulous cities.

As the ship glided up the river, the city burst thunderously upon us in the early dusk—the white glacier of lower New York swooping down like a strand of a bridge to rise into uptown New York, a miracle of foamy light suspended by the stars. A band started to play on deck, but the majesty of the city made the march trivial and tinkling.

Whole panoramas of New York everywhere, from New Jersey, from skyscrapers.—

Above

To paint New York from above, at the top, is to rely once again on the first spiritualist myth, i.e., that geometry kills man. [Grid] Barthes, Reader, p. 160.

Aerial perspectives cantilever bare rooms in a bleak sky or elide architecture, propping up unanchored arrays of water tanks, chimney pots, and cornices with no buildings to belong to.
Conrad, p. 105.

Water towers on all the flat tarred roofs.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Not an accretion of streets and squares that can be comprehended by the pedestrian, but instead manifests its shape from the air.
Amin, p. 3.

The thick summer sky flared to the east with the lights of Harlem, and on this high roof one had a sense of separation from the rest of the world one usually doesn’t achieve in Nature at a level lower than five thousand feet.
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 51.

My hotel room is on the twenty-first floor, about two hundred and twenty-five feet above the ground. I was greatly surprised to find that I had by no means lost contact with the ground. My myopic eyes easily, even very clearly, grasp the activities in the street—people, cars in movement.
Corbusier, p. 65.

Gaze down on Manhattan Island from the air, and you will see the world’s most extravagant architectural fantasy. It won’t look the same next week.
Morris, Incredible, p. 354.

It’s a city of shapes that hang together and rearrange themselves as if seen through a kaleidoscope. Move 20 years and the view changes. Even if the foreground hardly shifts, the entire background may have vanished and been replaced. No two views are ever the same.
Brook, p. 14.
From the street, or from any window, the city often seems like a place thrown up without regard for reason, and haunted by chaos. But from any rooftop the city comes into focus. The roof is in proportion to the building beneath it, and from any roof it can easily be seen that all the other roofs, and their walls, are in proportion to each other and to the city. The buildings are tightly packed together, without regard to size or height, and light and shadow strike across them so that the scene changes every minute. The struggle for space in Manhattan creates an oceanic uproar in the air above the streets, and every roof turns into a magic carpet just as soon as someone is standing on it.

Brennan, p. 32.

The multi-souled city opens its central viscera and extends its peripheral members like tentacles.

de Torre, p. 57.

To assure himself that New York is beautiful, the pedestrian must crane his neck in crowded streets, and perhaps doubt still remains. Yet only from the windows, making the buildings into great honey-combs, can New York be seen at her most beautiful.

N. cit.

(for New York is in fact a deep city, not a high one) Barthes, Eiffel, p. 150.

Proscenium

The skyline view is a kind of proscenium, after all, a metaphoric arch framing everything to come, offering a reassuring familiarity even as it plunges us into a new and unpredictable experience. How many places are as widely (or instantly) recognizable as New York? Older films sometimes placed a printed title across the view; newer ones rarely do—but in any case the name has always been superfluous. Like Big Ben or the Taj Mahal, the New York skyline is one of the world’s unmistakable icons, thanks in large part to films themselves: each new opening shot trades on—and reinforces—the skyline’s preexisting fame. Unlike those other icons, though, the skyline carries civic as well as national significance, standing for a city as much as (or more than) a country. And unlike the others it is not just a single structure but an entire place—the very thing, in fact, being symbolized. The Eiffel Tower denotes Paris; the skyline not only denotes but is New York.

Of course, the skyline also denotes something else: the “big city,” the endless metropolis. This turns out to be less a function of the skyline’s vertical thrust, surprisingly, than its horizontal spread: its hundreds upon hundreds of buildings, with their thousands upon thousands of windows—each window providing the symbolic marker of an individual and so, by extension, an individual story. Over the next few hours, the skyline vista suggests, we will follow one such story—but we might well have turned to some other window and there found another, equally interesting story to watch. Next time, perhaps. There are, the skyline proposes, millions of stories to choose from—a whole city of stories, all proceeding at once, whether we happen to see them or not.

Some establishing shots try for more, searching the skyline for clues about the story to come. The image that starts Young Man with a Horn (1950) gazes high up at the Chrysler Building, soaring into the sky as confidently as the jazz trumpeter on the soundtrack rises into his upper register. But soon the camera begins to tilt down, descending roof by roof to the modest tenement apartment of piano player Hoagy Carmichael, the film’s narrator. This turns out to be a sketch of the film itself—a struggle between the transcendent “high note” that cornetist Kirk Douglas dreams of reaching and the worldly complexities of life and love that threaten to wreck his career. An identical shot, opening Miracle in the Rain (1956), offers a simpler meaning: New York, as the narrator tells us, is home to not only the high and mighty (the skyscrapers) but to millions of ordinary people—including Jane Wyatt, a tenement dweller who is the film’s romantic lead. Barbara Stanwyck’s smoky voice—over at the opening of 1949’s “East Side, West Side” “Yes, this is my town... the most exciting city in the world, they say, the (glamorous, the most frightening, and above all, the fastest...”) underpins a glide from the sleek towers of midtown to a modest apartment house on Gramercy Park (“for me, it’s home”), again evoking the distinction between the celebrated and the ordinary—and the city’s embrace of both.

The same kind of movement is elsewhere turned to very different purpose. Among other things, the New York skyline remains an abiding symbol of American wealth and power; an opening that shifts from the gleaming spires to a slum district effectively reminds the audience that the wretched conditions they will be sharing over the next few hours are to be found not in some obscure locality but in proximity to a national landmark. Over time, the simple tilt or pan from proud skyscrapers in the distance to shabby tenements nearby (in Street Scene, 1931, and The Window, 1949) has given way to the ambitious, planimetric aerial shots that open West Side Story (1961) and New Jack City (1991), which, surveying all part of New York from above—as if through a giant microscope—imply a kind of social-science objectivity, linking the city's riches and poorest districts in a single socioeconomic system. [Luxury]

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 67.

Huneker likened it to "a mad medley of pepperboxes perched on cigar boxes" and said the windows of the office blocks on Wall Street resembled waffles.

Conrad, p. 77.

Honeycombs! That's what they are, / Those lights from city windows

Edholm, p. 104.

A "democratic" skyline, in which buildings complement one another, and a "star" skyline, in which buildings compete with each other; in Manhattan, buildings challenged each other directly.

Douglas, Honesty, p. 436.

In this twisted, seething mass stand quaint houses with hipped roofs; squat buildings crouching close to escape being trampled on—some hugging the sides of huge steel giants as if for protection; patches of thread-bare sod sighed over by melancholy trees guarding long forgotten graves; narrow, baffled streets dodging in and out, their tired eyes on the river; stretches of wind-swept spaces bound by sea-walls, off which the eager, busy tugs and statelier ships weave their way, waving flags of white steam as they pass; wooden wharves choked with queer shaped bales smelling of spice, and ill-made boxes stained with bilge water, against which lie black and white monsters topped with red funnels, surmounting decks of steel.

Smith, Charcoals, N. pag.

City of skyscrapers, man-made Rocky Mountain range.

Here, on days when the violet mists obscure the distance, it is a curving cliff; the upper turrets of the higher structures might be castles or temples balanced on the dizzy edge.

Irwin, p. 78.

To the European these colossi seem either banal, meaningless, the sinister proof a material civilization, or a startling new achievement in art. And I have often wondered whether it does not all depend upon the first glimpse; whether at the moment when he stampedes to the rail they appear as a jumble, like boxes piled on boxes, or fall into one of their super-compositions.

Ibid., p. 15.

The city, magic and fantastic from afar, now appears an absurd jumble of straight lines of wood, a cheap, hastily constructed toy-house for the amusement of children. Dozens of white buildings, monstrously diverse, not one with even the suggestion of beauty.

The residents of the high-rent apartment houses that lined the Manhattan side of the East River had never gotten much of a view for their money. Opposite them—to the east and dragging off to the south—was scenery done in Early Industrial Era Midlands, the grimy warehouses, factories, tenements, oil tanks and open storage depots of Astoria and Long Island City. Its dreariness broken only by the gaudiness of occasional monster billboards painted large enough so that there messages could be seen clearly across the river. That vista stretched away without a break (There were no housing developments or parks before then) beneath a pall (the word “smog” had not yet gained currency) Cast over it by belching smokestacks. And the scene to the north where Ward’s Island lay, low in the water with Randall’s behind it, had not been any prettier. Dull-colored and lifeless in the distance even when the fog didn’t shroud them, the two islands had been adorned only by the squat red and gray industrial buildings that failed to block out the scenery behind the islands: the South Bronx, Long Island City’s spiritual descendent. Since 1932, the piers erected for the first, abortive attempt to build the Triborough Bridge had been part of the scene, but, dun-colored, featureless and, without a bridge on top of them. seeming in the distance like a succession of walls to play handball against, they did little to relive its drabness. The view had not been inspiriting. [Advertising]

Caro, p. 396.
It's a well-known fact that you can live in Manhattan all your life without ever seeing it from the water.
Trebay, p. 221.

Queens had been moribund and torpid, Manhattan was effervescent. The lights had come on in the midtown skyscrapers, the pavements were crowded, the yellow cabs bumped their ways over the potholes of the great avenues, and the peddlers displayed their wares and yelled their street cry: 'Check it out!'
Brook, pp. 4-5.

It seems an odd thing to say of creations so massive and magnificent as the skyscrapers; but they have a strangely elusive beauty. Seen from one point of view, they are a meaningless jumble, justifying every charge the foreigner used to bring against them; seen from another, they fall into a composition, as though a Michelangelo or some other super-artist had designed the whole group for a single creation.
Irwin, p. 13.

In “From An American Place, Looking North” (1931) a building is under construction opposite Stieglitz's window. At present he can see through the girders. When it's complete, it will block his view. Even from this height, his visual dominion is threatened. [Photography]
Conrad, p. 83.

The Gothic quirks of the church spire on West 23rd Street are partly obliterated by the bare rectangle of an office block.
Conrad, pp. 111-12.

Hotel New Yorker, which has eight thousand rooms, each with an inside view.
Gooch, p. 189.

Scale, Magnitude

The city is too big, and they have to touch too much, and touch it too rapidly. From the sheer impossibility of doing it justice they fall into conventionalism. Literature is nipped by the wealth of opportunity.
Hapgood, p. 97.
America has given us that sensation: magnitude which is noble, which can be very noble, as it often was in the past. Corbusier, p. 77.

The city as merely an accumulation: the largest size, the greatest number (even of units of quality), and the highest speed.
Federal Writers, p. 312.

We felt like small children in a great bright unexplored barn.

The biggest world is Manhattan; the smaller world is in this case this tip of the island, the smallest one of all is the world of shops and restaurants that cater to it.
Atkinson, p. 94.

The rush of emotion that rises as the car pulls down the Hudson Parkway, as the cab comes across the Triborough Bridge from La Guardia, the sense of a scale too big to be credited and of a potential too large to be quite real—all that remains available, which is the most you can say of any emotion. The other emotions—the daily frustrations, the long-term fears—remain available, too. The city we are in, the home we have made, and the other city we long for all remain in existence.
Gopnik, p. 296.

Ground

The city looks one way from a distance, a skyline full of symbols, inviting pilgrims and Visigoths, and another way up close, a city full of people. [Crowds]
Gopnik, p. 122.

First there was steelwork and concrete in the sky, immense towers, thick cables, a roadbed above the water—the George Washington Bridge, looking above the leaves, casting a dark shadow over the parkway so that the reporters’ limousine rolled across it as if it were a gigantic welcome mat to a gigantic city. Then, above the parkway to the left, there were apartment houses of Riverside Drive. Far away to the left, there were the spires of the Empire State Building and the Chrysler Building, canyons of skyscrapers toward which the limousine was headed. Ahead of the reporters was the panorama of the harbor, serene water turned busy, churned by the giant screws of giant ships, dented by piers jutting from shore.
   Caro, p. 555.

North across fourteen bridges and three tunnels. Under the flat tarred roofs. In the buildings zig zag with iron staired fire escapes. Stacked on the hills, brick hives of grey and brown. Packed with ginneys, micks, kikes and coons.
   Donleavy, N. pag..

The dome of the Manhattan Savings Bank over Chinatown at the entrance to Manhattan Bridge, and then in Brooklyn again, after we had traveled from light into dark, dark into light, along the shuddering shadowy criss-cross of the pillars.
   Jackson & Dunbar, p. 678.

Along Queens Boulevard. The stacks and stacks of apartment houses. Boxes and boxes of little homes down all the crosshatched streets.
   Ibid.

I gazed out the window, past the crawling traffic, those battered ungainly cars, past the cemeteries that cover hillside after hillside of suburban Queens, and looked idly at the Manhattan skyline just becoming visible through the late afternoon haze.
   Brook, p. 2.

"That," he reflects, "is the way you ought to come into Manhattan. See the black heart before you were dazzled by the chromium-plated wings and turrets."
   Conrad, p. 281.

If you will stand at any of the cross-streets that lead east from Second Avenue you will obtain a splendid panorama, window after window ornamented with a red or green or orange iron balcony and hung, in the summertime, with an array of green vines and bright flower-pots.
   Dreiser, p. 269.

You sit down on a piling and look out over the river.
Downriver, the Statue of Liberty shimmers in the haze.
Across the water, a huge Colgate sign welcomes you to New Jersey, the Garden State.
   McInerney, p. 10.
New York reveals itself only at a particular sight, a particular distance, a particular speed. These are not the height, the distance, or the speed of the pedestrian. This city is strikingly like the great Andalusia plains—monotonous when you pass through on foot, superb and varying when crossed by car.

Sartre, p. 123.

But if here I look up amid the shadows and out into the backyard I see nothing—a cement floor, an incredibly begrimed glass roof of an open shed. And it is just a well; except for soot, clean but eternally Cimmerian. As well—for although the house I have chosen to live in is old and relatively low, on the other three sides that surround my yard there tower up the skyscrapers, and I live either in funereal shadows or in artificial light... Where a sparrow can lodge a sparrow will lodge—but on the faces of these immense cliffs there is not lodgment even for a sparrow—except maybe skywards. You see, I have been gradually raising my eyes towards the tops of these cliffs by way of the backyards and the shadows. [Nature] [Death]

Ford, America, p. 64-5.

River

Time on the river had become irrelevant—walking down into the darkness of the side streets and avenues, crossing the highway, cars burning in lines going uptown and downtown, waiting beneath the overpass, papers skidding along the loading docks, some character standing beside a solitary car in darkness, over by the river a series of cars easing from parking spots on the asphalt runway, others turning off along the waterfront, circular motions of vehicles, burning headlights acting like beacons that sweep over the surface of the river, the river looks like clouds, the rafts of ice driven together by currents, spread from the shore to the center of the river protected from being swept away by the piers. When the headlights swing away from the surface of the river, everything is settled into a calm easy darkness, ice merges into a slow illuminated color of night, the bare ridges of the ice floes exposed, like arctic childhood memories, waiting for the polar strides and windy howls of desolation.

Wojnarowicz, p. 135.

Out along the waterfront asphalt strip, more cars are turning and circling. Headlights like lighthouse beacons drift over the surface of the river, swinging around and illuminating men, strangers, men I might or might not have known because their faces were invisible, just disks of black silhouette outlined briefly as each car passes, one after the other, pale interior faces turned against the windows, then fading into distance.

Coda

Then I understood—everything was explained: I had discovered the crowning error of the city, its Pandora’s box. Full of vaunting pride the New Yorker had climbed here and seen with dismay what he had never suspected, that the city was not the endless succession of canyons that he had supposed but that it had limits— from the tallest structure he saw for the first time that it faded out into the country on all sides, into an expanse of green and blue that alone was limitless. And with the awful realization that New York was a city after all and not a universe, the whole shining edifice that he had reared in his imagination came crashing to the ground.

Fitzgerald, My Lost City, p. 115.
Skyscrapers were unknown until 1900.
Britt, p. 5.

New York’s character is to be unfinished... its very essence is to be continually in the making, to never be completely resolved.
Bender, Unfinished, p. xi.

New York refuses a single logic and it declines any notion of completeness.
Ibid., p. xi.

Whitman’s unfinished Leaves of Grass as a parallel to NYC’s state of incompletion.
Ibid, p. xii.

Man’s rush to the nth floor is a neck-and-neck race between plumbing and abstraction.
Koolhaas, p. 130.

Unrealized

Early in 1906 advertisements appear in New York papers announcing “a ground floor chance to share profits” in “the largest steel structure ever erected... the greatest amusement enterprise in the whole world the best real estate venture,” the Globe Tower. It will cost $1,500,000 to erect. The public is urged to invest. The stock will pay 100 percent interest annually. The most voluminous building ever proposed in the history of mankind, it combines in a single gestalt the opposites—needle and sphere Trylon and Perisphere—that have been the extremes of Manhattan’s formal vocabulary ever since the Latting Observatory and the balloon of the Crystal Palace were juxtaposed in 1853. It is impossible for a globe to be a tower. A sketch illustrating the ad—of a skyline dominated by a blob—reveals the Globe Tower’s concept: the sphere is to be so colossal that simply by resting on the earth it can claim—through the height of its enormous diameter—also to be a tower, for it is at least “three times as high as the Flatiron building, the present marvel of New York.”

[World’s Fair 1939]
Vale, p. 226.
The tower’s blueprints showed a gigantic steel planet that had collided onto a replica of the Eiffel Tower. As a whole it was 700 feet high, three times as high as the Flatiron Building, New York’s marvel at the time. The Globe Tower would be the largest building in the world with enormous elevators to carry visitors to its eleven completely different floors. It would be an agglomeration of Steeplechase, Dreamland and Luna Park, all contained in a single interior volume.

Friede leased a small corner of the Steeplechase property on Surf Avenue to erect this colossal structure. The structure would be supported by eight enormous socles (pedestals) whose foundations would be 35 feet deep. Underground was planned as a multi-level interchange of various modes of transport: a combination parking garage, subway and railroad station with a branch heading out towards sea to connect with the boat pier.

The Globe would be divided into eleven floors, beginning 150 feet above the ground and spaced at intervals of fifty feet. The lowest or first level would feature a Pedestal Roof Garden with a popular priced restaurant, continuous vaudeville theater, roller skating rink, bowling alley, slot machines, etc. At the 250 foot level there would be an Aerial Hippodrome seating 5000 people. It would feature four large circus rings and four immense animal cages; each ring representing a different continent. Performances would be continuous and a miniature railroad would circle the arena’s perimeter. The Globe’s Main Hall would be located at the 300 foot level. Here would be the largest ballroom in the world and a moving restaurant enclosed in glass. A revolving strip twenty-five feet wide would carry tables, kitchens and patrons around the outer edge of the Tower to give the effect of eating in an airborne dining car. Diners would have a moving panoramic view of Coney Island, the countryside and Greater New York.

Friede, who envisioned continuous 24 hour use of his Globe Tower by its 50,000 temporary residents, planned a hotel floor at the sphere’s equator. Rooms would be small but luxuriously equipped and padded with sound proofing for undisturbed sleep.

[...]

Friede’s floor layout implicitly used social stratification. The facilities were increasingly refined and elegant the higher one would ascend. The level above at 350 feet would feature an Aerial Palm Garden, a more expensive restaurant with tables scattered in a palm garden with cascades of running water screened from each other by shrubbery. It was to be arranged on the Italian Garden plan.

The Observatory platform was at the 500 foot level. At the highest platform in New York visitors could use coin operated telescopes to see more than 50 miles. There would also be a souvenir stand and various small concessions. Near the tower’s top at the 600 feet level would be the United States Weather Observation Bureau and Wireless Telegraph Station. It would be equipped with modern weather recording devices. And at the very top would be the largest revolving searchlight in the world. The tower itself, lit by thousands of electric lights, would resemble a gigantic tower of fire.

There was a cornerstone laying ceremony on May 26, 1906. It was complete with speeches, band concerts and fireworks. There was a rush of investors at the Globe Tower Company office built next to the first socle. But by the end of the 1906 season, when the foundations were still incomplete, investors became anxious.

Another ceremony was held on February 17, 1907. A band was on hand when they put the first piece of steel in position. The company claimed they were driving 800 concrete foundation piles, each 30 feet long and five feet in circumference. They promised that half of the eleven floor structure would be open to the public on May 15th and the remainder would be fully operational the following year.

Meanwhile in March, George Tilyou, tired of the endless delays, threatened an injunction. A Brooklyn Supreme Court judge prevented it. None-the-less, by 1908 it became clear that the most impressive architectural project ever conceived was a fraud. Tilyou was left with the problem of removing thirty foundation piles on his property.

The Friede Tower, if it had been built would have been the first single building in the world to claim the status of resort.

Stanton, N. pag.

By 1908 it is clear that the most impressive architectural project ever conceived is a fraud.

Koolhaas, p. 71.

The Globe’s treasurer was convicted of embezzlement.

Panchyk, p. 40.

Harvey Wiley Corbett in 1923 proposed for the New York of the future a segregation of vehicular from pedestrian traffic, which would consign cars to ground level and raise people onto elevated walkways.

Raymond Hood in 1929 conjectured that apartment houses for three million people could be built on the East River bridges. These would be doubly abstracted from earth, placed over water and hung from the air by cables.

Hugh Ferriss, who after 1915 renounced architectural practice and contented himself with the graphic rendering of unbuildable fantasies, saw buildings as landing stages for futuristic visitors from the upper air and planned airport terminals on the upper shelves of skyscrapers. He was sure that the New Yorkers of the future would live in the sky, and his imaginary dwellings are terraced with aerial golf courses, hanging gardens, and swimming pools. Rather than traveling horizontally to the country, New Yorkers find it upstairs. Those heights are dizzy pleasures: Ferriss drew masked balls and carnivals atop his skyscrapers. What he called in 1936 “the air age” had reoriented architecture. Buildings, dangling from the sky into an abyss, should be designed to be seen from above. Following his own advice, Ferriss drew the United Nations Headquarters from a helicopter.

At the World’s Fair in 1939, Norman Bel Geddes laid out a city while hovering in midair. For the Futurama metropolis of 1960 in the General Motors pavilion, which was to be seen from sound-chairs traveling above it, Geddes relied on the drastic aerial perspectives he’d become accustomed to when looking down from theater catwalks during his period as a stage designer. Geddes places you in the future, patronizing the present from a steep vertical distance of foresight. The Futurama passengers disembarked at a street intersection in Tomorrow. As they stepped into “the wonder world of 1960” they were reminded that “1940 is twenty years ago!” and admonished ‘ALL EYES TO THE FUTURE.’ (cf. Warhol: “The thing I most of all remember about the World’s Fair was sitting in a car with the sound coming from speakers behind me.” [World’s Fair 1964])

Conrad, pp. 258–60.

One of the biggest standing sets on the Fox lot in Beverly Hills was an East River vehicular tunnel under construction, an interior tube of raw, exposed steel plating. Built for a 1933 picture called Under Pressure, the set remained on the lot for decades, forever ‘unfinished,’ a testament to the city as an ongoing work in progress.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 400.
Buckminster Fuller envisioned cutting people off from the elements entirely by building domed cities, which, he claimed, would offer free climate control, winter and summer: "A two-mile-diameter dome has been calculated to cover Mid-Manhattan Island, spanning west to east at 42nd Street," he observed. "The cost saving in ten years would pay for the dome."

Kolbert, N. pag.

Fuller calculated that the single one-mile-diameter dome enclosing the mid-Manhattan area between Twenty-second and Sixty-second Streets and between the Hudson and East Rivers would have a surface area of only 1/84 of all the buildings it would enclose. That dome would reduce the heating and cooling requirements of the buildings it covered to 1/84 of the current requirements. In addition to regulating the temperature, such a dome would also control the precipitation and the air quality within the enclosed environment.

Sieden, p. 363.

Suppose that there existed, between Madison Square and Central Park, an avenue three hundred feet in width, planted with trees on either side of a spacious roadway, with broad sidewalks, and a continuous series of flower beds, clumps of shrubs and patches of well-kept grass—in fact, something similar to the Avenue des Champs-Elysées in Paris; and suppose, further, that this avenue was bordered by the palaces of American millionaires—Silver Kings, Petroleum Kings, and other monarchs. In that case New York would possess a central artery worthy of the city and the renown of which would be world wide. [Empire]

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 439.

King's "Dream of New York" (1908). A drawing of the imagined future. Lower Broadway has been transformed into a stepped range of tall buildings, linked here and there by aerial walkways and finished off with small pantheons, cupolas, statuary, or flags. Dirigibles are casting off from lofty mooring masts (according to their labels, bound for Japan, Europe, the Panama Canal, the North Pole); several unidentifiable flying structures veer about like strange mechanical birds. The upper atmosphere teems with activity; it is not mere space but a realm of great potential drama, and it appears to be almost within arm's reach, for the hypothetical viewer is perched aloft, thirty or forty stories above the street.

Hawes, N. pag.
Glass Box

Architecture is capital.
White, Here, p. 163.

The word ‘skyscraper’ originally meant the topsail of a clipper ship.

The very name, initially a mixture of irony and awe, confesses its own transcendent ambition and awareness of failure. Though we long to scrape it, the sky always retreats from our touch. And the building, once tall, feels its inadequacy. Not least, perhaps, because another building, somewhere else, a few blocks or an ocean away, is ascending just a little bit higher.
Kingwell, p. 56.

They are not buildings, they are concrete realizations of thought.

Euphemisms for skyscrapers: “tombstones,” “jealous bitches,” and “granite cocks.”
N. cit.

granite cocks!

Skyscrapers and the men who built them may have represented the zenith of a modernist masculinity; yet there is something distinctly modern and female about them too.
Rabinowitz, p. 155.

The model is Jamesian rather than Freudian; James had his own ideas about the return of the repressed... The male-female presence, the realized alliance of masculine and feminine impulses, was crucial to the special euphoria of top promises fulfilled, the sense of heaven here on earth that the skyscrapers inspired in those who designed and viewed them. Only when the masculine and feminine elements are present in equal strength, only when the genders collaborate rather than compete, only when they come fully abreast or flush of each other, can the artifact or culture involved be, by a process of simultaneous gender reinforcement and gender cancellation, both gender-doubled and beyond gender and so satisfy the deepest needs of the human heart, mind, and psyche. Houdini remarked that “if the wish is father to the thought, it is mother to the hallucination.” The New York skyline, “built with a wish,” was that thought and that hallucination. [Psychoanalysis] Douglas, Honesty, pp. 442-6.

Sartre: “When we were twenty, we heard about skyscrapers. We discovered them with amazement in the movies. They were the architecture of the future, just as cinema was the art of the future.” Sartre, p. 124.

Sartre: “To the man who strolled through New York before 1930, the high-rise buildings towering over the city were the first signs of an architecture destined to radiate over the entire country. Skyscrapers were then living things. Today, for a Frenchman arriving from Europe, they are already mere historical monuments, witnesses to a bygone age. They still rise up into the sky but my spirit does not soar with them, and the New Yorkers pass by at their feet without so much as a glance. I cannot think of them without melancholy; they speak of an age when we believed in peace. They are already a little run-down; tomorrow, perhaps, they will be demolished. At any rate, to build them took a faith we no longer possess.” Ibid., p. 125.

Quentin Crisp: “When I was young, no one who visited Manhattan talked about anything but its skyscrapers. Now every city has skyscrapers.” Crisp, p. 217.

The aesthetics of skyscrapers have long passed the point of diminishing returns; there is nothing to say about a new skyscraper tower except that it is another skyscraper tower. Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 81.

What is astonishing about the skyscraper is that it does not astonish. When we actually see one (but do we ever see one, actually), the feeling it inspires is: why not? Barthes, Eiffel, p. 150.

By the late 1940s, as the swaggering individual entrepreneur of the past was transformed into the team-playing corporate man in the gray flannel suit, so the instantly identifiable cathedrals of commerce that exemplified the city's architecture from 1900 to 1929 gave way to an architecture that celebrated repetition to the point of anonymity.

Bennett, WWII, p. 63.

The architect-hero, Howard Roark, commonly believed to be modeled on Frank Lloyd Wright, had made generations of young women swoon. Roark is portrayed as a brilliantly creative, fiery genius, embattled by the establishment, who defiantly blows up his consummate work of art, a skyscraper [sic], rather than see his talent and integrity compromised.

Berliner, p. 43

The terror of a city of architectural individuality.

Monson, p. 31.

A physically sordid agglomeration of endlessly repeated submediocre typologies and overblow engineering stunts with little history and a dubious future.

Kunstler, p. 2.

The skyscraper appeals not only because of its combination of imposing form and enticing lights; there is also the magnetic pull of its human interior—and perhaps an underlying relief that one is not imprisoned there too. [Punishment]

Sharpe, p. 230.

Such buildings do not shelter or isolate men as do those of Europe. They gather and shuffle them.

Still, p. 298.

Batman could not function in a city of sheer glass towers, for what would his hooks tie into, and how would he scale their sides? [Reflection]

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 104.

Glass is the only material in the building industry which expresses surface and space at the same time.

Friedberg, p. 119.

The UN building: the first building in the city with an all-glass curtain wall.

no.cit.

Glass gives a new, uncertain, meaning to the wall.
Mies is basic to the miracle: "Can anyone stand unmoved at the top of a steel-framed skyscraper today, looking out across a city's glittering 20th century towers, glass walls reflecting clouds, sky and structures in a massed, changing pattern of light and color? This architecture is not static, any more than life is static. Can anyone fail to recognize and react to this miracle of our time?"

[Reflection]

The Seagram Building is New York's ultimate skin building. The wall is held unrelentingly flat; there are no tricks with projecting or extending mullions; thin and flush, they are used only to divide the window glass. The metal spandrel facing, in one smooth piece, echoes the placing of structural steel and seeks no "artful" plasticity. The taut, shiny-dark sleekness of matte black aluminum and gleaming bronze glass is an architectural statement of positive excellence as well as a foil for the ornate masonry around it.

The anti-individualistic static of the Seagram building, which Mies himself described as "completely opposed to the idea that a specific building should have an individual character."

Bennett, WWII, p. 63.

The proportions of a Mies design are so sensitively adjusted, his understating of the richness of marble, the brilliance of glass and the substantiability of bronze so sensuously sure, his feelings for the materials of our time so overwhelmingly rich and yet so far from vulgar, that no one has matched the precise and timeless beauty of his buildings. The Seagram Building, for example, is dignified, sumptuous, severe, sophisticated, cool, consummately elegant architecture—architecture for the 20th century and for the ages.

The Miesian example is a lesson of principle. But in too many cases, the Miesian principle has been ignored and the Miesian example simply 'knocked off' in the cheapest Seventh Avenue terms.

Without fine materials and meticulous details, Mies's diamond-sharp doctrine of "less is more" becomes a most ordinary formula. Raised about the shoddy and speculative, however, it is a competent and appropriate formula and it is here that Mies’s signal importance, as the source of a genuine popular style, has been so much misunderstood.

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 162

“We will build no cathedrals.” Buildings, Mies said, are “mere carriers” of “the will of the age.” It is worth noting that, when it comes to literal cathedrals, Mies was correct: a longstanding project to build a new cathedral in New York has exhibited none of the speed and efficiency of commercial and residential building, and still stands unfinished.

Kingwell, p. 33.

O’Hara explicitly challenges the functionalist pretensions of International Style Modernist architecture by imagining dysfunctional, ludic spaces where he can drop a “hot dog” into “one of the Seagram Building’s fountains.” [Surrealism]

Bennett, WWII, p. 9.

I get a cinder in my eye

it streams into the sunlight

the air pushes it aside and I drop my hot dog into one of the

Seagram Building’s fountains

O’Hara, p. 476.

The refusal of decoration should lead, finally, to the building that is pure manifest functionality, an exercise in verticality (the smooth flat surfaces of the elegant foursquare slab) that is also a negation of it (the dark finish now making a blank screen, absorbing light rather than reflecting it). In its way, the Seagram Building is the architectural equivalent of an Ad Reinhardt painting, a rectangle of pure black pigment that simultaneously celebrates and destroys the blank canvas. [New York School] [Abstract Expressionism]

Kingwell, p. 92.

Even triumphs of modernism could look bewildered or bereft against the backdrop of early postwar New York. On Park Avenue in midtown, Lever House and the Seagram Building, photographed before they’ve aged into the streetscape, seem wet behind the ears, just blocks away from a Third Avenue still holding on to the grubbiness it would soon lose under high-rise development. The whole atmosphere of the city in the 1950s was a blend of energy and enervation. In retrospect it looks—and the culture that surrounded it seems—incomplete, either half-built or half-decayed, with energy seeping away even where it seemed abundant. (cf. Lesueur: “Third Avenue’s The Bird Circuit of gay bars…” [Sex])

Mencken, pp. 186-91.

Oppen often specifically asked why we must look to Lever Brothers to provide the missing center that the city lacked. As Oppen’s imagery suggests, Lever House cannot center the city’s urban typology because it is merely a local address: it covers a single square block, containing some “thousand lives / Within that glass.”

Friedberg, p. 133.

The lights that blaze and promise
Where are so many—What is offered

In the wall and nest of lights?
The land

Lacked center:
We must look to Lever Brothers based in a square block, A thousand lives

Within that glass. What is the final meanings
Of extravagance? What are the office

Buildings, storehouses of papers,
The centers of extravagance?

Oppen, “Tourist,” p. 27.

The “glass box” is the most maligned building idea of our time. It is also one of the best. Whatever its deficiencies, and there are many, due to the complex factors of architects who are less than perfectionists and businessmen who are less than philanthropists or sociologists, it is the genuine vernacular of the mid-20th century. It derives legitimately from Mies’s masterful and meaningful innovations, and it serves legitimately the needs of a commercial society that builds on an industrial scale. It does this with sheer and brilliant modern magic and with as much validity and suitability as the last great vernacular style, the Georgian.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 163.

It is now possible to live in Mies apartment houses in Chicago, Detroit, Newark, Montreal and Baltimore. it is not possible to do so in New York. (It remains a mystery how New York’s status-symbol-conscious rich can continue to accept, at the nation’s highest prices, residential architectural trash.)
Ibid., p. 164.

Corbusier: “The skyscrapers of New York are too small.”
Corbusier, p. 51.

On the morning after my arrival in New York the New York Herald Tribune printed in big type, over my caricatured newspaper photograph:
FINDS AMERICAN SKYSCRAPERS MUCH TOO SMALL
Skyscrapers not big enough
Says Le Corbusier at first sight
Thinks they should be huge and a lot farther apart.
Ibid., p. 51.

The cardinal question asked of every traveler on his arrival is: “What do you think of New York?” Coolly I replied: “The skyscrapers are too small.”
Ibid., p. 51.

Though its buildings are fabled to be awesomely tall, for Le Corbusier they’re not tall enough. Because it’s an unplanned city, the skyscrapers flaunt themselves as brainless exhibitions of physical prowess, mere “acrobatic feats.”
Ibid., pp. 138-9.

Carl Ruggles, the futurist musical composer, whose immoderation in speech is the delight of his friends, made his first visit to New York some twenty years ago. When he returned to Cape Cod someone asked:
“What did you think of the sky-scrapers?’
‘By the Lord,” he replied, “I wished they were twenty times higher!’
Irwin, p. 16.

Schuyler criticized the tall new commercial buildings for being too tame, which was a reminder that the new technological advances were breeding certain expectations, encouraging invention and originality.

Hawes, N. pag.

The New York skyscrapers are out of line with the rational skyscraper which I have called: the Cartesian skyscraper.

Corbusier, p. 51.

Jazz, like the skyscrapers, is an event and not a deliberately conceived creation. They represent the forces of today. The jazz is more advanced than the architecture. If architecture were at the point reached by jazz, it would be an incredible spectacle. I repeat: Manhattan is hot jazz in stone and steel.

Corbusier, p. 161.

Skyscrapers were the architecture of the future, just as cinema was the art of the future and jazz the music of the future. Today we know all about jazz; it is more a music of the past than of the future. It is a popular black music, capable of limited development, but in gentle decline. It has had its day. And the talkies have not fulfilled the promise of the silent films: Hollywood is stuck in a rut.

Sartre, p. 125.

The skyscraper is a light radiator.

Corbusier, p. 51.

Abstracted isolation.

Rock, p. xix.

Architecture is Manhattan’s new religion.

Koolhaas, p. 21.

Skyscrapers: new white cathedrals. They are sublime, naive, touching, idiotic.

Corbusier, p. 56.

Ethereal lyricism.

Rock, p. xix.

Corbusier undoes Manhattanism with this ‘tower-in-the-park’ concept, as best expressed in the UN and Lincoln Center.

Koolhaas, p. 281.

Corbusier: “Skyscrapers are machines for making money.”

Corbett, p. 225.
An aseptic skyscraper city, an immense machine for living.
Federal Writers, p. 13.

For Chéchevlov, Corbusier's city was not modern, it was already out of date. It was a product of a retrograde culture, lagging behind science. The physical world is no longer understood as an orderly geometry, but culture has yet to catch up. The purpose of technology is not to make a city purified of complexity, a Platonic form gleaming in the sun. Spirit is earthy, not heavenly; spirit is movement, not an ideal.
Wark, Beach, p. 20.

At the same time that its gridded exterior and glass-and-steel box structure finally realized the thirty-year-old utopistic ideas of Mies van der Rohe and Le Corbusier... At full scale, its primary building slab was also lifted on a base and turned at a right angle to the grand axis of Park Avenue, the traditional street—the rue corridor—so loathed by Le Corbusier to create a new urban order of individual, object-like buildings liberated in space and set apart from one another.
Bennett, WWII, p. 68.

Le Corbusier's ineffable space [espace indicible].
Richards, p. 141.

You are in it.
Corbusier, p. 90.

On a sunny day, Jones Beach transports us into the great romance of the Mediterranean, of Apollonian clarity, of perfect light without shadows, cosmic geometry, unbroken perspectives stretching onward toward an infinite horizon. This romance is at least as old as Plato. Its most passionate and influential modern devotee is Le Corbusier.
[Antiquity]
Berman, Solid, p. 297.

Not the rational city but the playful city, not the city of work but the city of adventure. Not the city that conquers nature, but the city that opens towards the flux and change of the universe.
Wark, Beach, 19.
The skyscraper as a form has encouraged every species of romantic extravagance.
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 68.

The Beaux-Arts Ball of 1931, “Fête Moderne—a Fantasie in Flame and Silver”: In the main ballroom of the Hotel Astor ... A small-town Main Street was built as a midway but redesigned in the Cubist style, with modernist trees dotting the village green. An orchestra directed by the architect Kenneth Murchison consisted of pneumatic riveting machines, live steam pipes, ocean liner whistles and sledgehammers. A puppet show designed by the puppeteer and children’s book illustrator Tony Sarg presented robots on strings with bodies of metal coils. Ballet dancers rendered a modernistic impression of the blues.

[...] At least two dozen architects came dressed as buildings they had recently designed. These included Chester Aldrich as the Union Club, at 69th and Park, and William F. Lamb as the Empire State Building. Arthur J. Arwine, a heating contractor, came as a “low-pressure heating boiler.” Murchison came as a model tenement.

But most architecture aficionados are familiar with only the well-known image of William Van Alen as his Chrysler Building.

But they all wore helmet-like constructions of the tops of the buildings they had designed.

A. Stewart Walker was completely hidden under the black and white ziggurat at the top of his Fuller Building, at 57th and Madison; Leonard Schultze wore the rocket-shaped crown of one of his Waldorf-Astoria towers; Ely Jacques Kahn peeked out from under the castlelike top of his Squibb Building, at 58th and Fifth; Ralph Walker wore the Art Deco tower of his building at 1 Wall Street; and Joseph Freedlander—one of the heads of the costume committee—looked pretty silly under the horizontal neo-Georgian pavilions of the Museum of the City of New York, at 103rd and Fifth.

They all played supporting roles to Van Alen, the star of the group, whose attire included a Buck Rogers-style cloak and boots, both made of patent leather and flame-colored silk, with flexible inlays of the same exotic woods used on the Chrysler Building’s elevators. Indeed, his cloak was designed to emulate the design of the doors, and two shoulder ornaments replicated the eagle heads at the 61st-floor setbacks. On his head rose a strikingly dangerous-looking crown, the graduated layers of the Chrysler tower itself rising to a spire, the ensemble at least four feet above his scalp.
Gray, “Beaux-Arts” N. pag.

It’s the top of the world. All we can do is go round and round in a squirrel cage.
O’Connell, p. 141.

The skyscraper appears through a tracery of tree branches that domesticate the rude force of American capitalism.
Sharpe, p. 123.

Skyscrapers are not by day remarkable for grace or beauty of line, but by night under the electrician’s skill, they were shown to be capable of transformations which suggested rather palaces and dreams than the sober realities of the modern Land of the Dollar. [Dream City] Ibid., pp. 134-5.

Skyscrapers turn into sky shapers.
Ibid., p. 250.

Bernice Abbott: “Poetry in our crazy gadgets, our tools, our architecture.”
Rock, p. 205.

Once the city is geared for and goaded to transport itself into the future, its buildings begin to resent their anchorage to the earth.
Conrad, p. 257.

Gertrude Stein: “It isn’t the way they rise into the sky. It’s the way they spring out of the ground.”
no.cit.

Skyscrapers are an architectural accident. Imagine a man undergoing a mysterious disturbance of his organic life: the torso remains normal, but his legs become ten or twenty times too long.
Corbusier, p. 89.

Day after day in gray and desperate weather even, one can see its mystic aspiration above the skyscrapers of New York. Over our melancholy it rises high. It seems that we have taken root. The place has gotten a gravity that holds us. The suction outward has abated. No longer do we yearn to quit New York. We are not drawn away. We are content to remain in New York.
   Rosenfeld, p. 471.

Moloch whose skyscrapers stand in the long streets like endless Jehovahs!
   Ginsberg, Howl, p. 6.

They are the expression of "great movements"—the social and economic tug—of war of those "pull forces"—and they in turn discharge movement to their jagged or jittery surroundings. Their surfaces are warped or rippling. The Brooklyn Bridge is seen swaying... The World Trade Center towers twist in the wind.
   Conrad, p. 131.

A skyscraper with a facade of oblong glass eyes. No longer blind, the building has become an ocular eminence.
   Ibid., p. 85.

They were Manhattan’s Rosetta Stone, the hieroglyphics of the modern American nation; skyscraper Manhattan offered the spectator the biggest sculpture, the largest-scale self-portrait yet seen in the world, a case study, one might say, set in stone.
   Douglas, Honesty, p. 438.

The skyscrapers are greater than the architects.
   Corbusier, p. 59.

In the metropolitan archipelago, each skyscraper—in the absence of real history—develops its own instantaneous “folklore.”
   Koolhaas, p. 296.

They aren’t just gigantic; in an immense act of impersonation and appropriation, they play at being "giants."
   Douglas, Honesty, p. 447.

Like airplanes, they offer a concrete expression of human ambition, an ambition to transcend the mundane, dirty, or slow. If the airplane or racing car was the era’s purest expression of speed, the desire to overwhelm and annihilate space, the skyscraper was a materialization of pure direction.
   Kingwell, p. 62.
Image literally outdistances actuality. They won't defer to our imagery; the best we can hope for is that we might be allowed to become images of them. The skyscraper betokens the re-arising of prostrated man. Its upper tiers reclaim the sky from which he has been hurled. Whereas the image tentatively reaches out toward the infinite, the skyscraper boldly reaches up to it. Its architecture is a ladder of evolutionary elevation.

Conrad, p. 209.

The perfection of cast iron in the middle of the nineteenth century, and the super-perfection of steel in the twentieth.

Kingwell, p. 77.

Every tycoon was a nascent skyscraper. Frank Woolworth and Frank Taft clambered to the tower of the Woolworth Building, shinning up ladders to scrawl their names on the rafters.

Conrad, p. 209.

The tall skyscraper is the businessman's toy, his plaything, his gewgaw; in an expansive mood, he calls it alternatively a temple or a cathedral, and he looks upon the romantic altitudinous disorder of a modern city with the same blissful feeling that the Victorian industrialist had for his factory chimneys, belching forth soot and foul gases. The skyscraper makes him feel prosperous even when he is losing money on it. In the interests of congestion, the businessman is willing to make the streets impassable, lose thousands of dollars a day in lost motion and delay, waste millions in building more subways to promote more congestion, and in general to put up with any and every sort of nuisance, so long as he can feed his inflated romantic dream.

Kingwell, p. 83.

Walking so small with the distant windowed mountains all around pointing in the sky. Climb up there and be rich.

Donleavy, N. pag.

It seems a misty architectural shape taking up into itself like individual building stones the skyscrapers, tenements, thoroughfares, and people; and with the mass of them erecting a tower higher than any of them, even the highest, toward the sky.

Rosenfeld, p. 470.
I wish the word "skyscraper" had not been invented for them; its suggestion is one of ugliness that makes the superior European hug himself for his superior virtues. He does not do anything ugly to the skies, he says. But these great, beautiful pinnacles aspire to the skies and the clouds caress them. It would indeed be better if the European would regard them as cloud-houses, though the term is too clumsy for everyday New York to use, the initial of the word in common use taking the sound along faster.

Ford, America, p. 74.

The violence of the name—gashing nature—gives permission for unbridled and unstoppable American ambition.

N. cit.

The American Will inhabits the skyscraper; the American Intellect inhabits the colonial mansion.

Hawes, p. 176.

Manhattan has been compelled to expand skyward because of the absence of any other direction in which to grow. This, more than any other thing, is responsible for its physical majesty. It is to the nation what the white church spire is to the village—the visible symbol of aspiration and faith, the white plume saying that the way is up.

White, Here, pp. 31.

At the base of these square mountains luminous boxes there burst onto the streets colored hair

The age of the skyscraper is gone. This is the age of the housing project. Which is always a prelude to the age of the cave. This will be the last skyscraper built in New York... the last achievement of man on earth before mankind destroys itself.

Conrad, p. 209.

Setback

To a remarkable degree, New York’s buildings have been shaped by its zoning code, and it by them. It was New York, indeed, that initiated the practice of zoning back in 1919, and it has continued to be the most innovative of cities in that respect—ahead of all others, for ill or good, by about a decade. It is the shift from one zoning innovation to another that gives us our key to the city’s postwar architecture: If you know the sequence of the shifts, you can look at a building and gauge its history with some accuracy.

In the late 1940s, zoning was quite prescriptive. Builders could pile up about as much bulk as they wanted to, but there were strict rules governing how the building had to be set back as it went up. Architects were customarily instructed to fill in the zoning envelope. They did so faithfully, producing a series of nearly identical buildings in the wedding cake, or ziggurat, form. Then, in 1958, a building came along that was to have a profound new influence on architecture and zoning: the Seagram Building, designed by Mies van der Rohe in collaboration with Philip Johnson. It was a pure tower, rising straight up and set at the rear of a broad plaza. The plaza, fronting on Park Avenue between Fifty-second and Fifty-third streets, proved—to the surprise of everyone, including the architects—to be immensely popular with lunchtime crowds searching for a place to sit, picnic, or sunbathe. New York City’s planning commission thought it would be good to prod other architects and builders to provide similarly elegant structures and public spaces. Thus was born New York’s incentive zoning. For the next ten years every builder who put up an office tower went for the plaza bonus, which allowed them to build higher as compensation for leaving more space open at ground level. In the process, more new open space was created than in all the country’s other cities combined. Unhappily, many of the plazas were sterile and empty, neglecting such essentials as a place to sit. In 1975, however, zoning laws were changed so that essentials would be included. Before long, though, plazas were old hat; arcades, through-block corridors, covered pedestrian areas, and rooftop parks were in. Atriums were especially popular, in part because of the success of the atrium within the Citicorp Center at Lexington Avenue between Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth streets. Before long, Midtown was awash with atrium projects. Some turned out well—indoor parks, essentially, with “waterwalls,” cafés, and occasional entertainment. Others looked very much like big office building lobbies. Either way, the builders got lots of extra office space to rent.

Excess piled on excess. As more big buildings went up, east Midtown seemed as if it must soon tilt into the East River. One solution would have been for the builders to head elsewhere—to the neglected west Midtown area, for example. But they didn’t. Instead, they got the planning commission to modify the rules so that they could put up bigger buildings on smaller sites. This was done on a case-by-case basis, with much haggling back and forth. In the planners’ lexicon, this came to be known as “fine tuning” or “sophisticated zoning.” When you see an oversized building adorned with lots of greenhousery and skylights, you can bet it was built sometime between 1977 and 1981.

With bonuses for this and bonuses for that, and air rights as a kicker, developers began putting up “sliver” buildings. Ordinarily, very thin, tall buildings are uneconomical, amounting to mostly elevator banks and stairwells. But space was at a premium and the developers prevailed. If you see such a sliver—some thirty stories high but no wider than a brownstone, you can date its construction as 1981-1982.

_WPA Guide_, pp. xxiv-xxv.

Building setback laws occur the same time Cubism does.

no.cit.

The club sandwich is probably one of the best products of the synthetic meal mentality the gastronomic equivalent of the skyscraper in architecture. (cf. Parker: “Meals will largely consist of various pellets according to the hunger of the masses.” [Food]) [City as Body]

Beaton, _New York_, p. 53.

The setbacks imposed by zoning regulations made the architect a carver. He must, Ferris said, “cut into the mass to admit light into the interior.” Architecture is thus the ventilation of a geological solid, the erosion of a granite lump. When Ferriss declared that the skyscrapers were a “Grand Canyon,” he meant the tribute quite specifically: both have been made by reduction, emptying, a sculptural discarding of matter.”

Mumford, _Sidewalk_, p. 66.

The city has been blossoming cantilevered fronts this past year.

Sanders, _Celluloid_, p. 249.

Unlike the recent, harder-edged profiles of New York and other cities, the profusion of setback terraces softened the skyline, and textured it, but above all, gave it life, making it the public extension of ten thousand private—even intimate—realms.
The tradition of these wide, setback terraces was about to come to an abrupt end; the city's new 1961 zoning law tossed out the older, stepped design for a new and very different model. Based on the same modernist prototype as the city's boxy new office buildings, apartment houses would now be fashioned as monolithic slabs, rising from sidewalk to roof in a straight line, with little or no variation from top to bottom. Just one element marked them as residential rather than commercial towers: the narrow balconies that were pasted onto the facade at every floor, running up the length of the building. Small and mean, open not to the sky but to the concrete underside of the identical balcony of the floor above, these appendages offered none of the amenities of traditional terraces; indeed, their endless repetition worked to make each apartment (and by extension its occupants) feel like an interchangeable cog in some vast, anonymous machine. If the traditional setback terraces brought profuse signs of human life to the top of each apartment house—while at the same time giving it a distinctively idiosyncratic and highly sculptural shape—the long vertical rows of pasted-on balconies worked only to emphasize (on the very face of the building, for all to see) an interminable, inhuman repetition of units within; an artless, mechanistic stacking of floors; a cookie-cutter mentality that made every new apartment house look just like every other one.

Koolhaas, p. 82.

Architecture should not be humanized.
Baudrillard, America, p. 17.

Poetry says Epstein along with me is no longer in mythology, not in the lives of saints nor in the museum
It's right at hand in railway stations and piers de Torre, "Mental Diagram," p. 459.

Huxtable's quote is in line with the idea that nobody knows the names of the architects of the Empire State Building: "It is perhaps inconsistent that New Yorkers, who have such a love for celebrities, do not know the names of their most brilliant architects. But it is the fault of the architect... He has succeeded in making some of the biggest buildings in the world ordinary and inconsequential."

[Empire State Building]
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 81.
Rockefeller Center is a masterpiece without genius. (cf. Kingwell “Most people, when asked, cannot name the architects of the Empire State Building, nor do they much care.” [Empire State Building]) Koolhaas, p. 178.

All that solid brick and stone means nothing. Concrete is as evanescent as air. The monuments of our civilization stand, usually, on negotiated real estate; their value goes down as land value goes up... In addition to land economics, buildings, even great ones, become obsolete. Their functions and technology date. They reach a point of comparative inefficiency, and inefficiency today is both a financial and a mortal sin. Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 85.

My father and most “sound” businessmen considered the purchase of an apartment, which they called “a hole in the air,” to be a gambling venture as unwise as playing the market. Hawes, N. pag.

Space has no meaning without scale, containment, boundaries and direction. no.cit.

Adorno: “[Great] architecture asks how a specific purpose can become space, through which forms and materials, all these moments are reciprocally related to each other. Architectural fantasy would thus be the ability to articulate space through the sense of function, and let the sense of function become space; to translate purposes into formal structures.” Wellmer, p. 277

The turning away from any straightforward consideration of buildings and from the immediacy of such an experience toward a consideration of the very experience in which buildings are given. Gasche, p. 13.

Builders, notoriously, are not urbanists. Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 86.
On Madison you pass a construction site, walled in by acres of plywood on which the faces of various rock stars and Mary O'Brien McCann are plastered. Thirty stories above you, a crane dangles an I-beam over the street beside the skeleton of a new building. From the sidewalk the crane looks like a toy, but a few months back you read about a pedestrian who was killed at this site when a cable broke. DEATH FALLS FROM SKY, the Post said.
McInerney, p. 66.

An army of men, bare to the waist, operate pneumatic drills that shatter the seemingly unshatterable air. The men, raising their voices above the voices of the drills, shout angrily at one another and enter into vigorous altercations with the foremen. Others pour lakes of hot tar, or some mixture that looks and smells like hot tar. Smoking-hot tar spreads menacingly all over the place. Steam rollers, driven by irate men who peer out furiously and shout at everybody, roll with a horrible clanking and groaning and steaming. Nobody in the neighborhood can remember when these construction men were not in the process of constructing. The whole area settles down, grits its collective teeth and tries to endure.
Atkinson, p. 37.

Skyscrapers exist in time—complete even to renting offices—months before they appear in space!
That is, after the ghostly first building is all completed, on a time schedule, the pig iron to be used in the more tangible version still lies in the mill yards and the limestone in the quarries. Even the bricks are only red clay at this juncture.
Yet every joining of stone and steel, every laborer and exact payment, every delay has been accurately blue-printed.
Moreover, the real structure moves upward exactly as its paper shadow has prognosticated. (cf. Koolhaas & Kingwell on [Empire State Building's] mechanized construction.)
Josephy, p. 60.

Something had been torn down; something was being put up, but the steel structure had only just risen above the sidewalk fence and daylight poured through the gap.
Cheever, "Five-Forty-Eight," pp. 28-34.

The buildings make way for the sky, and the frame of a tower under construction, ignited by the sun on its steel, seems to catch fire.
Conrad, p. 83.

The light from the street yellowed faintly a big sign on which was a picture of a skyscraper, white with black windows against blue sky and white clouds. SEGAL AND HAYNES will erect on this site a modern up-to-date TWENTY-FOUR STORY OFFICE BUILDING open for occupancy January 1915 renting space still available inquire.

Dos Passos, p. 192.

Machine Age Temples

Rockefeller Center is the fulfillment of the promise of Manhattan. All paradoxes have been resolved.

From now on the Metropolis is perfect.

Beauty, utility, dignity and service are to be combined in the completed project. Rockefeller Center is not Greek, but it suggests the balance of Greek architecture. It is not Babylonian, but it retains the flavor of Babylon’s magnificence. It is not Roman, yet it has Rome’s enduring qualities of mass and strength. Nor is it the Taj Mahal, which it resembles in mass-composition, though in it has been caught the spirit of the Taj—aloof, generous in space, quieting in its serenity.

The Taj Mahal lies in solitary grandeur on the shimmering bank of the Jumna River. Rockefeller Center will stand in the mid-stream rush of New York. The Taj is like an oasis in the jungle, its whiteness tense against the gloomy greenness of the forest. Rockefeller Center will be a beautiful entity in the swirling life of a great metropolis—its cool heights standing out against the agitated man-made skyline. And yet the two, far apart in site and surroundings, are akin in spirit.

The Taj, in tribute to pure beauty, was designed as a temple, a shrine. Rockefeller Center, conceived in the same spirit of aesthetic devotion, is designed to satisfy, in pattern and in service, the many-sided spirit of our civilization. By solving its own varied problems, by bringing beauty and business into closer companionship, it promises a significant contribution to the city planning of an unfolding future. [Antiquity] [World City]

Koolhaas, p. 207.

Radio City Music Hall: Its elaborate facilities include dormitories, a small hospital, rehearsal rooms, a gymnasium, an art department, costume workshops. There is Radio City Symphony and a permanent troupe of 64 female dancers—the Roxyettes, all between 5'4” and 5'7”—a scriptless chorus line without any action to sustain. Furthermore, there is a menagerie—horses, cows, goats and other animals. They live in ultramodern stables, artificially lit and ventilated; an animal elevator—dimensioned to carry even elephants—not only deposits them on the stage but also on a special grazing ground on Radio City’s roof. Finally, there is Roxy’s own apartment fitted in between the roof trusses of his theater. It is round, all white plaster and the walls describe a parabola to meet in a domed top. The whole thing is really breathless—vague, spaceless, timeless. Makes you feel like an unhatched chicken looking up at the top of his eggshell. To make the whole thing even more fantastic, there are telephone dials in the walls. When you turn a dial, a red light starts to flash on and off—something to do with radio. But most painfully inactive is the colossal theatrical machine, the most complete mechanical installation in the world, including a revolving stage; three manipulable sections of stage flooring; a power-driven orchestral dais; a tank; an electrically draped curtain; seventy-five rows of fly lines for its scenery, ten of which are electrically operated; a cyclorama 117 feet by 75; six horns for motion pictures and two motion picture projection sheets; a fountain in the middle of the revolving stage which can be used for water effects while the turntable is in motion; a public-address system for amplifying speech and producing thunder and wind effects (played from records with fifty-four ribbon type); semi-invisible microphones on the stage, in the footlights, in the orchestra pit and in the sub-basement and an amplifier and six loudspeakers concealed above the proscenium; a monitor system in connection with the public address system which reproduces words spoken on the stage in the projection booths and the director’s office and even in the foyer and lobbies if desired, and which also carries the directions of the stage manager to the dressing rooms and electrical stations; an elaborate lighting system with six motor-operated light bridges over the stage, each 104 feet long, from which lens units and floods can be used for special lighting; eight portable sixteen-floor lighting towers; four spotting galleries, two on each side of the stage, and a spotting booth in the auditorium ceiling; a cyclorama strip in the floor and a floor battery of self-leveling, disappearing footlights; six projection machines, four effect machines and the usual, or rather more than usual, complication of controls. (cf. Globe Tower)
Almost without seeing daylight it would be possible to breakfast, shop, visit the consulates of six different countries, procure a passport, visit the Science Museum, lunch, enjoy movies projected on to the largest screen in the world, watch the radio performances of the National Broadcasting Company, have a hair-cut, skate, dine and dance here all in one day... from now on each new building... strives to be “a City within a City.”

It was by the canons of Cloudcuckooland that Radio City was designed.

Rockefeller Center is the most mature demonstration of Manhattanism’s unspoken theory of the simultaneous existence of different programs on a single site, connected only by the common data of elevators, service cores, columns and external envelope.

Beyond, however, is the new pinnacle of Rockefeller Center, lit from below, from within, and from behind by the setting sun, which also gilds the clouds. Reading from right to left, the eye advances from black by way of Rockefeller Center’s gray to the white of the sky. Its passage is a triumphant ascent toward the heavenly city, hovering there in midair on the other side of Fifth Avenue.

Rockefeller Center has now reached a convenient halfway point in its construction. The mice have labored, and they have brought forth their mountain. It was the Rockefeller Center building that pleased me most. . . . Alice Toklas said it is not the way they go into the air but the way they come out of the ground that is the thing. (cf. quote attributed to Stein—Irwin: “As Gertrude Stein, futurist poet, says…” See above.)

The name Radio City derives from the fact that, at an early stage in the project, someone had the notion of dedicating this site to radio broadcasting, and with the prospect of television not very distant, had conceived of putting vaudeville theatres and the Metropolitan Opera House on the same site.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 54.

In the first announcements about Radio City it was pointed out that Mr. Rockefeller, after a winter out in Egypt, had suggested an Egyptian style of architecture for the steel-framed skyscrapers which the practical men assigned to the site... No one thought of a Pyramid or tried to render it, to suit modern urban conditions, as a Babylonian zikkurat. [Antiquity]

When the plans for Radio City were first announced a healthy reaction expressed itself: no one liked them.

Architecturally, in short, Rockefeller Center is much ado about nothing. It lacks the distinction, the strength, the confidence of good architecture just because it lacks any solidness of purpose and sincerity of intention. On the one hand, the projectors have eaten into a colossal fortune with a series of bad guesses, blind stabs, and grandiose inanities; on the other, they have trimmed and played for a decent mediocrity. And the whole effect of the Center is mediocrity—seen through a magnifying glass.

The elemental divinities of wind and wave that romp along Radio City are its messengers, through whom it will radiate into the air.

Conrad, p. 257.

At last I have found something to admire in Rockefeller Center, and I hasten to express my feelings before any changes are made.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 137.

Radio City’s air conditioning was laced with ozone, to make the audience feel more happy. But not with laughing gas as its creator Samuel Rothafel had originally proposed.

An early name for Rockefeller Center was Rockefeller City.

no.cit.
But the apogee of his cleansed and hermetically sealed New York is Radio City, where he goes with Léger to make a broadcast. As its name proclaims, it’s a city within—and immunized against—the city. It’s installed “in one of the skyscrapers of Rockefeller Center,” safe from the savage, infested outdoors.

Radio City is a machine age temple installed in one of the skyscrapers of Rockefeller Center.
Corbusier, p. 33.

The Center is the apotheosis of the Vertical Schism:
Rockefeller Center = Beaux-Arts + Dreamland + the electronic future + the Reconstructed Past + the European Future, “the maximum of congestion” combined with “the maximum of light and space,” “as beautiful as possible consistent with the maximum income that should be developed”
Koolhaas, p. 207.

City Under One Roof

The tendency is toward related communities in the city—communities whose activities are confined within certain areas whose traffic does not need to travel distant streets to collect supplies and orders. It seems to me that the salvation of New York depends on the wider application of this principle... In Hood’s “City Under One Roof,” all the movement that contributes to congestion—horizontally across the surface of the earth—is replaced by vertical movement inside buildings, where it causes decongestion.
Koolhaas, p. 207.

Every business man in the city must at some time have realized what an advantage it would be to live in the building where his office is located... Put this worker in a unified scheme and he need hardly put his feet on the sidewalk during the entire day. His business, his lunch, his club and his apartment are all in the same building. The time he saves goes either into recreation or into greater production.
Hood, p. 195.

Sounding much like Bix Beiderbecke, Raymond Hood pledges not to build the same building twice.
Hood builds what Hood feels; it's the jazz ethos; his large office staff resembled a jazz band more than a bureaucracy; work was done in the ferment of creative chaos.

Ibid., p. 453.

He welcomed the absence of tradition manifest in the skyscrapers. He was New York—its people and buildings crowded every which way on an irregular non-gridlike grid, constantly shoved into instant closeups and surprising long-shot vistas—as an unending exercise in shifting perspectives as stimulation... Pressed to define his style, he responded "I am as much in the air about style as I am about everything else." Hood wore his hair cropped; it looked, in the words of The New Yorker, like "a shock of amazing gray-black bristles sticking straight up in the air." He built and flew endless kites and he loved to set off firecrackers and watch their aerial pyrotechnics. "In the air," in the American air, was just the place Raymond Hood wanted to be. [Grid] [Air]

Ibid., p. 453.

In postwar Manhattan, Lincoln Center is doomed to be one project only. It has no Beaux-Arts basement, no parks on the tenth floor—no tenth floor—and missing most of all are the commercial superstructures of the skyscrapers.

Koolhaas, p. 289.

City as building: "The girders and the roofs of the elevated railways often amount to a continuous awning, running the whole length of a street, and you can see neither the sky nor the houses to the side. There is just the thundering of the trains above your head, and the thundering of the heavy traffic in front of your nose—chunterings, of which you really can't make out as much as a word. In order not to lose the art of moving your lips, it only remains to chew silently the American cud—chewing gum." [Sound]

Mayakovsky, America, p. 48.

My ideal city would be one long Main Street with no cross streets or side streets to jam up traffic. Just one long one-way street. With one tall vertical building where everybody lived with:

One elevator
City Under One Roof: Hotel

These facilities are atomized and scattered throughout the structure in optimal locations for serving the farthest reaches of the building. Instead of a kitchen, the Waldorf has a system of kitchens. The main station is located on the second floor; from there octopus-like tentacles in the form of service pantries are extended in all directions providing contact with all the Rooms and innumerable private dining rooms on the 3rd and 4th floors. On the 19th floor, in the residential part, is a Home Kitchen where all the cooking is done by women... “Suppose that you want a dinner in your own language? Instead of the exotic masterpiece of a French chef, you may pine for your country ham and eggs, or Vermont cakes and maple syrup... It is for that reason that I put a home kitchen in the Waldorf. There are times that we all long for everyday food, so for instance if you wake up feeling hungry for chicken dumplings, or cherry pie, you simply call the American kitchen...”

The concept of Room Service is also elevated. For the benefit of those guests who choose to remain in the tower rather than descend to the living floors, it is transformed into a transcendental service that offers each visitor a choice between remaining a provincial or becoming a cosmopolite without ever leaving his room. All these services are orchestrated and coordinated by means of the telephone, which becomes an extension of the architecture. The volume of telephone calls and special services rendered by telephone to the Waldorf’s guests requires equipment that is extensive enough to serve a city with a population of more than 50,000.

Through all these revolutionary arrangements and the facilities that take care of elaborate private or public functions—balls, banquets, expositions, concerts, theatrical performances—all of them in self-contained spaces that include halls, theater, restaurants, cloakrooms, dance floors, etc., the Waldorf-Astoria becomes the social and civic center which it is today: Manhattan’s first Skyscraper House. [Food] [Technology]
Koolhaas, p. 148.

The munificence of its culture-loving patrons has finally made possible the subsidized existence of an opera only, a theatre only, a philharmonic only. Culture lovers have paid for the dissolution of Manhattanism’s poetic density. Through its amnesia, Manhattan no longer supports an infinite number of superimposed and unpredictable activities on a single site; it has regressed back to the clarity and predictability of univalence—to the known.
Ibid., p. 289.

At the turn of the century, the hotel emerges as the mode of public discourse.
no.cit.

With the Waldorf, the Hotel itself become a movie, featuring the guests as stars and the personnel as a discreet coat-tiled chorus of extras.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 293.

The hotel as glittering theater.
Hawes, N. pag.

The evolution of the Empire State Building site from dual private homes, to joined home, to hotel, to Empire State Building. Waldorf-Astoria becomes early example of isolated self-contained island of congestion.
Koolhaas, p. 289.

The old Waldorf Astoria, which was demolished to make way for the Empire State Building, was dumped into the sea five miles off Sandy Hook. The destruction of the Waldorf was planned as part of the construction of the Empire State Building.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 437.

The electrically retractable Starlight Roof rejected a building’s need to be and to have a sheltering canopy. Since the Waldorf was conceived to be in motion, its roof became a disposable hood, like that of a convertible car, rolled back to allow union with the element through which the building fancied itself to be speeding.
Conrad, p. 258.
The Waldorf had its own hedonistically revolving cosmic totem, a rug by Louis Rigal inside the Park Avenue foyer representing “The Wheel of Life.” You climbed aboard its dizzy circle, metaphorically at least, when you checked into the hotel. Such items of decor cast the buildings as autonomous worlds voyaging through space. Veined with pneumatic tubes, internally wired by 2700 telephones and a switchboard which was said in 1939 to be “large enough for a good-sized city,” transmitting messages through itself by electrical impulse, receiving dictation on its clattering teletype machines or dispatching radio signals to the air, the Waldorf seemed to have encompassed first New York and then the planet.

Ibid., p. 261.

“We’ve sat in hotel lobbies all over the world, and it’s always nice,” I said. The lobbies are always the best-looking place in the hotel—you wish you could bring out a cot and sleep in them. Compared to the lobby, your room always looks like a closet.

Warhol, Philosophy, p. 165.

Some of the Plaza suites have been done over by occupants of days gone by and the decorations remain for transients to enjoy. One gentleman whose fortunes melted away over night, left a fireplace transplanted from a Florentine Palace. [Psychogeography]

Josephy, p. 195.

Office

Since I began rightly to understand this cliff city, I look upon every casual visit to an unknown office as an adventure. There they stand, window after window up a thrust of thirty or forty stories, just alike. The elevator doors, opening to discharge passengers, reveal only white corridors and uniform doors of mahogany or oak or green-painted steel. As Gertrude Stein, futurist poet, says in her masterpiece on the Bon Marché, “One, one, there are many of them. Each is like the other.” Within, you feel, must be the same neat, sanitary uniformity—steel or near-mahogany desks and chairs of the latest fashion in office furniture; rows of scrubbed clerks and well powdered stenographers, all cut from the same pattern. (cf. quote attributed to Toklas—Sharpe: “Alice Toklas said it is not the way they go into the air …” see below.)
Irwin, p. 49-50.

It is just an office building, capable of being divided into a maximum number of cubicles.
Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 68.

Seen as terrain, the office floor resembles a series of concentric rings, nestled one into another. The innermost space, the building's core, held only the elevators and mechanical areas and is thus not contested. Surrounding the core is a ring of open floor area—"the bullpen"—given over to junior employees. Open and undivided (except by low partitions), it is noisy and lacks privacy. It offers no windows or view, looking out only upon the walls and doors of the floor's third and outermost ring: the private offices reserved for the corporate elite. These offices have actual walls. They are quiet. And occupying the perimeter of each floor, they—and only they—have authentic windows, and real views... After the war, central air-conditioning, fluorescent lighting, and a new zoning law allows office floors to become as large as desired—which turns out to be large indeed. Broad interior vistas became common with the advent of "open office" design with its low, flexible partitions. The same wide office floors that cause the building's exterior to balloon from a slender pinnacle to an ungainly box has an additional consequence: creating a vast interior field of space in which to play our a shot of stories. The scene suddenly shifts, from the outside in.

Sanders, Celluloid, pp. 136-7.

For a while our 1,2000,000 square feet of rentable area seemed almost like a new continent, so vast and vacant were its many floors.
Koolhaas, p. 88.

In the winter you can almost hear the tides of information flowing through the rooms and corridors.
Atkinson, p. 214.

I swam into the swift current of stenos and clerks and moved along with them as though my destination was still the same as their own. I felt that I could enter any building, go up in any elevator and get off at any floor. Then I could enter any office, go to the files and put my hand immediately upon that folder of correspondence that had been missing for days. I felt that with no effort I could dictate a soothing letter to that irate customer in Omaha that would make all serene once more. I felt that more than likely the girl at the switchboard, catching sight of me, might say, “Thank God, you’re back! Here, take the board a minute. I’m dying for a butt.”

Ibid., p. 100.

You can smell the newness, and it looks like a floor in any modern office building: polished vinyl-tiled corridors under a string of skylights; beige-painted walls with stenciled black arrows indicating groups of office numbers; looped fire hoses behind glass; occasional drinking fountains; numbered flush doors each with a black-and-white plastic name-plate fastened to the wall beside it.

Finney, p. 30.

The corporate epicenter is moving north, to Midtown—a place so far away, in commercial terms that it might as well be a separate city. The new corporate showplaces in Midtown—with their enormous windows, wide-open floor spaces, and, perhaps the most glorious, central air conditioning—leave the downtown towers looking like quaint but shopworn antiques.

Glanz, p. 9.

In Guglielmi’s “Nocturne” (1931), the navigator on his column in Columbus Circle plaintively confronts the featureless pile of the General Motors Headquarters.

Conrad, p. 112.

515 Madison Avenue
do to heaven? portal stopped realities and eternal licentiousness or at least the jungle of impossible eagerness your marble is bronze and your lianas elevator cables swinging from the myth of ascending
I would join or declining the challenge of racial attractions they zing on (into the lynch, dear friends) while everywhere love is breathing draftily like a doorway linking 53rd with 54th the east-bound with the west-bound traffic by 8,000,000s
o midtown tunnels and the tunnels, too, of Holland
O’Hara, p. 325.

515 Madison, DuMont Building. A 1931 art deco office building on 53rd and Madison… One of the building’s most distinctive features is a broadcasting antenna that traces back to the building’s role in the first television broadcasts of WNYW in 1938. In 1938, Allen B. DuMont began broadcasting experimental television W2XWV from the building. In 1944, the station became WABD, named for his initials. The station was one of the few that continued to broadcast through World War II. The broadcast of news about the dropping of the atomic bomb on Nagasaki in 1945 was considered the beginning of the DuMont Television Network. “DuMont Building,” N. pag.

Verticality

In the era of the staircase, all floors above the second were considered unfit for commercial purposes, and all those above the fifth, uninhabitable. Since the 1870s in Manhattan, the elevator has been the great emancipator of all horizontal surfaces above the ground floor. Otis’ apparatus recovers the uncounted planes that have been floating in the thin air of speculation and reveals their superiority in a metropolitan paradox: the greater the distance from the earth, the closer the communication with what remains of nature (i.e., light and air). The elevator is the ultimate self-fulfilling prophecy: the further it goes up, the more undesirable the circumstances it leaves behind. It also establishes a direct relationship between repetition and architectural quality: the greater the number of floors stacked around the shaft, the more spontaneously they congeal into a single form. The elevator generates the first aesthetic based on the absence of articulation. In the early 1880s the elevator meets the steel frame, able to support the newly discovered territories without itself taking up space. Through the mutual reinforcement of these two breakthroughs, any given site can now be multiplied ad infinitum to produce the proliferation of floor space called Skyscraper. [Nature] [Light] [Air]

Koolhaas, p. 82.

You enter: when you are three feet away from the entrance you have chosen, the door opens of its own accord. You are going out; the door opens again. What is the intelligence breathed into so many doors across the entrance? They explain: notice the glass bulb which appears in front of each door, on the level of your hips; an invisible infrared ray radiates from it horizontally; when you step within three feet of the door, your body intercepts the invisible ray; an electric circuit is established which operates an opening mechanism. It will open thus, automatically, ten thousand times a day if necessary.

Corbusier, p. 62.

Obviously there is no limit, within the realm of practical possibility, to the velocity at which an elevator can travel... from the view point of a passenger, boxed in a car running on well aligned, well lubricated guides. It seems no different to him whether he be traveling at 200 feet per minute or 2,000 feet per minute, provided only that the velocity be constant. High speed vertical transportation differs from high speed horizontal transportation in two important items. The distance we travel horizontally, at a given velocity, is not a matter of moment. But, due to the effect of variable air pressure, the distance we travel vertically, at a given velocity, may be a matter of considerable momentum, particularly to people with weak hearts or otherwise sensitive to such changes... The question is how fast can we safely drop a man through a given change in air pressure? At the present time it is possible to travel a thousand feet vertically at 1,000 feet per minute with no more discomfort than may be cured by one or two swallows to relieve the pressure on the ear drums. It is interesting to note, however, that a few immediate successive round trips in such an installation result in violent seasickness to those who are either not immune or not accustomed to continuous seesawing between one air pressure and another, though the difference may be only ½ inch of water pressure, as between the eightieth and the ground floors of the Empire State Building.

Reisenberg, pp. 74-5.

Everything about the vertical—aspiration, hierarchies, the Chrysler Building—is being replaced by the modular ideation in the immense Los Angeles interlock. We still dream in and of New York, but the paramount aggregate has gone to L.A.

McCourt, p. 39.

The infinity of crystal buildings—vertical villages—capped by domes of agricultural stations, traverses convulsive dynamism of clear rectilinear avenues.

In America the elevators do work, just as the water in the pipes, the lighting of the streets work, as do the trains in the stations, etc... It is something that has been accomplished; there is no longer any discussion about it.
[Plumbing] [Streets]
Corbusier, p. 62.

I live at an altitude of seventy-two feet while my friend Harrison works at a height of eight hundred and twenty feet in Rockefeller Center. And when we take the elevator at the same moment, we arrive at our doors at the same time, in forty-five seconds.

Ibid., p. 58.

Dwelling Machines

The New York house: 20 or 25’ wide, but two rooms deep.
Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. 31

If an Englishman’s home is his castle, a New Yorker’s apartment is his fallout shelter.

Blandford, p. 34.

Vogue magazine runs an article entitled, “The Rise of the Walkup.” People who once lived in Fifth Avenue town houses or Park Avenue apartments have moved into tenements, says Vogue, and praises them for “living gallantly in simplicity and liking it.”

Trager, p. 479.

If the modern apartment building was, in Le Corbusier’s terms, a ‘dwelling machine,’ it was also a viewing machine.

no.cit.

The wonder, really, is that there are any low buildings at all in Manhattan. Many of them were restricted not by desire but by material constraint. The six or eight stories of many residential blocks in Lower Manhattan is a function of human fatigue, since a walk-up—the casual-sounding name, as if everything to do with it were a sort of stroll, for a building without an elevator—cannot demand too much from its tenants’ legs and lungs.

Kingwell, p. 65.

Often the dwellers in other American cities may escape to a small garden plot, to the open road, to playing fields, even to mere restful idleness among quiet houses and streets whose tree-lined aspect offers relief from the grimness of factories and the austerity of office buildings. The New Yorker lacks such workaday variety. The end of his day's work, or his day's search for work, brings no relief. On the contrary, it intensifies his feeling of oppressive concern.

The sense of physical confinement that lurks in a removed corner of his consciousness during the day becomes overwhelming as he goes down into the crowded subway. Even his cramped living quarters offers no room for the unbending of his weary spirit. The apartment houses in which he lives are as closely packed as the office buildings where he works. The tenements look as grim as the factories. His mild but recurrent claustrophobia is fully roused by the time he has finished his evening meal; and the habit of a narrow but intense physical activity urges him like a drug. Where to go?

Federal Writers, p. 286.

Eventually, when New York was built and its population was settled, individual apartment buildings would not catch the attention like odd or flamboyant people. The eye would have grown nonchalant. The mind would be preoccupied. Apartment houses would be simply housing or real estate.

Hawes, N.pag.

The rule of thumb seemed to be the more modest the building, the more esoteric the name and claim. Exotic names of early apartment buildings: The Sunnycrest and The Ogontz, The Veronne and The Hyperion; The Sandringham, The Bertha, The Marimpol Court; a block comprised of The Fanta, The Huldana, The Helena, and The Siggins; The Nottingham, The Mannados, The King, The Zenobia, The Clifden, The Dreadnaught.

Hawes, N.pag.

The townhouse, built on East 38th Street as a swank cooperative and charming in its exterior and interior modernism, doesn't go at all until some blurb writer has the inspired idea of naming the apartments and describing them as though they were human. Immediately crowds come to view—and rent—"Harry" and "Creighton."

Josephy, p. 235.

People living in apartments, continually glancing up at the rising masses of residential buildings, or glancing out at a strange new geometry, were quietly revising their psyches. They were beginning to realize the advantages of height. [Grid] [Panorama]

Hawes, N. pag.
Once it had been the tall and ungainly new apartment house that was a self-conscious presence in the urban landscape. Now it is the old brownstone manse that is beginning to look awkward and isolated, like a survivor—brave, vulnerable, and no longer indomitable.

Ibid.,

The fear of sunlight and air, which we quaintly think of as confined to the French, is beginning to disappear among the well-to-do, who have so often been content with dark, back-to-back houses and apartments which differed only in price, space, and internal cleanliness from our worst slums.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 74.

When one thinks of their airless back rooms, untouched by daylight, whose hangings are always drawn in order to keep the occupants from staring at the blank wall ten feet away, one wonders that more murders are not committed there. Or perhaps that’s the reason so many murders are committed there.

To overcome the base deficiencies of the building, we shall call in the services of a fashionable architect, he will arrange the scenery to persuade his client that he is a Spanish ambassador, an Italian prince, or a medieval English baron—but woe to the poor client if he takes it into his head to draw back the hangings and look out the window. The chances are that he will find himself facing directly a blank honeycomb of windows: the virtues of a Park Avenue apartment are those of an honest barracks.

*Sutton Place building code: no windows north are allowed. (cf. Monaghan: “There are no windows in Fair-built buildings” [World’s Fair 1939])

Hawes, N. pag.*

The skyscraper should not have offices on the north side.

Corbusier, p. 51.

The apartment house as an expression of “modernized existence.”

Hawes, N. pag.
You can still call down to a neighbor through the dumbwaiter shaft.
Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

The meaning of the doorway.
Arnett, N. pag.

Stairs are novelties.
White, p. xix.

For two and a half months I did not see a stairway in America! They are something that has been buried. They exist nevertheless, off each corridor, but hidden behind a door that you are not supposed to open. There is a lighted sign above the door: Exit. The stair can be used in case of panic or fire. But there are no fires in skyscrapers. Already they are large enough to have their own public services, including firemen. And there are fire extinguishers, hydrants, all the necessary preventive devices. How beautiful, clean, gleaming, this apartment is, and always kept in good order and ready to use!
Corbusier, p. 61.

What makes New York so dreadful, I believe, is mainly the fact that the vast majority of its people have been forced to rid themselves of one of the oldest and most powerful of human instincts—the instinct to make a permanent home. Crowded, shoved about and exploited without mercy, they have lost the feeling that any part of the earth belongs to them, and so they simply camp out like hoboes, waiting for the constables to rush in and chase them away. I am not speaking here of the poor (God knows how they exist in New York at all!): I am speaking of the well-to-do, even of the rich. The very richest man, in New York, is never quite sure that the house he lives in now will be his next year—that he will be able to resist the constant pressure of business expansion and rising land values. I have known actual millionaires to be chased out of their homes in this way, and forced into apartments. Here in Baltimore, of course, the same pressure exists, but it is not oppressive, for the householder can meet it by yielding to it half-way. It may force him into the suburbs, even into the adjacent country, but he is still in direct contact with the city, sharing in its life, and wherever he lands he may make a stand. But on Manhattan Island he is quickly brought up by rivers, and once he has crossed them he may as well move to Syracuse or Trenton.
Nine times out of ten he tries to avoid crossing them. That is, he moves into meaner quarters on the island itself, and pays more for them. His house gives way to a large flat—one offering the same room for his goods and chattels that his house offered have vanished. A few years more, and he is in three or four rooms. Finally, he lands in a hotel. At this point he ceases to exist as the head of a house. His quarters are precisely like the quarters of 50,000 other men. The front he presents to the world is simply an anonymous door on a gloomy corridor. Inside, he lives like a sardine in a can.

The seasoned families will never live on apartment-house terms, like larvae in a honey-comb.

Irwin, p. 221.

The very rich do not wish to live in apartment houses, nor near apartment houses, and they do not like their effect on the city so they go about buying up lots to protect against projected development. Even talk of an apartment house in the vicinity throws the old guard into a panic.

Hawes, N. pag.

The apartment house as destroyer of social order: “Bring together in a single tenement-house a score of families enjoying equal incomes, each of which has hitherto lived in comfort and contentment in an isolated dwelling, and then add a family whose heads enjoy a better income, or, being of a more reckless nature, are willing to take all sorts of risk for the sake of cutting a dash, shortly thereafter, peace and comfort will vanish from most of the other twenty families, each of whom, disliking to be outshone, will also try to make a splurge and will sacrifice its children’s rights to a ‘plush rocker,’ a piano, or a too expensive dress. That means debt, sooner or later, and debt too often means drink.”

Hawes, N. pag.

At a party Paul meets a novelist he has long admired. “When I’m working,” she tells him, “I can disappear into my study and not come out... for days.” As it happens the novelist is married to a stockbroker, and lives on Central Park West. How enviously Paul envisions her study, its walls upholstered in some quieting damask fabric, its capacious oak desk overlooking the Park.

Leavitt, p. 109.
A friend tells me of his grandmother, who lived in a tiny Bronx apartment, dreamed of opening her linen closet and stepping into a paradise of clean, well-lighted space. Bahrampour, p. 101.

One evening when I was still living at Grand Street and Monroe, Isamu Noguchi came to visit me. There was nothing in the room (no furniture, no paintings).
The floor was covered, wall to wall, with cocoa matting.
The windows had no curtains, no drapes.

The architects of the Alwyn, were so pleased with their floor plans that they cautioned the industry against plagiarism under the threat of lawsuit. Hawes, N. pag.

Rosario Candela did the crossword puzzle in ink. Gross, p. 38.

The lobby was done in plush, gilt and leather. From the ceiling ancient gas fixtures had been converted to electricity whose yellow bulbs did little to brighten the mortuary effect of the mahogany-paneled walls. The pictures spotted around the place showed the city of long ago when it was at peace with itself. Spillane, p. 323.

Once all the rental buildings along the street had brass accessories, upholstered armchairs in their downstairs lobbies and thick, rich carpets leading to wood paneled elevators. Now but one carpet remains, cherished by the proud super to whose care it has been entrusted, while the rest must accept a life of plastic-covered banquettes, rubber mats and bare stone floors dictated by those who gather the rent.

Bladford, p. 31.

October 1: Moving Day.
Morris, Incredible, p. 292.

It never ceased to astonish me that some of the most luxurious apartments in the world are being constructed in the east and west 80s and 90s, while a few hundred yards away fester the slums of Harlem. New Yorkers blinker themselves against this, unless they travel by the commuter trains that slice through the ghetto at high speed. Drivers leaving the city to the north to reach the Westchester suburbs or New England are more likely to speed up one of the riverside highways than drive through Harlem. As long as the service industries prosper, and the glitter and glamour of the city are constantly refueled by fresh injections of talent and money, Manhattan will continue to gleam and shine and beckon as the prince of cities, welcoming acolytes who can make their contribution to it. That this prosperity and sophistication sours with every step that you take north of 96th Street doesn’t concern affluent New Yorkers. They simply don’t see it.

Hawes, N. pag.

The building where we have been accommodated is enormous, dense with so many kinds, a layer cake of the original inhabitants, who began as renters back in the sixties, were part of the original co-op, and now are the stunned (and imprisoned, really; where can they go?) inheritors of million-dollar apartments, schoolteachers and cookbook writers who contribute the odd recipe to the Wednesday Times and really believe in City Opera; true yuppies of the eighties generation, still in sneakers and skirts, upwardly mobile; single men in studios and lonesome Eleanor Rigbys who have occasional shouted telephone conversations with distant children, audible at seven o’clock in the morning and then again at the same time that night. [Loneliness]

Gopnik, pp. 91-2.

It is small and dark, but you like the imperfectly patched pressed-tin ceiling, the claw-footed bath in the kitchen, the windows that didn’t quite fit the frames.

McInerney, p. 9.
The apartment has become very small.
Ibid., p. 170.

The method of acquiring an apartment in those days was this. The Village Voice was published on Wednesday, but advance copies were delivered to Sheridan Square around noon on Tuesday. One waited as a nervous pad-junkie for the delivery truck and when it arrived, grabbed a copy and ran rudely, without even opening it, to the cigar store, where there were phone booths. Once inside the booth and the door was closed, one read the pad ads, and made an immediate phone calls.
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 144.

They had the coolest pad, large for the East Side, with three separate bedrooms. Everything was a haphazard yet carefully chosen. They collected art. Somehow, without paying one dime, they packed the walls of that one slum living room / kitchen with a Joe Brainard, a Rauschenberg, a Mike Goldberg, a Louise Adams, a Larry Rivers, an Oldenburg, a Marisol, a Schneemann, et alia moochifica. [Downtown] [New York School]
Ibid., p. 364.

Shortly before he died, we were invited to dinner at Merce Cunningham’s loft on Sixth Avenue. Upon entering, we were astonished to see numerous priceless works of art lining the walls. When we inquired “Is that...?” we were unceremoniously cut off and told that everything here is what you think it is. There were Johns’, Rauschenbergs and even a little Duchamp Tzank Check framed in a 70s plexiglass frame close the floor, covered in cooking grease, dust and cat piss. Over many valuable works of art were leaky skylights. During dinner we asked Merce what would happen if one of these works were damaged. He smiled and said, “But of course our friends would just make us another.”
Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag.

Furniture imprisoned in the fortress of the Manhattan Storage Company is running up enormous bills.

Soon will come the no-room apartment, with all sleeping on the same floor, all listening to the same radio speeches by the same bland speaker.
N. cit.
There is no subject dearer to the heart of an upwardly mobile New Yorker than real estate. It has everything: romance, sex, status, fantasy, the security of deep love, the fever of grand passion.

Blandford, p. 205.

The moment in the late seventies when, at parties, artists stopped talking about art and began talking about the value of their lofts.

N. cit.

Among people my age, from wealthy lawyers to struggling musicians, I never attend a party where the subject of real estate doesn’t come up. The head-shaking. The low clucks of the tongue. The “Oh, it’s so horrible,” and “If I didn’t have my place, I’d have to leave the city.” I slink away from these conversations and wonder how the demographic makeup of the city might be different in a softer market... I imagine older people in rent-controlled digs, whose parties are free from this obsession. Unless they’re going through divorce, they tend to be settled. They might have slummed it in their youth, but they had room to grow out of it.

Bahrampour, p. 97.

A couple of weeks ago I was talking to a self-described 60’s activist.

“Don’t take this wrong,” she said, “but I don’t understand your generation. Why aren’t you all in the streets fighting for the environment?”

“It is because we are fighting for real estate,” I replied.

Ibid., p. 97.

Another reason I want to sell my apartment: I loathe my fellow neighbors.

Braly, p. 399.

You pass the Helmsley Palace—the shell of old New York transparently veiling the hideous erection of a real estate baron.

McInerney, p. 134.

Leona Helmsley: The Queen of Mean.

Haden-Guest, p. 156.

How’s all the big money in New York been made? Astor, Vanderbilt, Fish... In real estate of course.

Dos Passos, p. 29.
Aerie, Mansion

Final touch of strange luxury is the roof-house, the "cote"; sometimes merely a super-cottage surrounded by painfully cultivated gardens, but often a veritable mansion. Here, twenty inhabited stores above ground, the circle swings full turn; the tenant has achieved a detachment impossible to any dwelling set on the earth. There are no neighbors to his right and left; only the tinted air above Manhattan. Though hundreds of strangers dwell just underfoot, his only connection with his six million fellow-citizens is the opening to his private elevator-shaft.

Federal Writers, p. 224.

Bette Davis's penthouse loft in Deception, all skylight view and grand piano, is said to be modeled on Leonard Bernstein's first New York loft apartment.

Hawes, N. pag.

The reason that then-Mayor John Lindsay did not send snowplows to Queens during that much publicized blizzard was that he lived on Gracie Square, where on the day in question he was lying on his terrace taking in the sun.

Leibowitz, p. 102.

On top of a distant building perches a house. Here, for our admiration, is the city penthouse, theoretical habitat of slim gazelles who dress by Schiaparelli and lunch lightly at Voisin.

Reisenberg, p. 96.

A city without chimneys.

The result has been an aerial landscape less picturesque perhaps than the chimney-pots of London or the slate roofs of Paris, but one whose essentially horizontal surfaces can accommodate all kinds of human pursuits and become, in effect, a series of open-air rooms. [Panorama]

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 251.

At first, real penthouses were simple, single-story affairs placed atop the flat roofs of early apartment houses, taking their name and style from the utilitarian structures that contained the buildings’ elevator machinery and other rooftop equipment. But they quickly sprawled and grew elegant as New Yorkers realized the value of their superior views and light, and soon architects were treating penthouses as an integral part of apartment-house design. The city’s 1916 zoning law, which mandated that the upper portion of buildings be stepped back in order to provide more light and air for the streets below, turned out to have an important side benefit: the creation of habitable terraces and the encouragement of freer variation in apartment layouts on the upper floors. The tops of New York apartment houses no longer consisted of carved stone cornices and other inanimate architectural devices, but terraces, plantings, windows, doors, and awnings that were clearly signs of life—a whole way of life, in fact, that could become the object of fantasy for those below. By the mid-1920s, traditional society-page accounts of Fifth Avenue mansions were being quickly replaced with stories of chic penthouse parties held on expansive terraces high above Park Avenue.

Even Babylon had its roof-gardens—far away and long ago. And it is a mere commonplace that where space is very valuable the rooftops will be utilized be they four stories high or a hundred and fifty.

Ford, America, p. 68.

Senator Copper of Tonapah Ditch
Made a clean billion in minin’ and sich,
Hiked fer Noo York, where his money he blew
Buildin’ a palace on Fift’ Avenoo.

Forty-eight architects came to consult,
Drawin up plans for a splendid result;
If the old Senator wanted to pay,
They’d give ‘em Art with a capital A,

Pillars Ionic,
Eaves Babylonic,
Doors cut in scallops, resemblin’ a shell;
Roof wuz Egyptian,
Gables caniptian,
Whole grand effect, when completed, wuz—hell.

When Mrs. E. F. Hutton, for example, was reluctant to sell her town-house property at 1107 Fifth, the builder contracted Rouse and Goldstone to re-create her fifty-four-room mansion atop the apartment structure. To ensure her autonomy, they cut a private porte cochere into the side of the building, which gave entrance to a private elevator that ascended directly to a three-story suite that filled its crown. In appearance, that crown might have been a grand house, planted like a dizzy fiefdom on a huge pedestal. The heavy band course above the lower floors might have been a garden wall. Like a great portal, a Palladian window at the center of the twelfth floor opened into a main foyer, with separate men's and women's coatrooms. From there, the apartment, decorated in the manner of a Newport estate, spread through a drawing room, a library, dining room, breakfast room, kitchen, and a servants' wing up to the bedrooms, sitting rooms, workrooms, sun porches, and on the roof, a laundry, children's bedrooms, a playroom, and gardens that changed with the seasons. It included a self-contained guest suite with maid's rooms and a private elevator, a silver room, cold-storage rooms for flowers and furs, and valets' workrooms, ten fireplaces, gown closets, cedar closets and bedroom balconies.

Hawes, N. pag.

A feature is numerous entrances—one for the ballroom, another for the dining room, still others for transient guests, so that Mrs. Vanastorbilt may go direct to her own party, avoiding the stares of curious outsiders.

Josephy, p. 193.

The largest apartment which we found record was sold to John Markell—41 rooms and 17 baths at 1060 Fifth Avenue for $375,000. The story goes that shortly after Mr. Markell moved in, a servant unlocked a door that nobody had notice and discovered ten rooms they didn't know they had.

Ibid., p. 224.

The Very Rich Man set an elaborate example, involving numerous residences, each one adapted to a season of the year (Thanksgiving until the New Year in a mansion in New York, spring on a farm on Long Island, summer in Newport, fall in the Berkshires, a winter interlude in Aiken, South Carolina) and each involving domestic machinery worthy of English nobility. The Rich Man lived in only two or three permanent homes; the Prosperous frequently didn't own either his New York town house, his summer house, or his carriage, and retained fewer servants. More industriously, the Well-to-Do Comfortable Man adjusted the facts of his existence, boarding in the country for the summer months, leasing a row house on a cross street of the city, as did the Well-to-Do Uncomfortable, who had “a certain fashion to maintain, but... not the means to do it with either comfort or decency.”

Hawes, N. pag.

The sort of apartment the mere thought of which ignites flames of greed and covetousness under people all over New York, and for that matter, all over the world.

Gross, p. 25.

As early as 1921, Park Avenue is hailed as the new Fifth Avenue.

Hawes, N. pag.

Park Avenue offers a new and revised version of well-to-do urbanity; it spells out how the modern aristocracy intends to live now: lavishly, privately, but also cooperatively and efficiently, well served and well serviced, “near ‘business” (and yet not actually, in their homes, on a business street). From a Park Avenue address, it is walking distance to the new “Little Wall Street” of Madison Avenue, to the theaters and clubs of the West 40s, to Grand Central and points north and west. The city encircles, but it does not encroach.

Ibid.

The luxury apartment is house-like, but does not feel exactly like a house, however. It is a question of more than the verticality or common stairs or even the doorman and gilded lobby. The apartment has a different character. Almost in spite of itself, it has developed different virtues. It is social rather than domestic, pretentious rather than practical. More than a sequence of spaces programmed for family-oriented activities like reading or sewing or games playing, it seems to have been conceived for more sophisticated, more courtly behavior. The majestic entryways, carriage turnabouts, and gilded lobbies set the tone. Inside an apartment, the most prominent spaces are designed for entertaining on a grand scale, almost like Fifth Avenue mansions. Rooms en suite that sweep through fifty or sixty feet of elegant contiguous space and oversized windows that look down on busy city streets put one in the mind of theater people, literary soirees, the cosmopolitan gatherings that are described in novels and newspaper columns.
The interior decoration of an apartment, too, conjures up a world of wealth and refinement. It is lavish but specific—parquet floors, marble or carved fireplaces, painted beams, plaster friezes, elaborate lighting fixtures— and is intended to render rooms “artistic.”

Ibid.

City Homes for Those with Country Houses.

Ibid.

The specifics of the Dorilton are as carefully chosen as a lady’s wardrobe: mahogany, oak, white enamel, and bird’s-eye maple trim throughout; high wooden wainscoting carried under a Dutch shelf molding for the dining room; five feet of marble wainscoting for the kitchen; French plate glass above French tiles in the bath; glass doors between major rooms. In most buildings, there are extra little touches here and there like signposts of taste—a sculpture niche, a Wedgwood frieze, a pair of silver wall sconces, a Delft-tiled fireplace.

Ibid.

The new apartment houses, which look like mansions blown into ridiculous proportions.

Ibid.

In the past decade Greenwich Village, Washington Square, Murray Hill, the châteaux of Fifth Avenue have somehow disappeared, or become unexpressive of anything. The city is bloated, glutted, stupid with cake and circuses, and a new expression “oh yeah?” sums up all the enthusiasm evoked by the announcement of the last super-skyscrapers.

Ibid.
The Empire State Building is both sign and ambassador of New York, capital of the world—or, as we should better say, after Walter Benjamin’s characterization of Paris and its epoch, capital of the twentieth century.

Kingwell, p. 19.

The world surveyed from the Eiffel Tower is no longer the world to be owned. That site has shifted, and its new coordinates, are Thirty-fourth and Fifth.

Ibid., p. 61.

This was no mere practical result; rather, it was the thin edge of a massive theoretical wedge that dramatically changed American social thinking. The Empire State, that sweeping gesture in the positional-goods race of height, is also an expression of coordinated technocratic ambition, a foreshadow of American megaprojects to come, from the Hoover Dam to the space program. The central-command progressivism of the 1930s morphed, over the course of the Second World War, into what used to be called the military-industrial complex.

Ibid., p. 111.

A cathedral not merely of architecture but of Americanness.

Ibid., p. 35.

Empire State Building site: in 1827 it was farmland, and William Backhouse Astor was able to acquire it for $20,500. 1856—free-standing brownstone 1893—The Waldorf Hotel opens 1897—becomes Waldorf Astoria 1925—site bought by real estate speculator 1928—sold to Bethlehem Engineering Corporation for a sum rumored to be between $14 million and $16 million.

Conrad, p. 211.

The groundbreaking of the Empire State Building—eight years ago, a short time when one stops to think, that this land was part of a farm.

Kingwell, p. 6.

The hotel at Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street represents a transitional moment, regrettable commercial enterprise corrupting, however luxuriously, a venerable Manhattan site. When it, in turn, made way for a skyscraper, and moreover a skyscraper explicitly organized around ideals of speed and efficiency, clearly the past world of New York was gone forever. Manhattan is finally, and irreversibly, what most of us now consider it, a thick palimpsest of newness and sometimes greatness, a city forever erected anew on the bones and dust of the past.

Ibid., p. 100.

Mechanized construction: Down below, in the streets, the drivers of the motor trucks worked on similar schedules. They knew, each hour of the day, whether they were to bring steel beams or bricks, window frames or blocks of stone, to Empire State. The moment of departure from a strange place, the length of time allowed for moving through traffic and the precise moment of arrival were calculated, scheduled and fulfilled with absolute precision. Trucks did not wait, derricks and elevators did not swing idle, men did not wait.

Koolhaas, p. 141.

On each floor, as the steel frame climbed higher, a miniature railroad was built, with switches and cars, to carry supplies. A perfect timetable was published each morning. At every minute of the day the builders knew what was going up on each of the elevators, to which height it would rise and which gang of workers would use it.

Kingwell, p. 116.

As automatic architecture, there was nothing that was not easy. (cf. "It seemed that an entire nation had been mobilized to build the [World Trade Center].")

Douglas, Honesty, p. 436.

So perfect was the planning, so exact the fulfillment of the schedule that workmen scarcely had to reach out for what they next required. As if by magic, their supplies appeared at their elbows.

Kingwell, p. 116.

The Empire State Building rose so fast it seemed to appear by magic, downloaded from the ether of technological possibility.

Ibid., p. 97.

At one point the "velocity" of this automatic architecture reaches $14\frac{1}{2}$ stories in ten days.

Koolhaas, p. 141.
This was the captivating technology of the Ford-hatched assembly line married ingeniously to the old-world appeal of haptic materials such as polished marble and carved granite.

Kingwell, p. 9.

It was not only built using assembly-line principles, it was itself the product of an assembly line that, in the event, produced just one product. Construction is here reduced, or rationalized, to the point of simple assembly. The building is unique, yes, but only as a mere matter of fact: there could easily be other tokens of the exquisitely precise design erected elsewhere.

Ibid., p. 160

“Sky boys” and “poet builders” conjuring the Empire State out of thin air.

Conrad, p. 211.

The finished Empire State Building is a sign, a representation in built form, of the logic of construction.

Kingwell, p. 94.

Fed by spooling assembly lines and thrusting upward in the middle of exurban Manhattan, a mega-project motivated by equal parts grandiose rhetoric and profit motive, it is a great machine work that sweeps away its surroundings, obliterating in a moment not just the previous occupants of its site but all previous conceptions of Manhattan, New York, and America.

Ibid., p. 110.

Empire State is not a new load placed on bedrock. Instead, the inert load of earth and stones put there by Nature has been dug away and a useful load in the form of a building has been placed there by man.

Koolhaas, p. 139.

Every building is an implied hymn to what lies beneath its surface, the plumbing and electricity and telephone lines, but none more so than the implausible Empire State, erected on the very cusp of capitalism’s worst ever spasm, what economists like to call a market correction and other people call, simply, a crash. The building goes up just as the market goes precipitately down, a living challenge, in its very uprightness, its physical assertion of height created and maintained, against the possibility of downfall.

The building’s design communicates this message, but it is delivered even more tellingly in accounts of the building that emphasize its gargantuan appetite for materials, like those still distributed by its in-house publicity department. It is, in this way as in so many others, a fitting synecdoche for New York itself, the city of self-conscious massiveness in consumption and production. Unlike the signature buildings of a more recent architectural moment, the Empire State makes itself a kind of organic genius of destruction (of raw materials and money) and creation (of office space and... money). In this way, it utterly fulfills the structural and commercial drives of its creators, realizing along the way the inner logic of all hyper-technological modernism. (cf. “The violence of the name—gashing nature—gives permission for unbridled and unstoppable American ambition.” [Architecture])

Kingwell, p. 112.

Upon the completion of the Empire State Building: The familiar skyline, so much the stuff of future cinematic fantasy and youthful ambition, was now substantially done. The city’s grid was set, its compression of desire and energy made into a presumptive ideology of constant circulation and exchange. [Grid]

Ibid., p. 7.

When the scaffolding was still up around the mooring mast of the Empire State tower it was far better in design than the structure that was finally revealed.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 69.

In 1932, the journalist Elmer Davis described the “newest New York” as a “sixty-story city unoccupied above the twentieth floor. Some nicknamed the Empire State Building the “Empty State Building.”

Douglas, Honesty, p. 460.

After it is built, it stands unlet. and can only pay its taxes by collecting dollars from the sightseers who ascend to its eyrie for the stupendous view.

Trager, p. 468.

“As a commercial building, it has never stood out and has never made sense,” a broker with Helmsley-Spear, the building’s manager, told me, sitting at a desk on its twenty-ninth floor surrounded by images of the exterior we could not see. "It's more about being gorgeous to look at."
Kingwell, p. 143.

One longtime tenant, descending to the lobby coatless one winter day, overheard a visitor say, "Hey, do you think there are offices in this building?" "Well, yes. I mean, it's not like the Eiffel Tower, where you can see that there's nothing there," the tenant said, shaking her head and laughing. "Do they think it's all an empty façade, with just a tourist shunt running people from bottom to top?"
Ibid., p. 128.

Most people, when asked, cannot name the architects of the Empire State Building, nor do they much care. (cf. Koolhaas "Rockefeller Center is a masterpiece without genius." [Architecture])
Ibid., p. 35.

Like all contemporary principles of the project, Lamb always refers to the building simply as "Empire State" rather than, as both visitors and native New Yorkers tend to do today, with the full title of "The Empire State Building."
Ibid., p. 16.

It is beautiful, certainly, but not revolutionary in its looks the way buildings by Corbusier, Mies, or Groupius, some of them going up at the very same time are. Its American solidity contrasts with the European flights of fancy that make the French and German designers into visionaries, social planners, utopian philosophers.
Ibid., p. 35.

In 1932, the year after the Empire State Building opened, Philip Johnson organized a landmark show, "The International Style," at the Museum of Modern Art declaring the Empire State Building's obsolescence by promoting the architecture pioneered by Le Corbusier and others. The show established the sleek glass-curtain skyscraper as a central modernist ideal.
Ibid., p. 106.

Not for the Empire State, or New York, the historically conditioned grandiosity of Albert Speer's almost exactly contemporary structures. Speer famously advised Hitler to construct massive buildings with traditional load-bearing masonry rather than steel or concrete frames. Such edifices would be longstanding but noble, such that when they eventually crumbled, a thousand years hence, their broken columns and tumbled-down stone walls would convey a message of glorious achievement followed by decay. Steel frames would simply topple and tangle, breaking into a refuse pile of rusted beams and glass shards—the very images we now associate with the chaotic scenes of the postwar imagination. Speer instinctively sensed that the Nazi desire for ostentatious posterity, the dreams of a new Roman imperium and millennial Reich, would be served better by classicism than by the sleek modernism of the architectural moment. The architect Otto March had designed for the 1936 Olympiad what Speer called “a concrete structure with glass partition walls”—a scheme Hitler furiously rejected, calling for the cancellation of the games. Hitler, Speer wrote, angrily vowed “never [to] set foot inside a modern glass box like that,” a perverse endorsement of at least some of the revolutionary ideas of architectural modernism. [Apocalypse] [Destruction] [Ruins]

The Empire State embodies its own kind of technotopian dream: not the genocidal Nazi fantasy, of course, but an extended celebration of machine logic and the forces of capital. The building achieves, in its smooth and hygienic Huxleyan fashion, a totalitarian ideal of command and control, the inexorable logic of assembly line and social engineering. The building is all about vertical space, and in Manhattan’s force-grown grid, space is money: upward is not upward for its own sake, but for the sake of possibility and profit. On the cramped Manhattan street plan, there is nowhere else to go, and so the skyscraper was born. The Empire State’s relation to the grid is therefore symbiotic, born of its pressures but also exploiting its conduits, the streets and pipes and gas lines that tangle beneath its surface. It is a node growing, massing, developing in the entire network of power and commodity, rising like a magic tower from sheer force of energy concentrated below. [Grid]

It is another cold day, a weekday in the last sunny dregs of fall, the city gathering itself for the giddy push of the holidays and the long wet months of the New Year. The lobby prep space and ticketing zone are filled and jostling, the lines at each way station of the elevated pilgrimage long, and long-suffering. You are yourself impatient to get to the top, for you have only a little time. Not for you the bovine sluggishness of the sight-seeking tourist, that slowing of the soul that comes, and finds its gait, with the gallery shuffle, the cathedral crawl. You have just left the jaywalked grid, the laced and scored streetscape, and still have the knifing urge to cut through the crowd.

You get to the top faster than ever, faster than anyone. And here there is a small crowd, as usual, and you are surprised, as usual, to remember how small it is here, really. Just a balcony, a gift shop, the dimensions of a not so grand apartment, especially in this city of grand apartments.

_Ibid._, p. 201.

Skin, Shadows, Reflection, Light

It doesn’t stand on earth, rather it’s an anchor for the sky.

Conrad, p. 213.

The Empire State’s dirigible mast announced its new upside-down ambition. Rather than being founded on earth, it was tethered to the clouds. Buildings that couldn’t fly transmitted themselves to the air by broadcasting themselves.

Conrad, p. 257.

Its foundations are firmly planted in bedrock; its stairwells are encased in thick concrete, and its steel interior, married to the limestone cladding, is more like a vertical radiator than the spindly framework typical of newer towers.

Kingwell, p. 124.

The rock and earth removed in digging the foundation of the Empire State Building weighted three-quarters as much as the building itself. This fact caused Henry Ford to worry about the building’s potentially disastrous effect upon the rotation of the earth itself.

Feininger, _Forties_, p. 8.

Pure product of process, Empire State can have no content. The building is sheer envelope… The building is process, not a fixed state.

Kingwell, pp. 9, 16.

The skin is all, or almost all.

Koolhaas, p. 141.
The truth of the building lies in its entire universe of use and meaning: the webs of relation and work that spin through its webs of plumbing and wiring; the shunting workers and tourists who find themselves here today, or tomorrow, and carry away memories and postcards; the entire palimpsest of history, of events and moments over seventy-five years, which together embed the site, rising in layers with each passing year to a soaring height of lived reality equal to the physical span.

The truth of the building is me sitting here right now, thinking these thoughts, my models before me, experiencing the building as a place and not just a space—not just an orientation in three dimensions, in other words, but an orientation to how I walked here this morning, and who is nearby and what they said as I came in, and how I will leave, too soon, always too soon, and walk up Fifth Avenue to another Shreve, Lamb & Harmon creation, the brick-clad little brother at 500 Fifth, with its similar setbacks and funny family-resemblance familiarity, where I will stop in at the ground floor and buy some cigars at Nat Sherman, a shop that has been here since the year before the Empire State opened its doors, and then walk along Forty-second Street to Grand Central Terminal, where I will order a manhattan—because, today, what else?—and drink it looking over the Grand Concourse and think of those ethereal, iconic black-and-white pictures of the same place, from another era, with hatted men and gloved women.

Kingwell, p. 161.

The automonument is not the monument as described, for example, in Aldo Rossi's structuralist architectural theory: the building that becomes prominent over time, defining a crossroads of arranging an urban fabric around itself via use. Rather, the automonument simply asserts its monumentality, makes itself its own argument. No architectural program is necessary, or even desirable. The paradox of the automonument is that, as a building, it is both there and not there; it is dream architecture. [Dream City]

Ibid., p. 15.

Empire State will gleam in all its pristine beauty, for our children's children to wonder at. This appearance comes from the use of chrome nickel steel, a new alloy that never tarnishes, never grows dull.

The disfiguring shadows which so often comes from deeply recessed windows, to mar the simple beauty of line, in Empire State are avoided by setting the windows, in thin metal frames, flush with the outer wall. Thus, not even shadows are allowed to break the upward sweep of the tower.

Koolhaas, p. 141.

One dramatic feature of the Empire State Building is its tendency to disappear—that is, as Wittgenstein said of language, to "lie hidden in its obviousness." All icons are more than themselves; it is worth remembering that they are, likewise, less than themselves.

Kingwell, p. 19.

The Empire State Building is, at once, always a building and never a building. It is always present, always absent; forever full and empty; unignorable and virtually invisible. When, fifty years into its existence, it passes from being an architectural achievement and becomes historic, a landmark, a site of preservation, it becomes more treasured yet harder to appreciate. Now, a quarter century later still, we may be forgiven for confessing that we sometimes wonder if we have ever really seen it.

Ibid., p. 35.

The structure of transcendence does not much guide the business conducted within its elevated walls.

Ibid., p. 83.

In an age overwhelmed by science and its instrumental application, technology, we somehow find it unacceptable to emphasize anything other than the use-value of even so obvious an illustration of human desire. Al Smith, singing the transcendental pleasures of the Empire State Building in his 1934 souvenir pamphlet, Above the Clouds, could not resist doing the very same thing. "The Tower has served many purposes besides that of a platform to look out on the world beneath," he said of the building’s summit. "Aviation authorities, many times each week, telephone to learn the wind velocity and the height of the ceiling above its pinnacle. Scientists have used it as a laboratory for the study of radio transmission; for the study of wind velocity and pressure; and for the study of electrical action."

Ibid., p. 59.

The building even becomes, after the fashion of all perverse cultural physics, a mythic unit of energy.

Ibid., p. 132.
Sufferers from hay fever and sinus afflictions sought relief in its vast elevator shafts. “One dear old lady rose up and down for hours on the fast-moving elevators in an effort to cure or reduce the intensity of approaching density.”
Ibid., p. 59.

Reproduction, Replication

The Empire State Building may be the most reproduced building in America.
Kingwell, p. 122.

Guy de Maupassant may have wanted to lunch in the Eiffel Tower café in order not to look at what he regarded as a cast-iron monstrosity, but workers in the Empire State Building seem to want multiple images of their tower around them, toys and photos and paintings, perhaps because they are virtually the only New Yorkers who cannot look up, or out a window, and see it. They feel deprived, perhaps, of that sense of connection, the linked sightlines of the shared nodal view—I see it and see you seeing it too—that is offered to every other New Yorker. It may be that a model or a poster, held near, allays the sense of interior blindness, a felt invisibility of one’s identity with the building when inside.
Ibid., p. 128.

Not long ago, taking a wrapped thirty-inch model of the building into the elevator, the product of some inspired haggling in a tourist shop across Fifth Avenue, I was stopped. “The supervisor thinks that’s a drill,” the young guard said, pointing to his exposed X-ray view of the building’s familiar pinnacle, which did indeed resemble a power tool if not quite a deadly weapon.

Standing there on the security threshold, off the street but not yet quite inside the building, I said, “It’s the building.” Meaning, of course, not that it was the building, since we were standing inside that, but a model of the building. Actually, an X-ray image of a model of the building. “Obviously it’s the building,” I said, pointing at the screen. Of course it was not obvious at all. It was the opposite of obvious.

“Obviously it’s the building,” the guard repeated, nodding in what he probably did not realize was agreement in a strange metaphysical bargain.
Ibid., p. 129.
There is a scale model of the building in the lobby itself complete with lighting that stands in a glass case next to the ground-floor information desk.

All the multiple reproductions of the building, especially when keyed to size and greatness, which on the surface appear to constitute an extended exercise in type-token metaphysics and so affirm the superlative nature of the building, actually work to diminish, and then eliminate, the physical reality of the building. They and it are caught in a new, simulacral economy typical not only of the twentieth century’s image-proliferating visual culture but also of the culture of tourism more generally. New York becomes suffused with visual memory, images and dreams entertained before. The Empire State is, in this sense, just one of a series of much-reproduced images that cycle through our collective experience, a thing whose materiality shimmers and goes out of focus with each added postcard or tchotchke.

These would not be models or copies, just late-model examples of the same. We cherish the building’s uniqueness in part because, as we think more deeply, we realize how contingent it is! There could be any number of Empire State Buildings—how wonderful that there is only this one! Of course any such desire for duplication is absurd, and misses the point. A second full-scale building, fancifully called a “model,” would no more make the first “building” definitive than a six-inch-high model does. Neither edifice can escape the logic of their shared subjection to cycles of image-making. Like a Borgesian library of self-collapsing taxonomy, the entire set of feedback loops of the Empire State Building is just part of its relation to all other buildings, both those literally around its space and those surrounding it in time, themselves including both the precursors of the past, which are set into a different position and meaning by its greatness, and those that will come after it, unable to ignore that achievement.

Images obscure as well as celebrate, and cultural icons shoulder a heavy burden of metaphysical speculation in the very act of being represented.
Proliferation

An anonymous man from Tacoma, Washington, used 135 decks of playing cards to construct a house of cards in the form of the Empire State. Another man carved a four-foot-high version out of soap. Students from Kelvedon Hatch Primary School in Brentwood, England, closed the distance between them and the New York landmark by constructing a seven-foot eight-inch model that used 3,212 matchboxes. T. B. Wu fashioned a ten-foot-high model out of plaster and powdered sugar. Models have been built at all scales from Lego blocks, carved out of cheese, chocolate, and butter, stitched into crochet samplers and embroidered onto jackets, made into abstract prints and decorative batik wall coverings. It has been mimicked in stacked champagne glasses in its own lobby, and there is at least one headstone carved in its likeness, marking the grave of a man who worked on its construction.

Kingwell, p. 135.

Officials estimate that more than a billion postcards featuring its image are produced every year. These are supplemented by commemorative posters, pennants, place mats, and eventually, the billboard of the late century T-shirts.

Ibid., p. 134

By the fiftieth anniversary of the building in 1981 it was estimated that some 80,000 miniatures of all kinds had been sold, making the building the most replicated structure of all time. By the seventy-fifth anniversary in 2006 the number will likely have reached 150,000 or more.

Ibid., p. 135.

Such items are still to be found in the shops scattered around the base of the building, along with crystal, steel, plastic and rubber models of the building, ineffective pencil erasers in its image, and even pewter salt and pepper shakers in the shape of the respective summits of the Empire State and the Chrysler buildings—a fitting counterpart to the sphere and obelisk shakers designed for the 1939 World's Fair.

Ibid., p. 134.

The spire of the Empire State Building reflected in a pool on the sidewalk.

Conrad, p. 175.
I see a shot of the summit, apparently taken from a helicopter; I remember the sight of soaring planes of limestone when I paused very briefly to look up while crossing Thirty-third Street at lunchtime; I recall the last time I walked over the Brooklyn Bridge at night, after eating pizza in Park Slope, and noticed that the building's signature lights were not red, white, and blue, though I can't now remember what they were; I visualize the opening sequence of a popular television show, now in reruns, that uses a titled time-lapse image of the building against a cerulean sky.

Empire State seemed almost to float, like an enchanted fairy tower, over New York. An edifice so lofty, so serene, so marvelously simple, so luminously beautiful, had never before been imagined. One could look back on a dream well-planned.

Ibid., p. 15.

The Empire State Building, though not an artwork—not, that is, created first and foremost to be viewed with rapt attention—nevertheless has acquired such a status.

Ibid., p. 142.

A sight of Manahatta in the towering needle multi-faceted insight of the fly in the stringless labyrinth Canada plans a higher place than the Empire State Building
O'Hara, p. 325.

Scale

Al Smith, the former governor of New York who became a mascot for the Empire State, demonstrated that the building was a prodigy by having himself photographed on the observation deck looking up through a telescope at an 6'7" giant, reputed to be the world's tallest man.

Conrad, p. 209.

"Stone of this size will be used all the way to the top of the building, in keeping with its massiveness," Lamb told reporters a month before steelwork began on the building.

Kingwell, p. 110.
I reach such states, in which my brain feels so open-so full of light, it feels huge, it feels as big as the Empire State Building.

View

Some tourists seem to think the whole thing is there just to support the view.

Kingwell, p. 124.

The observation deck becomes a kind of safety valve or ritual space of avoidance. Visitors are herded (sometimes, alas, literally) along vertical chutes of permitted access, deposited into the controlled space of the uppermost view, a platform far smaller than most people usually imagine, and then ushered back down to the street from which they have come.

Ibid., p. 59.

Sitting here, in the office on the twenty-ninth floor, we are all at sea.

Ibid., p. 153.

That is one reason I write from a position of actually sitting in the building, touching the nose on my face you might say.

Ibid., p. 160.

The right building for New York, for the New World, for the Empire State, for the American empire itself. Joyful but tough, a place to think big thoughts and survey worlds to conquer. From here, I look down at the city, and the world, I will overcome. Poems are not written for this building.

Ibid., p. 60.

Empire

The inspiration for Empire came from an eighteen-year-old named John Palmer, while he was camping out on the roof of the Film-Makers’ Cooperative. Seen from Palmer’s sleeping bag each night, the Empire State Building six blocks away dominated the New York skyline. Palmer had come to New York from Hartford, Connecticut, with an art background and an interest in film. He knew about Warhol’s Sleep, although he had not seen it. "It occurred to me, after Man Ray, what about a movie of a building?" Palmer wrote. "As a movie. Not as time lapse or National Geographic but as MOVIE?"

One day while he and Jonas Mekas were lugging copies of Film Culture to the post office branch at the Empire State Building, Palmer suggested, "We should tell Andy. This is a perfect icon, a perfect image for Andy?" Mekas presented the idea by talking to Andy Warhol and Marie Menken.

By the summer of 1964 Andy Warhol had moved away from the editing of Sleep, the multiple camera setups of Haircut, and the narrative of Batman/Dracula. Empire required only a handful of decisions: where to point the camera, and when to turn it on and off. Around this time the Empire State Building's spire was floodlit by master lighting designer Douglas Leigh, just in time for the opening of the 1964 World's Fair. Before, it would have been too dark to film.

Jonas Mekas had recently rented a large Auricon sound camera, to film a movie of the Living Theater's production of The Brig. He shot the play in real time, and two days later, Diane di Prima showed the movie at the New York Poets Theater. The sound was crude and the process simple, so Warhol decided to shoot the Empire State Building with an Auricon. Marie Menken, who worked in the Time-Life Building, arranged with Henry Romney that Warhol, Jonas Mekas, John Palmer, and Gerard Malanga could set up the camera in Romney's Rockefeller Foundation office on the forty-first floor of the Time-Life Building. On the evening of July 25, 1964, while the sun was still visible, Mekas set the camera on the tripod and framed a shot of the world's largest building. Warhol looked through the lens, said yes, and turned the camera on at 8:10 P.M., about ten minutes before sunset.

In the background, dwarfed by the Empire State Building, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Tower was topped by a light that flashed every quarter hour, so that in the film the audience can not only feel time going by but see it as the lights flash. The passing of time and the change of light are the only dramatic events in the film, with the exception of a brief glimpse of Warhol and John Palmer reflected in the window at the beginning of reel seven. (This image of the filmmaker had never been mentioned until Callie Angel noted it in restoring the film—which suggests how few people had actually watched the legendary film in its entirety.)

Surviving bits and pieces of description from Jonas Mekas's column suggest the jovial tone of those long hours of filming. When Andy gazed at the building, he repeatedly said, "An eight hour hard-on!" Henry Romney jokingly tried to goad Andy into making the movie more action-filled: "Andy?! NOW IS THE TIME TO PAN!" John Palmer occasionally noted, "The lack of action in the last three twelve-hundred-foot rolls is alarming." At one moment the group makes a string of campaign promises, and Andy contributes, "Jack Smith in every garage."

After the night of shooting, 654 feet of film were delivered to the lab. But when John Palmer went to pick them up, the lab would not release the film without payment. He called Warhol from a phone booth. "Ohhh, John, I don't have any money to pay for thaaat' he said. "It will just have to stay in the lab." Palmer suggested he could try to get the $350 from his mother; if so, he would have to appear on the credits as co-director. The phone went silent for fifteen seconds, Palmer recalled, and then, "Andy, in a voice I never heard and will never forget, said, 'Now you're learning.'"

The result is a moving picture of a stationary object, a silent film shot on sound equipment. Whatever the circumstances of its communal creation, Empire became an indelibly Warhol image. "Andy was so taken with the Auricon" recalled Mekas, "that he abandoned the silent camera. Unfortunately, I am guilty of that."

Gerard Malanga: "It was John Palmer who came up with the idea for Empire. John, Jonas Mekas and I changed the reels for Andy. He barely touched the camera during the whole time it was being made. He wanted the machine to make the art for him.

We started shooting around 6 p.m.—it was still daylight—and completed around 1 a.m. The first two reels are overexposed because Andy was exposing for night light, but it was all guesswork. What happens in the course of the first two reels, and partway through the third, is the building slowly emerges out of a twilight haze, balancing out the exposure for the darkness that slowly blankets the sky.”

Andy looked through the lens, composed the shot and told Mekas to turn it on, while he encouraged Henry and John to "say things intelligent." Later, on seeing the rushes, he opted for the purity of silence in the movie.

Most people thought Andy was really crazy when they heard he had made a film of the Empire State Building from dusk till dawn, but Andy was excited. "The Empire State Building is a star," he announced. "It's an eight-hour hard on. It’s so beautiful. The lights come on and the stars come out and it sways. It’s like Flash Gordon riding into space.”

Gerard Malanga: “I remember once—this happened so many different times and in varied contexts—we were attending the premiere screening of Empire at the Bridge cinema in New York. We were standing in the rear of the auditorium. Andy was observing the audience rather than film, and people were walking out or booing or throwing paper cups at the screen. Andy turned to me, and in his boyish voice said, ‘Gee, you think they hate it… you think they don’t like it?’ Empire was a movie where nothing happened except how the audience reacted.”

Like the death-and-disaster series, Empire was a work inspired by an amphetamine vision. “Among the younger artists Andy was involved with alcohol got almost completely phased out by marijuana in 1964, and then three months later by LSD, which made alcohol seem gross,” recalled one observer. “But while everyone else mixed speed and grass and LSD, which made everything softer and more confused, Andy didn’t give up the speed for a second.” [Drugs]

Bockris, Warhol, p. 207.

At about the six-and-a-half-hour mark, the floodlights illuminating the building are dimmed, and for the remaining ninety minutes of the film its ostensible subject is invisible.

Kingwell, p. 144.

(The following interview was recorded with Andy Warhol at 4:30 A.M. on the 43 floor of the Time-Life Building, just 30 minutes after the completion of the shooting of the 8-hour “underground” movie, EMPIRE, in the summer of 1964.)

Gerard Malanga: Could you tell me who you felt as you were being taken up into the building?

Andy Warhol: The actual elevator ride to the top of the Empire State Building took as little as one minute, but a visit to Empire State is an experience that each visitor will remember all his life.

My thrills began the moment I stepped aboard a modern express elevator which whisked me to the 86th floor Observatory at a speed of 1,200 feet per minute. A special elevator took me to the 102 story peak.

GM: What did you see once you reached the top?

AW: Once atop the Empire State Building, the most spectacular view in the world was spread at my feet. From the outdoor terraces or the glass-enclosed, heated Observatory on the 86th floor (1,050 feet or 320 meters), other buildings are dwarfed by this engineering marvel.

The view is even more amazing from the circular, glass-enclosed Observatory on the 102nd floor (1,250 feet or 381 meters). Here I was often at cloud level nearly a quarter of a mile above the streets.

I could distinguish landmarks as far away as 25 miles and was able to gaze as far as 50 miles into five states—Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York.

GM: What were some of New York’s landmarks that you were able to see from atop Empire State?

AW: To the north the RCA Building stands out against the 840 acres of Central Park. The Hudson River to the left leads to upper New York State and New England. The Bronx is in the background.

From the northwest corner of the 86th floor Observatory, visitors look into Times Square (center) and the bustling piers along the Hudson River, where giant ships from all over the world tie up.

Looking northwest from the top of Empire State, the visitor looks down on such landmarks as the United Nations Building (center) on the bank of the East River and the Chrysler Building (left). The Borough of Queens is in the background.

By night, New York becomes a honeycomb of light, dazzling and unbelievable in its beauty. This view from the northwest corner of the 86th floor observatory looks down into Times Square and the heart of the theatre district.

GM: What do you know about Empire State’s TV Tower?

AW: At the 102nd story level of the Empire State Building—on a space the size of a pitcher’s mound—a 22-story, 222-feet, 60-ton mast-like structure stretches upward to a height of 1,472 feet into the clouds. It is the world’s most powerful and far-reaching TV tower. From here all seven of the New York area’s television stations transmit their programs to a four-state sector in which 15 million persons live and own more than 5,200,000 TV sets. Programs transmitted from the Empire State Building, in other words, reach an area in which one of every ten persons in the United States lives.

GM: Andy, can you brief me on some of Empire State’s vital statistics in comparison with other structures of similar nature?

AW: The internationally known Empire State Building is the world’s tallest building. Comparative statistics show that the 1,472-feet-high Empire State Building towers over such other international structures as the 984-feet-high Eiffel Tower, the 555-feet-high Washington Monument, the 480-feet-high Pyramid of Cheops, and the 179-feet-high Leaning Tower of Pisa.

GM: What can you tell me about Empire State’s huge floodlights?

AW: The spectacular lighting of the tower portions of the Empire State Building allows the world-famous silhouette of the world’s tallest building to occupy the same dominant position on the horizon of nighttime New York as it does during the day. Basic light source for this gigantic floodlighting task is a 1,000-watt, iodine-quartz lamp which is in the same family of lamps as those used to illuminate missile launching pads at Cape Kennedy. The floodlights, which are distinguished for their high intensity, long throw and fine beam control capabilities, are strategically located on various setbacks of the building so as to do the best job of illumination without interfering with the famous nighttime view from the Observatory.

GM: Before the floodlights were installed to coincide with the World’s Fair, was there a time when Empire State had four powerful beacons?

AW: Yes; you are quite correct. Visible from the Observatory are the four Freedom Lights, the world’s most powerful beacons, which have made the Empire State Building the tallest lighthouse in the world... a landmark to sea and air travelers alike. A bronze plaque inscribed with famed author MacKinley Kantor’s 168-word tribute to the Freedom Lights is located on the western terrace of the 86th floor Observatory.

GM: What about Empire State’s interior decoration?

AW: “The Eight Wonders of the World,” the eight original art works in the lobby of the Empire State Building, which were created by artist Roy Sparkia and his wife Renee Nemerov, have become a prime additional attraction at Empire State since their unveiling in 1963. Employing a new technique which permits the artist to paint with light as well as color, the subjects include the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World as well as the Eighth Wonder of the Modern World... the Empire State Building.

GM: Can you tell me about the exterior of the Empire State?

AW: Not only the highest building in the world, Empire State is also one of the most beautiful. The exterior is of Indiana limestone trimmed with sparkling strips of stainless steel which run from the sixth floor all the way to the top. Whether seen in sunlight or moonlight, the effect is magnificent.

Marble in the cathedral-like lobby was imported from four different countries, France, Italy, Belgium and Germany. Experts combed these countries to get the most beautiful marble, and in one case, the contents of an entire quarry were exhausted to insure matching blocks of exactly the right color and graining.

GM: Do you feel that Empire State is a popular subject?
AW: The Empire State Building has been featured in many movies, Broadway plays and several big-hit musicals. Hardly a day passes that it isn’t mentioned in one television program or the other. It’s been included, too, in popular songs—and many, many books.

GM: Who are some of Empire State’s celebrated visitors?
AW: Each year the Empire State Building plays host to many Heads of State or dignitaries and celebrities. Had you been here on the right days in the past, you might have seen Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip of England, or the King and Queen of Thailand, or Princess Birgitta and Desiree of Sweden, or Queen Frederika of Greece or even your favorite movie actor.

GM: Oh, by the way, that reminds me, who is your favorite movie actor?
AW: My favorite movie actor is Troy Donahue.

GM: In closing, do you know what others think of Empire State?
AW: Of the many publications that have commented on Empire State, the following superfluous praise has been said (I hope I get the quotes right.):

“Empire State... one of USA’s 7 engineering wonders.”—Time Magazine
“The unbelievable Empire State Building.”—Reader’s Digest
“... see New York from the top of Empire State. There’s nothing like it.”—Dorothy Kilgallen
“From Empire State you can see 50 miles.”—Allentown Sunday Call Chronicle
“No visitor should miss Empire State”—New York Times
“Empire State’s best view is at night”—Glasgow (Scotland) News
“Empire State’s view is breathtaking”—Britain’s Queen Mother
“New York’s most visited building”—NBC

Quantification

Child’s Restaurants estimated that two days’ servings of its popular pancakes would make a stack as high as the building.
Kingwell, p. 130.

Scribner’s Magazine informed the world that the copies of Margaret Mitchell’s potboiler Gone With the Wind sold in 1933 would, if piled one on top of the other, form a stack 250 times taller than the Empire State Building.
Ibid., p. 130.

If all the materials which came to the corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirty-Fourth Street for the construction of Empire State had come in one shipment, a train fifty-seven miles in length would have been needed. When the locomotive of such a train would have entered New York, the caboose on the rear end would have come to a halt in Bridgeport, Connecticut.
Ibid., p. 130.

Ten million bricks were used in building Empire State. A single workman, had he continued at it every day, would have had to work for 25 years before he could have finished mortaring these bricks.
Ibid., p. 130.

Wiring expressed in miles, marble in acres, plaster in the form of an imaginary sidewalk that Starrett Brothers estimated would run from central Manhattan to the Capitol Building in Washington, D.C.
Ibid., p. 130.

Kelvinator officials estimated that the 6 million square feet of porcelain tile they used in 1933 would clad the Empire State seven times over.
Ibid., p. 131.

Once every eight hours Kellogg’s Cereals used enough Waxtite paper to encase the building.
Ibid., p. 131.

All the fresh linens stocked aboard the French Line cruise liner Normandie, sheets, tablecloths, and napkins included, would completely cover the building in snowy white material.
Ibid., p. 131.
"The energy women use in a year to wash clothes," a contemporary ad for Oxydol detergent said, "would move the Empire State Building a block if translated into moving power."

_Ibid._, p. 132.

A Sinclair gasoline ad shows the building being picked up by a crane: "Amazing as it may seem, there is enough energy stored up in a single gallon of the powerful new H-C gasoline, if it could be fully utilized, to hoist the world’s tallest building one-quarter inches in the air."

_Ibid._, p. 132.

The building is as high as all the original Seven Wonders tacked together.

_Ibid._, p. 31.

The total volume of one day’s worth of trash produced by McDonald’s packaging would fill the total interior space of the Empire State Building.

_Ibid._, p. 132.

In the Empire State lift-up, 102 stories to the sightseeing platform, 80 to the top service landing in the tower rental section, the elevators can, assuming the building to be fully occupied, carry 15,000 well drilled inmates to street level in a half an hour. This would mean 15 full regiments suddenly assembled on Fifth Avenue and 34th and 33rd St. in 30 minutes – a regimen delivered at the curb every two minutes. Hitler can’t beat that.

_Reisenberg_ pp. 77-8.

There is nothing like having to change elevators three times to remind you that cable does not stretch infinitely far.

_Kingwell_, p. 192.

Such imaginative equivalences, the stuff of a gee-whiz worldview ("amazing as it may seem"), were so neatly parodied by Dorothy Parker "If all the young ladies who attended the Yale promenade dance were laid end to end, no one would be the least surprised."

_Ibid._, p. 132.

King Kong, Simulacrum, Death
The Empire State Building, which to the photographer Lewis Hine is a trapeze for supermen, finds itself within two years assailed by King Kong, who from its spire briefly rules the city as a debased and tyrannized jungle.

Conrad, p. 207.

In 1969, Fay Wray herself wrote, "When I’m in New York, I look at the Empire State Building and feel as though it belongs to me, or is it vice versa?"

Kingwell, p. 167.

During a visit to the building, Wray refused outright to be photographed next to one of the building’s nameless gorillas—a rare moment of abruptness in an afternoon of sophisticated good manners and good feeling. And yet, when she lay dying just a few months later, on a sticky Sunday afternoon in August, she asked her companion and caretaker to put the film on her video recorder. She fell asleep watching it, and paid her second final visit to the top of the building, this time in the virtual reality of celluloid and magnetic tape.

Ibid., p. 167.

A scheme to place an inflatable Kong on the Empire State Building’s side in 1983 collapsed when, larger and heavier than expected, the balloon Kong itself collapsed, hanging in deflated puffs and flaps off one side of the great building.

Ibid., p. 166.

The Empire State Building bends out of the path of a low-flying jet airplane.

Valenti, p. 29.

A B-52 Mitchell bomber struck the Empire State Building, driving a hole into both the seventy-eighth and seventy-ninth floors. Most of the wings sheared off at once and dropped into the street, though the propeller remained embedded in the wall. One of the two engines plowed straight down the corridor on the 78th, went through the wall at the other end, and crashed onto somebody’s roof on 33rd St. The second engine plunged down one of the Empire State elevator shafts, taking the elevator with it. Some sections of the fuselage were blown—by the impact and by the explosion of the plane’s fuel tanks—up to the observation platform on the 86th floor. Other parts remained sticking out of the hole in the wall. People on the street said that an orange glow spread eerily up the side of the building behind the mist. Inside, flames were everywhere, as blazing aviation fuel began to pour down stairwells and across office floors. The shock of the impact was felt several blocks away. The Empire State itself was said to rock a couple of times before settling very gently down. Then it stood fast.
Moorhouse, p. 53-4.

The Empire State Building swayed back and forth like a whipsaw... People on the streets heard two rumbling booms. A brilliant orange mushroom of flame rushed up the side of the building to the Observation Deck on the 86th floor... Plane parts from the fire weakened an elevator cable, which snapped, the car plummeting seventy-floors into a subcellar... One man was either blown out of a window or jumped to escape the inferno, and he died when he landed on a terrace seven floors below... The next day the ragged hole that the plane had torn in the world’s tallest building drew crowds on Fifth Avenue... the mangled remnants of the plane’s tail sticking out.
Glanz, p. 130.

“...It seems, to some extent, fortunate that if the crash did have to occur, that it was so squarely into such a well-constructed building. It is difficult to fully visualize what the result would have been if the plane had crashed into a less sturdy building.” — NYC Fire Department report on how the building survived the July 1945 crash.
Ibid., p. 130.

jumping down the stoops off fire escapes off windowsills off Empire State out of the moon
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

“When you’re ready to sell your diamonds it’s time to go to the Empire State Building” and jump into the 30s like they did in 1929.
O’Hara, p. 85.

The Empire State Building, in whose polished stones and mournful black lobby Le Corbusier finds a tragic gloom and grandeur: it too, like the wax museum, is a mortuary. (cf. Corbusier: “Funereal entrances of the Empire State Building (the largest skyscraper, which has since been dethroned by Rockefeller Center)... The black of polished stones, the walls faced with dark, gleaming slabs.” [Death])
Conrad, p. 140.
His goal is the highest point on this island, a manmade mountain called the Empire State Building. His rise to the top was illusory, short-lived. In the end, the city has defeated him.
Sanders, pp. 97-8.

To pogo or walk backward up the stairs, rappel or BASE jump off the building, or otherwise subvert its businesslike efficiency.
Kingwell, p. 59.

H.G. Wells in The Shape of Things: published in 1933 just two years after construction tools were laid down, the Empire State Building, eighth wonder of the world, grows despised and neglected, and is finally torn down in the year 2016.
Ibid., p. 32.

As opposed to World Trade Center, from the start it has been an architectural winner, a class star; it has also become, with the passage of time, a national treasure.
Ibid., p. 32.

It is a poignant detail that Lamb avoided the gala opening of the building by sailing to Europe that very day. Three miles out, and so past the Prohibition boundary, he poured two martinis from a chrome shaker, pointed at the building visible in the distance, and said to his wife, “Isn’t this marvelous? Here we are and we don’t have to go to the party and listen to all those speeches.”
Ibid., p. 16.

Chrysler

If Chrysler produced a new model every year, why shouldn’t architects do the same? The skyscrapers were not only technology soon to be junked as obsolete, but pop and mass art, and whatever else it may be, mass art is transient, disposable, replaceable.

At first the Empire State was to be only four feet taller than the Chrysler, and John Jacob Raskob worried that Walter Chrysler might cheat by hiding a mast in his spire and suddenly raise it to win the race. For these men the buildings symbolize a power over mortality and over the human body which, for all their wealth, they themselves don't possess.
Conrad, p. 209.

By 1929, construction was already under way on Walter Chrysler's tower at Forty-second Street and Lexington Avenue, with a planned height that would overtop the Woolworth Building. Developers of another downtown structure at 40 Wall Street briefly tried to keep the prize in Lower Manhattan by making plans to build their tower just a few feet higher than Chrysler's. What they did not know was that Walter Chrysler had been planning a little trick: a 185-foot metallic spire that was secretly being assembled inside the fire shaft of his new building. Only once the new Bank of Manhattan tower had been topped out did Chrysler have it hoisted into place, giving the building a height of 1,048 feet when it opened in May 1930.
Glanz, p. 27.

He pomades his hair with bear's grease until it shone like the silver tip of the Chrysler Tower.
Conrad, p. 201.

Bourke-White photographed the Chrysler under construction during the winter of 1929-30. As the handmaiden of the machine, she had to learn its hardihood.
She worked on a tower eight hundred feet in the air, which swayed eight feet in gales. Often the temperature was below freezing. Descending from open scaffolds, she had to negotiate flights of unfinished stairs. After the building's completion, she decided she must have a studio on its sixty-first floor, level with the stainless-steel gargoyles. She often crawled out onto those gargoyles to photograph the city and was herself photographed on this perch by her assistant Oscar Graubner; Walker Evans too had been photographed by his helper Paul Grotz kneeling underneath his tripod on a parapet of the building next to the Chrysler during its construction in 1929, peering perilously into the gulf of the street. Bourke-White declared her new premises to be "the world's highest studio."

The brick friezes of cars along the sides of the Chrysler Building employ it as a runway and take to the air at the corners. With hubcaps, fenders, and radiator covers around its shaft and murals of airplanes and automobiles in its lobby, the Chrysler seems straining to lift off.
Conrad, p. 257.

The Empire State and Chrysler buildings exist as symbols of thirties materialism and as abstract ideas of skyscrapers and as big dowdy office buildings—a sign and then a thing and then a sign and then a thing and then a sign, going back and forth all the time. (It is possible to transact business in the Empire State Building and only the nudge yourself and think, Oh, yeah, this is the Empire State Building.) The World Trade Center exists both as a thrilling double exclamation point at the end of the island and as a rotten place to have to go and get your card stamped, your registration renewed.

Gopnik, p. 122.
H - Crowds

Restless machine and body parts: torrents of legs that mow each other down, herds of cars that move in close formation with shivers of disciplined brilliance, confetti-crowd, ants-crowd, human cage that runs, unlaces, slides, picks, thins and thickens with exasperating order and continuity; and comes and goes, and comes and goes, and comes and goes, and comes and goes, and comes and goes.

Nothing could be more intense, electrifying, turbulent and vital than the streets of New York. They are filled with crowds, bustle and advertisements, each by turns aggressive or casual. There are millions of people in the streets, wandering, care-free, violent, as if they had nothing better to do—and doubtless they have nothing else to do—than produce the permanent scenario of the city.

Baudrillard, America, p. 18

Crowd rushes by with a kind of hallucinated step, very staccato, monotonous, almost disciplined.

Jolas, p. 472.

The crowd says rhythmically. There is a feeling of erotic mass-insanity in the air.

Ibid., p. 473.

Space is exploding on all sides.

Lefebvre, Stage, p. 190.

As the flow of polyrhythmic human tide jostles with noisy machines and telegraphic gestures

Sensory perceptions flow out osmotically.

Compounding bodies, packing them together or piling them in orgiastic heaps.

Conrad, p. 97.

hurtful crush of hateful bodies smashed into buildings one on another on another (heap overproduction)

Jones, Modernism, p. 228.

There is just such a bombardment to the senses here that it gets taxing. Even walking out on the street for a leisurely stroll can be hair-raising. Car horns blare, people scream at you, you walk in dogshit, your feet get tangled in garbage, people bump right into you and don’t even say excuse me, buses will mow you down, bicyclists will play chicken with you, taxi cab doors open in your path and some people will even laugh at your shoes.
Mueller, p. 240.

Thousands are hurrying in every direction. The street cars which ply this area are packed as only the New York street car companies can pack their patrons, and that in cold, old, dirty and even vile cars. There are poor dresses, poor taste, and poor manners mingled with good dresses, good taste and good manners. In the glow of the many lights and shadows of the evening they are hurrying away, with that lightness of spirit and movement which is the evidence of a long strain of labor suddenly relaxed.
Dreiser, p. 278.

Infatuated with the rush and roar of a great metropolis, fascinated by the illusion of pleasure. Broadway, Fifth Avenue, the mansions, the lights, the beauty. A fever of living in their blood. An unnatural hunger and thirst for excitement is burning them up. For this they labor. For this they endure a hard, unnatural existence. For this they crowd themselves in stifling, inhuman quarters, and for this they die.
Ibid., p. 275.

I think of the crowds out there swarming over the streets with their minds clicking and buzzing and yawning with schedules and breakfast table slights and anticipations of the boss’ reactions and big hopes and my mind goes blank the way it does when a mathematical problem gets too complicated.

Monster crowds in Brooklyn, across the East river; monster crowds in New Jersey, across the Hudson river.
Springer, p. 332.

Rushing and slithering human vermin.
Joshi, p.101.

Shining top hats and a whirl of straw hats
Yeoash, p. 407.

The people huddled together in this city actually number hundreds of thousands. They swarm into the cages like black flies. Children walk about, silent, with gaping mouths and dazzled eyes. They look around with such intensity, such seriousness, that the sight of them feeding their little souls upon this hideousness, which they mistake for beauty, inspires a pained sense of pity. The men’s faces, shaven even to the mustache, all strangely like one another, are grave and immobile.

Everything rocks and roars and bellows and turns the heads of the people. They are filled with contented ennui, their nerves are racked by an intricate maze of motion and dazzling fire. Bright eyes grow still brighter, as if the brain paled and lost blood in the strange turmoil of the white, glittering wood. The ennui, which issues from under the pressure of self-disgust, seems to turn and turn in a slow circle of agony. It drags tens of thousands of uniformly dark people into its somber dance, and sweeps them into a will-less heap, as the wind sweeps the rubbish of the street. Then it scatters them apart and sweeps them together again.

Ibid., p. 312.

The crowd increases with the light, a black moving mass, workbound; a million pale faces; a clicking of heels that swells to one sustained roll of thunder.

WPA Guide, p. 49.

Huddling together in thick, gummy streets.
Dreiser, p. 7.

White necks, clumps of powdered bodies.
Yeoash, p. 407.

cold callous feet trotting up and down
Last Poets “NY, NY.”

The people surging in the direction of lights suspended far off in the darkness, writing multicolored snakes. They flow from all the neighboring streets. A crowd like that, I say to myself, adds up to a lot of dollars in handkerchiefs alone or silk stockings! Or just in cigarettes for that matter!

Céline, p. 562.

Eyes that have seen too many people,
a brain jazzing wearily.
Parland, p. 347.
Children cover the pavement, busy as ants, women, almost invisible in black, make little dark mounds before each tenement door. From each mound a buzzing hum of angry gossip rises to the summer, starry sky.
   Puzo, p. 5.

Bull-like men back off and plunge against walls of flesh, denting in and being pushed home.
   Reisenberg, p. 67.

They’re like a gray mass with bubbling eyes
   Beaudin, p. 3.

Women are pinned, their faces a few inches from those of strangers, their make-up running. It is a mingling and crushing of body to body, and close indecent contact.
   Reisenberg, p. 67.

People are hurrying along the sidewalk; hurrying, hurrying from work, from tea, from the theater, from their dentists; hurrying to the busses, the subways, calling for taxis; hurrying, hurrying.
   Atkinson, p. 41.

The streets are filled, with magical quickness, by hundreds of thousands, who chatter, and shout, and laugh, and shake hands, and ask questions, and tell their experiences, and demand if anybody has ever heard of such a thing before, and wonder what it is, and what it means, and whether it will come back again.
   Serviss, p. 64.

The garment factories, which have steadily inched their way northward to 42nd Street; in the evening their workers pour out of the tall buildings and place a blight on the streets like so many ravenous grasshoppers.
   Peretti, p. 106.

Below the buildings, on the streets we find the crowded mass of “tired and scattered” people (wearing “cynical masks of struggle and tiredness—faces of iron—hearts of iron—tongue of iron—crowd of iron...”) pressed together with more goods (slicing down and across the corner of 24th Street and 7th Avenue: “real furs and fake furs by the million: mountains of the most delicate breasts to cover millions of PINK—WOMEN; BROWN AND BLACK WOMEN”)

The faces of the people themselves seem unreal, like freaks come to life from a dreadful nightmare: Cauliflower ears, beggars, sleazy crones, skinny girls, twisted old men, sleek youths with pale faces, the blind and the maimed.
Walker, p. 205.

Faces coming into and out of view.
Amin, p. 38.

One searches vainly in the crowd on Broad Street for a smiling face.
Talbot, p. 32.

Cigars in big overseeing fat faces.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Walking up Broadway, he avows that "each face [is] beautiful and individual," and on another promenade with his wife he restores individuality of character to the avenues which have been rendered uniform by their numerical naming, differentiating unscrupulous Sixth ("tenderloin, fast") from demure Eighth ("real lower class, honest") and piteous Third ("poor, foreign").
Koolhaas, p. 123.

Full-length figure: all people appear at a distance, the face becomes unimportant, the overall gesture of the figure; silhouette, the figure always appears in relation to the background or frame of the composition.

So I joined the line of pedestrians entering one of the neighboring streets. We progressed by fits and starts because of the shop-windows, which fragmented the crowd.
Céline, p. 558.

The eyes of them! The bodies! The hats, the coats, the shoes, the motions! How often have I followed amazedly for blocks, for miles even, attempting to pigeonhole in my own mind the astonishing characteristics of a figure before me, attempting to say to myself what I really thought of it all, what misfortune or accident or condition of birth or of mind had worked out the sad or grim spectacle of a human being so distorted, a veritable caricature of womanhood or manhood. On the streets of New York I have seen slipping here and there truly marvelous creatures, and have realized instantly that I was looking at something most different, peculiar, that here again life had accomplished an actual chef d’oeuvre of the bizarre or the grotesque or the mad, had made something as strange and unaccountable as a great genius or a great master of men. Only it had worked at the other extreme from public efficiency or smug, conventional public interest, and had produced a singular variation, inefficient, unsocial, eccentric or evil, as you choose, qualities which worked to exclude the subject of the variation from any participation in what we are pleased to call a normal life. [Surveillance] [Voyeur] [Flâneur]

Dreiser, p. 155.

Vito Acconci: “Following Piece, potentially, could use all the time allotted and all the space available: I might be following people, all day long, everyday, through all the streets in New York City. In actuality, following episodes ranged from two or three minutes when someone got into a car and I couldn’t grab a taxi, I couldn’t follow—to seven or eight hours—when a person went to a restaurant, a movie.” [Surveillance] [Voyeur] [Flâneur]

McMahon, N. pag.

Everyone on the sidewalk looks exactly seventeen years old and restless.
McInerney, Bright Lights p. 160.

The crowds are beginning to prey on my nerves.
Hapgood, p. 156.

His life is spent among great crowds of his fellows, herded together in search of happiness or trains. He belongs at one time to the subway public, at another to the theater audience or the fight mob. But he always belongs to a crowd, and except at rare moments (in telephone booths or shower baths) he is only one of the faces one sees without recognition in such crowds. [Flâneur]

Federal Writers, p. 312.

New Yorkers are huddlers. In streets, on buses, in shops, they crowd together so that they may talk and feel the reassuring closeness of other bodies. Even the arguments that break out so fiercely and so quickly between strangers are an expression of that need for contact—that compulsion to break the silence of aloneness. [Singularity]

Bladford, pp. 93-4.
The city has never been so uncomfortable, so crowded, so tense. Money has been plentiful and New York has responded. Restaurants are hard to get into; businessmen stand in line for a Schrafft's luncheon as meekly as idle men used to stand in soup lines. (Prosperity creates its bread lines, the same as the Depression.) The lunch hour in Manhattan has been shoved ahead half an hour, to 12:00 or 12:30, in the hopes of beating the crowd to a table. Everyone is a little emptier at quitting time than he used to be. Apartments are festooned with No Vacancy signs. There is standing-room-only in Fifth Avenue buses, which once reserved a seat for every paying guest. The old double-deckers are disappearing—people don't ride just for the fun of it anymore.

At certain hours on certain days it is almost impossible to find an empty taxi and there is a great deal of chasing around after them. You grab a handle and open the door, and find that some other citizen is entering from the other side. Doormen grow rich blowing their whistles for cabs; and some doormen belong to no door at all—merely wander about through the streets, opening cabs for people as they happen to find them. By comparison with other less hectic days, the city is uncomfortable and inconvenient; but New Yorkers temperamentally do not crave comfort and convenience—if they did they would live elsewhere.

White, Here, p. 52.

In aboriginal America a person moving within the ten-mile circle could potentially make only 313 different contacts with other human beings. In contrast, the density of the Unites States as a whole today would make possible 15,699 contacts in the same land area. The density of the average central city in the United States would permit over 2.5 million contacts, the density of Chicago over 5.3 million contacts, the density of New York City over 7.8 million contacts, and the density of Manhattan over 23.5 million contacts in the same land area.

Hauser, p. 12.

If you take the population of a small town, say thirty thousand souls who are usually spread over houses bordering on several miles of road—I believe that if you wanted to walk over all the roads of London Town it would take you two hundred years at four miles per hour!—if you take that population and crowd it all into one house having a frontage of say sixty feet of say sixty-foot road, you will find that that road-space is singularly little for the needs of that population when another population of the same size is housed just a foot away along that same road. You will increase the bewilderment if you consider that of the population of a rural township of thirty thousand, about two-thirds—the children and the housekeeping women—use the roads very little, whereas your thirty thousand will all be active movers using their sixty feet of sidewalk and the sidewalks of their neighbors at least four times daily and all at about the same hour of the day—tides. The congestion between—to be liberal—eight and ten of mornings and four and seven in the evening will be terrible. In addition there is the lunch hour. That is the situation of New York.

Living in New York City gives people real incentives to want things that nobody else wants—to want all the leftover things. There are so many people here to compete with that changing your tastes to what other people don’t want is your only hope of getting anything. For instance, on beautiful, sunny days in New York, it gets so crowded outside you can’t even see Central Park through all the bodies. But very early on Sunday mornings in horrible rainy weather, when no one wants to get up and no one wants to get out even if they are up, you can go out and walk all over and have the streets to yourself and it’s wonderful.

[Commodity]

Warhol, Philosophy p. 93.

This sense of dispossession, to be brief about it, haunted me so, I was to feel, in the New York streets and in the packed projectiles to which one clingingly appeals from the streets, just as one tumbles back into the streets in appalled reaction from them, that the art of beguiling or duping it became an art to be cultivated—though the fond alternative vision was never long to be obscured, the imagination, exasperated to envy, of the ideal, in the order in question; of the luxury of some such close and sweet and whole national consciousness as that of the Switzer and the Scot.

James, pp. 380-1.

New York’s most congested time was 1904.

Reisenberg, p. 54.

I had to get used to it, but now that I have, nowhere do I feel freer than amid the crowds of New York. This light, ephemeral city, which every morning and evening, beneath the curious rays of the sun, seems a mere juxtaposition of rectangular parallelepipeds, never opposes or depresses. You can feel the anguish of solitude here, but not of being crushed. [Grid] [Loneliness]

Sartre, p. 124.

Shared spatial consciousness.
Jacks, p. 34.

I’ve seen them come dark wondering wide-eyed dreaming out of Penn Station—but the trains are late.
Hughes, Collected, p. 427.

It’s a tight little island.

And in the Upper West Side fifty thousand families will be reading the newspaper by the sitting room table; fifty thousand Upper East Side families will be finishing a quiet game of bridge or sitting at the library table; and among the thousand already asleep on the Lower East Side will be a large number of old timers who have never seen Broadway. Ibid., p. 51.

New York is the first place in the world where a man can work within a ten minute walk of a quarter of a million people.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 453.

An island is, after all, no place for sprawling; so many people, so little space.
Kingwell, p. 65.

No time for consciousness.
Conrad, p. 199.

This city is full of self-conscious high achievers who strive to appear as confident and fearless as New York itself. Claustrophobia, which involves both the fear of being unable to escape the crowd and the feeling of being painfully self-aware and isolated by one’s own limitations.

You may point out a street, correctly enough, as the abode of washerwomen; but, in that second floor, a man may be studying chaldee roots, and in the garret over the way, a forgotten artist is dying by inches.

A new contradiction appears on the horizon: that between flows (the moving, the ephemeral) and fixities (established centers, decision-making positions) institutions, various "properties," etc.).

Another hundred people just got off of the train
And came up through the ground,
While another hundred people just got off of the bus
And are looking around
[…]
Can they find each other in the crowded streets and the guarded parks,
By the rusty fountains and the dusty trees with the battered barks,
And they walk together past upholstered walls with the crude remarks.
And they meet at parties through the friends of friends who they never know.
Sondheim, "Another Hundred."

On the sidewalk pedestrians of every class in every kind of dress of every colour swept past Hamish or walked by his side. The show-windows on the bright spring day were resplendent with temptations for strollers. [Flâneur]

Van Vechten, p. 245.

The streets and parks were thinned of people, but New York is so dense—an experiment in density, really, as Venice is an experiment in water—that the thinning just produced the normal density of Philadelphia or Baltimore. It added to the odd calm.

Gopnik, p. 119.

Manhattanism is the one urbanistic ideology that has fed, from its conception, on the splendors and miseries of the metropolitan condition—hyper-density—without once losing faith in it as the basis for a desirable modern culture. Manhattan’s architecture is a paradigm for the exploitation of congestion.

Koolhaas, p. 10.
The Culture of Congestion is the culture of the 20th century.
Ibid., p. 125.

Raymond Hood: “Congestion is good.”
Kilham, p. 188.

Hardened Arteries

The traffic is heavy this time of the evening.
Hollander, p. 164.

The congestion on the streets gets heavier and heavier.
Lobas, p. 141.

Traffic is tied up, and horns are blowing urgently on a crosstown street in the distance. [Sound]
Cheever, “Five-Forty-Eight,” p. 3.

At that very moment, hundreds of thousands of cars are pouring into Manhattan island over twelve bridges and through four tunnels. Once the finally reaching the city, they end up in more traffic snarls; and they instantly wish, at all costs, to break out of Manhattan again.
Lobas, p. 132.

Vehicles jumping the lights often block intersections, inspiring whole symphonies of honking and hooting from frustrated drivers facing a green light and obstructed crossings. Spillback causes gridlock. [Sound]
Brook, p. 144.

Trucks jam along the gutters.
Donleavy, N. pag.

A savage confusion in the streets of New York. A great tidal counterpoint of traffic noises flows across a strange, roaring undertone that never ceases, night or day. It jangles the nerves of the people of the city, and creates tensions and strains that make everything a crisis. [Sound]
Atkinson, p. 19.

Fifty-ninth Street is almost solidly filled with two heavy, sluggish streams of traffic moving in opposite directions.
Ibid., p. 41.
The traffic on Seventy-ninth Street has thickened into a querulous, honking rush-hour crowd.
Gopnik, p. 53.

Getting around town by any means except by subway is virtually impossible.
Atkinson, p. 23.

Trying to get through the side streets of New York in an automobile is like trying to thread a maze.
Ibid., p. 23.

Blue exhaust chuffs steadily from heated cabs that lined the curb. Drivers re huddled behind the wheels. Taxis desert the line. They U-turn with a violent protest of tires and tear away with a rush.
Berger, Eight Million, pp. 166-7.

November seventh there is a heavy rain; the streets become slippery; traffic is completely tied up.
Corbusier, p. 69.

12:01 Well, in conjunction with the big holiday weekend, we start out with the Hudson River horror show right now. Big delays in the Holland Tunnel either way with roadwork, only one lane will be getting by. You’re talking about, at least, twenty to thirty minutes worth of traffic either way, possibly even more than that. Meanwhile the Lincoln Tunnel, not great back to Jersey but still your best option. And the GW Bridge your worst possible option. Thirty to forty minute delays, and that’s just going into town. Lower level closed, upper level all you get. Then back to New Jersey every approach is fouled-up: West Side Highway from the 150’s, the Major Deegan, the Bronx approaches and the Harlem River Drive are all a disaster, the Harlem River Drive could take you an hour, no direct access to the GW Bridge with roadwork. And right now across the East River 59th Street Bridge, you’ve gotta steer clear of that one. Midtown Tunnel, Triboro Bridge, they remain in better shape. Still very slow on the eastbound Southern State Parkway here at the area of the, uh, Meadowbrook there’s a, uh, stalled car there blocking a lane and traffic very slow.

A million people surly with traffic.
Conrad, p. 208.
For tardiness, sloppiness, and straining the nerves, you are sentenced to the maximum punishment—the Belt Parkway. Lobas, p. 156.

Whatever our differences, we agreed that the Cross-Bronx Expressway, a deep, eternally sluggish river of brake lights and diesel exhaust coursing through a waste of twisted rebar and abandoned scrap, is as gruesome a stretch of highway as exists in these parts. Paumgarten, N. pag.

About a million cars prowl around Manhattan each working day, and three-quarters of them leave the island every evening. Saturation point is frequently reached. Brook, p. 144.

Fifty minutes is needed at this time of day for a journey that in the morning would take a quarter of an hour, and pedestrians have to stand and wait for two minutes, deprived of any hope of an immediate crossing. Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 51.

On the most crowded street, Fifth Avenue, which cuts the city in half, from the height of the upstairs of the hundreds of trundling buses, you can see tens of thousands of cars, racing in six or eight lanes in either direction. Drenched in the rain that had just fallen, they are now gleaming with a lacquer finish. [Air] [Weather] Ibid., Discovery, p. 51.

Mayor William J. Gaynor, astounded by the automobile traffic he saw snarling Fifth Avenue, called for a broad new thoroughfare to be carved out of Midtown, just west of Fifth Avenue. [Robert Moses] Goldenberg, p. 19.

The sun illuminated a gracious picture on Fifth Avenue. At the corner the traffic policeman held up his hand and the black and white cabs, the yellow cabs, the cherry cabs, the green and silver cabs, the Chryslers, the Rolls-Royces, the Fords, the Packards, lined up restless for the signal to press onward, for all the world like a row of Roman charioteers behind the tape waiting for the race to begin. Van Vechten, p. 245.

Buckminster Fuller was driving through New York with a group of editors from the New Yorker and Fortune when he was stopped by a traffic office at Fifty-seventh Street and Fifth Avenue. While the officer demanded to know exactly what Bucky was driving, Bucky cleverly turned the steering and slowly rotated the entire Dymaxion car around the stationary police officer. That maneuver backfired because, upon witnessing the traffic-stopping event one block away, the next officer demanded a similar demonstration. The incident was then repeated at almost every successive corner, causing Bucky and his guests to spend nearly an hour traveling one mile down Fifth Avenue.

Sieden, p. 167.

Broadway is the main artery of New York life—the hardened artery.
Clapp, p. 390.

Broadway as a river with no bridge to detain it.
Conrad, p. 232.

Our traffic snarls irritate us, but the sleighs on lower Broadway caused such tangles a hundred years ago that people used to get out and walk “in a huff” rather than try to get anywhere behind horses.
Atkinson, p. 262.

By the late nineteenth century, the Brooklyn Bridge had become clogged with traffic.
Hawes, N. pag.

Motor trucks average less than six miles per hour in traffic, as against eleven miles per hour for horse drawn vehicles in 1911.

Manhattan traffic congestion returns by late July 1945 to its prewar levels.
Trager, p. 549.

The traffic problem in New York seems insoluble. Like some backwater of a lazy, powerful stream, it has eddied slower and slower until of late years it hardly moves at all.
Atkinson, p. 23.

In 1911, the architect Henry Rutgers Marshall suggested a broad, gently curved boulevard linking the old Pennsylvania Station with Fifth Avenue and 42 Street.
Goldenberg, p. 19.
We propose banning private cars from Manhattan Island.

Corbett’s “solution” for New York’s traffic problem is the most blatant case of disingenuity in Manhattanism’s history. Pragmatism so distorted becomes pure poetry. Not for a moment does the theorist intend to relieve congestion; his true ambition is to escalate it to such intensity that it generates—as in a quantum leap—a completely new condition, where congestion becomes mysteriously positive.
Koolhaas, p. 120.

Anytime one attempts to insert speed into any system, slowness results. The traffic jam was the old proof of this truth.
Gopnik, p. 232.

The new roadways are expected to ease traffic on the Southern and Northern State parkways, but they are quickly as jammed as the older roadways. [Moses]
Trager, p. 495.

The city designates all of Manhattan below 96th Street a tow-away zone for illegally parked cars.
Ibid., p. 621.

Oldenburg’s Broome Street expressway was a tube for traffic in the form of a cigarette extending across Manhattan. He says, “you would be driving inside a cigarette and wouldn’t even know it was a cigarette.”

By the late ’80s, I’d discovered how relatively easy it was to get a parking space on the street in Manhattan. Greenwich Village, the Upper East Side, and even the Theater District—areas that I would previously never have dreamed of driving to—began yielding spots pretty quickly.
McLoughlin, p. 198.

Movement

Oh (cosmic sensation of speed!
Parland, p. 5.
Lefebvre’s rhythmanalysis, a concept that interweaves cyclical and linear rhythms in the everyday. The linear, which can be made totally uniform and quantifiable, has more and more eliminated the qualitative from time and space. The disappearance of rhythms and cycles engenders in turn a need for rhythms, exemplified by the growing significance of music in social life or the commercialized and recuperated fête.

Lefebvre, Writings, p. 31.

And now the traffic was dim shapes and moving shadows visible only in bits and pieces.

Finney, p. 156.

Park Avenue is one of the most dangerous thoroughfares in the city; one should never try to beat the lights there. The traffic lights on Park Avenue change at intervals that allow a driver to cross about five streets at city limits. If you hustle you make a sixth.

Lobas, p. 158.

There was already the tall white city of today, already the feverish activity of the boom, but there was a general inarticulateness.

The Grand Concourse was also know as The Speedway Concourse, a route originally planned for Manhattanites to reach the open parks of the Bronx. When only a boulevard without dwellings on boulevardiers, the Speedway was an engineer’s dream.

White, Physical History, p. 121.

Peeling rubber all the way up
SECOND AVENUE into Harlem Heights
Our yellow Triumph took us out of Manhattan tenement hells
Into the deer-ridden black earth dairylands.

Berrigan, p. 522.
I - Street

Corrupting the rational spaces of modernity through a kind of material or virtual “street haunting.”

If you laid all New York’s paved streets end to end they’d bridge the Atlantic.
Conrad, p. 249.

Street Names

The junction of Grand and Center Streets was Bayard’s Mount, or Bunker’s Hill; East Thirteenth Street at Avenue D was Burnt Mill Point; just north of City Hall stood Windmill Hill, and around that spot were Gallows Hill, Potbaker’s Hill and Cowfoot Hill. The inlet that cut into Seventy-fourth Street from East River was Sawmill Creek and the great dimple east of Riverside Drive between 129th and 132nd Streets was Mother David’s Valley.

Abattoir Place was the former name of West 12th St. between 11th Ave. and the Hudson River.
Brown, Valentines No. 7, p. 66.

Art Street was the former name of Astor Place. Originally it was a lane leading from the Bowery to a part of the Stuyvesant Farm. It was known as Art St. in 1807.

The lower end of William Street has probably undergone more changes of name than any other street in the city. It has been known as: The Glass Makers’ Street, The Smith Street, Smee Street, Smit Street, Suice Street, De Smee Street, Burghers Path, Burger Jorisens Path, King Street, Berger Joris Street, and Borisens Path.
WPA Guide, p. 89.

Dirty Lane was the former name of South William St. This street was opened 1656 and was called by the Dutch Slyck Steegh, meaning Dirty Lane. In 1674 it was called Mill Street Lane; name changed to South William St. about 1832.
Brown, Valentines No. 7, p. 77.
Jew’s Alley was the former name of South William St. Between Broad Street and Mill Lane. Jew’s Alley formerly ran from Madison St. between Oliver and James Sts. Ibid., p. 90.

Smell Street Lane was the former name of Broad St. Between Exchange Place and Wall St. Ibid., p. 106.

Street name changes: “The Street That Leads to the Pie Woman’s” to Nassau Street, “Windmill Lane” to Cortlandt Street, “Smell Street Lane” to Broad Street, “Tinpot Alley” to Edgar Street, “Sugarloaf Street” to Franklin Street. A country road that wound around the west end of what is now Times Square toward the river was Verdant Lane. Berger, New York, p. 25.

She says she knows that she lives at 126 “Boddeh Stritt.” Even this isn’t correct, since her husband demands that she call it “Bahday Street,” which she reconverts to German where it means, meaninglessly, “bath street.” When David gets lost, he claims to live on “Boddeh Stritt.” A passerby chucklingly translates this into Potter Street, and an Irish policeman into “Body Street—sounds like the morgue” or “Barhdee Street.” Conrad, pp. 122-3.

A lexicon of pseudonyms for Broadway: the Illuminated Thoroughfare, the Modern Appian Way, the Rue of Roués, the Gay Lit-Up Canyon, Golden Gulch, Orange Juice Gulch, Beer Gulch, Mazda Lane, Frudadway, Via Lobsteria Dolorosa, Neon Boulevard, Tungsten Territory. Conrad, p. 284; Maffi, p. 109.

Maybe men will remember that Wall Street was named for a real wall that the mynheers built to keep out Indians. Maybe they will recall that Mill Lane took its name from an old Dutch mill; that Marketfield Street was Petticoat Lane, the Hausvrows’ road to Bowling Green market; that there were once aromas and trades and events identified by every name that will then be only a signpost. [Smell]

Berger, New York, pp. 279-80.

SoHo was one of the few New York City places whose streets were named for American generals from the Revolutionary War: Lafayette, Crosby, Greene, Wooster, along with Thompson, Sullivan, and MacDougal, whose names grace streets to the west of SoHo. The current exception, West Broadway, was originally named Laurens Street after Henry Laurens (1724-1792), a president of the Continental Congress.

Kostelanetz, Soho, p. 29.

I had barely recovered from the appellative blow struck by SoHo (South of Houston Street) when I received a quick left to the sensibility in the form of NoHo (North of Houston Street) ... I’ve come to the conclusion that this crazed naming of extremely specific areas of the city has yet to come to full flower... It is abundantly clear that such vague terms as Midtown will no longer suffice; it will only get worse.

Leibowitz, p. 110.

As early as the mid-nineteenth century, a Russian visitor noted that the roads cutting through Broadway down to Washington Square bore historical names, while those beyond were numbered, as if history has dried up and stopped nursing imagination.

Maffi, p. 15.

Christopher Street became so gay in the 1970s that some gay men wrongly assumed that Gay Street had been named in their honor.

Carter, p. 13.

Street Numbers

We have also a deplorable habit of naming our streets and avenues in numerical order. There is no reason why we should not bestow on these streets the names of some of our great statesmen, authors or littérateurs—anything that would save us from this humdrum, prosaic one, two, three stuff would be a relief—and the beauty of it is that all these new names would be suggestive and lead to further inquiry regarding the accomplishments of the men and women so honored. [Grid]

Too distracted to read the street numbers from the northbound bus he’s caught on Fifth Avenue, he mistakes 127th Street for 137th. He tells himself that “two and three look alike,” then admits that they don’t really. Conrad, p. 197.

Sixty-sixth Street, which muddles the general odd-even rule for Manhattan, leads westward. Lobas, p. 24.

89 East 42nd Street, the official address of Grand Central Station. Morris, Manhattan ’45, p. 172.

Ask me why they change Eleventh Avenue to West End at Fifty Ninth Street, and Tenth Avenue to Amsterdam and Ninth to Columbus, and Eighth to Central Park West. Because people thought they were big hot shit up there. That’s why. Donleavy, N. pag.

The fundamental reality of streets, as with all public space, is political. Blomley, p. 16.

Your streets are narrowing and must be widened. Reisenberg, p. 205.

The street widths of Manhattan were designed, in 1811, for buildings of one to four stories. Goodman, p. 304.

Corner

The ecology of the street corner. n.cit.

Only the meeting of two different street names makes for the magic of the corner. Buse, p. 67.

Outdoor corners may be instructively contrasted with interior ones. O’Neill, p. C1.
The freedom of corners may be expressed thusly: A corner is where travel options are multiplied, usually by two. (Rare is the New York corner that is not one of a quartet.)

Ibid., p. C1.

The pedestrian traffic accordingly doubles at corners, and because corners are where pedestrians are held up by stoplights, corners are also where temporary groups of people form.

Ibid., p. C1.

On the phenomenon of corner boys: "A corner boy is a loiterer up to no good, a brazen article who hangs around hoping for action. The action may be narcotic, it may be sexual (in the case of corner boys who are girls or, indeed, boy/girls), or it may be more innocently risqué."

[Drugs] [Sex]

Ibid., p. C1.

This corner is a paradise for semiologists. There is a very cluttered pole on which are mounted two pedestrian lights and a vehicular traffic light; a one-way sign; a sign alerting us to the possible presence of blind persons; a no-left-turn sign; a chirping yellow gadget (presumably for the blind); and, at the pole's overhanging extremity, a streetlight.

Ibid., p. C1.

Go to the intersection of Fifth and Fiftieth.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Looking upon a street intersection the corner of Fifth Avenue and 42nd St., we can imagine the scene, in large to a vast size, a mural in some future museum, showing maximum surface pressure, pedestrian and motor, into this crude city of today.

Reisenberg, p. 64.

The lion and the tiger passing, as Tom Wolfe used to say about certain types passing that corner.

Jackson, p. 753.

Suddenly a psychopathically worried policeman appears on the corner and tells everybody to go away.

Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 108.
I stood at the corner waiting for the light to change to get across to the subway and was overtaken again and started crying.
Wojnarowicz, p. 45.

Waverly Place achieves the distinction that makes it unique among the streets of New York City: the only street in the city to wrap around itself, it does so where it crosses Christopher Street, throwing itself around the three-sided Northern Dispensary (as a New Yorker once put it, "Where Waverly intersects Waverly intersecting Waverly"). From this point, as if having succeeded in confusing itself, Waverly takes a sudden sharp bend like the irregular path of a drunk and continues east to Sixth Avenue. But not before running into Gay Street on its northern side, a surprisingly short street that in its own diminutive existence of one block cannot keep itself straight, veering back upon itself at an odd angle, only turn back into Christopher Street.
Carter, p. 13.

Sidewalk

Sidewalks first appeared in Paris in the 1760s. By the mid-nineteenth century, they became common in major cities and began to be elevated about the road. Yet early sidewalks were tentative in nature: graveled edges, footbridges over muddy streets. In the 1880s, they were poured concrete. Once produced and identified as a space, the sidewalk became an object of urban governance.
Blomley, pp. 57-9.

The first laying down of hot asphalt was in 1871 at the Battery, and as this practice spread it presumably greatly aiding the early bicyclists. Concrete was first used as a base for pavements in New York in 1888. In 1889 the city fathers decided to implement a general project for the improvement of the pavements and sidewalks, seemingly after an especially hard winter which had led to an issue of bonds to help pay for road repairs.
Haden, p. 53.

Arshile Gorky, in the early thirties, often spoke of the cracks in the sidewalks as something that could interest and excite the eye.
Stevens & Swan, p. 105.
Sites of both domination and resistance. Lokaituou-Sideris, p. 86.

Central to the drama of "life and death" in the city. Sidewalks, their bordering uses and their users, are active participants in the drama of civilization versus barbarism in cities.
Blomley, p. 19.

The sidewalk ballet.
Ibid., p. 19.

Pests of the pavement.
Ibid., p. 68.

Inanimate bandits of the sidewalk.
Ibid., p. 68.

A constant succession of eyes.
Ibid., p. 19.

Micro-politics on public sidewalks.
Lokaituou-Sideris, p. 87.

When you are crawling on a sidewalk there is no proscenium: no front, no back.
Pope.L, p. 75.

Concrete excited him most.
Freeman, p. 102.

Passing and repassing.
Blomley, p. 74.

Bodies as urban forests.
Lokaituou-Sideris, p. 189.

sidewalks into catwalks
Tomlinson, p. 137.

The scourge of street encumbrance.
Blomley, p. 61.

Amiable disorder.
Ibid., p. 41.

Friction risk.
Ibid., p. 41.
Calculus of delay.

Their emotional nature.

These same slates. Scratched with marks hoboes made.
Donleavy, N. pag.

In the New World of pavements, asphalt and cement.

They’re of cut stone, not concrete.
Finney, p. 326.

The side of the street with the most obstructions and slowest going is the side that attracts people.
Blomley, p. 22.

Here falls a well-dressed woman and her dinner spills from a bag and onto the sidewalk.
Barry, p. xiv.

Someone sweeps his portion.

Attempts at sidewalk control: pedestrians were advised to keep to the right. Advisory placards were set up, but soon vandalized or destroyed. In the 1920s, painted white lines as to separate the two streams of pedestrians.
Blomley, p. 70.

Impediments to the free flow of pedestrian traffic are a hallmark of city life.

Narrow and crowded; the pavements are cracked, full of holes and subway gratings; they’re obstructed by a host of badly designed light standards, parking signs, mailboxes, trash containers; much of the surface is in permanent use for temporary storage of crates, newspapers, displays of merchandise, signs and what not. Further obstructing the flow is a host of street operators: handbill passers, demonstrators, hustlers for second-floor establishments, pushmen for stores, pushcart food vendors, knickknack vendors, and barkers.
Most of us take sidewalks for granted. An undervalued element of the urban form, this public ground connects points of origin and destination, and few people go through the day without traversing at least one sidewalk. Sidewalks are unassuming, standardized pieces of gray concrete that are placed between roadways and buildings, and their common appearance belies their significance and history as unique but integral parts of the street and urban life. A commercial terrain for merchants and vendors, a place of leisure for flâneurs, a refuge for homeless residents, a place for day-to-day survival for panhandlers, a space for debate for political activists, an urban forest for environmentalists ... Like streets, sidewalks are ubiquitous and difficult to avoid. Motorists observe them from their vehicles, and pedestrians walk along them from point of origin and destination or from car to building.
Lokaituou-Sideris, pp. 3, 6.

On a warm and blue early October day, I walk half a block from my home and investigate this question at West 23rd Street and Seventh Avenue, an intersection I constantly but heedlessly use. There are no other lingerers, and partly out of embarrassment I pay attention, for the first time ever, to the street furniture.

By the early twentieth century, the canopy had supplanted the row-house stoop as the common signature of the middle-class New York residence—yet its importance was far more than symbolic. As the apartment house’s clearest gesture to the street, it revealed the interlocking of domestic and public realms that made the New York apartment house, for all its layers of remove from the city, a profoundly urban form of housing. The canopy engaged the street—literally—by passing over a portion of the sidewalk and claiming it for the building; yet it simultaneously allowed free passage for the city’s street life beneath. In this overlap the film city found enormous dramatic possibility.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 198.

Street Furniture

The difference between “street architecture” and “landmarks”: built as part of street, they continue to live as a part of it, even in incongruous transformations; in isolation they lose their meaning.

I walked along for half a block staring up at a gray winter sky actually darkened, or so it seemed, by literally hundreds and hundreds of black telegraph wires on both sides of the street and running across it in bunches of sometimes several dozen, an astonishing mess. Every few yards wooden telegraph poles sprouted from the walk, some of them—I stopped and counted—with as many as fourteen crossarms loaded with wires, each pole, I noticed, marked with the name of whatever competing company had put it there.

Finney, pp. 227-8.

Street lamps hang, two big tears above signs. No parking no commercial traffic. [Light]
Donleavy, N. pag.

Waiting for a light at Forty-second, you scope among the announcements of ancient upcoming events, strangling the lamppost like kudzu. [Times Square]
McInerney, p. 13.

These white stripes form the rungs of a “ladder” crosswalk, where two parallel white lines serve as the side rails. A “continental” crosswalk, by contrast, is not bordered by rails, and its bands simply float on the blacktop. Some crosswalk markings have side rails but stripes that run diagonally: “zebra” crossings. [Grid]
O’Neill, p. CY1.

In all his thoughts and actions, there is a flavor of asphalt.
Hapgood, p. 76.

Look down and see all the bottle tops embedded in the asphalt.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Harum-scarum haze on the Pollock streets
Berrigan, p. 44.

Because of the building boom and the quickening thrust of the population toward the north, streets were ripped up much of the time.
Ellis, p. 460.
I think I forgot to tell about the girl on 57th at Park who took off all her clothes and peed in the middle of the street and then walked over and put her clothes on again. In front of that luggage store that I never see anybody in. The southwest corner, you know? Everybody pretended like nothing was happening. She had high heels on. (Tuesday, January 21, 1986)

Warhol, Diaries, p. 710.

In 1961 Frank and I were walking along First Avenue and noticed the funny steeples of St. Bridget’s Church on Tompkins Square Park in the distance—one steeple curved limply...The steeple of St. Brigid’s on Tompkins Square which is “leaning a little to the left.”

Gooch, p. 74.

How funny you are today New York like Ginger Rogers in Swingtime and St. Brigid’s steeple leaning a little to the left

O’Hara, p. 370.

What, in fire escapes, do I admire? Their universality; their economy of design; their rugged skeletal strength and transparent utility; their spontaneous novelty; the simply sturdy curves overlapping when viewed from a given vantage, filtering the masonry or brick; their constancy; sounds as a dollar, firm as Gibraltar, unshaken by the aged, neglected yet shouldering their vital charge, clinging, like Ulysses to his barque, through hurricanes, freezing gales of winter; safely conducting bolts of lighting; supporting, as Atlas, the gravid snows of winter.

Deyo p. 103.

Signs to Maspeth, Flatbush and Ozone Park.

Donleavy, N. pag.

These are the hands that paste posters and notices on lamppost and wall. Over the course of time, one poster is pasted over another and each in its turn crumbles and peels and fades away. But bits of each remain to form collages which are subject to change whenever the wind blows hard or another hand puts up a fresh poster.

Binzen, N. pag.

Character of Streets
Every street and avenue should be studied as an individual artistic problem.
   Goodman, p. 304.

The use and purpose of streets: history.

Rear Window is set on a fictitious 125 West 9th Street, nonexistent because West 9th has a career of only a single block.
   Conrad, p. 293.

Eighth Avenue: the greater lower middle class highway of New York.
   Hawes, N. pag.

Allen Street: the Riviera of the bums.

Fifth Avenue automatically denotes a gentleman while Central Park West a commoner.
   Hawes, N. pag.

People on Lexington Avenue are wishing that they lived in a more cheerful street.

In the Hunter’s Gate and out the Miner’s Gate and down Fifth Avenue.
   Donleavy, N. pag.

The curve of lower Broadway around Bowling Green Park when you went up to Wall Street.
   Jackson, p. 678.

The Bowery alive outside the window with its traffic and muttering winos, inside a house with alley cats chasing each other through the dimly lit room.
   Wojnarowicz, p. 184.

Broadway has a kind of island in the center, with strips of grass and a green bush or two, and at each street crossing there are a few benches on this island where the real hard-bitten city dwellers sit, in the very center of the rushing traffic, happily relaxed and cheerfully chatting.
   Atkinson, p. 25.
Riding up Broadway amid the soft hail of ticker tape.
Ellis, p. 526.

Sockedin on Park Avenue.
Donleavy, N. pag.

These streets are constantly stalked by high buildings.
Bennett, Deconstructing, p. 9.

Where every street is a dead end and in which the sluggish rivers trap the island like a moat.
Brook, p. 16.

all these streets leading / so crosswise, honking, lengthily, / by avenues
Bennett, Deconstructing, p. 9.

The streets are always disappearing around here.
Maffi, p. 50.

The brutal breaking of the streetscape, both historically and aesthetically.
Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 17.

The East Side street could not be banished with a leather strap.
Gold, p. 19.

Leaving the island of Manhattan. Arrive on the mainland of the Bronx.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Truth to tell, Sixth and Eighth at the best of times is no cozy byway of the Village. Back when the Women’s House of Detention occupied the site of the fenced neighborhood garden some neighbors refer to “Pansies in Bondage,” the streets veritably rang with conversations between inmates and loved ones six stories apart. The traffic island dividing Sixth and Greenwich avenues is an old haunt of brass bands partial to Souza medleys. And the intersection itself—can you try to imagine a sleazy incensed souk run by people in Mohawks, leather boots, and jackets that say “Stormtroopers of Death, Speak English or Die”? [Sound]
Trebay, p. 80.

Abandon all hope ye who enter here is scrawled in blood red lettering on the side of the Chemical Bank near the corner of Eleventh and First and is in print large enough to be seen from the backseat of the cab as it lurches forward in the traffic leaving Wall Street and just as Timothy Price notices the words a bus pulls up, the advertisement for Les Misérables on its side blocking his view, but Price who is with Pierce & Pierce and twenty-six doesn't seem to care because he tells the driver he will give him five dollars to turn up the radio, "Be My Baby" on WYNN, and the driver, black, not American, does so... Price calms down, continues to stare out the cab's dirty window, probably at the word FEAR sprayed in red graffiti on the side of a McDonald's on Fourth and Seventh... Like in a movie another bus appears, another poster for Les Misérables replaces the word—not the same bus because someone has written the word DYKE over Eponine's face. [Technology] [Sound] [Advertising] [Text] [Graffiti

Ellis, Psycho, p. 3.

Subjective Streets [Flâneur]

The street gets you.
Walker, Night Club, p. 200.

As time went on, the streets were what I came to dread most, and I was willing to do almost anything to avoid them.

I remember my favorite nights were just getting drunk and walking around the East Village kicking over garbage cans. Just the night. Just the night. Just that it would be night again. And you could go out, you know? It just seemed glorious. And you'd be humming these great songs and anything could happen, and it was usually pretty good. You'd pick up some chick. You'd have an adventure. You'd go to some fantasy where you'd never been before.
McNeil, p. 299.

My heart would just be racing every time I did that block. And then the doors would open and I'd be there. I was so excited every night I went. Everything was new, and it was so exciting because I knew I was walking into the future.
Ibid., p. 299.

"The streets," Cory would say with a flash in his eye, "are mine."
As if to prove it, he stopped me one evening under a lamp at the corner of Christopher and Seventh Avenue.

"Kiss me," he commanded.

Well, I was out of the closet and all that, but the corner of Seventh Avenue and Christopher with traffic going by like there was no tomorrow...?

"Here?" I said.

"Here," he said.

Hamilton, pp. 14-5.

And it’s midafternoon and I find myself standing at a phone booth on a corner somewhere downtown, I don’t know where, but I’m sweaty and a pounding migraine thumps dully in my head and I’m experiencing a major-league anxiety attack, searching my pockets for Valium, Xanax, a leftover Halcion, anything, and all I find are three faded Nuprin in a Gucci pillbox, so I pop all three into my mouth and swallow them down with a Diet Pepsi and I couldn’t tell you where it came from if my life depended on it.

Ellis, Psycho, p. 148.

Streets coming fast,
One after the other.

Lowell, p. 54.

I find myself walking through the antique district below Fourteenth Street. My watch has stopped so I’m not sure what time it is, but probably ten-thirty or so. Black guys pass by offering crack or hustling tickets to a party at the Palladium. I walk by a newsstand, a dry cleaners, a church, a diner. The streets are empty; the only noise breaking up the silence is an occasional taxi cruising toward Union Square. A couple of skinny faggots walk by while I’m at a phone booth checking my messages, staring at my reflection in an antique store’s window. One of them whistles at me, the other laughs: a high, fey, horrible sound A torn playbill from Les Misérables tumbles down the cracked, urine-stained sidewalk. A streetlamp burns out. Someone in a Jean-Paul Gaultier topcoat takes a piss in an alleyway. Steam rises from below the streets, billowing up in tendrils, evaporating. Bags of frozen garbage line the curbs. The moon, pale and low, hangs just above the tip of the Chrysler Building. Somewhere from over in the West Village the siren from an ambulance screams, the wind picks it up, it echoes then fades. [Sound] [Garbage] [Light] [Nature] [Wind] [Silence] [Air]

Ellis, Psycho, p. 128.
This is not hell, but the street.
Lorca, Poet, p. 123.

University Place: nothing of interest comes to mind about this minor thoroughfare of drab commercial buildings and boring apartment houses, with equally drab and boring bars, delis, and coffee shops interspersed, from shoddy, ugly Fourteenth Street down to what was then the staid and quiet corner of Eighth and University, where one found, inexplicably, completely out of place, the misnamed Cedar Street Tavern.
Lesueur, p. 165.

Another night, deep in the summer, the heat of my room sent me out into the streets. I walked down Third Avenue to Fifty-first Street, where there was an antique store with an object in its window I admired: a palace of a bird cage, a mosque of minarets and bamboo rooms yearning to be filled with talkative parrots. But the price was three hundred and fifty dollars. On the way home I noticed a cab-driver crowd gathered in front of P. J. Clark’s saloon, apparently attracted there by a happy group of whiskey-eyed Australian army officers baritoning, “Waltzing Matilda.” As they sang they took turns spin-dancing a girl over the cobbles under the El; and the girl, Miss Golightly, to be sure, floated round in their, arms light as a scarf. [Summer] [Heat]
Capote, p. 13.

There’s nothing better than taking a walk through the seedy part of downtown Manhattan during the steamy summer nights. I distinctly remember the smell of cigarettes, alcohol, garbage and cheap perfume. On the way to Keith Haring and Juan Dubose’s cluttered apartment on Broome Street, hookers lined the blocks of Chrystie Street. We always knew that we were near because we could hear the sound of their vinyl hot pants snapping back and forth and their heels clicking. [Weather] [Smell]
Frisa, p. 167.

At the corner of Jones and Bleecker a Chinese restaurant has replaced the bar whose lesbian patrons kept you awake so many summer nights when, too hot to sleep, you lay together with the windows open. [Sound] [Summer] [Heat]
McInerney, p. 134.

Q: What were your early influences?
A: The sidewalks of New York. East 11th Street, West 12th Street... so many side streets one doesn’t think of when not in town.
Creeley, N. pag.

A six-year-old boy was recently asked at the kindergarten to name the principal use of the streets of New York. He promptly replied that the streets of New York were made for the cable-cars to run over. If this boy spends his life on Manhattan Island, the chances are he will never have occasion to amend this answer, and never think what the streets of New York are really for, and to whom they really belong.
Girdner, pp. 51-2.

Riding a bike in Manhattan is indeed perilous sport... "You ride through red lights, you ride against the traffic. You can be a felon," said Chester... There’s a freedom in being on your bike in the city. You feel like you’re floating above the masses. I’m pretty fearless on my bike, in ways that I can’t be in the rest of my life. I feel like I’m the best on my bike, the most in tune with myself and the city." [Traffic Lights]
Bushnell, N. pag.

Streetscape

Montgomery Schuyler reviewed the streetscape of New York, pronouncing buildings appropriate or innocent or adventuresome or conformist, as if they were interesting characters or coded bits of behavior. He always seemed to sense where these buildings had come from, from the heart or the mind or the ego, born of ambition or pretension, nostalgia, or sheer mechanical ingenuity. His pronouncements applied as aptly to the citizens of the city as to their structures. As the new Fifth Avenue buildings were "amusing," so, in a way, were their pretentious owners. The older generation of houses, by contrast, were "primeval venerable things"—"dull" but innocent. [City as Body]
Hawes, N. pag.

A walk first: past the rich people eating chicken dinners on the sidewalk terraces of the Fifth Avenue Hotel... past the Young Marrieds, determinedly busying lousy paintings under the street lamps to take them back to the three-and-a-half out in Queens... past the glittering stream of lion tamers, pirates, hoods, Englishmen, movie stars, poets, motorcycle riders, citizens, ingénues, bright young urine-analysts and beards on Eighth Street. Then through the park and under the dark, rustling trees, and the young lovers eating cantaloupe on the black lawns, and out onto Fever Street, MacDougal Street and then around, taking Sixth Avenue back (stopping often to have our silhouettes drawn on soft copper “by genuine artists”), then west on Greenwich Avenue and into the Picador.

Manville, p. 345.

He’s now on Second Avenue, in the Yorkville section of Manhattan. He stops running for a moment to catch his breath. Once again he tries to hail a cab in the truck-filled street. No luck. He starts to run again. The music continues. The camera shows an empty phone booth; Ike runs over to it. He puts a dime into the slot and dials. The number is still busy. He drops the receiver back and leaves the booth quickly. He continues to run, now past Gramercy Park, oblivious to the passers-by, the traffic, everything but getting to where he desperately wants to go. The camera shows the lobby of Tracy’s apartment house, looking outside from its interior. A limousine is parked at the curb. The music changes to “But Not for Me” as Ike runs onto the screen. He looks inside the glass doors, breathing hard. He looks pleased. [Technology] [Sound]

Allen, Manhattan, p. 269

Just rain, black squares of windows, a drunk that weaved up the sidewalk.

Spillane, p. 267.

Onward: across the park and out into Fifth Avenue: stampeding against the noonday traffic, taxis, buses that screechinghswerved. Past the Duke mansion, the Frick Museum, past the Pierre and the Plaza.

Capote, p. 70.

Every day on this corner, summer or winter, spring or fall, a small group of men meet. They have no steady employment, nothing they can speak of; they do, however, have the gift of gab. These man can talk, talk, and mo’ talk, and when a bottle is going round and they’re feeling “nice,” they get philosophical. These men become the great thinkers of the world, with solutions to all its ills; like drugs, the homeless, and AIDS.

Lee, p. 12.
A distant street corner seen between two buildings. The traffic is very light at this hour, but a Sanitation Department truck moves through the intersection spraying water out behind it to cool the pavement and keep the dust down. Three little kids in bathing suits run behind the truck, playing in the water.

Hayes, p. 2.

Hasidim hurry up and down the street, holding their hats, stopping to confer with one another, taking care not to eyeball the women in miniskirts.

McInerney, p. 68.

Empty cabs keep rolling past and you and Vicky continue to talk.

Ibid., p. 97.

While lighting a gargantuan joint, camcorder guy shoots out the huge expanse of French windows, the lens staring at a view of a leafless Union Square Park, at a truck with a massive Snapple logo driving by, limousines parked at a curb. [Drugs]

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 12.

Cabs lumber by silently, someone dressed exactly like me crosses the street, three beautiful girls pass by, each maybe sixteen and eyeing me, trailed by a thug with a camcorder, the muted, dissonant strains of Moby float from the open doors of the Crunch gym across the street where on the building above it a giant billboard advertises in huge black block letters the word TEMPURA. [Sound] [Publicity] [Text] [Food]

Ibid., p. 107.

You take in the street by layers: this guy with the hat stepping too close to your shoulder; the storefront signs and window displays prompting impulse purchases; the stone-cut ornaments just above your head (cornices, cherubs, lions), and sometimes a whole second-story tier of retail or an upstairs restaurant; the wall posters on construction sites selling movies, politicians, rock stars; and, finally, the tops of buildings, for which the best touches are often saved: Babylonian roof gardens, green copper domes, medieval castle turrets, Mayan setbacks, Greek temples, and all manner of pointy needles symbolizing the heavenward aspirations of commerce. [Commodity] [Antiquity] [Cosmic]

By the mid-thirties the stores and entertainment palaces had long since closed, becoming empty-eyed witnesses to an earlier prosperity. When de Kooning moved in, the side streets were lined with graceless loft buildings that contained small factories and manufacturing spaces. Each was four or five stories high—sometimes as tall as eight—and without much enlivening decoration, careful proportion, or, indeed, any regaining architectural quality. The treeless streets, city canyons devoid of much light and space, were narrow. After dark, the area was deserted and grim. Few buildings were legitimate residences. Most were cold-water lofts, home to artists, dancers, and others.

Stevens & Swan, p. 119.

Traces of an earlier era, before the lofts, could be seen in the rows of ornate, wrought-iron stoops that were never torn down.

Ibid., p. 119.

In one night scene on the streets of New York, he depicted de Kooning as a haunted, brainy figure emerging from the abstract flicker of the city. [Abstraction]

Ibid., p. 420.

Greenwich Avenue is dishing up some of the sexiest girls and gayest boys in town. The former gaze at the boutiques and the latter at each other, all with shameless rapaciousness.

Binzen, N. pag.

The light changed and I saw my street coming up. I had to circle the block because it was a one way, then squeeze in between a decrepit delivery truck and a battered sedan. The number I wanted was a weather-beaten loft building, with an upholstery shop fronting on the street. On one side was a narrow entrance with a service elevator in the rear and a sign announcing the available vacancies hanging on the door.

Spillane, p. 290.

New York had its sinkholes, too, and the number of this one placed it smack in the middle of the slime. It was a one-way street of rats' nests with the river at one end and a saloon on each corner, peopled with men and women that had the flat, vacant look of defeat stamped on their faces.

Ibid., p. 189.
On one corner was a run-down candy store whose interior was obscured by flyspecked signs, but for all its dirt it served as a neighborhood hangout. In front of the paper stand were three young punks in sharp two-tone sports outfits making dirty cracks at the girls passing by. A husky blonde turned and slapped one across the jaw and got a boot in the tail for her trouble. This time she kept on going.

I wasn’t going anywhere… just driving, taking it easy along the main stem, following anybody that was ahead of me. Somehow we got to the approach of the Manhattan Bridge and it was easier to go across than to cut out of traffic. This time I was behind a truck that led the way down Flatbush Avenue at a leisurely pace. Evidently he was in no hurry, because he didn’t bother going through light changes and never jumped the reds. He set such a nice pace that when he parked at Beverly Road for ten minutes I sat behind him and waited until he came back and followed him some more. The first thing I knew we had the lights of the city behind us and were skirting Floyd Bennett Field, and the air was carrying the salty tang of the ocean with it. We crossed the bridge then and he turned left, but I didn’t follow. The winding macadam on the right led in the direction of the breezes and I took it to a gate and on into Rockaway Point.

J - Flâneur

The grid reproaches the flâneur.

The flâneur seemed out of place in a city growing so rapidly and re-constructing itself every ten years, as buildings within the grid were pulled down and replaced. Tallack, N. pag.

Who's going to write the history of the streets? And, anyway, what will it matter? Is there anyone around who can say, with calendar accuracy, when the solitary and quiet length of pavement and curb on which you walk every day became, let us say, a hooker's stroll?
Trebay, p. 63.

The moment you decide to go in search of the city is fraught with difficulties. Magical, yes, but also very tricky, because it is precisely in that moment that you determine your relationship with it: where and how to begin.
Maffi, p. 13.

I have contracted the habit of wandering. This great town, with its infinite modifications of nationality and external form, holds me in the afternoon and evening when I am through work, in a vise. But, somehow, altho there is movement and life in plenty, there is nothing vivid, or exciting about it, nothing irritating as are one's own little affairs. Life is lived in big masses by the common people. The rhythm of life is low because it is big and important. That street moving with quiet energy is more peaceful than a country scene. It lulls like the perpetual breaking of waves. I start out on one of my long wanderings because I want diversion in my loneliness and usually end up with feeling that it is deep folly to desire diversion at all. The contented masses of humanity gently vibrating through the broad street flooded with warm and liquid light, make me hate my individuality, despise my intelligence and my ambitions, and minimize the importance of everything except the essentials of life.
Hapgood, pp. 216-7.

Momentary disorientation, intimate exposure, physical contact with strangers, pratfalls, public humiliations—conditions that in other circumstances might have been excruciating—become richly entertaining.

Kasson, p. 61.

Think about what happens to you during any two minutes spent walking on a city street—the flood of sensations, perceptions, and feelings that courses through you, most of them hardly deserving your attention. The multiplicity and density of detail is far greater than even the richest collection of verbalized thoughts or conversations with yourself that may have been going on at the same time. The process by which the world impinges on us at all times and the constantly shifting apprehension of our relation to it are too enormous for us to fully grasp.

McCourt, p. 7.

More than anything else, what he liked to do was walk. New York was a labyrinth of endless steps and no matter how far he walked, it always left him with the feeling of being lost. Each time he too a walk, he felt he was leaving himself behind. By giving himself up to the streets, by reducing himself to a seeing eye, he was able to escape thinking. All places became equal, and on his best walks, he was able to feel that he was nowhere. This was all he ever asked of things: to be nowhere. New York as the nowhere he had built around himself and he had no intention of ever leaving it again.

Auster, Glass, p. 4.

Walk down any street in the soft violet light. Make the mind blank. A thousand sensations assault you at once from every direction. Here man is still furred and feathered; here cyst and quartz still speak. There are audible, voluble buildings with sheet-metal visors and windows that sweat; places of worship too, where the children drape themselves about the porticos like contortionists; rolling, ambulant streets where nothing stands still, nothing is fixed, nothing is comprehensible except through the eyes and a mind of a dreamer. Hallucinating streets too, where suddenly all is silence, all is barren, a fevered temple, streets to die on and not a soul takes notice. Strange frangi-panic streets, in which attar of roses mingles with the acrid bite of leek and scallion. Slippered streets, which echo with the pat and slap of lazy feet. Streets out of Euclid, which can be explained only by logic and theorem.

Miller, Sexus, pp. 535-7.
A lyrical expectancy and openness, expressed through a mixture of the poetic and the factual.
Amin, p. 11.

A man must make a great effort not to lose himself in the crowd, not to be overwhelmed by his amazement—an amazement in which there is neither transport nor joy. But if he succeeds in individualizing himself, he finds that these millions of fires produce a dismal, all-revealing light. Tho they hint at the possibility of beauty, they everywhere discover a dull, gloomy ugliness.

On a mild October day, sunshine is said to be loitering in the cross-streets. The avenues won’t even permit the light to dawdle. If it wants to be idle, it must do so around the corner. But the avenues can be won over if you stroll on them at leisure, rather than hurrying like the preoccupied men of business.
Conrad, p. 196.

Twice I had passed through it; but this was really my first visit to New York; and as I walked about that evening I began to feel the dread power of the city; the crowds, the lights, the excitement, the gayety all its subtler stimulating influences began to take effect upon me. My blood ran quicker, and I felt that I was just beginning to live. To some natures this stimulant of life in a great city becomes a thing as binding and necessary as opium is to one addicted to the habit. It becomes their breath of life; they cannot exist outside of it; rather than be deprived of it they are content to suffer hunger, want, pain and misery; they would not exchange even a ragged and wretched condition among the great crowd for any degree of comfort away from it. [Drugs]

Walking affirms, suspects, tries out, transgresses, respects, etc., the trajectories it “speaks.”
Jacks, p. 35.

In the crowd he is sublimely reminded of his own paltrines and finitude, as against the annihilating infinitude of nature.
Conrad, p. 84.

The trialectics of being: historicality, sociality, and spatiality.
Enter the reflexive walker who engages in a two-way encounter between mind and the city.

The constant physical closeness of mutually anonymous strangers needing to deal with each other in daily life.

When bored we took to our city with a Huysmans-like perversity.

Commander Thomas J. Keane, 65 years old, hopes to complete next Sunday afternoon, if the weather is bright, a project he started a little less than four years ago—to walk every street, avenue, alley, square and court on Manhattan Island.

He started at the island’s tip, taking all the east-west streets. He has had to weave and backtrack a lot in the crooked lanes and alleys in the financial district and in Greenwich Village.

He worked the flanks of Central Park as solid east and west blocks—took them from Fifty-ninth to 110th and then resumed his river-to-river hikes north of that point. The going was roughest where the marginal motor highways block easy access to the rivers’ brims.

All told, the commander has covered 3,022 city blocks, which add up to roughly 502 miles. After he had done all the side streets he took the avenues, working from east to west. He left Broadway for the last, because it is the only avenue that runs the island’s full length.

The most curious things he saw were a goat farm, or stable, at 128th Street near the East River and the shacks on stilts on Harlem River around 223rd or 225th Street.

The first man to walk the length of Manhattan backwards.

Walking every street in the grid temporarily unearths an apparently comprehensive collection of memories in physical things.

The only people ever to walk through the 8,500-foot
Holland Tunnel for pleasure were members of the throngs (20,000 people) that attended the dedication ceremonies on November 12, 1927, at the Broome Street entrance plaza to Jersey City. After the speeches had ended and President Calvin Coolidge had pressed a button in the White House, thousands crowded into the tubes to make the first crossing of the Hudson River on foot; one enthusiast walked the tunnel—a mile and a half from portal to portal and at the time the longest underwater tunnel in the world—seven times before asking a tunnel policeman in Jersey City for directions to the nearest ferry.

Moscow, p. 105.

From about six or seven, Broadway lights up—my very favourite street, the only one that capriciously and brazenly butts through streets and avenues as regular as prison bars. It’s harder to get lost in New York than it is in Tulsa. From north to south run the avenues, and from east to west the streets. Fifth Avenue divides the city in half, between West and East. And that’s all there is to it. I’m on Eighth Street, on the corner of Fifth Avenue. I want to get to the Fifty-third Street and Second Avenue corner. That means I have to go forty-five blocks, and turn right to the corner of Second.

Mayakovsky, America, p. 52.

To find the nearest street if you only have an Avenue address, drop the last digit of the building’s number, divide it by two and add specified numerals—for 500 Fifth Avenue—for instance, you add 18 to 25 and discover that your destination stands near the corner of 43rd St.

Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 69.

In Midtown Manhattan you walk as though on a conveyor belt, the grid pulling you along... you keep moving, you feel purposeful, wary, pointed, athletic. You can gauge your progress to an appointment by the rule of thumb that a block takes roughly a minute on foot.

The avenues may be ladders of ascent, but the cross streets at right angles to them are exits to dalliance, resorts of indolence.

Conrad, p. 196.

I have often walked it at night, scanning the rectangles of lighted panes and wondering. [Voyeur]

Morley, New York, p. 66.
Hunter the millionaire walks up Fifth Avenue at 4 a.m. from a nightclub on 53rd Street to his home on 71st and ponders as he goes his ancestral ownership of New York, marking "the mounting numbers, significant as names, of the marching streets." He receives the salutation of the reeling avenue.

Conrad, p. 195.

After the party I walked around the city, beginning my farewells. The customary tinder lights beat up from the streets onto the low clouds overhead. On a sidewalk somewhere in the Eighties I saw a Cuban going through the steps of a rhumba, holding a baby in his arms. A dinner party in the Sixties was breaking up and men and women were standing in a lighted doorway calling good-by and good-night. In the Fifties I saw a scavenger pushing an enormous English perambulator—a carriage for a princess—from ash can to ash can. [Garbage]

I know the deep night ballet and its seasons best from walking long after midnight to tend a baby and, sitting in the dark, seeing the shadows and hearing the sounds of the sidewalk. Mostly it is a sound like infinitely pattering snatches of party conversation and, about three in the morning, singing, very good singing. Sometimes there is a sharpness and anger or sad, sad weeping, or a flurry of search for a string of beads broken. One night a young man came roaring along bellowing terrible language at two girls whom he had apparently picked up and who were disappointing him. [Sound]

Rorem, pp. 813-4.

The men were passing, too, mostly young ones with faces that seemed to be made of pink wood, with a dry, monotonous expression, and jowls so wide and coarse they were hard to get used to... Well, maybe that was the kind of jowls their womenfolk wanted. The sexes seems to stay on different sides of the street. The women look at the shop windows, their whole attention was taken by the handbags, scarves, and little silk doodads, displayed very little at a time, but with precision and authority. You didn't see many old people in the crowd. Not many couples either. Nobody seemed to find it strange that I should sit on that bench for hours all by myself, watching the people pass. But all at once the policeman standing like an inkwell in the middle of the street seemed to suspect me of sinister intentions. I could tell.

Céline, p. 168.

I liked to walk up Fifth Avenue and pick out romantic women from the crowd and imagine that in a few minutes I was going to enter into their lives, and no one would ever now or disapprove. Sometimes in my mind, I followed them to their apartments on the corners of hidden street, and they turned and smiled back at me before they faded through a door into warm darkness...

Daydreaming on a country road is one thing. Daydreaming on Fifth Avenue with hundreds of other people striding down the same sidewalk is quite another. But because we are so crowded here, active recognition of other people has become mostly a matter of choice. Even so, compliments, insults, banter, smiles and genuine conversations among strangers are part of the city's noise, its stimulus, its charm.

Hustvedt, N. pag.

I left the hotel and walked down Broadway. The pursuit of my type gave a pleasant savor of life and interest to the air I breathed. I was glad to be in a city so great, so complex and diversified... I strolled along with my heart expanding at the thought that I was a citizen of great Gotham, a sharer in its magnificence and pleasures, a partaker.

The endless feeling of one street leading to another, an ancient chain of physical communication.

Turner, p. 102.

The pedestrian soils the pavement as he walks; his eye likewise stains or fades what he looks at.

Conrad, p. 302.

I prefer New York with soiled pavements to other cities set upon floors like those of Heaven. [Cosmic]

Broadway at Forty-second Street, on those selfsame spring evenings when the city is crowded with an idle, sightseeing cloud of Westerners; when the doors of all shops are open, the windows of nearly all restaurants wide to the gaze of the idlest passer-by.

Dreiser, p. 3.

All these April nights combing the streets alone a Broadway skyscraper has obsessed him—a grooved building jutting up with uncountable bright windows falling onto him out of a scudding sky.

Dos Passos, p. 253.

As I walk up Broadway, the people that brush past me seem always hastening toward a destination they never reach. Their motions are eager, as if they said, “We are on our way, we shall arrive in a moment.” They keep up the pace—they almost run. Each on his quest intent, in endless procession they pass, tragic, grotesque, gay, they all sweep onward like rain falling upon leaves. I wonder where they are going. I puzzle my brain; but the mystery is never solved. Will they at last come somewhere? Will anybody be waiting for them? The march never ceases. Their feet have worn the pavements unevenly. I wish I knew where they are going. Some are nonchalant, some walk with their eyes on the ground, others step lightly, as if they might fly if their wings were not bound by the multitude. A pale little woman is guiding the steps of a blind man. His great hand drags on her arm. Awkwardly he shortens his stride to her gait. He trips when the curb is uneven; his grip tightens on the arm of the woman. Where are they going?

Like figures in a meaningless pageant, they pass. There are young girls laughing, loitering. They have beauty, youth, lovers. They look in the shop windows, they look at the huge winking signs; they jostle the crowds, their feet keep time to the music of their hearts. They must be going to a pleasant place. I think I should like to go where they are going.

Keller, p. 298.

On Broadway I am not accustomed to find the “real thing.” Judge of my delight, therefore, to find an atmosphere and an assemblage which were, in their way, the realest of the real. Here were men and women who combined qualities rarely found in conjunction on Broadway. They were not merely riotous. They were not really riotous at all, for they evidently didn’t try to be. It was natural. And then they were all intelligent—and oh! word that covers a multitude of sins—artistic!

Hapgood, p. 220.
Before the light fades I went for a walk and headed towards Sixth Avenue. The rush hour was building up. It was my favourite time of day, when immobilized cars buzz and growl across six lanes of avenue while pedestrians, free as air, thread between them. The liberty of the unmechanized is deliciously intensified by the sorrowful captivity of the motorized.

Brook, p. 144.

The streets shunt him along, and from his privileged platform he reviews the city as a performance staged to divert him.

n.cit.

Flown were the real things. Flown was the world of expression.

Hapgood, p. 366.

Suspended in time and space, an interruption in the whirlwind of urban rhythms, an Arcadia carved out of the heart of the metropolis.

Maffi, p. 20.

The watching of streets: the old, chance meetings, the insecurity of being in an open place, of vulnerability.

Turner, p. 102.

I STARTED OFF from South Ferry one night upon a zigzag walk. Sleepless tramps were huddled in the seats in Battery Park; others were lying on the grass, flat and dazed as if they had fallen from balloons. There were hoots and howls from across the river, red lights and green lights, the hum-grum of machinery, and the strange electric-light cascade of moving elevated trains. 'Twas one by the clock. Syria slept. Greece slept.

I walked by Front Street to Moore Street, to Water Street, to Broad, to Pearl, to Coenties Slip, to Stone, to Mill Lane, to South William Street, to Broad again, past a blank empty lighted telegraph office, to Exchange Place, to New Street, to Wall Street. Thus I arrived at the financial anvil of the world. But all was still, no hammering, no bellows blowing, no flying sparks. Yellow stars looked down on the deserted Exchange. But I saw what appeared to be some Pagan temple, a stark altar of human sacrifice, and it proved to be a famous Christian Church, none other than Holy Trinity on Broadway, and as I stood by the strange little graveyard the church clock struck half past one. The little white headstones looked like the dead popping up from the tomb. There was heard the resounding hoot of a steamer on the river—yea, the last trump. Fast cars scooted along wet empty Broadway as if fleeing the wrath to come and all were going uptown.

Then I went on by Little Thames Street, and felt for a moment as if I were in part of the City of London. It also is deserted in the regions of Capel Court at that hour of the night. There are no nightshifts in stockbroking. You do not see a relief of stenographers being marched up Wall Street by a Managing Clerk; the stenographer’s relief is prancing in the White Friars and Tangoland.

I was in Cedar Street and Greenwich Street, walking under the “El” like a rat, and came to Liberty Street—O Liberty, most empty was thy street—and to Washington above that sleeping Syria and sleeping Greece, and so, going by Cortland Street, I came to West Street and its great market. It was two o’clock, and New York here was very much alive.

There were horse waggons and motor waggons, cases and baskets of vegetables and fruit, and porters innumerable hurrying hither and thither with gleaming white-wood boxes on their shoulders. I emerged from the dead city where never a blade of grass twinkles before square toes and came into a fairyland of cucumbers and corn, cabbages and melons and Malaga grapes. Refreshing fruit odours invaded the nostrils.

Heaps of small black grapes looked in the dim light like exaggerated caviare. I kicked a peach as I walked along. What largesse in the night, peaches are like stones in the roadway! They tumbled from wooden troughs and buckets uncovered and overfilled. There were South Mountain oranges and California lemons. There were crates of greens stacked higher than men. There were cabinets of blackberries and raspberries. The nose whispered to the heart “Raspberries, raspberries” as it tasted the air. Coloured porters with perspiring gleaming faces shouldered boxes of green varnish-surfaced peppers along narrow alley ways between piles of other boxes. Carrots peeped out of their ventilated crates like brown ribbons. Side streets were blocked with potatoes and yams. Activity, activity, activity—and quietude. The workers do not help themselves along with foul expletives and abuse as in London. They seem to be conserving their energy, or imitating the electric lamps which do their job and say nothing about it. But it is a big market, bigger than Covent Garden in London, and I reflected that New Yorkers eat more fruit and vegetables than we do. There is more for them to eat. Their reserves are greater.
The quayside beyond the market is long and spacious and empty. The freer air seems to be minus something—is it the mental ozone of New York? West Street is a long backyard. It has no mechanical turnings on the left. If you wish to take a turning on the left, the way of the heart, you must take a ship. There are ships in the wharves still as birds dozing head on wing in a covert at night. Not a rustle nor a whisper comes from the giant Cunarder. West Street is the landing stage of the Atlantic ferry. You stand on West Street and you think Southampton. You stand in West Street and you think Havana, San Juan, Cristobal, Panama, Valparaiso. You stand on West Street and think Cherbourg, Naples, the Piraeus. But now no one is thinking anything. The gangways may be down, but no one is on them. Eastward New York’s luminosity lies in layers like masonry of light and darkness built from the rocks to the night-sky. Westward lies the beautiful river flowing away to the calm ocean. And on the wide roadway of the quay laden lorries rush and crash bearing produce to the market or away.

I sought a turning on the left and did not find one till Fourteenth Street. It was a lonely walk. A drunken man sitting on a bit of paving addressed me vaguely. He was looking at the heavens with lacklustre eye.

“There’s only one star left. How far’s that from here?” he queried.

I passed an empty “Goulash Kitchen,” passed standing freight cars, passed the embarkation for Tampa and Mobile, passed the Boston and Providence pier, passed the R.M.S.P., passed the Hoboken Ferry and entered the Gansevoort market stirring feebly. A black and white cat was squatting in the roadway fastidiously eating melon.

My turning to the left proved to be the virtual one of Eleventh Avenue where it starts North near West Fourteenth Street, and there, like a derelict trolley car left stranded on the ooze after the subsidence of a flood, was a windowed shed with the explicit word LUNCH printed on it. This was kept by a lonely Greek.

“Where do you come from?” I asked, perched on my revolving stool at the counter and munching pie.

“Island,” he answered.

“What? From Ireland? You don’t look it.”

“No. Island. Crete. Greek, yes.”

“Fine country.”

“Not Americans?”
“No, English now. But in two hundred year maybe England go down. Other nation rise up.”

“How d’ye like New York?”

A friend from the island of Rhodes rolled in for his morning coffee on his way to work at the National Biscuit Factory. “Rhodes no good. Italians there. They turn out Greeks. New York fine. Plenty money. Rodos bad.”

I said Good Morning and Good-bye, and walked out on to Fourteenth Street, turned into Tenth Avenue and then into West Fifteenth Street where the “fleet” of the Biscuit Company was waiting in the dark like a string of camels before dawn on the outskirts of Baghdad.

Biscuits are not made all night. They are evidently partly compounded of daylight. But here was where my friend from Rhodes belonged, or in local parlance here the islander “held down his jahb.”

Ninth Avenue was drear. Orion up above the roofs was striding hastily across Sixteenth Street. On Eighth Avenue a big fruiterer’s stood wide open, very still and empty. What zest for trade!

West Seventeenth Street, Seventh Avenue, West Eighteenth, Sixth Avenue, West Nineteenth, passed as one. I was thinking of London and did not notice them. At Fifth Avenue I paused, for the speedway had had its nightly wash and was all aswill with water like a bathhouse floor.

I zigzagged across to Lexington and saw an iceman dragging blocks of ice into a large clean-swept and ready but empty cafeteria.

On Twenty-third Street I stopped at a shop window which was stacked with dollar shirts. A tall notice said “FORCED TO SELL.” The shop was closed but it was flooded with electric light. I saw many offices and barber shops where the lights had been left on all night. And on Twenty-ninth Street I paused in front of a locked undertaker’s where, a white-lined baby’s coffin was exposed, charmingly illuminated.

On Avenue A, the ashpan of the other avenues, there were notices which struck an Englishman as strange. The words TRANSIENTS met my eye. We advertise “Short Garage” but New Yorkers talk of “Transients.” What poetry there is in the word! In some streets all other lighted signs have been put out and the one word remains brilliantly enshrined, now here, now there, “Transients!” “Transients!”

After all, every one in the great caravanserai of New York is a transient. Every one in the caravanserai of the world is a transient. The world itself is a transient. Look up among the stars; you will see it as a celestial sky sign. There it is pricked out all over the dark deep of space—TRANSIENTS.

I am a transient in the city of New York at night. I am gyrating across the fitfully sleeping city from the Hudson to the East River. No other great city can be got across so quickly. One could run across it in less than half an hour. I was soon out at the water edge on the other side of the island, listening to the ceaseless Edison works. Oh, what is Edison contriving there, are they engines of death or of life? The wonder name of Edison stirs the imagination as if he were an arch wizard, the Michael Scott of the New World. The river of Time flows by and the great works climb upward on its banks.

It is five a.m. Something of the burden of the city has been lifted. The air is light. The heart seems freed. I feel happy to be walking. I love the space and the quietness. I have got rid of the idea of going to bed, got rid of the routine of daily life. New York and its millions, its wealth, its mysteries, are mine. There is a sense of conquest. The bustle has died down and I am still walking. The majority of people are asleep—but I am not the least sleepy. It seems as if life has just begun. I am dancing on a springed floor. The stones of the side-walks help me to leap along First Avenue, grim, empty, gloomy Avenue One, which has no turning to the right except little bottle-neck lanes which go down to the edge of the water of the East River.

I spent many nights in this way wandering about the city and returning at dawn, resuming next night at the point where I had left off the night before.

Whoever would know the poetry of New York must walk it in the after-midnight hours, see the red light come out on the Metropolitan tower preliminary to the striking of the hour; one is too pre-occupied and diverted to observe it in the livelier hours; enter the Central station at four a.m. and see it anew, deserted, silent, beautiful as on the morning of Opening Day; see the City Hall at dawn hanging down from on high like the sky’s apron.

Queensboro Bridge, seen from the foot of East Fifty-third Street late at night, is a marvellous spectacle. There is light in the sky above and wandering light on the river below. There is all the grandeur which circumambient shade can give. “What have I come to?” you ask, astonished after the sordidness of the Avenue, with its many garbage cans. Suddenly you see a mirage. It is called Queensboro Bridge. It takes the mind to the finest parts of the Seine and the Thames. You feel you must be at the centre of a great city, near its Parliament, its palaces, its pontifical grandeurs. But this is Rome without a Pope—a mere bridge, beautiful and awe-inspiring by accident, a convenience whose formal magnificence goes unheeded in the daytime, when business absorbs all the interest and takes the first and only place in men’s eyes.

Still as I walk on I find the influence of the bridge expressed in men’s habitations. As I approach the great viaduct of the bridge the poor district smartens up dramatically. The massive piles of the viaduct and the lofty exaggerated attendant factory chimneys, the vague Colossus of a gas works, all suggest more spacious living, and Sutton Place is the reply.

But I descend rapidly a long straight empty street nameless here for evermore, and it becomes Avenue A—the old ashpan once again. People of no social prominence are herded in grim unremarkable blocks. Fire ladders disfigure the houses, or do they merely hide them like black veils, the ravaged faces of elderly ladies. Perhaps the houses look worse than a similar variety in London. But imagine Bow and Whitechapel all festooned with rusty fire ladders!
There is something queer about these ladders. They look like the old black ladders of tramp steamers let down to the wharves. The immigrant never gets away from the debarkation gangway. All New York is a quay. I see all the vessels that have arrived there—then the population swarming on the streets are all people who have come off ships.

But it is the most extraordinary shore in the world. It is well to have arrived there sometime or other on life’s voyage.

Solitary walking along the empty streets seems to attune the mind to the city. True thoughts flow like music from the mind. I came to another outside street happily named Exterior Street. It has a Venetian view of river, lights, ferries, and small boats. Away beyond the river the sparse lights of Welfare Island diamond the dark. On the right is the grandeur of the bridge. But Exterior Street is below New York. It is bounded by the great grey cliff of the original Manhattan Island. Somewhere up above there are houses and gardens. Children perhaps come and drop pebbles down into Exterior Street or on to the shaggy tufts of old grass. It is like a bit of mountain road. There are hunks of uncontrolled rock. The shoulder of the world juts out.
The silence is only accented by the rustling of the wind.
No, there is another sound which is part of the silence, it is the undying whirr of rotary machines. I am walking towards a huge factory and from its little doors strange dwarfs with darkened faces come out, look round, and go in again the workers, they don’t belong. I sit on the grass under the cliff and look over the water. It is Exterior Street: I am outside New York.

To understand any experience you must get outside of it. King Canute went to Exterior Street and bade the waves keep away from his toes. The gentry from Park Avenue and Upper Fifth might well make a pilgrimage to Exterior Street at four in the morning and sit there in the grass, outside the scene of their wealth and their power.

I left this curious street by smart residential East Seventy-ninth, thence by East End Avenue to East Eightieth. I had been outside; soon I was very much inside. I came to a steaming curtained window, lighted and murmurous. The one word STUBE was explanatory. I went inside and asked for cider. This seemed to amuse the bar-tender who, however, poured out two mugs of it at once and set them before me. There was a big notice on one of the walls, NO GAMBLING, and under it a vociferous throng were throwing scarlet dice.

“Splitz!” “Splitz!”—every one at the bar was asking for “Splitz.”

I was invited to join the “Wilhelm Union.” No one spoke a word of English. Mine host kept saying something about zwei kasen Scotch verkauft. I had a glass of whisky with a red-faced and puffing, very drunken man who showed me an iron cross and very paradoxically wanted to kiss me. I pointed to the only girl in the establishment, sitting sulkily in a corner. He took me over to a poster depicting the American Unknown Soldier which was inscribed—“Work for the Living,” and he nodded his head sententiously. A fig for unknown soldiers; all German soldiers were unknown. At least, so I surmised.

In this tavern ended another night and when next I resumed I quickly reached luxuriant, spacious, Southern-looking Fifth Avenue, the Avenue, as it is affectionately called. Curious fact about the avenues—the word avenue means approach; in England avenues are usually bordered with trees; in order to make a road into an avenue you plant trees. An avenue’s trees are its guard of honour leading to the portals of country house, castle, or palace. But the avenues of New York do not lead anywhere. They are paved rivers which go on and on through various districts to lose themselves eventually in wildernesses, to be dried up in social deserts. But Fifth Avenue for one hundred and ten streets does preserve its character of grandeur, and it is one of the most exhilarating ways to walk in any city.
With Central Park on one side and fine houses on the other, I walked twenty blocks, the Harlem moon standing over the street and raising gleaming reflections all the way. Moonlight also glinted from the highly polished varnish of fast moving automobiles. No one was walking except myself, and many men and women passed in cars and taxis, mostly lovers indulgently petting one another in course of transit from one night-club to another, or from a dance to their homes.

I turned with the park railings along Hundred-and-Tenth Street and came to the gay base of Lenox Avenue, then went in a circle through the Morningside district back to Fifth Avenue. I came to Harlem all aflame with the lure of pleasure—cabarets, night-clubs, dance-halls, chop-suey restaurants, parlours. At three in the morning I watched a bevy of coloured girls operating a barber shop, cutting the fuzzy hair of Harlem dandies in a brilliantly lighted hairdressing saloon. I strayed into Capitol Club and saw white women dreamily trotting with Negroes in slow jazz, strange women who defy the custom of night to enjoy the sensual thrill of the black man's dance.

By the cross-streets I passed through Africa. Street after street was entirely black, housing swarms of families, all black. Banjoes still throbbed in some; the ukuleles gurgled dance music, but most houses were silent. They were sleeping and snoring. They were bathed in the deep physical ardour of Negro sleep—only in doorways here and there petting couples lingered awake, oblivious of the clock.

I left Harlem by Edgecombe Avenue and St. Nicholas Avenue, the road dug up and dotted with red lanterns, and came to a substantial quiet and English-looking neighbourhood, Hamilton Terrace, 144th Street and Convent Avenue, very respectable.

But respectability only held a strip, and having crossed it I was in Amsterdum Avenue. Then I came to Broadway still very much Broadway and, making a sharp descent by 147th Street, came once more to the end of New York—the grandest backway of all Riverside Drive. The view was very beautiful. I could imagine that the Hudson River was the Danube and that I was in Bratislava again. The esplanade was high, serene, and wind-blowen, fresh with raindrops flickering across the eyes. Little boats, like sleeping ducks, lay upon the surface of the water. The automobiles which whirled along the drive seemed unreal; the river is the great reality. It is on view here. It knows it was before all the rest and will survive it, with thousands of years both before and after.
A ferry boat crosses the river like a tram on the sea-travellers once more, transients. Three shooting stars follow and pass over New Jersey—transients, transients. All is transient. New York is a setting for a drama that is being played, a spectacle which is being rehearsed. At four in the morning I am walking along like the Wandering Jew, but my taste is shared by two lovers in a solemn closed car drawn up overlooking the river. Through the misty glass I see them in one another’s arms, in close embrace.

Through silver-tinted clouds the moon seems to beat her way, keeping coming out, keeping going in, and as I climb Washington Heights I seem to be making another exit from the city, upward to the stars. All the way from South Ferry to the sky—I have skated the stairways of the city. I have gone from outside to inside, by Exterior Street to the heart. The mystic closes his eyes that he may see better. The curtain which comes down gives leisure to the mind to consider the hidden springs of drama. Night reveals the day.

Graham, pp. 36–52.

Strolling is almost a lost art in New York; at least, in the manner in which it is so generally practised in Harlem. Strolling in Harlem does not mean merely walking along Lenox or upper Seventh Avenue or One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street; it means that those streets are places for socializing. One puts on one’s best clothes and fares forth to pass the time pleasantly with the friends and acquaintances and, most important of all, the strangers he is sure of meeting. One saunters along, he hails this one, exchanges a word or two with that one, stops for a short chat with the other one. He comes up to a laughing, chattering group, in which he may have only one friend or acquaintance, but that gives him the privilege of joining in. He does join in and takes part in the joking, the small talk and gossip, and makes new acquaintances. He passes on and arrives in front of one of the theatres, studies the bill for a while, undecided about going in. He finally moves on a few steps farther and joins another group and is introduced to two or three pretty girls who have just come to Harlem, perhaps only for a visit; and finds a reason to be glad that he postponed going into the theatre. The hours of a summer evening run by rapidly. This is not simply going out for a walk; it is more like going out for adventure.

Johnson, Black Manhattan, p. 163.
Map in hand, walking fifty, sixty blocks a day that first heart-pounding week, resorting to the subway only to get to far-flung parts of Manhattan, I eagerly surveyed the reaches of the island I'd so long ago decided would one day be my home. Yet the place I'd envisioned paled beside the reality—an understandable reaction for me to have, since all I ever knew, all I could compare the city of my dreams with, were dismal suburban sprawls where nobody walks because there's nothing to see, where there is no spring, summer, fall, or winter, only unchanging days of humdrum sunshine that lull you into thinking comfort is all that matters in life. Small wonder I was agog over what I instantly recognized as the cosmopolitan atmosphere of a true city, whose want of any hint of provincialism thrilled me to the quick and whose awesome scale, ceaseless roar, and pounding tempo at once stunned, stirred, and seduced me. God, how the place bustled with people and activity! And it was now my home, it was where I should live.

Lesueur, p. 15.

Feeling a little cool, for the heat of the season was not yet excessive, he rose to stroll once more, now towards Fifty-ninth Street where over the tops of the greening trees myriad towers rose against the sky, creating an amazing spectacle which confirmed his desire to go somewhere, were it only for the pleasure of coming back to New York, a pleasure of which he never seemed to tire. Then the cock on the Heckscher Building reminded him of the storks of Strassbourg and Strassbourg reminded him of Germany. [Psychogeography]

Van Vechten, p. 242.

Rauschenberg: a flâneur who becomes a bricoleur. The bricoleur is Crusoe on his island. He is also Rauschenberg in New York, scavenging on the beaches of Staten Island and among the downtown gutters and the junk shops of Canal Street for the urban jetsam which is to be the raw material of his art. The artist’s compact with the city requires him to behave as if, like Crusoe, he were the first and only man there. He must adapt to its random order by limiting his range of choices. [Garbage] Rauschenberg had a rule, when on the lookout for objects to make art from, that he’d go once around the block in quest of them. If that didn’t yield enough, he could go one further block in any direction; then no more.

Ibid., p. 304.
On his forays Rauschenberg picked up ventilation ducts, bicycle wheels, rubber tires, packing cases, cardboard, corrugated paper, and a stuffed angora goat.

Rauschenberg takes a snippet of the Manhattan telephone directory, recesses it, frames it in an expanse of paisley shawl, and renames it "Hymnal."

Fitzgerald ended an alcoholic rampage of his own on Fifth Avenue early one Sunday morning in 1919, and instigated a giddy parade by rolling empty champagne bottles down the roadway.

Getting out of the labyrinthine West Village is easy only for those who know the neighborhood. Turning from one alleyway into another, I wandered around in search of a familiar thoroughfare and could not find either Sixth or Seventh Avenue, both of which were somewhere quite close by.

Lobas, p 50.

The streets as a place of danger: a place of crime, of confusion, movement, speed, noise, many fleeting images confront the walker of the streets. A place where anything can happen.

There is a sleepy, melancholy charm for the wanderer, stranger or native, among these hangovers of a bygone day, especially on weekends when they are silent, barred and shuttered, staring with dust-covered, bleary panes on the narrow thoroughfares.

automatons and somnambulists

Roche, p. 404.

By this time the 3126 electric lights on the Rialto were alight. People passed, but they held me not... Diners, heimgangers, shop-girls, confidence men, panhandlers, actors, highwaymen, millionaires, and outlanders hurried, skipped, strolled, sneaked, swaggered, and scurried by me; but I took no note of them. I knew them all; I had read their hearts; they had served.
Henry, Complete, p. 83.

There is a type of ‘Man About Town’ in New York... The term is quite familiar to me, but I don’t think I was ever called upon to define the character before. It would be difficult to point out an exact specimen. I would say, offhand, that it is a man who had a hopeless case of the peculiar New York disease of wanting to see and know. At 6 o’clock each day life begins with him. He follows rigidly the conventions of dress and manners; but in the business of poking his nose into places where he does not belong he could give pointers to a civet cat or a jackdaw... He is always on the scent of something new. He is curiosity, impudence and omnipresence. Hansoms were made for him, and gold-banded cigars; and the curse of music at dinner. There are not so many of him; but his minority report is adopted everywhere.

Ibid., pp. 85-6.

He haunts the department stores, he does not buy. He consumes the city at one remove, savoring the display without expenditure, financial or emotional. All the women in the street belong to his personal harem. He need not choose, and he need not pay. Of course, he could choose and he could pay. This illusion of disinterest, of disinvolvment with the commercial, can only be indulged by men “of leisure and wit.”

Tester, p. 28.

The flâneur—once a full time job—today is merely a pleasurable suspension of social claims, a temporary state of irresponsibility.

Ibid., p. 31.

The street level is a dead space... It is only a means of passage to the interior.

Ibid., p. 149.

Tonight you probably walked over here from Bethune Street down Greenwich Avenue with its sneaky little bars and the Women’s Detention House, across 8th Street, by acres of books and pillows and shoes and illuminating lampshades, past Cooper Union where we heard the piece by Mortie Feldman with “the Stars and Stripes Forever" in it and the Sagamore's terrific "coffee and, Andy," meaning "with a cheese Danish" — did you spit on your index fingers and rub the CEDAR'S neon circle for luck?
did you give a kind thought, hurrying, to Alger Hiss?
O'Hara, p. 257.

I remember Delancey Street. The Brooklyn Bridge. Orchard Street. The Staten Island Ferry. And walking around the Wall Street area late at night. (No people.)
Brainard, "I Remember," N. pag.

I've been living at Broadway and West 74th for a week and still haven't ventured on a stroll in Central Park, two bizarre blocks away.
Schulyer, p. 693.

Since the street is ambling along at your bidding, you are free to sidle off it at any point.
Conrad, p. 196.

At midnight I turned up at the place. I had been, earlier in the evening, wandering on the Bowery, where I had been looking for "real things."
Hapgood, p. 365.

Always at night he walked the streets alone, always the horn in his ears.
Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 72.

On his nocturnal rambles, the street seems to be murmurously snoring, like the horse in the dormitory of buses; but it's only a drill at work early--the travail of a mechanical and therefore enviably immortal body. [Sound]

I went out, shaken, and I wandered, dazed, often muttering to myself, once or twice even overturning children as I strode throughout those horrid crowded, superheated streets. Finally, when I cared to look, I found myself on the far East Side, well toward the East River and I was compelled to turn back and retrace steps to the Bowery and the Third Avenue Elevated in that intense heat. I was all but exhausted when I reached it, and though I cooled my scarlet face and reduced my throbbing pulse beats somewhat in the breeze of my transit uptown, yet when I finally reached my quarters I was almost prostrated. A raging headache held me, with a not unnatural fear of heat exhaustion. Try as I would, I could neither think nor act. There was but one thing for me to do: I took to my bed, and finally sleep intervened upon my physical misery. It was night before I awoke again, and leaned out my window to see a city asleep—or struggling to sleep in the heat. I went back and, falling heavily on my disheveled bed, passed once more into a half stupor.

Off we reeled into the night streets. It was a difficult journey because the streets kept moving under our feet.

Hamilton, p. 7.

Feet of passers-by become epileptic.

Jolas, p. 472.

Walking around absentmindedly.

Maffi, p. 19.

City of orgies, walks and joys.

Turner, p. 119.

I have long been convinced of the unattractiveness and disagreeableness of people. I have noticed how they always turn the sharp side of their shoulders toward you when you pass them in a crowd. I have noticed how two or three walking together remain steadfastly side by side in spite of the narrowness of the pavement and the fact that some persons are going in the opposite direction.

Hapgood, p. 192.

Three men wearing hats walk by, two toward our left, one the other way. In this chance cluster, a leg that stretches down to the bottom right is obscured at the knee, which makes us uncertain as to the direction it is going, let alone to whom it belongs. A view of his foot would be enlightening, but it is withheld.

Kozloff, n. pag.

I know two or three men of education who whenever they want to have a good "temperamental" time, go out at night alone, and wander for hours about the lowliest streets in the city. They go in search of anybody whose face shows that he has been subjected good and hard to what Henry James calls the “irregular rhythm of life.”...In these tours through the side streets there is not only temperamental satisfaction to be derived but also undoubted material for literature.

Linking chewing gum to the rhythm of the city—it’s rather like humming, something that is particularly suited to walking the streets.

Turner, p. 103.

Then there’s time in the street, when you run into somebody you haven’t seen in, say, five years, and you play it all one level. When you see each other and you don’t even lose a beat, that’s when it’s the best. You don’t say “What have you been doing?”—you don’t try to catch up. Maybe you mention that you’re on your way to 8th Street to get a frozen custard and maybe they mention which movie they’re on their way to see, but that’s it. Just a casual check-in. Very light, cool, off-hand, very American. Nobody’s fazed, nobody’s thrown out of time, nobody gets hysterical, nobody loses a beat. That’s when it’s good. And when somebody asks you whatever happened to so-and-so you just say, “Yes, I saw him having a malted on 53rd Street.” Just play it all on one level, like everything was yesterday.

Warhol, Philosophy, p. 111.

All modern metropolitan persons who compete in our fierce struggle are hypocrites when they pretend to enjoy anything. The nearest we can come to enjoyment is to see what we miss. When I look now at the mob passing along the avenue they mean nothing to me. The mood has passed.

Hapgood, p. 219.

and for Mike I just stroll into the PARK LANE Liquor Store and ask for a bottle of Strega and then I go back where I came from to 6th Avenue and the tobacconist in the Ziegfeld Theatre and casually ask for a carton of Gauloises and a carton of Picayunes, and a NEW YORK POST with her face on it

O’Hara, p. 325.

The weather, for all that experience, mixes intimately with the fullness of my impression; speaking not least, for instance, of the way “the state of the streets” and the assault of the turbid air seemed all one with the look, the tramp, the whole quality and allure, the consummate monotonous commonness, of the pushing male crowd, moving in its dense mass—with the confusion carried to chaos for any intelligence, any perception; a welter of objects and sounds in which relief, detachment, dignity, meaning, perished utterly and lost all rights. It appeared, the muddy medium, all one with every other element and note as well, all the signs of the heaped industrial battle-field, all the sounds and silences, grim, pushing, trudging silences too, of the universal will to move—to move, move, as an end in itself, an appetite at any price.

James, pp. 83-4.

The walls of the high buildings which line the streets effectually limit the field of vision. The only opportunity for using the eyes for distant vision is to look up at the sky.

Girdner, p. 121.

For it was a couple or so of days afterwards when walking along the opposite side of the Avenue between Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third that looking across at the Flatiron and remembering something that had been said on that particular walk there came into my head a sudden, half-philosophical, half-literary idea that has ever since formed the chief basis of my technical stock in trade and the mainspring of my actions.

It would be superfluously biographical at this point to dilate on that idea. It is sufficient to say that very early on an October morning of strong damp shadows, looking across at the almost forbidding, dumb, purplish column of the Flatiron whose side towards me was in the deepest shade and feeling at the moment a mood of intense loneliness, I suddenly conjured up on that then deserted opposite sidewalk the figure of the companion who the day before or so had been walking with me at the foot of that same Flatiron that now seemed a barrier of gloom between myself and a desirable sunlight. And it occurred to me to think how the imagination of that figure made the Flatiron suddenly alive for me whether as an architectural mass or as a figurative barrier between myself and the sun.

[Shadow] [Light]

But he isn’t staying. “I’ve been in New York four days,” he says, “and I’m lost already.”

Sanders, p. 400.
The gifted meditative walker, purposefully lost in the city’s daily rhythms and material juxtapositions. Amin, p. 11.

Walter Benjamin once wrote that we need to learn how to get lost in the city as in the forest. But, as in the forest, it is also nice to learn how to find ourselves, how to find the paths and trails across the city. Maffi, p. 13.

At this point, you really can get lost in the city. Ibid., p. 22.

Where getting lost is child’s play, where the roads become anonymous, directions are almost nonexistent, the small gardens become a mirage, and the mighty buildings (colonnades, roof gardens, spires, entablatures, streets) explode with architecture that seem Assyro-Babylonian, removed from any time or space, or like a dreamlike distillation of the subconscious. [Dream City] [Antiquity] [World City] Ibid., pp. 18-9.

I will tell you how to get there:
walk 3 blocks down
& 8 blocks across
& 4 blocks backwards
& 7 blocks around
& 6 blocks up
& 9 blocks down
& 5 blocks across
& 1 block backwards
& 2 blocks sideways
& 3 blocks wherever
& you will get there sooner or later
Ibid., p. 107.

Hordes of people bustle all about you, and once again it feels like you are back in a village in the metropolis. Perhaps you are stuck on the corner, unsure of where to go next. Ibid., p. 57.

The invisible web of laws that guides people’s behavior. Inam, p. 21.
Central Park and Fifth Avenue are crowded with people who do not wish to hurry. They walk in the shade.
Talese, p. 42.

Lovecraft lived in that paradisiacal age of the pedestrian, which lay somewhere between the decline of the horse in large cities and the pestilence of mass car ownership.
Haden, p. 9.

In the 1920s cars were not dominant over pedestrians in the city, especially during the evenings and night.
Ibid., p. 55.

The sight of a horse had become rare by the late 1920s.
Ibid., p. 57.

As Lovecraft threaded his way through a maze of tenuous and delicate mental impressions, in the night shadows and dawn glimmerings of New York City he found a new dream-city that could function simultaneously as an inspirational fever-dream, as a text, as an antiquarian reliquary, and as a sort of psychic comforter to aid him in his battle against the mundane and horrifyingly noisy reality of its daylight hours. [Dream City] [Textuality]
Ibid., p. 9.

Lovecraft and his circle spent several years, on and off, exploring the city by night, and from these experiences he shaped and sold the thrill of unspeakable fears and nightmares. His walking was not in the rural "tromping" style, or that of the rambling clubs then newly in vogue. Rather it was walking of fits and starts, of zigzags and jumps, of adventuresome following of intuition, of stopping to see, hear, and consider, to fondle the past and also any passing kitty-kat that might come with range. (cf. Conrad on Hopper's "'East Side Interior' (1922) derives from 'memories of glimpses of rooms seen from the streets in the eastside in my walks.'" [Flâneur])
Ibid., pp. 11.

He and his friends delved into the slums, the ancient wharfs and graveyards, the neglected back courtyards, the crumbling churches and graveyards, the eerie wharfs, the winding alleys, plumbing the depths of the rapidly-widening civilisation chasm opening between the hoary past and the brash new modernity. Out of this chasm he dredged the Lovecraft found walking useful for working up a mood suitable for creation, and the plot for the famous “The Call of Cthulhu” was written directly after a marathon all-night walking session in the city. Ibid., p. 12.

Lovecraft’s expeditions into the night of New York City were near-contemporaneous with the more well-known night walks of the Surrealists in Paris. In a city just a few years away from the brink of a new car-borne hostility to the pedestrian, his walking, Lovecraft’s cross-cutting of histories, his seeking out of little known routes, his stopping to look up at the buildings instead of into shop windows, his stepping back into the street for a better view—all these acts can be seen as implicit varieties of subversion of the ‘normal’ commercial experience of the modern city. His actual techniques, and those of his companions interestingly anticipated some of those used in the walks of the Situationists in the 1950s and early 1960s. His antiquarianism and attention to the old vernacular of the streets, and to the layered and confused pasts of the city edge-lands, has many parallels with the ‘London turn’ in the modern psychogeography of the 1990s and 2000s. He was not simply being ‘a tourist’ or some fogyish daytime architectural train-spotter. Like the classic Paris flâneur, Lovecraft perceived modernity well enough—he marveled at its flow of seductive images when done well, enjoyed its childishly garish ice-cream parlours, ate at the coffee shops and the automatés (all night self-service cafes), went on the amusements at Coney Island, and visited its vast new cinemas and theatres. To illuminate this, Christopher Morley usefully gives a vivid glimpse of the New York streetscape in 1935 with modernity crowding in, seemingly from the edges…

“Walking on crowded city streets at night, watching the lighted windows, delicatessen shops, peanut carts, bakeries, fish stalls, free lunch counters piled with crackers and saloon cheese, and minor poets struggling home with the Saturday night marketing [… ] the great symbols of our hodgepodge democracy: ice cream soda, electrical sky-signs…”

But in turning his back on the modern and on the legendary American ‘compulsory cheerfulness’, he became for a moment something that now seems a crucial addendum to New York’s literary history—a conscious ‘anti-collector’ collecting impressions of overlooked places rather than objects, righting wrongs being done upon the city by modernity through a kind of psychic collection and excavation of dark places, seeking out the obverse of modernity and making it into highly subjective fictional detours that nevertheless rested very much on his experiences in real places...

"... hidden in cryptical recesses which no street, lane, or passageway connects with the Manhattan of today!"

In short order he succeeded in powerfully re-imagining city as haunted by its suppressed ‘other’, the hoary and hidden past. He did not so much “re-enchant places”—as the Romantics had tried to do, and the neo-Romantics in Britain were then still trying to do—as to “re-nightmare” them. He succeeded in doing this, not for any one place in the city, but for the whole of New York City. [Window Display]

[Psychogeography]

Ibid., pp. 12-14.

He also engaged in the typical bohemian modus operandi of “anti-consumption,” happiest with the idea of the city as garden and as museum, as basically free and pleasurable—the free pleasures of the parks, pet shops, the public libraries and museums, the art galleries, street cats, even the joy of lingering in a café over a cheap coffee in the small hours so as to be able to read the free morning-edition papers, and talking with like-minded friends on long night walks. Such free pleasures are, of course, one of the rights and prerogatives of the talented artist. If society refuses to pay now for what it will value only after one’s death, then one is perfectly entitled to sponge upon it mercilessly. Lovecraft did just that, becoming a lifelong expert at getting a free ride and then walking away leaving everyone smiling.

Lovecraft’s extreme sensitivity to the cold meant that walking was, with a few notable exceptions, a passion only enthusiastically undertaken in pleasant weather. [Air]

Ibid., p. 15.

What awesome images are suggested by the existence of such secret cities within cities! ...The active imagination conjures up endless weird possibilities... having seen this thing, one cannot look an ordinary crowded street without wondering what surviving marvels may lurk unsuspecting beneath the prim and monotonous blocks.
It is a mistake to fancy that horror is associated inextricably with darkness, silence, and solitude. I found it in the glare of mid-afternoon, in the clangour of a metropolis.

Lovecraft, “Cool Air,” N. pag.

I walked slowly southward by the light of a waning misty moon [...] amongst the curious houses, imagination-kindling streets, & innumerable kitty-cats... Long all-night solo walk of early August 1925.

Haden, p. 15.

Lovecraft: “I always have a supply of catnip on hand.”

Ibid., p. 15.

Lovecraft is exploring without map and guide as early as August 1924. At the end of September 1925 he spends several days and evenings without a map, exploring the furthest outer suburbs and boundaries of New York. “I had no map, & knew nothing of the country—trustling to chance with a very agreeable sense of adventure into the unknown.”

I didn’t buy a map; that would have spoilt it, somehow; to see everything plotted out, and named, and measured. What I wanted was to feel that I was going where nobody had been before.

Machen, p. 72.

If these ancient spots were fascinating in the busy hours of twilight, fancy their utter and poignant charm in the sinister hours before dawn, when only cats, criminals, astronomers, and poetic antiquarians roam the waking world! ... truly we had cast the modern and visible world aside... the fever of the explorer was upon us.

Joshi, pp. 65-6.

Lovecraft adored cats and made almost a game of his very serious attempts to encounter as many street and garden cats as possible on his walks. There were then a great many cats to encounter, as his good friend Loveman commented, “One of the quaintest features of all colonial New York is the number of cats seen at large…”

Ibid., p.74.

Promenade—dressing up and promenading up and down a street engaged in witty and intellectual conversation to see its effect on ordinary people.
Lovecraft on an August, 1925 nocturnal ramble: “I could go where I darned please and when I darned please... I set forth on a nocturnal pilgrimage after mine own heart; beginning at Chelsea... & working south toward Greenwich... south along Hudson St. to Old New York... under Brooklyn Bridge [then back] toward The Battery [and as dawn broke, onto] a Staten Island ferry.”

Joshi, p. 170.

Navigation was aided by the illumination of shop display windows and signs at night, by which one might read a finely-printed map or a pocket notebook without the aid of a flickering match. [Light] [Commodity] [Psychogeography]

Haden, p. 61.

Only once, attempting to explore the outlying suburb of Jamaica, did Lovecraft find that he not have enough light to walk by at night.

Ibid., p. 64.

What is it about the city that stimulates? Surely that altogether special blend of closeness and distance, crowd and flickering, surface and gaze, freedom and danger. Others are defenceless vis-à-vis your gaze and you yourself are on display to theirs; you come so close to them that you can actually touch them, yet ought not to: a distance that incites you to overstep yet still maintain it; surfaces intercept gazes and turn into signals, and the flickering vibrates; the crowd generates feelings of supply and possibilities; the anonymity and the absence of immediate social control amplifies the feeling, and the risk of nevertheless being monitored and uncovered increases the tension. You sense this omnipresent, diffuse sexualization of the city and confirm it by designing your surface accordingly and by taking up a position, perhaps also by engaging in cruising and brief encounters.

Turner, pp. 59-60.

Oh! marvels of the fleeting moment, only for a moment seized.

de Torre, p. 459.

He studied cities as women study their reflections in mirrors; as children study the glue and sawdust of a dislocated doll; as the men who write about wild animals study the cages in the zoo. A city to Raggles was not merely a pile of bricks and mortar, peopled by a certain number of inhabitants; it was a thing with a soul characteristic and distinct; an individual conglomeration of life, with its own peculiar essence, flavor, and feeling. Two thousand miles to the north and south, east and west, Raggles wandered in poetic fervor, taking the cities to his breast. He footed it on dusty roads, or sped magnificently in freight cars, counting time as of no account. And when he had found the heart of a city and listened to its secret confession, he strayed on, restless, to another. Fickle Raggles!—but perhaps he had not met the civic corporation that could engage and hold his critical fancy. [Mirror] [Window] [Reflection]

Henry, p. 1098.

The citizen, about his occasions, butts ahead into on-rushing traffic, his eyes level or sweeping the sidewalks for dimes. He never looks up, unless he sees a crowd gazing at a window washer or a jumper. [Death]

Reisenberg, p. 27.

Mayhap you like to roam in the rusty shadows of the Third Avenue El as trains roar overheard on a broiling day in the holy month of Ramadan, drinking cool beer in the corner places with infidel dogs.

Ibid., p. 100.

Traffic lights flash; the street-crossing crowd starts and stops as if ordered by a corporal of marines. But there is always the disobedient citizen, the nonconformist. A mad adventurer dashes against the lights.

Ibid., p. 153.

First there is the problem of traffic; if the flâneur does not pay attention when he crosses roads he too will become a victim of it.

Tester, p. 13.

I walk quickly wondering how to say urinate in slang.

Jolas, p. 471.

That night walked crosstown on Fifty Seventh Street and turned left up the tiny hill into the automat. For the two dollar bill I gave the woman in the little booth she swept into the hollow of her marble counter a fistful of nickels dimes and quarters.

Took deep breaths of air along the big shadowy darknesses of Fifth Avenue to bring back my appetite. Went back and forth examining the thicknesses of meat between the bread sitting in these glass tabernacles. Dreamt all my young life of moments like this. When I could shove in the nickels and open up all the doors on all the doughnuts and pies I wanted. And show my little brother that I was magic.

Donleavy, N. pag.

To walk up one side and down the other of a people flooded pale grey Fifth Avenue.

Now head north up Fifth Avenue. More canopies. Into the stacked palaces of the rich. Turn east. Between the shadows of the grey stone town houses. And come to an empty space in the sky.

Under its influence he could fall asleep in construction sites, play "chicken" with buses on Second Avenue, run naked into the ocean at night during a lightning storm.

Gooch, p. 436.

I was once afraid of nothing... I’d walk home those sixty blocks alone all those years. I loved the fur district, that’s where I’d walk when I finished working.

These are the war years I’m speaking about now... believe me, there were no cabs; I’d walk these long, long blocks. We were practically in a blackout—what they called a brownout—the lights were very dim. I was absolutely freezing. [Light] [Blackout]

The city is so accommodating for the exploration of identity that it is a place of doubles, where the individual can be both self and other, where he can become an underground man and go unnoticed and where his secrets can remain secrets.

Turner, p. 127.

Dizzily he staggered up into the air and the blinking block of lights. Upper Broadway was full of people. Sailors lounged in twos and threes at the corner of Ninety-sixth. He ate a ham and a leberwurst sandwich in a delicatessen store.

Dos Passos, p. 148.

Take a walk through junky littered downtown streets to that pier on the East River where they pile the great beams of mahogany, breakfast all alone at the Lafayette, coffee and crescent rolls and sweet butter, go shopping at Lord & Taylor's early before everything is stuffy and the salesgirls wilted...[Garbage] [Department Store]

She dresses in a hurry and goes out, walks down Fifth Avenue and east along Eighth Street without looking to the right or left.

Walked along the West Side Highway structure, roaring autos and grainy darkness, filthy streets with the tugboat strike, a few transvestites out hooking in the shadows of the girder stanchions.

Wojnarowicz, p. 115.

the flat drift of sensations gathered from walking and seeing and smelling

There's a discreet pleasure I have in the walking of familiar streets, streets familiar more because of the faraway past than for the recent past, streets that I walked down odd times while living amongst them. Each time different because of the companions I had previously while walking those streets.

Walking downtown in the rain, a quick bite at Tiffany's restaurant on Fourth Street and down into SoHo via Italian neighborhoods, all-night bars, neon in the drizzle, we're talking friendly and I'm feeling mellow and I say, I feel like I've really lost my innocence, now that I finally have fucked with needles, the whole romantic attachment to them being blown with the first shot. Now it's just down to the simple level of intake and warmth. Whatya mean? he says. You think we'd be walkin' in this fuckin' rain talkin' like this if we'd lost our innocence? And he was right. We walked through Chinatown checkin' out kung-fu movie posters and over into his old neighborhood where we caught the train, shook out our wet jackets, and made it home. [Drugs] [Junk]

Went out walking around the neighborhood along the river where the dark streets are gently illuminated, pools of light slipping down brick and stone and iron walls and easing over the smooth surfaces of cobblestones.

Ibid., p. 133.

We headed west down the street glittering with lamps and pools of broken glass an emptiness in the dark air, a taxi in the distance bouncing over a hole in the street.

Ibid., p. 177.

I crossed Broadway and 7th Avenue in the midst of heavy traffic, dodging vehicles, drivers with feet on the gas pedals, heavy traffic mayhem like rush hour. I remember fragments of other people in the middle of the avenues dodging the cars as well, I got to the other side. I had to go back, dodged the traffic again barely missed by cars.
Found myself at 42nd and 7th Avenue facing west, rows of movie houses and the streets were filled with people moving in different directions. Intensity from all the movements around me but I’m surrounded by anonymity and a sense as if the streets of the entire city were empty, emptied of people, houses, automobiles, mobiles, movements, and sounds. I’m magnified and I’m seeing the movie view of myself from behind. I’m seeing my upper body, the back of my head almost silhouetted against the intensity of dusk, light blowing from the west across 42nd Street, and I begin to scream. I see the grillwork of the movie marquees and the lettering of the current shows. I see the glimmering of the asphalt between 8th Avenue and 7th Avenue in the bleached out blind light as if the street were wet after a brief spitting rain and all that light is reflecting off it turning it lakelike in pools of light and I am screaming. I am screaming so loud and so deep I am inside my body and I feel the scream and it is as if I have a ten-year-old’s body and that body is as full of life, full of flesh and muscle and veins and blood and energy and it all produces and propels this scream, this scream that comes from twenty to thirty years of silence. It is a sad great deep scream and it goes on forever. It lifts and swells up into the air and the sky, it barrels out into the dusk, into the west and my head is vibrating and the pressure of it makes me blind to everything but the blood running in rivers under my skin, and my fingers are tensed and delicate as a ten-year-old’s and all my life is within them and it is here in the midst of that scream in the midst of this sensation of life in an uninfected body in all this blurry swirl of dusky street light that I wake up.

Ibid., pp. 223-4.
Yeah if those floorboards could talk, if those streets could talk, if the whole huge path this body has traveled—roads, motel rooms, hillsides, cliffs, subways, rivers, planes, tracks—if any of them could speak, what would they remember most about me? What motions would they unravel within their words, or would they turn away faceless like the turn of this whole river and waterfront street, all of its people, its wanderers, its silences beneath the wheels of traffic and industry and sleep, would it turn away speechless like faces in dreams, in warehouses, pale wordless faces containing whole histories and geographies and adventures?

Ibid., p. 147.

Of shoes, umbrellas, each eye attending its shoe.
Crane, “The Tunnel,” p. 95.

heavy walking shoes

sixteen million feet nationals florsheims tom mccanns stepping on each other
Last Poets “NY, NY.”

Walking in the city, we seldom turn and look back.
Cheever, “Five-Forty-Eight,” p. 3.

The whole organization of the metropolitan community is designed to kill spontaneity and self-direction. You stop on the red and go on the green. You see what you are supposed to see, and think what you are supposed to think...To choose, to select, to discriminate, to exercise prudence or continence or forethought, to carry self-control to the point of abstinence, have standards other than those of the [mass] market, and to set limits other than those of immediate consumption—these are the impious heresies that would challenge the whole megalopolitan myth and deflate its economy. In such a free society Henry Thoreau must rank as a greater public enemy than Karl Marx.

Mumford, City in History, p. 546.

I was gripped by the horror at the thought of what it would be like to stroll aimlessly through this part of Manhattan. Always have a purpose and walk rapidly between appointments, to work, and on errands. In this way you cannot be overwhelmed, overtaken, enveloped by the mammoth emptiness of square grey spaces and buildings. Your tiny remnant of a soul, crushed into a minute fragment of itself by traveling the streets of New York—your soul can’t be obliterated if you keep walking. Walk briskly, ride, escape if it’s over fifty degrees, wear dark glasses if the sun is out, stay near Central Park on the Upper East Side, never go to a business district on weekends, never even be in New York on the weekend. Even a Friday is not safe—don’t let yourself try to imagine what it would feel like to be on Park Avenue and Forty-sixth Street on a Sunday in the summer. You would be the only one there—maybe a lost or story derelict in some state of delirium tremens would be someone to share the empty corner with.

Hecht, p. 320.

I hired a hack to Wanamaker’s, cut over to Third, walked up to Fourteenth. At Twelfth a mink-faced jasper made up as a street cleaner tailed me for a block, drifted into a dairy restaurant. At Thirteenth somebody dropped a sour tomato out of a third-story window, missing me by inches. I doubled back to Wanamaker’s, hopped a bus up Fifth to Madison, and switched to a cab down Fourth, where the second-hand bookshops elbow each other like dirty urchins.

[Department Store]
Perelman, p. 21.

Go to a pulp novel in the late 1950s and learn which streets in the Village to walk, which corners in particular to pass, and where to linger.

Turner, p. 127.

Wandering along the familiar but long-lost streets of my native Greenwich Village some June day.

Atkinson, p. 40.

But everything I can really tell you I will have said before we reach Fifty-sixth Street.

Finney, p. 10.

drunks somnambulist strutters lolling by cab-stands
Stefanile, p. 32.

What people call love is small compared with that orgy, that holy prostitution of the soul that gives itself totally, in all its poetry and charity, to the unexpected that appears, to the unknown that passes by.

Berman, Town, p. xxiii.

Moments excluded from histories of the day, a counterpoint within the time, space, and place governed and regulated by the logic and commerce of economic rationality and the structures of political rule.
Peretti, p. 8.

The Rounder is merely a hardened specimen of the man about town anywhere. He is the man who frequents the club, the theater, the saloon, the restaurant, who turns up at every habitual place regularly.

His habits are stiffened into the inevitableness of reflex action. So stiff are they that he is stripped of all initiative and carried automatically every day into the same old haunts. He may have his business and his family, but they are the accidents of his career. His heart is not with them. His real life is the life of the theater, the restaurant, the society of other Rounders. It is this life which forms his ideals and determines his habits of thought. In it he moves and has his moral and intellectual being.

The Rounder is thoroughly a public man. He holds no public office and does no public work, but he is yet as public as the street. All the world is admitted to his inner life, which is the glittering apparent life of the city. He is occupied solely with what is in the common gaze, and has less of a private life, even than the excellent actor, for the actor's genius secures for him an inner life into which the public can not enter. But the more excellent the Rounder the more completely are his interests confined to the most public of things, the more completely does he sink his individuality in the glare of the hard thoroughfare.

Broadway indeed is the external symbol of the Rounder's life. Everything in this brilliantly lighted street suggests the concentrated publicity of metropolitan life—the stranger eager to investigate the Tenderloin; the restaurant with its breath of hospitality; the flaunting show of dress in the passers-by; the music hall luring to a vision of the ballet or the topical song satirical of the country or instructive of the streets; the theater in which a new farce, a new comic opera, is bidding loud for the undiscriminating favor of the crowd.

Of this unpleasant aspect of the street the Rounder is the interpreter. He realizes the street's ideals and rejects all else. In all his thoughts and actions, there is a flavor of asphalt. In what is only the occasional pastime of the ordinary human being, the Rounder is absorbed. He is the embodied spirit of Broadway. There his tastes are formed. He hates with the special hatred of a highly differentiated type whatever is foreign to the basic instincts of the Tenderloin. Filled with the feeling of the street, the Rounder hates poetry above all else. The light that never was on sea or land he sees not and believes only in the lights of Broadway. He looks with suspicion upon a man who thinks for thought is a private privilege. The reformer in politics, the optimist, the lover, anybody with emotion or enthusiasm, fills him with loathing, for such he regards as fakes or fools, or at best as snobs in excellence. In politics he sees nothing but patronage, stares at a principle, which to him is as unreal as a poem. The word literature means pretension and reform is synonymous with hypocrisy. Sentiment is unpractical and love a name for something worse or the sign of a private life.

Pinned to the fact, blasé to the core, the Rounder is the modern soul in its narrowest aspect. So narrow is he that it is only generically that he can be said to have a soul at all. In the metaphorical sense he has none. Even for the latest happening in the trodden centers of the city’s external life he has no enthusiasm. He merely recognizes its excellence states it and passes on to the next manifestation of the mundane.

The Rounder, limited to a hard and fragmentary fact, is as thoughtless as he is definite. There is no “fringe” to his ideas, no light and shade, only the hard perception of a limited line of facts. Each thing as he experiences it is finished and has no meaning beyond. There is nothing vague about him, except perhaps a vague distrust of anything intellectual or poetic, which he looks upon as amateurish or insincere.

Perhaps the Rounder is dry because his “rounds” bring him only to the street in one form or another, and for a soul to strike its roots for nourishment through the asphalt is a desperate proposition.

Hapgood, pp. 74-9.

He flees from one desolation to another, he escapes by buying a seat “at some show,” or snatching at food in a cafeteria, he lashes about the huge streets of the night and he returns to his cell having found no doors that he could open, no place that he could call his own.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 568.

It’s my lunch hour, so I go for a walk among the hum-colored cabs. First, down the sidewalk where laborers feed their dirty glistening torsos sandwiches and Coca-Cola, with yellow helmets on. They protect them from falling bricks, I guess. Then onto the avenue where skirts are flipping above heels and blow up over grates. The sun is hot, but the cabs stir up the air. I look at bargains in wristwatches. There are cats playing in sawdust.

[...] And one has eaten and one walks, past the magazines with nudes and the posters for BULLFIGHT and the Manhattan Storage Warehouse, which they’ll soon tear down. I used to think they had the Armory Show there.

A glass of papaya juice and back to work. My heart is in my pocket, it is Poems by Pierre Reverdy. O’Hara, pp. 257–8.

Whenever I walked out among crowds, I was quickly shamed into an awareness of myself. I felt like a speck, a vagabond, a pox of failure on the skin of mankind. Each day, I became a little dirtier than I had been the day before, a little more ragged and confused, a little more different from everyone else.

Today’s flâneurs are mere shadows of their former selves. Today the very notion of a “walking city” begins to sound precious, or curated... What if walking ceased to be a form of entertainment, and became a cultural duty, something “good for you”? Will all future literary mediations take place from behind the wheel?

Lopate, Waterfront, p. 209.

Around this time I began to appreciate the performance art of pedestrianism. Each New Yorker can seem like a minor character who has honed his or her persona into a sharp, three-second cameo. You have only an instant to catch the passerby’s unique gesture or telltale accessory: a cough, hair primping, insouciant drawing on a cigarette, nubby red scarf, words muttered under the breath, eyebrow squinched in doubt. Diane Arbus used to say that in that split-second of passing someone, she looked for the flaw. I would say I look for the self-dramatizing element. How often you see perfectly sane people walking along grimacing to themselves, giggling, or wincing at some memory.

The walk becomes a technique to deal with, act out, dramatize, defend, or deplore one’s solitude. With solitude, of course, comes a danger: self-preoccupation.
The literary walk inscribes the struggle between self-absorption and self-forgetting, between the poison of egobrooding and the healing parade of sensory stimuli. One of the classic preoccupations of peripatetic literature is how a mood changes in the process of traversing a city on foot.
In the meantime, perception is sharpened, by charting the precise movement between interior monologue (“the daily fodder of my mind” is how Rousseau put it in _The Reveries of the Solitary Walker_) and outward attentiveness, like the rack-focus in movies that pulls first the foreground, then the background, into clarity.
_Ibid._, p. 200.

Some walks follow habitual routes, and are intended to reassure; others are undertaken to disorient oneself in a strange neighborhood—to court, as in childhood, the sensation of being lost and afraid, albeit in safe, small doses.
_Ibid._, p. 200.

Idlers and literary bohemians, looking down on nine-to-five “wage slaves,” try to swallow their guilt toward the worker and promote walking into a sacred vocation.
_Ibid._, p. 200.

The mind relaxes through the calming, repeated movement of a stroll, while the legs’ cadences trigger the rhythms of poetry. [Textuality]
_Ibid._ p. 204.

Charles Reznikoff was a great walker, putting in twenty miles a day, usually starting from his home on the Upper West Side of Manhattan.
_Ibid._, p. 204.

Self-dislike is the doppelganger dogging the flâneur who must evade it at all costs by immersion in the present.
_Ibid._, p. 204.

I walked, I walked.
_Ibid._, p. 206.
There is about this walking (usually in the case of men, though not exclusively) an imperialistic vanity, as though you could possess a city by marking it with your shoe leather, side-by-side with a conviction of incurable solitude, that stems from early feelings of powerlessness: mind-locked, onanistic, boastful, defensive, and melancholy (as all flirtations with the infinite must be).

[Loneliness]
Ibid., p. 207.

When beset by his demons, de Kooning would pace the dark streets for most of the night... walking as far south as Battery Park at the southern tip of the city and then back. Often he went on these prowls alone, but friends occasionally accompanied him. Denby said: “I can hear his light, tense voice saying as we walked at night, ‘I’m struggling with my picture, I’m beating my brains out, I’m stuck.’”

Stevens & Swan, p. 141.

It was on one such evening that de Kooning, restlessly roaming the streets late at night, first met Mark Rothko, who rarely went to the artists cafés... And so, one night in the park, it was late, wasn’t a soul around. I walked around—thought I would sit a little bit on a bench. I was sitting way on the right side of the bench and kind of a husky man was on the left end of the bench, and I thought maybe I ought to move and sit on another bench. Maybe people would think we were a couple of queers or something. I didn’t know what I was thinking. We were just sitting there—there wasn’t a soul around...and we just sat there until Mark said something like it was a nice evening. And so I said, “Yes, a nice evening,” and we got to talk.

I guess he must’ve asked me what I did. I said, “I’m a painter.” He said, “Oh, you’re a painter? I’m a painter, too.” And he said, “What’s your name?” I said, “I’m Bill de Kooning.” I said, “Who are you?” He says, “I’m Rothko.” I said, “Oh, for God’s sake,” and said it was very funny. We then talked in a couple of days later he came to visit me in my studio. [New York School]
Ibid., pp. 147–8.

Average pedestrian speed: three hundred feet per minute.

Before the light fades I went for a walk and headed towards Sixth Avenue. The rush hour was building up. It was my favourite time of day, when immobilized cars buzz and growl across six lanes of avenue while pedestrians, free as air, thread between them. The liberty of the unmechanized is deliciously intensified by the sorrowful captivity of the motorized.

Brook, p. 144.

Sometime in the evening, getting on kind of late. This is a Thursday night. 2nd Avenue full of people, the kinds of people I never really notice anymore when walking down a street, not quite tourists but something like that (characters like middle-aged couples going into Abe’s delicatessen or off to see some harmless show), lots of these people, nameless, faceless, almost uninteresting.

Wojnarowicz, p. 186.

In the streets, everything is bodies and commotion, and like it or not, you cannot enter them without adhering to a rigid protocol of behavior. To walk among the crowd means never going faster than anyone else, never lagging behind your neighbor never doing anything to disrupt the flow of human traffic. If you play by the rules of this game, people will tend to ignore you. There is a particular glaze that comes over the eyes of New Yorkers when they walk through the streets, a natural and perhaps necessary form of indifference to others. It doesn’t matter how you look, for example. Outrageous costumes, bizarre hairdos, T-shirts with obscene slogans printed across them—no one pays attention to such things. On the other hand, the way you act inside your clothes is of the utmost importance. Odd gestures of any kind are automatically taken as a threat. Talking out loud to yourself, scratching your body, looking someone directly in the eye: these deviations can trigger off hostile and sometimes violent reactions from those around you. You must not swagger or swoon, you must not clutch the walls, you must not sing, for all forms of spontaneous or involuntary behavior are sure to elicit stares, caustic remarks, and even an occasional shove or kick in the shins. I was not so far gone that I received any treatment of that sort, but I saw it happen to others, and I knew that a day might eventually come when I wouldn’t be able to control myself anymore. (cf. Lofland: “Avoid coming close to anyone who either looks or behaves oddly.” [Loneliness])

Body space is carefully apportioned so that even elbows never jar, bare flesh is never thrust before another’s eyes which, in any case, would be carefully averted.
Bladford, p. 115.

Pedestrians can twist, duck, bend, and turn sharply, and therefore, unlike motorists, can safely count on being able to extricate themselves in the last few milliseconds before impending impact. Should pedestrians actually collide, damage is not likely to be significant, whereas between motorists collision is unlikely (given current costs of repair) to be insignificant. Further, a pedestrian who walks aggressively or drops in his tracks or collides with another can hardly produce a traffic jam, although, of course, he can produce a considerable audience.
Goffman, pp. 28-9.

A popular maneuver in busy traffic (to avoid collision) is the “step-and-slide”—a slight angling of the body, a turning of the shoulder and an almost imperceptible sidestep, all of which is reciprocated by the oncoming pedestrian.
Ibid., p. 35.

One pedestrian trips over another, says ‘Sorry’, as he passes, is answered with ‘Okay’, and each goes on his way.
Ibid., p. 172.

A pedestrian has a buffer, a ‘no-touch’ zone.
Ibid., p. 42.

Bodies that may impede and obstruct other bodies.
Ibid., p. 89.

Bodies and objects are viewed as interchangeable.
Ibid., p. 89.

The pedestrian as object in motion, rather than a person.
Ibid., p. 42.

The spatial needs of two persons walking side by side is four-and-a-half feet (known as “spatial bubbles’).
Ibid., p. 43.

Their movements are such that they appear to be headed for a collision.
Lofland, p. 152.
The freedom to choose desired speeds and to bypass others. The ability to cross a pedestrian traffic stream, to walk in the reverse direction of a major pedestrian flow, and to maneuver generally without conflicts and changes in walking speed. Blomley, p. 45.

The successful sidewalk is wide and largely empty, devoid of “pedlock.” Ibid., p. 45.

City walkers who could be pushed along by a variety of causes and impulses, lagged and sped along, shopped and rushed to work, depending on the neighborhood and hour of day. They stopped and crossed streets at random: an order was not yet imposed on how they moved, stood, leaned or squatted under haunches, waiting in line... Absent traffic signals and police, anything resembling a full system of sidewalks, and a shared sense of etiquette, walkers, as individuals and groups, were undisciplined and unruly. At any one moment they might vary their pace and direction as they darted from one place to another, swerved to avoid a vehicle, circled to pass an unobstructed walk or made a beeline to greet an acquaintance. Ibid., p. 59.

In cities walkers were organized around narrower and tighter regimes... Gathered together by hundreds of thousands in cities... The walking public—by force, law and regulation and manners—must be coordinated and it’s everyday actions... Issues that might seem trivial to us, who have long ago learned the ways and etiquette of city walking or rarely at all, surround the proper use of sidewalks, stairs, escalators, ramps, doorways and fenced walk ways. These issues include questions about who can walk them, in what ways—circling, going arm in arm, or with an unleashed dog—and with what things—long poles, big swords, or big picket signs. These issues consist of matters pertaining to the right to approach, sell and solicit passersby or stop traffic by not moving, but entertaining, or by lying down. Ibid., p. 70.

Then there are some very special niches within the city, where time seems to slow down as if suspended, to allow you a moment to reflect anew on the paths you have already trodden, reorganize the sensations you have felt, and think over the faces, voices, and stories you’ve come across.
Maffi, p. 118.

The paradigm of the "self-sustaining" city incorporates a certain degree of disorder.

Sennet, p. 17.

To look at things from an alien standpoint—externally and from a reasonable distance—is to look at things truly.

Lefebvre, Critique, p. 20.

New York installs "Walk / Don't Walk" signals at busy intersections beginning April 19, 1955. Park Avenue is exempted.

Trager, p. 601.

If a Chinese woman has nothing to do she never walks aimlessly through the streets.

Chin, N. pag.

We spent entire evenings together during which we exchanged less than a hundred words; once, we walked all the way to Chinatown, ate a chow-mein supper, bought some paper lanterns and stole a box of joss sticks, then moseyed across the Brooklyn Bridge and on the bridge, as we watched seaward-moving ships pass between the cliffs of burning skyline.

Capote, p. 67.

You start north, holding a hand over your eyes. Trucks rumble up Hudson Street, bearing provisions into the sleeping city. You turn east. On Seventh Avenue an old woman with a hive of rollers on her head walks a German shepherd.

McInerney, p. 9.

You walk across town, east on Forty-seventh, past the windows of the discount jewelry stores. A hawker with an armful of leaflets drones in front of a shop door: "Gold and silver, buy and sell, gold and silver, buy and sell."

Ibid., p. 67.

The evening is cool. You find yourself walking the Village, pointing out landmarks and favorite townhouses. Only yesterday you would have considered such a stroll too New Jersey for words, but tonight you remember how much you used to like this part of the city. The whole neighborhood smells of Italian food. The streets have friendly names and cut weird angles into the rectilinear map of the city. The buildings are humble in scale and don't try to intimidate you. Gay giants stride past on hypertrophied thighs, swathed in leather and chains, and they do intimidate you.

Down on the street, you clamp your sunglasses to your face and wonder where to go. An old question, it seems to come up more and more frequently.

You want to go somewhere, do something, talk to someone, but it's only eleven-thirty in the morning and everyone else in the world has a job.

You expect people to gaze at you, horror-stricken, yet nobody pays any attention. On the corner a fat man in a Yankees cap is selling pretzels from a pushcart. A woman in a fur coat holds her right arm erect, hoping to conjure a taxi. A bus roars past. Cautiously, as if you were entering a swimming pool for the first time in years, you ease yourself into the ranks of pedestrians.

At Fiftieth you get off and walk up the stairs to the street. Walking east, you cross abrupt thermoclines as you move between the cool shadows of tall buildings and brief regions of direct sunlight. At Fifth Avenue you stand on the corner and look over at the long row of windows fronting Saks. You cross the street to the third window down from the uptown corner.

You walk up Fifth Avenue along the park. On the steps of the Metropolitan Museum, a mime with a black-and-white face performs in front of a small crowd. As you pass you hear laughter and when you turn around the mime is imitating your walk. He bows and tips his hat when you stop. You bow back and throw him a quarter... You go to the Egyptian wing and wander among the obelisks, sarcophagi and mummies. In your several visits to the Met this is the only exhibit you have seen. Mummies of all sizes are included, some of them unwrapped to reveal the leathery half-preserved dead. Also dog and cat mummies, and an infant mummy, an ancient newborn bundled up for eternity.

You’re not sure exactly where you are going. You don’t feel you have the strength to walk home. You walk faster. If the sunlight catches you on the streets, you will undergo some terrible chemical change.

You like to prowl your own uncompleted buildings at night, treading on shivering planks hung over emptiness... to the open edges where girders stuck out like bones through broken skin.

Conrad, p. 209.

Their impressions of New York remained the same that they had been fifteen years ago: huge, noisy, ugly, kindly, it seemed to them now as it seemed then. The main difference was that they saw it more now as a life, and then they only regarded it a spectacle; and March could not release himself from a sense of complicity with it, no matter what whimsical, or alien, or critical attitude he took.

Howells, p. 305.

One day Raggles came and laid siege to the heart of the great city of Manhattan. She was the greatest of all; and he wanted to learn her note in the scale; to taste and appraise and classify and solve and label her and arrange her with the other cities that had given him up the secret of their individuality. And here we cease to be Raggles’s translator and become his chronicler... Late in the afternoon he drew out of the roar and commotion with a look of dumb terror on his countenance. He was defeated, puzzled, discomfited, frightened. Other cities had been to him as long primer to read; as country maidens quickly to fathom; as send-price-of-subscription-with-answer rebus to solve; as oyster cocktails to swallow; but here was one as cold, glittering, serene, impossible as a four-carat diamond in a window to a lover outside fingering damply in his pocket his ribbon-counter salary.

The greetings of the other cities he had known—their homespun kindliness, their human gamut of rough charity, friendly curses, garrulous curiosity and easily estimated credulity or indifference. This city of Manhattan gave him no clue; it was walled against him. Like a river of adamant it flowed past him in the streets. Never an eye was turned upon him; no voice spoke to him. His heart yearned for the clap of Pittsburgh’s sooty hand on his shoulder; for Chicago’s menacing but social yawp in his ear; for the pale and eleemosynary stare through the Bostonian eyeglass—for the precipitate but unmalicious boot-toe of Louisville or St. Louis.

On Broadway Raggles, successful suitor of many cities, stood, bashful, like any country swain. For the first time he experienced the poignant humiliation of being ignored. And when he tried to reduce this brilliant, swiftly changing, ice-cold city to a formula he failed utterly. Poet though he was, it offered him no color similes, no points of comparison, no flaw in its polished facets, no handle by which he could hold it up and view its shape and structure, as he familiarly and often contemptuously had done with other towns. The houses were interminable ramparts loopholed for defense; the people were bright but bloodless spectres passing in sinister and selfish array.

The thing that weighed heaviest on Raggles’s soul and clogged his poet’s fancy was the spirit of absolute egotism that seemed to saturate the people as toys are saturated with paint. Each one that he considered appeared a monster of abominable and insolent conceit. Humanity was gone from them; they were toddling idols of stone and varnish, worshipping themselves and greedy for though oblivious of worship from their fellow graven images. Frozen, cruel, implacable, impervious, cut to an identical pattern, they hurried on their ways like statues brought by some miracles to motion, while soul and feeling lay unaroused in the reluctant marble.

Gradually Raggles became conscious of certain types. One was an elderly gentleman with a snow-white, short beard, pink, unwrinkled face and stony, sharp blue eyes, attired in the fashion of a gilded youth, who seemed to personify the city’s wealth, ripeness and frigid unconcern. Another type was a woman, tall, beautiful, clear as a steel engraving, goddess-like, calm, clothed like the princesses of old, with eyes as coldly blue as the reflection of sunlight on a glacier. And another was a by-product of this town of marionettes—a broad, swaggering, grim, threateningly sedate fellow, with a jowl as large as a harvested wheat field, the complexion of a baptized infant and the knuckles of a prize-fighter. This type leaned against cigar signs and viewed the world with frapped contumely. [Textuality] [Commodity] [Window Display]

Henry, Trimmed, pp. 105-7.

Theater is a metaphor for the city because it renders experience unreal, abstracts you from yourself. Dreading the vulnerability of self-exposure, we all devise protective false fronts and wear them on the street as a defense against the crowd’s assault.

New York provides not only a continuing excitation but also a spectacle that is continuing. I wander around, re-examining this spectacle, hoping that I can put it on paper.

White, Here, p. 38.

Boredom, Loafing, Sloth

On mild sunny days the drifters sit along the docks with their 'junk bags,' sharing cigarette butts, and stare endlessly into the water.

WPA Guide p. 81.

I have never been bored since I came to live in Manhattan, but, inevitably, I am gradually becoming permanently tired.

Crisp, p. 124.

New Yorkers do nothing.

Conrad, p. 199.

Two policemen work two hours on the Lincoln Tunnel catwalks and two hours in open air at the tunnel plazas. They have an eight-hour day. There are no health hazard in the job. It's the monotony that gets them. The constant stream of cars seems to have a dulling effect on a man if he's on the catwalk too long.

Theater patrons settling themselves into the otherwise empty stalls and studying the program of a nonexistent, putative show, though they know it never will.

Conrad, p. 106.

I was sitting on the steps of the Metropolitan Museum at quitting time, watching people head home. It was nearly evening, too warm for the season, and the sky was Parker's inky blue. Men walked by with the slanted carriage you associate with Dads in New Yorker cartoons. Fifth was weirdly vacant—one of those lulls after a herd of buses has taken off... The museum was closing, so I dropped down the steps and sat, the only person going no place besides a chauffer in a Rolls and a curbside Santa.

Trebay, p. 150.
Free countries are great, because you can actually sit in somebody else's space for a while and pretend you're a part of it. You can sit in the Plaza Hotel and you don't even have to live there. You can just sit and watch the people go by.

Warhol, Philosophy, p.146.

The girl on the El gazes at a procession of chimney pots, but her motive is boredom, not curiosity or yearning. Ibid., p. 104.

The painter, shuttled past on the El, can't wait for a narrative to ensue. Nor do his people have stories to tell about themselves. They're seen waiting for something to happen.

Ibid., p. 106.

New York animates the plastic universals in a jittering, nervous, constant motion, yet it stays always the same.

Ibid., p. 121.

People disconsolately accept their placement in the composition because, sweltering in their rooms or moping behind the counter of an all-night diner, they have nothing else to do.

Ibid., p. 102.

Blinded by the gleam of the light, lured by the cheap, but glittering sumptuousness, intoxicated by the noise, they turn about in a slow dance of weary boredom.

Gorky on Coney Island: "a marsh of glittering boredom." Kasson, p. 108.

To old people whose dwellings are tiny or dreary or places of endless boredom, the waiting room is a kind of indoor park. It never rains in the Port Authority bus terminal. [Loneliness] [Singularity]

Philips, p. 6.

After seven-thirty in the evening, in order to read a book in Grand Central or Penn Station, a person either has to wear hornrimmed glasses or look exceptionally prosperous. Anyone else is apt to come under surveillance.
On the other hand, newspaper readers never seem to attract attention and even the seediest vagrant can sit in Grand Central all night without being molested if he continues to read a paper.

Lofland, p. 127.

A man who sat in a 42nd Street cafeteria for eighteen hours a day, sometimes for twenty-four when there was nowhere else to go, his expression always weary, indifferent, somehow astonished too, aware of everything. He had the look of a man who is sincerely miserable in the world.

Reay, pp. 265-6.

Downtown, the days of small shops for fresh-ground coffee or odd electronic gadgets or conviviality in a not-too-pure circa 1827 bar are past and numbered. (It’s not very convivial in the personal credit department of a bank and the place smells of computers, not coffee. If New Yorkers survive the rape of the city, or just crossing the street or breathing the air, there is one last, lethal urban hazard: boredom. [Smell]

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 116.

Later on, after I had been rescued, they kept asking me how I managed to do nothing for so many days. Hadn’t I been bored? they wondered. Hadn’t I found it tedious? These were logical questions, but the fact was that I never became bored. I was subject to all kinds of moods and emotions in the park, but boredom wasn’t one of them.

The mysteries of the city could well become just banal and boring.

Tester, p. 13.

But there was also an excitement in the streets of New York in 1882 that is gone.

Finney, p. 266.

I remember awkward elevator “moments.”

Brainard, ‘I Remember,’ N. pag.

Chctchegov: “We are bored in the city, there is no longer any Temple of the Sun. ... We are bored in the city, we really have to strain still to discover the mysteries on the sidewalk billboards…”

Pinder, p. 127.
Loafing is a subject often talked about in the journals of New York. Man usually thinks and dreams a lot about what he does not experience. In the ideal world he insists on what hard fate shuts away from him in the actual world of the setting and the rising of the sun. Thus it comes about that loafing, which in the actual world of New York does not exist among the decent classes is exhaustively treated in literature and the press. Man’s intense longings, and man’s conscience science smothered by the dusty ordeal of daily life is eased by the contemplation in print of all that ought to be.

Therefore no apology is needed for a few more melancholy remarks on loafing. If I were in Paris or Berlin in Rome or in the languid East, I should consider such a subject a superfluous impertinence. But in New York I know the subject is in the minds of all idealists and you can always talk about a big subject, no matter how shabbily and tritely without being very rudely sat upon. [Empire] Hapgood, pp. 193-4.

Bohemianism combined loafing and agreeable companionship to form a philosophic and artistic habit of mind. Bohemianism was foreign to the American experience because in New York, a very swift town, contemplation was shut out the life of its residents. In choosing bohemianism, and few men did, one endured social reprobation, for when a man is not busy in American, he is generally a bum or a foreigner. [Downtown] Humphrey, p. 61.

I know a common loafer, or “bum” or “gorilla,” as they call such on the Bowery, who in his spoken language has the elements of literature. His phrases are not frozen, but adequately and originally and temperamentally express his thought.

Hapgood, p. 20.

It was swelteringly hot in Washington Square. Wherever there was a bit of shade the benches were crowded, for it was Sunday, and the number of the New York Sunday afternoon loafers in the open air increases with the age and cosmopolitanism of the city.

Ibid., p. 151.

Two men sat in a café on Second Avenue—one of those open air cafés, characteristic of Europe and of the broadest, lightest, and handsomest streets in New York. It was on a Sunday afternoon and they watched the sauntering Teutonic crowd pass—men, women, and children in easy domestic fashion. Around them in the little garden sat several men, some playing cards some in almost complete silence staring sturdily at their beer all seeming to be fixt there, settled comfortable with no nervous consciousness of the uncompleted task or the unkept engagement. They belonged to the happy crowd of the unnoticed and the unambitious; and to a race that prefers calm and almost sensuous contemplation to “getting there” in any sweaty form. The day was warm and the sun shone through an atmosphere rendered heavy by a recent shower; the hot, bright globules of moisture marking the path of the rays.

Perhaps it was the pacifying weather and the undulating rich quiet of the street that put the two nervous Americans into unusual mood. For a long time they were silent. They sipped the repose-inducing beer and almost felt that they were a part of their surroundings. Ultimately, however, being of expressive character, they must needs give vent to what was an unusual and delightfully literary sensation, and talked of many things, through the heterogeneity of which, however, there was a strain of unity—the tone of the place and the mood of the day being subtly manifest in the diverse things they said.

Ibid., pp. 215-6.

He was born with a genius for doing nothing.
Ibid., p. 247.

The people there sat long hours and did not hurry. It did not seem like New York.
Ibid., p. 274.

He began adult life as an esthete. He was not an actor, or a musician, or anything like that. He was just a loafer, well-born, with keen senses and much joy in life.
Ibid., p. 280.

You will see crowds of people loafing around the streets with nothing to do. They will all stop and talk to you about any subject. If you raise your eyes to the heavens and stand still for a minute, you will be surrounded by a mob which a policeman would be hard to put to disperse. Their capacity for entertaining themselves with something beyond the stock market goes a long way towards reconciling me to the crowds of New York.
Mayakovsky, America, pp. 50-51.
When S. inherited his father's estate, although it was not a major sum, he promptly retired. That is, he quit his job, moved into a room in the George Washington Hotel on 23rd Street, and took his meals at the donut shop on the corner. He read, wrote, strolled, napped. It was the life of Riley. He might have continued in this fashion indefinitely had he not made the acquaintance of cocaine. [Drugs]

Sante, "Commerce," p. 112.
On his visit to New York in 1930, Sergei Eisenstein found numbered streets confusing or else he could not remember addresses full of numbers. And so he attached images to the streets and street corners. He then found that, armed with his images, the rectangular, numerical experience of walking New York, and the shocks and collisions of its intersections, confirmed and refined his theory of cinematic montage.

Tallack, N. pag.

A number of places I had come to think of as mere sights were restored as memories. A familiar corner became not just an intersection, but a spot where I anxiously waited for her all those years ago. Places, bricks and mortar, rang with an emotional resonance they hadn’t had before.

Brook, p. 90.

In an episode that sounds like familiar fiction, but was in fact quite true, the father in my building went home by mistake to the identical building across the way. He went upstairs in the identical elevator, got off at his floor, went to his apartment, with the door was unlocked (this was in the 50s: doors were unlocked during the day so the kids could run freely from one apartment to another) and walked in. He wondered if his wife had gotten new furniture, shouted “hello!” To her, and the strange woman screamed in the bathroom.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 6.

O’Hara’s “lunch hour” poems explore what the city can be like—and in fact what it is like—for urban subjects who are not confined, either spatially or psychologically, by the city’s homogenous spatial grid... O’Hara laid the seeds for an urban aesthetic based on New York City’s socio-spatial geography.

Ibid., pp. 9, 20.

O’Hara used the cityscape constantly in his wishful need to transmute life into game or art. “Once we were walking down Fifty-seventh Street. There were all these grand antique shops, but small, each one with a window that would be arranged as a little Louis Quinze salon or a Victorian fumoir. One night Frank and I stopped and looked and a game began spontaneously where this was our living room and we were inviting all our idols in. He would say, ‘Tab, how nice to see you,’ and I would say, ‘Sugar Ray, I’m so glad you could come.’ We played the game the length of Fifty-seventh Street. This sort of thing happened every time you were with him.”

Gooch, p. 218.

Then we strolled along Fifth Avenue northward, still discussing Style. Writers do sometimes do that. At the southeast corner of the intersection of the Avenue and Fourteenth Street, just as he was stepping off the curb to take his trolley-car he halted with one foot in the air and said: “I have read your books: I like them very much.” So I said: “Well, I have read your books and I like them very much, too.”

So that angle of that street has its pleasant association for me. Crossing onto the corner immediately opposite on a very slippery day I once had a very bad fall—so that corner, too, has its clothing of memory.

Ford, America, p. 100.

The urban connoisseur is also an amateur archaeologist of the recently vanished past. Not surprisingly, an elegiac tone creeps into this genre, as personal memories intersect with what had formerly existed on a particular spot. The walker-writer cannot help seeing, superimposed over the present edifice, its former incarnation, and he/she sings the necropolis, the litany of all those torn-down Pennsylvania Stations.

Lopate, Waterfront, p. 201.

A famous crozier-shaped lamppost on Union Square, dating from the 1890s. Reginald Marsh could see it from his studio and sketched it in 1954. By then it was a signifier which signified so much that it polymathically contradicted itself, asking to be read not as use but as ceremonial beauty. Traffic lights, street signs, embargos against parking, warnings against turns, and even a mailbox had been hung on it. Pointing every way at once, it offered itself as an all-purpose guide to the city, which it had transliterated in symbols, signs, and numerals referring to streets, postal zones, and periods of the day. It can cope with one symbol’s sudden metamorphosis into another, as when East 14th Street unexpectedly renominates itself as Union Square or (since the pole, like a bemedaled veteran, also bears a highway shield) as N.Y. Route 22. As well as a many armed and all-wise directory, it’s a tribal elder, a symbol of the city whose contradictory symbols it regulates. In Marsh’s sketch, someone mails a letter in the box tethered to the post, not so much using it as gravely consulting it and trusting it to care for and relay a personal message, treating it as a clearinghouse for prayers. New York’s policemen totemize their bodies in the same way as that lamppost, attaching to their sagging belts an armory of guns, whistles, truncheons, and handcuffs, with their clanking bunches of keys announcing their right to open every door in the city. Walkie-talkies crackling, they are human radio stations, absorbing and giving off information like the plurally gesturing lamppost.

Conrad, pp. 305-6.

Oldenburg reconstitutes the frugal and dexterous economy of Crusoe’s island in a block-long studio on 14th Street at First Avenue. He reads the city as a landscape, of which he, like Crusoe, is the sole proprietor. A note in 1963 effects a sequence of beautiful metamorphoses, seeing urban objects as flora and fauna—people, Oldenburg says, are single trees, vehicles are animals, stores are collective forests, streets are plains or rivers. [Nature] [Primeval]

Apart from that, Wall Street might, for all I care, emigrate to Norfolk, Va. And yet it mightn’t.

Ford, America, p. 82.

In The Wiz (1978) the yellow brick road is rerouted across the Brooklyn Bridge to the World Trade Center.

Conrad, p. 299.

“Americans have practically added a new dimension to space,” a British journalist wrote in 1899, “when they find themselves a little crowded, they simply tilt a street on end, and call it a skyscraper.”

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 114.

Jenny Holzer on Forty-second Street marquee: “In Greenwich Village / a tourist asks directions / to Greenwich Village”

Delany, p. 5.

Superimposed on a map of midtown Manhattan, the World’s Fair plan would reach from the Central Park menagerie deep down into Greenwich Village; and the transverse Central mall, lying approximately over Forty-Second Street, would extend from Times Square to Tudor City. [World’s Fair]

Federal Writers, p. 48.
A map of Europe superimposed upon the map of New York could prove that the different foreign sections of the city live in the same proximity to one another as in Europe: the Germans near the Austrians, the Russians and the Rumanians near the Hungarians, and the Greeks behind the Italians. People of western Europe live in the western side of the city. People of eastern Europe live in the eastern side of the city. Northerners live in the northern part of the city and southerners in the southern part. Those who have lived on the other side near the sea or a river have a tendency to live here as near the sea or the river as possible. A reformation of the same grouping takes place every time the city expands. If the Italians move further up Harlem, the Greeks follow them, the Spanish join them, with the French always lagging behind and the Germans expanding eastward.

Ibid., p. 83.

The private map turns out to be as provisional as the public one—not one on which our walks and lessons trace grooves deepening over the years, but one on which no step, no thing seems to leave a trace. The map of the city we carried just five years ago hardly corresponds to the city we know today, while the New York we knew before that are buried completely.

Gopnik, p. 4.

Lay a Central Park map of the early eighteen eighties beside a map of today, and there on both maps are all the old names and places: the reservoir, the lake, North Meadow, the Green, the pool, Harlem Mere, the obelisk. We’ve photocopied some of the old maps to precisely the size of a modern one, then superimposed one over the other between glass sheets, and shot a good strong light through them. Allowing for small mapmakers’ errors, they’ve coincided, the sizes and shapes of the things in the park unchanged through the years... the very curve of this road, and nearly all the roads and even the footpaths, are unaltered.

Finney, pp. 76-8.

The city is a map of the hierarchy of desire, from the valorized to the stigmatized.

Calafia, p. 216.

One morning, with the sun at your back illuminating everything in front of you, you might, then, take 14th or 23rd or 42nd or 57th on the eastern side of the island and walk toward the Hudson River in the extreme west. Your steps will follow another map, and this will allow you to cut across the metropolis transversely—thus sharpening your perception of the city—land that openly proclaims, on the one hand, it’s monumental immensity, and on the other, at the same time, it’s insurmountable limits. [Flâneur] Maffi, p. 18.

Even if we must have a vertical city instead of a horizontal one, why have a West Street bordering the North River, which isn’t the North River but the Hudson, and a South Street bordering the East River, which isn’t any river at all? Collins, p. 8.

As she always has, when we have a long way to go downtown at night, Martha will ask cab-drivers to take the “East Side Highway”—and no matter how often, or how obnoxiously I tell here that there is no East Side Highway, that it is called the FDR Drive, or just the Drive or the FDR, she persists. The East Side Highway is a sacred place for her somehow, the Yellow Brick Road of her mind and heart, never really settled in New York, still dreaming of Canada or Paris and a road to take you there. Gopnik, p. 79.

Fifth Avenue, by virtue of ghetto blasters usually no larger than refrigerators, was a temporary trade outpost of Japan. Trebay, p. 136.

271 West 52nd Street is the easiest of all addresses to find, but the hardest of all addresses to remember. Conrad, p. 120.

Transversed by seven parallel avenues, and on the grid by any number of names, letter and number streets, all out of sequence and Oz-like willy-nilly. [Grid] McCourt, p. 6.

The city itself could be read, interpreted, and signified upon even by writers and artists who were unable to alter its physical topography.

Observe the island, measuring it, superimposing one view over another, following its contours.

Maffi, p. 19.

The street evolves over decades into a post-modern, non-linear cluster fuck event construction.

McCourt, p. 29.

I am twenty-two blocks from where Rudolph Valentino lay in state, eight blocks from where Nathan Hale was executed, five blocks from the publisher’s office where Ernest Hemingway hit Max Eastman on the nose, four miles from where Walt Whitman sat sweating out editorials for the Brooklyn Eagle, thirty-four blocks from the street Willa Gather lived in when she came to New York to write books about Nebraska, one block from where Marceline used to clown on the boards of the Hippodrome, thirty-six blocks from the spot where the historian Joe Gould kicked a radio to pieces in full view of the public, thirteen blocks from where Harry Thaw shot Stanford White, five blocks from where I used to usher at the Metropolitan Opera and only a hundred and twelve blocks from the spot where Clarence Day the Elder was washed of his sins in the Church of the Epiphany (I could continue this list indefinitely); and for that matter I am probably occupying the very room that any number of exalted and some wise, memorable characters sat in, some of them on hot, breathless afternoons, lonely and private and full of their own sense of emanations from without.

What do maps and records and guide-books really tell [of the city, for] these ancient places are dreaming gorgeously and overflowing with wonder and terror and escapes from the commonplace, and yet there’s not a living soul to understand or profit by them.

Lovecraft, “Pickman,” pp. 505.

The civic orientation is inexact, north-south avenues running twenty-eight degrees out of true, west-east streets really running northwest to southeast.

I went downtown and met a man who was making a perfect map of New York. He worked for the city, and from a set of aerial photographs and underground schematics he had turned every block, every highway, and every awning—every one in all five boroughs—into neatly marked and brightly colored geometric spaces laid out on countless squares. Buildings red, streets blue, open spaces white, the underground tunnels sketched in dotted lines... everything in New York was on the map: every ramp to the Major Deegan Expressway and every abandoned brownstone in the Bronx.

The kicker was that the maniacally perfect map was unfinished and even unfinishable, because the city it described was too "dynamic," changing every day in ways that superseded each morning's finished drawing. Each time everything had been put in place—the subway tunnels aligned with the streets, the Con Ed crawl spaces with the subway tunnels, all else with the buildings above—someone or other would come back with the discouraging news that something had altered, invariably a lot. So every time he was nearly done, he had to start all over.

Gopnik, p. 3.

Built by Robert Moses for the 1964 World's Fair, in part as a celebration of the City’s municipal infrastructure, The Panorama of the City of New York, a 9,335 square foot architectural model includes every single building constructed before 1992 in all five boroughs; that is a total of 895,000 individual structures. After the Fair the Panorama remained open to the public, its originally planned use as an urban planning tool seemingly forgotten. Until 1970 all of the changes in the City were accurately recreated in the model by Lester's team. After 1970 very few changes were made until 1992, when again Lester Associates changed over 60,000 structures to bring it up-to-date. [Robert Moses] [Panorama]

Queens Museum, “Panorama,” N. pag.

In his Brooklyn Heights apartment, Norman Mailer constructed a Lego-block model of his 15,000-unit apartment building in the pure-geometry style International Modernism, as an act of protest. After a year or so of slamming away at the modern “Kleenex box” school of architecture, Mailer decided to demonstrate the kind of city he thinks architects should be building. Using children’s building blocks with aluminum beams here and there to provide structural support, he built a six-foot sculptural model of his dream city.

In the summer, Mailer says, his city would be a tropical paradise “with all sorts of wonderful bright colors, beach umbrellas on terraces, people sunning themselves, all sorts of music.” Mailer’s city would be extraordinary in winter, too. "Think of it after a snowstorm," said Mailer ecstatically. "You’d think you were living in the Alps."

Nichols, N. pag.

The real is produced from miniaturized cells, matrices, and memory banks, models of control and it can be reproduced an indefinite number of times from these.

Baudrillard, Selected, p. 167.

A city of accommodations and of many maps. We constantly redraw them, whether we realize it or not, and are grateful if a single island we knew on the last survey is still to be found above water.

Gopnik, p. 5.

And yet both shape the city’s maps, for what aspirations and accommodations share is the quality of becoming, of not being fixed in place, of being in every way unfinished. An aspiration might someday be achieved; an accommodation will someday be replaced. The romantic vision ends up harmonizing with the unromantic embrace of reality.

Ibid., p. 5.

We can’t make any kind of life in New York without composing a private map of it in our minds—and these inner maps are always detailed, always divided into local squares, and always unfinished.

Ibid., p. 3.

Ever since its beginnings, the New World constantly demanded and presumed that real and metaphorical adjustments being made to its topography, and so New York maps are potentially unlimited.

Maffi, p. 22.

Other cities that share NYC’s latitude—40 degrees north—Beijing and Madrid.

Mittlebach, p. 4.

The middle of Central Park lay at latitude \(40^\circ46'56"\) N, longitude \(73^\circ57'57"\) W.

Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 6.

The invention of all manner of strange mappings—the network, the fluid, the blank figure.

Amin, p. 4.
This confused knot of streets could certainly be termed, however anachronistically, a queer geography.
Carter, p. 13.

In New York, even monuments can fade from your mental map under the stress of daily life. I can walk to the Guggenheim if I want to, these days, but in my mind it has become simply a place to go when the coffee shops are too full. Another day, suddenly turning a corner, I discover the old monument looking just as it did the first time I saw it, the amazing white ziggurat on a city block, worth going to see.
Gopnik, p. 6.

Charles Scott Landers' 1929 sub-surface map of Manhattan, on which subway lines in use or projected are show against the original hills, swamps, watercourses and made land. [Primeval] [Nature]
Federal Writers, p. 415.

Fashioned and refashioned through commentaries, recollections, memories and erasures, and in a variety of media—monumental, official and vernacular, newspapers and magazines, guides and maps, photographs, films, newsreels and novels, street-level conversations and tales.
Amin, p. 2.

Set Riker's Island adrift.
Brook, p. 211.

Or the filling in of the East River nearly as far as Brooklyn Suspension Bridge might solve the problem.
Ford, America, p. 84.

Why the time will come—and I firmly believe that you and I will see it—when bridge after bridge spanning the East River have made Long Island and Manhattan one, when the Borough of Queens will be as much the heart and throbbing center of the great metropolis as is Astor Place today.
Dos Passos, p. 15.

What if a super-tugboat could cast a line about Long Island and haul it out to sea! Left exposed would be the broken ends of all the bridges and the under-river tunnels that now tie it to Manhattan. Riding off on the runaway island would go more than 4-1/2 million people—but only if the start were made at night, for in the daytime a large share of these people work in New York.
Simpich, p. 281.

PLUG up the Hudson river at both ends of Manhattan . . . divert that body of water into the Harlem river so that it might flow out into the East river and down to the Atlantic ocean . . . pump out the water from the area of the Hudson which has been dammed off . . . fill in that space . . . ultimately connecting the Island of Manhattan with the mainland of New Jersey . . . and you have the world's eighth wonder—the reconstruction of Manhattan!

... a plan to fill in the Harlem river and eliminate the East river entirely.

Ibid., p. 38.

The startling plan to fill up the Harlem River in order to make more space for the city's expansion, was never fulfilled. It still ebbs and flows.

So I am certain that, in the end, the East River will be covered in, since sooner or later, New York must either succumb or find more breathing space.

Ford, America, p. 68.

The East River is not a river at all, but a turbulent strait.

McCourt, p. 43.

It is a peculiarity of Manhattan that it has two rivers running more or less parallel and one of the is called the East River, while the other is called the North River. The North River is like a broad avenue, smoothly paved. The East River is more like a narrow side street, clogged with traffic and badly pitted.

Increasing traffic congestion... recently called forth this vast plan of draining the East River and converting what now is a busy waterway into a five-mile system of automobile and motor-truck highways, subway lines, parking spaces, and city centers... The project calls for erection of two concrete dams—one at lower Manhattan near the Williamsburg Bridge, the other where the Harlem River joins the East River near Hell Gate. The river then would be drained, and the 500 feet between the Manhattan and the
In 1853, foresighted Charles E. Appleby purchased from the city a grant of land then mainly under the waters of the Hudson River between 39th and 40th Street. According to the terms of his grant, Appleby was required to fill in streets and build wharves and bulkheads. This work was left undone by Appleby and his heirs. Eventually, the city filled in the area, built streets, constructed piers. As a result, in 1928 Appleby's descendants sued the city for trespass, and ultimately received more than three million dollars in awards, interest and damages. They still own the property, which today—largely because of the city's trespass—is valued at more than 150 times what it cost their ancestor.

Morris, Incredible, p. 355.

A view of the Wall Street skyscrapers through the masts and rigging of a schooner moored at Pier 11; the past is visually canceled by the efficient present as it is by the refrigerated containers for bananas parked in front of the arches of the Brooklyn Bridge.

Conrad, p. 167.

Of only one thing about Henry Hudson's visit can we be sure: when he landed on Manhattan Island in 1609 he received no shower of torn-up phone books from skyscraper windows.

Collins, p. 3.

The patient thinks in a circle bounded by the confines of Manhattan Island.

Girdner, p. 54.

Central Park not as a landscape but—with its model yacht basin and its boating lake—as a surrogate landlocked sea, mimicking the maritime commerce of New York.

Conrad, pp. 256-7.

The difference between the Upper East Side and the Upper West side used to be substantial. Now it is a question of gradations. The lack of delineation is one of the weirdest changes to the psychic landscape of New York in the last twenty-five or so years. Today a visitor might wander through the park from one side to another and feel it was a kind of oasis in the midst of a continuous fabric, but in recent decades it also served as a kind of moat, a Maginot Line that separated two worlds and worldviews. And if the park was a kind of DMZ in which one could wander, there was also means to cross the border from one side to the next. No one asked for your passport. It was an interval of stopped time: the Central Park Transverse. [Central Park Flâneur]

Beller, p. 129.

People use the cross streets, imaginatively projecting them across the Park, like latitude lines, as a way of imposing a New York grid on this bit of New York gridlessness. [Grid]
Buford, p. 179.

At auction in 1973, Matta-Clark bought some small pieces of land in Queens and Staten Island... which had reverted to the ownership of the City due to non-payment of taxes by previous owners. Each property was a small, irregularly-shaped plot between buildings, known as a ‘kerb property’ or ‘gutterspace.’ These were aberrations within the property system, for which Matta-Clark paid between $25 and $75 each. He described how he was drawn to the auctions by the description of the properties as ‘inaccessible’: “When I bought those properties at the New York City Auction, the description of them that always excited me the most was ‘inaccessible.’ They were a group of fifteen micro-parcels of land in Queens, left over properties from an architect’s drawing. One or tow of the prize ones were a foot [wide] strip down somebody’s driveway and a square foot of sidewalk. And the others were kerbstone and gutterspace that wouldn’t be seen and certainly not occupied. Buying them was my own take on the strangeness of existing property demarcation lines. Property is so all-pervasive. Everyone’s notion of ownership is determined by the use factor.” (cf. Hess’s triangle [Gentrification])

Walker, Matta-Clark, p. 135.

Matta-Clark died in 1978 at the age of 35 without realizing his plans for Fake Estates, and ownership of the properties reverted to the city. The archival material that he had assembled went into storage and was not rediscovered until the early 1990s, when it was assembled into exhibitable collages. Thus, Fake Estates has emerged not only as a mordant commentary on issues surrounding property, materiality, and disappearance that marked the whole of Matta-Clark’s career, but as artifacts of his own estate, reminders of the powers of absence and presence.
that govern our relationship to the past. [Real Estate] [Art] “Odd Lots,” N. pag.

An avenue is defined by its having been planted. It’s a trail through a landscape, not a mere route for traffic. Conrad, p. 87.

For his “Automobile Tire Print” in 1951 Rauschenberg glued together twenty sheets of paper, then inked the pavement on Fulton Street. John Cage drove a car through the ink and along the paper. Ibid., p. 314

Sixth Avenue which Mayor LaGuardia, in a pixie moment, renamed the Avenue of the Americas. Granick, p. 139.

Pedestrians cross the street even earlier than I recalled, treating Second Avenue as a country lane. Gopnik, p. 78.

The Times Tower, a Northern Flatiron. Irwin, p. 323.

The bisected Flatiron. Halved, it is set in motion, mounted on wings in readiness for flight, or sharpened into a prow which slices its way nautically out of the space where it has been tethered. Conrad, p. 133.

An apartment house called Stadium View, which claimed a western vista to a sports arena in New Jersey that was never built. [Architecture] [Unrealized] Hawes, N. pag.

An overhang or bridge becomes the roof of a temporary home; lampposts can be used to lean against. [Sloth, Loafing] Franck, p. 8.

In the distance was a small old-fashioned brick building, probably a pump house. By cutting off the surrounding environment, it became a Swiss chalet nestling among trees. It looked like the kind of romantic vista one sees in an old engraving.
   Myers, pp. 73-4.

   An elderly brownstone has as its neighbor a new residence fronted in glass brick, vitreously and metallogically immaculate, all right angles and streamlined curves. Like different generations, they sit together amiably enough, but they’re biologically at war. Even so, the victory of the present is temporary. It too will soon enough be the past. Indeed, it already is, for the glass-faced newcomer is the identical twin of its senescent companion and has simply had cosmetic surgery. Both were built about 1860; one was remodeled in 1934.
   Conrad, p. 167

   Rooftops deputize as beaches.
   Ibid., p. 174.

   In the summer, windowsills, fire escapes, and parked vehicles are annexed as dormitories.
   Ibid., p. 69.

   From the Woolworth Building you can take your vacation menially in the circumambient states.

   The steel frame-work of the old Madison Square Garden was preserved and is languishing in storage in anticipation of the day when it will be set up again in another city.
   Bennett, “Smashing” pp. 52-3.

   The façade of the Bank of the United States was cunningly tucked away as the south façade of the American Wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art when the rest of the bank was demolished. This fine and important front is now a kind of a rear at the back, visible to the facing stone walls and the most diligent and dedicated searcher.
   Preservation can be an act of polite disposal.
   Huxtable, Architecture of NY, p. 68

   Given the proper investment of time and money, no two apartments needed to look alike.
   Hawes, N. pag.

   At the Grand Central Station’s center stood the Main Concourse, the great room at the heart of the complex. “Nice looking city,” observes the country bumpkin upon entering the space. "Pa," this is the station," his daughter explains.

The very things that are objectively wondrous, the rising towers and majestic bridges, must go unnoticed in order that the street dweller can maintain his obligatory demeanor of weary cool. It is famously goofy, by local standards even to look up at the awesome structures stretching away above the sidewalk. This is the act of a rube, one likely to fail at the other cognitive imperatives of the real New Yorker, like checking the time, noticing an attractive stranger, and thinking about dinner even while crossing against the light. The rube, by contrast, notices all the wrong things: he or she is that person likely to take notice of a streetside entreaty, for example, and yet be unable to jaywalk successfully.

Kingwell, p. 53.

The tunnel to an invisible city depicts that city as an area of self-extinction, a subway to nowhere or to the ultimate estrangement and abstraction of death. [Death] [Grid] Conrad, p. 108.

It is the symbolic city that draws us here, and the real city that keep us.

Gopnik, p. 123.

You become a connoisseur of negative space. These spaces are refuges, tiny oases, sought after, multipurpose. They are meditative temples. They are moments of rest. Where nothing is happening. These places become little pockets of possibility. They are unidentified, off the grid, the staging areas for trysts, seductions, encounters. They are the places where crimes are committed, of one kind or another. The most conspicuous, hiding-in-plain-sight negative space in New York is Central Park. [Grid] [Sex] Beller, p. 122.

The degree of change each day is usually too slight to perceive much difference. Yet those tiny daily changes have brought us from a time when what you'd have seen down there instead of traffic lights and hooting fire engines, was farmland, treetops, and streams; cows at pasture, men in tricornered hats; and British sailing ships anchored in a clear-running, tree-shaded East River. It was out there once. Can you see it?

Finney, p. 66.

And near the old Medcef-Eden farm today, in Forty-second Street’s subway station, are pinball machines and boys with narrow, cuffless pants who wiggle their hips and snap their fingers at each other.

Talese, p. 126.

In the guidebook which I use, the visitor to New York is given advice on how not to look like an out-of-towner. And wandering slowly around with no obvious purpose, standing on street corners gazing in a detached manner at skyscrapers or at commodity fetishism in action (or at the crazies), breaks rules 1, 2, 5 and 8 on how to avoid getting mugged.

Tallack, N. pag.

A Harlem band playing Young Woman’s Blues from a phonograph as the safari breaks camp in Tanganyika under a tile-blue morning sky as intensely lighted as the panorama closed by mountains in the ceiling dome of the African section at the American Museum of Natural History. [Sound] [Psychogeography]

Federal Writers, p. 3.

From a balcony in One Times Square I gazed down on Broadway last week and mentally erased the crowds.

Trebay, p. 157.
City As Body

Le Corbusier whitens New York; Dalí proclaims it to be a sanguinary, intestinal red.

Conrad, p. 145.

Business, mass transit, is the circulation of that flood through the urban body, and he admires the El as an exact solution to the problem of traffic in New York.

Ibid., p. 183.

Each of these huge constructed and compressed communities throbbing, through its myriad arteries and pores, with a single passion, even as a complicated watch throbs with the one purpose of telling you the hour and the minute, testified overwhelmingly to the character of New York—and the passion of the restless analyst, on his side, is for the extraction of character.

James, p. 377.

Urban affrays are pathological symptoms. Traffic jams resemble blood clots or coronary obstructions, and the tonic of the street life is an overdose of surplus vitamins to keep the frenetic body working.

Conrad, p. 297.

Congested roadways as hardened arteries. [Density]

Ibid., p. 297.

A single organism and its parts should be read in order.

Ibid., p. 185.

Le Corbusier dismisses the Brooklyn Bridge with faint praise, calling it “strong and rugged as a gladiator.” He prefers the unornamented, severely exact George Washington Bridge, which is “a young athlete” beautiful but regressive, still trusting in the athletic training of the body. Whenever Le Corbusier employs anatomical imagery for the city, it’s mocking or defamatory, characterizing New York as a messy overfed organism.

Ibid., p. 139.

The city feeding on people to fuel its mechanism, an organism is a contraption of fleshly engineering.
The city as living organism, an enormous dragon curled up inside the guts of the metropolis, a mysterious and powerful energy to be released in small doses, smoke signals of a people hidden away beneath the sidewalk: fantastic images come to mind.

The division of the island by Fifth Avenue reminds him of the spine of a sole (which, in any case, you prize out and discard in order to get at the soft and yielding flesh), and the traffic-clogged avenues are costive digestive tracts, their excretory exits blocked.

Conrad, p. 139.

The ridge of rock running in the general direction of Broadway is the backbone of the island. [cf. Hawes, “Where Broadway stood, a rocky ridge once ran diagonally up across the island like a sash.” [Nature]]

Struabenmüller, p. 35.

The markets and the warehouses are not the belly of the city, as Zola has called them in his own Paris. The digestive processes of a great city are worked out later and in a million homes. The markets are the heart of the city, pumping the life fuel to themselves from across the rivers and the seas and pumping them out again by drayloads and cartloads through the streets.

Strunsky, p. 699.

The city mashes, melds, and recomposes substances, as a percolator circulates fluids in its hiccups.

Conrad, p. 125.

For even as your brain, nerves, heart, lungs and stomach are hidden from view, so it is with the City. Its nervous system, the vital organs which provide it with heat, water, light and air, its intestines, which like yours eliminate its wastes, its great arteries of its body, all these and more that ask it possible for eight million to live together, are out of sight under the pavements and the waterways.

But why is this complicated machine buried under tons of concrete and water where it is so hard to get at? Well, do you wear your heart upon your sleeve? No. It beats under the protection of a cage of ribs and muscle. The mechanism of the City also is too delicate and too vital to be placed out in the open.

Granick, p. 4.

New York City, below its man-piled coverings, is a huge stone lizard sprawled flat on its belly, its head erect at Spuyten-Tuyvel, its arms and legs touching the two Rivers, its tail flopping the Battery.

All along the spine and flanks of this Reptile of Gneiss tormenting men dig and bore and blast: driving tunnels through its vitals; scooping holes for sub-cellars five floors under ground; running water pipes and gas mains; puncturing its skin with hypodermics of steam; weighting it with skyscrapers, the dismal streets below dark as sunless ravines; plastering its sides with grass bordered by asphalt into which scraggly shrubs are stuck—and as a crowning indignity—criss-crossing its backbone with centipedes of steel, highways for endless puffing trains belching heat and gas.

This has been going on in constantly increasing malevolence since the Dutch landed, and will continue to go on until three or four, or perhaps six, brand-new cities, each one exactly above the other, are piled on top of the poor beast. What will happen then, especially if it loses all patience and some fine morning gives an angry shiver, as would an old horse shaking off flies, a lucky survivor near the Golden Gate may know, but no one questions that it would be unpleasant for the flies.

Smith, Charcoals, N. pag.

Trucks will appear late at night to plant tall trees surreptitiously, their roots to mingle with the intestines of the town.

White, Here, p. 55.

The postal tubes in skyscrapers as ducts traveling through the city’s frigid, nonvisceral body. Letters posted on the fiftieth floor would catch fire from static irritation before they reached the ground; to guard against this, the conduits are iced.

Conrad, p. 137.

Burrowing through the innards of a prestigious skyscraper.

Brook, p. 63.

Fresh raw effluence flowing from the city’s body.

Jones, Modernism, p. 224.
New York is subject to a kind of alimentary decomposition. In its transit through the body the city has been ingested impressionistically and regurgitated abstractly, consumed as material or sensual food but transformed into an innutritious idea or a conceit. Conrad, p. 117.

An uncladding of the its orifices, its excretory back door which shunts off the rejected to the river, the asylums, the potter’s field. Ibid., p. 181.

The mouths of our great cities are gigantic hoppers. Into them pour the foods we coax from the earth, the energy we snare from the sun, the metals we disembowel, the men and women we draw from the sampler communities. Mumford, “Intolerable,” pp. 283–93.

What now is the container of multitudes? A gormandizing maw, able to ingest all those edibles; an overstocked store; a groaning garbage truck. The city swells to offer bodily hospitality to all the things which chance to be in it at the moment. The epic motive of the city’s founder was to prove the necessity of the place. Now, however, the city is content to seem a product of happenstance. Conrad, p. 323.

His eyes penetrate the Empire State Building’s skin, “paring / The white shaft stark to its thrusting steel.” Sharpe, p. 240.

The skyscrapers of the city are a collections of hard-ons zeroing in on Brooklyn. Flaherty, Tin Wife, p. 64.

But [Joseph] Stella, who called the city “she,” and who said, “New York is my wife—I always come back to her,” refuses phallic skyscraper imagery. Sharpe, p. 204.

Since the city’s architecture is grisly biology, not celibate mechanism, Dalí interprets the skyline priapically. From the ship, he sees Manhattan as the rearing multiple erection of some couchant, many-phallusedinal massage, which caresses the prongs until, Dalí says, they void themselves in the sky’s vagina. Traveling on the subway also inserts you, through the door of a gash into that body. Dali declares that the cars run
"not on iron rails" but "on rails of calves" lungs.
Conrad, p. 146.

Suffering from "an edifice complex."
Federal Writers, p. 13.

Christo, suggesting that the outer garments matter more than what's beneath them, has fetishized the skyscrapers.
We enjoy them by dressing them up, not by unclothing them.
So long as we don't violate their casing, they'll guarantee us that joy forever. Without satiation there can be no wearying. He's reconciled to the consumability of his projects, which he calls temporary monuments.
Conrad, p. 312.

The streets of New York pulse with warm blood and a feeling of animal love, symbolized by the throbbing fountain in Madison Square with its eruptive, ejaculatory spurts.

Ibid., p. 92.

Manhattan, as they neared it from the north, looked like the coda to the urban-erotic, the garter and stocking-top patterning of its loops and bridges now doing service as supports and braces, hernia frames. Above it all, the poised hypodermic of the Empire State. [Drugs]

Kingwell, p. 89.

If skyscrapers get people excited, what kind of bodies do they have?
Sharpe, p. 240.

Longing made concrete.
Kingwell, p. 56.

The reason people look longingly at a sparkling skyscraper is because the beauty of the human form has inspired it.
Sharpe, p. 240.

My City, my beloved,
Thou art a maid with no breasts,
Thou art slender as a silver reed.
Pound, Personae, p. 58.

The gaze is likely to be male, and the city as object is likely to be female.
Leaving the East Seventies is like getting squeezed out of a grid-shaped womb into wide-avenued anarchy.

He sees a congested flood of wagons, trucks, cabs, vans and street cars filling the vast space where Broadway, Sixth Avenue and Thirty-fourth street cross one another as a twenty-six inch maiden fills her twenty-two inch girdle.

New York anatomized as a plumply appetizing woman’s body.

Newspapers referred to New York as a “she” or sometimes as the soldiers’ mother.

Now the skyscraper, stroked in graphite and color
On the thin whiteness of woven paper
Flamed suddenly like the mounting stillness
Of thighs, loins, breasts, lips,
Not steel but flesh, its straightness softened
By slight curving until it rose
Newly whole, like a woman poised
Meaningless and serene, her feet pressing the earth.

The city is lovingly stripped of the defenses in which it’s clad and shown to be a body, warmly comforting and carnally needy.

The city has a gaunt look. The buildings are stark; they jab at the heavy skies.

It is common in the open spaces of the city to see the skeletal infrastructure on the backside of a building.

The city has such big feet and such small hands.

South Street beats time with bony hands.
The city’s deposit of grime and dust is its membrane of complicity. He is taking New York’s fingerprints. [Crime]
Ibid., p. 277.

It isn’t that New York has no muscle; it has no vision. Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 85.

Dozing on Riverside Drive, the buildings of lower Manhattan trudge uptown. They are the city’s ghoulish spirits, departing from the gargantuanly lustful body which has been snuffed out that night. The Statue of Liberty has doused her torch, and the Brooklyn Bridge crawls along, rattling skeletally, its cables making a most unearthly racket. [Statue of Liberty]
Conrad, p. 203.

The searchlight from Madison Square Garden scratching the belly of the sky and tickling the buildings.
Ibid., p. 92.

The skyscrapers are built of wood, and smeared over with peeling white paint, which gives them the appearance of suffering with the same skin disease.

He professed to understand why skyscraper massiveness might have driven others to street level. “There is no question but that a body breaks of its own weight.”
Peretti, p. 107.

The city relaxes into what Léger calls la vie mécanique, freed from the importunings of the perishable human organism. He notes that in New York everyone smokes, even the streets. He couples the human habit with the mechanical exhalation of subterranean steam because smoking, properly understood, chastens the body’s cravings. It subdues greedy organism to disciplined machine: a girl tells Léger that it’s good to smoke during a meal because it distracts your appetite and saves you from getting fat… The city ought to learn the appetite-suppressing wisdom of Léger’s girl with her cigarettes between courses.
Conrad, pp. 137-8, 139.
A broad chest usually means healthy lungs. Now, Manhattan Island is notoriously narrow-chested. Her scanty space across is not redeemed by greater length. Crowded with humans and their houses, there is consequently little space for the expansion of her normal breathing powers. Her lungs, i.e., her parks, are contracted and not enough of them; there never will be. But more than some people think.

Huneker, p. 396.

It was Edmund Burke who first coined the famous description of parks as "the lungs of the city."

Rybczynski, p. 50.

The subway mined through a neurotic individual brain.

Conrad, p. 233.

I love this hairy city.
It's wrinkled like a detective story and noisy and getting fat and smudged lids hood the sharp hard black eyes.
O'Hara, p. 198.

The Elusive Tenderloin: the cavity that had been drilled in the city's tooth, soon to be filed with the new gold subway.

Conrad, p. 90.

West 42nd Street is the "inflamed appendix" of Broadway, while Bryant Park with its inexplicable excavations is a carious mouth.

Ibid., p. 296.

Windows are the eyes of buildings, the outlets of consciousness. If you can see in through them, you live in a city of commonality. [Voyeur]

Ibid., p. 103.

In what part of the body of a Manhattan Islander is the New York located?

Girdner, p. 28.

The economy New York exists to cater to the exigent, opulent body. The streets are loud with advertisements for tattoos, permanent waves, and cosmetic aids.

Conrad, p. 97.

The tribal fetishes of the two cities float into propinquity. El stations and sidewalk cafés are ranked as interchangeable amenities, and the lean needle of the Chrysler Building, tilted on its side, aims itself in the direction of a shapely Parisian leg.

Both the body and the city are intensifying grids for simultaneously social and psychic meanings, produced in the mobile, conflictual fusion of power, desire and disgust.

His nervous system gets intertwined with that of the Metropolis.

Koolhaas, p. 164.

In a taxi on Lafayette Street, Charley Anderson in U.S.A. travels on a stream of metal, glass, upholstery, overcoats, haberdashery, flesh and blood... moving uptown.

Conrad, p. 195.

I have a fancy that every city has a voice. Each one has something to say to the one who can hear it... Chicago says, unhesitatingly, 'I will;' I Philadelphia says, 'I should;' New Orleans says, 'I used to;' Louisville says, 'Don't care if I do;' St. Louis says, 'Excuse me;' Pittsburg says, 'Smoke up.' Now, New York "

Henry, Voice, pp. 4-5.

Now, you can't put New York into a note unless it's better indorsed than that. But give me an idea of what it would say if it should speak. It is bound to be a mighty and far-reaching utterance. To arrive at it we must take the tremendous crash of the chords of the day's traffic, the laughter and music of the night, the solemn tones of Dr. Parkhurst, the rag-time, the weeping, the stealthy bum of cab-wheels, the shout of the press agent, the tinkle of fountains on the roof gardens, the hullabaloo of the strawberry vender and the covers of Everybody's Magazine, the whispers of the lovers in the parks - all these sounds, must go into your Voice - not combined, but mixed, and of the mixture an essence made; and of the essence an extract - an audible extract, of which one drop shall form the thing we seek."

The Body in the City
Estimating the nervy, toxic toll of the city on its people, who inhale poisonous air, are squeezed and stifled in the subway, and have their organs nauseously rearranged in elevators.
Conrad, p. 296.

I could feel the soft air blowing from a subway grating on my legs.

It shuddered at the vibration of passing trains, and his body shivered with it.
Conrad, p. 239.

The city lunges from boom to crash as one’s entrails become tight and metallic. Blood and guts change to ethyl and duralumin.
_Ibid._, p. 296.

The modern city so discourages our physical existence that improving on your body becomes a fanatical specialism, and once you have labored to perfect it, you’re trapped inside it.
_Ibid._, p. 95.

New Yorkers blink twenty-eight times a minute, but forty when tense.
Talese, p. 2.

Most popcorn chewers at Yankee Stadium stop chewing momentarily just before the first pitch.
_Ibid._, p. 2.

150,000 walk though the city wearing eyes of glass and plastic.
_Ibid._, p. 2.

A Park Avenue doorman has parts of three bullets in his head—there since World War I.
_Ibid._, p. 2.

Each month one hundred pounds of hair is delivered to Louis Feder at 545 Fifth Avenue, where blond hairpieces are made from German women’s hair; and brunette hairpieces from French and Italian women’s hair.
_Ibid._, p. 3.
Each weekday over 4,000,000 riders pass these money-changer who seem to have neither heads, faces, nor personalities—only fingers.

Gum chewers on Macy’s escalators stop chewing momentarily just before they get off—to concentrate on the last step.

The male body begets a girder.
  Conrad, p. 211.

Unselfconscious New Yorkers stripping in their rooms.

Alone in the empty streets of New York I am its dirty feet and head
  O’Hara, p. 228.

You could hear his toenails scraping along the sidewalk.
  [Sound]
  Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 15.

Punching a keyboard in disgust, or pressing too hard on a pen in our anxiety.
  Amin & Thrift, Cities, p. 86.

On Edward Hopper: “New York in dishabille, its shop windows bulging with corsets and ample brassieres, its inhabitants disheveled in their furnished rooms or sleeping undressed on rooftops during the summer or baring themselves at their windows or cheerily urinating in the gutter or ogling the legs of girls whose skirts flare in the hot drafts on the subway stairs.” [Window Display] [Sexuality] [Desire]
  Conrad, p. 89.

The overly angular architect is seated at his desk with rectilinear lighted buildings visible through the window behind him. With a blueprint spread before him, he stares straight ahead; he holds out a T-square in his left hand and makes a right angle of the fingers on his right hand. Reflected in the window glass on the left we can see the object of his measuring gaze: a naked man stands before him in a life-class pose, at once natural and monumental. The skyscraper that rises in the background distance above the architect’s head is the consummation of his vision, the supple proportions of the male body transformed into soaring glass and steel. As an emblem of male-male desire, both its yearning and fulfillment, the homosexual tower avoids the woman question entirely, along with the transgenderings that entangle the heterosexual lover of tall buildings.

Sharpe, p. 240.

The rubbery elasticity of the jazz-dancing body, liquidizing its limbs and curvaceously grooving, corresponds to the fluctuant nature of De Casseres’s city. To him New York is a sensorium of fickly migrating pleasures. The centers of nervous or erogenous sensitivity aren’t fixed; they float about in quest of new intensities, like Baudelaire’s drunken boat… This mobility of pleasure zones suggests to De Casseres a New York whose body is rendered fluid by desire, its internal organs spurning allocation to a single place and function but circulating in a hedonistic flux. The gambling centers are constantly on the move, the outlets for whiskey change once a month, the fashionable social precinct moves steadily north.

Conrad, pp. 205-6.

The understanding of space cannot reduce the lived to the conceived, nor the body to a geometric or optical abstraction. On the contrary: this understanding must begin with the lived and the body, that is, from a space occupied by an organic, living, and thinking being. This being has (is) its space, circumscribed in its immediate surroundings, but threatened or favored by that which is distant. Within the reach of the body, that is, of the hands, it is what is useful or harmful to it; beyond this proximity begins a social space that stretches out without well-defined limits into physical and cosmic space. Three indistinct spheres and zones: the mental, the social, the cosmic—the lived body, the close, the distant.

Lefebvre, Stage, p. 229.

Survival in the city isn’t biological engagement with it but a blissful capacity not to hear, see, or smell it.

Conrad, p. 187.

And to be. . . Hereby the River that is East—Here at the waters’ edge the hands drop memory; Shadowless in that abyss they unaccounting lie.

Crane, “The Bridge,” p. 76.
The only bodies the city can supply Reginald Marsh with are, unlike those girls of Sloan who bathe near open windows or lift their skirts to leap over fire hydrants, bulbous and bovine. Or else dead. Sloan understood in advance the miscegenation of the urban body, predicting its mechanization, when in 1908 he paused to watch a crowd on Sixth Avenue admiring a dummy in a shop window. The mannequin sported a sheath gown slit to the knee. Through the slit, however, she extended a wooden leg. [Window Display] [Mannequin] Graciela, p. 97.

A watercolor of 1944, looking out from Marsh's studio window on Union Square at S. Klein's "Fat Men's Shop," derives a political reassurance from the body's sated placidity. The store's banner depicts a leering gourmand, his naked belly and thighs distending his swimming trunks. Underneath is printed his Falstaffian philosophy of pastoral nonaggression: "If everybody was fat there would be no war." [Commodity]
Ibid., p. 97.

Picabia's first act of abstract defiance was his refusal to paint what his eye saw in New York. His city forfeits this anecdotal abundance. Picabia absorbed impressions only to overcome them. He had passed, he explained, "entirely beyond the material, therefore there is nothing materialistic in my studies of New York nor anything sensual." He painted what his brain saw, a conceptual, not an actual, New York, a huddle of jostling oblongs and aspiring triangles plastically corresponding to the élan he felt in the buildings, bridges, and hurrying avenues. As he says in the title of a 1913 watercolor, his is a "New York seen through the body."
Ibid., pp. 115-6.

A week in New York is like being rolled naked in metal filings.
O'Connell, p. 137.

Men and women, if they survived in this environment, did so at the price of some sort of psychical dismemberment or paralysis. They sought to compensate themselves for their withered members by dwelling on the material satisfactions of this metropolitan life: how fresh fruits and vegetables came from California and Africa, thanks to refrigeration, how bathtubs and sanitary plumbing offset the undiminished dirt and the growing tendency toward constipation, how finally the sun lamps that were bought by the well-to-do overcame the lack of real sunlight in these misplanned domestic quarters. Mechanical apparatus, the refinements of scientific knowledge and of inventive ingenuity, would stay the process of deterioration for a time.

Exercise from the seventies through the nineties, for a certain class of New Yorkers was what communion and confession were for Italian peasants—not means but ends, not paths to heaven but the Godhead itself. If you “worked out,” you did not need to succeed at it—in fact, no one did succeed at it, really, no one seemed much thinner or stronger or (aside from a few gay men and professional athletes) truly altered.

Considering the total number of hours spent in the gym, one would have expected a city of Samsons, a metropolis of Babe Didriksons. Instead, people went on dieting, and the gym existed as the church does in a Sicilian village, as a gathering place, an intermediate institution, where fitness, like grace, would eventually descend on your head just from being there—and if it didn’t, what of it, death was a long way off, and the body, like the Mediterranean God, was forgetful, largely forgiving. [Lisa Lyon]

Gopnik, p. 228.

On a balcony five stories above the street, a man lying on his back with his hips in the air was being put through his morning exercises by a Swedish masseur. The tired middle-aged legs went up and down like pistons. Like pistons, the elevators rose and fell in all the buildings overlooking the park.

Maxwell, p. 402.

Gothamites prefer to eschew extravertical wall climbing, trail biking, or parsailing.

Deák, p. 374.

I’ve just returned from Berlin where my fingernails grew the longest that they’ve ever grown. Now I don’t chew my nails or pick them but they never grow as rapidly as in New York City.

Mueller, p. 240.

I’ve noticed that my hair and nails grow better whenever I leave New York for extended periods.

Ibid., p. 240.
I had come to New York to seduce a girl—but when I got to New York I didn’t recognize her, because she’d changed her face. She had gotten plastic surgery.
McNeil & McCain, p. 149.

Monitoring the city’s financial health by studying the flailing, thrashing exuberance of the urban body.
Conrad, p. 92.

Bowery skin peckers.
Talese, p. 100.

A forest of hands, picking their way across keyboards, clicking mice, gripping steering wheels.
Amin & Thrift, p. 86.

AIDS

Having this virus and watching guys have sex and ignoring the invitation to join in is like walking in between raindrops.
Wojnarowicz, p. 244.

When I’ve gone to a movie house periodically to jerk off, there are at times men who approach me and begin to lick my throat or kiss my hands or jerk off next to me or try to kiss me and I sometimes allow a measure of touch and suddenly this guy’s head attempts to go further and with the weight of my hand I prevent him. I feel comfortable to take responsibility to prevent him from doing anything that is dangerous to himself, but I also recognize in that moment that he has released himself from responsibility for himself. He submits to desire which negates death for him, which negates the possibility of death. The virus is invisible to the eye for both of us in that moment, but the pushing motion of my hand against his forehead even if he struggles with all his might in order to force me to let him do what he wants, my hand is like iron, I won’t let him pass this line of desire. If I were to speak and tell him I have this virus in my body, he might flee or he might be angry because he kissed my neck or licked my chest, or he might not care and want to chance doing what he wants, which is to suck my dick. Sometimes a guy will get angry at me for not allowing him to do what he wishes and then go off down the aisle and immediately start blowing someone who will let him do what he wants. Some of these guys stay all day in the movie house and blow dozens of men. Everything is in motion inside the dark confines of this theater that shows blurry porno flicks on a cheap unfolded screen, and life and death is simultaneously being hatched, structures of life and death, plans of life and death are being made by physical communications and gestures. This guy doesn’t trust the idea or concept of death enough to take his own precautions, or else maybe he feels it’s too late to worry because of his history and the possibility that he already has the virus and that in the mechanics of sex many people don’t believe it is highly possible to transmit the virus orally if they refrain from swallowing semen. I don’t know what it is he thinks but I feel safe in what I allow or don’t allow in terms of touch by fingers or tongue, all of it confined to the external and the areas free of seminal contact, but it also makes me wonder about the machinations of the world and the fragmentations of social order and disorder, all shifting simultaneously and creating designs and patterns that we call the world, that we call life. And I’m still wondering what that twelve years makes in terms of a difference beyond the frail human structure we call society and the world and personal activities that make up our lives. I guess I’m still trying to understand some concept of life in measurement against the universe and life/death cycles or capsules. What does that twelve years mean? to him? to me? to all whom we interact with? What does it mean outside the time we refer to as life? What does it mean to our selves? What does it mean?

For I am quite aware of the chance that I have or will have AIDS. The odds are very great and, in fact, the symptoms already exist. My friends are dropping like flies and I know in my heart that it is only divine intervention that it’s kept me alive this long I don’t know if I have five months or five years, but I know my days are numbered... I’m not really scared of AIDS. Not for myself. I’m scared of having to watch more people die in front of me... I refuse to die like that. If the time comes, I think suicide is much more dignified and much easier on friends and loved ones. Nobody deserves to watch this kind of slow death... most artists have this understanding of the world that separates them from it, but only some of them are truly special in a way that they can touch other peoples lives and pass through them. I’m sure when I die, I won’t really die, because I live in many people.

Haring, pp. 162-3.
Some realized the cruel irony of the obviating ubiquity of "I Will Survive," the disco anthem, at a time when the dancers were already succumbing to amoebiasis and taking every drug there was in the world to go on dancing.

_McCourt, p. 327._

"I Will Survive" and "I'm Gonna Live Forever" slow to dirge tempo, as if the DJ were leaning on the needle. Disco dies. A mourner laments in form.

_Ibid., p. 435._

"Yeah, but they think AIDS is a new band from England," Price points out.

_Ellis, Psycho, p. 34._

On the public response in the early days of the epidemic: the great smear of mortality across the picture, the dirty mark of pain and horror, found in few quarters a surface of spirit or speech consenting to reflect it.

_McCourt, p. 435._

Great Moments in Irrational AIDS Fear. Buy a paper at any newsstand in Manhattan, try to give 'em exact change, aim specifically for their hand, and they will not take it.

_Meltzer, p. 189._

"On me, not in me" became a mantra of safer sex.

_Atkins, p. 238._

A virus has no morals.

_McCourt, p. 327._

John was at the dentist and under the hygienist's vigorous scraping, his gums started to bleed and wouldn't stop. The hygienist applied gauze, but nothing seemed to stanch the flow. The dentist became quite perplexed and admitted John to Bellevue for tests.

"It seems my blood has lost the ability to clot," John told me over the phone from the hospital. "They want to check me for all kinds of things. They're testing my blood for platelets, whatever they are."

"Well, I'm sure it's no big deal," I lied, vaguely aware of some disturbing rumors that had been afoot about some gay men who were sick. 'I'll come by later today and visit.'

Surely this "gay cancer" could only affect older West Village mustached disco queens who went to the baths every day, not youthful smooth-faced East Village anarchist performance artists in skinny neckties.

I was wrong about that.

Murphy, "7 New Yorkers" N. pag.

One gentleman, James Johnson, worked in the publicity department at Paramount Pictures and would invite me to movie screenings. By the end of the summer, he and the other two black guys in the building were dead. I would run into each of them frequently enough, but I never saw any of them deteriorate. It was that fast. So fast that the landlord was having trouble turning over the rent-stabilized apartments, so I was able to secure one for another college buddy.

_Ibid._

A couple of years later, the Times obits section was commonly referred to as the Gay Sports Page, because we would count the number of apparent AIDS-related deaths before checking the other news.

_Ibid._

Over scrambled eggs, Rupert casually said, "I guess you've heard about Robert," referring to someone I was fond of and had dated.

I felt a chill. "No, what about Robert?" I asked.

"I heard he's got it," was all Rupert needed to say.

_Ibid._

Then my attention fixed on a small oblong purple spot near Patrick's left earlobe. It was about as wide as the tip of a pencil eraser and about the same color... Rupert took a peek, and his face changed. "I don't think that was there a couple of days ago," he said. Patrick, who could be prickly, said belligerently, "What? Now you think I have AIDS? Thanks a lot!"

He left the table to look in the bathroom mirror and returned with an ashen face. I felt guilty, like it was my fault for having noticed the spot.

_Ibid._

I actually, by the way, saw five or six "AIDS beggars"—emaciated, scabby guys moaning, "I've got AIDS... feed me."

_Ibid._

Everyone designed rituals around AIDS: Rituals for a cure, rituals for understanding, rituals to send energy to distant Positives, rituals to zap coven members in travail, rituals to build T-helper cells.
McCourt, p. 437.

Demonstrators "died" in front of the 5:33 to Harrison. They "died" on the steps to Vanderbilt Avenue. They formed a human chain to prevent commuters from reaching trains. They skeined red tape across the platform doorways. They splashed bags of blood on the terminal floor.
Trebay, p. 257.

THE THING THAT'S IMPORTANT ABOUT MEMORIALS IS THEY BRING A PRIVATE GRIEF OUT OF THE SELF AND MAKE IT A LITTLE MORE PUBLIC WHICH ALLOWS FOR COMMUNICATIVE TRANSITION, PEELS AWAY ISOLATION, BUT THE MEMORIAL IS IN ITSELF STILL AN ACCEPTANCE OF IMMOBILITY, INACTIVITY. TOO MANY TIMES I’VE SEEN THE COMMUNITY BRUSH OFF ITS MEMORIAL CLOTHES, ITS GREIVING CLOTHES AND GATHER IN THE CONFINES OF AT LEAST FOUR WALLS AND UTTER WORDS OR SONGS OF BEAUTY TO ACKNOWLEDGE THE PASSING OF ONE OF ITS CHILDREN / PARENTS / LOVERS BUT AFTER THE MEMORIAL THEY REUTRN HOME AND WAIT FOR THE NEXT PASSING, THE NEXT DEATH. IT’S IMPORTANT TO MARK THAT TIME OR MOMENT OF DEATH. IT’S HEALTY TO MAKE THE PRIVATE PUBLIC, BUT THE WALLS OF THE ROOM OR CHAPEL ARE THIN AND UNNECESSARY. ONE SIMPLE STEP CAN BRING IT OUT INTO A MORE PUBLIC SPACE. DON’T GIVE ME A MEMORIAL IF I DIE. GIVE ME A DEMONSTRATION.
Wojnarowicz, p. 206.

I don’t want to think of death or virus or illness and that sense of removal that aloneness in illness with everyone as witness of your silent decline that can only be the worst part aside from making oneself accept the burden of making acceptance with the idea of departure of dying of becoming dead.
Ibid., p. 211.

I fight this weariness from drugs and take a glimpse of sunlight as a conducive shot of movement of excitement of living but these drugs make me weary and frustrated.
Ibid., p. 213.

(that’s the thing about watching someone die, you turn from the deathbed or the sidewalk and then look out the window or down the street and the world is still in motion and that’s both a tragic and beautiful part of it)
Ibid., p. 220.
I thought of the “AIDS Monster” headlines of the New York Post a few years ago: some guy on Long Island with AIDS paid a few dollars periodically to suck the dicks of teenagers.

Ibid., p. 232.

The body is a conduit, a receptor of symbols or energy or merely moving forward drifting through the urban scenery waiting for a dozen signals to intersect the right way as to surprise, open the eyes, stir the senses, find me, and unexpected hard-on.

Ibid., p. 235.

All your faces, the faces of those who are not dying have become echoes.

Ibid., p. 263.

I was arrested in clown attire while throwing condoms + confetti in the middle of 5th Avenue.

Bytsura, N. pag.

Blotcher, N. pag.

AIDS isn’t a disease anymore, it’s a media event.

Lott, N. pag.

And don’t worry about AIDS, for God’s sake... if you don’t have it now, you won’t get it. By now we’ve all been in some form of contact with it... not everybody gets it, only those predisposed to it. If everyone got it that was introduced to it, half the population would be on death’s door by now.

Herpes and hepatitis; everybody is getting transfusions, as if indeed Dracula were loose in Gotham.

McCourt, p. 332.
Next year I predict a change in what is considered fashionable as far as body size goes. No longer will people want to be svelte and lean. Fat will be in because where there is fat you can be sure there is no AIDS. People by then will be terrified to align themselves with skinny people. Fashion, as we all know, is based on sexual attractions...

Mueller, p. 245.

You don’t get AIDS through the air, or from even looking into the eyes of a victim or even from shaking their hand. You don’t have to put yourself in a plastic bag. You could just as easily be hit by a car and die while you’re not looking where you’re going when feeling a very skinny person you think has it. Everybody now living in this city takes their chances every day.

Ibid., p. 245.

Fortunately I am not the first person to tell you that you will never die. You simply lose your body. You will be the same except you won’t have to worry about rent or mortgages or fashionable clothes. You will be released from sexual obsessions. You will not have drug addictions. You will not need alcohol. You will not have to worry about cellulite or cigarettes or cancer or AIDS or venereal disease. You will be free.

Ibid., p. v.

Larry Kramer and I disagree on almost everything, especially on his use of holocaust imagery, but he lost an entire life network. He would say that he had five hundred friends and acquaintances who had died. If you think about it, that’s the size of a small town in Germany.

Ingram, N. pag.

All the advertising on the subways in New York was about women taking condoms with them in their purse. It would say “Don’t forget these when you go out,” as if women wore condoms.

Ibid.

We began to throw around crazy ideas. One woman was absolutely panicked. She had absolutely never had anything to do with sports. But everybody else in the room was taking off on it. Two of the women were baseball nuts, so we finally decided this was the best idea we ever had, and we sat down and really worked out a plan. We were gonna get tickets in blocks. Shea Stadium is U-shaped. We planned to get seating in blocks in the three different areas of the “U” and that we would do “call-and-response” like you do at college football games. We called up Shea Stadium and found out that in fact there was a ball game that night and that we could get blocks of seats and that if you bought sixty seats, you could even get a message on the message board! And we thought, “Wow, this is fucking amazing!”

When we came to the floor of ACT UP and we presented the Shea Stadium Action as our Nine Days of Action thing, the room became dead silent. Panic was in the air, absolute panic. So people started to stand up and speak. First, we got the “class” stuff. “We’re gonna get beaten to death there,” and we’re standing there very calmly saying, “Do you know who goes to Shea Stadium? We go to Shea Stadium? Kids go to Shea Stadium on Friday nights to pick each other up. Queers go to Shea Stadium.” And in the room all of a sudden the closeted baseball queers started standing up. All these gay men who wouldn’t tell anyone they were baseball nuts because it’s not the “thing to be,” and they started saying, “Yeah! I go to Shea Stadium.” So we finally got people to go.

We had reconnoitered the Stadium beforehand, found the seats we had just bought, measured them all out. We had rulers so that we could make banners that were exactly the right length. We also went to a night game to check out the lighting and to figure out how big the letters would have to be to be seen.

Word of this got out. In the beginning we could hardly get anybody to buy seats. By the last day, I was getting phone calls from people I hadn’t heard from in years from the left because the word had gotten out that this was gonna be the most amazing thing that had ever happened, and people were acting like I was their connection for a seat in the orchestra. They’d say, “Do you have seats at Shea Stadium?” and I’d say, “No, I don’t.” So it actually turned out to be quite amazing because we ended up selling around 400 tickets.

At Shea Stadium we had people spread in three different actions and there was also a whole big issue about standing outside and handing out these leaflets. Because Shea Stadium is owned by the City of New York, but the Mets rent it, anything that happens in Shea Stadium is in relationship to the Mets. The parking lot is owned by Kinney or was then. That’s private property. They can decide what happens in the parking lot. But there’s a whole space that is not really either publicly or privately owned or leased—almost like a street or plaza that goes around the entrances to the stadium, that looks like a sidewalk but a big sidewalk and that is not the parking lot and is not the stadium. We could not find out for weeks who it belonged to. We wanted to know, if we were going to get arrested, what it was we would be getting arrested for. Were we on private property or public property? Who knew? And we kept trying to get in touch with Shea Stadium. We also wanted to get in touch with them because we wanted the Mets to declare this National Woman and AIDS Day, and we left them many messages and they never called us back. And by that time, ACT UP had a reputation for doing things. Especially the women, because we had just done another demonstration in January, and the police nearly went crazy because we did not ask the city and the police for permits.

We had coming up on the LED screen a message that said "Welcome the National Women and AIDS Day Committee," and we did not think we'd have any trouble getting in because we had tickets. But giving out these flyers outside, that we thought we would end up getting arrested for. About a week and a half before this whole thing was going to happen, some guy wrote a story in the Village Voice about ACT UP that mentioned we were going to Shea Stadium. A friend of mine who was actually working with Shea Stadium on a totally different thing—she was working with them on a performance art thing that was going to be happening in their parking lot, and they did not know that she had anything to do with ACT UP—was there one day when the guy she was working with was talking to the community/police liaison. The officer was saying, "Did you hear? These crazy people are coming to the ballpark next week—these ACT UP people—and they’re going to rip up the turf and they’re going to do this and we’re going to do that." And we thought, "Holy shit, we’re going to show up, and they’re going to be in riot gear!" And we weren't even doing anything that provocative, from our point of view. I mean we saw this as an educational action. there was nothing we wanted from Shea Stadium. So we actually thought of this as a lighthearted but hard-hitting educational action because it would be in a place where no one would ever expect us to be.

So we got one of the women to call up the cops—not to ask for a permit. She said, "You know, we’ve been trying to get in touch with Shea Stadium for three and a half months and nobody has called us back. We just wanted to let you know that we’re going to be out there on Wednesday night, and we just did not want you to maybe get freaked that we were coming." And of course, when he started asking questions like "How many?" she just said, "Well, I don’t know, but we just wanted you to know." So it wouldn’t be this kind of riot gear kind of thing. When we got there, they had spoken to the people at Shea Stadium, and the head of their public relations department came out and put our leaflets in every one of their press packets, and he made sure that we could stand at every single doorway and give out all of our stuff. It was great, but we hadn’t negotiated; we just went.

It was the most amazing thing because we had made these banners with a black background and white lettering. We had six long rows in each area and each row had a set of banners, and we only opened them up when the visiting team was up because we did not want to upset the New York Mets fans. At a certain point, I do not remember what inning it was, the first banners opened up. They started at the top of the group and they were always three lines. And the first one opened up and it said “Don’t balk at safe sex.” And then across the stadium, opposite them, in the seats above the other field, three banners rolled open and they said “AIDS kills women,” and then in the center, behind home plate, the next three opened up and they said “Men! Use condoms.”

And then, people from ACT UP got so into having these banners that people started swaying back and forth, up and down, and the visual effect was incredible because it was at night, totally dark, and the lighting from the ballpark totally reflected the white letters of the banners. An inning and a half later, we opened the next set of banners. They said “Strike out AIDS,” “No glove, no love,” and the final one said “SILENCE=DEATH” and it had a huge triangle and ACT UP! This was on C-Span. We not only got to the twenty thousand people who were in the ballpark, but it was televised around the country and we gave out leaflets. We reached an incredible number of people in an audience that we’d otherwise never have been able to get to. Most of the people came from ACT UP, but many people from other groups got wind of it and thought it was the most exciting thing.

Ibid.

I mean, some people got all decked out and dressed up, and, people were making out in the bleachers of Shea Stadium.

A friend of mine in New York City has a half-fare transit card, which means that you get on buses and subways for half price. And the other day, when he showed his card to the token attendant, the attendant asked what his disability was and he said, I have AIDS. And the attendant said, no you don’t, if you had AIDS, you’d be home dying. And so, I wanted to speak out today as a person with AIDS who is not dying.

Russo, N. pag.

Thank you for coming to New York City, the epicenter of the AIDS epidemic.

Finkelstein, N. pag.

Gregg, when you go to New York, there will be people who tell you that you can get cancer from certain kinds of gay sex. That’s not true. They just want us not to be able to have sex. So you can’t get cancer from anal sex. There’s no such thing as gay cancer.

The feeling of ACT UP in its heyday—this was like 1988—when the room was packed, and you could hardly get into the ground floor of the Gay Community Center. If the weather was nice, the meeting spills out into the courtyard. There is business happening all over the place. It’s very difficult for the people who are actually running the meeting to get the attention of the group. There is all kinds of sexiness going on, as well. There is all kinds of cruising going on on the sides, and eye catching, and chattiness. There was an energy in the group that was amazing, because it was filled with people who had ideas, filled with people who had energies, filled with a kind of erotic energy. And all that came together. It was in some ways like a bazaar of desires. So it was amazing that anything got done. An enormous amount got done.

_Ibid._

You know, you would walk around down on Delancey Street, and if you would see someone—it’s like dealing, basically. If you see someone who you think might use needles, you just kind of whispered to them as they passed, “Do you get high?” They would stop, maybe, because they didn’t know necessarily what you were offering. [Drugs]

_Ibid._

But in ACT UP, you had to kiss everybody, because you couldn’t be afraid of people with AIDS. So you had to demonstrate that you were not afraid of people with AIDS. So you had to kiss everyone you met.

_Ibid._
It was at Sheridan Square and then we marched down to Sixth Avenue. We stopped traffic and kissed. It was pouring rain.

Ibid.

In Brooklyn, there were problems when my friends’ mothers would be crying because funeral parlors would not accept the bodies of those people that died from AIDS. Everybody had to come up to 110th Street or something, because nobody in Brooklyn would do it. So the funeral parlors in Harlem were like, “We know you can’t catch it.” But there was a time when they didn’t want to bury people with AIDS in the ground. They thought once they buried a body with AIDS in the ground, you would grow flowers with AIDS.

Lawrence, p. 64.

How can we forget the clouds of Felix Gonzalez-Torres, the flowers of Nan Goldin or Jack Pierson, the delicate sketches of David Wojnarowicz, profound, simple adherence to the world in the diaries and words of Keith Haring? The illness modifies the body and is accepted by it.

Frisa, p. 404.

“What about AIDS?”
“Passé. Passé.”
Ellis, Glamoroma, p. 11.

At times I feel like there’s nothing to be afraid about dying. I mean, look at how many people have done so before me.

Wojnarowicz, p. 211.

Pathology

The French freighter Wyoming arrives at New York from Casablanca with a cargo consisting of chiefly wine and tobacco. Casablanca and other Moroccan cities have had an outbreak of bubonic plague in December, but the Wyoming’s crew is apparently healthy and she is allowed to unload some bags of mail at Brooklyn’s Pier 34. When she begins to discharge cargo at Pier 84 on the Hudson River, however, some longshoremen spot rats: health inspectors find rat droppings. 20 rats are promptly autopsied. Indications of plague infection show up, tests with guinea pigs confirm that the ship’s crates carried the Black Death, but news of the incident is kept from public to avoid any panic.
Evidently no rats got ashore.
Trager, p. 540.

1899: a dog show held in the Metropolitan Opera House a few weeks prior to its opening left a major infestation of fleas in the auditorium’s plus seats.
Caldwell, p. 209.

The importing of leeches for medicinal use continued in New York City until the mid-1950s.

In 1908 Franz Boas began using “physical anthropology” methods, measuring the skulls of Jewish children in New York, moving on to measuring the heads of new arrivals at the Ellis Island immigration centre in New York. He then recruited assistants and spread out to measure head size in New York’s immigrant districts.
Haden, p. 132.

A comparison of individuals born in Europe with those born in America shows that the change of head-form is almost abrupt at the time of immigration. The child born abroad, even if it is less than one year old at the time of arrival, has the head-form of the European-born. The child born in America, even if born only a few months after the arrival of the parents, has the head-form of the American-born.

Immigrants believed in the medicinal value of blood, and when illness came they went to the abattoirs and bought blood for five cents a glass.
WPA, p. 211.

New York’s two medicinal industries cater to the extremities of the longsuffering human body, selling pills for throbbing heads and, on a cross street in the 305 between Fifth and Madison, rectifying fallen arches.
N. cit.

Manhattan is an island of cannibals. Here people feed on other people for all their stimulation, information and satisfaction. The eagerness to expose all to another is also the desire to be allowed in return to creep into the other’s skin.
Bladford, p. 93.
Encephalitis in the New York region: twelve million men dedicated to hard labor.
Corbusier, p. 111.

Elevator sickness: “The resulting movement of the organs, and the accompanying pressure of such organs against other parts more rigidly attached to the frame, is the cause of discomfort.”
Reisenberg, p. 75.

Getting home, if it’s spring or summer, you close the windows to keep out mosquitoes and gnats, you wash out your ears and your nostrils, and cough up the coal dust.
Mayakovsky, America, p. 55.
M - Sex

City as Sex

Things as innocuous as the interior remodeling of houses or traffic jams become polymorphously sexy.
Conrad, p. 200.

A traffic jam catches two vehicles in the act of coupling: on Broadway near 28th Street a heavy truck had become entangled with a taxi-cab in so intimate a manner as to completely obstruct the pavement.
Ibid., p. 200.

The subway is a tunnel of love. Traveling on it inducts you into the city's erotic underground.
Ibid., p. 98.

The subway is New York's id, able to trump the competing elevated railway. The El, being above ground, is less duskily sexy.
Ibid., p. 98.

A romping bacchanal, a feast of blowsy, corpulent, promiscuous gods.
Ibid., p. 98.

It was in the air! It was a wave! Everywhere! Inescapable! ... Sex! ... There for the taking! ... It walked down the street, as bold as you please!
Wolfe, Bonfire, p. 53.

The skyscrapers, for instance, are places of business. Their height is strictly utilitarian, a device for maximizing space and increasing revenues. It's therefore necessary to deny their dour usefulness and make them a sensual amenity as inducements to sexual delight: a skyscraper is the most exquisite setting for a passionate love affair which has yet been devised by man.
Conrad, p. 200.

Artists persist in describing their infatuation with New York as a courtship or a wedding.
Ibid., p. 208.
Joseph Stella connubially declared, “New York is my wife.” His paintings of it were their offspring.
Ibid., p. 208.

New York is not a romantic city. It does not choose to be. Romance is soft; so are Paris, Venice.
Blandford, p. 81.

New York is a zoo of lubricity.
Conrad, p. 213.

The eyes of the lions in front of the library on Fifth Avenue are heavy-lidded with the load of sensual experience granaried inside the building.

The Brooklyn Bridge symbolizes a stern determination of restraint. It arrests the deliquescent sexual expenditure of the self, opposing to the fluidity of the river and of urban society its solid piers of stone.
Ibid., p. 226.

A celebration of the physical democracy of New York—its undressing of its inhabitants and of its own lusty, greedy urban body.
Conrad, p. 95.

Laughter, joy, and loneliness / and sex and sex and sex and sex.
Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

The impressionist city renders sex pastoral, absorbing it into the budding fecundity of nature.
Conrad, p. 92.

That he was already projecting a destiny for the two of them as grand as the approaching skyline of Manhattan was an indication of the eagerness and poetic inspiration that he brought to bear almost instantly on this much-longed-for romance.
Gooch, p. 329.

Coming back from the laundry down First Avenue I and two other inmates, as usual, had to step over sleeping bodies in various positions on the sidewalk. About twenty yards from the halfway house, lying on his back in the middle of the sidewalk, someone was masturbating intensely, straight up to the sky. His eyes were squeezed tightly shut. It should have been amusing, but it was not. None of us could laugh although we tried to see humor in it.

Abbott, "Bowery," p. 84.

The last function of the New York pub is to cater to the needs of a serious drinker.

Bell hops and elevator boys were known to be available for paid sex.

Reay, p. 104.

The subway cowboy with a midnight tan.

Roditi, p. 427.

Broads who stroll the boardwalk, while often easy, usually have housemaid's knee.

Mortimer, p. 141.

Now that the days are warm again, sex is back on the streets of New York. Outside is no longer a mere conduit for wooly-bundled travelers scurrying between over-heated boxes hoping to achieve some miraculous arrangement of face and form in trundling elevators at their destination. Street life has resumed with all its buzzing excitement; sex has made its annual reappearance.

Blandford, p. 114.

Body contact with strangers is to be had only with the battery of doctors or nurses to whom one turns over the machine for its biannual check-up.

Ibid., p. 114.

kissproof world of plastic toiletseats tampax taxis

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 8.

It is dirty
does it look dirty
that's what you think of in the city.

does it just seem dirty
that's what you think of in the city
you don't refuse to breath do you

O'Hara, p. 337.

I remember a rather horsy-looking girl who tried to seduce me on a New York City roof. Although I got it up, I really didn’t want to do anything, so I told her that I had a headache.

I never think of sex anymore, being wrapped up in work.

In the burlesques, women with dazzling skin have golden locks, like metal chiseled by a goldsmith, with the vividness of something cut by a chisel. Incisive casques (not vaporous!), clean, curly, dense, lively, full in style. Along with that the woman is a healthy, beautiful animal, a very beautiful animal.

Corbusier, p. 110.

Kinsey spent a lot of time in Ross Bar interviewing some of the boys; I was there the night his assistant came, in 1945. Huncke and Allen were interviewed.

Kerouac, Road, p. 242.

Within the past few months, I have slept with an Italian journalist, a Hispanic teenager from Queens, a NYPD detective who investigates terrorist threats, a Jewish philosophy student attending Northwestern, a graphic artist for an advertising firm, a truck driver, a freelance copy editor, an architecture student at Pratt, a construction worker who specializes in concrete floors, an electrician, a vendor of tickets for local rock concerts, a supervisor at a research laboratory, a luggage inspector at an airport, a “male escort” who claimed to have read Housman and Yeats, a dispatcher for a cab company, and a mad Albanian who nearly kissed me when I mentioned that I had read and liked the novels of Ismail Kadare.

Harris, Diary p. 10.

Watching some girls on swings in Stuyvesant Square who are themselves being ogled at by a fat man. [Voyeur]

Conrad, p. 92.

There’s another female idiosyncrasy peculiar to New York that bears mentioning. Many girls go through periodic withdrawals and isolation. Suddenly extremely prudish, proper, sanctimonious and horrified at their pasts... they take on the responsibility of voluntary self-punishment. They wish to rid themselves of all their old loose living, racy friends and corrupt ways.

Petronious, p. 12.
The woman who churned a man's blood as she leaned all alone on a fence by a country road might not expect even to catch his eye in the City. But if she is clipping quickly down the big-city street in heels, swinging her purse, or sitting on a stoop... dangling her shoe from the toes of her foot, the man, reacting to her posture, to soft skin on stone, the weight of the building stressing the delicate, dangling shoe, is captured. And he'd think it was the woman he wanted, and not some combination of curved stone, and a swinging, high-heeled shoe moving in and out of sunlight. [Body in the City] [Harlem]

Morrison, Jazz, p.34.

In one of Sloan’s subway etchings, a girl, baring a solid length of leg, sits reading a book. Behind her an advertisement smirkingly recommends “Rub with Sloan’s liniment.”

Conrad, p. 92.

A city of cheater panties and people who know how to use them, a puritan place some of whose famous prelates have been nicknamed Fanny and Joan, a city where a billboard shows a woman sipping from a bottle of brandy beneath the legend, “I could suck on this all night,” a city of fugitive sex on phone lines, an electronic territory of states called raunch-and-sleaze, hardcore, discipline, daddy and span.

Trebay, p. 6.

Woman eating at 2nd Ave Deli (E 10th St) Fri aft at 4. You had small Barnes & Noble bag w/ you. I’m the man you saw getting his check when you turned around. Call 777-5291 anytime after 2 pm,” or “11 /11/80, 8:45 PM, Times Sq RR. You were boarding train, we smiled, you seemed interested. Wearing blue jacket, tan pants, brown hair, beard. Tel: 201-648-2306. Mark.

Conrad, p. 306.

Oh for my New York bed full of teenage boys and lost wandering Tibetan / Amphetamine girls of twenty.

Miles, p. 342.

On the street, other than to note that he’s probably homeless, you wouldn’t give him a second look. In a public rest room, at Penn Station or at Port Authority, however, when he stands before a urinal, slouched a leisurely eight to ten inches back from the porcelain fixture, I’ve never seen anyone not at least glance in his direction—astonished, with opened mouth and blinking eyes.

Delany, p. 12.

Suits will stand outside the peep show entrance and give the appearance of casually waiting for someone in a place that just “happens” to be in front of the shop. At other times they may loiter, standing near the curb as if waiting for a cab or bus. The persona will stand in these places until it sees that “the coast is clear” and then quickly enter the shop.

Another technique involves walking by the shop and stopping, appearing to be a curious observer. The customer first looks through the window of the shop and then enters. Hence there is no sense of rushing since, after all, the individual is simply a curious passerby.

McNamara, p. 63.

He was reputed to be the best gay lay in New York.

Hamilton, p. 143.

His eyelashes were long enough now to catch in the boughs should he go for a walk in Washington Square.

Reay, p. 149.

All I have to do is step outdoors alone to have boys drop from the sky and roll under his feet; they look up at one (I am told on reliable authority), flutter their lovely black eyelashes, and the deal is made.

Ibid., p. 11.

In New York nobody paid any attention to you except now and then a man tried to pick you up in the street or brushed against you in the subway, which was disgusting.

[Subway] [Claustrophobia]

Conrad, p. 189.

A woman idling on the street is to be ‘consumed’ and ‘enjoyed’ along with the rest of the sights that the city affords. [Flâneur]

Tester, p. 28.

The parks of New York were their boudoir. They planked in them all. They were the only ones who had ever made love under the streetlight in the midpoint of the arching stone bridge near the Central Park Zoo, according to the policeman who broke up their coupling at a most urgent mutual moment of just-before-groinflash oblivion; ears aware of the approaching footsteps of Eros, but not of gumshoe.

They tried it, lying up against the little jungle gym Park in Washington Square after the park was closed. They playing on the cinder riding track near 72nd St. on the west side of Central Park and were interrupted by police forces—again at a critical moment. They planked sports-car-style on a bench at 72nd on the east side of the park (the same night as the cinder track interruption).

They loved to make it in Inwood Park. One New Year’s Eve they climbed high in the rocks above the Columbia University boat basin at the north edge of Inwood, and were lean/lying on a steep icy incline between huge boulders—when, right in the middle, they began to slide, we’re unable to break it, but still kept fucking, and her buttocks were treated to fifteen feet of thrillies down the twiggy glaciation.

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 6.

“The condom killed romance, but it has made it a lot easier to get laid,” said a friend. “There’s something about using a condom that, for women, makes it like sex doesn’t count. There’s no skin-to-skin contact. So they go to bed with you more easily.

Bushnell, N. pag.

The talk turned to the inevitable: What kind of people go to a sex club? I seemed to be the only one who didn’t have a clue. Although no one had been to a sex club, everyone at dinner firmly asserted that the clubgoers would generally be “losers from New Jersey.”

Ibid., N. pag.

Le Trapeze was located in a white stone building covered with graffiti. The entrance was discreet, with a rounded metal railing, a downmarket version of the entrance to the Royalton Hotel... What did we see? Well, there was a big room with a huge air mattress, upon which a few blobby couples gamely went at it; there was a “sex chair” (unoccupied) that looked like a spider; there was a chubby woman in a robe, sitting next to a Jacuzzi, smoking; there were couples with glazed eyes (Night of the Living Sex Zombies, I thought); and there were many men who appeared to be having trouble keeping up their end of the bargain. But mostly, there were those damn steaming buffet tables (containing what mini hot dogs?), and unfortunately, that’s pretty much all you need to know... The problem, in the clubs, anyway, always comes down to the people. They’re the actresses who can never find work; the failed opera singers, painters, and writers; the lower-management men who will never get to the middle. People who, should they corner you in a bar, will keep you hostage with tales of their ex-spouses and their digestive troubles. They’re the people who can’t negotiate the system. They’re on the fringes, sexually and in life. They’re not necessarily the people with whom you want to share your intimate fantasies.

Or is there a darker side to threesomes: Are they a symptom of all that’s wrong with New York, a product of that combination of desperation and desire particular to Manhattan?

Lured perhaps by the promise of free drinks, free joints, and free honey-roasted peanuts, seven men joined me on a recent Monday evening in the basement of a SoHo art gallery to talk about threesomes.

The most popular place where strangers agree to meet, it seems, are outside the main branch of the New York Public Library, beside the Washington Square Arch, under the clock at the Biltmore and by the information booth in Grand Central Station. At any of these places and many others, says my friend, pretty girls will always be waiting, with at least of few of them waiting for men they’ve never met.

Coleman, p. 274.

(Inconveniently, if you want to invest in a white carnation for your buttonhole, that’s fine, but you don’t really need it. Research has proved that the most common identification symbol among blind dates is a New Yorker magazine tucked under the arm.)

And in this city, with all the lawyers and all the overcrowded niche structures, you have incredible pressure. Pressure fucks up the hormones; when the hormones are screwed up, there are more homosexuals; and homosexuality is nature’s way of cutting down on population. All of these unnatural things we’re talking about exponentially expand.

Bushnell, N. pag.

Man meets woman, man fucks woman...again and again and again.
And you go into the bathroom, and you get a blow job from someone in the fashion industry.

In the Ninety-third Street two-bedroom—Carnegie Hill—he pulled my hair to one side and kissed my neck slowly, with a masterful flourish... Then he took my hand and pulled me gently into... the master bedroom. Sunlight. Space. New marble bathroom. just as promised.

Gay Bars

I remember queer bars.

I remember leaning up against walls in queer bars.

I remember standing up straight in queer bars.

I remember suddenly being aware of "how" I am holding my cigarette in queer bars.

I remember not liking myself for not picking up boys I probably could pick up because of the possibility of being rejected.

I remember deciding at a certain point that I would cut through all the bullshit and just go up to boys I liked and say, "Do you want to go home with me?" and so I tried it. But it didn't work. Except once. And he was drunk. The next morning he left a card behind with a picture of Jesus on it signed "with love, Jesus" on the back. He said he was a friend of Allen Ginsberg.

I remember tight white pants. Certain ways of standing. Blond heads of hair. And spotted bleached blue jeans.

I remember "baskets."
Ibid.

I remember “jewels” neatly placed down the left pantleg or the right.
Ibid.

I remember pretty faces that don’t move.
Ibid.

I remember loud sexy music. Too much beer. Quick glances. And not liking myself for playing the game too.
Ibid.

I remember a boy I tried to pick up once. As an opener I told him he had a nice nose and he said he was thinking about having it “fixed” and I said no he shouldn’t. He said he was busy that night but he took my phone number. (Never did call, though.) Maybe I put him off by saying that I thought psychology was a bit silly. (He was a psychology major.) “Too self indulgent.” I remember saying. (I was drunk.) Actually his nose was a bit too big.
Ibid.

I remember coming home from queer bars and bawling myself out for not having more confidence in myself.
Ibid.

After an unsuccessful night, going around to queer bars, I come home, and say to myself, “Art.”
Ibid.

14th Street is drunken and credulous,
53rd Street tries to tremble but is too at rest.
O’Hara, p. 182.

He said, “There’s a special train. After you’ve done the third Avenue bars, you take it at Fifty-third and Third and it goes right to West Eighth Street. And then you have all of Eighth Street.”
Gooch, p. 194.

Names for Third Avenue: Third Sex, Third Leg, Three-Dollar Bill.
McCourt, p. 6.

The Bird Circuit of gay bars: The Blue Parrot on Fifty-third between Third and Lexington, the Golden Pheasant on Forty-eighth Street, the Swan—all in the neighborhood of the Third Avenue El. The East Side bars tended to be dressy, and their customers were conservatively dressed in bow ties, blazers, or fluffy sweaters. The “bird bars” usually started coming to life between eleven-thirty and midnight when the plays let out. Often the men in the bar could be found shoulder to shoulder dancing, singing tunes from such Broadway musicals as South Pacific or Kiss Me, Kate in unison with the jukebox.” (cf. Mencken: “Third Avenue still holding on to the grubbiness...” against modernist [Architecture])
Bowes, p. 105.

I’d walk down Third Avenue. In the East Sixties, guys stood casually on street corners, paused significantly in doorways, gave sidelong glances: all very discreet. Eyes tracked me from the windows of the bird bars... In those bars Piaf sang on the jukebox, men in suits sat at the bar... Down the Avenue from the bars at Fifty-Third and Third was a world famous chicken run. Young boys stood in the cold in sneakers and thin jakcekts, waited under awnings, stared out the windows of seedy coffee shops and knew just who I was.
Ibid., p. 105-6.

I sit in one of the dives
On Fifty-second Street
Uncertain and afraid
Auden, “September” p. 72.

The bars of Third Avenue, where The Lost Weekend was filmed.
Delaney, p. 77.

The Ramones’ “53rd & 3rd,” is a chilling song. It’s about this guy standing on the corner of Fifty-third and Third trying to hustle guys, but nobody ever picks him. Then when somebody does, he kills the john to prove that he’s not a sissy.
McNeil, p. 175

“The song ’53rd & 3rd,’ speaks for itself,” said Dee Dee Ramone. “Everything I write is autobiographical and very real. I can’t write any other way.”
Van Dorston, N. pag.

I remember driving by Fifty-third Street and Third Avenue and seeing Dee Dee Ramone standing out there. He had a black leather motorcycle jacket on, the one he would later wear on the first album cover. He was just standing there, so I knew what he was doing, because I knew that was the gay-boy hustler spot. Still, I was kind of shocked to see somebody I knew standing there, like, "Holy shit. That’s Doug standing there. He’s really doing it."
McNeil, p. 174

If you think you can, well come on man
I was a Green Beret in Viet Nam
No more of your fairy stories
‘Cause I got my other worries

53rd and 3rd
Standing on the street
53rd and 3rd
I’m tryin’ to turn a trick

53rd and 3rd
You’re the one they never pick
53rd and 3rd
Don’t it make you feel sick?

Then I took out my razor blade
Then I did what God forbade
Now the cops are after me
But I proved that I’m no sissy
Ramones, “53rd and 3rd.”

Eighth Street gay bars of the 50s: Mary’s, Main Street, the Eighth Street Bar, the Old Colony.

Regent’s Row: “piss-elegant” Upper East Side gay bar.
Little, p. 79.

The Mineshaft, the Anvil, Ramrod, the Spike, Crisco Disco, the Cock Pit, the Toilet, Hellfire, Papacock, Clit Club.
Strausbaugh, p. 517.

Late in the afternoon [Warhol] usually dropped by a new favorite hot spot, Serendipity, to have coffee and pastries. Serendipity… was located in a basement on East 58th Street and specialized in serving ice ream, cakes and coffee and selling fashionable knick-knacks in a tasteful, all-white setting. It was a mecca for celebrities like Gloria Vanderbilt, Cary Grant and Truman Capote.
Bockris, Warhol, pp. 104-5.
The Silver Dollar Bar with its selection of wonderful hustlers, the more upmarket possibilities of the Astor Bar (hustlers with ties) and the young white and Puerto Rican men of 42nd Street available for $5 or $10. I couldn’t believe that these beautiful, magnificent specimens of manly beauty would be so pliable and agreeable in bed.

The Back Room was an arcane practice that has since, apparently, gone out of fashion in Village bars. In its heyday, it was a walled-off area, pitch-black, adjacent to the bar, that served as an arena for any variety of catch-as-catch-can sex. Sometimes two guys would meet at the bar and, after preliminaries, repair to the Back Room to do their thing. In other cases, singles who had not much luck at the bar or pool table would drift into the Back Room and wait for a body—any body—to find them in the darkness... what closed down the Village Back Room was not fastidiousness, but the rumor of a “mad Slasher” who was said to go around from one back room to another playing havoc on penile musculatures with a razor blade. [Mapplethorpe] [Sex]

Ibid., pp. 19-20.

Gay

1910s–1940s

In 1912, agents of the Pennsylvania Railroad cut holes in the ceiling of the men’s room at their Cortlandt Ferry house in order to spy on men using the facilities.

Chauncey, p. 198.

East Fourteenth Street between Third Avenue and Union square was a gay cruising area known as the Rialto from the 1890s into the 1920s.

Ibid., p. 190.

The sexual topography of the capital of the homosexual world continually shifted but did so around recurring axes. In the 1920s, the centers had been Riverside Drive, Fifth Avenue, and Battery Park. In the early 1930s, the focus had moved to Bryant Park and Lexington Avenue. In 1940, it was Times Square and lower Central Park.

Reay, p. 85.
Van Vechten's flat in Harlem for his affairs with men was painted black with silver stars on the ceiling for nocturnal trysts.
   Barnet, p. 141.

Charles Henri Ford and Parker Tyler on Harlem's drag balls of the 1920s: "A scene whose celestial flavor and cerulean coloring no angelic painter or nectarish poet has ever conceived."
   Lawrence, p. 3.

The elaborate display windows that department stores began installing in the late nineteenth century quickly became the locus of one of the few acceptable street cultures for middle-class women, who could stroll down the street looking at them and conversing with other browsers, their loitering in public space legitimized by its association with consumption. As men, gay men had less need to justify their presence on the streets, but they took advantage of the same legitimizing conventions. One man who had indicated his interest in meeting another might stop before a window and gaze at the display; the second could then join him and strike up a conversation in which they could determine whether they wanted to spend more time together. "Fairies hang out in the saloon opposite Bloomingdale's," a Macy's saleswoman claimed in 1913, and, she added, the blocks of Third Avenue in the East Fifties, a marginal retail strip under the El, were "their favorite beat." A study of arrests for homosexual activity in 1921 provides further evidence of the extent to which cruising was concentrated in retail shopping districts, for it revealed that the subway stations at Lexington and Fifty-ninth Street where Bloomingdale's stood, Union Square (the site of numerous cheap retail outlets), and Herald Square where Macy's, Gimbels, and Saks-34th Street were located, each accounted for more arrests than any other station, all together accounted for three-quarters of the arrests reported for all subway stations. [Commodity] [Shopping] [Display]
   Chauncey, p. 190.

A man who expressed interest in another could stop in front of the windows display, and the other, if interested, could begin a conversation without attracting attention. [Desire] [Commodity]
   Ibid., p. 198.
The floating center of hustlers moved from one street corner to another or from the north to the south sides of the street, depending on the popularity of a given bar or the frequency of policing.
Reay, p. 85.

The Fruited Plain, Vaseline Alley, Bitches’ Walk.
Chauncey, p. 204.

The senescent, semi-derelict pensioned-off civil servant queer from one of the many residential hotels in the neighborhood is sitting on the bench a mere two blocks south in Madison Square, at six on a summer morning. Sex still rages in the bushes and up against the trees, and particularly significantly in the thicket behind the Saint-Gaudens statue of Admiral Farragut ("Damn the torpedoes—full speed ahead!") with his flaring long coat, pedestal and chair.
McCourt, p. 199.

There is always some kind of physical barrier—some bushes, a bathroom door, or a car—between the participants of public sex and the outside world. This barrier screens out the uninitiated. If more than two people are present, one of them usually acts as a lookout... People sitting behind the closed door of a bathroom or of a movie booth in an adult bookstore can reasonably assume that they have privacy.
Califia, p. 20.

Clustered in theater and retail shopping districts, where many gay men worked and where heavy pedestrian traffic offered cover, such as Union Square, Herald Square and Harlem’s Seventh Avenue and 135th street; along the socially less desirable avenues darkened by elevated trains thundering overheard, particularly Third and Sixth Avenues, where few powerful interests would notice them; close to the parks where men gathered, such as Fifth Avenue in the twenty blocks south of Central Park (and, in later years, Central Park West in the Seventies); along Riverside Drive and other parts of the waterfront, where many seamen and other unmarried or transient workers were to be found; and, in general, in the same “vice” areas where other forms of disreputable sexual behavior, particularly prostitution, were tacitly allowed to flourish, or tat for one reason or another provided a measure of privacy and “cover” to gay men seeking to meet.
Chauncey, p. 189.
In which Central Park becomes a fantasy dancing ground for sailors.
McCourt, p. 31.

Every night after dinner we go walk on Central Park West and we run into all of our friends, the people we work with, and half the West Side gay people—which were thousands—on Central Park West between 59th and 86th. In those days, there was one long bench from corner to corner, solid with gay men. Hundreds and thousands of them walked back-and-forth singularly, in couples, and in groups.
Carter, p. 30.

Where homosexuals gather, hustlers will gather and during the 1920s and early 1930s Riverside Drive at about 96th Street was a hive of homosexual activity every mild evening and even during the winter.
Reay, p. 55.

Riverside Drive was the haunt of Navy and Army men looking for prostitutes.
Ibid., p. 55.

Hart Crane make frequent references to his fondness for sailors in New York: “If it weren’t for the Fleet I should scarcely be able to endure it.”
Ibid., p. 7.

In the 1930s, painted faggots were to be found on the blocks above and below 72nd Street between Central Park and Broadway—because the end of 72nd Street was where the sailors disembarked.
Ibid., p. 56.

And here on Broadway and 72nd Street muderpiss beautiful boys grow out of dung... They push flesh into eternity and sidestep automobiles. I bemoan them most under sheets at night when their eyes rimmed with masculinity see nothing and their lymphlips are smothered by the irondomed sky. Poor things, their genitals only peaceful when without visiting cards.
Ibid., p. 40.

Gay male residential and commercial enclaves developed in the Bowery, Greenwich Village, Times Square and Harlem in large part because they were the city’s major centers of furnished-room housing for single men.
Opposite the piers, along the entire length of highway, nearly every block houses its quota of cheap lunchrooms, tawdry saloons and waterfront haberdasheries catering to the thousand of polyglot seamen who haunt the "front." Men "on the beach" (out of employment) usually make their headquarters in the barrooms, which are frequented mainly by employees of lines leasing piers in the vicinity.

_WPA Guide_, p. 69.

In the 1920s and 1930s, the flaming homosexual was a common sight on the streets of mid-town New York. There were blatant, painted, "flaming" young homosexuals (older ones seldom try to flame) with marcelled hair quite long and held into place with innumerable hair pins, with mascaraed eyelashes, powdered cheeks, lipsticked mouths, and riotously colored fingernails, their fingers vulgarly ornamented with large rings, their clothing femininely soft and loudly colored, their shoes suede, their whole appearance and manner calculated to attract the attention of normal men. These were to be seen any night in Times Square.

_Reay, pp. 57-8._

In 1930, Fifth Avenue from 42nd Street to Central Park at 59th Street was popular homosexually, not only on one side of the street—the west side.

_Ibid., p. 85._

Well-dressed, "mannered," and gay-identified hustlers serving a gay-identified clientele generally met their customers as the latter left the theater and walked home on the west side of Fifth Avenue from Forty-second to Fifty-ninth Streets.

_Chauncey, p. 191._

1930s hustler tactics: telling a john that he is menstruating so he can have anal or provide oral sex; the use of breast pads and a girdle to hold up tell-tale testicles and penis; the strategy never to strip; the employment of a rubber vagina or the technique of slipping the penis into the anus instead of the non-existent vagina.

_Reay, p. 59._

La Guardia began closing Bryant Park at night in 1944 in order to "prevent undesirables from gathering."

_Chauncey, p. 183._
One man often served informally as a sentry who could warn the others about the approach of strangers, and, given the possible consequences of approaching the wrong man, even two strangers alone in an isolated washroom usually sought to confirm their mutual interest in an encounter through a series of nonverbal signs before overtly approaching each other. The most popular tearooms had elaborate and noisy entrances, which altered men to the approach of another and gave them time to stop whatever they were doing. To reach one tearoom famous among gay men in the 1940s, located on the eighth floor of the RCA Building at Rockefeller Center, for instance, those arriving had to pass through several doors in a long corridor, thus providing the men in the room ample warning of their approach.

_Ibid._, p. 197.

Gore Vidal, who had an appetite for trade, recalled the Astor Bar in New York's Times Square in the 1940's as "the city's most exciting meeting place for soldiers, sailors, and marines on the prowl for one another." "I did enjoy my daily meetings with strangers, usually encountered in the streets," he wrote of 1946. "We would then go to one of the Dreiserian hotels around Times Square. Most were poor youths my own age, and often capable of an odd lovingness, odd considering the fact that I did so little to give any of them physical pleasure. But then, even at twenty, I often paid for sex on the ground that it was only fair."

_Reay_, p. 8.

John Cheever was not above paid sex with young men.

_Ibid._, p. 7.

Tennessee Williams: "I went out cruising last night and brought home something with a marvelous body it was animated Greek marble and turned over even. It asked for money and I said, dear, would I be living in circumstances like this if I had any money?" [Antiquity]

_Ibid._, p. 9.

The pansies stared and tightened their grip on their dandies. The dandies tightened their hold on themselves. They looked the favored Jake up and down... Dandies and pansies, chocolate, chestnut, coffee, ebony, cream, yellow, everybody was teased up to the high point of excitement. Brown girls rouged and painted like dark pansies. Brown flesh draped in soft colorful clothes. Brown lips full and pouted for sweet kissing. Brown breasts throbbing with love.

Ima Pansy from Central Park.
Walker, p. 207.

Harvey Milk arrested in a Central Park cruising area sweep in 1947.
Chauncey, p. 183.

1950s

Ginsberg’s first sexual experience with Kerouac: They were walking by the waterfront where the elevated West Side Highway passed Christopher Street. The area beneath it was used as a truck park and would later become the center of the New York gay scene. They stopped between two trucks and jacked each other off. "I don’t know why there should be some erotic spirit of a place," Ginsberg commented. "I think it was just the industrial isolation, and we were horny." However, the next time they walked through the area they did it again.
Miles, p. 64.

In the 1950s, he described a movie theatre in Spanish Harlem where fellators operated as a cooperative, some keeping watch on the stairs, the others observing the fellating. One was a horrid, campy, swishy, noisy old faggot who irritated hem all; another was a tough, rough, muscular, truck-driverish youth who nonetheless was also a fellator and who said to the faggot, "Thank God I’m just a cocksucker and not queer!"
Reay, p. 20.

The buff boys of the Chelsea nighty, ripped all, like Alpha-male delicatessen, work of Paul Cadmus and Charles Demuth.
McCourt, p. 24.

I remember another early sexual experience. At the Museum of Modern Art. In the movie theater. I don’t remember the movie. First there was a knee pressed to mine. Then there was a hand on my knee. Then a hand on my crotch. Then a hand inside my pants. Inside my underwear. It was very exciting but I was afraid to look at him. He left before the movie was over and I thought he would be outside waiting for me by the print exhibition but I waited around and nobody showed any interest.

1954 Times Square hustler uniform: T-shirt and turned up jeans.

Reay, p. 80.

Idlewild—gay name, for sure.

McCourt, p. 155.

Eighth Street in the summer of ’57. The Eighth Street Bookshop, the Whitney, the Bon Soir, and the Village Barn. The Walgreen’s on the northeast corner of Eighth Street and the Avenue of the Americas. The Eighth Street (at Broadway) men’s toilet (the uptown side).

Ibid., p. 80.

Ibid., p. 39.

Every queer coming of age in America, who developed the ambition to be metropolitan, was instructed in the same way: the goal is the “penthouse” overlooking the river, or the Park, or midway between the two, but uptown, far away from the 14th Street fault line. [Aerie]

Ibid., p. 108.

Washington Square Park hustlers in the late 50s: lined up in close-fitting jeans with a clear emphasis on certain body parts—in Levis, t-shirts, leather jackets (every taste is provided for), and a cigarette dangling from the corner of the mouth.

Reay, p. 112.

One Sunday he circled a block on Greenwich Avenue. He had circled the block twice already and he hadn’t met anyone. In the early 60s it could be hard to meet someone, the encounter was so ritualized. The shops were closed on Sundays, but he circled the block looking at the shop windows; then he walked by without looking. Then he went around the block again, passed an attractive man, and stood and feigned a studious interest in the goods displayed in the window. Would the good-looking fellow stop and also stare? Maybe the other man would signal his interest by tapping his foot as they both window-shopped. Then he could ask the other man if he knew the time or had a light for a cigarette? They started the long, drawn-out procedure of approach. Did you live here? What did he think of the village? And so forth. [Commodity]

Carter, pp. 16-7.

The shadowy parks, subways stations, and ship docks of the city were a libidinal landscape for the young poet, their furtiveness part of a mischievous midsummer night’s game.

Gooch, p. 197.

Frank O’Hara’s sexual exploits: His regularly making out with a guard at the UN during its construction, right there in there small, temporary station house, always after midnight, or like the time he boarded the subway, blind drunk, missed his stop and ended up in Queens, where he blew the Negro in the change booth before catching his train back to Manhattan.

Lesueur, p. 40.

There are several Puerto Ricans on the avenue today, which makes it beautiful and warm.

O’Hara, p. 257.

1960s

The early years: Eighth Street, Greenwich Avenue, the Cherry Lane, Lenny’s Hideaway; Mary’s, Julius’s, Danny Monk’s, The Modern, the Ninth Circle; the St. Marks Baths, the Everad Baths, the Metropolitan Opera standing-room line between 39th and 40th on Broadway, the Astor Bar “Flit” Side—and the infiltrated “Straight” Side at the opposite end—the other side of the mirror. Dozens of subway and Department of Parks mens’ toilets, the “tea rooms,” the Ramble in Central Park, the Metropolitan Museum of Art, MoMA, the Frick Collection, Duff’s and the Sea Shack in Cherry Grove, on Fire Island, the Belvedere (the grandest beach house in the Grove), the Cherry Grove Playhouse.

McCourt, p. 24.

If I had sex, say, with an average of three different partners a week from 1962 to 1982 in New York, then that means I fooled around with 3,120 men during my twenty years there. The funny thing is that I always felt deprived, as though all the other fellows must be getting laid more often. A gay shrink once told me that that was the single most common complaint he heard from his patients, even from the real satyrs: they weren’t getting as much tail as the next guy.

Turner, p. 128.

Most people would probably think of the following year, ’68, as the time we were getting involved with the drag queens who were around downtown, because it wasn’t until then that they first cropped up in our movies, when Paul used Jackie Curtis and Candy in Flesh. Of course we’d had Mario Montez in a few of our early films, but since Mario only dressed up as a woman for performances—out in the world, he would never be in drag; he was more like a show business transvestite than the social sexual phenomenon the true drags were.

As late as ’67 drag queens still weren’t accepted in the mainstream freak circles. They were still hanging around where they’d always hung around—on the fringes, around the big cities, usually in crummy little hotels, sticking to their own circles—outcasts with bad teeth and body odor and cheap makeup and creepy clothes. But then, just like drugs had come into the average person’s life, sexual blurs did, too, and people began identifying a little more with drag queens, seeing them more as “sexual radicals” than as depressing losers.

In the sixties, average types started having sex-identity problems, and some people saw a lot of their own questions about themselves being acted out by the drag queens. So then, naturally, people seemed to sort of want them around—almost as if it made them feel better because then they could say to themselves, “I may not know exactly what I am, but at least I know I’m not a drag queen.” That’s how in ’68, after so many years of being repelled by them, people started accepting drag queens even courting them, inviting them everywhere. With the new attitude of mind-before-matter / where-your-head-is-at / do-your-own-thing, the drags had the Thing of Things going for them. I mean, it was quite a thing, it took up all of their time. “Does she tuck?” the other queens would ask Jackie about Candy, and Jackie would say something oblique like “Listen, even Garbo has to rearrange her jewels.”

Candy herself referred to his penis as “my flaw.” There was always that question of what to call the drags—“him” or “her” or a little bit of both. You usually just did it intuitively. Jackie I always called “him” since I’d known him before he went into drag, and Candy Darling and Holly Woodlawn were “her” because they were already in it when I met up with them.

But if in ‘68 the drag queens were incorporated into the fun of the general freak scene, in ‘67 they were still pretty “queer.”

Poet Charles Henri Ford was still paying for sex in the 1960s.

Reay, p. 9.

Hustlers stood on the curb facing inwards on the sidewalk so that they could see those passing by and be seen... In the 1960s, they stood on the opposite side of the sidewalk against the wall or a shop window, easily approached by potential johns who could always say that they were window shopping. [Street Furniture]

New York was the gay capital of the US. Things happened here.

Atkins, p. 253.

New York’s male homosexuals are the smartest, best-dressed, most glamorous, jaded, Wittiest, most attractive, most successful, vicious, shrewd, influential and desirable queens in the world. They are also the sickest, most desperate, most ridiculous and dullest in the world.

Petronious, p. 79.

Ginsberg visiting the Stonewall Inn after the riots: “The guys there were so beautiful—they’ve lost that wounded look that fags all had ten years ago.”

Caldwell, p. 326.

June 27, 1969: Judy Garland’s funeral was held at Frank Campbell’s Upper East Side mortuary the day of the Stonewall Riots.

Atkins, 253.

Out of the mass of people on the dance deck, strands of lives reached out in time and place, in anguish or fulfillment or just a quiet gentle drift toward death. Post-Stonewall liberation? What did it mean? How would the people on the dance deck differ in their lives from those quiet gray-haired gay couples who ghosted around the Village and shared their little amusements during genteel evenings at Carr’s, a West Village gay bar of antique vintage, or at home with the television set and two toy poodles?
Hamilton, p. 56.

... their torments in the city and their ecstasies at Cherry Grove... their safe haven in a rent-controlled two-bedroom on Charles Street.
Ibid., p. 56.

1970s

Short of hair, mustaches neatly clipped, T-shirts tight over big muscles, heavy key chains jangling, feet shod in bulky leather workboots.

Vaseline, Stevedore, Partouze, Dexamyl, Amyl, Mascara, Revenge, Judy, Balenciaga, Syphilis, Penicillin and Frottage.
McCourt, p. 74.

Sugar Plum Fairy came and hit the streets
Looking for soul food and a place to eat
Reed, "Walk."

Over the strains of WKTU 92 FM disco, they sigh for his gleaming black hair, his broad shoulders, the cowboy moustache.
Blandford, p. 78.

Here in Manhattan were a hundred or so men in leather or lumberjack shirts or other varieties of Western gear, though for a certainty no more than one or two had so much as laid eyes on a cow, let alone rounded one up. A shiny saddle hung from the centre of the ceiling and across the middle of the bar a rustic wooden fence had been constructed, the kind of fence Dale Evans sits on while she watches Roy Rogers breaking in a four-legged friend. A few tightly Jeaned men in check shirts and bristling moustaches sat on this fence, and there was a little manly smooching going on.
Brook, pp. 160-1.

In the Forty-second Street area's sex theaters specifically, since I started frequenting them in the summer of 1975, I've met playwrights, carpenters, opera singers, telephone repair men, stockbrokers, guys on welfare, guys with trust funds, guys on crutches, on walkers, in wheelchairs, teachers, warehouse workers, male nurses, fancy chefs, guys who worked at Dunkin' Donuts, guys who gave out flyers on street corners, guys who drove garbage trucks, and guys who washed windows on the Empire State Building.

Delany, 15.

For a dollar forty-nine in the seventies, and for five dollars in the year before they were closed (several less than twelve months ago), from ten in the morning till midnight you could enter and, in the sagging seats, watch a projection of two or three hard-core pornographic videos. A few trips up and down the aisle while your eyes got accustomed to the darkness revealed men sitting off in the shadows—or, sometimes, full out under the occasional wall lights—masturbating . . . if someone hadn't stood up on the seat and unscrewed the bulb. Sit a seat away from one, and you would either be told to go away, usually fairly quietly, or invited to move closer (if only by the guy's feigned indifference). Should he be one of your regulars, you might even get a grin of recognition.

Occasionally men expected money—but most often, not. Many encounters were wordless. Now and again, though, one would blossom into a conversation lasting hours, especially with those men less well-off, the out-of-work, or the homeless with nowhere else to go.

Ibid., 15.

Nobody gets what they want, pet, on Fire Island, except the deer. Check the faces on the ferry on the way back: there ought to be a branch of the Department of Welfare with a passport photo apparatus to snap headshots on the Friday afternoon and again on the Sunday evening—before and after, as in the ads for Ayds, the reducing candy. The idea that candy can had to weight reduction is no crazier than canonizing the idea that a weekend in Island Pines can lead to happiness. Never have I seen so much unavailing untold want, such fruitless longing as on the dance floor, along the meat rack and in the drugged hollows of Island Pines.

McCourt, p. 209.

Ayds (pronounced as "aids") was an appetite-suppressant candy which enjoyed strong sales in the 1970s and early 1980s and was originally manufactured by The Campana Company. It was available in chocolate, chocolate mint, butterscotch, and caramel flavors, and later a peanut butter flavor was introduced. The original packaging used the phrase "Ayds Reducing Plan vitamin and mineral Candy"; a later version used the phrase "appetite suppressant candy". The active ingredient was originally benzocaine, presumably to reduce the sense of taste to reduce eating.

By the mid-1980s, public awareness of the disease AIDS caused problems for the brand due to the phonetic similarity of names. While initially sales were not affected, by 1988 the chair of Dep Corporation announced that the company was seeking a new name because sales had dropped as much as 50% due to publicity about the disease. While the product’s name was changed to Diet Ayds (Aydslim in Britain), it was eventually withdrawn from the market.

"Ayds." Wikipedia.

There was no fence. The trucks would back right up to the river and it was pitch-dark in there. Every now and then you could see somebody with a cigarette in the back of the truck. There would sometimes be 200 or 300 people in them.

Carter, p. 36.

Christopher Street is sedate and quiet, more like the block I first saw in 1970, when I wondered if the man walking down the street in front of me knew there was a hole in the seat of his jeans.

Later heading back we walked along the highway, the motorheads from the cycle bars spilling out in beery crowd onto the streets. Musclemen packed into tight T-shirts and this one albino kid about nineteen or twenty flirting with some of them as he walked in front of us. A group of ten transvestites sitting on car hoods or standing by the sides of gleaming autos, fixing their faces, powdering noses, rubbing on lipsticks and showing each other their clothes, bending down into car mirrors to work with cosmetics. Couple of more reserved joes hanging out with the staring around and looking a bit faded.

Wojnarowicz, p. 116.

We walked down Christopher Street in the night, crowds of bar characters, homeless cowboys and street sleepers, the roughneck crowds and the junkies on the stoop next to Boots & Saddles and dollah joints ooo-eee good shit here now dollar joints, mesc, etc., etc. Passed the Silver Dollar with the semitransvestites primping in the side mirrors, day-old leather guys lounging in plastic seats and across tables.
Ibid., p. 117.

Turned the corner at Badlands bar and walked uptown, racing night traffic and glitter of lamps and glass broken on the street and the tittering of transvestites in front of Peter Rabbit bar and the ocean roll of traffic and hiss of wheels the shoosh of bypassing autos and the glimmer of the river not too far away—we crossed and took various pisses and sat on the waterfront boardwalk and watched the characters easing in and outta the shadows of the pier warehouses, along the brick walls like rats and emerging into the phosphorescent shine of bathing street lamps along the lapping posted walls through various darkness and passing no one—once inside it was difficult to see, a few dim shapes of white T-shirts or the pale gleam of white skin in the darkness, and standin’ still for a while our eyes adjusted and we walked toward the back of the pier warehouse where there was one middle doorway shining with a contained section of river and lights, we passed back, John said it was hard to see the ground, we moved directly in the center of the doorway line, seeing two bright spherical yellow lights like car headlights anchored on Jersey cliffs sending vertical lines of light, gold breathin’ light across the surface of the dark roiling river, like two railroad track lines laid out into some hobo’s heaven, it’s a giant Chevy parked against the Jersey coastline, images come from the river, the solitude and great sense of foreign remote excitement, all road images coming back from distant places and watchin’ these ferryboat barge ships drift by with loud echoing rollin’ music coming from their stompin’ interiors, party people on a latenight drift, we turned and walked back in the deep darkness of the pier warehouse and stood against a side wall talking quietly and watching the movements of anonymous characters driftin’ back and forth and up and down staircases against the back wall, occasional voices from upstairs and then we strolled back out and onto the bank street pier and towards the end of the pier, avoiding the large gaping holes that open onto the river, my foot almost disappeared down a large pipe aperture, over to the side materializing in the darkness were two men, one giving the other a desperate blow job, Jesus, I said, and John went, Whew...and further on were two men one bent over getting rammed by another guy, the fucking was brutal and fast and almost violent but both were into it and then at one point the guy getting rammed was rammed so hard he flew over and his palms landed on the surface of the pier boards and he continued in that position and I just recalled that before in the warehouse we were upstairs walkin' around through hallways and rooms and there was this guy who slid outta the dark and had his shirt removed and positioned himself on the wall and then slid after us as we moved along, he rushin' from door to door and leaning back to caress his chest and crotch and I asked John would he mind waitin' a little bit to the side in the main large room, he did and I went in after the guy, he turned from the wall and ran his tongue over his lips, could feel the dryness of them just by lookin', he whipped out this bottle of amyl and held it under my nose and groped me and I rubbed his chest, his nipples, and he moaned in that hollow darkness, held the amyl under my nose and I placed my hand behind his neck to draw him down to his knees but he turned and slipped away into the darkness and disappeared—I went back to John and we split into a series of rooms windows bordering the river and four perfect diamonds of exterior lamplights laid out on the floor, if ya stand in the middle of the side doorway and walk forward the doorframe empty of door evolves into another room with diamonds of gold light with shadows crossing window frames into another doorway you’re still moving forward it’s like a film, another set of diamonds on another floor, and the tips of each set of light diamonds appearing less and less in each room, easin’ into full view as ya pass forward, eyes on one spot in the unseeing distance, moving like you’re on rails —everything relegated to the senses, use of sense like a vehicle, moving forward at regulated pace, something otherwise so unexplainable yet the wounding nature of these visual scenes...we watched on the bankstreet pier the fucking until the guys separated and went their various ways, we sat on the far edge next to lapping water and posts and talked about the sense ya get in these scenes that although it’s public sex ya still have the sense that ya should respect their privacy and not go over and watch, though watching from a discreet distance can only be expected as it is an intense visual to be confronted with and then another boat went by with characters milling and shoutin’ in the din of music, you could barely make out their voices—and the timeless photographic nature of the scenes way back at the beginning of the pier, the trucks lined up silver and motionless, the numerous autos from Jersey and other parts all filled with motionless drivers waiting for someone of their private dreams to walk along softly and open the side door with a click and slide heavy and climbed into the front seat and the pale flash of belly and the motion of the tongue and the slide of hands and the sleeplessness of it all, the bright lights and lampposts burning continuously beneath the Westside Highway structures, the trucks barreling downtown and the two smokestacks to the side in a factory building, squealing autos and the light pale rise of smoke... [Drugs] [Photography]

A skein of torsos unravels into the Hudson, with a liner passing and the skyscrapers on parade. The bodies might be boys diving; they might just as well be gods thunderously alighting.

Conrad, p. 100.

I found New York’s gay sex scene appealing primarily for the novelty of outdoor sex to be had in Central or Riverside Parks, on Fire Island, or on the piers or trucks of the Village and Meatpacking districts.

Atkins, p. 255.

At Westbeth, gazing down on what remained of the Morton Street Pier, a blackened slab, like an enormous Anselm Kiefer canvas year by year dismantled further, until the blackened surface had been torn away and the pilings had almost completely sunk into the North River, like the Sunken Cathedral and the Kingdom of Y’s.

McCourt, p. 328.

Sodom-on-Hudson.
O’Hara, p. 85.

Waterfront fuck pits.
McCourt, p. 328.

Dank black holes, full of creeping murmur and the poring dark.
McCourt, p. 332.

You cross under the rusting stanchions of the old elevated highway and walk out to the pier. The easterly light skims across the broad expanse of the Hudson. You step carefully as you approach the end of the rotting pier. You are none too steady and there are holes through which you can see the black, fetid water underneath.

McInerney, p. 10

The succeeding four nights have proven that New York is still a Babylon and a Sodom—if not more so. [Antiquity]
Reay, p. 67.
I had a copy of William Burroughs’s The Algebra of Need balanced on the ledge of the closed unloading dock door next to where we stood as we started getting it on we got involved, the situation becoming more and more intense and hot, the idea that if I was ever gonna make it with a guy that I loved and knew previously as a traveling buddy that this place in the predawn hours had to be the one right place in this fuckin’ city to do it.

Wojnarowicz, p. 123.

Remembering how when I was younger and was rejected by the sturdy rogue men ten years older than me whom I met within the dark avenues of the river, how I came close to telling them it didn’t matter, I had their images, their faces, and bodies and all the associations in my head to go home at leisure and lay down upon the warm sheets of a summer room and lay my hand to myself and have them anyway.

And I swung down over him, placed his hard cock in my mouth and immediately he began coming and I heard soft sounds come from his mouth and the darkness in the room moving, stirring with the low breeze over the sill.

I’m sitting in the park up on 15th Street, long after the sun’s gone down. I’m sitting there in the darkness under some trees on a bench and this seedy red-haired man in a cheap business suit suddenly walks over and slides onto the bench next to me, simultaneously mumbling something.

At some point a couple of bums walked by and I heard one yell, Hey you homos … get outta there.

Early in the morning in a coffee shop on 2nd Avenue and 11th Street, this dive coffeehouse where gunshots occasionally ring out and pimp types are murdered, drug stuff, petty gangsters, I’m sitting there in the fluorescent light watching the dawn come up, this strong sunlight over in the trees of the church on the uppermost parts of buildings yet the asphalt street below, the cool stone walls of the cemetery of St. Mark’s Church, everything cool blue like early dawn, a clarity that’s unreal, and these drag queens, three of them lifting their skirts up to the traffic, wind billowing up beneath the skirts, their brown slender arms waving, pulling the skirts almost over their heads, shaking their pantied asses at passing cars, laughing loudly, small shrieks: Oh baby! Lips painted and stretched against white teeth, one guy in the coffee shop, a fat white guy with faded blue tattoos on his huge sagging arms: Lookit them faggots. They get desperate after the sun comes up. One queen comes in assuming this overly feminine posture at the counter, leans towards the fat man: Order me 'a cup of tea, baby. I’ll be right back. Pats the place on the counter where she wants her tea and walks out, cuts up in the street laughing, fat man says to the Greek behind the counter: A cup of tea, she’ll be right back in… cup of tea, y’hear me? And she comes back in and sips at the tea after pouring a pound of sugar in and a dash of milk and her friend comes in and takes a few sips patting their lips with napkins, first one points to this cute counterman and says, What’s he, Puerto Rican? Says something in Spanish. Naw, says the fat man, Egyptian. Oh, says the drag queen. Oh, I’ve always wanted to take a trip up the Nile.

_Ibid._, pp. 194-5.

The trucks lined up silver and motionless, the numerous autos from Jersey and other parts all filled with motionless drivers waiting for someone of their private dreams to walk along softly and open the side door with a click and slide heavy and denimed into the front seat and the pale flash of belly and the motion of the tongue and the slide of hands and the sleeplessness of it all, the bright lights and lampposts burning continuously beneath the Westside Highway structures, the trucks barrel.

_Ibid._, p. 124.

For gay people in the 1970s it was like one person per 50 blocks, north, south, east and west.

_Lawrence_, p. 63.

Marlboro Man clones, with tattoos, cockrings, tit-clamps, cigars and ritual hot-ash frolics in cavernous back cellar rooms in the Meat Packing District, a program of order and conformity whose power to contain was surpassed only by its ability to define.

_McCourt_, p. 325.

Gay liberation had really exploded. Homosexual culture had really taken over—Donna Summer, disco, it was so boring. Suddenly in New York, it was cool to be gay, but it just seemed to be about suburbanites who sucked cock and went to discos.
McNeil, p. 275.

He would retire to the arms of a bevy of black drag-queens as some hotel on Eighth Street. The drag-queens would salve his wounds with an ego-satisfying flutter over his lily-white flesh.

Hamilton, p. 19.

Here was this kid with dance training coming out of his ears and he wasn’t doing a damn thing about it except running up and down Christopher Street, shrieking it up with other queens.

Ibid., p. 33.

One walked by doorways and saw young men in tight pants with their whole profile on display. And there were the many flagrant queens that used to fly up and down the street, not to mention the more sinister types that could be noticed if one paid attention.

Reay, p. 25.

The street queens did a little better. One I knew spent months working his way through the NYU faculty. It was geology one night, chemistry the next, and English literature for two nights running. He got quite a groove out of it. “They even talk to me once in a while! Of course, I don’t know what the hell they’re talking about, but it’s nice to hear them talk.” Too bad. With concentration he might have gone through all the freshman survey courses in the school!

Hamilton, p. 172.

The headquarters of the Gay Activist Alliance was an old firehouse on Wooster Street in SoHo. Dances were held there on Saturday nights as a manifest of “Our Place” as opposed to the Mafia-run gay bars in other parts of the city. For two dollars’ admission one could spend an evening immersed in tribal rites, with all the soda or beer one could drink. The street floor of the firehouse was the dance floor, with a circular staircase the Second-floor lounge and soda bar. The basement in Stygian darkness, included chairs, tables, and another soda bar.

The whole building, on Saturday nights, pulsed with the beat of rock music, but the main action was on the dance floor. When Lamont, Vernon, Michael, and I were going over there, it was early June, 1971, and hot, since the Firehouse didn’t have air conditioning. The higher the temperature went, the more clothes came off, down to the briefest of hot pants. The music blasted. The bodies writhed. The sweat poured. And the beat went on. Observing the melee from halfway up the circular staircase left no doubt in my mind about what was happening. It was a war dance. The contrast to the dancing at Christopher’s End and other dance bars was obvious. At the bars dancing was, by and large, part of the whole cruising process and had a sense of display about it. People danced for other people to see them and hopefully appreciate what they saw. Although plenty of cruising went on at the Firehouse, the dance floor wasn’t the place for peacock displays, but a celebration of post-Stonewall identity. “We are. We are together. And if you don’t like it, fuck off.”

Arms around each other, we wove our way to Christopher Street, steadying the trees and lamp posts as we went. We sang a little, sighed a lot, and exchanged incoherent profundities.

On weekend evenings, when there was sometimes a line out in front of Your Father’s Mustache and the smell of new-mown hay was in the air, gays I knew would take some pleasure in walking slowly past the place hand-in-hand or arm-in-arm pause at the corner, and go into some deathless swoon of an embrace—just to let the folks know whose territory it was. It was kind of silly in a serious kind of way. [Smell]

It started out pleasantly enough, wandering through a Middle Earth poster, but in the middle of a field he had the sudden sensation of falling down through the earth into a vast vaulted cavern, dimly lit with street lamps that he recognized as Central Park West. The floor of the cavern was covered with male bodies, still as they lay there. Still as he had seen them on beds all over New York. young bodies and old, fat and thin, black and white, stretched and huddled, a great, slow-breathing carpet of flesh that extended out until it was lost in the shadows of the chamber. He moved slowly between the bodies, searching. He’d see faces; some of them he’d remember but others were strangers. At least he thought they were strangers. Maybe he’d slept with them once, but he couldn’t remember. So many bodies. He could feel the heat of them in the chill of the cavern. He wanted to lie down and warm himself. But he had to keep hunting.
You should see this guy’s place. Apartment building with a doorman all dressed up. And you go up in the elevator, way up. His pad, it’s got a big living room and it looks out over the Park, with rugs all over, and this big stereo, and a bar with all kinds of bottles, and a color television set in the bedroom. He’s in some kind of thing down on Wall Street. He’s old, maybe even thirty, and he’s got it all together. He says like he’s bisexual, you know, and he likes guys and girls both. He gave me a drink. Then we smoked some grass and played a lot of his records—he’s big on Dionne Warwick—and he told me I had a nice body. After a while I was feeling real good and he let me take a shower. It was one of those crazy showers where the water comes out all around you, and being stoned, I felt like I was all alive—everything—and then we went into the bedroom to watch television, and he talked to me. I never had anybody talk to me like that, I mean, him being older, but talking to me just like I was, you know, his friend. Then he put his arms around me, and I was going to tell him I was straight, but he said he liked girls too, so it didn’t matter, and … after a while I came back home.

Heady stuff for a couple of kids from Queens.

The mating habits of gays, as Paul Goodman has pointed out, are highly democratic. A gay who is living with a coterie of addicts on welfare in some far reach of the East Village might move from there to some professional’s opulent pad on the Upper West Side. A street freak I knew who was a masochist found heaven—for-two with an industrialist on Park Avenue in the Eighties. “You better know it, he ties me up in velvet every night! It’s getting so I come just touching velvet!”

The St. Mark’s Baths, a plaque outside the door proclaims, is the site of the last townhouse of James Fenimore Cooper.

A few recreational facilities were provided for the blasé and the detumescent; the rest of the building was devoted to sex. There were nine floors. The first floor was the entrance, the second contained offices, the third the lockers; the next three floors housed the “rooms” and a TV room and gym; the floor above consisted of a communal shower and sauna; up more stairs to the Truck Stop, and the top floor contained so-called Fantasy Rooms.

If 'baths' is a misnomer, so is “rooms.” They were no more than cubicles, a double row of them encircled by a corridor, at least 30 on each floor. On the outer side of the corridor was blank wall—no windows anywhere, one was boxed in, secluded, secure—and the occasional uninviting lavatory and washroom. A cubicle was only large enough for a mattress and a chair. Most of the doors were closed, either because the tenant was busy elsewhere or because the room was occupied by a couple at work.

But some of the doors were open. In some cubicles the dim light exhibited a man languidly staring out into the corridor while he fondled his penis or otherwise displayed his best features to those who passed by. Some of these men looked battle-weary, but they must have been game for another bout, or else they’d have closed the door and taken a recuperative nap. In others men lay on their stomachs baring their buttocks. I was puzzled by the constant availability of the inmate of one cubicle. He as a lithe creature, with a mop of very dark hair and a shapely bottom—but his door was always open and it was clear no one wanted him. Chacun à son gout, of course, but he seemed a good deal more desirable, qua meat, than some of the other morsels that were more readily snapped up. Perhaps the cruisers knew something I didn’t: piles or an unattractive disposition.

Although these sexual invitations are transparent enough, the are not of course entirely open. The prospective partner lingers on the threshold and the two men look each other over and decide whether or not to commit unnatural acts. The succession of opening and closing doors implied considerable sexual athleticism, a determination to cram in as many sex acts as your body can take and muster. The silence in the air was punctuated with the grunts and cries of the compatible, but was also filled with the stillness of the undesired, hopelessly exhibiting their negligible charms to a parade of passers-by. In odd recesses stood couples of more exhibitionist inclination. One youth, with an ineffably bored expression, leaned against the wall gazing down onto the mobile head of another man who was energetically sucking him off. It spoke of a vast sexual indifference that was, if anything, more dispiriting than the meat market around the cubicles. Look on, stranger, I’m only making love.

Brook, pp. 96-7.

The streets were deserted and the snow had blanketed the city. It was a dangerous time to be out alone on the streets but it didn’t feel that way. How sweet even the grimy night air of New York seemed, now fresh and pastoral after the sour sweat-heavy atmosphere of the baths. [Smell] [Air]

_Ibid., p. 100._

Dark places and groping, almost certainly unsanitary hands.
McCourt, p. 40.

The Continental Baths, where chanteuse / gay icon Bette Midler performed poolside.
Atkins, p. 254.

The thing about the Everard is, it was just rooms and beds, tiny rooms and tiny beds. No tile and marble glories, no “fetish rooms.” Barebones bodies. A little steam, for tradition’s sake. But they made their own heat. You could imagine boys coming here to bathe—the tub in the kitchen being full of dirty dishes.

There was no music—so one could sleep... And the walls of the rooms did not reach the ceiling—you could hear everything—you couldn’t not hear everything. Slurping and moaning and everybody’s dish about everybody else... The entrance is a dream of cartoons... That a whole culture’s mating, food-finding, navigational and social behavior should converge at a single point on West 28th Street in New York City is certainly notable.
McCourt, pp. 189-94.

In reaction to the mustaches, flannel shirts, construction-worker boots, faded Levi’s, leather-tongued key rings and color-coded handkerchiefs, they, the old proud, dress in pressed chinos, button-down shirts and striped ties, and in rumpled pebble-weave tweeds, drink bourbon old fashioneds, stingers, brandy alexanders and awfully good old vintages. They smoke Lucky Strikes, Chesterfields, Pall Malls and Kents, and play and sing the golden oldies.
_Ibid., p. 324._

It was Gay Day parade day. Got in a cab and the driver was a happy faggot, he said, “Hi! Did you go to the parade?” and I just said, “What parade?” and he dropped the subject, talked about the weather (cab $5). (Sunday, June 30, 1985)
_Warhol, Diaries, p. 659._
New York seemed to be a sea of men: all 28, all dark-eyed, all handsome, and all named Luis.
Holleran, p. 10.

Sunday afternoons the mob of men spilling out of the waterfront bars was so huge it left you wondering why, with such numbers available, you still could not detail just one.

80s–90s / Drag Balls

1981: Gay is in, didn’t you know?
Morrisroe, p. 255.

It was the queens’ most baroque fantasies of glamour and stardom, all run on Singer sewing machines in tiny apartments.
Lawrence, p. 4.

One girl, a sexy Puerto Rican pre-op with luscious pouting lips who advertises her self as “DA MOST BEAUTYFULL TS IN DA BRONX.”
Harris, Diary p. 96.

At one event, Cleopatra arrived on a ceremonial float flanked by six servants waving white, glittering palm leaves; and at another, a 2,000-watt incandescent lamp was lit just as a fashion model flung open her Mylar-lined feathered coat, leaving the front rows momentarily blind.
Lawrence, p. 3.

The negro homosexuals still appear at intervals dressed in a baffling impersonation of their opposite sex. Sometimes a “Drag” (or costume ball) is announced... The raised stubble of chin and neck is pitted with a power that creates a blue bloom. The row of pearls accentuates, rather than camouflages, the Adam’s apple. Kid gloves cover the veined hands, but the feet are always a “give-away.”

Going to the annual Greenwich Village Halloween Parade as Mother Teresa.
McCourt, p. 258.
Holly Woodlawn and Candy Darling; Charles Ludlam, Charles Pierce, and Charles Busch; Ethyl Eichelberger; Dame Edna Everage; Lypsinka. McCourt, p. 257.

Voguing evolved into a contorted, jerky, slicing style of dance when drag queens incorporated kung fu aesthetics into their routines, having become familiar with the swift, angular movements of Bruce Lee and his co-stars while working trade inside Times Square’s porn cinemas, or heading there after a night’s work to get some rest. Ibid., p. 5.

In broad daylight, voguers headed to the abandoned stretches of the West Side piers, where they would hang out and practice moves, or to the clandestine space of gay-driven dance venues such as Better Days, the Paradise Garage and Tracks. Ibid., p. 6.

Beautiful femme queens and famous voguers, taken in their youth. Founding mothers Dorian Corey, Pepper LaBeija, Avis Pendavis, Angie Xtravaganza, Paris Dupree, Duchess LaWong. Ibid., p. 11.

In the early 1980s, leaving my house to go to balls at 3:30am was really just a bit too much. My family argued with me about going out, they were like, “Are you crazy? Where you going at this time?” And I would reply, “I’m leaving Brooklyn, riding the west side highway up to Harlem, looking at the sunrise, and then I’m going to a ball.” It was like a drug, you had to go, and you had to wait to the end for the grand prize. It was like, “You have to see Miss Avis come out there, honey.” Ibid., p. 61.

Not because I didn’t appreciate the Harlem Renaissance or my roots, I just didn’t like that 4 o’clock, 5 o’clock in the morning lifestyle. It almost felt to me like it was as if gay people shouldn’t be seen, so let’s go out in the wee hours of the morning and play around and do our thing, then run home before people can see us. I think it was a little safer for some of the drag queens back then, because they liked coming out when it was dark. But when they came downtown, I picked an area where people could feel safe, wear their fur coats and didn’t have to worry about this, that and the other.

I walked in Brooklyn, in the worst neighborhoods, in red leather pants, red leather shoes, beige sheepskin, beige shoes, finger-wave hairstyle and Gazelle glasses.

Light versus dark for butch queen face.

The top voguers were Ronald LeMay, Jose Xtravaganza, Jason Overness, Aldona Fields, Jerome Pendavis, and Brian Omni.

Park Slope in Brooklyn is a nascent “lesbian ghetto.”

Califia, p. 221.

The cross-dressers in the Village sniff at the influx of nuclear families as the fleeing nuclear families once sniffed at the cross-dressers. [Gentrification]

Gopnik, p. 10.

Late one drunken December night, did I bundle myself up and go to a corner bodega for a beer run in my makeup, wig, and heels, but I have never repeated this foolhardy excursion. In fact, I dread stepping out of my apartment in my getups as much as vampires dread stepping out into sunlight. I live in terror that my neighbors should discover what I am doing, that I should forget that I am made up (a surprisingly simple oversight) and come to the door to take a package they have accepted for me, or, horror of horrors, that I should be caught in the hallway or the elevator when, after the outside doors to the buzzers lock at 10:00 P.M., I am forced to go down to meet a trick in one of my clownish disguises. For these fantastic voyages, I wear sunglasses and hooded sweatshirts pulled tightly over my face, the costumes of a hysterical actress bent on avoiding the attention of her intrusive fans, but only attracting more of it by virtue of her ostentatious stealth. The building’s 10:00 curfew, imposed when the neighborhood was at the mercy of drug pushers and crack addicts, instills me with dread on those nights that I go on a drag bender, drunk and horny. To leave my apartment is to enter a war zone of unexpected encounters, ambushes by astonished families returning late from Grandma’s or packs of black teenage boys who smoke pot in the stairwells. I tell my tricks to hurry, to get here before 10:00, to do everything they can to arrive before the building’s security timer turns the bolt.

Harris, Diary, pp. 53-4.

Cruising [Flâneur]

Let’s suppose you are in a real city and you are a man and you are walking down the street, in the thick of the crowd. Glancing up from the pavement, for just a moment, you notice a man walking in your direction and he’s staring straight at you. Not every man fixes his stare before his feet at this violet hour, it seems. You don’t. His stare hits you right between your eyes. And not for the first time. You recognize him. He has looked at you in this way before—and he has seen you see him do this before. Let’s say he is about your age (whatever age that is) and he is wearing a suit, like you. You two could be twins, in the dark.

You don’t know why, or rather, you don’t at this particular moment ask yourself why, but you hold the gaze of this man who is now walking closer to you and who refuses not to look. Seconds pass, perhaps as many as five or six, but it seems like longer. Time slows down for you, as it always does in situations like these. In an instant, the gaze between you two is broken—you look down, or perhaps he looks away. Maybe someone passes between you, or something else diverts your attention. It’s noisy, with the sound of horns and motors, but it could be anything. As quickly as the moment came upon you, it is lost. Almost. You look back, behind you, and see that he, too, is looking back behind him.

You are hurrying... in order to catch a train because you have a family to go home to, a ready-made microwave meal awaits, probably kids, the lot. You don’t want to be late, not again, not again this week anyway. You look forward to your train journey, because this is your time, your very own time, the time between two lives, someone might say.

On the train home, settled into your seat, and for reasons you cannot explain to yourself or for reasons you really don’t understand, the man on the street—your man on the street, handsome with a nice suit—comes back into your mind. He was never very far out of your mind, if truth be told. You are going a little red in the cheeks at the thought of it, even now. Did you go red in the cheeks when he was looking at you? Was it the blush of shame or the blush of desire? Do you know the difference between shame and desire? These are questions you could ask yourself, but don’t.

Instead, you wonder if one day this man will speak to you. Speak to me, you think. Why do you never speak. What are you thinking? I never know what you are thinking.

Turner, pp. 13-14.

Can we talk about a network of cruisers rather than occasional and seemingly isolated, if not accidental, encounters?

Ibid., p. 123.

While walking the street, my gaze would be riveted on stalwart adolescents, and I would have to look back at the handsomest that passed. If a street-car conductor happened to be youthful and good-looking, I became almost irrational. With a look of despair I would gaze insolently and imploringly into the face of the blue-clad youth as if I would compel him to read my thoughts, since I did not dare give them expression. When in a crowded car he brushed against me in passing, a tremor would pass over my body. Youthful policemen also at this time particularly fascinated me. Blue clothing and brass buttons have always made a young man appear to me as at his best.

Ibid., pp. 129-30.

So we are taking off our masks, are we, and keeping / our mouths shut? As if we’d been pierced by a glance’—that later leads us to ‘the merits of each / of the latrines. 14th Street is drunken and credulous, / 53rd tries to tremble but is too at rest

Ibid., p. 148.

What does it mean when two men look at each other in the streets of the modern city?

Ibid., p. 43.

Mere eye contact and an exchange of words.

Ibid., p. 61.

Reciprocal gazes may hold their own pleasures for some, and the dynamics of the gaze may be erotic and stimulating precisely because it does not end in sex.

Ibid., p. 61.
This chance encounter—"the magnetism of our meeting."
_Ibid._, p. 89.

The cruiser queers the _flâneur._
_Ibid._, p. 62.

Cruising is a practice that exploits the ambivalence of the modern city, and in so doing, ‘queers’ the totalizing narratives of modernity, in particular, _flânerie._
_Ibid._, p. 46.

There’s an art to cruising and it has a lot to do with timing and with the eyes. Take eyes first. You’re walking down the street and you pass a man going in the opposite direction. Your eyes lock but you both keep on moving. After a few paces you glance back and see that the man has stopped and is facing a store window but looking in your direction. If he’s not exactly the partner you’re searching for you’ll probably register the compliment his stare is paying you but leave it at that.

But if he does catch your fancy you may go through the little charade of examining the shop window nearest you. After a bit, the frequency and intensity of exchanged glances will increase and one of you will stroll over to the other. There are a few safe and stock opening lines banal to the point of absurdity... After these preliminaries you may extend your hand, introduce yourself, ask him his name and suggest you have a drink together. [Display]
_Ibid._, pp. 56-7.

I remember when I lived in a storefront next door to a meat packing house on East Sixth Street. One very fat meat packer who always ate at the same diner on the corner that I ate at followed me home and asked if he could come in and see my paintings. Once inside he instantly unzipped his blood-stained white pants and pulled out an enormous dick. He asked me to touch it and I did. As repulsive as it all was, it was exciting too, and I didn’t want to hurt his feelings. But then I said I had to go out and he said, “Let’s get together,” and I said, “No’ but he was very insistent so I said, “Yes.” He was very fat and ugly and really very disgusting, so when the time came for our date I went out for a walk. But who should I run into on the street but him, all dressed up and spanking clean. I felt bad that I had to tell him that I had changed my mind. He offered me money but I said no.

Port Authority Bus Terminal’s “meat rack,” near the departure gates.
McNamara, p. 27.

For open secret tea-room ceremonies. Tea ceremonies are properly held in tea houses, true, but the tea room at Port Authority was the side of a half-floor in the fabled Dakota Apartments overlooking Central Park West. Two seemingly endless rows of urinals, as many as at Radio City Music hall—with as many semaphoric penises as a full kick line of Rockette’s legs… and in the stalls, you might way, apropos tea ceremonies, there was a kind of Zen operation insofar as the mediator was summoned to contemplation of a symmetry without the burden of any attendant meaning.

So he’s in the tea room at 59th and Lexington, of course on the uptown side, and he sees scribbled on the stall wall, For a nice accommodation, [sic] call Regent 4—, and for the first time in his life is impelled to scribble a reply: There are two c’s and two m’s in accommodation, Mary.

McCourt, p. 92.

To cater to the flood of tourists, dozens of self-consciously picturesque tearooms sprang up, with names that suggested… “a tinted zoology”—the Black Parrot, the Purple Pup, the Green Witch, the Vermillion Hound. (cf. The Bird Circuit of gay bars [Alcohol])

Burns, p. 327.

Old cops always called the tea rooms the nickelodeons.
McCourt, p. 94.

One’s social performance in subway toilets.

I’ve never understood how anybody can do business in such places, with express trains roaring by at regular intervals.

I get vertigo in the Ramble, dear—all those precipitous declivities. [Central Park]

Moving along at warp speed from a single encounter on Eighth Street.
Santos measures his success by his earnings. He is sure that he has done as well, if not better, than most of the boys who loiter around Forty-second Street between Broadway and Eighth Avenue, a street known by homosexuals as the “Meat Market.” Here hoodlum homosexuals meet prospective customers and arrange the details of payment, the form of sex play, and the place where it is to occur. Santos says that his usual fee is $1. On one evening he took in as much as $6 for three sexual experiences.

A few flagrantly exhibitionistic fairies are able to make a living through the sexual gratification of men who are interested in their type of service. Ordinarily, however, the hustler is the one who is paid by the “queen,” “bitch,” “fag,” or “fairy”—that is, by an effeminate exhibitionist who not only brazenly proclaims his homosexuality to the interested, but attempts to force it on the notice of others. Like the female prostitute, the effeminate male prostitute has a more masculine male prostitute somewhere in the offing to whom he contributes and who serves as his protector. Sometimes these protectors are gangsters. Emotional attachments between fairies of Santos’ type and their protectors are ephemeral affairs.

Blue Movie

The big nude theater craze hit in ’69. It was only the year before that police had stood by in San Francisco to arrest the Living Theater performers if they so much as started taking their clothes off. Then all of a sudden the new thing was for performers to take all their clothes off and dance around completely naked on stage in long-playing well-advertised shows like Oh! Calcutta! and Dionysus in ’69.

During this period I took thousands of Polaroids of genitals. Whenever somebody came up to the Factory; no matter how straight-looking he was, I’d ask him to take his pants off so I could photograph his cock and balls. It was surprising who’d let me and who wouldn’t.

Personally, I loved porno and I bought lots of it all the time—the really dirty, exciting stuff. All you had to do was figure out what turned you on, and then just buy the dirty magazines and movie prints that are right for you, the way you’d go for the right pills or the right cans of food. (I was so avid for porno that on my first time out of the house after the shooting I went straight to 42nd Street and checked out the peep shows with Vera Cruise and restocked on dirty magazines.)

I'd always wanted to do a movie that was pure fucking, nothing else, the way Eat had been just eating and Sleep had been just sleeping. So in October '68 I shot a movie of Viva having sex with Louis Waldon. I called it just Fuck.

At first we kept it at the Factory; screening it occasionally for friends. Then, when we opened Lonesome Cowboys in May and it began to die pretty quickly, we had to think about what to replace it with, and I wondered if it should be Fuck.

I was still confused about what was legal in pornography and what wasn't, but at the end of July, what with all sorts of dirty movies playing around town and dirty magazines like Screw on every newsstand, we thought, oh, why not, and put Fuck into the Garrick Theater after changing the title to Blue Movie. It ran a week before getting seized by the cops. They came all the way down to the Village, sat through Viva's speeches about General MacArthur and the Vietnam war, through Louis calling her tits "dried apricots," and through her story about the police harassing her in the Hamptons for not wearing a bra, etc., etc., etc. and then they seized the print of our movie. Why, I wondered, hadn't they gone over to Eighth Avenue and seized things like Inside Judy's Box or Tina's Tongue? Were they more "socially redeeming," maybe? It all came down to what they wanted to seize and what they didn't, basically. It was ridiculous.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 372-3.

I knew that we were probably going to have more trouble with the censors soon—at least if our movies kept getting attention and I guess I must have known in the back of my mind that it would be a smart idea to have at least one really articulate performer in each movie. The legal definition of "obscenity" had that "without redeeming social value" phrase in it, and it occurred to me that if you found someone who could look beautiful, take off her clothes, step into a bathtub, and talk as intellectually as Viva did ("You know, Churchill spent six hours a day in his tub"), you'd have a better chance with the censors than if you had a giggly teenager saying, "Let me feel your cock." It was all just silly legal strategy, though, because to me they were all great, all just people being their real selves on camera and I liked them all the same.

Ibid., p. 289.
The Factory was dark. It took me a moment to figure out what was going on, and when I did I knew Ondine wasn’t there. Andy was torturing several people, several rich people judging by the little gleam of jewelry at everyone’s throat and wrist, and by the smell; the rich have a certain smell when they are upset, like good food going bad. I saw little screams for help shine in the ladies’ eyes, and heard the soft groans from their husbands as they twisted in their chairs. Oblivious, Andy calmly loaded another reel of his twenty-four hour movie called Fuck. He knew they were unhappy, but he always thought if he just showed them a little more they would finally understand or maybe even like it. Tonight he was projecting two separate scenes and soundtracks onto the same screen at the same time. The result was excruciating; the very air was turning black with pressure as the bright flickers of pain shot through it. To make matters worse, one of the uncomfortable women sat very near a famous art critic who was watching this mess with a cigar in his mouth and an anonymous dick in each of his hands, the owners of which lay stoned on either side of him on the silver couch. I was happy to see the rich had to go to hell too, and I would have stayed to enjoy their discomfort but I was more interested in finding Ondine. I told Andy I had to run. [Smell] Wornov, pp. 89-107.

The Bryant that had featured “Live Sex Shows,” which, at five performances a day between ten and ten, were exactly that: a brown or black couple spent twenty minutes on a bare blue-lit stage, first the woman stripping for the man, then fellating him, then his performing cunnilingus on her, and finally the two of them screwing in two or three positions, finishing—with pull-out orgasms for a few of the after-six shows—to polite applause from the largely forty-plus male audience, before the porn film started once more. At the back of the chest-high wall behind the last row of orchestra seats, usually some guy would give you a hand job or sometimes a blow job; there for a couple of weeks (I gave my quota of both) was simply a south-side vacant lot. Delany, pp. 17-8.

Just as Manhattan liberals of a few years before had sought to rub elbows with student revolutionaries and Black Panthers (a trend satirized by Tom Wolfe as “radical chic”), so now the smart set indulged in “porn chic,” joining the raincoat brigade at Times Square theaters to see Deep Throat and such films as The Devil in Miss Jones.
(1972) and Behind the Green Door (1972) in order to claim front line credentials in the sexual revolution.

Prostitution

"The capital of dangerous love."

Berman, Town, p. 112.

Where the girls with thirsty eyes go by.

[...] With the man I love who loves me not
  I walked in the street-lamps flare—
  But oh, the girls who can ask for love
  In the lights of Union Square.

Teasdale, p. 50.

Reformers: think of prostitution not social evil but as an answer to a human need.

Peretti, p. 29.

If you don't like my gate why did you swing on it, why didja swing on it anyhow

Crane vows to withdraw from "beckonings and all that draws you into doorways, subways, sympathies, rapports and the City's complicated devastations."

Conrad, p. 226.

Preludes to solicitation: A woman on Times Square acted very suspiciously, but she explained, "The reason I winked at you was that I didn't want anybody else to see me. You have to be somewhat careful around the City of New York."

Peretti, p. 43.

The detectives tried to glean conclusions from the most ambiguous female body language.

At the Dreamland dance hall in Harlem in 1931, a hostess exposed her breast to detective "B" and suggested that he kiss it. On his second visit in 1932 to a massage parlor on West 70th Street an investigator disrobed for a session. A masseuse removed the towel from his loins, put oil on her hands, and tried to “stimulate his private parts,” while another offered him a “tongue bath.”

_Ibid._, p. 44.

The girls winked and jeered, made lascivious gestures at passing males. They pulled at coat-tails and cajoled men with fake honeyed words. They called their wares like pushcart peddlers.

_Gold_, p. 15.

The girls were naked under flowery kimonos. Chunks of breast and belly flashed. Slippers hung from their feet; they were always ready for business.

_Ibid._, p. 15.

Earth’s trees, grass, flowers could not grow on my street; but the rose of syphilis bloomed by night and by day.

_Ibid._, p. 15.

... old New York hookers rarely retire. They just move to Chicago or Duluth.

_Petronious_, p. 71.

New York is the hooker melting pot of the world... New York features at least 3,000 hookers. Each grosses an average of between $15,000 and $20,000 a year. Mostly tax free... Very few girls come to New York exclusively to pursue hookerdom. In fact, no more than 3% of New York’s hookers came here with hustling in mind as their destined career. Most usually land with some more noble aspiration in mind... and then gradually settle down to pursue this most classical and traditional career for as long as possible.

_Ibid._, p. 72.

The majority of New York’s vice girls are foreign. They’re often superbly shrewd beauties who have maneuvered their way to the United States through various methods. Many of them were war brides, temporarily charming the lonesome GI and dumping him shortly after marriage and citizenship.

It takes a special cunning for the ones who get here... But the foreign girl who was so desirable overseas loses much of that notorious European feminity in the process. The men who rave about those “magnificent European women, so much better, more understanding that U.S. girls” would swallow those fatuous words if they examined the relocated product once she has settled in New York or points west.
Ibid., p. 76.

Hunter College, New York University and Columbia all contribute their share of educated ladies of leisure to the sexual vortex of the city. There has also been a contingent of college girls who hook for prestige. They actually brag about their sexual adventures as an index of their social emancipation. Paid pros regard them with great distaste.
Ibid., p. 76.

The garment, jewelry, furniture, hardware, fur districts and many other centralized industries abounding in New York all have a need for hookers. For themselves and hundreds of customers from all over the world who pass through for business.
Ibid., p. 77.

... there has been a larger call for colored girls, and shortage of same. The quality of the colored girls who hook has gone down... the top colored hookers in New York are always quite light, unusually beautiful and rarely have dealings with Negro men... except for those in very high and powerful stations.
Ibid., p. 79.

The United Nations is one of the largest users of hookers. They have an assembly of choice prostitutes at their disposal. A girl considers a UN diplomat or any foreign emissary a genuine prize. They are all exceedingly generous with their nation’s money and extra gifts; most court the prostitutes extravagantly. They’re also all great leads for the wealthier members of their countries who drop in on the States and like to meet a nice girl. Have tons of money, want to swing.
Ibid., p. 85.

Times Square: “There may never have been such a vast variety of women thrown together in any one place before. A small proportion of these women were prostitutes, professionally offering many varieties of sex, and appealing to customers in every class. Other women, sexual amateurs (though often fairly sophisticated), offered themselves to coworkers, bosses, or customers, sometimes in hope of a respectable marriage, other times settling for cruder satisfactions like furs, jewels, and rent money. Some would have died rather than give up their premarital virginity, yet sought alluring ways to present their sexuality in the ways they dressed and moved and spoke.”
   Berman, Town, p. 110.

   On sunshiny days the whores sat on chairs along the sidewalks. They sprawled indolently, their legs taking up half the pavements. People stumbled over a gauntlet of whores’ meaty legs.
   Gold, p. 15.

   Walked along the West Side Highway structure, roaring autos and grainy darkness, filthy streets with the tugboat strike, a few transvestites out hooking in the shadows of the girder stanchions.
   Wojnarowicz, p. 115.

   I tell the chauffeur to head over to the meat-packing district just west of Nell’s, near the bistro Florent, to look for prostitutes.
   Ellis, Psycho, 168.

   Manhattan go-go bars are really sleazy. The owners sometimes want you to go into the back rooms to do hand jobs on the creeps.
   Mueller, p. 147.

   Tricks at the St. Regis.
   Quan, p. 97.

   Down on the West Side Highway, a lone hooker totters on heels and tugs at her skirt as if no one had told her that the commuters won’t be coming through the tunnels from Jersey today. Coming closer, you see that she is a man in drag.
   McInerney, p. 9.

   Hookers and office workers do not wear the same kind of high heels, stockings, skirts, foundation garments, wigs, or makeup, and these items do not mean the same things, either.
   Califia, p. 219

   The Tenderloin was represented by persons who seemed to forget for a moment the trade that brought them there.
   Napgood, pp. 369-71.

   They don’t start walking the streets until midnight, if that’s what you’re after.
Spillane, p. 186.

Coda

The only happy people left in New York are the Lesbians and pederasts, and they are so happy they are miserable. Nobody else has anything.
Van Vechten, p. 70.

I was too unnerved by the ominous sounds of distant sirens and the honking horns of cars confused by the failure of the traffic lights to enjoy the sex, which seemed distinctly ill-omened, as if it were out last fuck, the last desperate gropes of a couple doomed to die before sunset, the twilight of Western civilization as we knew it.
Harris, Diary p. 99.
Coney Island is the dress rehearsal for Manhattan. Koolhaas, p. 27.

For Lorca, Coney Island becomes “Landscape of the Vomiting Multitude” and Battery Park “Landscape of the Urinating Multitude.” Walton, p. 22.

What would a Jones Beach of the mind be like? Berman, Solid, p. 297.

Reginald Marsh on Coney Island: “I’m nauseated by the smell of stale food, but after that I get so I don’t notice it.” Kasson, p. 93.

Unreality is as greedily craved by the mob as alcohol by the dipsomaniac. Ibid., p. 96.

It attracted people because of the way in which it mocked the established social order. It in effect declared a moral holiday for all who entered its gates. Against the values of thrift, sobriety, industry, and ambition, it encouraged extravagance, gaiety, abandon, revelry. Coney signaled the rise of a new mass culture no longer deferential to genteel tastes and values, which demanded a democratic resort of its own. It served as a Feast of Fools for an urban-industrial society... As a city of festivity and play, Coney Island challenged conventional categories of social description. It appeared to be a new kind of cultural institution, and commentators groped for analogies to describe it: “an almost uninterrupted French fête,” “a medieval street fair,” a “fiesta and mardi-gras,” a “charivari,” and, again and again, a “carnival.”... In Coney’s permissive environment customers felt a giddy sense of irresponsibility. Among the most popular attractions... were booths with imitation china dishes, objects to throw at them, and a sign: “If you can’t break up your own home, break up ours!”... Factory “girls” pretended they occupied loftier positions and played the parts of stenographers and private secretaries for a day; and a Brooklyn shopkeeper would don her best clothes and act the part of a grand dame. More dramatically, a prim-looking “schoolmarm,” accustomed to curbing the childish excesses of others, surrendered to her own at Coney Island and walked fully dressed into the sea.

Arriving as separate, isolated figures, they became actors in a vast, collective comedy. The flamboyantly expressive surroundings had the effect of garbing customers in costumes and eliciting their own theatricality. At various moments on rides they might briefly grab the spotlight and attract the attention of the multitude; at other times they might sit in the balconies and watch their fellow revelers. The lines between spectator and performer, between professional entertainer and seeker of amusement, blurred at Luna Park.

My analyst says I exaggerate my childhood memories, but I swear I was brought up underneath the roller coaster in the Coney Island section of Brooklyn. Maybe that accounts for my personality, which is a little nervous, I think.

A ferry ride to Coney became for middle- and working-class people a substitute for a steamship cruise abroad and Luna Park a Cook’s tour in miniature.

Though Luna Park provided benches, the owners hated to see customers sitting on them, for the in effect they were removing themselves as actors in the spectacle and becoming a potentially detached and critical audience. When people sat down, they would immediately dispatch a band of musicians to the scene in attempt to rouse their customer’s spirits and thus bring them to their feet. (cf. Monaghan: “Celotex Traffic Top, a “new material that takes the strain out of walking.” [World’s Fair 1939])

The importance of sustaining the illusion of anarchic freedom and heedless release beneath the underlying reality of control underlay all of Luna Park and Coney Island as a whole. The various rides were based upon the ability to coordinate mass activity through technology, to assemble and disperse crowds at will without making such efforts oppressive.

All of Coney Island’s intricate machines and amusements were unproductive, promising customers nothing more than the pleasure of the event itself; that was central to their character as play. But the particular forms this play took were significant. In the effort to suggest a dream or nightmare world, Coney abstracted features from the larger society and presented them in intensified, fantastic forms. Instruments of production and efficiency were transformed into objects of amusement, and life around them lifted from dull routine to exhilarating pageantry.

This process is particularly striking in the case of the mechanized rides at Luna and elsewhere in Coney Island. These marked the culmination of a desire, evident throughout the nineteenth century and into the twentieth, not simply to view technology in utilitarian terms but to value it as spectacle. Generations of Americans had thrilled in viewing huge steam engines, thundering locomotives, and other powerful machinery as sublime creatures harnessed to do their bidding. Mechanical amusement rides allowed them to cultivate the delight, awe, and fear of the technological sublime still more intensely.

If an embargo were placed on noise at Coney, if silence were required, there would be a lot of people who would lose their jobs. If the transactions of the mongers were carried on in the sign language, there would be money in manicuring. [Sound]

Luna appealed to popular notions of magnificence. Illusions of extravagance and ostentatious display provided a holiday compensation for the plainness and thrift required of everyday life. Before the mansions of the rich on New York’s Fifth Avenue they might feel humbled and excluded, but here they could feel assured. Luna Park, in effect, democratized the hunger for aristocratic splendor that was driving rich industrialists to construct palatial houses at the turn of the century. It provided a Newport for the masses.

Kasson, p. 66.
Luna turned night into day, a feat which symbolized its topsy-turvy order. Its buildings dramatically altered their appearance [via colored lights] to achieve an even more festive air and invited visitors to do the same.

Ibid., p. 66.

Coney Island's nighttime landscape complements the plaster architecture of days: not rectangular signboards propped above modest, boxy, commercial buildings, but a delicate tracery of bulbs, draped like glittering necklaces over the romantic structures of a shimmering fairyland.

Sanders, Celluloid, pp. 30-1.

The Infant Incubator exhibit, at Luna Park in Coney Island, among midway attractions like the Streets of Delhi and Trip to the Moon, were a consistently popular attraction from 1903 until the exhibit closed 40 years later. Stranger still is that the exhibit was, by all accounts, medically and ethically sound. Visitors to the exhibit viewed rows of tiny infants dozing in their incubators while a lecturer explained the workings of the life-saving machines. The Incubators closed when the cost of maintaining the exhibit became too great amid the general cheapening of Coney Island entertainments.

Goldenberg, pp. 17-8.

Luna Park's "Human Toboggan."
Kasson, p. 78.

A Luna Park ride in the shape of a huge tobacco pipe, in which patrons entered at the mouthpiece and slid out the bowl.

Ibid., p. 78.

steep mountains for tolling at absurd speeds Depero, "Coney Island," p. 422.

climb descend climb descend
Abril, p. 432.

Such rides served in effect as powerful hallucinogens, altering visitors' perceptions and transforming their consciousness, dispelling everyday concerns in the intense sensations of the present moment. They allowed customers the exhilaration or whirlwind activity without physical exertion, of thrilling drama without imaginary effort.

Kasson, p. 82.
Coney Island is a problem for interpreters of the city because it can be a lesson in the glad democracy of human fates or in their individual insignificance. It aggravates the psychological problem of the city: are we akin to our neighbors, or do we dissever ourselves from them in gloating at them?
Conrad, p. 96.

Dreamland contained a Lilliputian village inhabited by 300 midgets.
Kasson, p. 86.

Midgets, giants, fat ladies, and ape-men were both stigmatized and honored as freaks... Their grotesque presences heightened the visitors' sense that they had penetrated a marvelous realm of transformation, subject to laws all its own. The popular distorting mirrors furnished the illusion that the spectators themselves had become freaks. Thus it seemed charged with a magical power to transmute customary appearances into fluid new possibilities.
_Ibid._, pp. 50-51.

Coney boasted its own "Streets of Cairo." Visitors stared at camels and warily fed elephants, not in a circus setting but as participants in a drama that attempted within its means to suggest the mysteries of the Orient.
_Ibid._, p. 53.

Showmen vied with one another in re-creating such famous disasters as "The Fall of Pompeii," simulating the eruption of Mount Vesuvius and the death of 40,000 people, the eruption of Mount Pelée and devastation of Martinique in 1902, Pennsylvania's Johnston Flood of 1889, and Texas Galveston Flood of 1900. For the first live disaster spectacle Luna chose a scene closer to home. In 'Fire and Flames' a four-story building was repeatedly set ablaze, the fire battled by heroic firemen while residents leaped from upper windows into safety nets below. [Triangle Shirtwaist Fire] [Apocalypse] [Nature]

The day that Luna Park burned to the ground. The year was 1944. There was a sudden stirring on the beach, a movement away from the surf to the boardwalk, and then great clouds of black smoke piling into the cobalt sky. You could hear voices: Luna Park's on fire. People were running then, and we could hear the sirens of the Fire Department and saw high arcs of water rising in a beautiful way and falling into the flames. We watched for hours, drawn as New Yorkers always are to the unity of disaster, and saw the rides and buildings collapse into black, wet rubble until there was no more Luna Park.

Hamill, "Lost," N. cit.

Following the great fire that destroyed Steeplechase Park, a sign appeared: “Admission to the Burning Ruins – 10 cents.”

Kasson, p. 112.

Sex

In the mechanical metropolis, the body is cordoned off from exhibition and discloses itself either tawdrily at burlesque shows or in a wrestling adipose mass on the beach.

Conrad, p. 95.

Sunday, July 28, 1940, Coney Island, 4 p.m. A sweaty compendium of overlapping limbs. Standing or sitting on one another’s shoulders, an undiscriminating family of flesh. They’re all just meat.

Ibid., p. 252.

There may be a million bodies on the beach, but none of them is much concerned about any of the others.

Ibid., p. 96.

Time was when Coney’s transgressions were crimson and its sinners wore silks and sables.

Lait, p. 141.

On the beach: crowd of over a MILLION . . . (I wonder who counts them) has no order except the carnal common denominator. We all have bodies ("undressing is permitted on the beach"), and we’re all therefore voyeurs. [Voyeur]

Conrad, p. 252.

Coney as alfresco life class; Reginald Marsh carried anatomy textbooks with him to the beach, where a million near naked bodies could be seen at once, a phenomenon unparalleled in history.

Ibid., p. 96.
Marsh was ambitious to paint murals, reinterpreting the city’s public spaces as idylls of surfeit and athletic sensuality. His Coney Island with its wrestling musclemen is a tribute to Michelangelo’s bathing soldiers; his Luna Park with its barrage of indiscriminate bodies is an orgiastic heaven based on the hell of Michelangelo’s “Last Judgment”; his nocturnal Central Park in a painting of 1932, with patrolling sailors and tempting girls trailing off to couple in leafy alcoves, is a scene of unprotesting ravishment that corrects Rubens’s “Abduction of the Daughters of Leucippus.” [Central Park]

Ibid., p. 98.

A male beauty contest held at Coney Island’s Washington Baths in the summer of 1929 took an unexpected turn. To the surprise of a Variety reporter who served as one of the judges, most of the people who gathered to watch the contest were men. Add to her further surprise, most of the men participating in the contest wore paint and powder. On a packed beach on a hot summer afternoon, gay men had taken over a male beauty contest, becoming its audience, its contestants, its stars.

Chauncey, p. 184.

1939–40: “Coney Island has one truly amazing bath... It gives the visitor the impression of being exclusively homosexual. If one visits the roof there is the spectacle of at least a hundred naked males practically all of them homosexuals, with a few hustlers and kept boys about, lying around in the sun. The more direct homosexual expression is reserved for the steam rooms. There, in an atmosphere murky with steam—so murky, indeed, that one cannot see more than a few feet ahead—with benches around the walls, fellation and pedication are not at all uncommon. If one stumbles over a pair in the act, one mutters a hasty apology and goes on quickly in another direction.”

The body discloses itself at the cost of a licentious vulgarization. Spectators glimpse underwear on the slippery slides at Luna Park with a roar of natural “vulgar mirth,” and on the beach the women look like soft sandstone sculptures, full of the real “vulgar” human life.

Conrad, p. 96.

Bert Savoy, famously struck by lightning on that very Coney Island promenade when during a summer storm he talked back to a thunderbolt, declaring, “That’ll be enough out of you, Miss God!”

McCourt, p. 19-20.

Gay men gathered on the city’s beaches, which were enormously popular in the decades before air conditioning. A large group of deaf gay men regularly gathered on one of the city’s beaches in the 1940s. [Air Conditioning]

Chauncey, p. 197.

Body-builders at Coney Island as pagan gods. [Antiquity]

Conrad, p. 114.

Coney Island has been a Paradise for me that way—as it would be: my type goes there—the rough, tough proletarian; they dress for Coney Island in fetish clothing (to me), and they proceed to reduce that clothing to a fascinating minimum. And on the beach, ah the beach, with its beautiful Italians! no.cit.

Instead of the burlesque show, he frequented the locker room at the West Side YMCA on 63rd Street and the changing sheds at Jones Beach where, in 1933 and 1935, he watched the boisterous divinities of his agora at play. Those at the Y soap and deodorize their toned-up bodies, erotically fraternizing, as the conventions of that room allow them to do, without suspicion; those at Jones Beach, with the grins of proletarian satyrs, flick each other with wet towels. n.cit.

Coney

Samuel Gottscho’s stunning photograph Luna Park, Coney Island (1906) shows hundreds of dazzling lights but only two words—‘WILD ANIMALS.’ [Nature] [Photography]

Sharpe, p. 191.

This particularly long, thin slice of island-peninsula was so densely populated with rabbits in the seventeenth century that the Dutch called it Conyné Eylant (the “island of rabbits”).

Maffi, p. 7.

The elephant, Topsy, belonged to the Forepaugh Circus and spent the last years of her life at Coney Island’s Luna Park. Because she had killed three men in as many years (including a severely abusive trainer who attempted to feed her a lit cigarette), Topsy was deemed a threat to people by her owners and killed by electrocution on January 4, 1903, at the age of 28. Inventor Thomas Edison captured the event on film. He would release it later that year under the title Electrocuting an Elephant.

A means of execution initially discussed was hanging. However, the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals protested and other ways were considered. Edison then suggested electrocution with alternating current, which had been used for the execution of humans since 1890.

To reinforce the execution, Topsy was fed carrots laced with 460 grams of potassium cyanide before the deadly current from a 6,600-volt AC source was sent coursing through her body. She was dead in seconds. The event was witnessed by an estimated 1,500 people and Edison’s film of the event was seen by audiences throughout the United States.

When Luna Park burned down in 1944, the fire was referred to as “Topsy’s Revenge.” [Death] [Nature] [Cinema] [Spectacle] “Topsy (elephant).” N. cit.

The wires were dragged over. Topsy immediately complied when she was instructed to raise her right foot for the first death sandal.

“Not so vicious,” a reporter remarked aloud.

Topsy seemed less a wild animal than a mild one. Another reporter later wrote, “She stood still in the application as quietly as could be asked, obeying all commands of the men even when telling her to get down on her knees.”

After the second electrode was fitted on her rear left foot and she was again standing, Topsy did become mildly bothered. She shook off the electrode on her forefoot, but soon it was secured again and there she stood, nearly three decades after being torn from her mother and smuggled into America, where she had traveled tens of thousands of miles in perpetual servitude, endured innumerable beatings, and survived more than a dozen train wrecks. Her big dark eyes with their extravagant elephantine lashes glimmered with what a reporter discerned to be still at her core.

“There was real benevolence in her eyes and kindness in her manner,” the Tribune reported.

The amusement park’s press agent stepped up to act out the ultimate metaphor for his profession, feeding Topsy three carrots filled with a total of 460 grams of potassium cyanide. She took and gobbled one after another, playfully curling her trunk.
The motion picture camera had been shifted around so that Topsy was in center frame and one of the cloth banners on the platform was in full view over her left shoulder.

If the gobbling of the carrots was filmed, it never made public view. The Edison crew was there to film, and the Luna Park people were there to stage, an electrocution, not a poisoning. The big worry was that the cyanide might cause her to collapse before the electricity brought her down. The third carrot was no sooner swallowed than the Edison plant got the awaited signal on the phone.

"All right!"

The camera was running and recorded Topsy again trying to shake off the electrode on her right forefoot. The electrode stayed in place. She set her foot back down and was standing motionless when the 6,600 volts coursed through the wires and the electrician, Thomas, closed the switch at the park. There were flashes and small blue flames and then smoke began to curl up from where copper met foot. Some would describe the smell as that of burning flesh, others that of burning hoof. The pain must have been excruciating and her huge form shook violently.

"Turn the current off!" a Luna employee cried out.

The smoke rose up around her flanks and she pitched forward into it, tipping to the right as her right foreleg buckled. The chain on her left leg grew taut with the fall, restraining her even in her last instant, drawing the limb straight out, displaying the electrode at the bottom of the foot. The electrode had stopped smoking. The current had been turned off after ten seconds.

Once the motion picture camera stopped filming, the donkey engine was set to work, cinching the noose tight around Topsy’s neck and holding it tight for a full ten minutes. Only then, when she had been triply killed and there was not the slightest chance that she was alive, did the three veterinary surgeons approach and pronounce her dead.

Topsy was measured and it was recorded that she was ten feet tall and ten feet, eleven inches long. The autopsy was then performed on the spot. The heart and stomach were removed for the biology department at Princeton University. The taxidermist Hubert Vogelsang began skinning her. Some of the hide would be used to cover Thompson’s office chair and two of the legs would be fashioned into umbrella holders. Thompson would tell people that the hide and leg came from the world-famous Jumbo. The head was buried in a remote, unmarked patch behind the stables.

The many witnesses to the electrocution concurred that Topsy had died without making a sound. There is no way of knowing if, in those final instants, she had made one of those cries below the level of human hearing, which a scientist of the next millennium would term a contact call and explain as a simple message elephants in the wild send to other elephants across great distances of savannah and jungle. Such a cry would have carried past the gawkers and across the grounds and the beach beyond and out over the sea, fading to an unheard whisper over the waves.

"Here I am! Here I am! Where are you?" [Death] [Nature] [Cinema] [Spectacle] [Smell] [Sound]

Daly, N. cit.

Three elephants escaped from Coney Island’s Luna Park in June 1904. One swam across the Lower Bay to Staten Island and was captured. The other two elephants, which allegedly had headed for Quogue, on Long Island, never were sighted.

Moscow, p. 95

Elephants were brought to the sands of Long Beach in the 1920s to haul pilings for the boardwalk.

Kornblum, p. 58.

Freedomland opens in the Bronx, June 1960. Billed as the ‘world’s largest entertainment area’ (bigger than Disneyland), but quickly turns dystopian: A fire destroys several buildings before the opening and three gunmen have taken $28,000 from the amusement park’s office, escaping by boat up the Hutchinson River. Displays include replicas of Old New York and a Kansas Cornfield. Freedomland lasts only four years before being demolished to make room for Co-Op City in 1970.

It’s not hard, not far to reach
We can hitch a ride to Rockaway Beach
Ramones, “Rockaway Beach.”

Under any other conditions the Seaside Hotel would have been a flophouse. Because it had sand around the foundations and sometimes you could smell the ocean over the hot dogs and body odors, they called it a summer hotel. The corridors were cramped and warped, the carpet on the floor worn through in spots. Doors to the rooms hung from tired hinges, eager for the final siege of dry rot, when they could fall and lie there. I went down the hallway, keeping against the wall, the flash spotting the way. To one side a flight of stairs snaked down, the dust tracked with the imprints of countless rat feet. [Smell]
Coney Island had several Communist party clubs, collectively known as the Coney Island section. [Marxism] [Unrest] no.cit.

The problem the Coney Island entrepreneurs faced by the 1920s was that the rest of the culture was catching up. A long-time Coney Island resident would observe, 'Once upon a time Coney Island was the greatest amusement resort in the world. The radio and the movies killed. The movies killed illusions.' [Cinema] [Dream City] Kasson, p. 112.

And this is Coney Island on a quiet Sunday afternoon... a crowd of over a MILLION is usual and attracts no attention (I wonder who counts them). [Density] Weegee, Naked, p. 176.

The summer crowd sleeping on the Coney Island beach after the lights went off: A muggy moon shown intermittently over us, its bleached rays painting in ghastly tone, the upturned faces of the sleepers. [Blackout] Sharpe, pp. 192-3.

It was after midnight and jet black. One of those nights when the moon forgets to come out... but the sweethearts like that. I took my shoes off not to get sand in them and went walking in my stocking feet on the beach, being careful not to bump into any couples. I wouldn't want to disturb them for the world. Once in a while I would hear a giggle or a happy laugh, so I aimed my camera and took a picture in the dark using invisible light.

It was so still. Once in a while there would be a flicker of a match lighting a cigarette. Love making is so exhausting a happy kind of exhaustion... and a cigarette gives one a chance to rest up and hear the heartbeat of one's partner.

I walked nearer to the water's edge and stopped to rest against a Life Guard look-out. I thought I heard a movement from above so I aimed my camera high and took a photo, thinking it was a couple who liked to be exclusive and do their love making nearer the sky. When I developed the picture, I saw that the only occupant on the look-out had been a girl looking dreamily towards the Atlantic Ocean.
What was she doing there alone among all the lovers? [Photography] [Voyeur]

... Came the zero hour, 9 P. M. “Lights Out” and they did go out... In Coney Island the freaks inside the museums got a well-earned rest... what with doing a new show every fifteen minutes inside, and the bally outside... In Steeplechase Park the power was shut off the machine that throws up the girls’ skirts as they pass... At the Baby Incubator side-show doctor was glad... he was slowly but surely being driven crazy by lady customers who kept pestering him with questions like “Where do you get the eggs from?” “How can I get a ticket for a premature?” “How can I have intercourse with this machine?” So Coney Island was dark... But the saloons remained open for business as usual. The patrons remained inside in the dark... and kept ordering fresh drinks by lighting matches so the waiters could see them... Someone sat down at the piano and started fooling around with the keys... “Play God Bless America,” someone shouted the melody started on the piano and everyone joined in the chorus... but loud... people like to sing loud in the dark...
O - Alcohol

New York, I tell you, was drunk to begin with. And man has done little to compensate for this original inebriety.
Collins, p. 8.

New York landscapes express an amnesiac fluency, rendering everything liquid so as to carry it into oblivion.
Conrad, p. 232.

Robert Ripley liked to remind his readers that the word "Manhattan" in the language of the Indians who were its original inhabitants means "Place of Drunkenness."
Douglas, Honesty, p. 24

Manhattan is the place where we all got drunk.
Collins, pp. 8-9.

Fitzgerald ended an alcoholic rampage of his own on Fifth Avenue early one Sunday morning in 1919, and instigated a giddy parade by rolling empty champagne bottles down the roadway.
Conrad, p. 195.

wine drunkenness over the rooftops
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Oh mixologic cryptogram
It's the Manhattan-Cocktail!
Manhattan! Manhattan! Gechy Manitou!
Meyer, pp. 295-6

The cocktail is the product of a period when drinking is equated with style and art. The purpose remains the brain's annihilation; but the means to that obtuse end must be fantasticated and ritualized. Nature and its thirsty cravings must succumb, as at Van Vechten's Coney Island, to artifice. The same mutation occurs when Fitzgerald says the New York skyline is fabricated not from which is ordure, but from sugar. The cocktail is a liquid symbol of decadence in its contradiction between function (getting drunk) and form (doing so by tippling grenadine or honey or maple syrup). It corresponds to the sexual habits of Firbank's New Yorkers, who administer sadistic slaps with bouquets or with checkbooks. The instinctual urge, complicated by optional extras and fetishistic detours, turns toward perversity.

Conrad, p. 203

During Van Vechten’s “splendid Drunken Twenties,” New York undergoes an imaginative liquidation.

N. cit.

Once de Kooning and Marisol drank together all night; and the, about six in the morning, de Kooning thought the pebbles in the street were floating about.

Stevens & Swan, p. 369.

In New York it is the cocktail hour. You have cocktails at the homes of various friends after your day’s work in the city. Thirty people, fifty people, even more. You stand up. It is impossible to carry on a conversation standing up, for, in the middle of a phrase, a third person intervenes, taps you on the shoulder and says “Hello!” It is useless to go on trying, conversation is out of the question. One cocktail leads to another, your blood warms up, voices rise; the noise, annoying at first, becomes intolerable. Everyone shouts and has an alcoholic smile. Cudgel blows on spirits wearied by hard work in the city. Decidedly, conversation is impossible.

Corbusier, p. 103.

The bar is the center of their apartments, and in its shuttered and black-mirrored laboratory they toil over the invention of new cocktails.

Conrad, p. 204.

Now, admittedly, mixed drinks are not paintings, sculptures, novels, or poems. They are disposable and, frankly, not a little bit disreputable, standing roughly in the same relation to the culinary arts that American motor sports do to automotive engineering or hot jazz to musical composition: they smack of improvisation and cheap effects and even the most august of them lack the cachet accorded to fine wines, old whiskies, and cognac brandies. They are easily abused; they can degrade lives and even destroy them. Even if appreciated in moderation, they are appreciated in surroundings that rarely lead to detached meditation on truth and beauty (if those are not the same thing) or constructive engagement with the great moral and social questions of the age.

Wondrich, p. 10.
Larry Rivers once said to me, "I’ve often asked myself, what is a bar? It’s a space that has liquor that’s usually fairly dark, where you go for a certain kind of social interaction. It’s not a dinner party. It’s not a dance. It’s not an opening. You move in a certain way through this space, over a period of time, and you begin to recognize faces that begin to recognize you. And you may have had experiences with some of these people before which you kind of pick up on in another way in this space."
Warhol, POPism, pp. 234.

The Angle Bar with one door on Eighth Avenue and the other on 43rd Street.
Reay, p. 269.

The Zero Zero Club was a cellar joint off Sixth Avenue that buried itself among the maze of other night spots with nothing more than two aughts done in red neon to proclaim its location. But it was doing a lively business. It had atmosphere; plenty of it ... that’s why they called it the Zero Zero. Both visibility and ceiling were wiped out with cigar smoke... Unlike most joints, there was no tinsel or chromium. The bar was an old solid mahogany job set along one wall and the tables were grouped around a dance floor that actually had room for dancing. The orchestra was set into a niche that could double as a stage for the floor show if necessary. The faces around me weren’t those of New Yorkers. At least those of the men. Most could be spotted as out-of-towners looking for a good time... Yeah, the atmosphere was great, what you could see of it. The Zero Zero Club took you right back to the saloons of a Western mining camp and the patrons loved it.
Spillane, p. 215.

I found him in a dirty bar near Canal Street, his one hand cupped around a highball and his other hooked in his belt, in earnest conversation with a couple of kids who couldn’t have been more than seventeen. Both of them looked like high-school seniors out to spend a week’s allowance.
Spillane, p. 186.

Even from bars, like a Third Avenue bar—4 P.M. the men are all roaring in clink bonk glass brassfoot barrail “where ya goin” excitement.
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 105

The British novelist Ford Madox Ford found that in New York, “few people object to your getting far drunker than a lord at any [European] social gathering," while Lois Long noted Manhattanites' preference for "drinking without interruption in the smokiest place they could find."

Peretti. p. 12.

If you have never before seen a luxurious modern bar, this one of Tony's will interest you. It is a huge oval, occupying almost the entire front portion of the second floor space. Its polished black top, rimmed with stainless steel, rests on a base of contrasting natural woods. Little swivels stools, covered in beige leather, to match the color of the walls, are set all around. In the center, the oval back-bar, also done in beige and black, is a sparkling pyramid of vari-colored bottles. Eight bartenders in the white jackets of tradition are already busy, shaking and mixing. We are lucky to get seats. In a few minutes more customers will be clustered here three deep.

Hilder, p. 596.

Then one night I happened into a strange, equivocal place on Twelfth Street at Second Avenue. It was called the Clock Bar. The Clock had no regular crowd. It was not Bohemian or tough or Bowery. It was a place that anyone could happen in. The place was empty—except for you.

Reay, p. 92.

Crowd with alcoholic eyes

Beauduin, p. 283.

Albee on Julius's: "There was a saloon—it's changed its name now—on Tenth Street between Greenwich Avenue and Waverly Place... and they had a big mirror on the downstairs bar in this saloon where people used to scrawl graffiti. At one point back in about... 1954 I think it was—long before any of us started doing much of anything—I was in there having a beer one night, and I saw "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" scrawled in soap, I suppose, on this mirror." [Literature]

Edmiston, p. 99.

The camera shows the word "Elaine's" drawn on the glass of the restaurant, and moves inside, past patrons being shown to their seats, past the crowded, noisy, smoky tables.

Allen, Manhattan, p. 182.

Nightlife
By 1920 the term "nightlife" was coined.
Peretti, p. 4.

A museum and a factory, New York in the 1910s and 1920s was a modern scene in action crying for comment, tantalizingly ready to express and be expressed. It was a photo shoot inviting models and masqueraders, a play in the vast business of being cast, a movie set calling those ready to live inside their own movie of New York.
[Simulacra] [Photography]
Douglas, Honesty, p. 59.

In 1945, only one in fifteen New Yorkers had ever been to a nightclub and 92 percent were in bed by 10:30 p.m.
Morris, Manhattan '45, p. 166.

Five thousand people in New York go out several times a week.
Haden-Guest, p. xii.

An army of tens of thousands were moving through Nightworld.
Ibid. p. xii.

Thursday is New York's night out.
Trebay, p. 273.

Life in New York only begins to get really amusing around two-thirty. In Harlem the club Bamville was deserted on Sunday nights until about four A.M. when hordes began arriving for the Monday morning breakfast-dance.
Peretti, p. 7.

The whole mystique of the place was to make a person struggle to find it.
Haden-Guest, p. 5.

The nocturnal behavior centering on the nightclub districts posed a new challenge to the daytime norms of "respectable" New York culture. The presence of homosexuals and prostitutes was the most blatant indication that the night was a culturally alternate, liminal, or "inverted" time. [Bohemia]
Peretti, p. 8.

Fitzgerald: "It was characteristic of the Jazz Age that it had no interest in politics at all."

In this agitated metropolis nightlife joints sprout like jimsonweeds after a spring rain.

Most clubs had no windows at all.

Peretti, p. 10.

The nightclub disenchants New York. You pass the portals of a guarded house, leave the throngs in the Avenue, and straightway you are transported to another clime. You are in a village street in Millen, Georgia, with wisps of cotton blowing about. There is dancing in the village square... Old wooden lamp-posts stand round the square, with smoky kerosene lamps in the quaint lanterns above. Lamp-dazzled Emperor moths are on the wing, and float above in the dim light. Men and women sit about at tables, talking or listening or merely existing. Inside all is unreality, sentiment, indulgence and relaxation. New York has been banished. [Simulacra] [Psychogeography]

Peretti, p. 16.

By stepping into one of New York’s nightclubs, one could suddenly be transported to an ocean liner, a Hungarian village, a pirate’s den, an antebellum plantation, an old-fashioned Parisian café, an ultra-modern European casino, a bohemian tearoom, or a luxurious country club. [Simulacra] [Psychogeography]

Lerner, p. 140.

A smart girl in black with silver flowers on her hips selling dolls, the four strolling guitarists, and Guinan’s “near-naked girls” who sang “a song about cherries.”

Peretti, p. 12.

The magician at one nightclub “enthralled New Yorkers so sophisticated that they, apparently, have never been to a county fair in Dubuque and seen the shell game put over on the yokels.”

Ethnic motifs in the decor, personnel, and entertainment of nightclubs reflected the insecurities of native-born white Americans in an increasingly diverse society. These portrayals both fulfilled white customers’ taste for exotic escapism and expressed their anxieties about the world outside nightclub walls. [Slumming] [Harlem]
Ibid., p. 17.

The lower type of dance-hall, the closed joint, is a direct lineal descendent of the old mining camp dive. Its main purpose is to give the unattractive man a chance to have a good time. And how unattractive some of them are! Some of the old sourdoughs could pass for Apollos beside them. To these places come the crippled, the outcasts, the pockmarked, and frequently Filipinos, who are extremely fond of the dance.

Walker, Night Club, p. 209.

Cool, cruel faces, gray with the night-club pallor, red, bloated faces, indicative of overstrained hearts, brown faces of outdoor men and alabaster faces of indoor ones. Faces of women, young faces and old ones, ugly and beautiful, stupid and daring. Keen, sophisticated faces beside blandly innocent ones.

Lerner, p. 143.

Van Vechten believes that the architectural mutability of New York contradicts the solid stony permanence most cities aim to possess. New York commits itself to a more promiscuous, truant element—"if a city may conceivably be compared to a liquid, it may be reasonably said that New York is a fluid: it flows." … Pleasures well and gush there in streamy succession, catering to the insatiability of urban appetites. Among the most liquidly unstable sites mentioned by Van Vechten are those which trade in the watery elements, speakeasies and the business places of the bootleggers. [Prohibition]

Conrad, p. 232.

Prohibition

The night of January 16, 1920. Prohibition begins. As midnight approached the weather became terribly cold. A blistery wind swept around the corners. Derelicts huddled in hallways, and tried to sleep under piles of old newspapers. The blanketed horses arched their backs and hobbed along the icy pavements. Snowplows crunched through the streets. After midnight the temperature in the city went down to six degrees above zero.

Walker, Night Club, p. 2.

On the last night of legal drinking, New Yorkers crowded into corner saloons, into the cafes and supper rooms of hotels, into hot spots along Broadway’s roaring Forties, joylessly awaiting the midnight hour that would inaugurate a future of deprivation and drought. Prosperous citizens had stocked up on liquor at soaring prices, but even millionaires could not acquire supplies adequate to last a lifetime. As midnight approached, people drank copiously but solemnly. Some shed years over the extinction of all gaiety. Some pleaded for souvenirs of an epoch about to pass into history—a champagne class, an ice bucket.

Morris, Incredible, p. 294.

In New York City, before Prohibition, there had been 15,000 places where a man could get a drink. Shortly after Prohibition began, there were 32,000. Before Prohibition ended, there were more drinking places in the city than there had previously been in all New York State. Office bars appeared. Daytime drinking became the accepted thing in the Wall Street counting rooms. The twenty-four-hour consumption of the average downtown New Yorker rose during Prohibition from four fingers to fifteen.

Collins, p. 301.

Official estimates of the number of speakeasies in New York City as a whole ranged from twenty-two thousand to one hundred thousand.

Peretti. p. 10.

In one week during Prohibition, the Anti-Saloon League claimed, New Yorkers consumed 30 million quarts of draft beer, a million quarts of bottled beer and ale, a half-million quarts of whiskey, 75,000 quarts of gin, 76,000 quarts of brandy, 500 quarts of absinthe, 40,500 quarts of champagne, 60,000 quarts of wine, and nearly 500,000 quarts of other miscellaneous beers and liquors.

The Adams Gum Company appealed to New Yorkers to try chewing gum as a replacement for their cocktails. Waving “Good-bye, Old Pal!” to the mixed drink, Adams’s advertisements in the New York dailies promised that Chiclets, with their “exhilarating flavor that tingles the taste,” would let drinkers forget all about alcohol.

Ibid, p. 50.

Names of alcohol-free “near bears” marketed during Prohibition: Bevo, Famo, Kippo, Yip, Bone Dry.

N. cit.
Saloons were selling alcohol disguised in soda bottles with fictitious names like “Moonland Moss.”
Lerner, p. 58.

Prohibition transformed the familiar landscape of the city as bars disappeared from hotel lobbies to be replaced by lunchrooms, bank branches, and shops... Saloons were converted into grocery stores, cigar shops, or dry goods stores.
Ibid., pp. 51, 54.

Many restaurants considered watering down their famous wine selections to legal strength.
Ibid., p. 53.

Liquor was being sold openly from taxicabs.
Ibid., p. 58.

Bartenders were hiding miniature flasks of whiskey in cigar boxes, or concealing it in bottles attached to their belts like holsters.
Lerner, p. 58.

Though many hotels had closed their bars, their lobbies had become very popular with patrons desiring suspicious brews of “coffee” or “tea,” curiously served without cream or sugar.
Ibid., p. 58.

In restaurants, patrons were seen drinking liquor out of teacups.
Ibid., p. 58.

Waiters had quickly mastered the art of exchanging flasks under tablecloths.
Ibid., p. 58.

A candy shop on Wythe Avenue in Brooklyn sold chocolate bunnies filled with whiskey.
Ibid., p. 58.

Farm trade journals reported 17,000 trainloads of grapes being shipped to New York, and estimated that only 20 percent were consumed as fruit.
Ibid., p. 58.

Wine-making was so common in the Italian quarters of New York that every fall the gutters in front of tenements and storefronts would be stained red by the dregs from the process, and the women who worked in the local grocery stores would apologize for their grape-stained hands.

Ibid., p. 107

A Staten Island hearse was stopped carrying 60 cases of liquor.
Ibid., p. 58.

An olive oil dealer on Chrystie Street actually turned out to be selling rye in olive oil tins.
Ibid., p. 58.

Pharmacies, which could legally dispense prescription whiskey.
Ibid., p. 58.

One day in late winter which was so heavenly bright, all of New York with one accord pulled down the shades, illuminated its rooms with artificial light, and manufactured synthetic gin in a thousand bathtubs. [Light] Van Vechten,, p. 174.

See what Prohibition has done—driven hard working, honest men to drinking wood alcohol.
Lerner, p. 86.

"Dry Americans" and "wet foreigners."
"Most of the aliens are lovers of wine, which they are unable to get under present conditions. As a result, they are changing their minds about America being the free country they thought it was and are going back now where they will be able to get their wine and beer unmolested."
Ibid., pp. 100, 108.

"wet" propaganda
Ibid., p. 152.

The defiance of Prohibition could be seen all over the city. In Little Italy, Greenwich Village, East Harlem, and sections of the Bronx, Italian workers still gathered in cafés to drink wine. In Jewish neighborhoods, cafés and restaurants freely sold wine, beer, and liquor to their patrons. In Harlem, grills and cafés remained open for business, with the traditional walnut or mahogany screens still covering their plate-glass windows to obscure the goings-on inside. One reporter argued that the only discernible difference between these Prohibition-era saloons and their legal predecessors was that the traditional free pretzels had been replaced by potato chips.

According to Manhattan lore, the originator of the interwar nightclub was a tall, sad-faced Irish-American named Larry Fay. A native to the island, Fay was a taxicab driver with a long record of traffic and parking violations who dabbled in controlling his own fleet of cars. In 1920 Prohibition had begun and speakeasies had sprung up to sell illegal liquor. That year, legend has it, Fay took on a bootlegger as a fare. They drove 400 miles to Montreal, where the passenger picked up a crate of liquor. Earning a sizeable wad of bills for his effort, Fay decided to buy his own cache of Canadian whiskey. On his return to Manhattan he sold it to speakeasies and scored a large profit. Fay first poured his liquor earnings into an effort to build the most distinctive taxicab fleet in the city. He outfitted his cabs with blinking lights, tune-playing horns, polished metallic trim, and inlaid black swastikas. His personnel director, a recently paroled thief named Owney Madden, hired tough and aggressive drivers and ran the racket, using threats to scare other cabbies away from railway stations and prestigious hotels. [Crime]

Peretti, p. 1.

Most of all, New Yorkers drank during Prohibition because drinking was a form of cultural rebellion against the heavy-handed moralism of the dry lobby and its insistence that all Americans adhere to the same social mores.

Lerner, p. 130.

Tex Guinan began wearing a charm bracelet made of tiny gold padlocks in a spirited show of defiance.

Jimmy Walker called moral reformers, “the side-burned shock troops of reform.” [Dandy]

Under the initial terms of the Volstead Act, all households in the United States were entitled to an annual allowance of ten gallons of sacramental wine for religious use.

Fraudulent rabbis inflated the sizes of their congregations to get more wine; sold wine to saloons; forged wine permits; took kickbacks from wineries; set up elaborate schemes to import wine illegally; or sold wine to gentiles using fake Jewish names.

Newspaper headline: “Jews of City without Wine for Passover.”

The Dearborn Independent, a Michigan newspaper published by Henry Ford, a 1921 article claimed that “bootlegging is a 95 percent controlled Jewish industry in which a certain class of rabbis have been active.” Mocking the provisions of the Volstead Act that allowed the use of sacramental wine, the paper insisted that “rabbinical wine” is a euphemism for whiskey, gin, Scotch, champagne, vermouth, absinthe, or any other kind of hard liquor.

Robert Benchley had his first cocktail in 1921 in a speakeasy with playwright Robert Sherwood and Zelda and F. Scott Fitzgerald... Benchley once visited thirty-eight speakeasies and clubs in a single night.

Prohibition transformed Dorothy Parker into a drinker as legendary as Benchley.

Men would surreptitiously ask for “ginger ale” in bars, hoping the bartender would respond with a wink and the query, “Imported or domestic?” If the customer wants imported ginger ale, and he is the right kind of customer, and he gets a regulation pre-Prohibition highball... When the diners requested two highballs, the waiter asked, “Do you know anybody?” The one guest pointed at his companion and replied with a smile, “I know him, and he knows me.” With that, the waiter fetched the drinks for these, unmistakably, were true New Yorkers, qualified to be served.

Have you observed, of late, how fastidious everyone has become in the matter of liquor? Not only a particular brand, but a definitive vintage and especially shaped bottle are now almost always demanded.
Some speakeasies were tucked away in construction sites, hidden in apartment back rooms, disguised behind receptionists’ desks in office buildings, or brazenly situated across from police precinct houses.

Six white-coated fellows… lining the shakers up and down lustily to the tune of rattling ice… while the faintly sweet aroma of gin floated back through the crowd pressed against the rail. [Smell] “Gin” was often industrial alcohol mixed with glycerin and oil of juniper, while “scotch” was made from grain alcohol colored with prune juice, creosote, or Moxie.

Prohibition song titles: “How Are You Going to Wet Your Whistle (When the Whole Damn World Goes Dry?),” “I Must Have a Little Liquor When I’m Dry,” and Irving Berlin’s “You Cannot Make Your Shimmy Shake on Tea.”

The inlets of Long Island served as ports of call for small boats unloading liquor. Once in a while, bathers at Coney Island heard the boom of small cannon as the Coast Guard fired warning shots across the bows of unregistered speedboats suspected of carrying contraband whisky. Sometimes the whisky was dumped to lighten an unregistered vessel so it could make a fast getaway. To the delight of beachcombers from Coney Island to Montauk Point, 120 miles away from the eastern tip of Long Island, cases of whisky sometimes washed up on the sands. [Sound]

New York will be on a strict “water diet” within sixty days.

Ladies’ department stores in the district hawked whiskey and gin under code names like “red stockings” and “white stockings.”

Ibid., p. 135.

Ibid., p. 138.

Ibid., p. 139.

N. cit.

Mitgang, p. 33.

Lerner, p. 156.

Ibid., p. 200.
Many African Americans looked to Prohibition as an important opportunity to prove the decency and “respectability” of their race.

The community’s moral guardians were called “Black Victorians.”

One African-American politician in neighboring Jersey City went so far as to suggest that if the Eighteenth Amendment were ever repealed, it would open the possibility for a repeal of the Thirteenth Amendment and a return to legal slavery in the United States.

Gin was considered the new “Aframerican national beverage.”

Open a book or newspaper of a few years ago and you will seek the term “speakeasy” in vain. It was born of Prohibition, but later than Prohibition. The speakeasy (the name suggests a whispered password) is a clandestine refreshment-bar selling spirits or wine. They must be visited to understand present-day New York. One must see a speakeasy, if only to avoid the places for the future—I know nothing so depressing. There are a few in the downtown streets, but they are mainly set up between Fortieth Street and Sixtieth Street; they are usually situated downstairs, and are identifiable by the large number of empty cars standing at their doors. The door is closed, and is only opened after you have been scrutinized through a door-catch or a barred opening. At night an electric torch suddenly gleams through a pink silk curtain. There is a truly New York atmosphere of humbug in the whole thing. The interior is that of a criminal house; shutters are closed in full daylight, and one is caught in the smell of a cremation furnace, for the ventilation is defective and grills are prepared under the mantelpiece of the fireplace. Italians with a too familiar manner, or plump, blue pseudo-bullfighters, carrying bunches of monastic keys, guide you through the deserted rooms of the abandoned house. Facetious inscriptions grimace from the walls. There are a few very flushed diners. At one table some habitués are asleep, their heads sunk on their arms; behind a screen somebody is trying to restore a young woman who has had an attack of hysteria, while an old gentleman with spectacles is dancing all by himself. The food is almost always poor, the service deplorable; the staff regards you with the eyes of confederates and care not two pins about you. The Sauterne is a sort of glycerine; it has to go with a partridge brought from the refrigerator of a French vessel; the champagne would not be touched at a Vincennes wedding-party.

Yet the speakeasy pervades Manhattan with a fascinating atmosphere of mystery. If only one could drink water there! Some speakeasies are disguised behind florists' shops, or behind undertakers' coffins. I know one, right in Broadway, which is entered through an imitation telephone-box; it has excellent beer; appetizing sausages and Welsh rabbits are sizzling in chafing-dishes and are given to customers without extra charge; drunks are expelled through a side-door which seems to open out into the nether world, as in Chicago Nights. In the poorer quarters many former saloons for the ordinary people have secretly reopened. All these secret shrines are readily accessible, for there are, it is said, 20,000 speakeasies in New York, and it is unlikely that the police do not know them; I think myself that they are only forced to close down when they refuse to make themselves pleasant to persons in authority, or when they sell too much poison. Spirits have their market-quotations in New York, as fluctuating as those of the Stock Exchange; champagne averages forty dollars, cognac and gin twelve dollars, the bottle. The speakeasy is very popular in all classes of society; women go there gladly, even a few young girls, who at least provide a diversion for the Frenchman, who is not accustomed to American habits of drinking.

[Smell]
Morand, pp. 509-17.

It isn't very exciting here? No, it's not supposed to be; in fact, it's supposed not to be. But what sort of excitement did you expect? A shooting? They do have shootings and some speakeasies, not in the best ones; at least, not as a general thing.

Hilder, p. 591.

The Manhattan anchorage of the Brooklyn Bridge was used as a storage place for European liquors. The cellars, entered from 209 William Street, were sealed during Prohibition.

WPA, p. 314.

City records for 1901 show that the 'Luyties Brothers' paid $5,000 for wine storage in a vault on the Manhattan
A. Smith & Company' paid $500 a year from 1901 until 1909 for a vault on the Brooklyn side.

Schneider, "N. pag.

The Brooklyn Bridge's arches' interiors are damp, gloomy vaults and are weirdly medieval in appearance, especially the abandoned wine cellars behind the studded heavy steel doors in the arch at North William Street, just off the rear of the old World Building. The arches and the crooked little streets that bend and twist around them give that part of town something of the look of medieval Prague. When you get down into the wine cellars and away from the sound, you're in a "Cast of Amontillado" setting. The damp drips, walls glitter, footfalls echo, shadows distort on ancient vaults.

There's a brief history of the bridge wine cellars on one of the deep inner walls. It's patch and flaked with painted vine trellises all around it crawling up the wet walls. It says: "Legend of Oechs Cellars: These cellars were built in 1876, about seven years prior to the official opening of Brooklyn Bridge in 1883. From their inception they housed the choicest wines in New York City."

Morris, Incredible, p. 355.

Historic Wine Cellars Reopened After Dry Era

Corks Pop in Vaulted Passageways Far Below Roaring Traffic as Liquor Firm is Handed Keys in Ceremony.

NEW YORK, July 11—You step off the subway at Brooklyn Bridge, turn sharp left through and underground passageway and pass through a cave-like door into medieval France.

As far ahead as you can see stretch vaulted passageways, dimly glowing in a subdued light, and from floor to ceiling are stacked cases upon cases of champagne, sparkling Burgundies, brandies, liquors, rare vintages of the old world.

These are the wine cellars of Anthony Oechs & Co. under the roaring traffic of Brooklyn bridge, under the trolleys and elevators, the brass-buttoned policemen and shrieking newsboys, the hurrying millions that scuttle back and forth on the surface.

A few hundred lucky citizens were invited to visit the historic cellars today to witness the ceremony in which Aldermanic President Bernard S. Deutch turned over the key to the Oechs company. Since Prohibition the ancient cellars have been used for storing city tools. And before that they were used by the now defunct "Evening World" for storing newsprint.
New Yorkers of another generation remember the cellars, which were built in 1876, 7 years before the erection of Brooklyn Bridge, and which housed the wine stores of Rackey’s wine establishment and Luyttes & Co.

In a niche at the entrance is a shrine of the Virgin Mary, brought from the Pol Rogers cellars in Epernay. The walls of the vaulted labyrinths are embellished with mottos in French, German, and Italian.

And on the arched entrances to the various wine cellars are titles—Avenue Sichel Bordeaux, Avenue Les Deux Oeufs, Avenue Regoud, Avenue Des Chateaux Haut Brion.

Visitors crowded the taproom this afternoon, musicians played Viennese waltzes, champagne corks popped and nobody remembered that above the trolleys and the elevators, the automobiles and the rushing pedestrians still hurried back and forth across Brooklyn Bridge.

Corner drug-stores will supply bad gin to people who are well enough known to them.

The hazards of Sumatra are no worse than the poison liquor and the automobiles here in New York.

Conrad, p. 213.

Bootleggers were the real modernists.

Charyn, p. 68.

Names of speakeasies: The Bombay Bicycle Club, The Town and Country Club, Tony’s, Michael’s, Louis’, 300 Club, El Fey Club, Landmark Tavern, Club Intime, Casa Blanca, Connie’s Inn, Jack and Charlie’s, The Red Head, Club Frontón,

N. cit.

Almost without exception, every house, on both sides of the street, was a speak, and the after-dark traffic on this single block was always more congested than that on any so-called “residential” cross street in Manhattan.

[Congestion] [Traffic]

Morris, Incredible, p. 325

The “21” Club: the atmosphere was one of aristocratic elegance, and you would not have surmised that this dignified resort concealed defenses as elaborate as those of a fortress, or electrically controlled devices of such remarkable ingenuity that, in the event of a raid, strategic sections of wall could be made to turn and disappear.

At the 21 Club during Prohibition a button was pressed when the premises were raided, and all the bottles in the bar would at once crash through a trapdoor and shatter on rocks. A sandpit absorbed the spillage.
   Conrad, p. 288.

One establishment decorated its walls “with a translation of the skyline of New York into terms of bottles.” [Panorama]
   Peretti. p. 10.

Spy-holes, moving shutters, padlocks, chains, bars, [and] a password might be used. False wall panels, electric dumbwaiters, and drains underneath the bartender’s work space allowed for the quick disposal of liquor in case of raids. (cf. Williams and Noél: George Macuinas’ elaborate escape labyrinth from his Wooster St. lair. [Downtown])
   Ibid. p. 11.

I hope you enjoyed the dinner as much as I did. Considering that it was prepared and served by the outlaw employees of a pair of outlaws, it seems to me to have been a not uncivilized production. The barbaric feature was the fact that Prohibition, which is supposed to make it impossible, and protection which made it possible combined to make it three times as expensive as it should’ve been.
   Ibid. p. 11.

La Guardia: “I’m making beer.”
   Patrolman Mennella: “All right.”
   La Guardia: “Why don’t you arrest me?”
   Mennella: “I guess that’s a job for a Prohibition agent if anybody.”
   La Guardia: “Well, I’m defying you. I thought you might accommodate me.”
   Ibid. p. 257.

Sales of beer are legalized after 14 years of Prohibition. Schaefer Brewing company has anticipated Repeal by launching an advertising campaign with the slogan, “Our hand has never lost its skill.”
   Trager, p. 480.
Parties

I want to give a really bad party. I want to give a party where there’s a brawl and seductions and people going home with their feelings hurt and women passing out in the cabinet de toilette.

Nobody had time to sleep. Everybody had about five careers. What I learned from them was the Dickens Principle—it was the best of times, it was the worst of times, but it was our times, and we owned them with our youth, our energy, our good will, our edginess. So let’s party. Under the Dickens Principle everything was a party.

Poetry was a party. Work was a party. When I put out a new issue of Fuck You / A magazine of the Arts and there was a night long collating session at Peace Eye, sitting lotus posture in front of stacks of pages with Peter and Julius Orlovsky and Barbara Rubin—that was a party. Fugs rehearsals were a party. Even demonstrations and long meeting planning the revolution.
Sanders, Beatnik p. 365.

It was a good party, you could tell by the part barometer man, Andy Warhol. All the stars were crushing in, bubbly, perfumed, crackling with sparks, but the host was just looking melancholy. And when he wasn’t looking wistful he was looking bored and sullen. He even yawned a few times.
Mueller, p. 286.

Rosalie Keith was celebrated for giving the worst parties in New York, but despite this undesirable reputation she never ceased giving them and people continued to go to them. It is impossible to persuade people not to go to a party in New York, particularly if there are uninvited and English.
Van Vechten, p. 63.

Who could tell anymore what was fashionable and what was fun?

A swirl of excited nothingness.

Now it’s New York itself which is being consumed—worn, drunk, eaten by a populace of partygoers.
Tad’s mission in life is to have more fun than anyone else in New York City, and this involves a lot of moving around, since there is always the likelihood that where you aren’t is more fun than where you are.
McInerney, p 2.

The trouble with inviting every suspect in New York to a party is that they tend to come.
McCourt, p. 106.

The labor of social supremacy is no longer worth the scant glory.
Irwin, Highlights, p. 222.

Is great New York to become the final citadel of an enduring youth, the only creatures strong enough to live in it?
Reisenberg, p. 95.

At a large party, Frank lost his temper when a former friend, an art critic, pursued him all evening in an effort to get back in his good graces. “Listen,” Frank finally exploded, his voice loud enough so that half of the party heard him, “there are eight million people in New York and I like about ten of them and you’re not one of them.”
Lesueur, N. pag.

In an era when parties were a way of life, all I could think of was: “Too bad I missed this one.”

Studio 54

Over the dance floor, tubes studded with light bulbs, Flash Gordon style, were rising and descending and, higher yet, the spoon made its rhythmic journeys to the insatiable nose of the Man in the moon, discharging a fizz of light.
Haden-Guest, p. xiii.

The beat of disco, which is very close to that of the human heartbeat.

Dancers washed in the surf of sound, dappled and splashed by light, shedding the dull gravitational tug of quotidian life, losing themselves in what is at once a voyeuristic jostle, like a fairground, and a domain of the self-absorbed.

Vladimir Horowitz on the floor of Studio 54, protecting his valuable eardrums with wads of cotton.

Fashion models and demi-señoriatas who could be counted upon to pop a perky nipple as they threw themselves into choreographed frenzies on the dance floor; also those who had painted themselves silver, or gold, or costumed as pharaohs, cucumbers, or Angels of Death; to say nothing of such Studio-famous characters as Rollerena, supposedly a prim Wall Streeter by day, a dreamboat by night in a wedding dress and roller skates; and the man who danced with the lifelike marionette; and Miriam, the woman (by day a substitute teacher) in the see-through wedding-dress; and the septuagenarian pretty girl, Disco Sally. Finally, there would have been, as always, a handful of souls who felt that the sight of their naked genitalia should be a source of wonder and delight.

You would look around and you’d see somebody’s back. And then you’d see little toes twinkling behind their ears.

A warm body and a toot of cocaine.

To me it was about freeing the body. The girls would take off their tops and dance.

I don’t know if it was heaven or hell. But it was it was wonderful.

Here are Elizabeth Taylor and Betty Ford, each wearing something diaphanous, each with a bodyguard, wearing Truly Bad Hair; here is Michael Jackson with an Afro and Michael Jackson in pale shantung and an ascot; here is Steve Rubell dancing with Margaret Trudeau, her eyes wide and heavy-lidded, like those of a succubus; here are Barry Diller and Rod Stewart in the DJ booth; and here is Christine Brinkley, with permanently sideswept hair, as though being escorted by her own personal wind tunnel.

They seldom looked happy. They passed one another without a word, in the elevator, like silent shades in hell, hell-bent on their next look from a handsome stranger. Their next rush from a popper. The next song that turned their bones to jelly and left them all on the dance floor with heads back, eyes nearly closed, in the ecstasy of saints receiving the stigmata. They pursued these things with such devotion that they acquired, after a few seasons, a haggard look, a look of deadly seriousness. Some wiped everything they could off their faces and reduced themselves to blanks.

Before it was Studio 54, it was owned by CBS and called Studio 53... The concept of the studio—moveable sets, the actors being the audience, the audience being the actors... A former theater as a club.

It is a Manhattan myth, a chunk of urban folklore, that Studio 54 never had a dull moment after Bianca rode the horse.

Andy Warhol’s fashionable silkscreen portraits of the 70s had been widely pooh-poohed by the high art world and he was wistfully aware that he wasn’t seen as being in the same league as his fellow popsters like Roy Lichtenstein. In Studio, and he was famous artist. Halston, once a household name at a grandee level, now became a household name in trailer camps and retirement homes. The vehicle for Halston’s re-ascent was Studio 54.

Ibid., p. 56.

You would see a little piece of glitter in her hair and you know he had been at Studio 54 the night before.

People would say to me, ‘Where do you live?’ I would say, ‘I live at Studio 54.’

Ibid., p. 57

The lords of the door were aware of their might.

With gardenias behind their ears and Tuinal smiles.

[Drugs]

A Chinatown Mall is a Chinatown Mall. When you enter the fluorescent lights glare at you and suddenly you’re surrounded by hundreds of brightly colored posters of happy Chinese women, children and cartoons. The place smells like musty plastic and everything looks old. There are trinkets everywhere. Up the escalator everything gets darker and the bass is pumping. Even early on everyone is dancing to a familiar beat, and they can’t help it. That’s what Disco does. [Smell]

“She’ll Be,” N. pag.

A very Queens-type club The problem was the landing pattern at Kennedy airport. The jet planes would go right the hell over this place and there would be this tremendous noise every fifteen seconds. So they just pumped up the music. [Noise]

Haden-Guest, p. 18.

The sheer look of things was going to be important in the new disco palaces. Some elements would be nostalgic, like the disco balls themselves, and some, like Infinity’s neon penis, would be borrowed from the gaudy over-the-topness of burlesque shows, the Vegas aesthetic. Others would be taken from Nightworld’s arsenal of special effects, like the strobe, borrowed from fashion photography, which caught dancers in a snowblind dazzle, freezing them, moment by moment, like a Muybridge photo strip, and like the luminescent spermatozoa that used to slip over the walls, ceiling, and revelers during the classic light shows of the sixties. [Photography]

The “Translator” coded music into electrical pulses that activated a flashing light system, fulfilling a project of the Decadents of the nineteenth century, who had dreamed of sense swapping—Rimbaud’s colored vowels and the scent organ of Huysmans.

Paradise Garage was a gigantic warehouse to Varick on King Street. One has to walk awhile before one gets to the entrance, like walking on an airport tarmac during the night. Once inside there would be a blue haze of smoke amidst tons of sweaty people either socializing or dancing. It was a place where our mental state and the music created that tingle that lasts awhile.

Frisa, p. 167.

The elevator door opens directly into the loft, which is roughly the size of a Midwestern state and at least as populous. There are windows on three sides and mirrors on the fourth. A bar and buffet is set up at one end. The dance floor is down at the other end, somewhere near New Jersey.

McInerney, p. 172.

Lots of sniffling going on in the stalls.

Ibid., p. 5.

At four-thirty in the morning, when I played ‘Last Dance,’ the people were in tears. In tears.

Haden-Guest, p. xxi.
Junk

Burroughs: "Heroin was $28 an ounce in the 1920s. Actually there was more morphine on the street rather than heroin. In the 1920s they brought in morphine. Then heroin came in in the late 1920s. Heroin is now about $9,000 an ounce, so imagine from $28 an ounce to $9,000 and junk turns out to be a model for inflation, being the most inflated item. A friend of mine... who did time on Rikers Island in the thirties, told me the guards came in every morning with a shoebox full of heroin decks at fifty cents a deck. On one deck you could stay loaded all day and do the time standing on your head. With junk you are immune to boredom and discomfort... Now there's good heroin on the street again and you can maintain a habit for $12 a day."

Bockris, Burroughs, pp. 111-2.

In the 1930s, the word smack for heroin originates on the Lower East Side from schmecker, the Yiddish word for taste.

Patterson, Resistance, p. 240.

It was in 1948—January—during a siege of severe New York winter weather. It had snowed for several days—stopped—clearing up—growing milder the snow melting into dirty slush then becoming intensely cold—snowing again... At night the city streets became even more deserted with only a few to be seen on Forty-second Street—probably one of the busiest streets of any city in the world—a few like myself living in cafeterias—sleeping in the all-night movies—staying away from the cops on their beats—who were angry to be out... walking through the underground tunnels down toward Penn Station—through the station into the rest rooms—sitting on the toilets sleeping—sometimes writing—looking to pick up someone who had money and wanted sex—and was willing to pay for it—anxious only for a place to sleep take a bath—shave—obtain clean clothing—even food. Maybe steal a suitcase—roll a stray drunk—meet a friend—talk—make it until the morning and a cheap movie. I had been living in this manner since shortly after the beginning of the New Year. I was broke—hungry most of the time—poorly clad for contesting the rage of the elements—staying awake using Benzedrine inhalers—occasionally smoking pot—somehow maintaining a junk habit—just managing to keep straight enough not to collapse completely—stealing—ready to make a dollar at anything—always looking for a good take—something big enough to allow me a chance for a bed of my own—a place to live or at least die in out of the cold—not to be found crouched—a corpse in the doorway. I wanted to die and I felt I was dying—could observe death feeding on me—see it in the pallor of my skin—the patches of oozing sores on my chin and face—the tiny red flecks in the whites of my eyes—in the way my skull showed through my skin at the temples—and I could smell it from my dirt-coated bleeding feet—from my crotch—from my clothing.

Reay, p. 226.

Smack was in effect the avant-garde of drugs, the ultimate high, the total rejection of the square world and tis bustling work ethic... It was no coincidence that jazz and heroin appeared in the same place. the common factor was the Mafia, who both ran the international heroin trade and owned or backed many of the jazz clubs... Heroin’s reputation as the coolest complement to the coolest new music would carry through the rock and punk rock decades.

Strausbaugh, p. 285.

The brands of heroin most actively hawked Wednesday afternoon, June 9, 1982, on 3rd Street east of Avenue C were Red Tape and Yellow Tape and Buddha.

As the geologist looking for oil is guided by certain outcroppings of rock, so certain signs indicate the near presence of junk. Junk is often found adjacent to ambiguous or transitional districts: East Fourteenth near Third in New York.

Burroughs, p. 227.

There’s no night (except for Sunday, when the Street is eerie and dead) when you can’t walk from Fourth Avenue to Second Avenue on Fourteenth Street without at least half a dozen ballcap-wearing, pinpoint-eyed junkies asking you if you want downers. The price list fluctuates with supply: Placidyl usually go for 2.50; Valium, 75 cents; Tuinal, $3; Elavil, $2 on Fourteenth Streets, with a 25 percent markup for rock show nights.

Jacobson, p. 108.

Avenues of pushers and between 3rd and 2nd Avenues—it’s hot like wall-to-wall body tension, like people waiting for a connection somewhere in that wall of sound and flash.

Wojnarowicz, p. 25.
One day when L. went to buy heroin on 3rd Street, as he often did, he was hijacked. That was not unusual either, but this time the thieves maneuvered him into an abandoned building and took not just his money but also every shred of his clothing. He was forced to make his way home naked. Fortunately he only lived about ten blocks away.

Sante, “Commerce,” p. 111.

About that time, it was getting very, very popular to be a junkie on the Lower East Side. In the morning you would see people lined up, like for a hit movie—in a line fifty feet deep—with people that sold the dope running up and down the line saying, “Have your money ready, we’ll be open in ten minutes.” You know, “No singles, you gotta have fives or tens.” And they would have a menu, like, “Today we have brown dope, white dope, and cocaine.” You know, “Got somethin’ special today, you’re all gonna be real happy”… Sometimes it was very scary copping at the dope house—you’d go to these abandoned buildings, you’d go in, it was completely dark, and you’d climb a stairway where half the steps were missing. You can’t see ANYTHING at all, complete darkness, then you’d get to the landing and there’d be one candle on each floor. You’d climb two or three stories, then suddenly, BAAM, you’d run into someone—there’s all these people—there’s now a line of two hundred people going up the stairs. So you’d wait in line in complete darkness, while some motherfucker would say, “Stay in line!” Everybody would be real quiet, because they wanted their dope. When you finally got to the top of the stairs, there would be a guy behind the door. There’d just be a little hole in the door. You’d put your money in the hole, and say the initial, C or O, if you wanted either coke or dope. Then you’d get a little bag back, and get the fuck outta there, hoping they’d say, “Green light.” That meant you could walk out, there was no cops on the street. If they said, “Red light,” then you had to stay in there and that was really scary, but it wasn’t until years later I realized that was a big part of the rush.

I’d walk through abandoned buildings where the Stations of the Cross had been set up or where people were having sex, creeping by headless animals, half-humans doing all kinds of drugs, used condoms, used tampons, discarded panties, Naked Lunch-sized cockroaches.

Schmitz, pp. 270-4.
The outer chaos was considerable. When I first moved in, a soda joint called The Haven was in full operation in the neighborhood as probably the largest downtown retail distribution center for every known variety of drugs. Sunday mornings, going out to get the paper at nine or ten o’clock, I’d see the flotsam and jetsam of the night before strewn around Sheridan Square and West Fourth Street, kids barely able to walk, kids draped over fenders or nodding out in doorways, blank, lost looks on their faces. I had a sunlit vision of hell.

Hamilton, p. 96.

The junk scene was just like the sex, it was all a lark. I mean, it still had this “nice” taint of the forbidden, yet at the same time nobody really thought of it as dangerous.

You could get a bag of dope for three bucks. That’s what the standard price was. We’d cop on the corner of Twelfth Street and Avenue A. There was a crowd of about ten or twenty Puerto Rican children, about the age of thirteen, who were the runners. So we’d give them three bucks and they’d bring back a bag.

Ibid., p. 212.

Junkies were always the hungriest, the hurtingest; they almost kind of defined New York Despair.

Meltzer, p. 188.

By 1989, heroin had become my sole occupation as well as my one solace in the nonstop clang of a city that clearly had no use for me.

Kopasz, p. 243.

One day something fell out of an old book, the business card of a beauty parlor that had stood on Avenue C near Third Street, probably in the 1920s. I marveled at it, unable to picture something as sedate as a beauty parlor anywhere near that corner, by then a heroin souk.

Sante, “My Lost City,” n.pag.

Heroin: “If Alphabet City was a candy store, then Harlem was a supermarket.”

Kopasz, p. 250.

Those cold, junk-sick mornings in Alphabet City and East Harlem, crying, crying in the gray rain, begging me to get my white ass back out on the street and hustle, scratch up some money or back a few bags or get to work, but for Christ’s sake, do something… those mornings when every tree was bare even if the air was warm… those sickly mornings of rain and grinding noise held a terrible, immutable, extracting beauty that I cannot accurately describe. It was something close to the pain of pure desire.

Ibid., p. 252.

People were either gay or sharing needles or both.

Schmitz, p. 270.

This particular party was for his birthday, at the apartment he shared with his lovers, Alice and Tom. All his loyal friends were there, the famous, the infamous, the washouts, the successful rogues, and the types who only have fame after they die. They were the representatives of the New York alternative subculture, the people who went to sleep at dawn. And never held a nine to five job because they were too odd looking, or sassy, or over qualified. Because Sam had an MFA degree, he never had any money, but he always gave great parties… never pretentious ones, always wild ones. He wasn’t short handed with the food or liquor.

It wasn’t even midnight but the party was already jamming and jumping. Alice hadn’t even gotten around to lighting the candles on her attempted Cordon Bleu birthday cake when I noticed Sam thanking a rock star for a very small birthday present, one of the many very small presents he’d received all night, yet another glassine bag of heroin, his drug of choice.

Mueller, p. 155.

Heroin makes you real smart, huh?

McNeil, p. 164.

Using heroin was like taking a vacation a few days a week.

Ibid., p. 166.

She was a prostitute, I was a Ramone, and we were both junkies.

Ibid., p. 200.

Up to Lexington, 125 / Feel sick and dirty, more dead than alive

Velvet Underground, “Waiting”
And the worst thing is, the worst thing about junkies, is they are so BORING. They sit around and talk about junk. As if there were anything to say about it.

McNeil, p. 381.

“They call this a light show?” Paul said, looking at the stage during the Airplane’s act, where they had projections from the glass with fluid on it. “I’d rather sit and watch a clothes dryer in the laundromat.”

A lot of friction developed between Bill Graham and us. It was just the difference between New York and San Francisco attitudes. What was funny was that Graham’s business style was New York—the fast, loud-mouth operator kind of thing—but then what he was saying were San Francisco flower child things. The end came when we were all standing around in the back of the Fillmore watching some local band onstage. Paul was continuing the same type of LSD put-down commentary that he’d been making all day—comments that I could see were really rubbing Graham the wrong way.

“Why don’t they take heroin?” Paul suggested, pointing to the group on stage. “That’s what all the really good musicians take.” Graham didn’t say anything, he just fumed. Paul knew he was driving him good and crazy so he kept it up. “You know, I think I’m really all for heroin, because if you take care of yourself, it doesn’t affect you physically.” He took a tangerine out of his pocket and peeled it in one motion, letting the peels fall on the floor. “With heroin you never catch cold—it started in the United States as a cure for the common cold.”

Paul was saying everything he could think of to offend Bill Graham’s San Francisco sensibility, but in the end it was dropping the tangerine peels on the Fillmore floor—which he had done totally unconsciously—that brought on the showdown. Little things mean a lot. Graham stared down at the peels, and he got livid. I don’t remember his exact words, but he started yelling—things like:

“You disgusting germs from New York! Here we are, trying to clean up everything, and you come out here with your disgusting minds and whips!” Things along that line.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 213-14.

Speed

By then he was taking so much amphetamine. He had the classic symptom: intense concentration, but only on minutiae. That’s what happens to you on speed—your teeth might be falling out of your head, the landlord might be evicting you, your brother might be dropping dead right next to you, but, you would have to, say, get your address book recopied and you couldn’t let any of that other stuff “distract” you.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 73–73.

We cut across the black underbelly of the Manhattan animal, and wherever we cut, its colorful guts tumbled out: hippies, hustlers, hookers, heroin users, they trickled into the streets collecting in pools at the corners waiting to be pumped through the veins of the city. When we stumbled onto the sidewalk I had no idea where we were. I don’t even think we paid the driver, he was so happy to get rid of us. My teeth were banging on my gums—we wanted out, we hate you. As he pulled me into an expensive brownstone I wondered if Ronnie could hear my teeth yelling.

Inside, all the queens and queers were in one room. It was painted gold, and it was vibrating, humming like a great nest of wasps. Beads of every description were all over the floor, in different-sized containers on the tables, and hanging on the walls in every kind of necklace imaginable. The electric lights were blaring, forcing the occupants of the room to wear sunglasses that only added to their insect-like appearance. Each bug held a big fat needle, and you knew they were shooting up; but every time you looked at them, they pretended to string beads, with smiles that fooled nobody. Rotten Rita grinned, and a rotten tooth fell out of his head. Without missing a beat, he strung it onto his necklace. Orion was wearing jeweled chicken bones about her throat. She also had glued her hand to the arm of a chair and with a smile, she removed it like a glove. [City as Body]

Wornov, p. 93.

“Don’t go near the windows,” they hummed, laying out two giant lines of white powder that I greedily snorted.

“Beware of the windows, darling,” they smiled, laying out two more big fat lines. I couldn’t believe my luck.

“No, no, don’t touch those windows,” they snickered as the drug took hold and stringing beads became my life.

Oh yes, the bead stringing was absolutely fierce, with the necklaces growing in size. Yes, yes, this was a very competitive group—who could make the biggest collar. The buzzing increased, the weak dropped back, pushed into corners where they were relegated to gathering and sorting stray beads. I heard them talking about me out of the corner of my ear.
They were after me, but I just kept stringing. It didn’t matter anyway. I wasn’t even thinking of them—what I was worried about were my teeth. What happens to them when they come out? Is there much blood? I mean, blood shooting from the empty sockets in my gums, or will they simply drop out with a little dust? I’ve had dreams about this, where my teeth were loose and I spent all night holding them in place.

I hadn’t said anything for four hours, afraid to unclench my jaw. The race to string the biggest necklace intensified. Silverware, records, anything was pounced on and incorporated into the decorative noose we were all weaving for our group suicide. Along with squeals of humming and droning, huge beads were rolled across the floor. Shiny gelatinous encrusted goo hung from the walls in various lengths.

I stopped drifting. What was it? I had seen something. Everything was still, just the dry bead stringing noises, the scraping needles, the insects were happy; then I saw it again.

Ondine, master seamstress that he was, leaned into the mirror before me and shot up right in his eyeball. I almost puked into the sink.

Murmurs fluttered, the word was passed, “Shot up in his eye,” and we all took it as an omen that a particularly intense high was ahead of us—all except Andy. He was oblivious, buzzing along on his own little yellow pills. He liked to be next to things, feel the energy, but he didn’t want to know what was really going on, and we were very discreet. Yes, to the normal eye it looked as if everybody simply had an extreme bowel disease, but to us a bathroom became a temple of porcelain and tile, the inner sanctum of bodily functions where only the initiated were allowed, where the dealer held communion, and ritual held sway.

We called them gray people, unfortunates who had lost their souls to get high. All they wanted was to be the one closest to the door, but one twitch from the animal and they scattered along the ground like wingless birds, scuttling into the corners of the room where they tried to look like furniture so no one would throw them out. We had no sympathy for them. To regain their human form all they had to do was leave, the only thing they could not do.
Instead they hovered, searching our eyes for the flicker of recognition that would turn them from ghosts into people again.

“You promised me a shot.” No one looked at anyone. No one spoke. “You promised me a shot!” Quickly everyone moved away, leaving Ann’s exposed mouth opening and shutting on the floor. It was unheard of for a ghost to speak. “Where’s my shot?”

Only Rita moved towards Ann, smiling cordially. “Oh, did I promise you that? Thanks for reminding me.” He pulled out a giant horse syringe. I had never seen anything so big—the needle itself must have been nine feet long.

“You’re right, I have your shot right here. Shall we?” His other hand pointed to the bathroom.

Most people used only one word to describe Rita, and that word was evil. He was the dealer, and a lousy dealer at that. Trying to cop from Rita was a nightmare. His apartment was a bare room with several glaring sunlamps and one black chair that he would sit in, telling you to make yourself comfortable. In the dead of winter people would be sweating in there. If you didn’t have sunglasses it was hard to stay, but he would start insisting that before you score you might like to watch his lover, Birdie, sit on a Coke bottle.

The Factory A-men were mostly fags (they knew each other originally from Riis Park in Brooklyn), except for the Duchess, who was a notorious dyke. They were all incredibly skinny, except for the Duchess, who was incredibly fat. And they all mainlined, except for the Duchess, who skin-popped. All this I only found out later, because at the time I was very naïve—I mean, if you don’t actually see a person shooting up, you don’t believe they could really be doing it. Oh, I’d hear them call someone on the wall pay phone and say, “Can I come over?” and then they’d leave and I’d just assume they were going to pick up some amphetamine. But where they went I never knew. Years later I asked somebody who’d been around a lot then where exactly all the speed had been coming from, and he said, “At first, they got all their speed from Rotten, but then his speed got so bad he wouldn’t even touch it himself, and from then on, everybody got it from Won-Ton.” That was a name I’d heard a lot, but I’d never laid eyes on him. Won-Ton was really short and barrel-chested and he never left his apartment—he always answered the door in the same shiny satin latex royal blue Jantzen bathing suit. That was all he ever wore.” Was he a fag?” I asked. “Well”—this person laughed—”he was living with a woman, but you got the idea he’d do anything with just about anybody. He worked in construction—he had something to do with the Verrazano Bridge.” But where did Won-Ton get the speed? “That was something you just didn’t ask.”

Amphetamine doesn’t give you peace of mind, but it makes not having it very amusing. Billy used to say that amphetamine had been invented by Hitler to keep his Nazis awake and happy in the trenches, but then Silver George would look up from the intricate geometric patterns he was drawing with his Magic Markers—another classic speed compulsion—and insist that it had been invented by the Japanese so they would export more felt-tip pens. Anyway, they both agreed that it hadn’t been invented by any Allies.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 79-81.

Generally speaking, girls were still pretty chubby, but with the new slim clothes coming in, they all went on diets. This was the first year I can remember seeing loads of people drink low-calorie sodas. (Amazingly, lots of the people who got thinner looked better and younger ten years later at the end of the sixties than they had at the beginning. And of course, tits and muscles were on the way out along with fat, because they bulged too much in clothes, too). Since diet pills are made out of amphetamine, that was one reason speed was as popular with Society women as it was with street people. And these Society women would pass out the pills to their whole family, too—to their sons and daughters to help them lose weight, and to their husbands to help them work harder or stay out later. There were so many people from every level on amphetamine, and although it sounds strange, I think a lot of it was because of the new fashions—everyone wanted to stay thin and stay up late to show off their new looks at all the new clubs.

Ibid., pp. 87-8.

who chained themselves to subways for the endless ride from Battery to holy Bronx on Benzedrine

Ginsberg, Howl, p. 10.

If you lived on the East Side, and spent much time mixing with the street culture, the A-heads were unavoidable. They roamed the streets, bistros and pads compulsively shooting, snorting or gobbling an earthly amounts of amphetamine, methedrine, dysoxin, bennies, cocaine, procaine—all of them burning for the flash that would lead to FLASH!

Everybody from Washington Square to Tompkins Square called the streets “the set”—as “I’ve been looking for you all over the set, man. Where is my amphetamine?” With a generation readily present and future life as on a set, there was no need to hunt to far for actors and actresses. What a cast of characters were roaming the Village streets of 1962!

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 201.

Amphetamine altered sex. Some under A’s spell waxed unable in Eros or sublimated their desire beneath the frenzy of endless conversation or art projects. Others with strong natural sensual urges experienced this: that the erogenous areas became extended under A to include every inch of bodily skin. “No piece of skin where you can’t cop a riff of flash, man.”

Within fifteen minutes, the A-heads began to flock, and the sounds of the trilling flute was heard in the hallway of 28 Allen Street, ‘phet-freaks banging most urgently upon the door.

Huncke was sharing an apartment on East Sixth Street. The occupants and habitués of that apartment were shooting amphetamine on an hour-by-hour basis and had been doing so for six weeks, with disastrous effects. Not only were they dropping like mallards into the jails and looney bins of Manhattan, but Beauty was besmirched, and even Huncke was becoming a nervous wreck.

Reay, p. 269.

Those treks up to Myrtle sometimes took forever as I was loading up on all that good shit the neighborhood had to offer: grass, plantains, Café Bustelo, various hot peppers, chorizo, fake opium, those ubiquitous incense bundles, pizza, occasionally some coke.

Kopasz, p. 244.

It was 1983, and between Jay Street and the end of the line at Myrtle and Srteuben, I might have heard Grandmaster Flash’s “White Lines” a dozen times: Freeze! Rock!

Diane was seventeen—and six months removed from the Bronx—sitting with the others on the mattress and floor of the bedroom, yakkety-yakking. Amphetamine had possessed her. She wore her long black tresses swept back into a vague tangled knot behind her. Her eyes were huge and dark—capable of fixing a baleful glazed gaze upon a partner of shoot-up, art or grope. She wore a black short-sleeved scoop-neck bodystocking. Her shoes and other clothes were in a brown bag on the window ledge between the rooms. There was a hole in the stocking’s toe. “See that abscess?” wiggling her white toe which bore a pink sore on the outer tarsal—“Zack shot me up with methedrine. A foot flash!”—breaking into giggles.

Diane drew eyelashes with ink and brush above her lips so that her mouth babbling torrentially had the look of a convulsing cyclops. Next, her twitching Rapidograph pen began to work on her toe. She drew flower petals around her shoot-up sore. Then she ripped at the toe-hole and peeled the stocking up to her thigh and spent the next hour drawing a maze of stick-figures all over the leg. Soon, she had cut a jagged circle out of the stomach of the bodystocking with a razor blade. She studied her stomach, craning her head down, and then began to shave each pale stomach hair with the blade. Sometimes a meth mini-spasm would occur and the steel would nick the skin, leaving a thin red slice. Ouch. She drew an ink sun in the Mayan style rising from the top of her pubic hair. This done, she stood up and said, “Hey, somebody said you were going to bring some amphetamine.”

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 206-7.

He said, “Oh, I took a shot of speed and I couldn’t stop brushing my hair for three days.”

McNeil, p. 14

Dr. Roberts

There were other father figures in New York at that time—the acid doctors. A friend of mine—well, an ex-friend of mine—told me about this terrific doctor where you’d get these vitamin shots—Dr. Charles Roberts. I used to run into Edie there. I went one night, got this shot, and it was the most wonderful shot in the world. I had the answer: I mean, it gives you that rush. There were vitamins in it, and a very strong lacing of methedrine. I’d never heard of methedrine or speed. They never told you what was in the shot anyway. It was a slow evolution. I went there first and got a shot. I went a week later and got another one. And maybe one week later I was feeling kind of down, and I went twice a week. Eventually I was going there every day, and then I was going two or three times a day. Then I went four times a day. Then I started shooting up myself.

Dr. Roberts was the perfect father image. His office, down on Forty-eighth Street on the East Side, was very reputable-looking, with attractive nurses, and he himself looked like a doctor in a movie. He was always telling me of his wonderful experiments with LSD, delivering babies, curing alcoholics... and he was going to open a health farm and spa where all this was going to go on... and naturally he was stoned all the time, too. He wasn't a viper. I just think he was so crazy, he truly thought he was going to help the world. He wasn't out to kill anyone. We were the ones going in and getting the shots. I mean, anyone can set up a booth on the side of the road reading: I'M GIVING ARSENIC SHOTS HERE, but you have to stop and take them.

Over the years that he was riding high, tons of people went to see Dr. Roberts. But there was a little crowd of favorites. When you were a favorite, it meant that you were allowed special privileges. Even if the waiting room was filled with twenty people, you got right in. When you were addicted, being able to get right in was very important. You got bigger shots; you got shot up more than anybody else, and you became more of an addict. It was wonderful to be part of this special group. Edie fit right in. The minute she hit there, she became a special Dr. Roberts person.

I'll give you a description of what it was like to go to Dr. Roberts. The time is two-thirty in the afternoon. I'm going back for my second shot of the day. I open the door. There are twenty-five people in the waiting room: businessmen, beautiful teenagers on the floor with long hair playing guitars, pregnant women with babies in their arms, designers, actors, models, record people, freaks, non-freaks... waiting. Everyone is waiting for a shot, so the tension in the office is beyond belief.

Lucky you, being a special Dr. Roberts person who can whip right in without waiting. Naturally, there's a terribly resentful, tense moment as you rush by because you're going to get your shot.

You attack one of the nurses. By that I mean you grab her and say, "Listen, Susan! Give me a shot!" You're in the corridor with your pants half off, ready to get the shot in your rear. Meanwhile Dr. Roberts comes floating by. Dr. Roberts has had a few shots already, right? So in the middle of this corridor he decides to tell you his complete plan to rejuvenate the entire earth. It’s a thirteen-part plan, but he has lots of time to tell it to you, and as the shot starts to work—Susan having given it to you—you have a lot of time to listen.

In Dr. Roberts’ room would be Edie … so thin that she cannot be given her shot standing up; she has to be down on her stomach. It was a big shot—all those vitamins, niacin, methedrine, God knows what else—for a little girl, so she had to take it lying down.

Meanwhile everyone who’s back in the corridor for the second or third time that day complains that the shots they received that morning haven’t worked. Out in the waiting room you can hear the people complaining that they haven’t even received their first shot yet.

And Dr. Roberts is still going on. In the middle of his thirteen-part plan he decides to tell you about a movie he saw on television… in detail. You, however, are telling him your ideas for whatever you’re going to do. But then Dr. Roberts begins to describe his idea for a plastic Kabuki house. Someone else is showing his sketches for redesigning the Boeing 707 with a psychedelic interior. Big doings at Dr. Roberts’ all the time.

Now you decide to go back out through the waiting room, right? Now you have all the time in the world. Life is a breeze. You’ve used the sun lamp. I mean, you were in a great rush when you came in; now, finally, you decide you’ll leave.

But there in the room are all these people who are not Dr. Roberts’ special people and who still haven’t been serviced. They’re there to spend as much money as you have, but they’re not part of the “in” crowd. So they’re drifting off into craziness because they haven’t gotten their shots. A couple of people are wandering around… their poor systems are so riddled with the methedrine they got half an hour ago they feel is not working that they’ve come back for what Dr. Roberts calls “the booster.” The basic Dr. Roberts shot goes from ten dollars to fifteen dollars. As your resistance to the drug gets to the point of diminishing returns, you move on up. There is a big shot for twenty-five dollars, and if it doesn’t work, you go right back and get “the booster” for five dollars. That’s what some of these poor people are doing—standing out there waiting for the booster. But you… you are flying high, having just had your twenty-five-dollar special, and you walk out into the outer office and say: “Hi. Oh, hi! What a beautiful sweater! Gee, you look wonderful! How are you? Oh, hi! Isn’t it wonderful to see you! What’s happening?”
Before leaving, I’d often go and find Edie in Dr. Roberts’ sauna. If we’d been up all night on drugs, the sauna and steam bath were wonderful things. We’d go out and walk for blocks and blocks… just be together, because we didn’t know what we were saying half the time.

The speed thing was so wonderful because everyone was walking around scared to death… scared because they couldn’t sustain that pace. And so these shots from Dr. Roberts and all those other speed doctors gave you a false sense of being together. You could face everybody when you went out at night. You could dance all night. It was like “the answer.” Nobody knew much about speed in those days.

Once Edie’s mother came to Dr. Roberts’. I remember she was on crutches. She looked like Betty Crocker—gray hair with a little hairnet, a blue print dress, and little glasses. She looked like a librarian from the Midwest standing next to Edie with her cut-off blond hair with the dark roots, thigh-high boots, a mini-skirt, and a kind of chubby fur jacket that looked like it was made out of old cocker spaniels. There they were—the two of them. Mrs. Sedgwick had come to see if Dr. Roberts was taking good care of her little girl… and I guess he must have conned her, because Edie kept going there. I guess the parents paid for her treatment: it cost a lot for those shots.

Ring my friend, I said you call Doctor Robert
Day or night he’ll be there any time at all, Doctor Robert

Doctor Robert, you’re a new and better man
He helps you to understand
He does everything he can, Doctor Robert

If you’re down he’ll pick you up, Doctor Robert Take a drink from his special cup, Doctor Robert Doctor Robert, he’s a man you must believe Helping everyone in need
No one can succeed like Doctor Robert

Well, well, well, you’re feeling fine
Well, well, well, he’ll make you… Doctor Robert

My friend works for the national health, Doctor Robert Don’t pay money just to see yourself with Doctor Robert Doctor Robert, you’re a new and better man
He helps you to understand
He does everything he can, Doctor Robert
Well, well, well, you’re feeling fine
Well, well, well, he’ll make you... Doctor Robert

Ring my friend, I said you’d call Doctor Robert Ring my friend, I said you’d call Doctor Robert

Beatles, “Doctor Robert.”

Paul McCartney: “We’d hear people say, ‘You can get anything off him, any pills you want.’ It was a big racket. The song was a joke about this fellow who cured everyone of everything with all these pills and tranquilizers. He just kept New York high. John paid sardonic tribute to an actual New York doctor. His real name was Charles Roberts, whose unorthodox prescriptions had made him a great favorite of Andy Warhol’s entourage and, indeed, of The Beatles themselves, whenever they passed through town.”

In fact, the name was based on the New York Dr. Feelgood character Dr. Robert Freymann, whose discreet East 78th Street clinic was conveniently located for Jackie Kennedy and other wealthy Upper East Siders from Fifth Avenue and Park to stroll over for their vitamin B-12 shots, which also happened to contain a massive dose of amphetamine. Dr. Robert’s reputation spread and it was not long before visiting Americans told John and Paul about him.

German born Robert Freymann, sometimes known as Dr. Robert or “The Great White Father” (reportedly because of having a tuft of white hair), continued his practice in New York for many years administering legal amphetamines in larger than needed doses to mostly well-to-do clients. “I have a clientele that is remarkable, from every sphere of life,” he has stated. “I could tell you in ten minutes probably 100 famous names who come here.” He continued his practice until he was expelled from the New York State Medical Society in 1975 for malpractice. His book What’s So Bad About Feeling Good? was published in 1983 He passed away in 1987.

Falter, n.pag.

Often people got introduced to Dr. Roberts as a present. Going to him was the great gift of the time. If you really loved someone, you took him to Dr. Roberts as a gift and let him feel the feeling. Or if you were trying to make somebody, you’d go around to Dr. Roberts, and after the shots you’d get very oversexed and you’d fuck. People used him in that way. His office was a social focal point.

I’ve forgotten who took me there first. Someone said, “Hey, Cherry Vanilla, let’s go over to Dr. Roberts.” Cherry Vanilla is a name I thought up when somebody asked what I’d call myself if I wrote a column for a rock magazine, and I said, “Cherry Vanilla... scoops for you!” Everybody loved it. Anyway, someone said, “Come on, Cherry Vanilla,” and we went over to Dr. Roberts. I was fascinated. All these freaky people were sitting around, rapping their brains out in the office, in the middle of the day.

Then Dr. Roberts moved his office. He had a sauna and a big mirrored room with a dance floor. Four floors. Never completed. You’d get your shot in the hallway, sometimes from the nurse. You and your friend could go in together and both get them at once, and even give each other shots. It was all big fun-and-games.

I became like an acid queen. I loved it. My looks got crazier and crazier. I started getting into things like pink wigs, teasing them up to make them real big and like bubbles. I’d wear goggle glasses and real crazy make-up: spidery lashes and white lips, and micro-minis. I saw a micro-mini on Edie and immediately started cutting everything off. Kenneth Jay Lane earrings. Big Robert Indiana LOVE earrings, giant love paintings on my ears. Little bikini undies, a band around the top; and we made these silver dresses that were just silver strings hanging on us. I was surrounded by a lot of gay boys in designing and decorating who would always give me a hand in pulling some look together. I would go out half naked with see-through things. You took a scarf and wrapped it around you and thought you were dressed.

I gave Dr. Roberts a shot once. In the ass, in his office about five o’clock in the morning. I had been playing records at Aux Puces—I was the disc jockey there—and he had come around to visit and said, “If you come back to my office with me, I’ll give you a shot.” It was a freebie, which was nice because those shots were not cheap.

I really got into having a needle in the ass. Just the feeling of it. I got into the pain of it. You got the shot, then this taste in your mouth, and you got a rush and you knew you were getting high. It was all very sexual in a way, and very “in” and social and stylish to do it. So I went back to his office with him and I gave him one and he gave me one.

I don’t know what he shot me up with, but it was something I had certainly never had before. I was really very numbed. Maybe it was cocaine. Sometimes he would shoot you with LSD. You never knew what he was going to shoot you with. He’d throw a little surprise in every once in a while. So we got involved in a rather heavy sex encounter. [Fashion]
Dr. Roberts says, "Hello, girls . . . how are we today? Are you all ready? Okay. Hop up. Put all your weight on this leg. Okay? Ready? My god, this rear end looks like a battlefield."

You want to hear something I wrote about the horror of speed? Well, maybe you don’t, but the nearly incommunicable torments of speed, buzzerama, that acrylic high, horrorous, yodeling, repetitious echoes of an infinity so brutally harrowing that words cannot capture the devastation nor the tone of such a vicious nightmare. Yes, I’m even getting paranoid, which is a trip for me. I don’t really dig it, but there it is.

It’s hard to choose between the climactic ecstasies of speed and cocaine. They’re similar. Oh, they are so fabulous. That fantabulous sexual exhilaration. Which is better, coke or speed? It’s hard to choose. The purest speed, the purest coke, and sex is a deadlock.

Speeding and booze. That gets funny. You get chattering at about fifty miles an hour over the downdraft, and booze kind of cools it. It can get very funny. Utterly ridiculous. It’s a good combination for a party. Not for an orgy, though.

Speedball! Speed and heroin. That was the first time I had a shot in each arm. Closed my eyes. Opened my arms. Closed my fists, and jab, jab. A shot of cocaine and speed, and a shot of heroin. Stripped off all my clothes, leapt downstairs, and ran out on Park Avenue and two blocks down it before my friends caught me. Naked. Naked as a lima bean. A speedball is from another world. It’s a little bit dangerous. Pure coke, pure speed, and pure sex. Wow! The ultimate in climax. Once I went over to Dr. Roberts for a shot of cocaine. It was very strange because he wouldn’t tell me what it was and I was playing it cool. It was my first intravenous shot, and I said, “Well, I don’t feel it.” And so he gave me another one, and all of a sudden I went blind. Just flipped out of my skull! I ended up wildly bailing him. And flipping him out of his skull. He was probably shot up… he was always shooting up around the corner anyway.

Ibid., p. 267.

The next day, the Duchess told us she’d been in her pill doctor’s office on Fifth Avenue when the lights went out. A lot of people used to go to this one particular doctor—he gave them what they wanted.
"I was in Doctor Pill’s office and I was thrilled. I thought ‘This is it, the big haul.’ I stuffed as much as I could get my hands on into my pocketbooks while he went out to see what was happening, and I ran out of there across to the park and sat down by the Met. I couldn’t wait to see what I’d gotten. It turned out to be some green iron pills, some Phisohex, and lots of that green soap doctors use. I didn’t get anything, my dear. But oh, what a place to be in the dark…"

"Is he a legal doctor?" I asked, because I knew all the kids got drugs there and I’d heard that some drag queens were getting hormone sots from him—I mean, it sounded like a big social club there.

"Well, naturally he’s not legal when he does abortions, but yes, he’s a legal doctor."

"And he’s never gotten in trouble with the police?"

"Oh, they know about him, but it’ll take years to get him. They’ve got to have proof—they’ve almost got to catch him doing it…"

"But why would a real doctor take a chance like that?"

"He needs the money, he gambles. He bets on the trotters every day—that’s where it all goes. So he has to do abortions and charge a fortune for pills. But if I give him, say, an old invitation to a debutante ball or something—one of those fancy engraved ones—he gives me a bottle of amphetamine for free because he wants to impress his friends"

"Oooo," I said, "he must be creepy. Is he?"

"No. Actually I adore him."

"How much did your abortion cost?" I asked her.

"A lot. Eight hundred dollars. But he followed up on me that night, and they don’t usually do that, you know? They usually just dump you afterward. He brought me home and gave me orange juice and tea, and every day for five days he came over to give me penicillin injections. Believe me, it was worth the eight hundred dollars. His office has paintings by movie stars who are too famous to mention." She laughed, and then she mentioned them.

Whatever anyone may have thought, the truth is I never gave Edie a drug, ever. Not even one diet pill. Nothing. She certainly was taking a lot of amphetamine and downs, but she certainly wasn’t getting any of them from me. She was getting them from that doctor who was shooting up every Society lady in town.

Ibid., p. 136.
Dr. Bishop’s Waiting Room: 420 E. 51st. Diet doctor of the moment! Fashionable party ever-present for daily, nightly treatments. Includes sauna. Good for all contracts. Petronious, p. 46.

Opium

The hands of a clock prominently displayed in the window of a Chatham Square jewelry store point to 2 o’clock in the morning. The boulevard of the East Side is thronged with pedestrians. Night brings them over here when the rest of the city is asleep, recalling the old adage, “One half of this great city knows nothing about the other half.” Within half a dozen doors from the shop where the clock hangs is Pell Street a narrow, dark, gruesome, thoroughfare. This portion of the Chinese quarter is given over to the occupancy of loose women and men who are, if anything, on a lower scale morally than their wretched consorts. The houses are old and dilapidated veritable rookeries swarming in the daytime with Mongol-American children who give place, as night draws near, to the frowsy haired and foul-mouthed women who make the dark halls a rendezvous. No. 10 is a house much like the rest, with possibly the exception that an air of quiet pervades it in the daytime. Visitors are few, occasionally a man or woman better dressed than those of the neighborhood. They come from the Tenderloin, and in the early part of the night are frequenters of the Empire the Bijou on Sixth Avenue the Haymarket and similar places. They climb up the steps leading from the cellar and hurry away. These steps lead down to a little square bit of standing room built about with boards nailed firm and strong as if an attack was expected. Little pencils of light sift through cracks made by inequalities in the timber and from a knothole in the door, a single red eye in the forehead of a very watchful demon confronts you. If you would enter, knock, wait and presently you will hear the rattle of a chain the shifting of a bolt and the door is opened by an attendant who peers out into the gloom bringing with him a smell pungent and heavy. If he knows you or concludes that you look all right, the chain is loosened and you enter the opium joint.

Near the door is an apartment very much like a booth at a country fair or like an enclosure in Central Park where the sacred bull or some other animal is kept to be stared at. In the booth is a platform which takes up nearly all the available space. It is two feet from the floor and is covered with Chinese matting. In the center is a square black walnut tray holding a variety of articles familiar to the opium smoker. By the tray is the pipe itself. This particular pipe is a good one and brought on here from San Francisco by Mo Iling. It is used only by the Celestial proprietor. A piece of bamboo about fifteen inches long so soaked by repeated smokings that it looks like ebony is the stem. Two thirds of the distance from the ivory mouthpiece is the bowl made of red clay and marked around the sides with Chinese characters. The top of the bowl is flat but in the center is a pin hole over which the cooked pill is placed. This particular pipe is worth $50. The value increases with age. A Chinaman is smoking. He is Sing the proprietor. His lips are fixed against the mouthpiece and he draws steadily. While the smoke is ejected through his nostrils, the pill makes a crackling noise as it turns over the flame and as it is gradually drawn into the little hole.

Pass between the folds of a calico curtain to the joint proper and this is what you will see. It is a room about thirty feet long by about twelve wide. Beginning at a point about three feet from the floor are several separate and distinct strata of smoke which rise and fall like the bosom of the sea disturbed by a swell. The pungent odor which greeted you at the door is intensified a hundredfold and is heavy and sensuous. [A score of little lamps dot the place here and there and are burning bravely as if they were trying to light up the surroundings. Their attempt at illumination is a failure. They were not intended to illuminate, hence their failure in that regard. Vice loves gloom and goes hand in hand with darkness. Here is vice of the vilest kind imported vice. On either side of the room there is a row of board bunks, as habitués say, erected about two feet from the floor and covered like the platform in the outer room with matting and dotted with wooden head rests or little wads of straw covered with green gingham which serve as pillows. This is the hour for the fiends, and there is little unoccupied space on the bunks.

A party of four is the usual company with one lay out and one pipe. Two lie, one on either side of the tray, and use the head rests. The other two lie on their companions so that no space is wasted. One acts as cook and the pipe goes around in turn between choice bits of conversation and morsels of gossip. Hop fiends do not stand on ceremony nor among them is regard paid to personal appearance while in the joint. There is a knock at the door and a party of newcomers is announced. [Smell] [Light]

When the Chinese in 1875 began migrating in numbers from the Pacific coast to this city they brought with them their opium pots well filled and the paraphernalia for its use. But while they settled in an isolated locality by themselves the noxious fumes of their opium pipes pervaded the entire city and rapidly won devotees to its use. And so it happens that to day we are debarred from pointing a finger at Chinatown and saying, “There that degrading disgusting and soul destroying habit of opium smoking is indulged therefore we must drive the Chinese out.” Opium is smoked to day in all quarters of the city and by all classes of the community alike. The number of hop fiends as opium smokers are called is far greater in New York than people have any idea of and seems to be growing rapidly.

_Ibid._, p. 139.

There are about twenty or more places in Chinatown in which opium is sold in twenty-five and fifty cent portions. The gum, which is bought from wholesale druggists, is spread out thin in a baking pan and baked slowly over a mild fire until almost crisp. It is then dissolved in water over night and strained through a piece of fine flannel. Then it is again boiled over a slow fire until the liquid becomes of the consistency of molasses This is known as No. 1 opium.

_Ibid._, p. 144

The places where opium smoking is provided for and may be indulged for a price by all comers like liquor drinking in a saloon are called “joints.” There are a great many of these joints scattered throughout Chinatown the most of them hidden in obscure places and all more or less surrounded with mystery out of deference to or fear of the police... To gain an entrance to it you will have to go along a narrow unlighted dingy alley to a barricaded door. Upon the signal given by your guide the door will be open, leading through a Chinese wood yard, up a narrow rickety stairs, along a narrow creaky porch, to the second flight of stairs, leading down to door No 2. On gaining an entrance there by signal you will find yourself in a dimly lighted underground room where from fifteen to twenty people Chinamen and white women will be found hitting the pipe. Others may be seen sitting at tables gambling away the few pennies they may have. The place is dark gloomy and filthy. Along the sides of the apartment are ranged a number of slightly raised platforms which serve as bunks for the smokers. They are without furniture save a block of wood which serves as a head rest or pillow. The paraphernalia or lay out for smoking is brought to the bunk on order by the proprietor or attendant. This lay out consists of the following essential articles:

The Yen Tsiang (opium pipe), Ow (opium bowl), Yen Hock
(a thin wire used for dipping out the opium and holding it over the light while cooking), Yen Hop (a box containing the opium), Yen Dong (opium lamp), Kiao Tsien (scissors), Sui Pow (a sponge to wipe off the bowl of the pipe when soiled), Dao (a cleaning knife), Yen tau Kar (a box or bureau used for setting the bowl on), Yen Shee Hop (a box for keeping the ashes in).

For all this you make payment and are then at liberty to proceed with your smoking and when satisfied or overcome sleep and dream as long as you please or can survive in the close, fetid atmosphere of the room. The person who smokes opium always does so reclining usually stretched across the hard wooden bunk which is simply carpeted with straw matting a small stool or a beveled block of wood serving as a pillow. Resting on his left side the smoker takes up a little of the treacle-like mass upon the steel needle yen hock and holding it about the flame of a lamp watches it bubble and swell to six or seven times its usual size. In doing so it loses its inky hue and becomes a bright golden brown color giving out a pleasant creamy odor much admired by old smokers. Poor opium does not yield so pleasant an odor and is liable to drop from the needle into the flame of the lamp and rarely gives so handsome a color the yellow being here and there streaked with black. This process is known as cooking the hop or opium. Having brought it to a proper consistency the operator, with a rapid twirling motion of the fingers holding the long needle, rolls the mass upon the smooth surface of the bowl submitting it occasionally to the flame and now and then catching it on the edge of the bowl and pulling it out into strings in order to cook it through and more thoroughly. This is called chying—the mass or pill.

Rolling it again upon the surface of the bowl until the opium is formed into a small pea sized mass with the needle as a center the needle is thrust into the small hole in the center of the bowl thus leveling off the bottom. [Odor]

Beck, pp. 146-8.

There are many Chinamen in Chinatown who make a living buying Yen Shee or opium ashes. They collect these ashes from all available sources. This refuse is dissolved in water when it is subjected to a process by which whatever of the original drug may be retained in it is recovered and remanufactured. This is known as No. 2 opium. It is then mixed with No. 1 and becomes what is called Yen She Cow or half and half, and is sold at a reduced price to the lower class of joints and to those smokers who cannot command the price of the pure drug. Fortunes or what are esteemed such among the Chinese have been made from this business.

[Garbage]
Ibid., pp. 152-3.

Waiting for a door in the East River to open to a room full of steamheat and opium
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 15.

On the wall of the squat at 8th and Avenue C was written, "Opium is the religion of the people."
Kopasz, p. 242.

Various

I was scared now and tripping my brains out. I crawled out the window onto the fire escape, which faced south and offered a perfectly framed view of the World Trade Center, where I'd worked as a foot messenger just a few years earlier. The two towers hovered over me changing color from blue to purple to pink and cycling back through again and again. [World Trade Center]
Kopasz, p. 246

Day-trips
in Washington Sq.
Park, dropping out-STONED on SAMO. Two hits of acid a day

The L.I.E. the B.Q.E
Hippies at the band shell with the L.S.D. [Graffiti]
[Downtown] [Art]

Beastie Boys, "Open Letter."

The Easter Sunday Be-In in Central Park was incredible; thousands of kids handing you flowers, burning incense, smoking grass, taking acid, passing drugs around right out in the open, taking their clothes off and rolling around on the ground, painting their bodies and faces with Day-Glo, doing Far East-type chants, playing with their toys—balloons and pinwheels and sheriff’s badges and Frisbees. They could stand there staring at each other for hours without moving. As I said before, that had always fascinated me, the way people could sit by a window or on a porch all day and look out and never be bored, but then if they went to a movie or a play, they suddenly objected to being bored.
I always felt that a very slow film could be just as interesting as a porch-sit if you thought about it the same way. And now all these kids on acid were demonstrating the exact same thing.

[Voyeur] [Boredom]
Warhol, POPism, p. 261.

The primary colors of crack vial tops decorated the sidewalks.
Schmitz, p. 270.

I tried to look away politely, but all I could find to stare at were three spent crack vials floating in the puddle of urine that almost inevitably adorns the corners of New York City Housing Authority elevators in El Barrio at 2:00 a.m. on Saturday nights.
Courgois, p. 258.

In 1907, the cost of cocaine on New York City streets, as revealed by newspaper and police accounts after the law’s enactment, was typically 25 cents a packet, or “deck.”... Packets, commonly glassine envelopes, usually contained one to two grains (65 to 130 milligrams), or about a tenth of a gram. The going rate was roughly 10 times that of the wholesale price, a ratio not unlike recent cocaine street prices, although in the past few years the street price has actually been lower in real value than what it was in 1910.
Musto, pp. 40-7.

“You’ve got some blow?” she says.
“Is Stevie Wonder blind?” you say.
McInerney, p. 7.

Every time we played New York, this guy would come by our show and give the Stooges a little bottle of coke, completely on his own volition. So we’re sitting backstage with Miles Davis, and this guy finally arrives and just throws down a big old pile.
We already had the straws ready. Imagine that great scene—Miles Davis’s head right next to all the heads of the Stooges going “sNNNORRRRT!”
McNeil, p. 65.

I never really sniffed glue or Carbona. I never got really heavy into the paper bag. I did it, but I didn’t get into it like Johnny and Dee Dee did. They used to go up on the roof and sniff Carbona and sniff glue and shit. It was this sensation, like “Bzzzz, bzzz, bzzz.”
Ibid., pp. 177-8.

Leave New York at 7:30 PM for Paris. Came to airport in limo with Adolfo Arena. Smoking pot all the way to the airport.
Haring, p. 166.
Quaaludes were great, the Love Drug, they made you real horny. You just wanted to rip off your clothes and scream, "Suck my dick!"
McNeil, p. 269.

A Quaalude nirvana.
Haden-Guest, p. 103.

The original, medicinal form of poppers was amyl nitrate, a "vascular dilator" used by people with angina.
Young, Stonewall, p. 104.

In the gay ghettos of the Seventies and early Eighties, poppers were always at the center of the action. On any given night at, say, the Anvil in Manhattan, a large percentage of the men on the dance floor would have poppers in hand, and many of the rest would be helping to pass the bottles around. Some disco clubs would even add to the general euphoria by occasionally spraying the dance floor with poppers fumes... permeated with that particularly inert, greasy odor of poppers. Wherever you went, the musky chemical smell of it was constantly in your nostrils. He found himself heading to the single, small window, in order to gasp a few breaths of "something other than the cold, kerosene smell of amyl. [Smell]
Ibid., p. 103-4

I was visiting friends in The Pines, and was spending a couple of hours at the disco one night. Across the room, I noticed an acquaintance of mine... dancing up a storm and inhaling liberally from a poppers bottle which he kept in the pocket of his jeans. Somehow in the course of the evening, the bottle broke, and the contents spilled all over [his] leg, giving him a terrible and very unsightly burn. It made me wonder what kind of damage inhaling the stuff must do.
Ibid., pp. 103

A brand of poppers called Cum showed its bottle as a dripping cock and balls.
Ibid., pp. 104.

It was a cold and bitter night. The wind was nearly as exhilarating as the amyl nitrite they were popping in the taxi. [Air]
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 57.

In the gay ghettos of the Seventies and early Eighties, poppers were always at the center of the action. On any given night at, say, the Anvil in Manhattan, a large percentage of the men on the dance floor would have poppers in hand, and many of the rest would be helping to pass the bottles around. Some disco clubs would even add to the general euphoria by occasionally spraying the dance floor with poppers fumes. [Smell]

Young, Stonewall, pp. 103.

At the Paradise Garage: “In the morning empty poppers and ethyl rags lay strewn about the dance floor. Morning, it is worth noting, was after 7 AM.”

“She’ll Be Good,” n.pag.

At Burroughs’ apartment, Ter emptied the bag of drug samples onto Bill’s big parlor table, and as I turned on the tape and fired up the bomber, Bill motioned us to fix our drinks, donned his reading glasses, and settled in for a good scrutiny of the dope labels, using a magnifying glass like a jeweler examining precious stones.

BURROUGHS: Now then, what is all this shit, Terry?

TERRY SOUTHERN: Bill, these are pharmaceutical samples, sent by the drug companies to Big Ed Fales, the friendly druggist, and to Doc Tom Adams, the writing croak. Anything that won’t cook up, we’ll eat. Give them good scrutiny, Bill.

BURROUGHS: Indeed I shall.

SOUTHERN: We’ll get them into the old noggin one way or the other! On double alert for Demerol, Dilaudid, and the great Talwin!

BURROUGHS: Pain—I’m on the alert for the word pain...

[murmuring, as he examines the label]: Hmm... yes... yes... yes, indeed [reading from a label]: “Fluid-control that can make life livable.” Well, that could apply to blood, water...

[reading another label].

SOUTHERN: All our precious bodily fluids!

BURROUGHS: I’ll just go through these methodically. Anything of interest I’ll put to one side... [makes a separate grouping].

SOUTHERN [getting a paper bag]: We’ll put rejects in here.

BURROUGHS [gesture of restraint]: I’m just picking out what might be of interest... [examining a label]: Here’s a possible [sets it aside].

SOUTHERN: Now a lot of these are new synthetics, Bill—names you may not be familiar with, because they’re disguising the heavy drug within! This could warrant some serious research, and a good article for one of the dope mags—on how the pharmaceutical companies connive to beat the FDA—you know, and get Cosonal back on the shelf!

BURROUGHS [scrutinizing a bottle]: I don’t really know what this one may be...

SOUTHERN [enthusiastically]: Well then, down the old gullet with it, Bill! Better safe than sorry!
BURROUGHS [dryly]: I think not.
SOUTHERN [picks up a bottle and reads]: “For pimples and acne” [throws it aside in disgust]. Now here… “lcktazinga” [handing it to Bill]: Ring a bell?
BURROUGHS [examining it]: “Chewable.” I’m not much interested in anything chewable… [makes a wry face].
Bockris, Burroughs, pp. 95–6.

Half the people in this city can’t sleep without pills.
Conrad, p. 276.

The down of the day was Darvon. Then Black Beauties, Christmas Trees. The downs were to take the pain away that was always there. The ups were to keep them going so that they could go out on tears all night. They never slept.
Carter, p. 59.

(sotto voce: “Loose joints, Valium, black beauties . . .
‘Ludes . . . Sen’similla . . .”)
Delany, p. 7.

On Forty-second near Fifth a kid falls into stride beside you.
“Loose joints. Genuine Hawaiian sens. Downers and uppers.”
McInerney, p. 108.

In Washington Square Park, a pot dealer walked around holding up notebook pages covered with scribble. “These are testimonials from my satisfied customers!” he crowed.

Three thousand persons selected at random from the phone book were sent a well-rolled marijuana cigarette with a card saying, “Happy Valentines Day.” … (in case you’re curious, Jimi Hendrix financed the entire marijuana mailing.)
Hoffman, Autobiography, p. 111.

That summer, for the first time really, pot was all over the place. But acid still wasn’t being dropped out of helicopters yet. You still had to “know somebody.”
Not that much dope was being handed around on the Village streets yet, although the Duchess had a friend who hung out around Washington Square with the M taken off the M & Ms and told the kids from the boroughs, “It’s dynamite dope, only don’t chew it because if you do you’ll die. See, it has to dissolve after it gets to your stomach.” He’d deal sugar to little girls from Brooklyn—he wouldn’t even bother to mash it up, he’d just take a box of granulated Domino out of his jacket and pour it into something. How did he get away with it? “I’m a spade, man,” he’d explain. “They worship me. They want to shoot up, I say, ‘You girls should sniff it, stay high longer, ask somebody.’”

Kids were so naïve about drugs in ’65. Nobody knew how to buy dope yet—but a lot of people sure knew how to sell it.

Warhol, POPism, p. 147.

Once, while visiting my parents in New Jersey, I ran into a high-school classmate I hadn’t seen in years. When he found out where I lived, he told me he visited the neighborhood sometimes in his capacity as freight agent for a large-scale marijuana importer. The outfit rented an apartment a few blocks away from me that was employed as a depot for goods being moved from one distant city to another. Years later, a friend who was a musician and a carpenter, told me he had spent the previous three months refitting a nearby apartment for a pot dealer. The circumstances were different, though. Prices had increased significantly and so, correspondingly, had apprehension. This dealer, a wholesaler for local traffic, had engaged my friend to put in numerous false walls and invisible compartments and sliding panels, as well as a booth by the door for the guard, with a hole through which he could poke the muzzle of his piece. [Maciunas]

Sante, “Commerce,” p. 106.

For many years there were numerous commercial establishments that sold marijuana. Summer candy stores, some social clubs, some bodegas. But what they had in common was a slot in the rear wall into which you would push her money, generally $10, and from which you would collect your little Manila envelope. The most famous were probably the Black Door and the Blue Door which glared at one another from opposite sides of 10th St. One was an empty room, the other featured a pool table; one marked its bags with the Maltese-cross stamp, the other didn’t.

Ibid., p. 105.
Q - Sound

Remarkable, unspeakable New York.
James, p. 527.

A city of people talking, to themselves, to their gods, to dead parents, to errant lovers and doomful doctors, to the friends who come and go. A city of people acting out, folks talking loud to no one or to everyone at once on the IRT--thanking you for your generosity before it's offered, biting your pant leg with their maladies and tales of hard luck. A city of menacing bargains struck by strangers, who ask charity in return for not mugging you or robbing you blind. A city of people speaking in tongues. Some of them are talking to space aliens who control their brains from the antenna atop the World Trade Center. You've heard these people muttering in strange syllables. The aliens may have heard them, too.
Trebay, p. 3.

But what is the voice of New York? Has this voice changed now that the elevated no longer cuts across all Manhattan with his fire-breathing steel structures, and the agonizing siren songs of massive ocean liners along the East River and Hudson are no more? Someone, perhaps Walt Whitman in 1842, wondered what had New York--noisy, trembling, bustling, stormy, turbulent New York--to do with silence.

True, there are (though they do exist) very few pockets of silence where sound as a kind of continual comment on everyday life, a genuine leitmotif that sums up the thousand contradictions of the city--strident, aggressive, and violent, or sweet, soothing, and amicable. In certain subway stations, the thunder can be frightening in the extreme, a rolling rumble that almost induces feelings of panic as the train draws near. J.D. Salinger was right when he wrote "New York's terrible when somebody laughs on the street very late at night. You can hear it from miles. It makes you feel lonesome and depressed." With its honkings, sirens, skiddings, and breakings, the traffic is a constantly grating presence. But the streets of New York reverberate with an incessant variety of sounds and noises: the voices--full, high-pitched, and rhythmic--of those with the streets, the witty remark of a young black leaning against the wall, the rustling of squirrels in the grass or among the branches above, the hurried scurrying along the massive sidewalk stones, the wooden thud of skateboards leaping upstairs, the intermittent whirring of helicopter blades, the metal frizzle a police car radios, the full-throated singing of the passerby... a succession of sounds that demands our attention, that creates a tension all of its own.

Once removed from the fortuitous and fleeting condition—their fluctuating consistency—they are sounds that, like the images we have of New York, tells a great deal about the history and culture of the city. For example, someone whose name escapes me for the moment once said that the sound of the jackhammer typifies New York the same way the chiming of big Ben typifies London: and its resounding centrality—it’s sheer physical everyday reality—cannot but remind us (yet again) of the mainsprings hidden away in the depths of the metropolitan mechanism.

But the experience of sound of New York is extremely various in nature. I remember the first night I spent in Queens, many years ago. I was awoken a peculiar hissing sound continually wailing away and changing pitch; sleepless from jet lag, I simply had to satisfy my curiosity. Unable to resist the temptation of discovering where the noise came from, I got up from the sofa bed in the sitting room where I was temporarily being lodged, afraid of turning a light for fear of waking my hosts. Hand stretched out in front of me, I started fumbling about the house in search of where the sound was coming from, and on reaching the kitchen I let out an almighty yell: I had grabbed hold of the massive, boiling-hot pipe of the steam heating system. The sound had given me a sharp—and decidedly palpable!—lesson in the history of the city.

Since that time I have learned to recognize (and live with) the variety of sounds that fill the apartments with an almost physical density and bulk: the vibration of the air as it sneaks its way about the stairways of the high-rises, crying out in the corridors and shaking the doors; the howling of the wind whistling through cracks in the guillotine windows; the deep droning of that air-conditioning system of the supermarket below the house; the sound of a phrase muttered in the narrow streets that echoes all the way up to the top floor... It is difficult not to be reminded of something that Fitzgerald wrote in “My Lost City”: “The gentle playing of an oboe mingled with the city noises from this brief outside, which penetrated into the room with difficulty through great barricades of books...” But this sparks off memories of another night in New York (again, after I had just flown then), when a typically frenzied block party lulled me off to sleep at five in the morning with extremely limited and aggressive next of salsa and merengue being played at a nearby corner turned into a square and dancing hall.

All this music making in the city’s public places... Of course, it is not an exclusively New York experience, but I do not think it is an entirely casual phenomenon either. It has as much to do with a very direct relationship with the metropolis, its spaces and its rhythms.

Maffi, pp. 103-5.

I sit there and listen to every sound: the freight elevator moving in the shaft, the sound of the grate opening and closing when people get in and went out, the steady traffic all the way downstairs on 47th Street, the projector running, a camera shutter clicking, a magazine page turning, somebody lighting a match, the colored sheets of gelatin and sheets of silver paper moving when the fan hits them, the high school typists hitting a key every couple of seconds, the scissors shearing as Paul cuts out E.P.I. clippings and pastes them into scrapbooks, the water running over the prints in Billy’s darkroom, the timer going off, the dryer operating, someone trying to make the toilet work, men having sex in the back room, girls closing compacts and makeup cases. The mixture of the mechanical sounds and the people sounds make everything seem unreal and if you hear a projector going while you are watching somebody, you feel that they must be a part of the movie, too.

Warhol, POPism, p. 172.

Audited correctly, New York can be heard speaking the Esperanto of abstraction.

Linguistically, New York’s nearest approach to the world language of abstraction’s Esperanto is in its bastardizing of tongues. Sometimes more than one language is spoken in a single word. The pidgin English which results comically gestures toward monoglot Babel. Vladimir Mayakofsky, visiting New York in 1925, hears the émigrés on Broadway conversing in mispronounced English catchphrases which he transcribes as Russian neologisms “chuingam” for chewing gum, “Mek monei” for the admonition to get rich.

Conrad, p. 122.

Language as ascetically abstract as the skeletal New York grid.

Ibid., p. 124.
Picabia is delighted by the conflict of tongues in New York because his art wants to reach the plastic or grammatic universals that those clashing tribal dialects have in common.

Ibid., pp. 117-8.

Since Babel, the only language that remains globally (but abstractly) intelligible is music, and this too can be heard in New York, in the mechanical bruit of the streets.

Ibid., p. 118.

Has a history of metropolitan sound has ever been written? A study of all the different elements involved, the transformations that take place with each passing epoch, the effects on the life of the city and and the way in which culture recorded and incorporated it.

Maffi, p. 103.

It is almost impossible at any season of the year or in any quarter of the city to escape the sound of blasting, which reminds one that Manhattan, like the church of Rome is built on solid rock, or the sound of riveting, that process by which molten bolts are urged to bind steel girders together. Sometimes these sounds are imminent and ear-splitting, sometimes they are dull rackets in the distance, but their permanence seems fairly secure. So does that of the rumble of the elevated railways, the clanging of bells on the trolley-cars, the shrinking of the taxi sirens, the explosions of exhausted gas from automobiles, the late evening cries of Extra! (usually unheeded), proclaiming another edition of the tabloids, the song of the radio, Crying for the Carolines, through so many open windows or through the fragile floors or frail walls of apartment houses, the beating of the steam in cold radiators, Rudy Vallee and Duke Ellington, and in the morning, the hurling of tin trash-receptacles by the refuse man against brick walls or the clatter of milk bottles upon cement floorings. These are a few of the predominant contemporary New York sounds, most of which did not exist twenty years ago and many of which may have departed in favor of newer dins in the 1950.

Van Vechten, p. 141.

Sounds burst forth, they move in the streets, rebound off the walls, build houses. You can almost touch them. The day will be full of them: the intermittent wail a fire trucks rushing by, the scream of police cars, the long, drawn-out screeching of breaking yellow taxis, the dull thud of cars landing of the huge metal sheets thrown down to cover up the roadworks, the excessive chanting of antitheft devices, the roaring of the subway, the machine gun-like chorus of jackhammers, the rhythmic pounding of drills tearing up the earth to lay the foundations of a new tower block, the guttural shrieking of the poor wretch hobbling along the sidewalk, and the vibrations emanating from a radio sitting on the shoulder of some ghetto boy... A blend of longings and frustrations, tenderness and harshness—less a contemporary babel than a polyphony—a concert of ostensibly discordant sounds that eventually settles and amalgamates, and tells the metropolis.

Hence, when I am at home in the evening, the windows tinged with red and yellow as the city at last catches its breath, I know I will shortly hear the ice-cream truck coming from afar, almost as if in the dream. The sounds of the city continue to clash and overlap even at that hour, but the sweet melody of the approaching truck—like that of an immense music box—is a charm able to dialogue with those sounds, almost reconciling them one to the other. The truck reaches the corner, then it stops for a few minutes down below, filling my house with familiar notes and affectionate melodies, hypnotic in their undulating movement, and folding every other sound—every other noise—of the pulsating city at dark at dusk.

At that moment I stop whatever I'm doing, and smile: that stinky music box melody is my very own private New York "Nocturne."

Air, Wind

The slashed canyons of lower Broadway play curious tricks with sounds as with air currents. At some points the echoes seem to collide and burst into a noise like the booming of a great gun.

Irwin, p. 41.

The high walls of the houses also play an important part in producing this symptom, for they reflect the noise and cause the sound-waves to reverberate back and forth many times, thus greatly increasing the evil effects of a single discordant sound on the ears. The capacity of city streets for transmitting and intensifying sounds is shown in the great distance at which the rap of a policeman’s club on the pavement can be heard.
   Girdner, p. 128.

One can rigorously control the placement of skyscrapers in such a way that no reflective surfaces are offered to street noises, and thus the desired silence can be secured.
   Corbusier, p. 66.

Silence, Quiet

The financial streets are deserted. It is so quiet one can hear, walking through a narrow street, the staccato noise of a typewriter in one of the few offices in which people are still working. No flags fly from the plentiful flagpoles. The jewelers on lower Broadway have removed their prim window displays for the weekend and pulled their shades. All the restaurants are closed. They will not open again until Monday morning. In these narrow streets of corporations and tickertape there is no life.
   Mitchell, Ears, p. 196.

In a high wind tenants sometimes hear ghost "typewriters" tapping away like mad in empty offices—but this is only the building’s steel skeleton creaking and groaning.
   Botkin, p. 257.

On weekends in summer the town empties. I visit my office on a Saturday afternoon. No phone rings, no one feeds the hungry IN-baskets, no one disturbs the papers; it is a building of the dead, a time of awesome suspension. The whole city is honeycombed with abandoned cells—a jail that has been effectively broken. Occasionally from somewhere in the building a night bell rings, summoning the elevator—a special fire-alarm rings. This is the pit of loneliness, in an office on a summer Saturday. I stand at the window and look down at the batteries and batteries of offices across the way, recalling how the thing looks in winter twilight when everything is going full blast, every cell lighted, and how you can see in pantomime the puppets fumbling with their slips of paper (but you don’t hear the rustle), see them pick up their phone (but you don’t hear the ring), see the noiseless, ceaseless moving about of so many passers of pieces of paper: New York, the capital of memoranda, in touch with Calcutta, in touch with Reykjavik, and always fooling with something.

White, Here, p. 42.

Stores close, the smaller ones with crashes of steel security gates, and the quieter stretches of commercial avenues turn into rows of illuminated grillwork.

Caldwell, p. 2.

At this time of the day, it’s almost as if there are no sounds of the city: perhaps they have all been carefully wrapped in the cotton wool of morning, or hidden away somewhere beneath the sidewalk in their very own Pandora’s box.

Maffi, pp. 112-3.

All of a sudden it is silent out there on the street. All those damnable millions who come careening into Manhattan all week aren’t there. The town is empty.

It was this frightful silence of the streets, and of all the outer world, that terrifies people, cooped up in their houses, and their rooms, by the walls of darkness, more than almost any other circumstance; it gives such an overwhelming sense of the universality of disaster, whatever that disaster is. Except where the voices of neighbors can be heard, one cannot be sure that the whole population, outside of his own family, had not perished.

[Apocalypse]
Serviss, p. 61.

The city is silenced by the softer and richer symphony of the night, its racking noises quelled.

Conrad, p. 73.

Night workers, their footsteps sharp, irregular on the quiet streets, return home.

WPA Guide, p. 49.

In the long, lonely hours of early morning in Times Square, the beggar’s tin cup does not rattle; the target guns go silent in the slot-machine parlors; loud speakers do not pour scratchy melodies into the ears of passersby; curbstone evangelists shout final affirmations above the chorus of their hecklers and go home.

Philips, p. 21.
The blanked-out street now ends in a terminal emptiness. Conrad, p. 112.

Absences begin to ventilate urban narrative. Ibid., p. 112.

The city has emptied itself in deference to abstraction. The shop fronts are identical, colleagues in empty-headed vacancy, windows which resemble moronic faces harboring a nullity behind their eyes. [Reflection] [Display] Ibid., p. 105.

Abstraction, entering the city, evacuates and disassembles it. Its people are sent into retreat, its buildings are flattened or else sliced in half. It becomes beautiful by being rendered humanly unintelligible and uninhabitable. Ibid., p. 105.

For a moment the summertime city hushed, one of those pauses and it’s roar more imaginary than real. Reisenberg, p. 50.

No traffic noises penetrate to the court. Its nocturnal silences have dimension. Lying in their beds under the ancient rooftops and chimney pots, the tenants get only the heartbreak wait of groping river traffic on foggy nights. Berger, New York, p. 116.

The automobiles slide through the esophagus of silence. Seifert, p. 462.

Mrs. Mattie Dechner has three rooms with five windows, all facing the street. She has a tape recording she made one day, which she calls, “A Quiet Sunday Afternoon.” Philips, p. 42.

The sounds of traffic are barely audible inside the great Park Avenue residential palaces. Hawes, N. pag..

The noise is bad everywhere, but in some of the finer apartment-houses on the better streets you are as well out of it as you can be anywhere in the city. Howells, p. 12.
Boy walks into an Italian social club on Bleecker Street. A moment of dead ominous silence, dominoes frozen in the air.
Burroughs, p. 1566.

The walls of this building are thick; from the outside I never hear any but the loudest sounds, and they are muted. But now I can’t hear even these; no horns, air brakes, tire squeals. The silence is absolute.
Finney, p. 115.

Restaurants are devoid of conversation.
Le Corbusier, p. 103.

A thick carpet deadens the footsteps of waiters and busboys.
Hilder, p. 595.

They walk along 86th Street toward Fifth Avenue and, remembering the “avalanche of sound” on Avenue D, he notices that the further they get from Third Avenue, the more aloof grow the houses, the more silent the streets.
Conrad, p. 123.

the breeze is cool barely a sound filters up through my confused eyes
O’Hara, p. 327.

City of silent laughter.
Reisenberg, p. 208.

even the sun must rest and air and the noises of Manhattan
O’Hara, p. 332.

You are the refuge of silent people rubbing elbows and afraid to talk.

The silent elevators unloading passengers.
Le Corbusier, p. 33.

The strange silence of it all. When I first noticed this—as a man will notice suddenly an obvious phenomenon he has been ignoring for years—I wondered if it were not a trick of acoustics; perhaps these depths absorbed sound. Then a pair of truckmen, unloading a safe, laughed; and the noise came out as clearly as the crying of a child in church. The cause may be that half-light, whether of sun or fire, to draw conversation out of people; or it may be the absorption of brain-workers. This is only the overflow of nearly a million people who cram for seven hours a day in the caves in the great cliffs aloft; and ninety-nine percent of them work furiously at a thinking job.

Irwin, p. 47.

For most of its history, Chinatown has been silent.
Kinkead, p. 11.

With the first hint of morning, this beautiful quiet comes to an end.
Maxwell, p. 16.

Snow

One morning at the beginning of last month, I stood for a moment at the open window of my room and, except for the very faint wait of a distant police car siren, there was no sound to be heard. I thought it was the snow that had hushed the usually strident city... At last it dawned on me that I had become almost totally deaf... I like the noise of Manhattan.
Crisp, p. 169.

I hear snow shovels hitting the pavement at 6 A.M. (Thursday, January 17, 1985)
Warhol, Diaries, p. 628.

Sound of snow shoveling in the street.
Donleavy, N. pag..

When day breaks after a heavy snowfall, Manhattan wakes up to the clanging of shovels on sidewalks and the spatter of salt on newly cleared and shiny concrete.
Bladford, pp. 111-12.

Snow white this Monday morning. Began falling in the night. Traffic sounds faint on the avenue the end of the street.
Donleavy, N. pag..

We turned on to a side street, and as the traffic sounds faded, the snow became audible. It was an incredibly delicate sound. Imagine the softest, lightest rain you have ever heard, and then imagine that the sound is not taking place on an umbrella right over your head, but about 20 feet away. Something like that. In any case, it sounded great, and we just listened to the snow for a block or two.

Later, as I began thinking about the sound of snow, and considering writing about it, I found myself listening to my feet as I walked along snow-packed sidewalks. That sound is familiar to all of us who live in snowy climates, and writers in English even seem to have agreed on a word for it. I haven’t taken any surveys, but I’m fairly sure that ‘crunch’ is by far the most common word to describe the sound of footsteps in the snow. But as I listened, really listened, I began to hear something else. It’s something much more gentle than that. ‘Crunch,’ after all, is something you do when you bite down on a piece of celery, and the word sounds very much like ‘crush.’ Our feet don’t do anything that violent to the snow, they just pack it down a bit. It isn’t exactly a crunch, it’s a... Well, I guess there isn’t any word for it, which explains why writers have made do with the wrong one, and which also shows how linguistic approximations can distort our perceptions. For years I have assumed that my feet really did crunch when I walked in the snow. I trusted language conventions instead of really listening.

Johnson, New Music, pp. 269-70.

Rain

He listens for a minute–foolishly as he walks, as if he can distinguish her footsteps from the worlds of sound in the city at the end of a rainy day.

It has been raining all day, and he notices how much louder the rain makes the noises of the street.

From the sides, numerous minor tones from the narrow side streets howl in accompaniment to the storm, just as evenly cutting their swathes across Manhattan—from one water’s edge to the other.

Mayakovsky, America, p. 47.

River
Gone from the upper harbor around Manhattan are the thousands of large and small vessels whose whistles (especially on a foggy day) have always been a reminder to New Yorkers of their maritime past.

Ship’s whistle from the river.
  Donleavy, N. pag.

The low cry of dark shapes and winking lights that are ships echo and re-echo through the canyons of the avenues.
  Spillane, p. 220.

The whistlings of the ferries.
  Roche, p. 404.

Ferry blasts shatter and break on the Wall Street skyscraper fronts.
  Berger, Eight Million, p. 84.

From under the bridge tugboats moan in pain.
  Conrad, p. 239.

There are no steamship blasts but loud now are the hoarse piping of tugs, the yap of ferries with homeward-bound crowds.

I hear the Queen Mary blow at midnight, though, and the sound carries the whole history of departure and longing and loss.
  White, Here, p. 22.

The broad highway, West Street and its continuations, is during the day, a surging mass of back-firing, horn-blowing, gear-grinding trucks and taxis. All other waterfront sounds are submerged in the cacophony of the daily avalanche of freight and passengers in transit.

Nature

The fat pigeons that roost in the eaves of the Custom House fly down, making ugly noises in their throats.
  Mitchell, Ears, p. 196.

They make bubbling noises in their throats as they strut on windowsills high above the street.
Maxwell, p. 3.

Seagulls screech outside his window and sometimes when he wants to call an important person, he waits until the seagulls come near to supply an authentic background.
Philips, p. 135.

Occasionally, in the morning, the delicate sounds of small birds cut through the aural clutter. For a moment the city becomes the country. It’s unsettling, a confusion of contexts.
Brooks, p. 7.

Girls gossip and chirp like a jungle of parrots. Others hum.
Gold, p. 15.

It is cool quiet, the occasional sounds of a faraway city, the wet tips of grass and the warmth of him through his clothes.
Wojnarowicz, p. 178.

As I stand sketching, I hear the lowing of cows, the baaing of sheep, hear pigs squeal, geese honk, and at the same time the distant, familiar, incongruous clatter of the El.
Finney, p. 177.

Skilled construction engineers during the building of the World Trade Center learn to strike the stone with a bar and, as the heavy equipment nearby stands silent, listen to the ring. A sound with a certain muffled overtone means the rock can have faults, or be too soft, or have a gap underneath. A clear melodic ping means the rock is solid. Swinging the rebar and listening, a first violinist searches for a perfect A amid the mighty walls of the excavation. A Stradivarius couldn’t have sounded prettier. “Pour the concrete,” he barks. [Archaic]
Glanz, p. 185.

El, Train, Subway

Morning clatters with the first L train down Allen Street. Daylight rattles through the windows, shaking the old brick houses, splatters the girders of the L structure with bright confetti.
Dos Passos, p. 129.

They are walking down Sixth Avenue. An L train roars above their heads leaving a humming rattle to fade among the girders after it passes.
Ibid., p. 39.

Jagged oblongs of harsh sound break one after another as an elevated passes over.
Ibid., p. 158.

The Bowery by day. . . where only the El makes music.
Weegee, Naked, p. 156.

His laughter develops into a sneer. It grows into an insane cackling that resounds above the noise of the elevated train just passing.
Jolas, p. 474.

Vaguely I hear the purple roar of the torn-down Third Avenue El it sways slightly but firmly like a hand or a golden-downed thigh
O'Hara, p. 331.

An Elevated Railway train passes. It bounds between two streets like a cannonball filed with quivering flesh, jolting from section to section of this lunatic city. You should see it far away, its carcass trembling as it passes over a torrent of steel girders, which goes on echoing from rampart to rampart long after the train had roars by at seventy miles an hour.
Céline, p. 560.

Elevated train roaring by on its iron trestle at the end of the street.
Donleavy, N. pag..

The click click of the turnstile. Money drops down.
Ibid., N. pag..

Coins-in-cups make a pretty good rattle.
Meltzer, p. 188.

Shout Kools to the man over the crashing rumble of an elevated train and he hands across a pack. Says

Donleavy, N. pag.

I stop for a moment so as to listen to the sounds of the tunnels. We stand very still, and there is silence here, deep under the city. Irregular drops of water reverberate and I also pick out, far off, a faint hum.

Brook, p. 132.

The subway rumbles underneath as man in homburg in vest but coatless executive changes from right to left foot.

Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 107.

And the all-night girls / they whisper of escapades out on the D train.

Dylan, "Visions."

Now and then, with a long and fading reverberation, a subway train passes under their feet. Perhaps they think momentarily of two green eyes tunneling violently through the earth without apparent propulsion or guidance, as though of their own unparalleled violence creating, like spaced beads on a string, lighted niches in whose wan and fleeting glare human figures like corpses set momentarily on end in a violated grave yard leaned in one streaming and rigid direction and flick away.

Faulkner, p. 613.

A long, dirt-crusted train screeches into the station, running past his nose, stopping with a hundred decibel scream of breaks.

Reisenberg, p. 66.

Uncovered tracks meant a never-ending clanking, from the couplings of railroad cars, and periodic bawling, from the cows and other animals being transported south to the slaughterhouses, unless the people who live in the apartments above keep their windows closed.

Caro, p. 557.

Listen: You might even hear the Pan Am Clipper leaving from Floyd Bennett for Lisbon.

Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

The shrill sulphurous voice of the trolley wires.

Stella, p. 207.
Traffic

It is hardly possible to conceive the appearance of a crowded wholesale street in the day of the automobile vehicle. In the first place, it will be almost as quiet as a country lane—all the crash of horses' hoofs and the rumble of steel tires will be gone.

Ellis, p. 462.

The hymn of the heavy trucks.
Arce, p. 330.

The rumble of speeding trucks, the blasts from near-by steam shovels, and the intermittent whistles from passing river traffic join in crescendos of dissonance.

I move along the streets in a constant screech of brakes, while a torrent of curses and abuse rain down on me.

Lobas, p. 54.

Only sometimes of an afternoon keen ears detect over the rattle and roar of traffic on Seventh Avenue a humming which is the voice of a hundred thousand sewing machines.

Irwin, p. 315.

One apartment has a picture-window view of the Gowanus Expressway. "Ah, listen," the realtor says as the cars zoom toward the living room. "To me, the sounds of a freeway is like the sound of the ocean. In fact, I like it better."

Bahrampour, N. pag..

We can hear the sound of our own tires on the asphalt, and at Amsterdam Avenue, waiting for a light, I hear someone cough half a block or more away.

Finney, pp. 104-5.

When one is walking down Fifth Avenue, one does not expect to hear string quartet playing a Strauss waltz. What one expects to hear while walking down Fifth Avenue is traffic. When one does indeed hear a string quartet playing a Strauss waltz while one is walking down Fifth Avenue, one is apt to become confused, and imagine that it one is not walking down Fifth Avenue at all but rather that one has somehow wound up an old Vienna. Should one imagine that one is in Old Vienna one is likely to become quite upset when one realizes that in old Vienna there is no sale at Charles Jourdan. And that is why when I walk down Fifth Avenue I want to hear traffic. [Psychogeography]
Leibowitz, p. 139.

Fifth Avenue, that singing, crystal street.
Dreiser, p. 3.

The noise of the collision had been heard in Fifth Avenue, and its meaning was understood; but amid the universal terror no one thought of trying to aid the victims. Everybody was absorbed in wondering what would become of himself.
Serviss, p. 60.

Auto claxon roars crescendo.
Jolas, p. 473.

We bounce and dance over every pothole on the avenue.
Brook, p. 254.

Thick iron manhole cover clanks and rocks under the passing wheels.
Donleavy, N. pag..

Taxis squeal by as doormen’s whistles blow.
Ibid., N. pag..

And right in the middle of my little moment of beauty some crass fucker stops his car to honk his horn.
Ibid., N. pag..

“Taxi!” people wail. “Taxi!” But there are no taxis. Or if one comes along there is somebody in it.
Maxwell, p. 17.

Pedestrian and motor traffic thins and the din slowly fades.
Berger, Eight Million, p. 166.

Noise of sliding automobiles and hunger of their eyes.
Galwey, p. 422.

The sound of tireless traffic in the wet streets.
Wojnarowicz, p. 129.

From somewhere off toward Amsterdam Avenue comes the sound of a siren.
Conroy, p. 44.
The siren subsides. Car doors slam outside.
Donleavy, N. pag.

I hear the siren scream, but that is all there is to that—an eighteen-inch margin again.
White, Here, p. 22.

Streets of clanging ambulances.
Reisenberg, p. 203.

Just south of the statue of Father Duffy at 46th Street between Broadway and Seventh Avenue is a large subway grating on a pedestrian island. If you walk over it, you will hear a steady sound, not unlike that of a conch shell held up to the ear. If you stand still for a long enough time, you will notice that the sound changes gradually and subtly... It does not pollute the air nor force itself on one, the way Muzak does in restaurants and other public places, but rather steals into one's consciousness, and by its uniqueness it makes one listen to the sounds—chiefly traffic noise—with a greater appreciation of special textures.
Ericson, p. 113.

Garbage

The garbage men come waltzing along. Clanging, clattering and strewing the sidewalk and gutters with a new debris.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Muffled sound of the garbage men approaching. Radio says temperature twenty two degrees. [Winter]
Ibid., N. pag.

The "CHIFF-CHIFF" of hydraulic brakes (like steam escaping from a narrow fissure), the scrunch of clashing gears, the thump of wooden boxes being unloaded, the blaring of a loudspeaker system, the growl of trucks being jockeyed in and out of position, the slamming shut of metal doors hardly ever stop... There are two reverse gears. The second one is the noisy one, but it's faster. VRRRRROM! they gun the motors to get out, then CHUME! into gear, CHUME! into the next gear, then they slam on the brakes at the corner.
Stopping and starting, making noises like an electric toaster, the Department of Sanitation truck makes its way down Eighty-fourth Street murdering sleep. Crash. Tingle. More grinding. Bump. Thump. Voices. A brief silence and in the whole thing starts up again further down the street. This is followed by other noises—a parked car being warmed up, a maniac in the sports car with no muffler.

The apartments facing the largest express depot in the world are living in acute distress. They have the mercantile equivalent of all-news radio—"all noise, all the time"—the difference being that there's no knob to shut it off with. [Media]

Radiator

We hear the first paint-roasting thump of the radiator, which tells our conditioned ears that Autumn is here.

Tingling and banging in the pipes along the wall. Donleavy, N. pag.

City of clanging radiators.

If the clatter, blast, clang and boom ever quiets. Donleavy, N. pag.

There is a cracking sound. Strong fumes come up. Someone has dropped a bottle of ammonia at the curb.

When real winter arrives, the radiators of Manhattan begin to clank and hiss and tenants know that happiness—or, at least, heat—is on the way, but at this time of year while in the street it is still warm, indoors it is cool—occasionally too cool.

In this room the heat pipes just cough

Dylan, "Visions."
Construction

A rivet overhead pierces the sultry sky; another shakes the earth.

The slow lights of barges and the bleak iron giantcy of a crane that in the morning sunrise are pummeling away at the hard earth amidst the clang of hammers and cries of workmen.
Wojnarowicz, p. 133.

Scaffolding down five stories into murky ear splitting darkness. Bed hatted carpenters hammering. Under floodlights. Men bending wire and cutting steel. Huge crane rearing from a truck up into the sky.
Donleavy, N. pag..

Outside there is a prodigious honking of motor-horns and the hammering of a riveter as it flattens the headless ends of bolts in a steel construction across the way. Through the window men, poising perilously at a high altitude on the cross-beams, might be observed catching these blots as they are tossed molten from the furnace.
Van Vechten, p. 77.

Steam riveters rattle incessantly; now and then a donkeyengine whistles and there is a jingle of chains and a fresh girder soared crosswise in the air.
Dos Passos, p. 185.

Looms, shears, jackhammers, trolley cars, voices, add to the din.

A deep blast rises, drowning the sound of hawkers, children, automobiles.
Ibid., p. 50.

Street repairs and upheavals, buildings being razed and buildings being constructed keep the streets of New York in a constant hell of noise and dirt and inconvenience.
Atkinson, p. 37.

Street
I am sitting in my room one night, listening to the sounds that float vaguely about this curious little unit of metropolitan life.
Dreiser, p. 190.

On a hot summer night, I can measure the lively progress of small boys down Tenth Street by the clanking of sticks on the garbage cans along the way. They charge the air with strident sounds that no symphony would dare to match.
Binzen, N. pag.

The sounds of my street lift like the blast of a great carnival or catastrophe. The noise is always in my ears. Even in sleep I could hear it; I can hear it now.

From the twenty-first floor, I hear all the noises, precisely and in detail, amplified even! I am stupefied. I cannot sleep with the window barely half open.
Corbusier, p. 65.

Sounds drift up from the street. Honking horns. Squeals of tires. Sirens wailing along the avenues. Drone of an airplane.
Donleavy, N. pag.

I don’t even hear any planes except a couple of westbound commercial airliners that habitually use this air shaft to fly over.
White, Here, p. 22.

The wail of fire trucks and police sirens is now added to the night.
Lee, p. 85

Off in the distance a fire engine screams, demanding room, behind it another with a harsh, brassy gong backing up the order.
Spillane, p. 318.

Horse cars jingle by. A tinker hammers at brass. Junkbells clang.

A sound like electric waves cuts into the nerves of the passers-by.
Jolas, p. 472.
I listen to the burbling of water in the fountain, the thunder clapping its way across the skylight, the organ music.

Maffi, p. 72.

Shouting screaming kids fill the streets playing baseball, football, hopscotch, jump-rope, dodging swift-moving trucks and taxis.

Jackhammers, horns, sirens, breaking glass, recycling trucks, whistles, booming bass from the new Ice Cube, unwanted sound trailing behind me.

Ellis, Glamorama, p. 18.

We hear the familiar tune from the Mister Softee truck as it comes down the street.

Lee, p. 60.

Now and again, though, in a quiet moment, the high sound of the iced drink vendor’s bell rings across the corner.

Blandford, p. 30.

The clatter of riveting-guns, the sigh of the weary, the shrill warnings of policemen’s whistles, the sunny chatter of perambulating nursemaids, the jittery laconisms of waiters, countermen, cabbies, musicians, busboys on the run, doctors, lawyers, nurses, thieves and radio entertainers.

Federal Writers, p. 152.

The sounds of the city are best heard from without. In the city the screeches of police whistles, the gongs of ambulances, the terrifying sirens of fire engines, balance out, but they swing off together over the pure heads, just as foghorns blare inland up the city streets in thick weather. Off on the stream one notes the cries of children playing games, the sound of whistles at noon, and on Sunday the ringing of church bells. But, for the traveler coming to New York by ferry, the most haunting charm of all is the saucy tinkle of iron pawls merrily spanking the mooring wheels of ferry slips.

Reisenberg, p. 199.

The din of barkers, brass bands, roller coasters, merry-go-rounds, shooting galleries, and hundreds of other attractions—above all, the shouts and laughter of the crowd itself.
But no human voice is heard. The monotonous hissing of the arc lights fills the air, the sounds of music, the cheap notes of the orchestrions, and the thin, continuous sputtering of the sausage-frying counters. All these sounds mingle in an importunate hum, as of some thick, taut chord. And if the human voice breaks into this ceaseless resonance, it is like a frightened whisper. Everything 'round about glitters insolently and reveals its own dismal ugliness.

Yet the background noise, like the incidental sweetness, is overwhelming: the rumble of buses, the constant whistles, a kind of white hush very different from that in other places. No hushed Sunday-morning moments when church bells ring from a distance... A fight over noise is displaced fight over space. You struggle so hard to claim a few hundred, a bare thousand, square feet that anything intruding—a take-out menu, a neighbor’s piano—becomes an affront to your privacy, to your selfhood. The dancing overhead, the barking down below, however harmless, encroach on your dearly bought and long-fought-for solitude. We fight about noise as people in Venice might have fought—did fight—about water rights at the Palazzo. As we do, they blamed the malice of their neighbors for the fact of their circumstances. The annual flooding, the damp mold creeping into your basement, the certain fatality of wet; it all got referred to an argument with your neighbor about where he left his gondola.

Gopnik, p. 91.

Noise is the New York issue, yet why should it be so? Surely all cities are equally noisy, but I have never heard anyone in Paris complain about the noise... yet Paris is as loud as it gets: the streets with traffic, the families with dogs; and in San Francisco, they play the stereo all night long. Noise in New York is, must be, a symbol, a referred pain, for something else. It is an issue on which no compromises seem possible. The anger comes from elsewhere, even if (as they claim, and as we refute at length) the noise comes from upstairs ... Is it noisier here than it is elsewhere? I listened on the street and think that, yes, it is noisy here, though I had never really noticed before. The situation can even be said to have improved somewhat, for everything has gone indoors, inside, been internalized.
The 8th Avenue wind from the river blowing the dirty curtains out over the Avenue—street sounds and prostitute clatter of heels mixed with traffic flowing in. Wojnarowicz, p. 43.

You can see the noise. Ibid.., p. 17.

I can’t hear me. Ibid.., p. 17.

And yet the city gives out only a faint sound of fabric being rent: one-half of the mass puling one way and the other half in an opposing direction. Barnes, p. 294.

This is what you hear along the sidewalks when the sun is shining and when the city’s roving bootblacks are lived up like buzzards for business—sometimes lurking in corners, sometimes perched at the curb, sometimes wandering through crowds whispering “shine, shine” like a peddler of dirty postcards. Talese, p. 39.

This strange dim street, still clattering steel against cobble in a blackness relieved by squares, rectangles and cones of vague light whose very color was strange. Finney, p. 156.

It’s hard to lose yourself in the fog of art when you can’t afford an air-conditioner, and the erratic thrum of a jackhammer rises up from the street. Through the thin walls comes the sound of the radio played too loudly. Babies and sirens cry. [Artificial Climate] Leavitt, N. pag.

We live on East Ninth Street, in a second-floor apartment so close to the street that it seems an extension of it, a cacophonous symphony of ugly urban sounds that play fortissimo outside our window, punctuated regularly by the sound of the Ninth Street crosstown bus making its stop next to the downstairs doorway—incredibly, these distractions not only fail to impede but seem to spur the steady stream of words rushing from his teeming brain to his two nimble index fingers that decisively, at full tilt, strike the keys of his trusty, overburdened Royal portable. It is, then, wide of the mark to say that he is tuning out, doing what I try in vain to do under the same trying circumstances—"I can't hear myself think!" I shout, and toss aside the book I am endeavoring to read, while Frank appears unwilling or unable to shut out the world that engulfs us.

"Is everything grist for your mill?" I ask him, impatiently.

"What?" he asks, as he continues typing. "The city! The noise outside!"

Lesueur, pp. 82-3.

the life of the city
at all hours
the polyphonic concert of cables of rat-a-tats
a "honneger pacific" of the sewer-pipe

Restless walks filled with coasting images of sight and sound, cars buckling or bucking over cobblestones down quiet side streets, trucks waiting at corners with swarthy drivers leaning back in cool shadowy seats and windows of buildings opening and closing, figures passing within the rooms, faraway sounds of voices and cries and horns that roll up and funnel in like some secret earphone connecting me to the creakings of the city.

Wojnarowicz, p. 145.

On the dropping of the New Years ball: "It's a giant animal mass that heaves and emits this unbelievable sound."

Trebay, p. 156.

Music

0 city full of music
built all out of mechanical rhythm.
Arce, p. 19.
There is music everywhere; the activity is intense, relatively violent, and silent (it is not the agitated, theatrical activity you find in Italy).
Baudrillard, America, p. 18.

The ‘music of the city’ that needs to be ‘discovered by reflection.’
Amin & Thrift, p. 16.

When the mode of music changes, the walls of the city shake.
McReynolds, p. 346.

Music and the spoken word meet, intermingle, and blend as one here, and the dialogue between the two is continual.
Maffi, p. 106.

When I come to Trinity Church I hear organ music rising against the roar of traffic.
Atkinson, p. 80.

Cats singing at night, cornetists wailing by day.

And now a “Jazz-Band”
from New York;
vice blossoms
and engines thrust
in synchronous seaports
Nuthouse of Hertz, Marconi, and Edison!
Arce, p. 333.

A sound of jazz from jug-band.
Jolas, p. 472.

bebop clutter familiar sounds
Wojnarowicz, p. 111.

who sang out of their windows in despair
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 5.

Bessie Smith is singing Jazzbo Brown from a radio in the orange drink stand at the corner. Halfway down Sutton Place a blind man is playing “Make Believe” on a sliding trombone. Beethoven’s Fifth Symphony, all threats and revelations, is blowing out of an upstairs window
The sidewalks on 14th Street are empty, devoid of extras, and above the sounds, I can hear someone singing "The Sunny Side of the Street" softly to himself.
Ellis, Glamorama, p. 129.

On Christmas Eve, Dorothy Day returns to the Women's House of Detention where she had spent almost a month this summer. With her are fellow members of the Catholic Worker Movement, pacifists, individualists—several of whom have also gone to jail for refusing, because of their convictions, to take shelter during an air-raid drill. They have come to Village Square to sing carols to the women inside. They stand in the freeing street opposite the towering building, and sing.

It seems hard for the unknowing, like this reporter, to believe that anyone can reach the girls in that dismal place.

The singing starts with a kind of unsure sincerity. After the first song, they pause. Against the windows, silhouettes of the watching girls can be seen. Then, from behind the heavy windows, they began to shout. "More...sing another one!" One girl yells, in a throaty Puerto Rican accent that seems to make standing in the cold wind worth it: "Please? Please sing another one, you good people...God bless all of you!"

The group really catches fire and sings with such zeal that they sound good enough to be in Saint Patrick's. Every time they pause, the inmates think they are stopping, and plead for more.

The carolers circle the prison, giving each side a chance to hear, and each side responds like the others. Every time a girl calls down, the singers seem to take on a new fervor.

Some passersby approaches with the wry smile of sophistication, but no one sneers when he gets close. In fact a great many stop to join in.

A slightly bald priest who looks very much like Barry Fitzgerald notices that I am standing apart, and smiles in my direction. A few minutes later he smiles again, comes over, and says to me with warmth: "You can join us if you'd like. That is—if you really want to."

So I sing right along with the group. I am singing with Catholic Workers, tourists, sailors, Villagers, actors, and a drunken woman who also feels the magnetism. We sing ourselves to tears to a bunch of tough girls we will never see.

After a long time in the cold the carolers start to split up. "God bless all you girls... we know next Christmas will be merrier," shouts the drunken woman in a blurred, tipsy voice, while she looks around thinking that perhaps she has made a mistake. Believe me, she hasn’t.

Music is playing from upstairs apartments in this year before air-conditioning silenced the New York night: Symphony Sid or Jazzbo Collins, Alan Freed or Murray Kaufman (Mee-a-zurry, Mee-a-zurray, all through the night)… even, in memory, Jack Lacy on WINS before it became an all-news station (Listen to Lacy, a guy with a style, of spinning a disk with finesse, yes, yes). [Media]

The cornetist steps forward for a solo, begins, “Drink to me only with thine eyes…” In the wide, warm night the horn is startlingly pure and magical. Then from the North River another horn solo begins—the Queen Mary announcing her intentions. She is not on key; she is a half tone off. The trumpeter in the bandstand never flinches. The horns quarrel savagely, but no one minds having the intimation of travel injected into the pledge of love. “I leave,” sobs Mary. “And I will pledge with mine,” sighs the trumpeter.

White, Here, p. 41.

The gentle playing of an oboe mingles with city noises from the street outside, which penetrates into the room with difficulty through great barricades of books.

The elevator stops, and we clamber out, blinking at the light and noise. There is a party going on, for sure. Some of the guys are playing a horn duet—I can’t tell an oboe from a trumpet from a frog, so I’m not sure exactly what instruments they are using, but they sound like enemy herds of elephants preparing for battle.

Tucker, p. 140.

Deep in the night, I am almost unaware how many people are on the street unless something calls them together, like the bagpipe. Who the piper is and why he favors our street I have no idea. The bagpipe just skirls out in the February night.

Rorem, p. 814.

a grindorgan fills the street with shiny jostling coils of the Blue Danube
Dos Passos, pp. 240-41.

Varèse hears the din of the city as improvised modern music, spurning the assuagement of tone and harmony. Conrad, p. 118.

The sirens change from scientific hypothesis to urban commonplace when fire engines—which can be heard in Varèse's "Deserts" (1954) and in his "Ameriques" (1926)—shriek by.

"Music is made of sound," Varèse insists, and New York's foghorns, piercing police whistles, rattling hammers, percussive El, ground bass of automobiles, and stuttering radios are an organization of sound, mechanically emitted and (in the orchestra) mechanically imitated.

American sounds. Varèse hears them from his room on West 14th Street.

Mid-1920s, Varèse's Amériques is played at Carnegie Hall. An anonymous reviewer of the Evening World says, "A pretty little shindig of boos and hisses broke last night... after Edgard Varèse's symphonic genuflection to the Fire Department and the Pneumatic Riveters' Union.

Varèse, p. 246.

Composer George Antheil, the self-styled "bad boy of music," presents the US premiere of his Ballet mécanique [at Carnegie Hall] on April 10.

Conducted by Eugène Goossens, the performance featured xylophones, electric bells, anvils, airplane propellers, sirens, assorted percussion instruments, player pianos, and regular pianos, including one played by a 26-year-old Aaron Copland.

According to The New York Times, some members of the audience cheered, some hissed, and "one beleaguered man" even tied a white handkerchief to his cane, "hoisted it over his head and waved it from side to side in a token of surrender."

"1927 George," N. pag..

He hears the electric light as the ringing of a "silvery alarm."

Conrad, p. 239.
The music does not melodiously happen through time. Rather it accumulates in and deafeningly congests space as the city does, tiered vertically in layers of battering sound. It is cubism in music, a piling-up of solid masses.
Ibid., p. 118.

The trumpet in a Harlem band is a turbine, a tireless self-repetitive dynamo, and admires tap-dancing for similar reasons, because it’s the choreography of the factory, “as mechanical as a sewing machine.”
Ibid., p. 138.

Cage: “I’m just crazy about the noise of New York. I consider it musical.”
Ibid., p. 119.

When I hear what we call music, it seems to me that someone is talking. And talking about his feelings or about his ideas, of relationships. But when I hear traffic, the sound of traffic here on Sixth Avenue for instance, I don’t have the feeling that anyone is talking, I have the feeling that a sound is acting, and I love the activity of sound. What it does, is it gets louder and quieter, and it gets higher and lower. And it gets longer and shorter. I’m completely satisfied with that, I don’t need sound to talk to me. And this silence, almost anywhere in the world today, is traffic. If you listen to Beethoven, it’s always the same, but if you listen to traffic, it’s always different.

I love living on Sixth Avenue. It has more sounds, and totally unpredictable sounds, than any place I’ve ever lived.
Cage, Conversing, p. 25.

I wouldn’t dream of getting double glass because I love all the sounds. The traffic never stops, night and day. Every now and then a horn, siren, screeching brakes—extremely interesting and always unpredictable. At first I thought I couldn’t sleep through it. Then I found a way of transposing the sounds into images so that they entered into my dreams without waking me up.
Ibid., p. 25.

Now I don’t need a piano. I have Sixth Avenue, the sounds. I translate the sounds into images, and so my dreams aren't disturbed. It just fuses. There was a burglar alarm one night and I was amazed because the pitch went on for two hours, was quite loud. It seemed to me to be going slightly up and slightly down. So what it became in my dreams was a Brancusi-like shape, you know, a subtle curve.
And I wasn't annoyed at all.

_Ibid._, p. 25.

When the weather was good the windows were open, and the airplanes leaving La Guardia flew directly overhead, drowning out from time to time whatever he had to say. He never repeated what had been said during the passage of the airplane. Three lectures I remember in particular. While he was giving them I couldn't for the life of me figure out what he was saying. It was a week or so later, while I was walking in the woods looking for mushrooms, that it all dawned on me.

_Cage, Indeterminacy, N. pag._

Planes flew over the city around me; I heard them.
Finney, p. 113.

O'Hara working at 326 East Forty-ninth Street between First and Second Avenues, listening to the three or four albums he owned: works by Poulenc, Milhaud and Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony—and an antiquated little radio which he kept tuned to one of the two classical radio stations, WQXR or WNYC.

_Gooch, p. 193._

Listening to free concerts under the stars at Lewisohn Stadium.
_Hamill, "Lost," N. pag._

In 1955 Muzak was tested in the NYC subways.
_Basile, Cool, p. 217._

On this blue May night, it is music. It is not the Prologue to Pagliacci, which rises ever and anon on hot evenings from an Italian tenement on Thompson Street, with the gasps of the corpulent baritone who gets behind it; nor is it the hurdy-gurdy man, who often plays at the corner in the balmy twilight. No, this is a woman’s voice, singing the tempestuous, over-lapping phrases of Signor Puccini, then comparatively new in the world, but already so popular that even he recognized his unmistakable gusts of breath.
He looks about over the roofs; all is blue and still, with the well-built chimneys that were never used now standing up dark and mournful.

Cather, p. 11.

It is Saturday, toward the end of the afternoon. I turn through West 48th Street. From the open windows of the drum and saxophone parlors come the listless sounds of musical instruction, monstrous insect noises in the brooding field of summer. The Cort Theater is disgorging its matinee audience. Suddenly the whole block is filled with the mighty voice of a street singer. He approaches, looking for an audience, a large, cheerful Negro with grand-opera contours, strolling with head thrown back, filling the canyon with uninhibited song. He carries a long cane as his sole prop, and is tidily but casually dressed slacks, seersucker jacket, a book showing in his pocket.

White, Here, p. 39.

I craved the memories of the smells and sounds of then-exotic Caribbean vegetables at La Marqueta, the indoor market at 115th Street and Park Avenue, and the salsa jams throbbing from the Casa Latina record store on 116th Street.

Morales, p. 19.

The Beatles’ Sgt. Pepper music was the main strain you heard all through the summer; you’d hear it playing absolutely everywhere.

Warhol, POPism, p. 216.

Sometimes a turntable just gets an urge to walk out the window and down to Eighth Street.

Trebay, p. 67.

In Harlem lanky youths in t-shirts amble past uniform public housing blocks swinging monstrous transistor radios that blare rock and reggae into the air as palpably as the exhaust from the groaning buses.

Brook, p. 4.

It was ’76 to 1980
The dreads in Brooklyn was crazy
You couldn’t bring out your set with no hip-hop
Because the pistols would go POP
BDP “South Bronx.”

One night she came down in a green sweat suit and carrying a boom box on her shoulder blaring “Rapper’s "Delight"! We didn’t go anywhere. We just walked around the city. It was our playground and her hood.

Frisa & Tonchi, p. 167.

A loudspeaker pulses salsa music from a tenth-story housing project window so that everyone on the street below can step in tune for free.

Courgois, p. 33.

Once there were kids with boom boxes, declaring the strength of their shoulders and their indifference to middle-class opinions by hoisting huge radios to create insulating, almost visible clouds of defiant sound... Now everyone walks with headphones.

Gopnik, p. 81, 99.

This is the only difference between this latest summer and those that have gone before it. The blaring tape decks are fewer. The big black noise machines gave way to Sony Walkmen. Now each person skips and dances along to an unheard, inner tuned. It would be a welcome relief were it not that the thunder of traffic goes on, the blast of exhausts continues.

Blandford, p. 30.

Back in the early 90s, I was working in my studio on Houston St. with the window open. In those days, people were still playing music on the streets from oversized ghetto blasters balanced on their shoulders and, more often than not, playing hip hop. From outside the window came an array of sheer white noise, which quickly morphed into what sounded like the electronic whooshes of musique concrète. I was stunned and rushed over to see what was going on. But by the time I got there, the noise had changed again, this time into light Daisy Age beats. It took me a few minutes to realize that what I was hearing was a noisy break in what was a rare and unique moment for experimental hip hop; a moment that passed quickly once gangsta rap took over.

Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag..

Radio

The phonograph and radio have all but exterminated the Italian organ-grinder.

Irwin, p. 38.
At every corner a gramophone shop in every shop a hundred gramophones for each gramophone a hundred records
Seferis, pp. 303-4.

City of telephone flirtations, Dictaphones, microphones, and loud-speakers.
Reisenberg, p. 206.

A gramophone will play (in-e-luc-ta-bly)
the Afternoon of a Faun;
Léyeles, p. 405.

Radio and victrola shops relay a never-ending programme of "fanfare" music. Rifle-shots thrash the air with monotonous explosions as the pageant of ducks floats by in the side-show, or a ping-pong ball balances precariously on a water jet. And you can hear music streaming out from every window. The sound from a grand piano on which some one is essaying Beethoven's "Appassionata" or Sarasate's undying and hackneyed "Gypsy Airs," played on a violin to a very inadequate accompaniment. Song, music, and color, whichever way you turn.
Bercovici, pp. 53-4.

Somewhere in the quiet, sparsely developed outskirts of Los Angeles, an artificial New York would arise. It would be a New York where sound could be controlled, a New York distant from any unwanted traffic background noises... The rise of a genuine mythic New York on film was the unexpected consequence of a second revolution brought on by sound—a consequence, in fact, of the single most crucial fact about talking pictures. They talked. [Dream City]
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 275.

The lack of directionality in early microphones ensured that every background sound—car horns, pneumatic drills, tugboat whistles, and always, somewhere, the roar of a distant elevated train—would find its way on to the recordings track.
Ibid., p. 275.

On the radio district which was replaced by the World Trade Center: And what an area it was, especially in its sounds. A walk down the streets presented a constantly shifting cacophony, as most of the shop owners had mounted big cone-shaped vibrating speakers over their doorways, blasting out everything from the teariest opera to big-band orchestral music to step-right-up sales pitches that ran over and over. Piercing through all that noise was the a-ooga of car horns on the street, the whistle of the ferries that docked in the slips right at the foot of Cortlandt Street, and the much deeper bellow from the tugboats plying the river. There was the occasional clop of horses—in the late 1920s there were still a few horse-drawn drays moving small loads of cargo or scrapwood, and they could be seen negotiating the widest of U-turns at the Cortlandt intersections.

Glanz, pp. 74-5.

Radio has introduced many new expressions into the city's language. Easily recognizable are hog the mike, wanna buy a duck?, check and double-check, are ya listenin'? Equally colorful is an inside (professional) lingo which employs killie loo bird for a flighty coloratura, old sexton for a bass with a sepulchral voice, talking in his beard for a muffled voice, fax for facilities, town crier for one who sings too loud, fighting the music for lack of ease in singing, down in the mud for very low reproduction volume, line hits for occasional chirps on transmission circuits, fizzy for an unclear voice, fuzzy for an unclear program, and on the nose for ending a program on schedule to the second. Staples surviving the introduction of microphones include nervous pudding for Jello; burn the British or toasted Wally for a toasted English muffin; smear one, burn it for a toasted cheese sandwich; bottle o' red for catsup; one to go for an order to be taken out; one cow for a glass of milk; stretch it for a large glass; burn one with a feather for a chocolate malted milk with an egg in it; and the strident eighty-six, a warning to the cashier that a customer is trying to leave without paying his check. [Speech]

Federal Writers, p. 159.

Radio jazz-splashing on pavement.

Jolas, p. 471.

The far end of the dial. Move the pointer away from NYC and QXR some night late and start fishing around between the loud local stations at the high-frequency end of the band. Where the static level is high and the living is not easy.

Shepherd, p. 156.
The obliviousness to low sounds, the indifference to cacophony which makes the ideal radio listener of present-day America, was part of the original acquisition of Manhattan in the Brown Decades. This torment of noise-troubled sleep, lowered waking efficiency, depleted vitality; but it was endured as if it were an irremediable fact of nature. In the lull of the elevated’s thunder, the occasional tinkle of the cowbells of the ragman on a side street, or the solemn I-I-I xas’ clos’s of the second-hand clothing buyer, would have an almost pastoral touch; while Carmen, on an Italian’s clanking hand organ, cold splash the sky with color.

Mumford, “Metropolitan,” p. 22.

If it’s warm enough, and the right year, you can hear the ball games too: Ernie Harwell and Russ Hodges bringing us the Giants (with Frankie Frisch the Fordham Flash on the post-game show), or Red Barber and Connie Desmond with the Dodgers, or hear the simulated crack of a bat and the simulated roar of a crowd, and Today’s baseball, with Bert Lee and Marty Glickman, and the absent Ward Wilson, who is ailing.... Ward Wilson was always absent. Ward Wilson was always ailing. And nobody listened to the Yankees.

Radio City as a bloodless cathedral. Inside the studio he sees another room made by muting and insulation: a glass aquarium for spectators, who can chatter at will without being heard because their booth is soundproofed.

“What’s news from New York ?”
“Stocks go up. A baby murdered a gangster.”
“Nothing more?”
“Nothing.Radios blare in the street.”

Speech

The exposure to the din and roar, the screams and yells, which go on in the streets at nearly all hours of the day and night.

Girdner, p. 127.

People talk with their hands, their mouths, their bodies—most of all their hands.

Binzen, N. pag.
Then, all of a sudden, piercing shrieks volley from high office windows.
Reisenberg, p. 50.

But somebody's always screaming.
Brown, Manchild, p. 120.

A woman shouts into a pay phone, as if she wants the whole city to hear.
Brooks, p. 59.

Life bubbles, sparkles; chatters bay, incoherent stuff.
Dreiser, p. 3.

In summer, other voices in other rooms spilled out into the street.
McCourt, p. 31.

A voice chants a Congo song.
Jolas, p. 472.

All of a sudden you realize that most of these humans are talking. The sound is like the sound in a theater just before the curtain goes up. Shut your eyes and listen. It is almost overpowering.
Mitchell, Ears, p. 186.

There are now so many stories gabbling simultaneously in New York that none of them can be made audible.
Conrad, p. 278.

The confusion of strange tongues, babbling heedlessly.
Maffi, p. 108.

Noisy cafes and whispering breadlines
Children that scream and yell
Whistles and bells and siren horns blowing
Pistols that crack and roar
Ono “Midsummer.”

Survival requires linguistic assimilation.
Conrad, p. 122.

The Voice of the City, implies that the painting is a direct expression of a city that speaks for itself. Stella may have got both his title and idea from O. Henry’s book The Voice of the City (1908). In the eponymous lead story the narrator searches all over New York, at night, for “the composite vocal message of massed humanity,” to “interpret its meaning” since “it must have a key.” New York’s voice, O. Henry imagined, would have to be “a mighty and far-reaching utterance… the tremendous crash of the chords of the day’s traffic, the laughter and music of the night… the rag-time, the weeping, the stealthy hum of cab-wheels.”

Sharpe, p. 201.

The composite vocal message of massed humanity. In other words, of the Voice of a Big City.

We can compare space to a language and study its dimensions: the paradigmatic (relevant oppositions: inside/outside, above/below, verticality/ horizontality, etc.)—the syntagmatic (sequences and linkages: roads, avenues and boulevards, routes, etc.)—the symbolic (the meaning of monuments, special places, etc.).

Lefebvre, Stage, p. 230.

Words and expressions are whipped off the street only to be deformed or interpreted anew, and linguistic borrowings taking their origins from the provinces and small towns are remolded on (and for) the metropolitan experience.

Maffi, p. 110.

In everyday speech, dominated as it is by its rhythm and speed, this language—“language of the city”—often becomes pure sound continually remodeled and modified by pronunciation, accent, and forever-changing outside influences.

Ibid., p. 110.

While walking around the metropolis, new and hybrid linguistic forms echo all around you, confirming the sensation that this is very much an ongoing process. [Refraction]

Ibid., p. 111.

It is a world of echoes and ricochets, observed from angles that emphasize the flatness and miscellaneous presences in the urban space. [Reflection]

Kozloff, N. pag..

The familiar utterance of words derived from unfamiliar lexicons. [Distortion]

Federal Writers, p. 292.
The vendors call out their wares in what seems at first a tongue all their own. But a trained ear soon discovers that it is English, or rather that English is the essential component of the chemistry of their language; the rest being words of their own creation, or scraps from a dozen other languages which stuck to the people of woe in their two thousand years' peregrination from land to land.

If you sit in Bronx Park on a Sunday or walk down Sixth Avenue below Twenty-Third Street on almost any evening you will not hear a word of English—but it will be a very New York Yiddish or Italian or German that you will hear.

Ford, America, p. 96.

You can sip coffee at the Cafe Royal on 12th Street at Second Avenue and listen to the sound of Yiddish.

Hamill, "Lost," N. pag..

Anyone who listens attentively enough on a Friday morning may hear as he strolls down Washington Street an oratorical flow of rhythmic speech piercing the rumble and chatter of the pavements. It is the reading of the Koran.

Irwin, p. 35.

From Houston to Rivington Street ... fruit is sold in the open air by howling venders to bargaining customers, each one yelling his offer on the top of his voice; quarreling disputing, cursing, using what is most spicy in the gutters of the street lingo.

Bercovici, pp. 224-5.

Who rose triumphant out of Brooklyn and the Bronx with that ritzy accent.

Donleavy, N. pag..

At first I made manic efforts to manage to speak English inside a month. Just as my efforts were beginning to make some headway, the near-at-hand (or even near-at-foot, or to boot) shopkeeper, milkman, laundryman, and even the policeman—they all began speaking to me in Russian.

Mayakovsky, America, p. 55.

It’s slang. Instead of "thank you," they say "fuck you." Lobas, p. 70.
In the wintry hush, the babble of the city’s languages carries through the clear, biting air—a whisper of English, as often the soft rise and fall of Spanish.

Blandford, p. 148.

The windows are opened and all our neighbors can hear us. We often lay there ourselves listening to the desperate fucking, and the curses in English, but in Spanish too, which was the language of that part of the city. For seven hours the deluge is unceasing.

New Yorkese is the common speech of early nineteenth century Cork, transplanted during the mass immigration of the South Irish a hundred years ago.

Maffi, p. 108.

It is not a joke, the great clang of New York. It is the sound of brassy people at the part, at all parties, pimping and doing favors and threatening and making gassy public statements and being modest and blackmailing and having dinner and going on later.

McCourt, p. 106.

The emphasized articulation of the so-called “dental consonants”—“d,” “ts,” “z,” “sh,” “ch,” and “n.”

Popeye, gnarled knight of the clenched fist and the corncob pipe, speaks Tenth Avenue’s indigenous tongue. Betty Boop, epitome of short-skirted innocence in the 1920’s, scolds her little dog and sings her copyrighted ditties in exaggerated New Yorkese.

Ibid., p. 284.

So you say to the waiter, ‘Gimme the chicken and vegetables but portostat with the chicken with the fustatis on it.’ So he says ‘What?’ and you say ‘You know, the portostat, and moonsign the savina on the top, with the vegetables.’”

Ibid., p. 157.

“Sure ya got pressed in the third, kid. You done all right, but your trouble is ya fonnastat when you go forward with your left hand. That’s a pretty bad fault. All ya have to learn is ya come forward when ya fest ‘em up on the referee with the old sedda m’credda.”

Ibid., p. 157.
“He’s after painting two swans on deh kitchen windes. Wan is facin’ wan way and d’oder is facin’ d’oder way.—So dat is so help me God dis day you’d tink deh swans was floatin’ in a garden! And deh garden was floatin’ in through deh winda! And dere was no winda!”

Liebling, p. 17

“Hey, hoo pie, howza clock on ‘at stonecrusher?”
“It’s the ice-breaker; see you on the show-break.”
Federal Writers, p. 158.

kibitzer, shikse, schnorrer, schleidel, schmeeggie, nebach, chiker, mazuma, meshuggah, kishkes, inazzaltov, shaslik

Ibid., p. 153.

The Dorgans, Conways, Lardners, Winchells, Baers, O’Haras, Kobers, Durantes and Runyons have given the nation scram, lay an egg, palooka, belly-laugh, Reno-vate, yes we have no bananas, twenty-three skidoo, Alcoholiday, Park Rowgue, wisecrack, applesauce, you said it, hard-boiled, pushover, click, laugh that off, yes-man, middle-aisling it, socko, step on the gas, kiss the canvas, throw in the sponge.

Ibid., p. 155.

New York so worships names that it recites them as free-standing—and thus inane—spells, which no longer need refer to things.
Conrad, p. 120.

In the 1926 Manhattan telephone book “Smith” fell to second place behind “Cohen” as the most common surname.
Peretti, p. 17.

Wellington Koo. Alfred Sze.
Ibid., N. pag..

Brook, p. 147.

Papito, Papi, Papo, Nene, Pops, Negro, Junior Courgois, p. 216.

Pipe the pushover, he thinks he’s a click with his doll because she told him she’d lohengrin and bear it, but all she wants is a stand-in to pinch hit for the last heart, who lost all his what-it-takes in an under-the-bridge-at-midnite payoff. Federal Writers, p. 155.

Somebody Loves Me, Baby Divine, You’re in Kentucky fuss Shu’ As You’re Born, bruised notes of foxtrots go limping out of doors, blues, waltzes (We’d Danced the Whole Night Through) trail gyrating tinsel memories. Dos Passos, p. 291.

The Rock & Roll for the RR. C for ‘Charlie.’ The J is Johnny, the M is Mary, N for Nancy. Boy train is the B; A is Apple; E is Echo. Most of the names that would be hard to distinguish on the radio... N and M would be difficult... Nancy, Mary... so that’s why they do that. A lot over the radio would be very difficult... And then the number trains are no problem. Groce, p. 74.

In the 1920s, the introduction to polite society the full spectrum of long-tabooed profanity such as the “lowdown,” the “scoop,” the “dope,” the “dirt,” “bunk,” “bogus,” “baloney,” “applesauce,” “balls,” and “bull[shit].” They tried to eliminate from their lexicon all the words like “sacred,” “sacrifice,” and “soul” that their Victorian predecessors had disfigured by overuse and misuse. Slang in the 1920s was the speech of bootlegging criminals and fast-talking vaudevillians, people who knew how to “fix” everything from the World Series to bathtub gin. Douglas, Honesty, p. 54.

Edmund Wilson listed more than a hundred terms for “drunk” in his “Lexicon of Prohibition” (1927): lit, squiffy, oiled, lubricated, owled, edged, jingled, pifffed, piped, sloppy, woozy, happy, half-screwed, half-cocked, half-shot, half seas over, fried, stewed, boiled, zozzled, sprung, scrooched, jazzed, jagged, canned, corked, corned, potted, hooted, slopped, tanked, stinko, blind, stiff, under the table, tight, full, wet, high, horseback, liquored, pickled, ginned, shicker (Yiddish), spifflicated, primed, organized, featured, pie-eyed, cock-eyed, wall-eyed, glassy-eyed, bleary-eyed, hoary-eyed, over the Bay, four sheets in the wind, crocked, loaded, leaping, screeching, lathered, plastered, soused, bloated, polluted, saturated, full as a tick, loaded for bear, loaded to the muzzle, loaded to the plimsoll mark, wapsed down, paralyzed, ossified, out like a light, passed out cold, embalmed, buried, blotto, lit up like the sky, lit up like the Commonwealth, lit up like a Christmas tree, lit up like a store window, lit up like a church, fried to the hat, slopped to the ears, stewed to the gills, boiled as an owl, to have a bun on, to have a slant on, to have a skate on, to have a snotful, to have a skinful, to draw a blank, to pull a shut-eye, to pull a Daniel Boone, to have a rubber drink, to have a hangover, to have a head, to have the jumps, to have the shakes, to have the zings, to have the heebie-jeebies, to have the screaming meemies, to have the whoops and jingles, to burn with a low blue flame.

[Alcohol]
Ibid., p. 101.

Damon Runyan invented the argot of NY streets, calling money potatoes, Lindy’s restaurant Mindy’s and complimentary tickets Chinee (because they are punched with holes like Chinese coins).
Trager, p. 460.

“Wauf!” “Pow!” “Wham!” “Socko!” “Glug!” “Zowie!” and “Bam!”

The first documented use of the following words, terms, and phrases can be attributed to Dorothy Parker: art moderne, ball of fire (said of a person), with bells on, bellyacher, birdbrain, boy-meets-girl, chocolate bar, daisy chain (in the sexual sense), face-lift, high society, mess around (to potter), nostalgic, one-night stand (in the sexual sense), pain in the neck (said of a person), pass (sexual overture), doesn’t have a prayer, queer (gay), scaredy-cat, shoot (expletive), the sky’s the limit, to twist someone’s arm, what the hell, and wisecrack.
Fitzpatrick, p. 9.
They wanted “nuthouse” not “madhouse,” “drugstore” not “chemist’s shop,” “radio” not “wireless,” “frame” not “put-up job.”

On the sidewalks of downtown brokers and brokers’ clerks are talking strange words and stranger phrases: conscientious objectors, hyphens, camouflage, T.N.T., profiteers, enemy aliens, the bridge of ships, swivel chairs, strafing, gasless Sundays, heatless Mondays, meatless Thursdays, somewhere in France, “Lafayette, we are here!”

Collins, p. 291.

Each precinct has its own idiosyncratic cry, voicing its collective unconsciousness. The Lower East Side gave out a subdued, suffering “Oh-hh, O-h-h. O-h-h-y,” Broadway a shriller “Eeee-eee-eee,” Harlem a throaty, ululating “Ooo-oOOoOoOoOo.”

Conrad, p. 287.

So we sat darning socks on Waverly Place and practiced the use of profanity as we stitched. Needle in, shit. Needle out, piss. Needle in, fuck. Needle out, cunt. Until we were very easy with the words.

Charyn, p. 234.

In the gale of brassbands and trampling horses and rumbling clatter of cannon, shadows like the shadows of claws grasp at the taut flags, the flags are hungry tongues licking twisting curling.

Oh it’s a long way to Tipperary…Over there! Over there! The harbor is packed with zebrastriped skunkstriped piebald steamboats, the Narrows are choked with bullion, they’re piling gold sovereigns up to the ceilings in the Subtreasury. Dollars whine on the radio, all the cables tap out dollars.

There’s a long long trail awinding… Over there! Over there!

In the subway their eyes pop as they spell out APOCALYPSE, typhus, cholera, shrapnel, insurrection, death in fire, death in water, death in hunger, death in mud.

Oh it’s a long way to Madymosell from Armenteers, over there! The Yanks are coming, the Yanks are coming. Down Fifth Avenue the bands blare for the Liberty Loan drive, for the Red Cross, drive. Hospital ships sneak up the harbor and unload furtively at night in old docks in Jersey. Up Fifth Avenue the flags of the seventeen nations are flaring curling in the shrill hungry wind.

O the oak and the ash and the weeping willow tree And green grows the grass in God’s country.

The great flags flap and tug at their lashings on the creaking goldknobbed poles up Fifth Avenue.

Dos Passos, p. 271.

Chuck’s readiness is proverbial on the Bowery. He is always prepared to say something characteristic and original. One day he was in a philosophic mood, and talked to me disjointedly, over his beer, as follows:

“A bloke wat ain’t go no money can’t git a gal, and if he does git her, den it’s all up in de air wid de money wat he’s got. But dere are some good gals wat a bloke’s a junk if he don’t treat right. A bloke ain’t go no show wid a gal if he ain’t goo-lookin’, wid good clothes, with a fence around his neck. I ain’t handsome, and I ain’t rich, so sometimes a bundle will give me a ticket to go across de ferry wid but she’ll give me a ticket to go back see. Now, if I was handsome and rich I’d git a ticket to cross de ferry but I wouldn’t git no ticket back, see? Anyway, a gal don’t make no difference ter me All coons look alike ter me. Dere’s no difference between a gal and a lady except dat de lady has got a fine dress and de gal ain’t. De lady has got de boodle, de rocks, see? and de gal ain’t, see? Dat’s all. Wat’s a gent, did yer say? A gent, wat you call a gentleman, is a bloke wat ain’t a junk. A gent is a man wat shakes hands wid yer; wat don’t wear no fence around his neck, wat don’t wear no tall hat, wat don’t call yer a bum. When a bloke wat ain’t got a nickel asks a junk for a nickel, the junk wat ain’t a gent, calls him a bum. You can always tell a junk that way. A junk ain’t no gent, that’s all, see? A gent is a damned good man, a good man that ain’t looking fer no good advice. A bloke wat takes good advice ain’t no gent. I hate a man wat takes good advice. A gent takes no advice, particly no good advice. He’s too good a feller, yer know. A chump is a good, good man. A chump is slang for a sucker. If you fetch him a jab in the wizard, he’ll grin, feeble like. an’ if you tell him you didn’t mean it he’ll shake yer hand as friendly as yer like. He’s a good, good man, a chump is, which is slang for a sucker, but he ain’t no gent tho he is a lot better than a junk. A junk is the worst thing there is. A chump is good to yer, but he’s mean to himself. He does himself all the harm he does, and that’s why he is a sucker. But a junk is a down bad man, real bad, yer know, wid a fence around his neck. Am I married did yer say? I’d like to see the gal wat could hitch up ter me. If I ever do hitch up, she might as well hitch up ter a post. But I booze too much and I may hitch up sometime. It’s a wonder I ain’t dead. I’ve done it all, yer know, up all night full of booze and fight, yer know, and dey say that when a bloke hitches up it’s easy to stop the booze. But I’d like to see the girl wat could hitch up ter me. If I ever do hitch up she’ll think I am a post sure. I get into a lot of troubles ‘cause of other blokes. I ain’t had ten fights fer myself in my life. Some bloke’ll come up to me’nd say, Chuck, that fellow wants ter fight me and den I fight. See that scar, and dat? and dat? dey’s all got fer other fellows, not fer me, but I am tired of it, and I am going to quit. I wonder I ain’t dead. Maybe I’ll hitch up. I thot I’d have a sloon of my own, but that would not pay, fer all the old blokes would come in and say: Chuck I’m dead broke, gimme a drink, Chuck, and I’d give em a drink of course, but dat don’t pay. I’d be in the air every night, right up in the air, yer know. But I am going to get a place right here in this here bar, and I tell you ther’ll be lots old blokes wat’ll come and when other men are around p’raps they’ll pay, but when I am alone then there ain’t no use. Be on the level and watch de play. It’s a blue day to-day but de play of life goes on. Some blokes—good fellows too—kill demselves when dey get blue. Why? Why not see de next act? I know a bloke wat cut his throat ‘cause his wife ran away from him. Dat’s all nonsense. He ought to go and cut a figur’ and his wife’d would come back, all right, all right. If she didn’t it wouldn’t cut no ice, but she would, yer know. Wat’s the use of being as blue as dis wedder? I’m always happy. Whenever I have de rocks, I’m all, right an’ I’m all right when I ain’t got ‘em. Some odder feller can cut his throat. Dat’s all right, but I won’t, Chuck Connors won’t. I want ter see de next act. I want ter see de play out. I m me own friend bloke, me best friend, and it’s only an easy mark wot’d cut his throat or give a rip wat happens so long as de play goes on.”

Hapgood, pp. 36-9.
When I'm walking around New York I'm always aware of the smells around me: the rubber mats in office buildings; upholstered seats in movie theaters; pizza; Orange Julius; espresso–garlic–oregano; burgers; dry cotton tee-shirts; neighborhood grocery stores; chic grocery stores; the hot dogs and sauerkraut carts; hardware store smell; stationery store smell; souvlaki; the leather and rugs at Dunhill, Mark Cross, Gucci; the Moroccan-tanned leather on the street-racks; new magazines, back-issue magazines; typewriter stores; Chinese import stores (the mildew from the freighter); India import stores; Japanese import stores; record stores; health food stores; soda-fountain drugstores; cut-rate drugstores; barber shops; beauty parlors; delicatessens; lumber yards; the wood chairs and tables in the N.Y. Public Library; the donuts, pretzels, gum, and grape soda in the subways; kitchen appliance departments; photo labs; shoe stores; bicycle stores; the paper and printing inks in Scribner’s, Brentano’s, Doubleday’s, Rizzoli, Marboro, Bookmasters, Barnes & Noble; shoe-shine stands; grease-batter; hair pomade; the good cheap candy smell in the front of Woolworth’s and the dry-goods smell in the back; the horses by the Plaza Hotel; bus and truck exhaust; architects’ blueprints; cumin, fenugreek, soy sauce, cinnamon; fried platanos; the train tracks in Grand Central Station; the banana smell of dry cleaners; exhausts from apartment house laundry rooms; East Side bars (creams); West Side bars (sweat); newspaper stands; record stores; fruit stands in all the different seasons–strawberry, watermelon, plum, peach, kiwi, cherry, Concord grape, tangerine, murcot, pineapple, apple—and I love the way the smell of each fruit gets into the rough wood of the crates and into the tissue-paper wrappings.

Warhol, Philosophy, p. 152-4.

I usually know what city I am in by the odors. There are as many smells as there are philosophies. I have never had time to gather and classify my olfactory impressions of different cities, but it would be an interesting subject. I find it quite natural to think of places by their characteristic smells.

Keller, pp. 296-7.

The night is scented with the odor of decaying foliage: it reeks of ambergris, menthol, powder, rouge, and the neoprene smell of slickers and galoshes.
Its aliveness is certified by the hearty and versatile stench it exudes, an olfactory cloud of hot asphalt, underground caverns, gasoline, patchouli, orange peel, sewer gas, Albany grabs, Egyptian cigarettes, mortar and the undried ink on newspapers drifts across Gramercy Park: the city's body odor. [City as Body]

For years it reeked with trapped breaths, the fuming of paper-box scrap fillers, trade-marked cigarettes, blended bottle alcohol, and the fry smell of half-done hot dogs grilled at the downstairs lunch counter. A certain rectification was achieved by bubbling coffee urns, adding a Brooklyn aroma while humidifying the winter cold with jets of steam.

The faint odour of horse-dung, so prevailing in the nineties, has of course been supplanted by the aroma of gas. The other odours of New York depend upon the locale and the seasons: in the summer, the smell of hot asphalt, a distinct smell of chop suey and occasionally even of cooking opium on Broadway and the adjacent streets; in the winter, the aroma of roasting chestnuts; in the theaters, the churches, and the restaurants the mingled odours of Guerlain, Houbigant, Hudnut, and stale tobacco.

Food

Coney Island's greasy air with its confusion of artificial and natural odors: the fishy, salty smell of the sea; the aroma of cooking-oil, steaming clams, sausages, frying pork.

The air, despite the good zestful salt sea breeze, reeks with the acrid smoke of potato knishes, garlic and frying frankfurters.

The essential New York smell twenty years ago was still Italian and WASP: tomato and olive oil and oregano, acid and pungent, mingled with the indoor, Bloomingdale's smell of sweet perfumes. Now, inside the giant boxes that have arrived from America, from the malls (the Gap and Banana Republic and Staples), there is a new, clean pharmacy smell, a disconcerting absence of smells, the American non-smell.

Gopnik, p. 28.

Spice odors came downwind two blocks from the spice mills in the weathered brick plant on Franklin Street. The closer you trod the sharper the odors seemed. The inner brick walls, once white, were a melancholy yellow and coated with fine spice dust, mostly brown and red, something like brick dust.

Mr. Weyer said, “That yellow you see is from volatile spice oils. It has settled on the walls through the years. It’s on everything; all six floors.”

My sense of smell became, in a manner of speaking, somewhat hysterical. It struggled frantically to identify individual pungent odors but made no headway. Mr. Weyer peered down the length of the gloomy loft as if he could see the odors. His nose wiggled like a rabbit’s over a carrot.

“Can’t say for sure,” he said. “But I’d guess what we’re getting right here is mostly caraway. Some kummel, maybe.”

He felt his surefooted way between high mounds of enshadowed bales and bags of spices. The place was ill-lighted and spice dust hung in the half-light like red fog. We clumped along the rough wooden flooring, past silent gnomish men who toiled at fragrant bales. Their faces seemed inordinately grave, had the rust-and-yellow tint of the walls.

Mr. Weyer stepped into another cavernous loft, darker than the one below. Gyrators throbbed and pulsed in the shadows, grinding and sifting red pepper, cayenne, cloves, caraway, cardamom, mace. These ponderous devices, distorted in the weak dust-infiltrated light, ground the crude stuff and dropped it through fine silk mesh. Cloth bags at the bottom bulged and breathed as the spices blew through.

He brought out African ginger, Granada mace, allspice from Jamaica, red pepper from Japan, coriander from Morocco, curry from India, cloves from Madagascar, cardamom from the Malay archipelago. My eyes smarted and I looked wistfully at the clean air beyond they dusty windows.

On the mill floor, below, leather belting slapped at great iron wheels lost in deep upper gloom. Great galvanized pipes and middle-sized pipes ran through the flooring, carrying off milled nutmeg cayenne. A dusty-red miller patiently scooped crushed nutmeg from a mound on the floor and fed it into a hopper.
Walk out of the crush of Gansevoort Market and Greenwich Street and Hudson Street, a good mile and a half south through silent warehouses all crammed with food, a solid square mile of provender. The contents of these grim weather-beaten storehouses are open to appraisal by the mere sense of smell as you pass through successive strata of coffee and sugar and tea and spices and green vegetables and fruits... Discern where the pepper merges into the cloves, and the heavy odor of banana into the acid aroma of the citrus.

Strunsky, p. 699.

As we walked down Greenwich Avenue we stopped to enjoy the smell of hot bread outside of Cushman's bakery.

Cowley, p. 49.

de Kooning could not stand the smell of fresh bread constantly wafting upward from a bakery just beneath him in his loft.

Stevens & Swan, p. 119.

On Bleecker Street you catch the scent of the Italian bakery.

McInerney, p. 9.

As you turn, what is left of your olfactory equipment sends a message to your brain: fresh bread. Somewhere they are baking bread. You can smell it, even through the nose-bleed. You see bakery trucks loading in front of a building on the next block. You watch as bags of rolls are carried out onto the loading dock by a man with tattooed forearms. This man is already at work so that normal people can have fresh bread for their morning tables... As you approach, the smell of bread washes over you like a gentle rain. You inhale deeply, filling your lungs. Tears come to your eyes, and you feel such a rush of tenderness and pity that you stop beside a lamppost and hang on for support.

Ibid., p. 180.

The warm smell of the bakery on the corner of Eighth Street, a blessed repository of doughnuts, cookies, cream-cakes and pies, the slow passing by which, on returns from school, must have had much in common with the experience of the shipmen of old who came, in long voyages, while they tacked and hung back, upon those belts of ocean that are haunted with the balm and spice of tropic islands.
James, p. 91.

At her feet a squirming heap of small boys, dirty torn shirts, slobbering mouths, punching, biting, scratching; a squalid smell like moldy bread comes from them.
Dos Passos, pp. 240-1.

Near Eighth Avenue, before Fortieth Street. The smell of garlic and tomato sauce warns the passer-by that the inhabitants are from Piedmonte, but on the street one hears the Irish brogue. The bales of cotton in front of the warehouses and the smoke from the chimneys reek after Liverpool, but the smell of rope, tar and fried smelts that comes from the wharves near by remind one of Fiume and Marseille, as the swaying masts and the spread out sails outline themselves against the glowing sky.
Bercovici, pp. 209-10.

The aroma of oregano, tomato, and garlic filled the elevator.
Tucker, p. 140.

The smell of garlic in the rear of a Mulberry Street church.
Talese, p. 24.

The hot air is tinged by garlic, by the offensive breath of cigarettes.
Reisenberg, p. 67.

Cheese shops give Fulton Street its racy aroma; second office furniture fills in between the gorgonzola.
Ibid., p. 18.

Close your eyes, take a deep breath. You are on the west side of the street, in the Forties. A smell of rich fried chicken assaults your nose.
Ibid., p. 30.

acrid pungence spreads from a picklestand
Dos Passos, pp. 240-1.

The steam escapes through the little copper pipe on the peanut roaster, making a cheerful sound, and the hot peanuts smell good.
Mitchell, Ears, p. 196.

Beaton on Roseland: “the smell of double-mint gum permeates the atmosphere of this monstrous paradise of black, orange and pink."
Caldwell, p. 264.

The crooked streets of one of New York’s oldest ghettos smell of salt and fish and orange peel... Ice water dripped from the profusion of produce, and among the gagging smells rising front the sidewalk and the gutters, where the food was cleaned, was a whiff of orange peel.
Kinkead, p. 3

The odor of cooked cabbage and burned fats dissolves into the stronger odors of the oiled high boots and the numerous Russian steam baths of the district. Ah, these steam baths! From the looks of them and the smell, one comes to think of them more as sewers than baths.
Bercovici, p. 174.

Neighborhood

Why has Washington Square a meaning, a fragrance, so to speak, while Washington Heights has none?
Barnes, p. 225.

Third Avenue is easily identified by its smells—malt and hops in the Nineties, burning rubber in the Fifties, and ripe hides, when the wind blows from the east under Brooklyn Bridge.

Fifth Avenue, for example, has a different odor from any other part of New York or elsewhere. Indeed, it is a very odorous street. It may sound like a joke to say that is has an aristocratic smell; but it has, nevertheless. As I walk along its even pavements, I recognize expensive perfumes, powders, creams, choice flowers, and pleasant exhalations from the houses. In the residential section I smell delicate food, silken draperies, and rich tapestries. Sometimes when a door opens as I pass, I know what kind of cosmetics the occupants of the house use. I know if there is an open fire, they burn wood or soft cola, if they roast their coffee, if they use candles, if the house has been shut up for a ling time, if it has been painted or newly decorated, and if the cleaners are at work in it.
Keller, pp. 296-7.
the tenacious odors of service and the warm indigenous smells of Harlem
McKay, p. 30.

There was also a smell: a dampness, a kind of rotting fecundity. And the stream was very loud: this was the sound of nature, true, but it was all a bit too incongruous. Olmsted or not, I knew I was in Harlem.
Buford, p. 185.

Nature

John Muhlhan sniffs hay by the hour, and he is believed to be one of the nation’s top connoisseurs of hay for hoses. The odd thing is that he has been selling hay in the heart of Forty-second street for forty-five years.
Talese, p. 98.

We must try to imagine the smells of circus animals.
Kasson, p. 49.

The smell of a dead old horse in the night air was said to be appalling.
Haden, pp. 57-8.

The smell of raw furs permeating Seventh Avenue and Thirtieth Street.
Irwin, p. 322.

Salted hides smell under the damp approachment arches of Brooklyn Bridge.
Reisenberg, p. 18.

And in the summer, when it was too hot to keep windows close, uncovered tracks meant not only noise but odors, the stench of the animals.
Caro, p. 557.

Outside the air smells of crowds, is full of noise and sunlight.
Dos Passos, p. 17.

It smells of the sun.
Lichtenstein, p. 513.

If you want to quit the world for a moment, head east on Sixth Street and pass through a gate between avenues B and
C. First stand at the threshold and take a breath. The smell—what some people think of as the sweet, fresh-scented essence of summer—is honeysuckle, of course. Its slightly druggy aroma drifts down from a big, bosomy vine that partly conceals a hideous chain-link fence. Covering the vine itself are tiny butter-yellow flowers that look like trumpets with flicking tongues. There are good streets smell in New York (and even more foul ones) but few smells that have the power to take you away from where you are.
Trebay, p. 214.

Snow

When the city air smelled of snow.

Dry snow has that heavenly smell that comes of purity, like the smell of a healthy well-washed baby.
Reisenberg, p. 185.

They seemed to bring with them the smell of the snow falling in Seventh Avenue. Or perhaps the other people who had entered before them had done it, bringing it with them in their lungs and exhaling it, filling the arcade with a stale chill like that which might lie unwined and spent upon the cold plains of infinity itself. In it the bright and serried shop-windows had a fixed and insomniac glare like the eyes of people drugged with coffee, sitting up with a strange corpse.
Faulkner, p. 609.

In the rotunda, where the people appeared as small and intent as ants, the smell and sense of snow still lingered.
Reisenberg, p. 185.

Perfume

The flask of perfume which brings Fifth Avenue to a hacienda in the Argentine.
Federal Writers, p. 3.

I could smell lilac and garbage and expensive perfume.

For a lot of the time I was in New York I used a perfume called Fleurs de Rocaille, and then L’air du Temps, and now the slightest trace of either can short-circuit my connections for the rest of the day. Nor can I smell Henri Bendel jasmine soap without falling back into the past, or the particular mixture of spices used for boiling crabs. There were barrels of crab boil in a Czech place in the Eighties where I once shopped. Smells, of course, are notorious memory stimuli.

_Ibid._, p. 173.

I noticed the aroma and sheen of very rich women, or women with very rich husbands or lovers.

_Brook_, p. 253.

At 9 A.M. the bus is filled with secretaries and receptionist and the smell of perfume.

_Talese_, p. 32.

Drugs

Sharp whiffs of marijuana hit the nose.

_Brook_, 165.

The smell hit me first: dampness, the sharp whiff of amyl nitrate, and the equally pungent aroma of piss.

The place smelled of the usual telltale mix of Crisco, poppers, and smoke.

_Fritscher_, p. 36.

"... the smell of poppers and the sweat off a stranger's body."

_Braunstein_, N. pag.

Spring had a smell to it too, even in New York. It smelled like just-cooked heroin. It was the exhaust fumes mixed with the wet air that still carried subtle hinted promises of voyage and growth. Sea air and foliage. [Drugs]

Industrial

The very gasoline contributes a distinct perfume.

_Dreiser_, p. 3.

Its parks smelled like warm bitumen and gasoline
He raised his head and sniffed, hoping for a breath of the sea, and smelled gasoline fumes instead.
Maxwell, p. 5.

Trucks grated by along the avenue raising a dust that smelled of gasoline and trampled horse dung. The dead air stank of stores and lunchrooms. He began walking slowly uptown towards Fourteenth Street. At a corner a crinkly warm smell of cigars stopped him like a hand on his shoulder.
Dos Passos, p. 158.

The acrid fumes of diesel combustion, the flash of wheel sparks, and the chemical-industrial reek of brakes follow the commuter trains out into the suburbs. The later the hour the swanker the passengers: the loud workers peak at four or five, to be followed by the sweet-voiced bourgeois at six, seven, and eight.
Caldwell, p. 2.

symphony of electric aromas
Beaudin, p. 284.

The sneering city curls brown smoke from its chimney censers; the bitter incense carries a faint odor as of burning sacrificial flesh.
Reisenberg, p. 93.

Smells of Moody street exhaust river lunch in road of grime.
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 106.

The life of subways, of rebreathed air, of the smell of burnt steel.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 566.

The stony, odorous, metallic, captive air of the subway.

Stink, Sweat, Garbage

The more I know New York the more I think of it.
I like the sight and the sound and even the stink of it.
Porter "I Happen."
He crossed Sixth Avenue and followed the street into the dingy West Side, where there was a smell of stables and the sidewalks were littered with scraps of garbage and crawling children.

Dos Passos, p. 51.

A scent of garbage, patchouli and carbon monoxide drifts across it, making it the lovely, corrupt, wholesome place New York is.

Ashbery, p. 133.

Oldenburg’s design for an electric fan for Staten Island to dwarf the Statue of Liberty and disperse the city’s odors, and to cope with more solid wastage, a vacuum cleaner for the Battery.

Conrad, p. 320.

The possibility of smelling the humid city’s odors of human life and sweat.

Ibid., p. 93.

He smelled of tobacco and sweat.

Ibid., p. 52.

Summertime, all ya can smell is the garbage. Stink overpowers everything, especially soft sweet smells like flowers.

Lee, p. 57.

You just don’t know how I love it—how I get up every morning and want to kiss the pavement. . . Hollywood smells like a laundry. The beautiful vegetables taste as if they were raised in trunks, and at those wonderful supermarkets you find that the vegetables are all wax. The flowers out there smell like dirty, old dollar bills.

Fitzpatrick, Parker, pp. 109-10.

So the first time I went to CBGB’s, the whole place stunk of urine. The whole place smelled like a bathroom.

McNeil, p. 201.

I’d sniff deep and see the cuchifritos and hot dogs, stale sweat and dried urine. I’d smell the worn-out mothers with six or seven kids, and the non-patient fathers beating the hell out of them. My nose would get a high-pitch tingling from the gritting wailing and bouncing red light of a squad car passing the scene like a bat out of Harlem, going to cool some trouble, or maybe cause some.
Thomas, Streets, p. 106.

Given the heat, people smelled, of course, but some smelled a lot worse than others.
Miller, “Air Conditioning,” N. pag.

Something all a piece of dirty rags and stench picked up in the street.
McKay, p. 59.

The city that Sunday morning was quiet and those trapped there gasp in foul humid air that smelled and felt like water in which too many soda-water glasses had been washed.
Conrad, p. 291.

Water

Beyond the Battery, which is the prow of Manhattan, lies the waterfront with its smells of salt, tar, rope, seaweed and decaying fish.

The smell of the ozone, the ghostly wails of old boats passing down the Island, and the opalescent skies.

The smell of the salt air in the rotting planks floating on the green scummy waters of the Hudson.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 678.

The watery floor of the Aquarium that smelled of the eternally wet skins of the seals in the great tank.

The rancid smell of the wet gutters and pavings.

The rancid smell of the wet dusk outside.

Now on summer nights the smell of the city sometimes drifts northward on the waters of the Hudson River, up to the wooded, inland banks where we live. The odor is like the stales from some enormous laundry, although I expect that an incurable evacuee could detect in it Arpége, stone-cold gin, and might perhaps even imagine that he heard music on the water; but this is not for me.

Hudson’s report to his employers must have been an unfavorable one, at least on the practical side, which was the side in which they were interested. They hadn’t sent him across the ocean to find out how Staten Island smelled. Collins, Money, p. 10.

Interior, Domestic

He ushered me into his West Broadway apartment. It was a steamy, New York summer day, but the apartment was cool. It smelled like straw mats.

In courtyards smelling of backhouses.

We went up to the hotel on 44th Street or 45th up the rank rickety swaying leaning staircase paid seven dollars for a room and opened the windows to let the musty smell out.
Wojnarowicz, p. 43.

the smell of the four cats in this apartment
Ibid., p. 111.

There are still books I bought more than thirty years ago which can still, by a single sniff of their pages, transport me instantly over the ocean to New York. Books don’t smell like that any more.
Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 240.

And the Fourth Avenue bookstores! How many hundreds of afternoons they spent in the twenty or so dusty stores with the worn wood floors; noses whiffing that excellent store-air, a mixture of dust and floating minutiae of antique leather bindings and frayed linen.
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 5.
Oldenburg’s New York is an indulged infant, gobbling a diet of fast food. He plans to set up at Times Square an overripe, wilting banana, and on Ellis Island a colossal frankfurter with a tomato on top, impaled by a toothpick. A supplementary island of pizza will bob in the bay; the blades of the fan that unseats the Statue of Liberty are made by unpeeling and softly mechanizing the Times Square banana. If the monuments themselves can’t be ingested, Oldenburg locates restaurants inside them. Visitors would alight from helicopters on top of the East Side ironing board and eat in a cabin hanging beneath it. He allows his structures to boast of the ravages of appetite. A bite has already been chewed from the Good Humor bar on Park Avenue; through the gap, cars could be driven. The city’s catastrophes are to Oldenburg soft tragedies, like the fate of our provender inside us. [Surrealism]

Conrad, p. 140.

As Dalí sees it, the surreal nature of New York is evincen by its maggoty carnality: uncooked meat and cheese.
Ibid, p. 145.

When Dalí wakes up in the Hotel St. Moritz, the city confirms the bloodthirstiness he has excited in it by the temptation of meat, for the first thing he hears is the roar of hungry lions in the Central Park zoo. [Sound] [Nature]
Ibid, p. 146.

When Dalí sees the skyline from his boat, he likens it to an immense Gothic Roquefort cheese, adding, “I love Roquefort.”
Conrad, p. 146.

Dalí perverts New York, dressing one of its skyscrapers in kinky furs and setting a gargantuan lamb chop on its pinnacle.
Ibid, p. 149.

New York as candy or confectionery: a building on West 58th Street as one slice in a long white cake of apartment-houses.
New York seen from the Queensboro Bridge rises in white heaps and sugar lumps all built with a wish out of non-olfactory money. Money is smelly, guilty refuse. Amassing it not in cloacal hoards but in an arrangement of sugar lumps sanitizes it, for sugar symbolizes a romantic inutility.

The New York skyline first deodorizes wealth, then makes it sweetly edible.

The lemon-yellow shades of the lamps on Fifth Avenue give the street and everybody the color of champagne in the evening.

The Belly of New York

Every day in New York, they slaughter four million ducks,
five million hogs,
two thousand pigeons to accommodate the tastes of the dying,
one million cows,
one million lambs,
and two million roosters that smash the sky to pieces.
Lorca, "Office," p. 11.

Fried sleeve buttons; a plate of summertime; a band of music with the leader; soaked buns; stack of browns;
slaughter in the pan; drop one on the brown; eggs in the dark; white wings, with the sunny side up; two shipwrecked;
a sheeny funeral with two on horseback; hot and viscid sinkers.
Grimes, p. 117.

walking lunchrooms
Ibid, p. 118.

Luke, hostage to Parisian food, cannot believe the range of cheap takeout, the empire of menus. You press a button, and all the world's spices come obsequiously to your door: Indian food, Chinese food; the baby loves chicken in pancakes, the boy loves steak fajitas, and without saying so, I see that he likes the sweetness of New York food, the way that, as I had forgotten, Americans put sugar in everything, in ketchup and mustard and cereal and bread. The incidental sweetness of American life is, to an unaccustomed palate like his, overwhelming and quickly addictive.

Gopnik, pp. 75-6.

I can’t walk into a housewares store in Manhattan without feeling myself the victim of a complicated confidence trick, a kind of cynical come-on. We’re really going to use a toaster and a coffee-maker every morning?

Ibid, pp. 7-8.

“Egg sandwich, coffee and doughnuts.” “Cup of boullion.” “Chicken broth.” “Chocolate icecream soda.” People eat hurriedly without looking at each other, with their eyes on their plates, in their cups. Behind the people sitting on stools those waiting nudge nearer. Some eat standing up. Some turn their backs on the counter and eat looking out through the glass partition and the sign HCNUL ENIL NEERG at the jostling crowds filing in and out the subway through the drabgreen gloom.

Dos Passos, p. 314.

A blast of grey heat hit their faces. They passed the stationary store, the red A. and P., the corner drugstore from which a stale coolness of sodawater and icecream freezers drifted out under the green awning, crossed the street, where their feet sank into the sticky melting asphalt, and stopped at the Sagamore Cafeteria. IT was twelve exactly by the clock in the window that had round its face in old English lettering, TIME TO EAT. Under it was a large rusty fern and a card announcing Chicken Dinner $1.25.

The next morning Andy told Julia to buy one of each of the thirty-two varieties of Campbell’s soup at the local A & P and he started to work on his idea. First he did a series of drawings. Then he made color slides of each can, projected them on to a screen and began experimenting with different dimensions and combinations… Finally he hit upon his format for the soup cans. A lot of pop artists used supermarket food images in their work but they crammed their pictures with them. Andy decided to do one portrait of each of the thirty-two cans as exactly as possible alone against a white background... "He made us feel that even in the simplest of commodities and the most commonplace of subject there was a great deal of poetry and meaning..."
Bockris, Warhol, 144-5

In 1962 you could live in New York on a $5-a-week food budget. He bought from the discount shelves in the supermarket all the canned foods without labels. At that time labels were printed on paper and wrapped around the items. When those papers got ripped off, the cans came up on the bargain counter and people, poor people, used to buy them as a kind of blind date.
Williams & Noél, p. 187.

Häagen-Dazs Ice Cream is introduced by Polish-born Bronx entrepreneur Reuben Mattus, 47, who since age 17 has been peddling his family’s homemade ice cream to small candy stores and neighborhood restaurants, initially with a horse and wagon. Finding that most commercial ice cream has become cheaper, he puts more butterfat in his product than government standards require, use less air filler, comes up with a Danish-sounding name (even though the umlaut does not exist in Danish), packs the ice cream in cartons adorned with maps of Scandinavia, creates a new category that will be called super-premium ice cream, and begins what will become a multimillion-dollar company.
Trager, p. 626.

Mattus invented the “Danish-sounding” “Häagen-Dazs” as a tribute to Denmark’s exemplary treatment of its Jews during the Second World War, and included an outline map of Denmark on early labels. The name, however, is not Danish, which has neither an umlaut nor a digraph zs, nor does it have any meaning in any language or etymology before its creation. Mattus felt that Denmark was known for its dairy products and had a positive image in the U.S. His daughter Doris Hurley reported... that her father sat at the kitchen table for hours saying nonsensical words until he came up with a combination he liked. The reason he chose this method was so that the name would be unique and original.

"Häagen-Dazs," N. pag.

Business girls who bought their food in the ubiquitous delicatessen stores and prepared it on electric plates concealed on closet shelves.
Morris, Incredible, p. 299.
The silk-skirt factory girls who came to eat their lunch in Washington Square.
Cather, p. 17.

Big theatrical men with their mistresses, both shaped like well-stuffed ottomans, are eating sandwiches at sandwich places.

For the men who labor in the night, primarily for the city's breakfast, must themselves be fed. Clustered around the markets and around the railway-junctions and car-barns or the popular and brilliantly illuminated Delmonico's of the industrial underworld. What places of warm cheer they are, on a winter night, these long rows of Lunches, whose names are a perpetual lesson in the national geography! They all have tiled floors and white walls and spacious arm-chairs... a sirloin steak selling for twenty cents, with bread, butter and coffee, at three in the morning.
Strunsky, p. 702.

A whole section of Elizabeth Street is given up to the sale of stale fish at ten and fifteen cents a pound, and the crowd of Italians, Jews and Bohemians who are taking advantage of these modest prices is swarming over the sidewalk and into the gutters. A four- or five-pound fish at fifteen cents a pound will make an excellent Christmas dinner for four, five or six. A thin, ice-packed and chemically-preserved chicken at fifteen or twenty cents a pound will do as much for another family. Onions, garlic, old cast-off preserves, pickles and condiments that the wholesale houses uptown have seen grow stale and musty on their shelves, can be had here for five, ten and fifteen cents a bottle, and although the combination is unwholesome it will be worked over as Christmas dinners for the morrow. Cheap, unsalable, stale, adulterated these are the words that should be stamped on every bottle, basket and barrel that is here being scrambled over. And yet the purchasers would not be benefited any thereby. They must buy what they can afford. What they can afford is this.
Dreiser, p. 277.

The old men, the ones who have been doing it for years, are too resigned to boast about the wizened bits of meat they sell, too tired to move fast and, anyway, couldn't—hampered as they are by the thick, heavy coats they wear no matter how hot the day.
Bladford, p. 29.
After years of Paris markets, with their abundance and bad faith, I confess that I found the pickings at the Union Square green market on a spring morning a little scrappy. Gopnik, p. 168.

Take celery. It is monstrous to eat blanched celery with olives as an hors d’oeuvre. For God surely meant celery to be eaten along with Stilton cheese at the end of a full meal, just before the port... Yet in New York—horresco referens—blanched celery is continually eaten as I have described. I may add that in Paris the idea of eating celery raw at all causes a shudder to run down the French spine. Ford, America, p. 150.

In the winter of 1900 Bernarr MacFadden opened a restaurant, at 487 Pearl Street, where most items sold for one cent. Ellis, p. 460.

Perplexed by the diversity of dietary habits and helpless in the face of grafting food contractors, Ellis Island staff members often fed the immigrants little more than prunes and bread. One employee brought out a big pail filled with prunes. Another walked into the mess hall carrying sliced loaves of rye bread. A third plunged a dipper into the pail, slopped prunes onto a big slice of bread, and cried to the bewildered immigrants, “Here! Now go and eat!” Ellis, p. 474.

The area was “redolent” of old New York, and equally redolent of garlic and pearly onions, and gleaming with the fresh color of avocados, tomatoes and eggplants. It was filled with the bustle of early dawn activity for a city still stonily asleep. Hopelessly nonfunctional for the 20th century and, we assume, now happily transferred to safe, sanitary and totally sterile in every sense of the word new accommodations in the Bronx, the old market had Hogarthian energy and Georgian style. Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 116.

The Automat has a clinical cleanliness—the tables are washed continuously, even the slot through which the nickels pass are polished many times a day. Around the marble wall are rows of dishes, an infinite variety of food, each a still-life framed in chromium.
Beaton, Portrait p. 44.

Around Times Square, and across from Bryant Park, the Horn & Hardart Automats, free from supervision, developed into prime cruising grounds for gay New Yorkers. [Sex] Grimes, p. 193.

The thirty-five-a-week lot go to a huge mechanised eating point. Having shoved in their five cents, they press a knob and exactly measured quantity of coffee splashes out into a cup. And for another two or three nickels they can open one of the little glass doors to the sandwiches on the huge shelves piled with comestibles. Mayakovsky, America, p. 50.

“Let’s go down to the Automat.”
“Just a minute, I’ve got to shine my shoes on top of a fire hydrant.” Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 110.

Shall we go down by the Automat and watch the old ladies eating beans, or the deaf-mutes that stand in front of the window there and you watch ‘em and try to figure the invisible language as it flees across the window from face to face and finger to finger...? Ibid., p. 110.

We hear a warlike clash of ten thousand heavy dishes storming washing machines in the energetic Automat. Reisenberg, p. 153.

But of first importance to the American is the cleanliness of his food. Sugar is hermetically sealed, biscuits are done up in cellophane, sandwiches wrapped in greaseproof paper. The waiters at Childs look like dentists or operating surgeons in their white overalls. Beaton, Portrait, p. 41.

Around the small cafés, single men start getting their body machinery into gear, cramming the first fuel of their day into their mouths—a hurried cup of rotten coffee and a baked bagel, which works right here, in samples running to hundreds, the bagel making machine is swinging into a cauldron of boiling and spitting fat. Mayakovsky, Discovery, p. 47.

In the summer a stand is a breakaway soft drink place; in the winter it is a nuttery.
Walker, p. 203.

More than eight hundred hospital patients in New York City had been without sugar for a week.

Ibid., p. 23.

Bodegas sold mysterious little bags of dime-sized cookies decorated with pastel florets of frosting. The bags cost a quarter, and every time I went to a birthday party I would buy one and tape it to my present. As far as I know, nobody ever ate even one, and no wonder: while they looked soft, they had all the resilience of marble.

Day and night the cash registers ring, frankfurters twirl over hot rollers, orangeade gushes forth into glasses and the air is filled with sizzling pork and tangling tension.

Talese, p. 95.

men are wiping off the marble counters of softdrink stands

Dos Passos, p. 240-1.

It's been estimated that if a customer smoked a cigarette in Nedick's on Thirty-fourth, the store would lose about $2 in turnover. Nedick's is believed to pay $95,000 rent annually for the tiny corner stand and, with its salaries and other expenses, it must sell thousands of hot dogs and orange drinks each day to break even. All this food is pushed over a 61-foot-long counter, and only thirty-two customers can be crushed against it at one time. Behind the counter, Nedick's twenty-six employees sidestep each other, collect coins, flip hamburgers, jab hot dogs, and pour orange drink into coolers. The famous drink is 20 per cent orange juice mixed with water, lemon and sugar.

Talese, pp. 95-6.

A tally of the millions of eggs cracked each morning, of the thousands upon thousands of gallons of hot coffee drawn.

Reisenberg, p. 30.

Ten million stomachs eat 15 per cent of the national production of perishable food commodities.

Ibid., p. 30.
As they do little physical labor, the result is stimulated glands or overdeveloped midsections and jowls.
Ibid., p. 30.

This street of large signs and large portions, feeds it fortunates to the point of bursting.
Ibid., p. 30.

Skinless franks, smeared with canary-yellow chemical mustard, pinched in last week's fresh-laid rolls, are doing a moderate forenoon business.
Ibid., p. 142.

Dry ice is being shuffled into milkless jumbo malted-milk containers.
Ibid., p. 142.

A noontime mob refuels in a double-decked commercial cafeteria.
Ibid., p. 153.

Then go to the Sixth Avenue Delicatessen. Order a hot pastrami on rye, use plenty of mustard, a dish of coleslaw, a bottle of beer.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Like Dublin at 4:30 P.M. when the work is done, but this is great New York Third Avenue, free lunch.
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 105.

... the taste of hot dogs, beer, and seafood...
Kasson, p. 49.

Hamburg Heaven was empty. Nevertheless, he took a seat right beside me at the long counter... He ordered a cup of coffee, but when it came he didn’t touch it. Instead, he chewed on a toothpick and studied me in the wall mirror facing us.
Capote, p. 52.

I stop for a cheeseburger at JULIET’S CORNER. Giulietta Masina, wife of Federico Fellini, è bell’ attrice.
And chocolate malted. A lady in foxes on such a day puts her poodle in a cab.
O’Hara, p. 258.
I’m just going out to Sarabeth’s Kitchen to pick up some more fucking scones, dear.
Quan, p. 97.

The croissant is Manhattan’s national dish.
Bladford, p. 120.

The rest of the afternoon we were east and west worming out of reluctant grocers cans of peanut butter, a wartime scarcity; dark came before we’d rounded up a half-dozen jars, the last at a delicatessen on Third Avenue. It was near the antique shop with the palace of a bird cage in its window, so I took her there to see it, and she enjoyed the point, its fantasy: “But still, it’s a cage.”
Capote, p. 44.

You pass Ottomanelli’s Meats, where the corpses of small animals hang in the window: unskinned rabbits, hairless fetal pigs, plucked fowl with yellow feet.
McInerney, p. 134.

Passing a vegetable shop, green peppers, bulging red and yellow tomatoes, purple egg plants and fruits stacked out on the pavement. Buy myself an apple. With one nickel. Make a phone call with another.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Dining

Murray’s, the city’s first theme restaurant. Located on Forty-second Street, its exterior was modeled on the residence of the Cardinal de Rohan in Paris. Electric stars twinkled in the ceiling, while underneath the tables electric lights radiated a romantic pink glow. Extensive use of mirrors compounded the sense of dislocation—gaping patrons often walked straight into their own reflections. Not just a restaurant but a portal to another world... The menu included a porcelain dolphin stuffed with flambéed crabmeat, oysters, and lobster, planked lamb a la Ramses II, and American Beauty roses stuffed with cheese covered in mayonnaise dressing. The centerpiece of the dining room table was a scale model of Peking’s imperial gardens, with a miniature railroad that delivered dishes to each place setting. [Simulacra]
Grimes, p. 146.

The Waldorf Hotel was the first dining room where old New York wealth dined on public display.
Ibid., p. 147.

Healy’s opened a beefsteak dungeon.
Ibid., p. 151.

Rooftop gardens swelter during the summer. One trick was to heat the elevator so that sweltering guest stepping out on the roof, felt the blessed relief of cooler air.
Ibid., p. 156.

At the Paradise Roof atop the Republic Theater on Forty-second street, Oscar Hammerstein created a mock country village, with a windmill, a ruined castle, bridges, boats, and stone houses to complement an open air farm where swains and milkmaids tended live animals. Fitted with colored electric lights, his spitting windmill through five and colors onto the night sky. [Simulacra]
Ibid., p. 156.

On the Waldorf-Astoria roof-garden, the management installed a giant Victrola. As Caruso recordings played, a twenty-five-piece orchestra provided the accompaniment, creating the illusion of a live operatic performance. [Sound]
Ibid., p. 172.

The itchy palm of the waiter.
Ibid., p. 161.

Large restaurants: the distance between the kitchen and the tables was so great that the food tended to arrive cold.
Ibid., p. 167.

The restaurant operated by Gustav Stickley on the 12th floor of his retail house furnishings store on 39th street in NYC was a brave but brief experiment in pure food, sanitation, and “progressive living.” It opened in May of 1913 and was out of business a few months short of three years later when the entire retail business failed… The Workshop’s ambitions were captured in the motto which appeared on furniture labels and the restaurant’s china: “Als ik kan.” In its quaint Dutch formulation, it was a pledge to do one’s very best work. When applied to food this meant pure and fresh ingredients straight from the source, simply prepared by cooks using modern appliances in a pleasant work environment, and consumed slowly in a restful setting... Provisions such as eggs, dairy products, vegetables, and spring water served for lunch, teatime, and dinner at the Craftsman Restaurant were trucked in daily from Stickley’s 600-acre Craftsman Farms in Morris Plains NJ... It was a haven for people of “good taste” wishing to avoid the show-off culture of champagne and loud music exemplified by lobster palaces and cabarets...

The dining room was decorated in earth tones: browns, deep reds, oatmeals, and creams. Plates, bowls, and cups were rimmed with a pinecone design. Bread was served in handmade willow baskets. The wood floor was mostly left bare while the tables were covered with criss-crossing Irish linen runners. A focal point of the room was a Germanic-looking hearth covered in Grueby tiles, with a hammered copper hood... The store and restaurant closed early in 1916. In August the entire stock of the Craftsman Workshops store was sold at Gimbels Department Store at reductions of 35% to 50%. [Department Store]

Whitaker, N. pag.

In the teens, the Department of Health ran an experimental lunchroom, where the calorie count and protein content of each dish were printed on the menu.

Ibid., p. 178.

As calorie-counting became widespread in the teens and twenties with the pencil-thin flapper ideal, restaurants suffered.

Ibid., p. 199.

The Volstead Act harmed restaurants, where many sauces could not be made without wine.” [Prohibition]

Ibid., p. 198.

First vegetarian restaurant, Vegetarian Restaurant Number One, opens in 1895 on Twenty-third Street.

Ibid., p. 194.

Keene’s English Chop House in West Thirty-sixth Street has three-dimensional menus, now-stereoptician color slides showing all available courses, including deserts. The diner studies them through a viewer.

Berger, New York, p. 203.
No meat was served in New York on Tuesdays during World War I.
Ellis, p. 506.

If it’s very late and you are hungry, you can take a cab to the Belmont Cafeteria downtown or the Garfield on Flatbush Avenue. Better: Wait till tomorrow; there’s a 99-cent hot lunch at the Tip Toe Inn on 86th and Broadway. Have the brisket and then drop a nickel in the subway and go downtown and take a walk. The old socialists are still discussing the imminent collapse of capitalism with the writers from the Forvetz at the Garden Cafeteria. In Union Square, they are arguing about surplus value, the Spanish Republic, and the true meaning of Marx’s Grundriss.

If it’s a sultry August evening, you will be able to hurry down to Sheepshead Bay and step up to the Clam Bar at Lundy’s. Or you can drive out to Rockaway, get on the rides at Playland, drink cold beer and eat pig’s feet at Fennessey’s, Gildea’s, or Sligo House, McGuire’s or the Breakers, and look at the girls outside Curly’s Hotel at 116th and the ocean.
Ibid.

In the late 50s and early 60s there was a restaurant on West 50th (or was it 49th?) Street, in New York, between Fifth and Sixth Avenues, called Stokholm (without the “c”). As one may guess, it was a Swedish restaurant.
It was George who first told me about it. Actually he was telling all his friends about it. “You pay $3 and you can eat and eat and eat, as much as you want,” George said. And it was true. That was the restaurant’s policy. Swedish and Italian dishes.
The funny thing about this was that George used to very carefully prepare himself for the trips to Stokholm. For two or three days prior to going, he practically starved.
He ate nothing. I never followed that rule—which he advised—but George followed it religiously. On the subway, up Sixth Avenue, he could barely contain his anticipation of stuffing himself full. And I tell you, he ate and ate and ate, incredible amounts, his belly barely holding all the Swedish and Italian stuff, and he laughed, and had a terrific time, and we all had a terrific time. He never went to Stokholm alone: it was always a Fluxus gorging party. I don’t think I will ever forget those trips.
[Downtown]
Williams & Noél, p. 153.
Maciunas's diet consisted of ripe cheese and canned fish. The fist and the cheese were washed down with liberal amounts of Russian vodka... He used to say, that as long as the cheese did not walk away, he would eat it.
Ibid., pp. 150-1.

In 1960, Maciunas decided that one could become a millionaire by importing very special European foods. So he sent hundreds of form letters to European special food exporters and producers, offering to be their agent / salesman; and "Please, send me some samples of your special foods." And samples he got! Thousands of canned food samples began arriving at his home... We were very poor and very very hungry... So he brings and dumps in our place maybe a thousand cans of the most expensive, very very special pates, nightingale tongues, all very very special stuff. So we ate and ate, and we fed all the hungry Lower East side poets for a year or two, and everybody was amazed when we used to pull out these French delicacies that you could get only at the Waldorf-Astoria. I don't have to tell you that George couldn't sell any of it. He ate it all himself, with our help.
Ibid., p. 150.

"Oh, but baby, I want to go to Nobu tonight," she whines from the closet. "I want a baby shrimp tempura roll."
Ellis, Glamorama, p. 26.

Florent: a narrow, bleak 24-hour diner in the meat-packing district and I'm feeling grimy, slumped at a table near the front.
Ibid., p. 191.

The glittering, curvilinear surfaces inside Odeon are reassuring. The place makes you feel reasonable at any hour, often against bad odds, with its good light and clean luncheonette-via-Cartier deco decor. Along the bar are faces familiar under artificial light, belonging to people whose daytime existence is only a tag-designer, writer, artist.
McInerney, p. 44.

New York in 1982 will probably be fed on concentrates—pills at so much per box or bottle. Restaurants, cafés and dining places generally, will probably be passé. Meals will largely consist of various pellets according to the hunger of the masses. (cf. Beaton: "... products of the synthetic meal mentality..." [Architecture])

Parker, p. 13.

Chinese

Li Hung Chang the last Premier in the Tsing dynasty under the Manchus left China on a good will tour. He sailed first to Europe and then to New York. On the strength of his friendship with the then ex-President U. S. Grant, whom he had met while the latter was touring the Orient, he was heartily welcomed at the dock and escorted by a jubilant throng down to the Astor Hotel where he was stopping.

Socially he was a huge success. He was invited everywhere. Much to his dismay, wherever he dined his meals always consisted of meat in one form or other. The meat was good but it didn't agree with his stomach because he was not used to such a steady diet of it. He was faced with the grave problem of cancelling all of his dinner engagements or bringing his own chef along wherever he went, to personally supervise and prepare his meals. He decided to try the later idea. It was a huge success because of the novelty of it.

Americans looked on with wonder and asked him what the name of the food was that his chef was preparing. His answer was "Chop Suey" which meant that it was a combination of mixed foods. He explained that it was a meal consisting of bean sprouts, celery and Chinese greens plus many more vegetables with a touch of meat, usually pork. The guests begged him to let them taste it. They did. Immediately they clamored for more. Overnight, Chop Suey won widespread popularity.

Chinese residents in New York soon found a new field of endeavor open to them. They opened restaurants and called them "Chop Suey Houses." Many of these original Chop Suey Houses still exist.

Several years later there was a trend in American appetites. The Chinese restaurant owners introduced a new dish to their patrons. They called their concoction, Chow Mein. This dish consisted of a layer of fried noodles smothered with onions, Chinese greens, a touch of chicken or pork, and gravy.

Most Americans, even today, cannot distinguish the difference between Chop Suey and Chow Mein. The easiest way to remember it is to know the following rule. “Without noodles it is Chop Suey. With noodles it’s Chow Mein.”

Chin, N. pag.

chow-meineries

Allen, Slang, p. 151

It is a revelation to walk into a real Chinese kitchen and watch the chef prepare a meal. It is plainly evident that he thoroughly enjoys his work and that he would not be happy at any other occupation. Although a chef seldom works less than from 10 to 12 hours a day he is never tired because of the buoyancy his ‘songs’ give him.

Every stroke of the cleaver is done with perfect rhythmic timing “Chop. Chop. Chop Chop Chop.” The beats seem to say over and over, “I am happy. I am cheerful. The food smells very good!”

Even the Chinese diner who partakes of this food smacks his lips in delight at every mouthful to signify his enjoyment and pleasure. To refrain from smacking one’s lips and to eat in silence as is the American custom is an insult to the chef because it means that the diner is not enjoying his food.

Chinese family restaurants may seem drab and colourless, to many tourists and visitors but they should keep in mind that when Chinese go into a restaurant they do so to eat, not to look at the scenery. The delicious foods are enough scenery for them.

A chef never talks about his technique in preparing his dishes. A true chef is like the proverbial sailor on a holiday. He spends his spare time in perfecting his “kitchen music.”

The Chinese chefs in the Broadway sector or in any other Chinese American restaurants are different from the chefs in Chinatown because they do not specialize in Chinese foods for the Chinese.

Chin, N. pag.

Chinese do not like rare meats. They like to eat hard apples and hard peaches. They eat freshly killed chickens instead of first putting them in an icebox for a few days or a few months like most Americans do. They dislike bread.

Ibid.

Chinese restaurants move into Times Square during Prohibition and open chop suey joints. Low food overhead and cheap labor, they undercut the nightclubs and large restaurants.
Grimes, p. 203.

The jaundiced cooks of Chinatown leer as they slice off the heads of fishes or the snouts of pigs.
Conrad, p. 322.

Sing Wu—Chinese restaurant on Second Avenue everyone went to after art openings.
N. cit.

Food

_Food_ restaurant opened at 127 Prince Street on the corner of Wooster Street in October of 1971 and was run by the original founders for three years.
Morris, _Food_, p. 12.

Matta-Clark held a sculptor’s dinner—for sculptors by sculptors. All the utensils were screwdrivers, hammers, chisels.
Ibid., p. 29.

Famous Sunday night guest artist meals at _Food_. One was the serving of live brine shrimp in hollowed out hard-boiled eggs. The other was Matta-Clark’s “Bone Meal,” consisting of a variety of bone-based dishes such as chicken bones, beef bones stuffed with wild rice and mushrooms, from legs, marrow bones. The meal started with Gordon-made aspic, went on to oxtail soup, and then the bone platter. Richard Peck was in the back scrubbing bones that people had finished eating and Hisachika Tasahashi drilled holes through the bones, which were stung on rope and handed to the customers as necklaces so they could wear their dinners home.
Ibid., p. 29.

You have to realize at that particular time in New York,” Mr. Sonnier added, “people did not eat bone marrow.”
Kennedy, “Meals,” N. pag.

The same year, 1971, Alice Waters founded Chez Panisse in Berkeley, Calif., as “a simple little place where we could cook and talk politics,” sparking a fresh-and-seasonal-foods revolution in America. In 1973 a collective of artists and communal farmers founded the Moosewood Restaurant, the vegetarian standard-bearer, in Ithaca, N.Y.
Menu items: used car stew, alka seltzer chili, velvet chicken in satin sauce, city chicken, lumberjacks, hobnails.
Morris, Food, p. 52.

Food was one of the first places in NYC to serve sushi. It was the idea of Hisachika Tasahashi, assistant to Robert Rauschenberg. One early menu simply described it as raw mackerel with wasabi sauce.
Walrod, p. 57.

Matta-Clark cooked a lovely whole sea bass, but it emerged from the kitchen encased in a block of aspic nearly three feet long. He unmolded it, then gave the table a good kick, so that the aspic wobbled wildly and the bass seemed to fishtail upstream. “All the guests looked at it with this sort of horror and amazement. In the end my mundane chicken stew got eaten and everyone was too afraid to touch the fish.”
Kennedy, “Meals,” N. pag.

edible flowers were served to guests who came dressed as flowers

“I had the ridiculous idea of serving a glass of milk for 5 cents for pure nostalgic reasons.”

At one dinner performance, Matta-Clark served live brine shrimp swimming in broth in the middle of a halved, cooked egg white. “Some nonartist customers were furious and claimed there should be a law against us,” she wrote. “We told them guest chef days were no holds barred days and they could leave if they wished. So they did.”

About 60 artists are estimated to have worked at the restaurant as cooks, waiters and busboys over the first three years.

the restaurant was becoming an increasingly fashionable scene, a precursor of the SoHo to come. [Gentrification]
T - Advertising

Le Corbusier: "If I were in authority, I would forbid advertising."
Corbusier, p. 101.

This city knows how to advertise.
Irwin, p. 30.

Manhattan is its own best logo.
Morris, Manhattan '45, p. 10.

Outdoor advertising, where the mere idea of a commodity could shine without any reference to the actual object.
Sharpe, p. 195.

History is forgotten. "Nature, gods, the sea, are replaced by new words that must be mastered. In Paris there is but one which the skies spasmodically teach us—Citroën. In New York there are Lasky, Ziegfeld, Goldwyn, Mayer."
Morand, p. 191.

Innermost, decisive significance of the advertisement:
"An electric sign stands up against the sky advertising some brand of chewing gum and beside it the steeple of a church. Great warehouses and grain elevators support flaring advertisements; it looks as though the whole of Manhattan is for sale. And somewhere in all this tangle of lives and tangle of buildings, inland out of sight of the sea and fog, there is my own particular little studio called home."
Barnes, p. 183.

The statue of Christopher Columbus in Columbus Circle has been upstaged by a hotel, the Mayflower, which hoists its plaque into the sky in celebration of another voyage. The new gods the city has installed in its heaven are the theatrical stars named on its billboards: Beatrice Lillie, Ethel Waters, and Eleanor Powell are appearing in At Home Abroad just off Columbus Circle.
Conrad, p. 170.

Like so many others, a young woman named Gladys Glover has come to New York to make a name for herself. Unable to do so by dint of talent or determination, she hits upon a simpler expedient, using her hard-earned cash to rent a huge billboard overlooking Columbus Circle, with her name painted on it in ten-foot-tall letters. Eerily prophetic in its vision of celebrity as a self-fueling phenomenon—Gladys becomes famous for being famous—offering deep insight into the nature of urban spectacle. New York is a city of crowds, of course, but it is also an instrument by which certain individuals distinguish themselves from the crowd, commanding the attention of everyone else. Incapable of activating New York’s publicity machine in an institutional way, Gladys taps the city’s physical urbanism, which turns out to be shaped along much the same lines: giant signs, placed on buildings facing large public spaces, seek to draw the notice of the thousands of pedestrians below.

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 352.

In 1910, the famous Roman Chariot Race sign debuted atop the Hotel Normandie at Broadway and Thirty-eighth Street. The thirty-second show, at seven stories high and ninety feet wide, was astonishing enough to stop traffic. Twenty thousand incandescent bulbs gave the impression of toga’d drivers snapping their whips over galloping horses as the wheels of their chariots spun through the night. Like Oscar Wilde at the New York Customs office, the sign had nothing to declare except its own genius. It sold nothing, but advertisers—up to ten in a minute—could bask in the glory of the spectacle by time-sharing a space for their names on the top of the billboard. Chariots came back to Broadway in 1925 when the first neon tubes were used to advertise the movie Ben-Hur. [Antiquity]

Sharpe, p. 197.

A billboard for the new St. Moritz Hotel goes up at Fordham Road and Corona Avenue in the Bronx. Alabama-born sign creator Douglas Leigh, 26, has persuaded the owners to advertise on the site, he is paid $50 per month and a room at the hotel (the Central Park South address looks good on his letterhead), and by year’s end he has sold A&P on the idea of putting up a sign with a steaming cup of coffee, 15 feet wide at the southeast corner of Seventh Avenue and 47th Street. Leigh will soon have a giant penguin blinking its eyes to promote Kool cigarettes, an animated cartoon for Old Gold cigarettes, a clown tossing quoits in the shape of the three-ring Ballantine Beer logotype, and by 1941 will have created 32 large signs with more than 75,000 light bulbs for Times Square, Columbus Circle, and other venues.

Trager, p. 476.
In general, the close connection between advertising and the cosmic awaits analysis: "In a Buick ad of the late 1920s, an athletic larger-than-life young man seems to be rising over the Manhattan skyline; his eyes are raised, his face bathed in light, and he is lifting a Buick in the palm of his hand, as offering it to heaven." [Cosmic] Douglas, Honesty, p. 68.

Electric billboards are more efficient than the moon. Goll," p. 5.

In a city in which the illusion of its advertising is mistaken for its reality, those who muddle along in the unkempt and ordinary way know themselves to be failures. Bladford, p. 56.

Red, white, green, yellow, blue, orange, purple, they urge, solicit, press, command you to go somewhere or buy something. Bottles of beer appear on the firmament and transform themselves into dwarfs drinking; showers of gold peanuts fall from the skies; dragons breathing smoke become a film title; cigarettes are ignited; automobiles materialize. Mountains, towns, lamaseries, men with top hats, nude women with teeth, spring into existence on the façades and are wiped off into oblivion... dwarfs and dragons, beer and nuts, spiffy men, naked women, and far-off landscapes—this fairy tale hodgepodge. Sharpe, pp. 210-1.

In New York Asta electrifies, astral The flickering signals on the rooftops give off sparks. Behrens, p. 315.

At a yellowpainted drugstore at the corner of Canal, he stops and stares abstractly at a face on a green advertising card. It is a highbrowed cleanshaven distinguished face with arched eyebrows and a bushy neatly trimmed moustache, the face of a man who has money in the bank, poised prosperously above a crisp wing collar and an ample dark cravat. Under it in copybook writing is the signature, "King C. Gillette." Dos Passos, p. 11

The evenly chiseled windows are like a stenciled advertising poster. Mayakovsky, America, p. 47.
Grand Central has become honky-tonk, with its extra-dimensional advertising displays and its tendency to adopt the tactics of a travel broker. I practically lived in Grand Central Terminal at one period (it has all the conveniences and I had no other place to stay) and the great hall seemed to me one of the more inspiring interiors in New York, until Lastex and Coca-Cola got into the temple.

White, Here, p. 49.

In 1949, Grand Central tries to boost revenues by broadcasting advertising messages over its public address system, stopping only after a vociferous protest led by New Yorker editor Harold Ross.

Trager, p. 569.

The Eastman Kodak Colorama unveiled in the main concourse of Grand Central Terminal will remain there for 40 years, presenting spectacular scenic views 18 feet high and 60 feet long. Other commercial displays follow.

Ibid, p. 578.

Marianne Moore delighted in advertising copy as a girl, later appropriating its fast, exact shifts and splices for the collages of her poetic art. “If you fear that you are reading an advertisement,” her poem, “The Arctic Ox (or Goat)” concludes, “you are.”

Douglas, Honesty, p. 66

Scott Fitzgerald spent only three months in the advertising world but learned how to drop flamboyantly quotable lines such as: “All women over thirty should be shot.”

Ibid., p. 67.

Scott had shrewd ideas about pushing his books. In a 1923 essay entitled “How I Would Sell My Book,” he urged the dealers to fill an entire store window with nothing but copies of his latest book, then station “a man with large spectacles sitting in the midst of them, frantically engrossed in the perusal of a copy.” Brash but incandescent self-promotion was one of the motives springs of young Fitzgerald’s art. “I am a fake,” he liked to explain in a half-conscious homage to the values of Madison Avenue, “but not a lie.”

Ibid., p. 67.
The fascination and familiarity with advertising on the part of New York's leading performers, publishers, and writers did not represent an artistic compromise or sellout on their part.

I.M. Pei will never be happy on Route 66.
Venturi, p. 6.

Cocktails and signs of "ads"

flashing,
light's waterfalls,

Bacchae
among electric lights will swarm the crowds streamers of the lighted

skyscrapers

The electrical sublime in art and literature ultimately threatened to become a form of the advertising that gave it birth—not advertising products, for people knew from the start how fleeting that effect was—but selling light and spectacle in and of themselves.
Sharpe, p. 21.

The spectacle is capital accumulated to the point that it becomes images.
Debord, Spectacle, N. pag.

All obsessing electric capitals
Warner's Sugar
And on the Palisade cliff
Surf Bathing
Depero, "Coney," p. 422.

As I look at the great incandescent signs along the Jersey shore, blazing across the night the names of beer and perfumes and corsets, it occurs to me that, after all, that kind of thing could be overdone; a single name, a single question, could be blazed too far.
Sharpe, p. 188
Stuart Davis’s paintings treat words like trade names, and his surfaces are, at bottom, a form of prospectus for corporate enterprises. Later, nesting in Pop trade names are figments such as those earlier thought to be hidden in the cache of “poetic” vocables.

Advertising is the art of mass communication, the only art, if it is one, that assumes that all knowledge is transmittable, and takes its audiences to be literally everyone. This is a position shared in one form or another by the artists working in New York in the 1920s; they, too, believe that everything is capable of popularization.

Douglas, Honesty, p. 69.

A year after the Singer Building opened, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Building usurped its place as the world’s tallest building, the world’s largest advertisement.

Sharpe, p. 188.

When Woolworth’s designers apologized to him that his building’s cost was unlikely to be recuperated by enough income-producing floor space, he confided that it was as an enormous advertisement that the building would pay for itself.

Ibid, p. 234.

It is an office building, not a cathedral, an advertising symbol, a monument to prosperity, an unusable landing place for illusory dirigibles, or a pathological symptom of somebody’s repressed desires.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 68.

Symbol dominates space. Architecture is not enough. The sign is more important than the architecture.

Venturi, pp. 8, 13.

An ad campaign for beer features pictures of the New York skyline over the slogan, “The night belongs to Michelob.” [Panorama]

Sharpe, p. 323.
To be white, male and healthy in New York in the 1950s was to be as blessed as any individual at any time in history.
Cracknell, p. 16.

The well-shined Oxfords of the comfortable WASP account executives paroling the Madison Avenue sidewalks.
Ibid., p. 71

New York is brogan boot shape state of Madison Ave Negro button-downs
The Last Poets, “New York”

The world of commercial art was high-powered and snobbish—the crowd was the smuggest, meanest, drunkest bunch of people you ever saw.
Bockris, Warhol, p. 80.

Contrary to popular belief, drinking on agency premises was comparatively rare, although not unknown.
Cracknell, p. 148.

who were burned alive in their innocent flannel suits on Madison Avenue amid blasts of leaden verse & the tanked-up clatter of the iron regiments of fashion & the nitroglycerine shrieks of the fairies of advertising & the mustard gas of sinister intelligent editors, or were run down by the drunken taxicabs of Absolute Reality
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 16.

Ghost writing, as in advertising.
Roman, p. 8.

Rosser Reeves: “Originality is the most dangerous word in the advertiser’s lexicon.”
Ibid. p. 7.

David Oglivy deplored “creativity,” a word he professed not to understand: “When I write an ad, I don’t want you to tell me you find it creative.”
Ibid., pp. 8, 9.

Paper clips are dangerous when they are used to fasten papers together they frequently pick up papers which don’t belong. Staples or bulldog clips are much safe and more efficient.
Oglivy was English, at a time when an English accent was still rare and hugely prized in New York. Oglivy’s was “a particularly well-modulated accent, and with his long, lean figure, foppish hair and ever present pipe, he was every bit Hollywood’s idea of the perfect English gentleman, a character he fully exploited… He dressed for his parts. He didn’t wear a business suit. Sometimes he dressed as the English country gentleman with his brogues, a tweed jacket and lapels on his vest. Sometimes he wore a kilt, before anyone had seen one. Sometimes, at big state occasions, he put on this kind of purple vest that looked vaguely ecclesiastical. But he never wore a normal business suit, never… In that era in New York, where in the face of the brash, loud, busy new world he retreats into a caricature of his real self and becomes even more English, brittle and refined.” [Fashion]
Cracknell, pp. 32-3, 41.

Bill Bernbach on naming Doyle Dane Bernbach: “Nothing will come between us, not even punctuation.” [Textuality]
Ibid., p. 52.

In 1935 when Grover Whalen was put in charge of organizing the New York World Fair that was to open in 1939, he took the young Bill Bernbach with him to work in his offices in the Empire State Building and at the site in Flushing Meadows. [World’s Fair 1939]
Ibid., p. 53.

Jewish advertising firms were known as “Seventh Avenue” agencies.
Ibid., p. 55.

On DDB’s Volkswagen account: “We have to sell a Nazi car in a Jewish town.”
Ibid. p. 84.

“You don’t have to be Jewish to love Levy’s real Jewish rye.” It was advertised as “Levy’s real Jewish Rye,” itself a little contrived as there’s nothing particularly Jewish about rye bread… Subway passengers became aware of posters with large, engaging pictures of the people you’d least expect chewing through a hunk of Levy’s. And if they looked authentic, that’s because they were authentic: “We wanted normal looking people, not blonde, perfectly proportioned models. I saw the Indian on the street; he was an engineer for the New York Central. The Chinese guy worked in a restaurant near my midtown Manhattan office. And the kid we found in Harlem. They have great faces, interesting faces, expressive faces.”

It would be easy now to dismiss the whole campaign as stereotypical, even condescending, but not then—far from it. These ads were startling for the simple reason that such people weren’t usually seen starring in advertising.
New Yorkers reveled in it, demanding copies of the Levy’s posters as well as the bread. It reflected and celebrated their contemporary multiculturalism, and for the immigrants it helped “normalize” and quotation their status simply by making them seem an excepted, normal part of society.

I Wuv Wevy’s.

Early in 1965, a beer company launched a major television and radio advertising campaign, in which it pointed out how many different nationalities live in New York City and, of course, how each of them preferred that company’s beer.
     Gottehrer, p. v.

Charles Gillett created the Big Apple tourism campaign, which was conceived during the 1964-65 World’s Fair, and most of the bureau’s publications carried “Come to the Fair” or similar slogans in large type. Gillett proposed that after the Fair, the city us The Big Apple, named after jazz musicians’ nickname for the city because that’s where they’d get the best jobs. [World’s Fair 1964]
     Cohen, Apple, pp. 91, 92.

“I’ve heard great singing Negroes call it “The Apple!”
     Kerouac, Traveler, p. 105.

In the mid 1950s an art director at Benton & Bowles asked the name of the hopeful blonde female illustrator who’d just shown her folio to a colleague in the office next to his. “That wasn’t a chick,” he laughed, “I’ve got his name somewhere… er… Andy Warhol.”
     Cracknell, p. 74.

On his second day in New York, Andy went to see the art director of Glamour magazine, Tina Fredericks, in the Condé Nast building in the heart of Madison Avenue’s “ad alley.”
He held himself in a loose way, with his hands hanging limp from his wrists, and talked in a breathless whisper.

Bockris, Warhol, p. 80.

When shopping his drawings to Madison Avenue, Andy wore a bohemian uniform of chino pants, cotton T-shirts and worn sneakers, which he had appropriated largely from Marlon Brando, and carried his drawings in a brown paper bag, looking, one friend remember, “as if he had written his own part in a play by Truman Capote.”

Ibid., p. 81.

A 1994 Gap ad featured black and white photo of Warhol during his illustrator days on Madison Avenue with the tagline: “Andy Warhol wore khakis.”

no.cit.

One of the climactic moments in the Raggedy Andy saga occurred when he presented his drawings to the elegant grande dame of the fashion magazines, Carmel Snow at Harper’s Bazaar, and a roach crawled out with the pictures. “She felt so sorry for me,” Andy told everyone, “that she gave me a job.”

Bockris, Warhol, p. 82.

In 1953, Andy won his first Art Director’s Club gold medal—the Oscar of the advertising industry.

Ibid. p. 88.

On an Esquire cover, Warhol falls backward into a can of Campbell’s tomato soup to signify the end of pop art. Warhol was excited; he thought they were going to make a giant can and fill it with soup. Fischer shot the picture in two parts, dropping a marble into a can of thinned soup to make the splash and the stripping in a separate shot of Warhol.

Cracknell, p. 176.

Warhol was contributing illustrations to practically all of the fashion magazines, including Mademoiselle, Glamour, Vogue, and Harper’s Bazaar, as well as doing covers for Dance Magazine and Interiors. His work could be seen in many of the city’s fanciest stores: he designed greeting cards for Tiffany & Co., stationary for Bergdorf Goodman, and placemats for the Bird Cage restaurant at Lord & Taylor. He whipped up sketches for album covers for RCA Victor and Columbia records and dust jackets for New Directions, including one with a typically Warholian composition of rows and rows of faces and a suggestively impish cupid with arrow for the cover of Three More Novels by Ronald Firbank, the outré English writer and pillar of camp sensibility. Warhol also devised illustrations for the corporate image-building campaigns of the Upjohn and Rexall companies. He drew newspaper ads for the National Broadcast Company and created title cards for the prestigious television show “Studio One.” For a while, he was even the “hands” on the Will Rogers Jr. Sunday morning TV show, drawing clouds, raindrops and whatever else the meteorologists predicated.

Art directors showered Warhol with assignments because he worked fast, met deadlines, and displayed a properly submissive attitude when they demanded revisions. “If they told me to draw a shoe,” He said, “I’d do it, and if they told me to correct it, I would—I’d do anything they told me to do, correct it and do it right. After all that correction, those commercial drawings would have feelings, they would have a style. The attitude of those who hired me had feeling or something to it; they knew what they wanted, they insisted; sometimes they got very emotional. The process of doing work in commercial art was machine-like, but the attitude had feeling to it.”

Andy cleverly ingratiated himself with almost anyone who was in a position to give him work. He made and gave away numerous personalized artworks, including hand-colored wrapping paper, ornately decorated Easter eggs, and whimsical drawings of butterflies. This endeared him to art directors, many of whom treasured every drawing he sent their way.

Bourdon, pp. 33-34.

Warhol brought his clients drawings in paper bags. Smith, Warhol, p. 100.

He wanted to call himself Andy Paperbag. Koestenbaum, p. 28.

Billboards

The development of electric power in the 1900s made it feasible to install enormous electric signs, sometimes mounted on the roofs of shorter older buildings, sometimes on the façades of big new ones. Years of conflict between Broadway and Fifth Avenue owners’ associations led to a plan to restrict electric signs in most of Manhattan, but to concentrate them around Times Square. In 1909, a state court overturned a city law that limited their size. Nearly overnight, a new generation of huge, bright, kinetic signs came to life.

Berman, Town, p. 109.

The phrase, the Great White Way, is supposed to have been coined in 1901 by O.J. Gude, an advertising man, who is also said to have been the first to see the tremendous possibilities of electric display. A modest sign at Broadway and Twenty-third Street advertising an ocean resort was New York’s first experience with this phenomenon.

WPA, pp. 170-71.

At Broadway and Twenty-third Street, where later, on this and some other ground, the once famed Flatiron Building was placed, there stood at one time a smaller building, not more than six stories high, the northward looking blank wall of which was completely covered with a huge electric sign which read:

SWEPT BY OCEAN BREEZES
THE GREAT HOTELS
PAIN’S FIREWORKS
SOUSA’S BAND
SEIDL’S GREAT ORCHESTRA
THE RACES
NOW—MANHATTAN BEACH—NOW

Each line was done in a different color of lights, light green for the ocean breezes, white for Manhattan Beach and the great hotels, red for Pain’s fireworks and the races, blue and yellow for the orchestra and band. As one line was illuminated the others were made dark, until all had been flashed separately, when they would again be flashed simultaneously and held thus for a time. Walking up or down Broadway on a hot summer night, this sign was an inspiration and an invitation. It made one long to go to Manhattan Beach. I had heard as much or more about Atlantic City and Coney Island, but this blazing sign lifted Manhattan Beach into rivalry with fairyland.

Dreiser, p. 119.

In 1916, The Broadway Association and the Fifth Avenue Association—collections of combative merchants—battle it out over where projecting signboards can and cannot be placed. Broadway wants unlimited access. But the Fifth Avenue merchants, who are wealthier and more aggressive, insist that projecting signs be banned from Washington Square to 110\textsuperscript{th}, along Fifth Avenue. Fifth Avenue wins the war. Its long elegant vistas will be unharmed. Broadway fights back. A new zoning law grants the unlimited use of giant billboards, but only on the Main Stem. One of the peculiarities of American capitalism is to concentrate and confine such activity [billboards] to a limited space, while at the same time \textit{liberating} it to an unparalleled degree.

Charyn, p. 51.

\textbf{BILLBOARDS ARE ALMOST ALRIGHT.}

Venturi, p. 6.

Everything about a Times Square sign, from its supporting framework to the image it displays, is big—indeed enormous. But it is not just big. Unlike a dam or aircraft hangar or similarly oversized structure, a Broadway sign is not simply large in the abstract: because its subject is almost always a person's face, or figure, or name, it plainly represents an enlargement, a scaling-up from ordinary human dimensions to something else, something that is distinct from—yet also related to—the individual on which it is based.

Sanders, \textit{Celluloid}, p. 298.

In 1955, James Rosenquist moves to New York to study. The next year he quits school and paints billboards in Times Square.

Rosenquist: "I wanted to paint the Sistine Chapel, and so where do you learn that? So, maybe that's in billboard painting, or outdoor sign painting. So I went to General Outdoor Advertising, and I said, 'I can do that!' It was painting great big macaroni noodles as big as firehouses for Kraft Foods. 'Oh, we don't let anybody do that until they've been here 20 years.' I said, 'Well, I can do that.' So, they gave me a job to paint two heads for Coca-Cola..."

Dickerson, n. pag.

Rosenquistian gigantism into abstraction... But one sign, dead center, especially catches our attention—not least because, seeing it from behind, we have no idea what it is for. It is a giant top hat, outlined in lights and slowly tipping its brim every minute or so. Glamorous, larger than life, ultimately unknowable, it is a symbol not of any particular celebrity, but of celebrity itself, a construct of popular culture that grow from and yet transcends individual personality in a way that not even the stars themselves fully understand.
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 299.

A giant smoker in a Times Square spectacular begins blowing five-foot-wide smoke rings (created by steam from Con Ed) every 4 seconds to promote Camel cigarettes. The sign requires no lighting.
Trager, p. 528.

Harpo Marx enters the signage of Times Square, riding a neon Pegasus across the giant Mobil sign, as if he has himself been somehow transmuted into the evanescent stuff of neon.

A blank array of electric globes crusting every building’s side like the very skin of some immense and glowing thing that has left its shell behind.
Barnes, p. 36.

The allure springs from the totality, the superabundance of signs, rather than from any one.

One important way in which people have always experienced Times Square, and still do, has been to adopt a favorite sign, to be alone with it, to make it part of their inner lives. This means uncoupling the sign from whatever commodity it was meant to promote and placing it in a different system of meaning all our own.

Do you remember the lady in an electric rain-storm with her long skirt blowing to show the binding? Do you remember the kitten eternally unrolling a spool of silk thread? Then there was the golfer, making at two-minute intervals a perfectly grooved drive, and the chariot race, with teams of fours galloping all night. [Surrealism]
Irwin, p. 325.

One of Times Square’s most arresting early spectaculars was the fifty foot-tall Miss Heatherbloom, promoting Heatherbloom Petticoats, Silk’s Only Rival. The product seems to have been a typical garment-center knockoff of a high-fashion item, marketed to millions of young women of the sort who passed through the Square every day: typists and switchboard operators, schoolteachers and young wives.
The sign was built in the 1900s (different sources give different dates) by O.J. Gude, the Square’s first great commercial artist, who painted in bursts and undulations of electric power. It had an elaborately programmed sequence where the heroine walked through a driving rain “depicted by slashing diagonal lines of lamps.” The wind whipped at her dress, lifted her skirt, and revealed the petticoat clinging to her legs and her hips and her thighs. The gale receded, her clothes fell into place, she resumed her high-heeled, mincing walk–only to be swept up in the wind and rain again, and again and again.

This sign attracted big crowds, and the crowds included plenty of women—not the most affluent women, who would surely have stuck with silk, a warm and voluptuous material that has been a symbol of class since ancient times—but seamstresses and switchboard operators on their way to work, or schoolteachers and stenographers going to plays. What the ad promised is something that the New York garment industry, just a few blocks south, knew how (and still knows how) to deliver: cheap knockoffs of expensive fabrics and designs; aristocratic fantasies that a plebeian mass public can afford. It was structurally similar to the electrified mass culture embodied in its sign. It sought and found a large body of respectable women who would respond to a public, flamboyant sexual display, and would buy a garment that they hoped would help them change.

Berman, Town, pp. 7–8.

The advertisement is the ruse by which the dream forces itself on industry. [Dream City]

Benjamin, p. 171.

The Prince of Wales visits Times Square to just look and admire the electric signs.

Irwin, p. 325.

On the corner is a gargantuan sign, “DRINK THE WIGGIN FAMILY RYE.” An acre of blood and green fire shows a huge bottle of the Wiggin Family pouring everlastingly into a glass that never fills. [Alcohol]

Reisenberg, p. 156.

The waterfall, a city block long, had a tremendous seething flow. At night, everything in the Square seemed to flow toward it. If you stood there and looked at it for a while, it could put you in a kind of trance, you could lose track of everything around you. The falls were high off the ground, but was there a way you could fall in? Could kids fall in? Was there something there that we couldn’t see but that could pull us in? On the northern and southern fringes of the waterfall, there were giant bronze statues of a man and a woman. Looking at photos today, I see I was right about them: They were naked! No clothes at all! And yet they were totally unsexy. Not that my cousins and my friends and I knew much about sex, but still we could feel its absence. The compelling thing about these statues was their solemnity… Were the bronze statues so solemn because they were guarding us from the edge, from falling in, from fatal currents and hidden rocks that we couldn’t see or even imagine, but that they knew all too well? Did the danger come, in some weird way, from the smart clothes themselves and from the BOND?

The Camel sign just below the waterfall was something else. Here was another giant adult, and a man in uniform, too—which meant, in the 1940s, somebody who was risking his life to protect us all from Hitler… this Camel smoker was ready to take Hitler on. How did he fight? He blew smoke rings in the dictator’s face… The smoke rings were collected from the building’s heating system; they signified not only American bravery, but American cool.

Berman, Town, pp. 9, 10.

This week or next, depending on when the first sharp frost hits Times Square, crews will add 3,000 gallons of anti-freeze to the waterfall display in the square. The anti-freeze goes in every year about the same time. A 1,000 gallon tank of the chemical is kept on the roof behind the waterfall to make up for evaporation loss, which varies from 250 to 500 gallons a week.

Berger, New York, p. 281.

A new Times Square sign advertising Bond Stores men’s and women’s apparel features a waterfall five stories (27 feet) high and 120 feet long. Sign impresario Douglas Leigh… has persuaded Bond Stores to let him put up the most sensational sign ever and it will continue until 1954. Running a full 200 feet from 44th to 45th Street, the $350,000 sign has 65-foot-tall male and female figures flanking the waterfall, which recyclces 50,000 gallons of water while a zipper flashes the news; a circular sign with a digital clock rises above the word “BOND” with a message reading, “Every Day 3,490 People Buy at Bond.”

Trager, p. 564.

Most signs are likely to be much smaller and more nuanced. The Square’s ecology is such that the smaller signs are experienced in relation to the big ones. The manager of the Arrow Shirts shop said, "We're just below the waterfall." They make limited claims on the universe, but "Side by side, they're glorified" by the unlimited claims being made just above and around them.

Berman, Town, p. 5.

I cannot pass by the luminous advertising on Broadway. Everyone has heard about that incandescent path cutting diagonally across Manhattan in which the mob of idlers and patrons of motion pictures, burlesque shows and theaters moves. Electricity reigns, but it is dynamic here, exploding, moving, sparkling, with lights turning white, blue, red, green, yellow. The things behind it are disappointing. These close-range constellations, this Milky Way in which you are carried along, lead to objects of enjoyment which are often mediocre. So much the worse for advertising! There remains a nocturnal festival characteristic of modem times. I remember that the light filled our hearts, and that the intense, powerful color excited us and gave us pleasure. And on Broadway, divided by feelings of melancholy and lively gaiety, I wander along in a hopeless search for an intelligent burlesque show in which the nude white bodies of beautiful women will spring up in witty flashes under the paradisaic illumination of the spotlight.

Corbusier, p. 102.

Learning from the existing landscape is a way of being revolutionary for an architect. Not the obvious way, which is to tear down Paris and begin again, as Le Corbusier suggested in the 1920s, but another, more way; that is, to question how we look at things.

Venturi, p. 3.

Many American cities, especially in the Sun Belt, developed prosperity based on highways and cars, and created spaces with signs as big and bold as Times Square's. But those spaces tend to be strips (Las Vegas, Los Angeles, Mexico City) where people come in cars and drive straight through. Their signs are laid out in straight lines, meant to be seen one or at most two at a time by drivers or passengers on the road. The deployment of signs in Times Square is far more complex. Here people are on their feet, enveloped by crowds of walkers in a hundred directions, impeded from moving straight ahead even if they want to. The signs come at us from many directions; they color the people next to us in complex blends, and we become colored, too, all of us overlaid with the moving lights and shadows. We metamorphose as we turn around, and we have to turn around to make any headway in this crowd.

The development of Cubism in the early twentieth century was made for spaces like this, where we occupy many different points of view while standing nearly still. Times Square is a place where Cubism is realism. Being there is like being inside a 1920s Cubist experimental film: The Man with the Movie Camera as a home movie. Signs are the essential landmark, yet generally what grips our hearts is less any one sign than the complex, the totality, the superabundance of signs, too many signs, a perfect complement for the Square's too many people.

Since the 1890s, being attuned to Times Square's powerfulness has been one of the basic ways of being at home in New York. Even the most wretched people can feel at home with the Square's signs. "I'll just go down Broadway," Hurstwood says. "When he reached 42nd Street, the fire signs were already blazing bright." This man is starving, freezing, dressed in rags, delirious, one foot in the grave. But he can't stay away from the "fire signs." He is drawn to their warmth and light like a moth to a flame.

Berman, Town, pp. 6-7.

A five-story-high plaster and wood arch over Fifth Avenue at Madison Square, built to commemorate the Spanish-American War, featured a garland of electric lights. But it looked stodgy beside a 45-foot-long Heinz pickle blaring out across the square, outlined in rapidly blinking green bulbs with 577 GOOD THINGS FOR THE TABLE flashing beneath it in a riot of color.

Caldwell. p. 213.

Tibor Kalman's (1949-99) Fire Sign. A spectacular ad for Colors, a glossy magazine put out by the Italian sportswear company United Colors of Benetton. The sign was on display in 1992 and 1993. It was fifty feet high, maybe twice as long; it curved around the corner of 47th Street and Broadway, and it showed full frontal nude photos of six teenagers. Actually, they weren't quite teenagers: Two of them looked closer to twenty-five, another two seemed more like fifteen. And they weren't quite nude; they were holding small signs over their genitals, something like the fig leaves in Renaissance paintings of Adam and Eve. It was hard for a spectator not to enjoy the nakedness of these beautiful kids; but their genital fig leaves forced us also to share their embarrassment.
The color contrasts among the kids were striking: One was clearly Asian, one clearly African (Afro-American? Afro-European?), two clearly Caucasian, and two unclear or mixed; for that matter, it was very likely that all of them were mixed. The contrasts in ideas were striking, too. At the far left, a punklike blond boy with an Axl Rose look held an ATTITUDE placard. Next, a voluptuous Asian girl held RACE. An olive-skinned boy carried a TRUTH sign. A black girl had a POWER sign. A short, compact Asian man signed LIES. At right, the youngest-looking of the six, a girl with a gamine aura, covered herself with FIRST DATE. It was impossible (or let’s say very hard) for a spectator not to enjoy the near nakedness of these kids, to feast our eyes on them. At the same time, the way the sign was crafted, it was impossible not to feel guilt and embarrassment. The sudden vision of their bodies was revelatory and shocking. There was something about the way they stood, the ambient light and color, the innocence on their faces when innocence was mixed with defiance—that made them seem vulnerable and overexposed; they looked more like suspects in a police lineup than participants in an orgy. But what was their crime? There was human depth in this sign, it drew us into the action. Before the picture could mean anything, we spectators had to imagine actively, to ‘write the book.’ My wife and I imagined a strip search after a drug raid on a club. We noticed that at least two of these kids were “underage,” but we couldn’t tell what the age spread was supposed to mean. Was the point that age meant nothing? (But then, I thought, shouldn’t there be some older people with wrinkled or sagging bodies in the scene?) We never figured out their genital signs, fig leaves in print. Were we meant to think of those tags as social labels imposed by the powers that took their clothes and lined them up? Was this a generation of kids caught in the crossfire of adult big words? Yet wasn’t ‘victim’ another adult big word?”

Berman, Town, pp. 16-7.

The eighties begin with this story. Photographer Bruce Weber shot a water-polo player lying bare-chested on an unmade bed with his hands playing ‘inside-outside’ in his long johns, which persuaded Calvin Klein to hire him. Against a backdrop of a whitewashed house on a Greek island, with the muscles and detail of the male anatomy heightened by the low camera angle, the image of the athlete, transformed into a demigod in undershorts was blown up into an immense poster measure twenty by thirty meters on a billboard in Times Square. It was stolen overnight. In the month following, the sales of Calvin Klein underwear reached record highs.

_Frisa_, p. 90.

Weber’s gaze annulled all vulgarity, all sex-shop temptation, to reveal the aspect of a masculinity wounded by centuries of sexophobic obscurantism, in which heterosexual men can also recognize themselves.

_Ibid._, p. 90.

In the Whitney Museum of American Art’s 1987 Biennial, Weber’s work, flanked by Julian Schnabel, Barbara Kruger, Jeff Koons, and others, was described as “the comfort of myths,” precisely because his photos reinvented an athletic body whose precedent is still found in the classicism of the myth of Olympus.

_Ibid._, p. 90.
Today, on a winter evening, I arrive in Times Square about six o’clock. It is Broadway’s finest hour. Here, until midnight, New York takes its bath of light... tumbling, running, turning, zigzagging, rolling, vertical, perpendicular, dancing, epileptic; frames are whirling, letters flash out from the night... In 42nd Street it is a glowing summer afternoon all night, a world of undiscovered prisms, of rainbows squared.

In rain, or when there are mists floating around, it is still more beautiful; the rain becomes golden water; the skyscrapers vanish halfway up, and nothing more can be seen but the haloes of their cupolas suspended in a colored mist... The great searchlight atop the Times Building is sweeping up the remains of the sky.

Here the class war no longer has any meaning. This is victory! The electric lamp is no longer a lighting device, it is a machine for fascinating, a machine for obliterating .... This weary throng is determined not to go home, determined to spend its money, determined to blind itself with false daylight .... 42nd Street is a conspiracy of commerce against night... there is only one latitude left, the latitude of pleasure.

The Crossroads of the World were cold and windswept. The subway gratings breathed mustily and strongly when trains came by. Each sudden exhalation scattered cellophane wrappers, cigar bands, and grimy papers on the sidewalk in front of the United Cigar store.

Depends how high you are by now—assuming you’re picked up on one of the corners—say 42nd Street and 8th Avenue, near the great Whelan’s drug store, another lonely haunt spot where you can meet people—Negro whores, ladies limping in a Benzedrine psychosis—Across the street you can see the ruins of New York already started—the Globe Hotel being torn down there, an empty tooth hole right on 44th Street—and the green McGraw-Hill building gaping up in the sky, higher than you’d believe—lonely all by itself down towards the Hudson River where freighters wait in the rain for the Montevideo limestone.

Or bemused drunken businessmen with their hats tipped awry on their graying heads staring catatonically upward at the signs floating by on the Times Building, huge sentences about Khrushchev reeling by, the populations of Asia enumerated in flashing lightbulbs, always five hundred periods after each sentence.

_Ibid._, p. 108.

Times Square is a Catholic anathema.
Conrad, p. 121.

The Times Square Motogram, spelling out the news in its thousand of bulbs. A blind man would know he was in New York from the endless chatter of it.
Morris, _Manhattan '45_, p. 238.

Broadway at 42nd Street. Mother has stopped to read the flashes of the latest news on the Times Building... but baby wasn’t curious about that and fell asleep... but the girl was interested as she ate an eskimo pie.
Weegee, _Naked_ p. 45.

I remember when the Duece was all porno flicks
Beastie Boys, “Open Letter.”

Like lost souls emerging from the purgatory of the trains (dark rattling tunnels, smelly pornographic toilets, newsstands futilely splashing the subterranean gray depths with unreal magazine colors), the New York faces push into the air: spilling into 42nd Street and Broadway—a scattered defeated army. And the world of that street bursts like a rocket into a shattered phosphorescent world. Giant signs—Bigger! Than! Life!—blink off and on. And a great hungry sign groping luridly at the darkness screams
F*A*S*C*I*N*A*T*I*O*N.
Reay, pp. 85-6.

Why does Times Square feel like a big room?
Kerouac, _Lonesome_, p. 111.

Hart Crane: Time squared.
Mariani, p. 233.

Broadway’s deliberate ephemerality. For the first time a landscape changed every few seconds.
Sharpe, p. 215.
Right off Broadway where the Rialto is at its intensest, where the American spirit is abroad at night, and where the crude emphasis of the lobster and the rarebit with its chappy accompaniment would excite a stare on the boulevards.

Hapgood, p. 364.

This is the quiet hour; the theaters
   Have gathered in their crowds, and steadily
   The million light blaze on for few to see,
Robbing the sky of stars that should be hers.
A woman waits with bag and shabby furs,
   A somber man drifts by, and only we,
   Pass up the street unwearied, warm and free,
For over us the olden magic stirs.
Beneath the liquid splendor of the lights
   We live a little ere the charm is spent
This night is ours, of all the golden nights,
   The pavement an enchanted palace floor,
And Youth the player on the viol, who sent
   A strain of music thru an open door.
Teasdale, p. 50.

The jungle of West Forty-second Street. This inflamed appendix is noisier, more noisome, and more punk than Broadway, exposed at midsummer noon.

Reisenberg, p. 154.

Only forty-five minutes from Broadway,
Think of the changes it brings;
For the short time it takes,
What a diff'rence it makes
In the ways of the people and things.
Oh! What a fine bunch of rubens,
Oh! what a jay atmosphere;
They have whiskers like hay,
And imagine Broadway
Only forty-five minutes from here.
Cohan, “Forty-Five.”

We misappropriate Walter Benjamin when we assimilate his arcades to Times Square, either before or after Disney.
Bender, p. 223.

Do we overdraw Times Square history, make it more epic than it ought to be? Picadilly and Soho, in London, and Place de Clichy, in Paris, are similar places, have known similar kinds of decline and similar kinds of pickup, but without gathering quite the same emotion. We make Times Square do more work than it ought to.

Gopnik, p. 221.

From my office window, as I write, my constant companion is a small Beaux Arts skyscraper directly across on 42nd Street. It is elegantly composed and decorated, with three elongated, vertical bands of round-arched windows dominating a delicate, five-bay arrangement, topped with a crown of carved stone. The street at its feet is porn-country; the neighborhood around it is a disaster area. But the finesse with which the building proposes that sill and order are not only justifiable but desirable is somehow reassuring. I raise my eyes for an architecture break in a city that is as heartbreaking in its beauty as it is in its poverty and decay.

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 134.

Times Square, in the 1960s: the place that removed the need for drugs because it was a psychedelic trip in itself. Berman, Town, p. 11.

The X-rated movie houses and porno parlors had yielded to cartoon figures and toy stores.
Sharpe, p. 325.

Signs

Neon in daylight is a great pleasure... as are light bulbs in daylight.
O’Hara, p. 257.

The neon in the streets made its way into the new interiors in the indirect Deco cove lighting, casting a subdued yet emphatic glow across ceilings, walls, and mirrors.
Caldwell, p. 262.

A hundred, a thousand electric signs will blink and wink.
Dreiser, p. 3.

They say the neon lights are bright on Broadway They say there’s always magic in the air But when you’re walkin’ down that street And you ain’t had enough to eat The glitter rubs right off and you’re nowhere Drifters, "On Broadway."

The light that never was on sea or land he sees not and believes only in the lights of Broadway.
Hapgood, p. 76.

The 1920s also saw a tremendous brightening of Times Square: a "bath of light."
Berman, Town, p. 124.

Broadway on a clear night—this is the "Great White Way," when coloured lights soar high and a floodlit clock seems to hang in heaven.
Beaton, Portrait, p. 80.

the eye-white sky-light white-light district of lunar lusts
Loy, p. 509.

Taxis honked and rasped outside the hoarding, the sky shimmered with gold powder from electric signs.
Dos Passos, p. 192.

I drove toward the twilight descending on the city, into a very different New York, beckoning with the evening glow of the streets. But I entered the neon fairyland of Times Square embittered and gloomy.
Lobas, p. 152.

At night the whores come out along with pimps and everyone struts in high-heeled regalia under the glitter of a half-dead moon and fluorescent lights and lamp poles.
Wojnarowicz, p. 25.

Marshall McLuhan will suggest, that this great array of machinery, programmed to "blind people with false daylight," can inadvertently endow them with a second sight, an insight into "the truth of tonight" that is deeper than the truth of the working day.
Berman, Town, p. 125.

On to Times Square, where the sign blows smoke over my head, and higher the waterfall pours lightly. A Negro stands in a doorway with a toothpick, languorously agitating.
A blonde chorus girl clicks: he smiles and rubs his chin. Everything suddenly honks: it is 12:40 on a Thursday.

Neon in daylight is a great pleasure, as Edwin Denby would write, as are light bulbs in daylight. O'Hara, p. 257.

Broadway, he argued, “is not reality, it is transfiguration” of the mind and body. “Broadway is a great place of health. It is a free electric ray treatment. It is a tonic light-bath. Here voices are clearer, eyes brighter, and the whole body more vivid than anywhere else in New York.” “Poe’s man in the crowd,” he continued, “is walking there every night, back and forth, forward and back again, his eyes lit by some dream.” He acknowledged that it all is “the artifice of night.” Everyday life in Manhattan “is almost intolerable,” so “a great deal of New York night life is purely escape from New York.”

Peretti, p. 16.

Glitter was the gaudiness of America, that’s what I interpreted it as. And it was pretty. Glitter was makeup. I used it because it was shoving America back into the American faces. It was the gaudiness of Times Square. You know, take away the lights and what do you have in Times Square? Nothing.

McNeil, p. 89.

Like Tristan and Isolde obliterating day, the denizens of Broadway subsist in a permanent dimout.

Conrad, p. 288.

Then they both looked up the ramp and through the arcade, toward the doors on Seventh Avenue. Beyond the doors lay a thick, moribund light that seemed to fill the arcade with the smell of snow and of cold, so that for a while longer they seemed to stand in the grip of a dreadful reluctance and inertia.

Faulkner, p. 624.

the flash lighting of Pizza stand clattering character, dark night over grainy red buildings’ rooftops, the glimmer of the chrome in windows

Wojnarowicz, p. 111.
Garcia Márquez, writing of Macondo, manages to see Times Square: “In that state of hallucinated lucidity, not only did they see the images of their own dreams, but some saw the images dreamed by others.”

Berman, Town, p. 121.

In 1985 the Municipal Art Society helped create a ruling, put into effect in 1987, that developers had to preserve the world-famous signage by making sure that the base of new office buildings would be covered with eye-assaulting advertising. In so doing they ensured a great light show, but also took a decisive step in turning the night city into a museum. With electric signs no longer an essential form of economic communication—the brands and shows are already known from media that travel farther than a flashing light—what counts is status, the fact of having one’s product blazoned at the center of light.

[Advertising]

Sharpe, p. 325.

The red neon sign was a blur through the rain, and when I cruised past I could see a bar with a handful of people on stools huddled over their drinks.

Spillane, N. pag.

Attractions

Penny arcades, peepshows, shooting-galleries, flea circuses, and burlesque theaters, shooting galleries, fake doctors...freak-shows and hot-dog stands and Hindu yogis have moved their tents from Coney Island to Broadway. The seaside carnival had decamped on the Great White Way within the shadow of the Empire State Building. Charlatan yogis pretended to mend people and wristwatches in storefront tent theaters, and automatic moving-picture booths allowed the customer to “see herself as she would look on the silver screen.”

Peretti, p. 107.

Hubert’s Time Square Museum epitomized the presence of Coney Island in Midtown. Famed for its flea circus, in which the insects kicked balls and walked on wires, Hubert’s also featured lectures on human conception, transvestitism (delivered by a practitioner), and boxing, the latter given by Jack Johnson, the destitute former world heavyweight boxing champion. A pig and a monkey in a baby carriage, Siamese twins, Asian dancers, slot-machine films, and freak exhibits including “Doraldina,” “half man and half woman” also graced the museum.

Ibid., p. 107.

“The Spanish Inquisition,” an exhibit of nineteen oil paintings of torture in Times Square by Franz Vinck (Belgian, 1827-1903), which stayed open until one in the morning.

Caldwell, p. 264.

The Astaires, the most aristocratic act in the history of American popular culture, could fly through the air amid crashes of downward mobility and smells of fast food.

Berman, Town, p. 138.

Fantastic postures, such as the Strangler Lewis hold around the neck, are barred from the more tony palaces.

Walker, Night Club, p. 209.

Maybe you’ll get a sandwich at Reuben’s or stroll through Times Square and look at the Camel sign with the guy blowing smoke rings into the night or the two huge nude statues flanking the waterfall of the Bond Clothes sign and then slip into Toffenetti’s for coffee or head east to Glennon’s for a few final beers.

Cafeterias, Bars, Hangouts

Bickford’s is the greatest stage on Times Square—many people have hung around there for years, man and boy searching God alone knows for what, maybe some angel of Times Square who would make the whole big room home, the old homestead—civilization needs it... What’s Times Square doing there anyway? Might as well enjoy it.—Greatest city the world has ever seen.—Have they got a Times Square on Mars? What would the Blob do on Times Square? Or St. Francis? A girl gets off a bus in the Port Authority Terminal and goes into Bickford’s, Chinese girl, red shoes, sits down with coffee, looking for daddy. There’s a whole floating population around Times Square that has always made Bickford’s their headquarters day and night. In the old days of the beat generation some poets used to go in there to meet the famous character “Hunkey” who used to come in and out in an oversized black raincoat and a cigarette holder looking for somebody to lay a pawn ticket on-Remington typewriter, portable radio, black raincoat—to score for some toast, (get some money) so he can go uptown and get in trouble with the cops or any of his boys. Also a lot of stupid gangsters from 8th Avenue used to cut in—maybe they still do—the ones from the early days are all in jail or dead. Now the poets just go there and smoke a peace pipe, looking for the ghost of Hunkey or his boys, and dream over the fading cups of tea. The beatniks make the point that if you went there in every night and stayed there you could start a whole Dostoevski season on Times Square by yourself and meet all the midnight newspaper peddlers and their involvements and families and woes.

Kerouac, Lonesome, pp. 111-2.

There’s a whole floating population around Times Square that has always made Bickford’s their headquarters say and night. Remember how we went to a year of movies on 42nd Street, seeing successions of nothing pictures about nobody people while we waited for our friend to finish work or sat in Bickford’s forcing patterns on the table top, our fingers pushing through the spilled sugar, our feet scraping on the tiled floor. We listened to the parade of pushers and passers who stopped at our table or sat there with us, drinking hot water and ketsup?

Bickford’s Restaurants were a mainstay of early to mid-20th Century New York. It all started in 1902 when Samuel L. Bickford opened his first restaurant. Within two decades later he owned a chain offering quick food at affordable prices. In those pre-Depression days, the company described itself saying “The lunchrooms operated are of the self-service type and serve a limited bill of fare, which makes possible the maximum use of equipment and a rapid turnover. Emphasis is placed on serving meals of high quality at moderate cost.

The little building at 488 8th Avenue made the newspapers in 1932 when Bickford’s replaced a glass windows using non-union glaziers. In retaliation union members drove past while a passenger shot out the plate glass with a slingshot.

The appeal of Bickford’s, as well as their rival Horn & Hardart, was good food served quickly in a pleasant environment at an affordable cost. The working class of the nearby 34th Street office buildings flocked in at lunchtime for lamb stew or chopped steak, followed by apple pie or rice pudding. The 24 lunchrooms in the 1920s doubled to 48 by 1960.
who sank all night in submarine light of Bickford’s Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Emerging from the Seventh Avenue subway on 42nd Street, you pass the john, which is the beatest john in New York—you never can tell if it’s open or not, usually there’s a big chain in front of it saying it’s out of order, or else it’s got some white-haired decaying monster slinking outside, a john which all seven million people in New York City have at one time passed and taken strange notice of—past the new charcoal-fried-hamburger stand, Bible booths, operatic jukeboxes, and a seedy underground used-magazine store next to a peanut-brittle store smelling of subway arcades—here and there a used copy of that old bard Plotinus sneaked in with the remainders of collections of German high-school textbooks—where they sell long ratty-looking hotdogs (no, actually they’re quite beautiful, particularly if you haven’t got 15 cents and are looking for someone in Bickford’s Cafeteria who can lay some smash on you) (lend you some change).—

Coming up that stairway, people stand there for hours and hours drooling in the rain, with soaking wet umbrellas—lots of boys in dungarees scared to go into the Army standing halfway up the stairway on the iron steps waiting for God Who knows what, certainly among them some romantic heroes just in from Oklahoma with ambitions to end up yearning in the arms of some unpredictable sexy young blonde in a penthouse on the Empire State Building—some of them probably stand there dreaming of owning the Empire State Building by virtue of a magic spell which they’ve dreamed up by a creek in the backwoods of a ratty old house on the outskirts of Texarkana. Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 108.

Still hungry, go out down to the Oriental Cafeteria—"favored dining spot" also—some night life—cheap—down in the basement across the street from the Port Authority monolith bus terminal on 40th Street and eat big oily lambs’ heads with Greek rice for 90¢—Oriental zig-zag tunes on the jukebox. Ibid., p. 112.

Hot sooty neon and hotels. Wojnarowicz, p. 59.
A Saturday night scene in Times Square included young men standing around waiting for something interesting to happen.
Talbot, p. 47.

We were sitting in Ross Bar on Eighth Avenue when he proposed the idea; we'd spent an hour walking Times Square looking for Hunkey. Ross Bar is the hoodlum bar of Times Square; it changes names every year. You walk in there and you don't see a single girl, even in the booths, just a great mob of young men dressed in all varieties of hoodlum cloth—from red shirts to zoot suits: it is also the hustler's bar, the boys who make a living among the sad old homos of the Eighth Avenue night. Neal walked in there with his eyes slitted to see every single face. There were wild Negro queers, sullen guys with guns, shiv-packing seamen, thin non-committal junkies, and an occasional well-dressed middle-aged detective posing as a bookie and hanging around half for interest and half for duty. It was the typical place for Neal to put down his request. All kinds of evil plans are hatched in Ross Bar—you can sense it in the air—and all kinds of mad sexual routines are initiated to go with it. The safecracker not only proposes a certain loft on Fourteenth Street to the hoodlum but that they sleep together.
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 108.

Crime

Broadway: the clip street of the world, the slaughter house of Moronia.
Peretti, p. 9.

At no time in the history of the world have there been so many damned morons together in one place as here in New York right now. The town squirms with them.

The heartland of undesirable New York is the block of Forty-second Street between Seventh and Eighth avenues. Here is the national cesspool, so bad, New Yorkers can take perverse pride in it, overflowing with pimps, whores, transvestites, male prostitutes and the like. At night, roving bands of toughs appear. Saturdays, they take over the subway station at Eighth Avenue, the most dangerous place in the city.
Broadway supports more low forms of life today than a primordial swamp; it swarms with types beside which the old-school gold-brick peddler, the cutpurse, and the square-rigged streetwalker seem like dimpled cherubim. But the chiselers are not like any of these. They are artists, living by chiseling with no thought of profit, to hear them tell of it, and all the others are sordid mercenaries. While the others prey on small and helpless game, chiefly gullible peasants from Oneonta and Painted Post, the chiselers practice their skullduggery on fair-sized victims: the Telephone Company, subway interests, the Automats, big hotels, and the owners and backers of slot and vending machines. These corporations have spent and are still spending tens of thousands of dollars and no end of corporate wrath in futile attempts to eliminate them, but the chiselers carry on. Private detectives and new automatic safeguarding gadgets only quicken their ingenuity.

In Damon Runyon's stories, Broadway secedes from New York. Although Runyon's people are society's idle or criminal rejects, he punctiliously refers to them as citizens. Their citizenship is their presence on the street: joining its shiftless after-dark world, they have opted out of workaday New York.

Conrad, p. 283.

The beer and alky runner, the junk pusher, the cannon mob and the booster; the hoop dropper, the fire-proofer, the stock-steerer; also the tat-man and the hijacker plied their trades, all targeting the half-smart eggs who thinks he is three jumps ahead of Broadway himself.

Peretti, p. 9.

"morons" and "half-smart eggs"
Ibid., p. 9.

fuckin' nighttime in Times Square waiting for a friend who's scoring some heroin...
Wojnarowicz, p. 151.

Broadway has its moments of glamorous beauty when it shines forth, but for every one of these moments there are long dull hours of the day and night when it is as tawdry as Coney at its worst. At three in the morning the dreary street sprawls slant-wise across the town in all the ugly meanness of disuse.

"Someday," she says, "I'm going to take a pick-ax and rip up Broadway from end to end."
Berman, Town, p. 198.

This very Broadway, its astonished melon-mouth smeared with your explosive fists and your trendy patent leather shoes ... is the same Broadway stretching its chops with a huge wet tongue, to greedily lick up
all the blood of our cane.
Guillén, p. 466.

Phony acting academies that bilked investors in nonexistent theatrical shows.
Peretti, p. 9.

Detectives and tarts in collusion are framing victims in the upper Forties.

Last night Kenny and I went to Times Square to do Polaroid photographs after seeing Barbara Buckner's videotape—Pictures of the Lost— at the Donnell Library. We watched this incredible black woman in a fluorescent orange poncho playing an electric organ. She was the best working player I've heard in a long time. She would go through these incredible abstract chord changes. She was totally unaware of the preconceived structures of songs and the only way you could tell what she was playing was by listening to the words. She did the most far-out version of "Blue Suede Shoes" I ever heard. We were the only people watching except for two other men. [Sound] [Music]
Haring, p. 88.

Sex

If one visits a sex zone at the wrong time of day, it may be unrecognizable. This type of marketplace is usually tolerated only between the hours of sunset and dawn... This gives all other neighborhoods in the city double meaning, a hidden semiotic, since their relationship to the sex zone remains uncharted.
Califia, p. 218.

I can’t give it away on Seventh Avenue
Rolling Stones, “Shattered.”

Sex gave the Square its allure; sex was the primal force that leaped across all the color lines and all the national borders, and created the family of man.
Berman, Town, p. 18.

Whenever the fleet comes into town, every sailor who wants his d___ licked comes to the Times Square Building. It seems to be common knowledge among the sailors that the Times Square Building is the place to go if they want to meet any fairies.
Chauncey, p. 66.

—Who has the biggest prick on Broadway?
—Fanny Brice.
Charyn, p. 226.

Privacy in public: Times Square subway station washrooms were used so frequently for sexual encounters that they became widely known among gay men as the “Sunken Gardens” (possibly an allusion to the song by Beatrice Lille about the fairies at the bottom of her garden, a name subsequently sometimes applied to other underground washrooms).
Chauncey, p. 197.

In the Depression the Square swarmed with boys. Poverty put them there. Transient boys went to Times Square to play the queers, forcing the fairy prostitutes to move east of Sixth Avenue to Bryant Park.

Tennessee Williams cruising Times Square in the early 40s where he made “very abrupt and candid overtures to groups of sailors or GIs, phrased so bluntly that it’s a wonder they didn’t slaughter me on the spot... They would stare at me for a moment in astonishment, burst into laughter, huddle for a brief conference, and, as often as not, would accept the solicitation, going to my partner’s Village pad or to my room at the ‘Y’.”
“Corner of 42 Street and Broadway,” Charles Henri Ford wrote in his diary in 1948, “meatmarket in the rain: a seaman wearing tight light blue jeans and dark knitted cap. If I had gone up to him and said, ‘How much’ and he’d have said, ‘For what?’ and I’d have replied, ‘You know for what.’”

Reay, pp. 93-4.

At the corner of 42nd Street and Broadway in 1951 to 1952: Like everyone whose life is conditioned by luck they had some brilliant streaks of it and some were dismal. For instance, that first week they operated together in Manhattan. That was really a freak; you couldn’t expect a thing like that to happen twice in a lifetime. The trade was running as thick as spawning salmon up those narrow cataracts in the Rockies: head to tail, tail to head, crowding, swarming together, seemingly driven along by some immoderate instinct. It was not a question of catching: it was simply a question of deciding which ones to keep and which ones to throw back in the stream, all glittering, all swift, all flowing one way which was toward you!

Ibid., 93-4.

The world pours into Times Square like lost souls emerging from the purgatory of trains.

Rechy, p. 30.

Ashamed of being seen going into the dirty movie (what’s its name?) across the street from the New York Times.

Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 108.

Strange duos of girls coming out of dirty movies.

Ibid., p. 108.

The diamond-district shop windows on Forty-seventh Street, heaped with gold and precious stones, gave way rapidly to the skyscrapers of Rockefeller Center, followed by the theaters of Broadway. Ten squads of prostitutes, crummy movies houses with Xs on their signs, and cheap joint where, fliers promised, satisfaction was guaranteed for seven dollars. Past houses whose windows were boarded up with plywood, catching occasional glimpses of ruins that looked like bomb sites. The white faces vanished. And then a stunning white girl stands in the middle of the sidewalk, shirt unbuttoned, breast bared. She lifts her elegant skirt, and, squatting down, urinates. Two men bustle around her, one with a camera, the other with a reflector.

[Photography] [Body in the City]
Lobas, p. 44.

There is a broken heart for every light on Broadway. Miller, "Festive," N. pag.

Leaning against that cigar store with a lot of telephone booths on the corner of 42nd and Seventh where you make beautiful telephone calls looking out into the street and it gets real cozy in there when it’s raining outside and you like to prolong the conversation, who do you find?
Kerouac, Lonesome, p. 108.

Times Square is extinct during the day, and almost so at night.
Petronious, p. 19.

Eighth Avenue

Eighth Avenue is a sad, sick street whose neon lights dangle over the dandruff of bartenders.
Talese, p. 116.

Eighth Avenue begins at a defunct public bathroom off West Twelfth Street.
Ibid., p. 116.

Eighth Avenue is where hoodlums attacked a longshoreman named Clifford Jordan and knocked his glass eye into a sewer.
Ibid., p. 116.

All around Eighth Avenue are cut-rate drugstores, some of which have telephones that are so sticky you hate to press them to your ear.
Ibid., p. 118.

... and in 1925 huge holes were dug into Eighth Avenue.
Ibid., p. 125.

On a June day in 1927, workmen scooped up six coffins on Eighth Avenue about Forty-fourth Street—coffins with expensive wood and nails. But the workmen quickly cleared the area of coffins and installed chewing gum machines.
Ibid., p. 126.
Apollinaire imagined that the New York Public Library was made of white marble and owed its present soiled hue to being washed each day with brown soap.
Conrad, p. 145.

Gay Talese sees the whole city as engaged in this famished consumption and excretion, ridding itself daily of tons of trash, leaving unclaimed umbrellas in the lockers of the Port Authority bus station, and distributing dead animals through the streets.
Ibid., p. 311.

Skimming the fouled streets of Greenwich Village in blacknight the stench of uncollected garbage newly cut wood steamy stinking tar fills the air—New York—filled with influenza rot—expands with Europe desolately warruined.

Writing in 1961 about a novelty shop on the Lower East Side, Oldenburg equates it with the wealthy museums uptown. The store is a “place full of objects,” and thus a demotically livelier version of the art mausoleum. “A refuse lot in the city,” he argues, “is worth all the art stores in the world.” His dream is to inhabit the street as a studio and to define the pavement as a canvas.
Conrad, p. 314.

Oldenburg in 1966 marveled that “the chief production of New York is garbage.”
Ibid., p. 311.

Oldenberg: “Dirt has depth and beauty. I love soot and scorching.” He embraced “the city filth, the evils of advertising, the disease of success, popular culture.”

The essential thing, Oldenburg said, was to “look for beauty where it is not supposed to be found.”
Ibid., p. 391.

Oldenberg: “I am for an art that tells you the time of day, or where such and such a street is. I am for an art that helps old ladies across the street.”
Ibid., p. 320
The ashcan, which had been the emblematic trophy of the realists who scavenge among and rejoice in the city's refuse, undergoes conscription. The waste cans on Fifth Avenue are marked "It's against the law to throw litter into the streets—use this can." Imagine the Anarchist joy in plunging into the can and scattering the waste over the avenue!

Conrad, p. 95.

There is a low door at the back of the sanitation truck and a kind of conveyor belt that bangs away endlessly as it turns. The men hurl the contents of the ash barrels and garbage cans in the general direction of this maw, and a little of it is caught and conveyed into the truck. A wild dense cloud of ash floats out and settles on passers-by and drifts into open windows. Cinders rain down and, bottles smash, and broken glass tumbles crazily to rest under the tires of the parked automobiles. The smell of old, disturbed vegetables and ancient fruit hangs heavy between the buildings, and masses of old fruit and vegetables are ground into slippery paste by the heavy, hurrying boots of the sanitation men.

Atkinson, pp. 17-8.

ashcan rantings
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Ashcan school: a Hester street pushcart is a better subject than a Dutch windmill.
Reitano, p. 111

Realism enables him to tolerate, even to delight in, the physical soiling of New York.
Conrad, p. 92.

Sloan's subway etching sees paint as a sensual lubricant. But it's also dirt. The painter is a licensed mess-maker. Sloan can enjoy the soiled and stained reality of New York because his own profession contributes to that festal grime. When writing his diary, he takes pleasure in his new fountain pen "which is making these marks" and sullying the paper. With the same comically scatological thrill, he records having taken delivery of an expressed box of printing ink. Part of Robert Henri's teaching was a messy and incontinent liberation of pigment. His students were taught to be unashamed of the filth they dabbled in, just as they were unembarrassed by urban ugliness. At the New York School of Art on West 57th Street they flung the leftovers from their palettes at a wall, which soon became impasted with an iridescent murk. Sloan concedes the alliance between paint and dirt when, on a walk through the East Side slums in 1906, he comments that the "grimy and greasy door frames" of the tenements look "as though huge hogs covered with filth had worn the paint away and replaced it with matted dirt." Here paint and dirt compete, but they're allies all the same. Paint is the accretion of sentiment, the varnishing of age and affection; dirt too testifies to use, wear, long familiarity. Dirt, like the spot on Yeats's vest, vouches for the reality of things, as paint is trying to do. One of Sloan's pictures—his scrubwoman in the Astor Library in 1910—shows the city being scoured and cleaned. Yet the artist undoes the woman's labor by muddying the scene all over again in paint.

_Ibid._, p. 94.

Sloan's impish pleasure in the city's uninhibited disorder, which makes him dream of overturning those waste cans, will turn when the surrealists arrive into a calculated assault from beneath on the normality and reality which the official city purports to uphold.

_Ibid._, p. 95.

"Six O'clock, Winter" (1912) is somberly toned. An El train flares against a lurid sky, a compressed and perhaps oppressed mob surges beneath its tracks. On the day Sloan began the painting he had twice been involved in the panic of an agitating mass, first at Grand Central, where some socialists from the west had missed their train and blamed a capitalist plot, then at the Labor Temple.

_Ibid._, p. 94.

Convinced that city dwellers reveal themselves in what they discard, literally giving themselves away in their garbage, Capote in April 1979 tested his expertise at trash decipherment by accompanying his cleaning lady on her rounds. In the empty apartments she services, he guesses at the character of the occupants. Fatty snacks cram the freezers of the rich Jewish couples. An airline pilot has strewn through his apartment, a flotsam of miniature vodka bottles; between his seamy sheets is impasted a gooey collage of mayonnaise, chocolate, chewing gum, cigarette butts, and lipstick.

Once the rubble has been cleared up and the vile smells it gave off have drifted away, its version of the city is benign, for it arrives at ecological peace. Tinguely carried his machine’s members back to the dumps of Plainfield and Summit: earth to earth, garbage to garbage.

Ibid., p. 310.

W.B. Yeats, on the pier from which rubbish is shipped, watching the barges being loaded with the offal the city has evacuated.

Ibid., p. 92.

Vincent Scully on the new Penn Station: “One entered the city like a god... one scuttles in now like a rat.”

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 132.

Penn Station: the majestic station’s pink walls, once sparkling, are now covered with grime.

Trager, p. 628.

Six murals by Jules Guérin, huge topographical maps of Pennsy territory in sky blues, pale browns and yellow, high in the reaches of the massive walls, gradually disappeared under layers of the same soot. Generous deposits turned the exterior Massachusetts granite from warm pink to dingy gray. Now marble pomp has been reduced to rubble; stone to dust.

Huxtable, Goodbye, p. 49.

Grand Central Station is kept clean constantly by an army of excellent Negroes who are polite, attentive, and never obnoxiously grasping.

Corbusier, p. 78.

A hunk of fetid ham fat from 1984 that remains as disturbingly plump and supple as the day it was trimmed from somebody’s dinner; a July 10, 1982, front page from The Daily News announcing a jet crash and looking surprisingly crisp, even after seven years of foul entombment; and assorted shards and snippets of plastic and paper, innards and once-edibles, oddments long forgotten by the New Yorkers who bought them, consumed them, then unceremoniously discarded them.

Severo, N. pag.

If you do a core sample of Fresh Kills, which has been done and you pull up these early layers, you can still read the newspapers from that era. I’ve seen slide shows from archaeologists who've done this work and the hotdogs look like you could throw them on the grill. But they're from the 1953 layer of Fresh Kills.

Oatman, N. pag.

One of the peculiarities of a place like the city dump is that it makes you realize that New York throws away more in the course of a week probably more manufactured goods than were produced in 18th century France in the course of a year. The motto was replacement, not maintenance, disposability and not durability.

Hughes, "Culture," video.

The garbage thrown away in this city every day—every day—would feed the whole of Europe for a week.

Morris, Manhattan '45, p. 53.

An investigation conducted in July, 1932, showed that in 50,000,000 cubic feet of New York City air there was one pound of dirt.

n.cit.

Each square mile of Manhattan produces 375,000 pounds of garbage per day, 80% of which is paper.

Weberman, N. pag.

Two thousand people joined in a sweep-in, and one cross street in Manhattan was made to sparkle.

Years later Reverend Moon appropriated the tactic, sending out smiling moonies in spotless white coveralls to clean up New York. The sight of them coming down the street with their brooms was chilling.

Ibid., p. 98.

In Colonial days New York City got rid of its garbage by letting pigs roam freely about the streets to eat it. But even an army of starving pigs couldn't digest the six million tons of refuse the city now produces each year—enough to fill the 102-story Empire State Building, the world's tallest, 30 times. In a city where 30 tons of trash is carted out of the cavernous subway system alone each day, 14,000 sanitation workers battle the daily garbage problem.

Thomas, "Brave," N. pag.

Before New Yorkers burned or buried their waste, they pitched garbage out their windows onto city streets, where it was consumed by scavenging pigs and dogs.
Royte, N. pag.

Sometimes as many as twenty thousand, were the street cleaners. Charles Dickens did not like New York because of them.
Granick, p. 16.

Weegee’s photographs define the dead as the city’s rubbish. They litter and stain its pavements, or (in one of his crime shots taken in a restaurant) lie under tables on which the chairs have been stacked, waiting to be swept up by the janitor. [Photography]
Conrad, p. 277.

New York is great only while still growing. Of its unending self-revision, the symbol is litter.
Ibid., p. 300.

As the evicted litter blows or rambles down the streets, so people drift through New York, never to return. You daren’t pretend to belong there. Urban wisdom demands that you accept the randomness of your apparition in and disappearance from the city.
Ibid., p. 300.

The greasy doorframes of the Lower East Side.
n.cit.

Our thrown-away plastic bags are their suitcases, and the heat we expel from our buildings provides them with hearths: they curl up to sleep over warm outdoor gratings. They’re parsimonious feeders on the city’s second helpings.
Conrad, p. 311.

Plastic bags twisted around branches of trees become year-round foliage, transforming bare winter oaks into everblues and everreds, technicolor displays that make New England Octobers pale by comparison. Seasonal narratives take on a rouge character: older bags, their shape deformed by sunlight and rough weather, disintegrate into fluttering flaglike shreds before being blown off the trees by gales. Those same gales attach fresh bags to the trees, blossoming anew each day.
The illusion that there's an "away" to which we can throw things, then it's all sort of magic. It just goes "away."

Oatman. N. pag.

There was a gigantic dung heap somewhere in the '40s on the East River. It created a horrific stench for anybody down wind of it. The pile was illegal, but it had been there for years and years. They owner sold it as fertilizer.

Ibid.

Miss Foley, the Waldorf housekeeper, has over two thousand rooms in her household; with 30,000 face towels and 54,000 sheets in her linen cupboard, her laundry bill must surely be excessive. Each day over 60,000 pieces of linen are sent to the wash. In this vast, modern, efficient hotel, that employs "every possible comfort-bringing, labour-saving device," it would seem that even used razor-blades must find some utilitarian fate. What becomes of them once they are dropped into those accommodating slots in the bathrooms? Perhaps they reach the world again as part of the steel chassis of a motor-car or add just one more steel drop to the ocean that goes to make a girder, forcing the world higher still to the sky? But no, enquiry reveals that Miss Foley allows the blades to lie idle behind the slots, waiting for the day when the cavities have been filled up before finding a use for the discarded relics.

n.cit.

Most family apartments are old and awkward with floors that encourage polishing and windows that have been painted over so often that opening them becomes a mighty feat. Should they open, the dirt that files in is of a character associated with a nineteenth-century mill town. It is a six-hour job vaguely to clean such an apartment.

Blandford, p. 51.

Windows half open or unwashed.
Reisenberg, p. 67.

People who wash their shirts, paint their houses, clean the glass in their windows, have an ethic different from those who cultivate dust and filth.

Le Corbusier, p. 46.
Robert Ripley seemed to live in excrement. Anyone could smell the fact that he seldom bathed; his nails were black with dirt, his gobbled and sucked his huge meals; and he actually ruled a "harem" of girls of every nationality near his private zoo on a Citizen Kane-scale estate in Mamaroneck, New York.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 48.

New York is a dirty city of a dirty present and a dirtier future.
Fritscher, p. 42.

The city was at its ugliest then. The buildings were all covered in soot and in various states of disrepair. Access to the sky was severely restricted by the ludicrous height of these block-shaped edifices.
Hollander, p. 217.

As Manhattan's last elevated line began coming down in 1955, Third Avenue emerged from beneath its tracks and girders like a hungover drunk waking up in the sunlight: it was disheveled, grimy, unsure where it had been or where it was going. The el had been running overhead 24 hours a day since 1878, depressing real estate values but also offering cover to seedy bars and a vital if shady street life. When the rows of dingy brick tenements, their begrimed windows, and their aged storefronts emerged into the harsh Manhattan light, for a time they remained a mocking contrast to the new, clean, and spare International Style skyscrapers that were beginning to rise in midtown. [Subway]
Caldwell, pp. 300-1.

The area was encrusted with the dark and gritty sediment of endless seasons of concentrated use and abuse that no rain or garbage removal ever touches.

Film by Edwin S. Porter for Edison: Sorting Refuse at Incinerating Plant, New York City. (1903) [Cinema]
Sanders, Celluloid, p. 27.

Their only means of communication is the service shaft. The flats are united by the mute mediation of the dumbwaiter: doors open into this empty column from every apartment on each floor, so commingling is confined to the chute reserved for the delivery of groceries or the disposal of garbage.
Conrad, p. 185.
Streets littered with papers, bags of garbage, shooting out of windows, lines of pushcarts selling food, neckties, pictures, bric-a-brac.

I am thinking now about Eighth Street, in particular the stretch off Broadway that’s perpetually bathed in the warm greasy breeze of the Riviera Cafe’s exhaust fan, a cheeseburger sirocco. It’s a short, drab block with truck loading bays on its north side and, on the south, the blank rear wall of a large union building. A nothing street you hurried down on the way to the IRT. Empty, as far back as I can remember, except for the odd drunk, or a dozer in a box.

Then one day—and what would be the timetable on this? Two years ago? More?—the street was full of people unloading onto flattened cartons and unwound bedrolls what looked like their worldly possessions. “Jerks selling junk,” a friend called them, although by the time she made the remark the nature of what was offered for sale on Eighth Street had evolved in a quantum way.

Where at first the vendors hawked bric-a-brac and very used clothes, over time other merchandising veins were opened. Not that the stock of mateless plates, ceramic Bambis, and cheap suit jackets dried up. These things exist in inexhaustible supply. They were just joined by other bits of sham and gimcrack in amounts that doubled, quadrupled, multiplied until on a summer afternoon Eighth Street (and, for accuracy’s sake, I should mention that the phenomenon leaps Lafayette Street to a patch of parking lot sidewalk and then crosses Fourth to Cooper Union) is littered with profligate quantities of flea-bitten unassimilable junk, all of it for sale. And selling.

Usable objects not worth selling could be disposed of easily. You just put them out on the street and they would disappear, within minutes, as if they had been thrown into a river. Depending on the building, a similar result might be obtained by putting the stuff in the lobby or a stairwell. When I finally threw out my old green couch, though, nobody would touch it. I felt personally insulted. It was admittedly a little ragged, but its springs were all present and intact, and it was long enough to serve as a comfortable spare bed. The cushions, of course, were nabbed immediately, but the rest of it lingered on the sidewalk.
until someone stuffed it awkwardly through the back door of an abandoned car and set it on fire.

Everybody’s seen them, parked and plateless, belly up or sitting on their rims, hoods propped open, innards gutted. “People think nothing of abandoning a car at curbside, but what we’re talking about basically is 3000 pounds of litter in the street.” He refers to the picked-over automobiles as an “eyesore condition.” In some neighborhoods, car dumping is so popular it creates entire eyesore regions. Riverside Park is one. So is Marine Park near the Belt Parkway. Stretches of Third, Fifth, and Eighth avenues in Harlem. Eighth Street between B and C. The popular reeds and cattails of the Crossbay Boulevard shoulder. Bruckner Boulevard. The Newton Creek. The Gowanus Canal. Any part of the East River with an open pier.

Like most dead things in New York, abandoned cars have their own municipal Charons.

Ibid., p. 322.

In Manhattan, the wife of a movie magnate threw two Rolls-Royces and a Hispano-Suiza automobile into the WWII ammunition heap.

Diehl, p. 166.

Coins, paper clips, ballpoint pens, and little girls’ pocketbooks are found by workmen when they clean the sea lions’ pool at the Bronx Zoo.

Talese, p. 2.

In Rockefeller Center where, after all the wastepaper has been dumped in baskets, it is stored for forty-eight hours in warehouses. Even vacuum cleaners are held for twelve hours before being emptied, a practice that has paid off in the recovery of jeweler’s gold dust, diamond rings and many tiny gems.

Ibid., p. 35.

Women leave tissues behind in the subways and think nobody notices.

Talese, p. 102.

I burrow the trashcan in the Square pigeon alighting on my breadcrust.

Jones, Modernism, p. 227.
I began giving funny names to the garbage cans. I called them cylindrical restaurants, pot-luck dinners, municipal care packages.

Bins filled with every kind of garbage stand there, and from these the poverty-stricken pick out any not entirely nibbled bones and pieces. Stinking puddles from today’s and the day before yesterday’s rain lie there cooling. Litter and putrefaction lie about ankle-deep—not just figuratively ankle-deep, but literally and for real. And this is within a fifteen-minute stroll, or a five-minute ride of sparkling Fifth Avenue and Broadway.

Mayakovsky, America, p. 53.

The litter baskets—they look like volcanoes of trash that have just erupted—are overloaded from a Sunday’s use. Debris is strewn over the pavement and in the gutters. A wind stirs up scraps and creates a funnel of newspaper that swirls up in a mad ballet.

Philips, p. 23.

When trash containers were first put on street corners, they were stolen.

Atkinson, p. 16.

Barrels of ashes and garbage stand bulging along the sides of the buildings, spilling their contents. Passers-by unwittingly brush against them, and loose papers and rags float on the breeze. Bad little children amuse themselves by kicking the unsavory stuff. The automobiles that stand solidly head to tail at the curbs make find hide-outs for fruit peelings and old vegetable under their wheels.

Ibid., p. 17.

Business buildings clean only the first story of their premises.

Reisenberg, p. 28.

People who clean up, working largely for the love of it, are picking cigarette butts and removing chewing gum from under marquees, dark with turned-off lights.

Ibid., p. 142.

And under the chess tables, at the end of a long day, matches, papers, butts, broken bottles, Vietnam leaflets, junk galore, all to be swept up by little men in green uniforms at the dawn of a new day.
    Binzen, N.p.

Sanitation department truck, grey lumping insect vehicle squirting water and spinning a big brush along the gutter.
    Donleavy, N. pag.

Outside, in East Twenty-fifth Street, the wind blew, the cold wind from the dirty river. The wind blew dirty scraps of newspapers along the dirty street. [Air] [Media]

Here comes a chip, there goes a wisp of straw. A tomato box comes leisurely bobbing upon the surface of the stream.
    Dreiser, p. 10.

Strike

During the Great Garbage Strike, the residents on Tenth between University Place and Fifth Avenue, once their garbage cans were full, put the excess in strangely vulgar-looking see-through plastic bags. But whatever their appearance, they were effective, and the sidewalks remained clean.

Further east on Tenth Street the garbage just piled higher and higher in great smelly pyramids that soon threatened to engulf entire city blocks in as pungent and surrealistic a happening as this city ever held. One night, between Avenues B and C, someone started throwing his slop out of the window. This immediately developed into a block project. Two hours later that section of Tenth Street was ankle-high in wall-to-wall garbage. It proved to be a swift and altogether satisfying solution to the problem, though, for the city saw fit to remove the mess during the night, and the next morning that block was cleaner than it had ever been before.
    Binzen, Tenth Street, N. pag.

With many once-clean sections of New York looking like a vast slum as mounds of refuse grew higher and strong winds whirled the filth through the streets, Mayor Lindsay made a brief inspection tour and reported grimly that, "the situation is getting very serious."

"When City," N. pag.
A sanman's annual salary ran from $6,424 to $7,956. DeLury wanted a $600 hike. The city was offering $400. Ten thousand persons walked off their jobs. Rubbish fires flamed nightly. Storm sewers backed up. Hungry rats swarmed in by the battalion. The grim specter of deadly disease stalked the streets.

Said Health Commissioner Edward O'Rourke, "There's no need to wait until somebody dies, comes down with typhoid fever, breaks his neck falling over a pile of garbage, burns to death in a fire or comes down with dysentery or hepatitis."

Ibid.

A corner is piled with black-bagged garbage, rising in a mound between a lamppost and a mailbox. There are no people on the pavement. The city seems to belong to the trash. At the corner, angled toward the street, sits an abandoned armchair. Some bags of litter repose in it to watch the world go by. Refuse here provides an amenity for its own kind: a park bench for the city's rejects.

Conrad, p. 305.

The city grows its totems, as on this street corner. They accumulate, like garbage, by haphazard accretion.

Ibid., p. 305.

Well, last Sunday I walked after lunch from 36th Street along Sixth Avenue to 16th and I have never imagined that such filth could be found in a city street as there we had to walk on. The paper repositories in all the side streets were piled high with immondices of an intimate and unmentionable kind and these with every conceivable other disgusting object overflowed from the side-streets onto the Avenue itself. And the queer thing was that although I was hardly able to desist from retching and wished incontinently to take a taxi, my companion—of a normally more delicate nature—said, no, the exercise would do us good and accepted the garbage as being all in the day's journey.

Ford, America, pp. 79-80.

Debris was everywhere in the street and sidewalks. Third Avenue traffic had not yet started. The streets were deserted.

Hollander, p. 79.

Dark, dirty streets littered with trash and garbage, but trash from what usage? And garbage from what foods and what containers? The smell of death and rot is here, from decay of unfamiliar offal.
Burroughs, p. 1745.

At the end of the 1975 garbage strike: "Today the city had enough garbage to construct two piles the height and width of both towers of the 110-story World Trade Center."
Mauhl, p. 2.

Water, River, Beach

The dredging and washing out of the polluted silted rivers. The bottom blanket of rare old vintage germs, if spread by machinery, would fertilize a Desert of Sahara.
Reisenberg, p. 71.

And some day gigantic liners—floating cities—will no longer empty their sanitary waste into our beautiful harbor.
_Ibid._, p. 71.

If Charles Dickens had been looking for an illustration for an American edition of _Hard Times_, he could have stopped looking when he got to that riverfront. The stretch between Ninety-second and 125th streets was a catalogue of the unlovely by-products of industrialism; scented with raw filth pouring from open sewers into the river below was a long row of small, grimy factories, used-car lots, auto-repair shops, junkyards, coal pockets and oil-storage depots. Hogarth could have found a whole gallery of models I the occupants of the bars, whorehouses and tenements that mingled with them.
Caro, p. 393.

The joke on Hylan Boulevard last week went that if you held a syringe to your ear, you could hear the ocean. Beginning with a high tide over the previous weekend, medical waste had been washing up on Staten Island’s shore almost daily. Each new cycle brought fresh harvests of pill bottles, blood vials, and needles. As if that weren’t enough, a city sewage treatment plant overflowed on Thursday and added 20 million gallons of bilge to the nightmare soup. [Drugs]
Trebay, p. 332.

During the 1900s, the city was losing its sense of the rivers, despite the extension of Riverside Park. Sewage pollution had driven the North River shad away and made all other kinds of fish that might be caught noxious; so that the old gaffers with their set-lines and bells had disappeared from the Hudson, along with the groups of happy naked swimmers, and another link with nature was broken, even as later, because of pollution from the oil-burning steamers, the waters of the Lower Bay lost the bluefish and weakfish that had once been so plentiful there. [Nature] [Food] Mumford, Empire, pp. 32-3.

A breeze was blowing up from the water, carrying with it the partially purified atmosphere of a city at work. It was cool and refreshing, but there was still something unclean about it. The river was gray in color, not the rich blue it should have been, and the foam that followed the wake of the ships passing by was too thick. Almost like blood. In close to shore it changed to a dirty brown trying to wash the filth up on the banks. It was pretty if you only stopped to look at it, but when you looked too close and thought enough it made you sick.
Spillane, p. 252

"No way am I going in the ocean and catch AIDS."
Trebay, p. 333.

77 hypodermics plucked from the sand since Saturday afternoon, a number that topped 200 by the end of the week. Ibid., p. 332.

An unreported truth is that few people swim at Staten Island beaches, they've become so foul: New York harbor meets the Atlantic above the south shore, and the water there is a scientifically diverse and constant scum. Ibid., pp. 332-3.

Tide-composed still lifes of tampon applicators, fireworks, glass shards, and chicken bones. Ibid., p. 333.

The hypodermics were easiest to spot. Plungers jutted up from tangles of seaweed... The syringes were pencil-thin, sand-caked, and of a type used to administer insulin or skin-pop illegal drugs. Ibid., p. 333.

Needles on the beach are part of the ecology of New York, as much as crack vials are part of the ecology of
The surf between the shore and the end of a jetty was glazed with a 40-yard coating of oily filth. Cork, straws, and cigarette butts swirled in meteor shower patterns. Spent condoms waved in the wash.

Here at the waterfronts, barges heaped with the city's garbage swayed in the greasy, dark water, great mounds of a city's refuse suspiring in the sun like a glutton lolling after an orgy. One felt that, had one listened sharply enough, one would have caught its thick, throaty breathing; the mounds seemed to move, rising slowly, falling slowly, a great stomach on a couch.

An enormous pancake of dirt spread beside the Manhattan Bridge, mostly surrounded by river.

The river was dirty and coming towards me in the wind, a smooth chest trembling with sweat.

The Gowanus used to freeze at times in winter and tugs had to break the channel clear. Now, its antagonists suspect, the chemicals in it act as their own antifreeze.

It's said that you can't judge an ocean by what washes ashore. Or perhaps the proper verb is shouldn't. If the composition of the Atlantic was to be inferred from the myriad pink tampon applicators that adorn Jones Beach, would anyone ever go in? I would not like to venture an opinion. So it is with the tidemark of detritus on Eighth Street. You pick your way along and avoid any sweeping conclusions about the culture.

New Yorkers would never drink Hudson water, even if it were made twice as pure as Catskill water (as it could be). The stuff is "psychologically unpalatable."

The water used in New York is soft water.
Do not imagine that I scampered around those velvet sewers completely unscathed.
Wornov, p. 169.

Broad St., near Wall St. began as a brook. The Dutch, homesick for Holland, widened it into a canal with a roadway and it became the City's first "common seuer."
Granick, p. 40.

Mid-twentieth century New York still uses some brick sewers put down in the early nineteenth century. They're mostly below Canal Street. Parts of the Canal Street sewer carry their twentieth century load after 145 years.
Berger, New York, p. 21.

As late as 1900 there were still thousands of toilets which lead to cesspools.
Granick, p. 40.

In 1902, Mayor Seth Low embarked on what may have been the world's first instance of driving a car through a sewer, causing the New York Times to proclaim that "automobiling through sewers is the very latest thing." Two cars were lowered into a 15-foot-wide conduit beneath 64th Street in Bay Ridge, which had been atmospherically lit with candles. The mayor and his entourage climbed down a ladder at Fourth Avenue and drove through the finish stretch of a pipe that, at a length of 300 miles, was intended to be the largest sewer in the world. [Surrealism]
Solis, p. 45.

Open sewers ran alongside Canal St. as late as 1918.
Granick, p. 40.

In 1938, Department of Public Works took over responsibility for sewage treatment in time to service the 1939 World's Fair.
Ibid., p. 42.

First sewer gutter drains made of wood, then of stone, later of brick.
Ibid., p. 40.

The sewage from buildings leaves through six-inch pipes that connect with the street sewer. The street sewer is twelve-inches in diameter, laid eight to twelve feet below street level. Its sewage flows into a collecting sewer that is usually five feet or more in diameter.

Nobody knows how many toilets there are on Manhattan Island. Since it takes five gallons of water to flush a toilet, there's another ocean used up every day.
  Atkinson, p. 226.

All the solids in sewage amount to no more than a spoonful in a big barrel of water. NYC's sewage is about a billion gallons a day, containing one thousand tons of solids.
  Granick, p. 43.

Five Boroughs, 17 drainage areas, each sloping toward a waterway. Sewers follow the banks of the city. All sewers are built at downgrades.

Sewage plant at the extreme western end of Canal St. are completely underground and below water level; remaining sewage flows into the Hudson. Coney Island into the ocean.

Large quantities of digested sludge are used as fertilizer in City parks. Sludge dumped ten miles out in the ocean.

The city's first sewage treatment plant is constructed on Coney Island. New York has been pouring nearly 1.5 million gallons of raw sewage into the harbor each day.
  Trager, p. 506.

Huge naked breast of water
Saturated lead by sewers–
  Galwey, p. 421.

Garbology

One day in September, 1970, Ann Duncan and I were on our way to the Cafe Gaslight on MacDougal Street and we happened to pass Bob Dylan's townhouse. For four long years I had been studying Dylan's poetry, trying to crack the code of his symbolism. As I eyed the home of the reclusive poet I wondered what went down behind the door that Dylan had slammed in my face when I had tried to discuss my work with him. Just then I noticed Dylan's shiny new steel garbage can. My mind flashed back to a Lord Buckley riff from Johanna and Whale: "I ain't outside anymore, I'm inside now." and said to myself, "Now, there's something that was inside and it's outside now." I lifted the lid, I opened Pandora's can, I reached in and the first thing, THE FIRST THING, that I pulled out of Dylan's garbage was a half-finished letter written by Bob Dylan to Johnny Cash. "Holy Moley," I said, "Ann, this is no ordinary garbage-can, this is a gold mine!"

Weberman, N. pag.

After my initial discovery in Dylan's garbage I realized that this method of research had great potential as a clandestine method. The lives of the rich, famous and powerful could be penetrated, great secrets revealed, plain truths brought to light from beneath the glittery facade. Garbology was a new weapon in the war against lies, injustice and faceless bureaucracy. The study and analysis of garbage could possibly alter the course of history! I resolved at once that aided by this valuable science I would leave no stone unturned, no garbage can lid unturned, in my quest for truth.

Ibid.

One night I went over D[ylan]'s garbage just for old time's sake and in an envelope separate from the rest of the trash there were five toothbrushes of various sizes and an unused tube of toothpaste wrapped in a plastic bag. "Tooth" means "electric guitar" in D's symbology...

Eisen, p. 179.

My fantasy was that I would find first drafts of Dylan's poetry (Dylan eventually published some stained fast drafts in his book Poetry & Drawings, published by Knopf) or a Rosetta stone that would unlock the secrets of his symbolism. But the reality, as I began sorting through the bags, was a harsh one, especially when I hit a layer of disposable diapers. It reminded me that Dylan and his wife Sara had just recently had their fourth child. I made my way down through a layer of kitchen refuse vegetable cans, Blimpie wrappers, coffee grounds. His eating habits seemed normal enough. No evidence of "brown rice, seaweed or a dirty hot-dog." Underneath the kitchen stuff a new layer came to light composed of rock-and-roll magazines. There was Rock, Rolling Stone and even an issue of Crawdaddy which contained an article that I had recently written. I was deeply hurt by this. Why had Dylan insulted me by throwing it away rather than filing it in his “Weberman” file?

Weberman, N. pag.

After about ten excursions through Dylan’s garbage can over a two-week period in September 1970, I began to piece together a very clear picture of the person he really is and the life he was living at that time. Essentially, the mythic Bob Dylan romantic, revolutionary, visionary was dispelled forever by thorough garbanalysis. Instead, he was revealed to be a typically upper middle-class family man with very ordinary day-to-day household concerns. From his pail I gathered bills from the vet concerning treatment of Sasha’s upset stomach; invitations to Sara to attend private sales at exclusive department stores; dozens of mail-order cosmetic offers; all the high fashion magazines, addressed to Sara; a package from Bloomingdale’s addressed to one of Dylan’s many pseudonyms, and charged to Sara Dylan’s account. I also found a bill from the Book-of-the-Month Club, and a memo to Bob Dylan regarding the upcoming monthly meeting of the MacDougal Street Garden Association.

The only remotely political piece of trash I was able to find in his garbage was a poster from upstate New York with a personal note on it from a local folksinger in Woodstock, asking Dylan to please vote in the upcoming election for this particular Democratic county committeeman. It was true, though, that despite the fact that he was a millionaire, Dylan’s garbage was not extravagant. There were no empty caviar tins, no drained bottles of rare wines. The typical shopping list for the Dylan household included items such as cookie mix, liverwurst and granola.

Ibid.

Jackie Onasis’s trash: There were two Brut Champagne bottles (Vintage 1966) and one Cole De Beaune Villages bottle (Vintage 1969). Typically, there were empty perfume bottles Estee Lauder Sport Fragrance Spray, perfumed lavender bath scent, a refillable spray container of Chanel No. 5 and an Avon Fashion Figurine that once held Field Flowers Cologne. There was dental floss, toothpaste and five empty packs of Ambassador cigarettes; Wella Care herbal shampoo, Instant Quaker cereal, Melba toast, etc., etc. I also found one of her famous leather gloves, plastic wrappers from pantyhose, a perfectly good scarf and two pairs of Jackie’s pantyhose, one of which I am wearing proudly at this very moment as I type this chapter. I also found some ribbons with “Happy 13th, John” and “Sweet Sixteen, Caroline” written on them in glitter along with a piece of stationery with John Kennedy, Jr. printed on the bottom of it. There was a wrapper from a famous European jeweler, marked “To Mr. Onassis” and another marked “To John.”

_Ibid._

Super-picker Robert Loughin once found a Salvador Dalí portrait at the Salvation Army on Spring Street in 1994. He bought the painting for $40, and later sold it at a Sotheby’s auction for $78,000.

_Walrod, p. 51._

Purity, Whiteness, Cleanliness

To purify New York, one must blanch it.
_Conrad, p. 137._

Contrasting the crystalline White World of the ideal, therapeutic New York with the befouled Brown World of the past. (c.f. Mumford’s _Brown Decades_.)

_Ibid._, p. 137.

The whiteness of New York’s mercantile cathedrals signifies their clinical disinfection, free from the soiling patina of age. Glass, with which New York walled its buildings, is a medium of moral superiority, hiding nothing, not straggling back into mud and murk like brick and stone.

_Ibid._, p. 137.

 Appropriately, Le Corbusier’s first view of New York was from his liner while it was anchored in quarantine. He sees it from within a sanitary cordon and admires its gelid beauty. Disembarking, he finds it to be carnally real and repellent. Before he can approve of it, it must be pristinely repackaged, insulated from the bacterial atmosphere. He commends the cellophane casing of sandwiches, the polished bar tops, and the trains in Grand Central, which are kept spick and span by legions of black janitors. But the apogee of his cleansed and hermetically sealed New York is Radio City, where he goes with Léger to make a broadcast. As its name proclaims, it’s a city within—and immunized against—the city. It’s installed “in one of the skyscrapers of Rockefeller Center,” safe from the savage, infested outdoors. He likes the claustral hush of its elevators and corridors and gratefully breathes its filtered and tempered air. Radio City is one of his bloodless cathedrals. Inside the studio he sees another room made by muting and insulation: a glass aquarium for spectators, who can chatter at will without being heard because their booth is soundproofed. [City Under One Roof] [Cosmic] [Silence] [Speech]

New York’s remade whiteness is fantasticated by Léger, who reports that scientists have found a way of making glass from curdled milk and imagines the cows of America laboring for the reification of the city and its conversion to transparency.

_Ibid._, p. 139.

Cleanliness is a national virtue in America. No filth, no dust.
_Corbusier_, p. 46.

There is a style, a true style, in American cleanliness.

_Ibid._, p. 46.

The offices are clean; the bath tubs, the shops, the glistening hotels; the dazzling restaurants and bars. The immaculate personnel, in shirt sleeves, is shining white. Food is wrapped up in bright cellophane. There is no more real dust than there is symbolic dust, everything is new and spotless.

_Ibid._, p. 46.

In New York you have to clean so much, and when you’re finished, it’s not-dirty. In Europe people clean so much, and when they’re finished, it not just not-dirty, it’s clean.

_Warhol, Philosophy_, p. 159.

Tehran, in Iran, is cleaner than New York.
_Atkinson_, p. 15.

New York is too big to be kept clean.

_Ibid._, p. 18.
If the precious ground of Central Park is valued at from two thousand to four thousand dollars per square yard, the commercial value of these granite rocks amounts to anywhere from ten billion to eighteen billion dollars.

Corbusier, p. 72.

If the various persons who have sought to invade Central Park in the last sixty years, for projects in themselves often worthy, oftener grotesque, and frequently purely commercial, had had their way, there would now be nothing left of the park except a few walks and drives, and a lake upon which steamboats and full-rigged ships would be plying.

The Park was a new institution in 1860, but already it had become apparent that there were plenty of people in New York who saw in this large expanse of ground only room for profitable private enterprise. The Board of Commissioners for Central Park reported in that year that “the demands of people who wish to advance their business interest by means of the park are most astounding.”

Following are some of the more audacious projects:

— An outdoor theater, proposed in 1911, which would have seated anywhere from 25,000 to 100,000 persons.
— A street railway
— The use of the lake for the voyagings of a full-rigged ship or steamboat.
— It was suggested that the park should be used as a burial ground for the city’s distinguished dead — In 1904, Robert B. Roosevelt wanted to cut the whole park into building lots.

“If Improvement...” N. pag.

Were apartment houses built as thickly and as tall in Central Park as elsewhere on Manhattan Island, the Park could handily domicile the populations of Austin, Texas, or Springfield, Illinois, or all the citizens of the State of Nevada.

Perry, p. 70.

Imagine there’s no Central Park.
Buford, p. 215.

This park itself is something of a miracle of survival, too. Right here in the heart of what must be the world’s most changeable city are, not just acres, but several square miles that have been preserved practically unchanged for decades.

Finney, p. 76.

A reminder of what the earth is really like before it is paved, pressed into brick or smelted into metal. [Ancient] [Primitive] [Nature]

Perry, p. 70.

Sous les pavés, la plage!

Tonkiss, p. 131.

A synthetic Arcadian Carpet.

Koolhaas, p. 23.

It was conceived with a very specific function, but it has not been static. It is a historical place, but it is also a place with a history, a changing history. It took a long time before the park was open at night, for example. A hundred years ago letting automobiles use the carriage drives must have seemed like a good idea; today it feels, and sounds, like an imposition.

Rybczynski, p. 53.

Every tree, every rise, every dip, every vista as carefully conceived as a museum show, yet all somehow maintaining the illusion of spontaneity.

By 1932, the paths, walks and roadways in New York's parks were miles of broken pavement. The lawns, seldom mowed, sometimes looked more like meadows. So many trees were dying that some of the loveliest tree-bordered walks were bordered mostly by stumps—the result of allowing unskilled and unsupervised workers to prune trees by simply climbing up to the top of their ladders and sawing trees off at that height, since they were reluctant to risk their own limbs by climbing out on trees. According to a Park Avenue Association survey, there was not a single structure in any park in the city that was not in need of immediate repair.

Caro, p. 332.

The faces of statues were masses of bird droppings. Obscenities had been written on—and never erased from—their chests. Their identifying plaques had been torn off. Swords were missing from sheaths, laurel wreaths from brows. Poets plucked at broken harps, saints stood on cracked pedestals.
An Indian hunter had lost his bow. The tiger in Central Park was slipping off his rock. The bayonets had been stolen off the rifles of the soldiers in the Seventh Regiment Memorial on Fifth Avenue.

Central Park was not then the barren waste it became in the nineteen-twenties.

Mumford, Sidewalk, p. 37.

The park’s lawns, unseeded, were expanses of bare earth, decorated with scraggly patches of grass and weeds, that became dust holes in dry weather and mud holes in wet. Its walks were broken and potholed. Its bridle paths were covered with dung. The once beautiful Mall looked like the scene of a wild party the morning after. Benches lay on their backs, their legs jabbing at the sky. Trash baskets had been overturned and never righted; their contents lay where they had spilled out. The concrete had been stripped off drinking fountains so completely that only their rusting iron pipes remained. And nine out of every ten trees on the Mall were dead or dying.

Caro, p. 334.

In the zoo, the lion’s cages were so flimsy that animal keepers carried shotguns to protect children if the beasts escaped.

Ellis, p. 551.

Around the Arsenal squatted the twenty-two ancient wooden animal houses of the Central Park Menagerie, crumbling away beneath their yellow paint. So rotted were their walls that park department officials feared that a single charge from a large animal, perhaps maddened by fire, might tear the cage bars right out of them. Instead of rebuilding the animal houses, the department had stationed keepers in front of the lion and tiger cages with rifles and had instructed them to shoot the big carnivores if fire broke out.

The Menagerie was filled with surprises. Because it gratefully accepted any gift that would fill a cage, and people therefore donated their unwanted family pets, it was housing in 1932, alongside the hyacinth cockatoos and the vulturine guinea fowl, several dozen canaries, and, in a large cage between the mountain lions and the leopards, an Airedale. Because the Menagerie did not adequately care for its animals or dispose of them when they grew old, its exhibits included such old pensioners as a senile tiger, a puma with rickets and a semi-paralyzed baboon. Its most fearsome exhibits were rats, which roamed it in herds and had become so bold that they were stealing food from the lions’ feeding pans. The most vivid memory carried away by many visitors was of the sickening stench that rose from the dung-heaped Barbary-pen. [Nature]
Caro, p. 335.

Almost directly across the Park, off Central Park West, was Jacob Wrey Mould’s sheepfold, considered by some critics the finest existing example of the full-blown architecture of the mid-nineteenth century, and from a distance the sheep who grazed opposite on the Green or Sheep meadow, under the care of a resident shepherd who twice a day held up traffic on the park’s West Drive to herd his flock across, made a picture as pretty as Olmsted had envisioned. But a closer look disclosed that, because for generations the sheep had been allowed to inbreed, every one of them was malformed. (cf. Conrad: “In this delicious sweltering fatigue, New York seems almost pastoral. He expects a flock of sheep to turn the corner.” [Nature]) [Simulacrum]
Ibid., p. 335.

Moses was getting tired of waiting for the sheep to cross the streets on his drives through Central Park.
Wynn, p. 165.

The aged biddies in charge of park comfort stations were widows of Tammany ward heelers and they understood that no work was required of them. According to one reporter: “Some had curtained off all but, say, two of the eight toilet compartments, had imported chairs, tables and hangings into the cozy space, and frequently had in their friends to afternoon tea.” The lady in charge of the comfort station perched on a rocky bluff overlooking the Metropolitan Museum of Art spent her time there removing much of the plumbing and then building herself a cozy little sitting room, in which she had installed a grand piano. The chords of a Chopin nocturne startled more than one woman who entered the comfort station in good faith. [Sound]
Caro, p. 335.

The Depression added its won touches to the parks: the shack towns named, bitterly, “Hoovervilles,” in which homeless men sought refuge. One of the largest was a collection of more than two hundred hovels of old boards, flattened gasoline tins and pieces of sheet iron and cardboard in the dried-out bed of the abandoned Central Park Receiving Reservoir behind the Metropolitan Museum of Art; at night its inhabitants ate birds they caught in the park's bird sanctuary.

The park is developed by the homeless in the Depression. A twenty-foot-tall building is erected with an inlaid tile roof; it was in front of a boulder, so they called it the Rockside Inn.

Caldwell, p. 253.

22 men are arrested for vagrancy in July, 1930 following complaints by Fifth Avenue residents that 'hobos' are sleeping in Central Park, but a sympathetic judge suspends their sentences, gives each one $2, and sends them all back to the park, which by autumn has 17 chimneyed shacks, all furnished with chairs and beds.

Trager, p. 457.

Dogs wandered into the playgrounds and urinated and defecated in the sandboxes and the sandboxes had to be removed. Drunks crept into the tunnel segments at night and fell asleep, to be discovered by children the next morning sleeping in their own vomit. The tunnel segments had to be removed. Drunks wandered into the striped guardhouse "play booths" during the day and urinated in them. Perverts used them as hiding places from which they could watch the playing little girls and boys at close range and masturbate. Vandals pried loose the light lumber out of which the play booths were constructed. The play booths had to be removed. Then the drunks slept and the perverts hid in the trees and shrubbery behind the benches, so this landscaping had to be removed. Still drunks kept wandering into the playgrounds at night.

Caro, p. 488.

Park concessions sold substandard food; there were recurring reports of sickness among children who ate the hot dogs they sold.

Municipal parks have degenerated into weed-filled dumps, some of the occupied by squatters. What will be Central Park's Great Lawn is rid of 200,000 rats in one week.

Trager, p. 486.

Bryant Park too: "Six priceless acres of green amid the concrete masses of midtown, had been allowed to become a haven for drunks and idlers.”
Caro, p. 332.

By 1934, under Moses, every structure in every park had been repainted. Every tennis court had been resurfaced. Every lawn had been reseeded. Eight antiqued golf courses had been reshaped, eleven miles of bridle paths rebuilt, thirty-eight miles of walks repaved, 145 comfort stations renovated, 284 statues refurbished, 678 drinking fountains repaired, 7,000 wastepaper baskets replaced, 22,500 benches reslatted, 7,000 dead trees removed, 11,000 new ones planted in their place and 62,000 others pruned… Generations of New Yorkers had believed that the six miles of granite walls around Central Park were a grimy blackish color. Now they saw that sand blasting had restored them to their original color, a handsome dark cream. And a thousand plots in the parks, plots which as long as New Yorkers could remember had contained nothing but dirt and weeds, were gay with spring-blooming flowers.
Ibid., pp. 273-3.

While seven hundred men were working day and night to build the Bronx Zoo, another thousand were transforming the dried-up reservoir bed that had been called “Hoover Valley”—Moses had torn down the shanty town there—into a verdant, thirty-acre “Great Lawn,” laying flagstone walks around it and planning along them hundreds of Japanese cherry trees.
Ibid., p. 274.

Henry James: “The Park was too narrow, and too short, and was overwhelmed by an obligation to ‘do.”
Buford, p. 181.

On Central Park: “New York itself must have been built to afford some kind of relief from it.”
Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 217.

Without the intervening park, the Upper East Side would blend into the Upper West Side—unthinkable. Without its enchanted setting, Tavern on the Green would be just another tourist eatery, and the site of the Bethesda Fountain would be simply an ordinary street corner. New York City without Central Park would be like Chicago without the lake, San Francisco without hills or Los Angeles without sunshine.
Rybczynski, p. 49.
Inside Central Park the film’s hippies and war resisters could exist in a world of their own, a place wrenched out of time. The park we see in Hair is an urban arcadia, an artfully improved nature, dedicated to the renewal of the human spirit. The film’s characters celebrate the ‘Age of Aquarius’ in a grassy meadow where police horses mirror their dance steps; they ride along the park’s bridle paths and take a midnight swim in its pond; they move to choreography on the stage-like steps of Bethesda Fountain and eventually gather at the Sheep Meadow for a peace festival.

Sanders, p. 356.

The Easter Sunday Be-In in Central Park was incredible; thousands of kids handing you flowers, burning incense, smoking grass, taking acid, passing drugs around right out in the open, taking their clothes off and rolling around on the ground, painting their bodies and faces with Day-Glo, doing Far East-type chants, playing with their toys—balloons and pinwheels and sheriff’s badges and Frisbees. They could stand there staring at each other for hours without moving. As I said before, that had always fascinated me, the way people could sit by a window or on a porch all day and look out and never be bored, but then if they went to a movie or a play, they suddenly objected to being bored. I always felt that a very slow film could be just as interesting as a porch-sit if you thought about it the same way. And now all these kids on acid were demonstrating the exact same thing.

Warhol, POPism, p. 207.

We giggled, ran, sang along the paths toward the old wooden boathouse, now gone. Leaves floated on the lake; on the shore, a park-man was fanning a bonfire of them, and the smoke, rising like Indian signals, was the only smudge on the quivering air. Aprils have never meant much to me, autumns seem that season of beginning, spring; which is how I felt sitting with Holly on the railings of the boathouse porch.

Capote, p. 43.

No one is buried there.

N. cit.

I slept in the park every night after that. It became a sanctuary for me, a refuge of inwardness against the grinding demands of the streets. There were eight hundred and forty acres to roam in, and unlike the massive gridwork of buildings and towers that loomed outside the perimeter, the park offered me the possibility of solitude, of separating myself from the rest of the world. By contrast, life in Central Park allowed for a much broader range of variables. No one thought twice if you stretched out on the grass and went to sleep in the middle of the day. No one blinked if you sat under a tree and did nothing, if you played your clarinet, if you howled at the top of your lungs. Except for the office workers who lurked around the fringes of the park at lunch hour, the majority of people who came in there acted as if they were on holiday. The same things that would have alarmed them in the streets were dismissed as casual amusements.

There is no question that the park did me a world of good. It gave me privacy, but more than that, it allowed me to pretend that I was not as bad off as I really was. The grass and the trees were democratic, and as I loafed in the sunshine of a late afternoon, or climbed among the rocks in the early evening to look for a place to sleep, I felt that I was blending into the environment, that even to a practiced eye I could have passed for one of the picnickers or strollers around me. The streets did not allow for such delusions. Whenever I walked out among crowds, I was quickly shamed into an awareness of myself. I felt like a speck, a vagabond, a pox of failure on the skin of mankind. Each day, I became a little dirtier than I had been the day before, a little more ragged and confused, a little more different from everyone else. In the park, I did not have to carry around this burden of self-consciousness. It gave me a threshold, a boundary, a way to distinguish between the inside and the outside. If the streets forced me to see myself as others saw me, the park gave me a chance to return to my inner life, to hold on to myself purely in terms of what was happening inside me. It is possible to survive without a roof over your head, I discovered, but you cannot live without establishing an equilibrium between the inner and outer. The park did that for me. It was not quite a home, perhaps, but for want of any other shelter, it came close. [Flâneur]

Auster, pp. 101-2.

I usually spent some time ambling through the park, exploring areas I had not visited before. I enjoyed the paradox of living in a manmade natural world. This was nature enhanced, so to speak, and it offered a variety of sites and terrains that nature seldom gives in such a condensed area. There were hillocks and fields, stony outcrops and jungles of foliage, smooth pastures and crowded networks of caves. I liked wandering back and forth among these different sectors, for it allowed me to imagine that I was raveling over great distances, even as I remained within the boundaries of my miniature world.

Ibid., p. 108.

Because night loiterers are excluded from Central Park, I supposed that all its awakening loveliness must go for naught. But if the first impingement of the sun on the massed verdure of the Park, on its lakes, its alpine views, its waterfall, and the fresh, sweet meadows, does find a rare spectator, it must again be one of the homeless who has eluded police regulations to find a night’s rest in the great green inclosure. Possibly there may be a poet or two wandering about in Central Park at dawn, but the poets are early risers only in the country. To them the city is only the monstrous, noisy machine of the full day.

Strunsky, p. 705.

I then set off into the park. It is a thick and hilly wood, a forest of century-old trees, an intricate network of roads and trails, rising and falling then meeting before departing again, squirrels poking about the bushes and scattering up the trees. Yet it is in a sorrowful mess: the brush is littered with wizened and branches, leaves, and fallen trees, bottles and wastepaper are scattered here and there, and not one of the streetlamps has been left intact—some of them have even been torn out of the ground, and now lie there like cast-iron trunks uprooted during a storm. There are no signs to tell you where you are, and it’s easy to get lost and you just have to trust your luck in finding the odd passerby who can you who can put you back on the right track.

Maffi, pp. 10-11.

Whole sections of the city had grown rather poisonous, but invariably I found a moment of utter peace in riding south through Central Park at dark toward where the façade of 59th Street thrusts its lights through the trees. There again was my lost city, wrapped cool in its mystery and promise.

I’ve been walking Central Park
Singing after dark
People think I’m crazy
Rolling Stones, “Miss You.”
The warning, 'Don’t go into the Park after dark,' is more than just a simple notice of potential physical danger. It is also an acknowledgment of the shift in the park’s function—which takes place when the sun goes down—from a place where nature lovers eat lunch and children feed squirrels, to a place where one can buy drugs or get one’s cock sucked.

Califia, p. 216.

For light relief I went up to street level to take a walk in the park. On top of a boulder in the sunshine, eight guys wearing lipstick sitting in a circle jerking off. Waved and invited me to join. As one marked time with a tambourine. And coming along the path in nice linen suit and white spats, an elderly man passing me said welcome to the asylum.

Donleavy, n,pag.

Certainly, homosexuals cruising Central Park for partners must accept the possibility of ending up dismembered in the bushes.

Blandford, p. 156.

One of the most frightening things in the Park at night was a man on his own.

For all at once, like savage members of a jungle ambush, a band of Negro boys leapt out of the shrubbery along the path. Hooting, cursing, they launched rocks and thrashed at the horse’s rumps with switches.

Capote, p. 69.

Two days ago, I was riding through Central Park at ten at night, when I was surrounded by a “wilding” gang on rollerblades. They were almost children. They tried to capture me in a flank maneuver, but I was able to bicycle away even faster.

Bushnell, N. pag.

1,477 Big New Lights for Central Park: Lovers’ Lanes Will Be Illuminated and Also the Danger Spots.

Sharpe, p. 170.

It’s possible Chambers took Levin to the park because he thought it would be romantic…

Stone, N. pag.
Chambers and Levin entered at 86th Street at around 4:50 A.M. and walked to a grassy area across the park drive from the Metropolitan Museum... She flew into a rage, he said, yelling at him and hitting him and scratching his face. He retreated and sat down in the grass a short distance away. She then went over to a nearby tree to urinate. When she came back, Chambers continued on the tape, she started being nice to him. He was sitting with his hands behind his back, and she playfully tied her panties loosely around his wrists and pushed him back to the ground. She straddled him, facing away, Chambers said. She undid his shirt and pants, he said, and began to masturbate him. Chambers said he grew tired of her efforts and told her to let go, but she wouldn't. Instead, she squeezed his testicles, hurting him. Freeing his hands, he reached up with his left arm and pulled back on her neck as hard as he could, eventually flipping her over him. Levin is estimated to have died at about 5:30.

_Ibid._

On Wednesday, April 19, 1989, at about 9 p.m., reports began filtering into the Central Park precinct that a marauding gang of youths was beating up joggers and bicyclists... The victim was white and middle-class and female, a promising young investment banker at Salomon Brothers with a Wellesley-Yale-Phi Beta Kappa pedigree. The suspects were black and Latino and male and much younger, some with dubious school records, some from fractured homes, all from Harlem. That the crime took place in Central Park, mythologized as the city's verdant, democratic refuge, played right into the theme of middle-class violation.

_Smith, "Revisited," N. pag._

The mothers and the nursemaids and the babies and the laughing children who fill the park all the daylight hours were gone now. In their place lurked muggers and thugs, perverts, dope addicts, a twisted world of evil, desperate people.

_Atkinson, pp. 41-12._

Looking out the window over the tree tops. The cars snaking on the curving drives through the park. And night when lights sprinkled across the whole grey vista. To put the heavens down below. With the stabbings and stomplings. You watch from windows safe and warm.

_Donleavy, N. pag._
Over the tops of Fifth Avenue’s proud apartment houses, showing exactly how abruptly they rise from the edge of the dark forest at their feet—the very embodiment, in urban terms, of the troubling closeness of “chaos” and “control.”

[Panorama]

Sanders, Celluloid, p. 255.
X - Subway

People love about in granite chasms; if not mastered, they are no longer the masters. Rock, p. xvi.

The train hammers its hard rhythm in the blood. Parland, p. 346.

The new subway system would quickly be characterized in the press as an antechamber of Hell. Haden, p. 89.

unworkable air vents ass aching benches Last Poets "N.Y, N.Y."

The hottest station in the summer of 1905 was Astor Place. Brooks, p. 70.

To cool the subway platforms in 1905, the Interborough turned off all but a few incandescent lights in each station. Ibid., p. 70.

It brought ordinary office fans on to the station platforms. Ibid., p. 70.

It takes a subway about seven years after building to equal the surface temperatures. Granick, p. 194.

A New York City subway passenger wouldn’t be assured of riding in an air-conditioned train until well into the 1990s.
Tremulously I stand in the subways, absorbed into the terrible reverberations of exploding energy. Fearful, I touch the forest of steel girders loud with the thunder of oncoming trains that shoot past me like projectiles. Inert I stand, riveted in my place. My limbs, paralyzed, refuse to obey the will insistent on haste to board the train while the lightning steed is leashed and its reeling speed checked for a moment. Before my mind flashes in clairvoyant vision what all this speed portends—the lightning crashing into life, the accidents, railroad wrecks, steam bursting free like geysers from bands of steel, thousands of racing motors and children caught at play, flying heroes diving into the sea, dying for speed—all this because of strange, unsatisfied ambitions. Another train bursts into the station like a volcano, the people crowd me on, on into the chasm—into the dark depths of awful forces and fates. In a few minutes, still trembling, I am spilled into the streets.

Keller, p. 299.

Indescribable scenes of crowding and confusion, never before paralleled in this city, marked the throwing open of the subway to the general public last night. The old 6 o’clock Brooklyn Bridge car crush paled into insignificance when contrasted with the deadly suffocating, rib-smashing subway rush which began at 7 o’clock tonight. Men fought, kicked and pummeled one another in the mad desire to reach the subway ticket offices or to ride on the trains. Women were dragged out, either screaming in hysterics or in a swooning condition; grey haired men pleaded for mercy, boys were knocked down and only escaped by a miracle from being trampled under foot. The presence of the police alone averted what would undoubtedly have been panic after panic, with wholesale loss of life. [Density] [Congestion]

“Birth,” N. pag.

Claustrophobia

The controversy over “subway air.” Within days of the opening reporters found passengers complaining of headaches, attacks of vertigo, dizziness, and occasional fainting spells. The New York Times reported on a woman who fainted on a train. “Foul air and nervousness due to the excitement of the trip” was the judgment of a physician who happened to be in the car. The Interborough responded by hiring Professor C.F. Chandler of Columbia University to prepare a scientific study. When his report of November 1904 declared The air perfectly safe, the company quickly issued its own pamphlet. Its cover proudly bore the claim, "SUBWAY AIR PURE AS IN YOUR OWN HOME."

Brooks, p. 70.

In 1905, it was proven that there were only half as many microbes per cubic foot in subway air as on the street. Ibid., p. 70.

I cannot see a well or a subway entrance without shuddering.

Lovecraft, "Lurking," N. pag.

In his letters Lovecraft refers to some types of closed New York buses as "prepayment suffocation chambers," so how much more trepidation might he have felt about suffocation on the subways?

Haden, p. 91.

Hart Crane seems the key progenitor for the future mythologizing of the subway, with his poem "The Tunnel" (the writing of which appears to have been started around late 1925 and with development continuing into 1926) in which the overcrowded and claustrophobic city subways become the nightmare haunt of the ghost of Edgar Allan Poe. Crane presents Poe as a covert symbol of an "underground" queer culture, linking his deathly status with the persecutions that normalcy inflicts upon the artistic...

Whose head is swinging from the swollen strap?
Whose body smokes along the bitten rails,
Bursts from a smoldering bundle far behind
In back forks of the chasms of the brain,— Puffs from a riven stump far out behind
In interborough fissures of the mind . . . ?
And why do I often meet your visage here,
Your eyes like agate lanterns—on and on Below the toothpaste and the dandruff ads?—
And did their riding eyes right through your side,
And did their eyes like unwashed platters ride?
Crane, "Bridge; Tunnel," p. 95.

Above the swaying heads, near smarting myopic eyes, are bands of clashing color, battering down sales lag. Liquors, cosmetics, legs, vermin exterminators, hair restorers, depilatories, purges, gums, and swim suits scream their obnoxious messages.

Reisenberg, p. 67.

fell out of the subway window

Ginsberg, Howl, p. 5.

In March 1912, a 27-year-old Irish-American subway engineer went to see Dr. C.P. Oberndorf, an Upper West Side neurologist, complaining of claustrophobia so severe that he had to quit his job because he could no longer enter the subway shaft. He had suffered his first attack of claustrophobia three years earlier while watching vaudeville at the American Theater.

Maloney, p. 109.

There is an actual sickness that affects mass-transit users [...] overcrowding leaves people wedged in place with blood accumulating in their feet, leading to faintness [...] the claustrophobia and dreads combine to push people from unease to panic.

Norwood, pp. 39-41.

who howled on their knees in the subway

Ginsberg, Howl, p. 4.

It is disappointing to hear that travellers on the New York Subway are complaining of imperfect ventilation and other discomforts which were not anticipated.

The Electrician, N. pag.

Somehow, the way life works, people usually wind up either in crowded subways and elevators, or in big rooms all by themselves. Everybody should have a big room they can go to and everybody should also ride the crowded subways.

Usually people are very tired when they ride on a subway, so they can’t sing and dance, but I think if they could sing and dance on a subway, they’d really enjoy it.

The kids who spray graffiti all over the subway cars at night have learned how to recycle city space very well. They go back into the subway yards in the middle of the night when the cars are empty and that’s when they do their singing and their dancing on the subway. The subways are like palaces at night with all that space just for you.

[Graffiti]

Warhol, Philosophy, p. 155.
Four steps past the turnstiles everybody is already backed up haunch to paunch for the climb up the ramp and the stairs to the surface, a great funnel of flesh, wool, felt, leather, rubber and steaming aluminon, with the blood squeezing through everybody’s old sclerotic arteries in hopped-up spurts from too much coffee and the effort of surfacing from the subway at the rush hour.

It is not exactly an inspiring sight, this subway car on the W train—our usual car filled with a look so full of exhaustion that you might think we had been riding on this car forever. But one senses that if you look hard enough, you can see the things that draw people to cities, that drew my grandfather here seventy years ago and drew me here, too: possibility, and plurality, keep us riding still. I suppose that possibility is just as possible in the suburbs of Dallas or Phoenix, in some edge city near Atlanta, some floating island of residence levitating between two malls, but I don’t quite believe it. Possibility still, in some significant part, depends on density; hope is the thing in a sweatshirt, riding the W train and reading the Daily News, a bird of another feather.

Gopnik, p. 295.

[close together; touching]

Subways below and trains above racing
Packed with humanity
Ono, “Midsummer.”

At 96th Street the IRT was jammed. This was not unusual. Quite often New Yorkers at that station indulge fantasies of commutation, pantomimes that to the uninitiated must seem strange.

A train pulls into the station, crowded with people, who then get off. The train, which had been southbound, retreats into the tunnel. Another empty train comes, slowing down as it enters the station, which by now is dangerously crowded, and halts. It pauses, engine humming, while people push to the doors, then accelerates and hurtles away. Perhaps a third train comes and if it does perhaps it is brimful of people. Perhaps, too, these people press closer under the pressure of newcomers who board the train and wait. Ten minutes? On occasion the train moves ahead to another station, 86th street, where the announcement is made: "This train is going out of service, all passengers please get off."

We have had our New York subways for 34 suffocating psychopathic years.
Reisenberg, p. 65.

The subway, Archer thought, was the only place to read today’s newspapers. Underground, in a bad light, at an increased fare, with all the passengers fearing the worst about each other. Everyone suspecting the man next to him of preparing to pick a pocket, commit a nuisance, carry a lighted cigar, pinch a girl, ask for a job, run for a vacant seat, block the door at the station at which you wanted to leave the train. Archer put the paper down and looked around at his fellow passengers. They do not look American, he thought; perhaps I shall report them to the proper authorities.
Lefebvre, Critique, p. 28.

Once the train doors close, people seemed to sink into their own private worlds, and it was easy to see their concerns played out on their faces.

Always more crowded are the subways, more rusty, more ill-kept, more dense with dull, ox-like throngs winding in the stations, following green, or black, or red stripes to their destinations; dust and papers and dirt swirling on every hand. He has become immune to the filth and orders of subway lavatories; he accepts unseeing the cheap additions to old decoration schemes at station platforms lengthened to accommodate ten-car, two-guard trains. He accepts as normal nuisances the brash crowd herders who act as station guards or pushers-in. His ears are deaf to club turnstiles, clapping around nerve-racking collections. He goes, I’m complaining for machines that count him and take him like meat in a grinder.
Reisenberg, p. 65.

Strap clutching subway stench, screaming “L”
Galwey, p. 421.

Mingled breath and smell
so close mingled Sexuality

The air fuming. A man sitting with a smile staring at a girl. Then someone vomited on the floor of the train.
Donleavy, N. pag.

The rush hour crush of tired silent faces. Breathing all over each other. Someone’s hands trying to open my fly.
Easing fingers in under the foreskin. All the way to the Bronx, didn’t know who to punch. For borrowing my privates without permission.
Ibid.

The Swedish Massage of the Subway... the pulping mill of the subway.

G.W. Bitzer filmed at 2 a.m. in the Subway in June 1905, showing a lady and gentleman behaving scandalously (she raises her voluminous skirt above her knees so that he can tie her shoelace) and being ejected from the train by a guard. (cf. Susan Strasberg & Marilyn Monroe on Fifth Avenue. [Power]) [Sex] [Surveillance] [Voyeur] [Timeline]
Brooks, p. 69.

One of the few places where body contact—at least the unavoidable rush-hour kind—is more acceptable than eye contact.
Peterix, N. pag.

Relationship is a friction of bodies in passing: a messenger boy is squeezed against an odorous blonde.
N. cit.

Thoughts very often grow fertile, because of the motion, the great company, the subtlety of the rider’s state as he rattles under streets and rivers, under the foundations of great buildings.
Brooks, p. 169.

The city breathes eroticism, from noon on. Even in the subway you can sense men and women angling, sizing each other up.
Keillor, p. 298.

In the repellent intimacy of the subway, silence is protection. Strangers right crush together, miles apart in mind.
Reisenberg, p. 67.

The entire island [of Manhattan] will be honeycombed by swiftly running [subways]. . . . The first day I [went down to the subway] it would not have been a difficult task to send me flying upstairs again. I wasn't exactly frightened, rather nervous. = didn't give me much chance for reflection, and I entered the first train that I was shoved into—the magnetism of the mob, as [Gustave] Le Bon would say. . . . New York is full to the brim . . . yes, pretty girls, a bit too rouged, too flimsily attired. . . .
Huneker, pp. 51-2.

I remember my first sexual experience in a subway. Some guy (I was afraid to look at him) got a hard-on and was rubbing it back and forth against my arm. I got very excited and when my stop came I hurried out and home where I tried to do an oil painting using my dick as a brush.
Brainard, "I Remember," N. pag.

She took off her clothes at 4:00 in the afternoon in the doorway of the F train at Rockefeller Center at rush hour.
Groce, p. 85.

On crowded subways, where women have had reason to accuse standees of mashing, a man may hold on to a centre post, with both hands fixed to the pole high so everyone can see that, whatever happens, his hands did not do it. And individual moving someone else's parcel from one seat to another when it is not clear who the owner is may feel he must show he has no designs on the other's personal property and is not overruling maliciously the claims of a possession marker; he handles the article very gingerly and at its edge, thus contaminating it minimally.
Goffman, pp. 165-166.

A person walking down the aisle of a subway car, accidentally stepping on the toe of a seated passenger, can maintain his rate of movement, turn his head back and hold out his arm and hand while he verbally excuses himself. The held-out hand, in effect, holds the offender in the remedial encounter even while his body is rapidly leaving it.
Ibid., p. 38

A principle of stranger interaction is "civil inattention." This "sine qua non of city life" is familiar to all of us who have, for example, travelled on the subway. A brief acknowledgement through body language that the other person is there and then, please, no staring or conversation.
Ings, N. pag.

Subway

In the fall of 1902, one Charles F. Allaire, Civil War veteran, accidentally rode his bicycle into an open subway tunnel at Amsterdam Avenue and 65th Street, breaking his right leg. Edward Morris drove a whole car in, at Broadway and 43rd Street.
Kennedy, Subwayland, p. 113.

On the subway's second of day of operation, holes had been pounded in the tile walls so that advertising posters could be put up.
Brooks, p. 69.

The el with its rusting pothellied stoves in the waiting rooms.
Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

Some subway entrances can't even be shut: they have no gates.
Brook, p. 129.

The yellow wicker seats facing each other in the middle of the El car.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 678.

Heaven under the El...
horrors of Third Avenue iron dreams [Cosmic] [Dream City]
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

The elevated rail is more intoxicating than the heavenly cathedral. [Cosmic]
Goll, p. 5.

El stations abstractly dislocate the city.
Conrad, p. 104.
A system of “impersonal dynamics”: not a convocation of people but a continuum of objects, activated by the impatience of the urban eye, as are the fire escapes, cast-iron pillars, barbers’ poles, and light fixtures which bounce through the visual field of his “Sixth Avenue El.”

Conrad, p. 124.

The Sixth Avenue El ceases operations. After the last northbound train from Rector Street arrives at 53rd Street and Eighth Avenue, revelers strip the cars for souvenirs, taking electric bulbs, destination sings, and straps, throwing seat cushions out of windows, pulling safety cords to bring the train to a series of jolting stops, and smoking in defiance of the No Smoking signs.

Trager, p. 508.

Elevated train platforms, about to be torn down, have a nostalgic glow about them.

Kozloff, n. pag.

“Its lease won’t expire ‘till 2878; and no doubt by then all the ‘Els’ will be torn down.” In fact, they didn’t last much more than a decade, let alone the anticipated thousand years.

Conrad, p. 169.

The horrors of socialism in the subway: Everyone paid the same fare, there were no “first class” tickets, no separate entrances or seating areas. Everyone was dragged down to the same level in the same mundane and deeply uncomfortable “cattle car” experience.

Norwood, pp. 39-41.

After it leaves Manhattan, the number seven train becomes an elevated, and crosses a landscape of abandoned railroad tracks, dilapidated buildings and, later, a conglomerate of ugly factories that blow serpentine plumes of gaudy poisonous smoke. As the train journeys deeper into Queens, the Manhattan skyscrapers in the distance resemble monuments of an enchanted place—ancient Baghdad, or even the Land of Oz. The sun, setting behind the towers of the World Trade Center, burnishes the sky with a warm orange glow and the windows of the towers look like gold-leafed entrances to huge hives bursting with honey. [Antiquity] [WTC]

Manrique, p. 3
Walk about the subway station in a grove of steel pillars; how their knobs, the rivet-heads—unlike those of oaks—
are regularly placed;
how barren the ground is except here and there on the platform a flat black fungus that was chewing-gum.
Reznikoff, p. 97.

Gum holds subway floors together.
Talese, p. 102.

I-N-D, B-M-T, I-R-T
Last Poets “On The Subway.”

I went home, had a good cry and towards nightfall, was collected by an unknown man who had been dragooned by an unknown woman into taking me to her home in Brooklyn. Apart from Mr. Cherry-Garrard’s voyage to the South Pole, this was the worst journey in the world. Though we implored eight of them, no taxi driver would take us on such a desperate trek. I couldn’t blame them. Brooklyn is a terrible place and all who live there know they have entered an enclosed order. In desperation, we walked to the subway station at the corner of Broadway and Houston Street where we waited for a train that did not come for a long and dangerous time. When it did appear, we forced our way on to it and stood swaying perilously but unable to reach any fixture on which to hold. I have to report that this motley throng of strangers, though pressed into disturbing proximity, remained surprisingly calm—even cheerful. Arriving at our station we still had a long, dark way to walk over pavements that have not been repaired in a hundred years. Had we not been delayed by so many difficulties on our journey, we would have been compelled to stand in the bitter desolation of a Brooklyn street for some time.
Crisp, pp. 160-1.

You wait fifteen minutes on the downtown platform... An announcement is made that the express is out of service. The tunnel smells of wet clothing and urine. The voice comes over the speaker again to say that the local will be delayed twenty minutes because of a fire on the tracks. You push through the crowd and ascend to the street.
McInerney, p. 86.
At the subway station you wait fifteen minutes on the platform for a train. Finally a local, enervated by graffiti, shuffles into the station.

But someone in the back is holding one open for a man who is running up the platform. The doors open again. You step onto the train. The car is full of Hasidim from Brooklyn—gnomes in black with briefcases full of diamonds. You take a seat beside one of them. He is reading from his Talmud, running his finger across the page. The strange script is similar to the graffiti signatures all over the surfaces of the subway car, but the man does not look up at the graffiti, nor does he try to steal a peek at the headlines of your Post.

Oh you age when streetcars make elegant spirals curving around City Hall.

N. cit.

I ride the A train out from Manhattan to my summer bungalow in the Rockaways. Crossing Jamaica Bay, I get a little lightheaded. The subway car, which has been chugging along over the bay, plunges downward with a jerk, as if it’s headed straight for the bottom. Then abruptly, almost at the waterline, the car seems to skim right across the top of the waves. It’s as if a gust of wind could swirl up and tip it over. Hitting open water in a crowded New York City subway car is one of the strangest satisfactions of metropolitan life.

Maloney, p. 109.

The train shudders and pitches toward Fourteenth Street, stopping twice for breathers in the tunnel.

McInerney, p. 12.

At Fourteenth Street three Rastafarians get on, and soon the car reeks of sweat and reefer. [Smell]

The doors close with a pneumatic hiss. [Sound]

The KK train from Manhattan crosses the Williamsburg Bridge.

Talbot, p. 73.
For Gravesend Manor change at Chambers Street.

[...]

The train rounds, bending to a scream,
Taking the final level for the dive
Under the river—
Crane, "Bridge; Tunnel," p. 110.

We had a full train. Well, the next stop is Fifth Avenue. And this fellow gets on—twenty, twenty-five years old—fit and trim as a marine. In fact, he was in marine fatigue uniform—except the hat that he had on, he had a pacifier hanging down, and a feature in the back. As we were moving out of Fifth Avenue... he took off his jacket, rolled it up very tightly. And then proceeded to get down on the floor of the subway car with this tightly rolled jacket between his elbows, and he starts doing a belly crawl along the floor! You’d think there were live bullets going across—he literally slithered across the floor. And he would go and he would look at people, just like a snake. And, of course New Yorkers, you learn not to make eye contact. And here it is: it’s after 12:00 at night and people are getting scared.

Groce, p. 83.

The subway films of G.W. “Billy” Bitzer: A Rube in the Subway (1905). A country bumpkin gets off the subway. His pocket is picked. He tries to jump back on the departing subway car, but hits the electrified third rail. [cf. Steve Brodie’s Brooklyn Bridge jump [Monument]]

Brooks, p. 69.

The railroad tracks wended their way between the buildings, making several sharp curves, and then emerged on Eleventh Avenue along which, at street level, trains inched their way in a straight line down to the foot of the island. In front of every train, to warn pedestrians and drives, rode a cowboy on a horse, waving a large red flag. Since the trains came at frequently backed up for blocks. Often, a driver would become impatient and ignore the warning flag. For that reason, Eleventh had become known as “Death Avenue.” For years, the city had tried without success to find a solution to the problem by the presence of the railroad along the West Side.

Caro, p. 66.

In a late-night cop raid, after the opera, the ballet and the theater crowd had long gone home, as the pursued felons dispersed, hurrying down platforms, leaping over turnstiles, jumping down on to the tracks and disappearing in the tunnels full of sewer rats, where they hoped to be spared death by oncoming local trains, one voice calling wildly, "Stay alive—I'll find you!"

McCourt, p. 100.

I saw Batman walking across the tracks. Someone just walking the tracks in a Batman costume! OK, I have a radio. My rule books says I'm supposed to call in anything unusual. I'm going to call control center and say 'Batman just walked across West 4th Street, across three tracks?' So as long as the train was in the station, this man just went across four tracks, flinging his cape back and forth 'til he got tired of it and then he went upstairs.

[Surrealism]

Groce, p. 81.

Bus

If there is a memorable bus scene in literature, or an unforgettable moment in a movie that takes place on a New York City bus, I have not found it. It isn't that buses are intrinsically inimical to symbolism: The London bus has a poetry as rich as the Tube's—there is Mary Poppins, there is Mrs. Dalloway. In Paris, Pascal rides the bus Zazie dreams of riding the Métro. In L.A., Keanu Reeves rides the bus, round and round in desperate Dennis Hopper-driven circles. But as a symbolic repository, the New York City bus does not exist. The only significant symbolic figure that the New York bus has had is Ralph Kramden, and what he symbolizes about the bus is that being stuck in one is one more form of comic frustration and disappointment; the bus is exactly the kind of institution that would have Ralph Kramden as its significant symbolic figure.

Gopnik, p. 145.

Skidaddling crosstown.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Every time I see a groaning bus coughing fumes as it lumbers across three traffic lanes, I long for the trolley cars.

Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.
This bus with a great engine roaring, swaying from stop to stop.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Lumbering, smelly vehicles.
Walker, Night Club, p. 203.

The busses totter spilling the jammed shadows.
Galwey, p. 421.

On a bus a simple citizen in search of transportation will find himself often reduced to the shakes.
Atkinson, p. 19.

The bus roaring past a statue of a man on a pedestal.
Donleavy, N. pag.

In the late 70s, the MTA began to notice riders sitting on the back bumpers of city buses. In 1981, all new buses ordered by the authority featured “anti-ride bumpers.” Instead of offering a flat surface upon which a person could get a foothold, the new bumpers slanted away from the bus at a 45-degree angle. Also redesigned was the grille on the back of the bus, which the bumper riders held on to. The grille itself was made smaller and the slates were put so close together that a hand cannot fit between them and get a grip.
Boland, N. pag.

Another bus pulls over and disgorges passengers. The sheltered mob clutch umbrellas, purses and briefcases, prepared to fight for seats; but once the bus unloads it’s nearly empty. The driver, a massive black man with sweat rings under his arms, says “Take it easy,” and his voice commands respect.
McInerney, p. 87.

You sit down up front. The bus lurches into traffic. Below Fortieth Street the signs on the corners change from Seventh Avenue to Fashion Avenue as you enter the garment district.
Ibid., p. 87.

At the Thirty-fourth Street stop there is a commotion at the door. “Zact change,” the bus driver says. A young man standing by the change box is trying to work his hand into the pockets of his skin-tight Calvin Kleins. Peach Lacoste shirt, a mustache that looks like a set of plucked eyebrows. Under one arm he clutches a small portfolio and a bulky Japanese paper umbrella. He rests the umbrella against the change box. "Step aside," the bus driver says. "People getting wet out there."

_Ibid._, p. 87.

Everyone watching titters and guffaws. The bus hasn’t moved.

_Ibid._, p. 86

Catching a bus by a white stone building.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Seen from a crowded bus on a steamy wet winter’s afternoon. As the M3 bus jolts its way along Madison Avenue from the fifties up towards the nineties, each fantasy stares out through the window and fulfills itself.

_Blandford, p. 176._

Car, Taxi

The 1908 New York to Paris auto race was by definition over land. The six competing teams rolled up Broadway, then turned their backs on the Atlantic and set off for France on a westerly course. The chosen route crossed the continental United States, Alaska and the frozen Bering Strait, continuing through Siberia, Russia, Poland, Germany, and finally to France. The length of the trip, which took about six months, was 19,877 miles. As the canvas-topped cars set out from the _New York Times_ building that uncommonly cold February morning, a crowd of more than 150,000 lined the streets to watch. The eventual winner was George Schuster, an American mechanic. He piloted his Tomas Speedway Flyer into Paris on July 30—and was promptly stopped by a policeman for driving without a headlight.

_Schneider, N. pag._

It is not the beauty of the city at night, or the shimmer of its multicolored lights, that enthralls the cab driver. Over twelve bridges and through four tunnels, hundreds of thousands of cars were leaving the island of Manhattan, freeing up the hammed, narrow streets, opening up for me the wide avenues, where the itching of my meter was now much livelier than in the daytime. The fewer the cars remaining in the city, the greater grew the number of people who need a taxi.

_Lobas, p. 152._
Or your taxi rolls and rolls through streets made of velvet, what is the feeling, what is the feeling when the radio never ends, but the hour, the swift, the electric, the invisible hour does not stop and does not turn.

Fearing, p. 66.

Fast taxi ride through New York streets when you are drunk: impression that you are plunging through all obstacles at exhilarating giddy speed; nothing can interfere with your progress.

O’Connell, p. 147.

Slam the door shut of this yellow black checkered cab.

Donleavy, N. pag.

Through strange doors into strange apartments with intermittent swings along in taxis through the soft nights.

Jackson & Dunbar, p. 607.

Even with the meter on there is no pleasure in driving around the city at five miles per hour, and it is even harder to pick your way through the crowds of pedestrians streaming around the cab; but it is unbearable to hang around in traffic jams empty.

Lobas, p. 141.

Kennedy airport! Half of the soul, half of the life of a New York cabbie belongs here, in this inexhaustible well of fabulous driving dollars.

Down in the mines of the streets and the avenues, we extracted our nickels and dimes, but we never stopped keeping a lascivious eye out for an airport.

Cabbies on crack

I want to get out, out of this yellow shell
I want to get out, crack cabbies straight from hell
Ramones, “Cabbies on Crack”

All the way down, he muses, are layers upon layers upon layers of tunnels, with no bottom.

Toth, p. 9.
Duke Ellington: New York is a dream of a song, a feeling of aliveness, a Russian flow of vitality that Paul says like the giant heart beautiful humanity. The whole world revolves around New York, especially my world. Very little happens anywhere unless someone in New York presses a button!

New York is its people, and it’s people are the city. Among its crowds, along with streets, and in its high-piled buildings can be found every mood, sight, and every sound, every custom, thought, and tradition, every color, flavor, religion, and the culture of the entire earth. It is as if each of the world’s greatest chefs had sent a pinch of his nation’s most distinctive flavoring to contribute to the richness of taste of this great savory pot of food called New York.

The miracle of the city is that this concoction, with its multitude of dissimilar ingredients, can sometimes come to the boil, and sometimes simmer away contentedly on the back of the stove. Since it is at the mercy of so many cooks, it is so often stirred up, and, too often, of late, over-seasoned by some heavy-handed pepper wielders. But this gorgeously aromatic pot never burns or sticks to the bottom! Instead, New York presents itself as a proper feast to each human being of healthy appetite who hungers for food. Whether his needs are nutritional or merely “gourmet,” the hungry one is fed, for in New York it is all there on the menu, that something to satisfy every taste: exotic, traditional, or adventuresome. Perhaps it is at this very moment of finding his soul food listed on the menu that the next New Yorker is born. For the “real New Yorker” is not always born in New York, you know. He becomes one at the very instant when he discovers that his own ingredients are completely compatible with the city’s soups and salads.

I am that kind of New Yorker, for I was born in Washington, D.C. And if I am asked to describe New York, I must think in musical terms, because New York is people, and that is what music is all about. This incredible city embraces all humanity within its structure, whether resident or visitor, and joins each new heartbeat with her own throbbing pulse. For personified, New York is a woman, and as such she is a little of everything. Certainly, she is a sophisticate. Sometimes she is a lady of the evening. To her cosmopolitan visitors, she is always a gracious hostess deferential to their differing points of view. And like a true Earth Mother, she rests but never sleeps. She is the last to retire at night and the first to rise with each new day, for she suffers from an exhaustingly active energy called Anticipation!

In his ideal image, the real New Yorker is seen at the newsstand after midnight with the News under his arm, but it is also considered extremely prestigious to be seen reading the Times on the subway in the morning. On his way home from work in the later afternoon, always with the Post in his pocket, the New Yorker looks as though he has been some place, and knows it.

It is impossible to enter New York without feeling that something wonderful is about to happen. Whether you arrive by plane, ship, train, car or bus, bridge or tunnel, you feel the immediate excitement of starshine. For to this great city come the world’s Beautiful People; men of wisdom and good intent; people of cultures older than our own, with highly cultivated tastes; creative geniuses in all fields of endeavor; exquisite women of fashion; great ladies of all ages, whose beauty lies in their genuineness; and all are essential parts of the melody line in this dream of a song that is New York. This is a city of talented performance. Everyone in New York is a performer, down to the most casual visitor. Perhaps Shakespeare had a vision of Manhattan in mind when he wrote that “all the world’s a stage,” for most certainly we all get caught up in the plot!

There is a kind of highly contagious fever of backstage communication about New York. The opportunities to rub elbows with the “stars” are so many and frequent that a little of that glamour dust of starshine clings to everybody. There are almost no “bit players” on Manhattan Island. Everybody is a star. If this statement seems extravagant, then just consider the taxi driver. No greater Solon exists than the New York cabbie. He knows something about everything, and his is the only gossip column worth reading. He is part of the pulse of the people, of the beat and throb of the city, for he knows, he really knows what is happening in New York, from his own point of view and everyone else’s. He speaks a “people” wisdom and at the heart of this great cosmopolitan city is a vital, small-town “peopleness.” Have you ever been in New York during a disaster or a blizzard? It becomes the friendliest place in the world! That blew fuse, the blackout, was the friendliest of all, because nine months later the stork flew in over the horizon with a bumper crop of babies.
So amid all her tickertape and traffic, New York is the dream of a song. New York is a place where the rich walk, the poor drive Cadillacs, and beggars die of malnutrition with thousands of dollars hidden in their mattresses.

Ellington, pp. 65-7

It was an unusually organic kind of city. Its sewage mostly went into its surrounding waters, to be swept away by the tides. Its garbage mostly went to make landfill. Its corpses were nearly all removed from the island. Its indigent old and its incurably sick were housed on an offshore island, Welfare Island, in the middle of the East River. The daily migration of its commuters, in and out, in and out, over the bridges, on the ferries, through the subaqueous tunnels, was like a great tidal movement, and the ships that were docked all around the shore, fitted so neatly into its multitudinous piers, made the whole island see God-made, rather an man-developed, for its own particular functions.

Morris, Manhattan '45, p. 69.

There are roughly three New Yorks. There is, first, the New York of the man or woman who was born here, who takes the city for granted and accepts its size and its turbulence as natural and inevitable. Second, there is the New York of the commuter—the city that is devoured by locusts each day and spat out each night. Third, there is the New York of the person who was born somewhere else and came to New York in quest of something. Of these three trembling cities the greatest is the last—the city of final destination, the city that is a goal. It is this third city that accounts for New York's high-strung disposition, its poetical deportment, its dedication to the arts, and its incomparable achievements. Commuters give the city its tidal restlessness; natives give it solidity and continuity; but the settlers give it passion. And whether it is a farmer arriving from Italy to set up a small grocery store in a slum, or a young girl arriving from a small town in Mississippi to escape the indignity of being observed by her neighbors, or a boy arriving from the Corn Belt with a manuscript in his suitcase and a pain in his heart, it makes no difference: each embraces New York with the intense excitement of first love, each absorbs New York with the fresh eyes of an adventurer, each generates heat and light to dwarf the Consolidated Edison Company.

White, Here, p. 25.
There is very little Bohemian atmosphere in New York for it is a very "swift" town. Even the rapid man from Chicago notices that there is a peculiarly strident character to the nervous haste of the metropolis. The rumbling "L," the shrieking trolley, overflowing with people all having an expression of wild eagerness on their faces, these are the most fitting external expressions of the jumping unrest at the heart of our city. We are palpitant, eager in the functions of life. We hurry our business in order to get at our pleasure and hurry our pleasure, in order to get at our business. We all have occasional backaches and headaches, and anything slow, from a thoughtful play to a provincial, brings to our nerves the shock of the unfamiliar. Contemplation is the one thing completely shut out of the life of a New Yorker who is thoroughly saturated with the most American spirit of the town. Thought with him is a nervous impulse, quickly over, having no genial, philosophic fringe, looking not before nor after, but pinned to the exciting moment. To use a rather undignified figure the man who is "in it" in New York is like the nervous system of the frog of the psychological laboratory which the operator, by the application of acid, galvanizes into vivid but unmeaning activity.

One way in which philosophy and art are found is in books, but the nervous New Yorker is too busy to read. Through books, therefore, he comes only very incompletely into contact with the contemplative the eternal, the artistic. The only practicable means of subjecting the typical city American to the contemplative is therefore through some influence which is connected with his daily, practical life and amusements. Now, this element is partly found in what is contributed to our metropolitan existence by the foreigners. [Textuality]

Hapgood, pp. 114-5.

Good old New York! The same old wench of a city. Elevated racketing over you’ head. Subway bellowing under you’ feet. Me foh wrestling round them piers again. Scratching down to the bottom of them ships and scrambling out. All alongshore for me now. No more fooling with the sea. Same old New York. Everybody dashing around like crazy... Same old New York... But the sun does better than over there. And the sky’s so high and dry and blue. And the air it—O Gawd it works in you’ flesh and blood like Scotch. O Lawdy, Lawdy! I wants to live to a hundred and finish mah days in New York. [Speech]

McKay, p. 25.
Its isolated faces, its loose fragments and time warps surround us and (with their reserved silences or boisterous chatterings) tell the city; and from these metropolis hypertext windows one can observe important stories and inconsequential events, reasons, and causes lost in time, revelations and unexpected epiphanies. Perhaps it is precisely this alternation of continuity and discontinuity—of the overall picture and the separate parts that go to make up that picture—that makes it difficult to get a grasp and puzzle out what it really is. And so every departure from the city necessarily implies return, for is there not always a niggling unconscious suspicion that something has been omitted? It is at this stage that the sides of the prism become as important or understanding as the in-depth and in-with maps. [Eternal Return] [Incomplete]
Maffi, pp. 115-6.

In a weed-filled vacant lot in Riverdale just north of the Harlem River stood a marble column a hundred feet high with a strangely unfinished look about its top. There was supposed to be a statue up there, a statue of Hendrick Hudson, for the vacant lot had been purchased by the city as the northern bridgehead of a "Hendrick Hudson Bridge" that was supposed to ease the congestion on the Broadway drawbridge, and a statue of the Great Navigator was supposed to look down on the span that bore his name. But although the lot had been purchased, and the column erected, in 1909, in 1932 work had still not started on the statue—or the bridge.
Caro, p. 331.

What I marvel is that the gorgeous, voluptuous color of this greatest of world capitals makes so little showing in the lovely letters of the United States. If only as spectacle, it is superb. It has a glitter like that of the Constantinople of the Comneni. It roars with life like the Bagdad of the Sassanians. These great capitals of antiquity, in fact, were squalid villages compared to it, as Rome was after their kind, and Paris and London are today.

There is little in New York that does not issue out of money. It is not a town of ideas; it is not even a town of causes. But what issues out of money is often extremely brilliant, and I believe that it is more brilliant in New York that it has ever been anywhere else. A truly overwhelming opulence envelops the whole place, even the slums.
The slaves who keep it going may dwell in vile cubicles, but they are hauled to and from their work by machinery that costs hundreds of millions, and when they fare forth to recreate themselves for tomorrow’s tasks they are felled and made dumb by a gaudiness that would have floored John Paleologus himself.

Has any one ever figured out, in hard cash, the value of the objects of art stored upon Manhattan Island? I narrow it to painting, and bar out all the good ones. What would it cost to replace even the bad ones? Of all the statuary, bronzes, hangings, pottery, and bogus antiques? Or the tons of bangles, chains of pearls, stomachers, necklaces, and other baubles? Assemble all the diamonds into one colossal stone, and you will have a weapon to slay Behemoth. The crowds pour in daily, bringing the gold wrung from iron and coal, hog and cow. It is invisible, for they carry it in checks, but it is real for all that. Every dollar earned in Kansas or Montana finds its way, soon or late, to New York, and if there is a part of it that goes back, there is also a part of it that sticks.

What I contend is that this spectacle, lush and barbaric in its every detail, offers the material for a great imaginative literature. There is not only gaudiness in it; there is also a hint of strangeness; it has overtones of the fabulous and even of the diabolical.

The thing simply cannot last. If it does not end by catastrophe, then it will end by becoming stale, which is to say, dull. But while it is in full blast it certainly holds out every sort of stimulation that the gifted literatus may plausibly demand. The shocking imbecility of Main Street is there and the macabre touch of Spoon River. But though Main Street and Spoon River have both found their poets, Manhattan is still to be adequately sung. How will the historian of the future get at it, imagining a future and assuming that it will have historians? The story is not written anywhere in the official records. It is not in the files of the newspapers, which reflect only the surface, and not even all of that. It will not go into memoirs, for the actors in the melodramatic comedy have no taste for prose, and moreover they are all afraid to tell what they know. What it needs, obviously, is an imaginative artist. We have them in this bursting, stall-fed land—not many of them, perhaps—not as many as our supply of quacks—but nevertheless we have them. The trouble is that they either hate Manhattan too much to do its portrait, or are so bedazzled by it that their hands are palsied and their parts of speech demoralized. Thus we have the dithyrambs of Manhattan—but no prose.
I hymn the town without loving it. It is immensely amusing, but I see nothing in it to inspire the fragile and shy thing called affection. I can imagine an Iowan loving the black, fecund stretches of his native State, or a New Englander loving the wreck of Boston, or even a Chicagoan loving Chicago, Loop, stockyards and all, but it is hard for me to fancy any rational human being loving New York. Does one love bartenders? Or interior decorators? Or elevator starters? Or the head-waiters of night clubs? No, one delights in such functionaries, and perhaps one respects them and even reveres them, but one does not love them. They are as palpably cold and artificial as the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Like it, they are mere functions of solvency. When the sheriff comes in they flutter away. One invests affection in places where it will be safe when the winds blow.

But I am speaking now of spectacles, not love affairs. the spectacle remains—grand and gorgeous, stimulating like the best that comes out of goblets, and none the worse for its sinister smack. The town seizes upon all the more facile and agreeable emotions like band music. It is immensely trashy—but it remains immense. Is it a mere Utopia of rogues, a vast and complicated machine for rooking honest me? I don’t think so. The honest man, going to its market, gets value for his money too. It offers him luxury of a kind never dreamed of in the world before—the luxury of being served by perfect and unobtrusive slaves, human and mechanical. It permits him to wallow regally—nay, almost celestially. The Heaven of the Moslems is open to any one who can pay the couvert charge and the honorarium of the hat-check girl—and there is a door, too, leading into the Heaven of the Christians, or, at all events, into every part of it save that devoted to praise and prayer. Nor is all this luxury purely physiological. There is entertainment also for the spirit, or for what passes for the spirit when men are happy. There were more orchestral concerts last Winter than anywhere else on earth. The town, as I have said, is loaded with art to the gunwales and is steadily piling more on deck. Is it fecund of ideas? Perhaps. But surely it is not hostile to them. There is far more to the show it offers than watching a pretty gal oscillate her hips; one may also hear some other gal, only a shade less slightly, babble the latest discoveries in antinomianism. All kinds, in brief, come in. There are parts for all in the Totentanz, even for moralists to call the figures. But there is, as yet, no recorder to put it on paper. [Antiquity] [Apocalypse] [Power] [Literature] [Suburb]
I like to think of all the city microcosms so nicely synchronized though unaware of one another: the worlds of the weight-lifters, yodelers, tugboat captains and sideshow barkers, of the book-dutchers, sparring partners, song pluggers, sporting girls and religious painters, of the dealers in rhesus monkeys and the bishops of churches that they establish themselves under the religious corporations law. It strengthens my hold on reality to know when I awake with a brandy headache in my house which is nine blocks due south of the Chrysler Building and four blocks due east of the Empire State, that Eddie Arcaio, (the jockey, is galloping a horse around the track at Belmont while Ollie Thomas, a colored docker of my acquaintance, is holding a watch on him. I can be sure that Kit Coates, at the Aquarium, is worrying over the liverish deportment of a new tropical fish, that presently Whitey will be laying out the gloves and headguards for the fighters he trains at Stillman’s gymnasium, while Miss Ira, the Harlem modiste, will be trying to talk a dark-complexioned girl out of buying herself an orange turban and Hymie the Tummler ruminates a plan for opening a new night club. It would be easier to predicate the existence of God on such recurrences than on the cracking of ice in ponds, the peeping of spring peepers in their peeperies and the shy green sprigs of poison ivy so well advertised by writers like Thoreau.

There is something strangely affecting about the last hours of long-lived and famous City institutions. Everything almost exactly as it has always gone on right up to the last minute and then suddenly it stops, never to be again. Whatever such places meant in the lives of many people is only a memory from that moment on. Perhaps it is the sheer ordinariness of such an occasion, observed with the knowledge that it is just about over, that gives it that quality. Or perhaps it is the courage of those who, knowing what is about to happen, go about their jobs almost exactly as they have always gone about them, performing their small functions to the end. [Memory] [Nostalgia]

Be that as it may the time wasted in New York over waiting for people who are late for their dates, over waiting for elevators, during traffic jams and over answering purely frivolous telephone calls must amount to a very considerable expenditure if it could be represented in money. Let us put it in another way: If I go to London, or if I go, in Paris, from the South to the North Bank, in both cases on business, I expect to—and I do—get in at least three, but not unusually four, business interviews before lunch and at least two, but quite frequently three, afterwards. In New York if you can manage two before lunch and one afterwards you are lucky, simply because of the difficulty of transit and of synchronization.

Ford, America, pp. 76-7.

There is no gauging the time of your arrival at any given point on the ground level of the city. Having an engagement for half-past four in Sixty-fifth Street, I took a taxicab one afternoon at four in Madison Square and arrived at five minutes past five, having traveled at the rate of practically a minute and a half to a block. The same evening I had a date for eight o’clock in the same street. I took a taxi at the corner of Sixteenth Street and Sixth Avenue at seven o’clock and arrived at Sixty-fifth Street at seven-twenty—having to cool my feet for forty minutes outside the house where I was dining and having covered the ground at the rate of practically fifty blocks in twenty minutes.

And this goes millionwise: there must be at present thousands of millions of business hours lost in the city of New York ever year, on the surface of the ground alone.

Ford, America, pp. 70-1.

Manhattan demographic dislocations: fluctuating populations from night to night and week to week as the servicemen tided through on their way abroad.

Caldwell, p. 279.

Like all big cities, it consisted of irregularity, change, sliding forward, not keeping in step, collisions of things and affairs, and fathomless points of silence in between, of paved ways and wilderness, of one great rhythmic throb and the perpetual discord and dislocation of all opposing rhythms, and as a whole resembled seething, bubbling fluid in a vessel consisting of the solid materials of buildings, laws, regulations, and historical traditions.

Donleavy, N. pag.

By the end of the nineteenth century, New York was too big and too diverse to be measured in traditional ways. It was impossible to cover its length in a walk, to keep up with the shops and the social events, to follow all the threads of its daily life.

Hawes, N. pag.

What will finish New York in the end, I suppose, will be an onslaught from without, not from within. The city is the least defensible of great capitals. Give an enemy command of the sea, and he will be able to take it almost as easily as he could take Copenhagen. The strategists of the General Staff at Washington seem to be well aware of this fact, for their preparations to defend the city from a foe afloat have always been half-hearted and lacking in confidence. Captain Stuart Godfrey, U.S.A., is at pains to warn his lay reader that the existing forts protect only the narrow spaces in front of them that "they cannot be expected to prevent the enemy from landing elsewhere." e.g., anywhere along the reaches of the Long Island coast. Once such a landing were effected, the fact that the city stands upon an island, with deep water behind it, would be a handicap rather than a benefit. If it could not be taken and held, it could at least be battered to pieces, and made so untenable. The guns of its own forts, indeed, might be turned upon it, once those forts were open to attack from the rear. After that, the best defenders could do would be to retire to the natural bombproofs in the cellars of Union Hill, N.J., breweries, and there wait for God to deliver them. They might, of course, be able to throw down enough metal form the Jersey heights to prevent the enemy from occupying the city and reopening its theaters and bordellos, but the more successful they were in this enterprise the more cruelly Manhattan would be used.

Altogether, an assault from the sea promises to give the New Yorkers something to think about. Any invader who emptied New York and took the line of the Hudson would have Uncle Sam by the tail, and could enter upon peace negotiations with every prospect of getting very polite attention. The American people, of course, could go on living without New York, but they could not go on living as a great and puissant nation. Steadily, year by year, they have made New York more and more essential to the orderly functioning of the American state. If it were cut off from the rest of the country the United States would be in the hopeless position of a man relieved of his medulla oblongata—that is to say, of a man without even enough equipment left to be a father, a patriot and a Christian.

Nevertheless, it is highly probable that the predestined enemy, when he comes at last, will direct his first and hardest efforts to cutting off New York, and then make some attempt to keep it detached afterward. This, in fact, is an essential part of the new higher strategy, which is based upon economic considerations, as the old strategy was based upon dynastic considerations. In the Middle Ages, the object of war was to capture and hamstring a king; at present it is to dismember a great state, and so make it impotent. The Germans, had they won, would have broken up the British Empire, and probably detached important territories from France, Italy and Russia, besides gobbling Belgium in toto. The French, tantalized by a precarious and incomplete victory, attempted to break up Germany, as they broke up Austria. The chances are that an enemy capable of taking and holding New York would never give it back wholly—that is, would never consent to its restoration to the Union on the old terms. What would be proposed, I venture, would be its conversion into a sort of free state—a new Danzig, perhaps functioning, as now, as the financial and commercial capital of the country, but nevertheless lying outside the bounds politically. This would solve the problem of the city's subsistence, and still enable the conqueror to keep his hold upon it. It is my belief that the New Yorkers, after the first blush of horror, would agree to the new arrangement and even welcome it. Their patriotism, as things stand, is next to nothing. I have never heard, indeed, of a single honest patriot in the whole town; every last man who pretends to kiss the flag is simply a swindler with something to sell. The indifference to the great heartthrobs of the hinterland is not to be dismissed as mere criminality; it is founded upon the plain and harsh fact that New York is alien to the rest of the country, not only in blood and tastes, but also in fundamental interests—that the sort of life that New Yorkers lead differs radically from the sort of life that the rest of the American people lead, and that their deepest instincts vary with it. The city in truth, already constitutes an independent free state in all save the same. the ordinary American law does not run there, save when it has been specifically ratified, and the ordinary American mores are quite unknown there. What passes as virtue in Kansas is regarded as intolerable vice in New York, and vice versa. The town is already powerful enough to swing the whole country when it wants to, as it did on the war issue in 1917, but the country is quite impotent to swing the town. Every great wave of popular passion that rolls up on the prairies is dashed to spray when it strikes the hard rocks of Manhattan. As a free state, licensed to pretty upon the hinterland but unharassed by its Cro-Magnon prejudices and delusions,
New York would probably rise to great heights to very genuine greatness, and perhaps become the most splendid city known to history. For one thing, it would be able, once it had cut the painter, to erect barriers and conditions around the privilege of citizenship, and so save itself from the double flood that now swamps it—first, of broken-down peasants from Europe, and secondly and more important, of fugitive rogues from all the land West and South of the Hudson. Citizenship in New York is now worth no more than citizenship in Arkansas, for it is open to any applicant from Arkansas. The great city-states of history have been far more fastidious. Venice, Antwerp, London, the Hansa towns, Carthage, Tyre, Cnossus, Alexandria—they were all very sniffish. Rome began to wobble when the Roman franchise was extended to immigrants from the Italian hill country, i.e., the Arkansas of that time. The Hansa towns, under the democracy that has been forced upon them, are rapidly sinking to the level of Chicago and Philadelphia. New York, free to put an end to this invasion, and to drive out thousands of the gorillas who now infest it—more, free from the eternal blackmail of laws made at Albany and the Methodist tyranny of laws made at Washington—could face the future with resolution and security, and in the course of a few generations it might conceivably become genuinely civilized. It would still stand as toll-taker on the chief highway of American commerce; it would still remain the premier banker and usurer of the Republic. But it would be loosed from the bonds which now tend to strenuously to drag it down to the level of the rest of the country. Free at last, it could cease to be the auction-room and bawdy-house that it is now, and so devote its brains and energy to the building up of a civilization. [Apocalypse] [Autonomy] [Suburb] [Antiquity] [Power]

Mencken, Chrestomathy, pp. 185-6
Z - 1939 World’s Fair

The decade lost to Scott Fitzgerald’s hero—that period of architectural reconstruction between 1929 and 1939—is the one when New York most irrevocably transforms itself. The raising of the Chrysler Building (1930), the Empire State (1931), and Rockefeller Center (completed in 1940) demanded that the city conceive of itself anew. Its heights are the lookouts of scientific prediction, from where it can espy a future designed in its own image. The decade ended with the provisional building of that future, at the New York World’s Fair of 1939-40. Going there was time-travel. The Pennsylvania Railroad undertook to speed you “From the World of Today to the World of Tomorrow in ten minutes for ten cents.” The route stretched from actual to envisioned New York: the Fair was the city’s perfected dream of itself.

Conrad, p. 248.

This Fair, more than had any previous effort, promoted as a major purpose the availability of consumer goods and services. It was a Fair that from the very start viewed the people not only as observers but as potential customers of the products it displayed. Thus, the advertising potential of the Fair and its promotion of the growing consumer culture of the time marked a subtle change in the role of the Fair.

Queens, p. 181.

There was no cynicism. There was no black humor. The human condition, or one’s awareness of its problems and inequities, had not reached the point where a sense of the absurd became salvation. It was an absurd world, in its own way, but we loved its flashy, streamlined promises of better things... And so there is more to the sudden passion for the memorabilia of the recent past than mere nostalgia. Nostalgia is a sadly desperate game, an instinctive gut reaction to the fact that we have gone through, and are still going through, a period of shattering change, a destructive, antiheroic, anti-beautiful phase of smashing beliefs, idols and ideals, in a world that offers none of the certainties and standards that kept earlier generations stable in adversity.

Muxtable, Goodbye, pp. 140-1.
The Fair was one of the conceptual crucibles in which the socio-spatial ideology of post-WWII American urbanism was forged. Probing beneath the Fair’s clean, shiny, streamlined lined surfaces, many cultural representations of the Fair exposed various cultural and political contradictions in the Fair’s socio-spatial ideology... its techno-rational designs promoted an evolution of democracy that excluded both ethnic minorities and the economically disenfranchised... its streamlined, machine-age aesthetics functioned as an ideological mask for the economic and political interests of corporate capitalism... the Fair’s own complex, marginal spaces—such as Salvador Dalí’s Dream of Venus exhibit or the Amusement Area—were models for developing alternative counter-hegemonic spatial, political, and urban agendas... Through its numerous, elaborate urban displays, the Fair exposed fairgoers to many trends in architecture and urban planning that would subsequently play a dominant role in the post-WWII restructuring of American cities. It also attempted to endow this new urban ideology with a brilliant utopian aura, fascinated with New York City’s newly emerging role as an international capital.

Ibid., p. 30.

The assertion of New York City’s importance as a global city. As one advertisement for the exhibit explained, New York City itself was an expression of the future because “no other city had advanced nearly so far along the road that leads to the world of tomorrow.” Convinced that both New York City would play a prominent role in defining the world civilization of the future and that the Fair would help design the new urban practices that would make this new world civilization possible, the Fair’s designers envisioned the Fair as a place where New York architects and urban planners could “as members of a great metropolis... think for the world at large” and “lay the foundation for a pattern of life which would have an enormous impact and times to come.” Thus the Fair’s designers endowed the Fair’s urban ideology, the ideology that would dominate the spatial restructuring of post-WW II New York City, with the bold utopian significance. In addition to exalting New York City as a paradigmatic city of the future, the Fair also developed bold, futuristic, techno-rational urban utopias that would eventually serve as models for restructuring post WW-II New York City itself. [Empire]

Ibid., p. 30.
The 1939 Fair’s urban utopias expressed a deep strain of optimism among fairgoers themselves.

_Ibid._, p. 35.

Aside from building an enormous amount of tearing down, these last forty-five years have added stylish and mechanical complications to our hysterical society: motion pictures, silent and sound; photoelectric cells; electron beams; radio direction beams; wire photos and electronic television; oil cracking; internal combustion engines, gas, gasoline, and Diesel; automobiles; airplanes; X-rays, gamma rays; radioactivity; the gyrocompass; turbine engine; steam boilers carrying pressures of over 2000 pounds to the square inch; high speed steel and a thousand new and marvelous alloys; vast improvements in the generation and distribution of electricity; synthetic rubber and silk. The colloids and the vitamins have arrived, and we have set foot on a new continent of discoveries in medicine and in the art of surgery. Fantastic inventions have been made in the design and the use of automatic machinery, of gang drills and precision jigs. The breaking down and the synthesis of matter become an accomplished fact. We see the crystal structure of the atom. Also, the site cyclotron has arrived, two hundred and fifty tons of power set to stretch the spectrum, to beat the speed of light. The atom is smashed, and its parts fly to the ends of the universe; an idea thrown into the machine will explode with the kick of a lightning bolt. Many of these things will be shown at the New York World’s Fair.

_Reisenberg_, p. 52.

Jack Womack’s _Terraplane: A Futuristic Novel of New York, 1939_ sends twenty-first century African American and Russian time travelers back to New York City in 1939. Representing different racial and political ideologies than those of the Fair’s designers, these characters frequently point out late-1930s America’s racist and exploitative practices, such as its xenophobia, ethnic violence, legalized segregation, and prejudiced legal system. Womack’s dehumanized, violent, futuristic characters—who kill people as if they were just “fixing breakfast”—also critique late-1930s America’s techno-rational metanarratives… By plotting an alternative, dystopic history of twentieth-century America that extends from the racially segregated streets of 1939 New York City to futuristic, dehumanized extensions of twentieth-century America’s military-industrial complex, Womack challenges the Fair’s utopian ideology.
Construction

Originally known, in popular parlance, as the "Corona Dumps"—1216 ½ acres of primeval bog, spongy marshland, and the accumulated debris and ashes of many years ... The appearance of the site was enough to daunt many of the most optimistic of the officials who fought their way to the ceremonies through the accumulated junk of many decades. It once presented a scene of stagnant pools and muddy runlets, a source of evil odors that threatened asphyxiation to the distressed inhabitants for miles around. Mountains of ashes rose to a height of 100 feet; the topmost peak, waggishly named "Mount Corona," dominated the dismal panorama. A creek called Flushing River meandered through the bog, virtually undisturbed since President Washington crossed it in 1790 to Flushing Bay. The preparation of the site was the largest single reclamation project ever undertaken in the eastern United States. The mountains were leveled and the bogs filled in with almost six million cubic yards of ashes. Over the marshes thus filled in, hundreds of thousands of cubic yards of top soil were deposited and leveled... A massive tide gate and dam were built to regulate water levels of the Fair-created lakes and the lagoon and to control the tide waters of Flushing Bay. By the end of March 1937 the area was leveled, filled and graded, ready for construction and planting. "From dump to glory."

Monaghan, p. 18.

For the landscaping of the Fair grounds, a forest of trees began moving toward the site. Experts, equipped with large books giving the sizes, shapes, and kinds of trees required, had been scouring the country for hundreds of miles around. They had catalogued upward of 10,000 available trees. In the largest mass movement of the kind on record, railroad flat cars and motor trucks began rolling toward New York bearing a wide variety of full-grown trees, some weighing as much as twenty-five tons and having a height of more than fifty feet. Following one-way streets and guided by police cars, most of the trucks passed through New York City in the early hours of the morning, reaching their destination before daylight.

[Nature]
Teale, pp. 35-8
Trylon and Perishphere

The needle and the globe represent the two extremes of Manhattan's formal vocabulary and describe the outer limits of its architectural choices. The needle is the thinnest, least voluminous structure to mark a location within the Grid. It combines maximum physical impact with a negligible consumption of ground. It is, essentially, a building without an interior. The globe is, mathematically, the form that encloses the maximum interior volume with the least external skin. It has a promiscuous capacity to absorb objects, people, iconographies, symbolisms; it relates them through the mere fact of their coexistence in its interior. In many ways, the history of Manhattanism as a separate, identifiable architecture is a dialectic between these two forms, with the needle wanting to become a globe and the globe trying, from time to time, to turn into a needle—a cross-fertilization that results in a series of successful hybrids in which the needle's capacity for attracting attention and its territorial modesty are matched with the consummate receptivity of the sphere. [Grid] Koolhaas, p. 27.

The Perisphere has hollowed out Hood's globe and made it habitable. Now people can enter it and travel within it into the future. Implantation makes the globe an egg. The Perisphere is the womb of time, engendering the future. Its ovoid shape offers us, when we enter it, the safety of regression and the comfort of going round in circles. Everything in it was constructed circularly. Democracity was laid out in concentric rings, its outer edges expanding from a downtown area called Centerton, and visitors saw it from cradling, revolving balconies. The Perisphere has, however, interrupted the present in order to give it rebirth as the future. Conrad, p. 264.

A sphere and a pylon like a cock and balls. An erection in Flushing Meadow Park. Imagined it so green with milk and honey and all the people of the world walked around with white angels landing on their arms and sticking lollipops of any flavour they wanted right in their mouths. Donleavy, N. pag.

The Trylon and Perisphere: based on a pair of gas storage tanks at the corner of York Avenue and 62nd Street. N. cit.
The Trylon: 700 feet high; The Perisphere 200 feet in diameter, 18 stories high, broad as a city block, its interior more than twice the size of Radio City Music Hall.

Monaghan, p. 43.

Trylon: from “tri,” the three sides of the structure, and “pylon,” indicating its use as the monumental gateway to the Theme Building. Perisphere: from “peri,” meaning “beyond, all around.”

Ibid., p. 43.

Inside the Perisphere: “Democracity,” a panorama. Daylight bustling city, broad highways traverse expansive areas of vivid green countryside, connecting outlying industrial towns with the city’s heart. After two minutes, night comes; workers march to the strains of a symphony and grow larger. The workers symbolize a group which makes the creation of a city possible. [Robert Moses]

Ibid., p. 43.

The Perisphere’s theme music is composed by William Grant Still—jazzy, tonic, light. The selection committee, in searching for a composer, listened to recordings on file at CBS radio without knowing who the composer was. The judges narrowed their choices to two works, “Lenox Avenue” and “A Deserted Plantation,” which turned out to be by the same composer, William Grant Still. The theme song, “Rising Tide,” was played continually in the Perisphere by an orchestra that was assembled and directed by André Kostelanetz.

Ibid., p. 65.

William Grant Still (May 11, 1895 — December 3, 1978) was an African-American classical composer who wrote more than 150 compositions. He was the first African-American to conduct a major American symphony orchestra, the first to have a symphony (his first symphony) performed by a leading orchestra, the first to have an opera performed by a major opera company, and the first to have an opera performed on national television. He is often referred to as “the Dean” of African-American composers.

“William Grant Still,” N. pag.

Color and Light

Only the Perisphere and Tryon, at the center of the Fair, are in pure white.
Monaghan, p. 24.

From almost any point of entrance, the New York World’s Fair assaults the beholder as a carnival of color in architecture. Great stretches of eye-filling hues, canary yellow, orange, blue, green, and rose, carry the eye along unbroken wall surfaces, set among fountains and lawns, and softened by long vistas of tree-lined avenues. From the central axis, dominated by the pearl-white Perisphere and the slender, sky-piercing Trylon, more than five hundred tints and shades contribute to the palette which the Fair has devised to depict the World of Tomorrow.
Harding, p. 193.

Fourteen buildings, including the flood-lighted Perisphere in the Fair’s theme center, were thrown into partial darkness and several lost the service of their air-conditioning equipment when a main feed line supplying the power failed. Democracity, the exhibition in the Perisphere, was unaffected but the globe’s exterior lost a good part of its purple glow.
N. cit.

In the Fair’s color scheme, an unstained whiteness was reserved for the Trylon and Perisphere. The rest of the Theme Center had dimmed into off-white. From there, the white radiance of this eternity was fractured into the variegation of the world. Each of the red, gold, and blue avenues that set out from the Theme Center, like rays from a white-hot but also lucidly cool sun, had its own color. At their ends these thoroughfares converged in the prism of Rainbow Avenue. The Fair’s layout follows the career of light from white immanence on high at its center to the polychrome hues of this world around the edges. This white city prohibited fear, anxiety, and mystery, the incubi of the dark. The Con Ed diorama boasted of their abolition: “This is / The City of Light, / Where night never comes.” This confidence was soon daunted. Even before the Fair had been dismantled, New York was subscribing to another image of itself—as a defiled and enshrouded place, a guilty city of immitigable night.
Conrad, p. 270.

Visual restrictions: “There shall be no signs in neon lights, no red lighting on any part of the building, and no names of exhibitors more than fifteen feet off the ground.” The result is that the Fair controls absolutely the integral effect of its own night-lighting and its own skyline as the designers conceived it. The crude glare of the average American city by night and the blatant hodgepodge of the skyline by day are, therefore, entirely subordinated as to civilized an effect of power and beauty, of significantly emphasized highlights, as any American has ever seen in any city in United States.

Harding, pp. 193-200.

The first general exposure to fluorescent lights. Throughout the grounds, white fluorescent tubes lit pathways. Colored fluorescent light backlit murals, illuminated signs, and highlighted walls. Whether concealed recessed, or ghosting structural details, they created sleek, striking effects.

Brox, p. 212.

Throughout the Fair, gas is used extensively in the form of open flames to secure that lambent movement and ruddy softness obtainable in no other way.

Monaghan, p. 39.

Preeminent among all the satisfying beauties to the average beholder is the lavish use of color. Under its spell great areas of wall surface lose their monotony and the flatness of buildings seldom more than fifty feet high is enlivened vitality and beauty. At night capillary mercury tubes and mercury vapor lamps are used on a scale that revolutionizes all our ideas of the use of light. A softened but brilliant radiance, with no glare or concentrated intensity, diffuses light over color in a way that makes the color produce its own life. The beauty of the central Ballet of the Fountains, where living flames play among the water jets, and streams of water fifty feet into the air as a hidden symphony orchestra players, color adds the final touch—one of the most superlatively beautiful sites we shall ever see. The fountains, played like a great organ, change from rose to amber to a rainbow of all colors to purest white again, in forms of dramatic and indescribable beauty.

Harding, p. 199.

Architecture / City

On the day the World's Fair opened, Mayor La Guardia nominated New York itself as one of the exhibits.

Kriendler, p. 119.
In view of the proximity of the Fair site to New York City with its towering skyscrapers, it was deemed absurd to build a "skyscraper" Fair. By way of contrast a "flat" exposition, consisting largely of one-story structures, was constructed.

Monaghan, p. 20.

There as an absolute conviction that buildings must be made to look what they are—temporary exhibit structures. No imitations either of historic architecture or imitations of permanent materials were permitted.

Ibid., p. 20.

Since it was decided to emphasize the frankly temporary nature of the buildings, they were constructed with large blank wall surfaces and without the superposition of meaningless architectural forms. The barren aspect of the blank surfaces was overcome through the application of sculpture, murals, and shadows cast by vines and tree groups arrange near the buildings... The Board of Design wished to achieve “unity without uniformity.”

Ibid., p. 21.

There are no windows in Fair-built buildings... because of the great amount of space that would be “lost” as exhibit space in the buildings if windows were installed. Another factor to be considered that the huge areas of glass in buildings in this climate would render them insufferably hot in summertime. Virtually all Fair-erected buildings are artificially illuminated and ventilated. (cf. Hawes: “Sutton Place building code: no windows north are allowed.” [Architecture])

Ibid., p. 20.

Both New York’s combustible summer and its libidinal night are laboratories for metamorphosis—of staid daytime citizens into savages of uncontrollable id; of the city, which the World’s Fair promised would be an electronic heaven, into our mutual hell, where the dark is aglow with flame, not light.

Conrad, p. 295.

Here a Glass House under a microscope shows how plumbing fixtures operate, how heat is created and conveyed through the house, and how you get water from faucets. The relationship of valves, fittings and piping to modern living.
Coming in, let us say, from the Interborough gate, on the northwest side, you get a breath-taking first impression of the amazing uses to which the architects of the Fair have put the tools of the present in projecting, on these once flat and dreary marshes, their ideals of the city of the future. Tall pylons carry the eye over the flat roofs of the exhibition buildings. Great domelike structures, bisected and connected on the flat side with huge ramps to the ground, invite you to the massive buildings of the big exhibitors. Arclike roofs resembling huge railway stations loom in the transportation section. Bold masses of color catch the light everywhere. Dominating the skyline, as you look from the adjacent Perisphere toward the massive bulk of the United States Government Building far down the central axis of the Fair, protrude the heroic statue of star-bearing young Russia, Italia seated on a pyramid throne, the bronze-hued glass tower of Poland, and the solid, superbly located mass of the British building. To the far left rises, like arococo mausoleum, the beautifully proportioned little turret of the League of Nations building; on the far right, across Fountain Lake, are the gemlike roofs and tortured ironwork of the Amusement Zone.

Harding, p. 193.

Politics

Palestine Exhibits, Inc.: Because of its significance as an answer to the charge of unproductiveness leveled against the Jew, the Palestine Exhibit has received the united support of the Jews of America.

Monaghan, p. 84.

In his dedication of the Palestine Pavilion at the 1939-40 New York World’s Fair, Albert Einstein criticized how the Fair “projected the world of men like a wishful dream” by exhibiting modern civilization’s “creative forces” while hiding its “sinister and destructive ones which today more than ever jeopardize the happiness, the very existence of civilized humanity.”

La Guardia proposed a Chamber of Horrors be built for the 1939 World’s Fair, depicting all that was evil in Nazi Germany.
Diehl, p. 19.

Mayor La Guardia announces that he will not allow Germany to mount an exhibit at the World's Fair next year, and if somehow Germany is able to have an exhibit that he will put a wax effigy of Adolf Hitler in a Museum of Horrors; he calls Hermann Goering a "perverted maniac." Goering vows to bomb New York from Governors Island to Rockefeller Center "to stop somewhat the mouths of the arrogant people over there." The German consulate in Manhattan demands police protection against possible attacks from angered Jews, and La Guardia sends Jewish cops to stand guard.

Trager, p. 506.

Conspicuously missing from the Hall of Nations is Germany. USSR, Italy and Japan are included.

Monaghan, p. 67.

A bomb that had been taken from the British Pavilion at the World's Fair exploded in the faces of four detectives, killing two of them. Bundists, Fascists or members of the Christian Front were suspected.

Duffy, Double Agent, p. 172.

Virtually all of the new urban and suburban spaces, from Levittown to Stuyvesant Town were racially segregated. Futurama and Democracity neither acknowledged nor attempted to redress these kinds of racial issues. Just as the Fair presented a brave new vision of the world of tomorrow, but only to those who could afford its steep admission fees and concession charges, post-WWII American urbanism also enabled the predominantly white middle-class to escape a little farther from the city while trapping other lower-class and racial minorities within embattled inner-city ghettos. Thus the Fair's utopian promises were both selectively made and selectively fulfilled.

Seminole Village Indians recognize no authority other than that vested in their chiefs, and consequently are permitted to have their own police force and jail at the Fair.

Monaghan, p. 50.

The American religion paraded its eschatological predictions and deep utopian faith most memorably and definitively at the 1939 New York World's Fair. The Fair was a credo in stucco and steel... as such that World's Fair is important to any credible effort at deciphering modern America... it is essential that we understand Democracity city if we are to understand the Fair... Democracity's utopian world of tomorrow amounts, in essence, to the modern suburbs.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 27.

La Guardia's pre-World's Fair crackdown on gay bars in the 1930s.

Exhibit

Here are strange people from remote lands which you have read about: pygmies, for instance, from the dark forests of central Africa, where mysterious rivers flow in the eternal shadow of impenetrable foliage; Ubangi tribesmen from French Equatorial Africa, strange black beings with enormous distended lips; headhunters, too... fierce savages from Masambo and the Congo; and here you may stare in awe at the giraffe-necked women from Padeung, in the mysterious north of India.

Monaghan, p. 33.

Frank (Bring 'em Back Alive) Buck has made his greatest capture. He has brought the whole jungle back alive to the Fair. Here are thousands of rare specimens of wild life from the jungles... 1,000 rhesus monkey living on a miniature mountain... Apart from the jungle camp inhabited by native hunters there is a special feature exhibit of trained animals where it is shown to what extent savage beasts can be "educated."

Nature's Mistakes: An assemblage of animal freaks from all corners of the world... housed in an auditorium with a maze-like pit area where the freaks move about in seeming freedom. There you see a hog without any ham, a bull with elephant feet, a steer with its heart in its neck, a cat with 28 toes and 28 claws, a bull with human skin (so transparent that veins are visible, insured by Lloyd's of London for $15,000)... None of these animals have been mutilated to make freaks.

Strange As It Seems: Founded on the familiar publications of John Hix in newspapers throughout the country, the show comprises thirty-two acts featuring the strange people depicted in the cartoons by Mr. Hix. Here also are showcases filled with curious objects obtained from all over the world. The show includes genuine Igerots, savage natives from North Luzon, Philippine Islands; pygmies from Batwa, Central Africa (the smallest human beings known); genuine Duckbill Ubangis from Shari country, French Equatorial Africa; headhunters from Congo and Masambo; the Jivaro and Phantom Indians of Ecuador; two genuine natives of the Cameroons, their faces covered with tribal makings; six Icelandic albinos, with white hair and pink eyes; giraffe-necked women from Padeung, north-eastern section of India; and two Romanian sister giantesses, the tallest women in the world.

Ibid., pp. 51-2.

The Infant Incubator Company Building (Skidmore and Owings, John Moss) was a structure designed to take care of premature babies. 8,000 babies are brought into the World's Fair to live for the first few weeks of their lives.

Ibid., p. 57.

We Humans: This is neither a mystery show nor one offering gruesome thrills, but is nature is such that it mustn't be divulged ahead of time. This much may be said, however: you'll enjoy We Humans, a biological surprise exhibit.

Ibid., p. 64.

A galaxy of midget stars dressed in immaculate white costumes... offering a variety of entertainment. Between performances they are kept busy packing giant cartons of "Krispy Crackers" and other Sunshine products.

Ibid., p. 82.

Living Magazine Covers: Jack Sheridan's eight-minute show presents beautiful girls in person whom the artists for magazine covers have made nationally famous. The show is accompanied by music and trick lighting. Titles identify the magazines represented.

Ibid., p. 44.

In a block of ice appears a living model who tells the story of refrigeration of tomorrow.

Ibid., p. 82.
Clad in an abbreviated bathing suit, a beautiful girl is entombed in a solid cake of crystal-clear ice weighing 1,400 pounds. Without resorting to legerdemain or any special preparations this young woman is able to remain for long periods at a time in her frigid person. Special lighting and the clearness of the ice enable you to observe the Arctic Girl closely, and by means of a microphone and amplifiers you may converse with her. Only her ability to produce self-hypnosis makes possible this seeming, icy contradiction.

True enough, stalwart Amazons do not stalk militantly over a gigantic, legendary country but pursue arts and sports... young athletic women whose sole purpose is to display the harmony and beauty of the perfect feminine physique in action. Dressed as gladiators they perform.

Famous industrial designer Norman Bel Geddes uses one-way mirrors in a circular room thirty feet in diameter. A single dancing girl appears to be a whole chorus of World’s Fairettes. Six hundred people are able to see the show from three levels through the transparent-reflecting glass walls, which repeat the image at least sixty times.

The Consumers Building is, indeed, the most nearly empty shell of all.

Harding, p. 196.

The nickel is a coin no one recognizes at the Fair.

The Fair pipes in city water free and charges what the concessionaires consider a stiff price for it.

For the first time the salesman is subordinate to the industrial designer, engineer, the architect, scientist, and the research man.

Celotex Traffic Top, a “new material that takes the strain out of walking” covers the Fair. “It is safe to say that this innovation has done its part to reverse the familiar expression often heard at previous fairs—"I’m too tired, let’s go home” to “Let’s stay and see the show.” (cf. Kasson on Luna Park’s disdain for seated customers: “When people sat down, they would immediately dispatch a band of musicians to the scene in attempt to rouse their customer’s spirits and thus bring them to their feet.” [Coney Island])

Ibid., p. 56.

The Borden exhibit sells Mel-o-rols, highly engineered ice cream cones, flat on the bottom, designed to accept a horizontal cylinder of vanilla, chocolate or strawberry ice cream on top.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 28.

Simulacra

The Fair’s urban dioramas simply expressed an already existent, widespread, popular desire for their utopian urbanism without adequately considering how the Fair’s spectacular urban simulacra also helped construct and produce that desire.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 37.

The predominance of nostalgia in 1939: “The tintype photographer is on hand to portray visitors as they would have looked in 1853, 1876, 1893 and 1915. The mustachioed soda fountain clerk dispenses the soda delights of bygone eras.”

Monaghan, p. 41.

Under the supervision of George Jessel, famous actor, Old New York presents an entertainment program staged and styled in the manner of The Gay Nineties. Here is New York of a bygone era, its streets lighted by gas; horsecars, hansom cabs, and patrol wagons clatter over its cobblestones... In the ghetto restaurant, short orders of food are relayed to the cook in the most amusing manner, while “Nigger” Mike features a score of singing waiter. Other attractions include... a police station and night court where rowdies and petty offenders are tried.

Ibid., p. 48.

Jessel sometimes appeared in blackface in his Vaudeville shows. By the late 1960s he had gained a reputation as being overly indulgent in reminiscing about former companions who were little known by a younger audiences. Walter Winchell once said of him, “That son of a bitch started to reminisce when he was eight years old.”

“George Jessel (actor).” Wikipedia.

Morris Gest’s Little Miracle Town, occupying 36,000 square feet was brought over from Europe by a specially chartered ship. A miniature community, complete in every detail even to the diminutive organ in the church, its one hundred and twenty-five midget inhabitants have their own tiny restaurant, their city hall, their own theatre, art gallery, and railroad station. Other features include a midget circus, motion picture studio, garage, radio station, ballroom, guard barracks, Punch and Judy show, and toy and doll factory. Morris Gest toured all Europe to secure the greatest “little people” for Little Miracle Town.

_Ibid._, p. 44.

In February of 1921, Gest filed a $5,000,000 damage suit against Henry Ford for an article, “How Jews Capitalized a Protest Against Jews,” which had referred to him as “a Russian Jew who has produced the most salacious spectacles ever shown in America,” and which accused him of abandoning his Russian parents. Mr. Gest was livid, saying to the press, “I’ll make that Peace Ship Henry pay dearly for what he said, and more, I’ll make him eat his own words.” In an official response, Liebold responded simply, “Mr. Gest will be ignored.” The suit was eventually abandoned. [Unrest] [Anti-Semitism]

Ford, “How Jews,” N. pag..

Located in the rear of a Fair building is the only wheat field sown and cultivated in New York City in 68 years.

Monaghan, p. 86.

Sun Valley: Here, throughout the summer, a snowstorm is realistically depicted every evening.

_Ibid._, p. 66.

The road to Tomorrow leads through the chimney pots of Queens. It’s a long familiar journey, through Mulsified Shampoo and Mobilgas, through Bliss Street, Kix, Astring-O-Sol, and the Majestic Auto Seat Covers... through Musterole and the delicate pink blossoms on the fruit trees in the ever-hopeful back yards of the populous borough, past Zemo, Alka-Seltzer... and the clothes that fly bravely on the line under the trees with the new little green leaves in Queens’ incomparable springtime.

Brox, p. 211.
For E.B. White, the Fair seemed to be "merely Heinz jousting with Beech-Nut—the same old contest on a somewhat larger field with accommodations for more spectators, and rather better facilities all around."

Art

The New York cultural avant-garde almost unanimously opposes International Style modernist corporate skyscrapers on both aesthetic and political grounds. What others see as a brave, new utopian city—the rationalized, radiant, rectilinear city of tomorrow promised by the World's Fair—the avant-garde attacks as a brutal inscription of the political economy of post World War II corporate America.
Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 54.

1939 marks the appearance of William de Kooning and Arshele Gorky [sic] as muralists at The Fair.
Monaghan, N. pag..

de Kooning receives a commission to design one of three murals for the Hall of Pharmacy at the World's Fair... The Hall of Pharmacy is allotted an auspicious location just off the Long Island Expressway, which skirts the fairgrounds.
Stevens & Swan, pp. 149, 151.

Salvador Dalí's Living Pictures: A series of living pictures, executed in three dimensions... In front of the spectator is a long animated panorama that includes a thirty-foot glass and steel tank filled with water, at the bottom of which is a room from a "Dream House." (c.f. La Monte Young's years'-long light and sound installation of the same name, begun 1994). Lovely diving girls plunge into the tank and by their actions seem to reveal the secrets of some dreams. The representations includes Dalí's famous "Soft Watches," "Piano Women," "Anthropomorphic Seaweed," Exploding Giraffes," a cow at the bottom of the sea, a couch in the shape of Garbo's lips, and of course his "Living Liquid Ladies."
Monaghan, p. 49.

Dalí's "Dream of Venus" provides a prototype for the complex aesthetic strategies that the post-WWII New York avant-garde developed to deconstruct the neo-Corbusian restricting of. The opposition between the Fair’s technorational urban dioramas and Dali’s surrealistic architecture not only illustrates an incipient form of the cultural antagonisms that subsequently emerged in, but it also helps demonstrate how the historical evolution of the post-WWII New York avant-garde was intimately connected to an on-going intellectual discussion about the nature of both space in general and urban space in particular.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 48.

Replica of Harlem’s Savoy Ballroom. Performers include Chick Webb, Erskine Hawkins, Duke Ellington and Johnny [sic] Lunceford.

Monaghan, p. 49.

Conducted by The Academy of American Poets, the contest for the Official Poems of the New York World’s Fair closed on March 15, 1939. 6,175 manuscripts were received. These came from every state and from American citizens living in Great Britain, Italy, France, Finland and Peru... The poem was judged by William Rose Benét, Theodore Roosevelt and Louis Untermeyer.

Academy, N. pag.

The names of the final poems: “World of Tomorrow,” “The World of Tomorrow,” “The World of Tomorrow,” “Tomorrow,” and “Tomorrow, America.”

Ibid.

The official poems was “World of Tomorrow” by Pearl E. Levison (P. Earl), later known as Pearl London. The poem was read on the radio by Orson Welles, with whom she was photographed.

Ibid.

“World of Tomorrow” by Pearl E. Levison
Here on island (O connect here for all points of your travel)
With many bridges extending: Triborough, Queensboro Brooklyn, Manhattan, Whitestone, iron harps suspended: Here at hub of island with many spokes converging: Radio, cable, wire bearing more than sparrow; Train, bus, tug, trawler, clipper with bellied sail, This is the achievement: this is tomorrow.

Ibid.
Probably more kinds of beauty were concentrated in the World of Tomorrow (1939-40) than had ever been seen by mortal eyes.
Rodgers, p. 345.

Coda

Sometimes at night I lie awake in the dark and try to recapture the vision and sound of The World of Tomorrow. I try to remember how the pastel lighting glowed on Mad Meadow in Flushing: soft greens, orange, yellow, and red; blue moonglow on the great Perisphere and on the ghostly soaring Trylon. I think with a sense of sweetened pain of nights when I sat by Flushing River and saw The World of Tomorrow reflected on its onyx surface, in full color, and upside down. I try to recall the sounds, the carillon from the Garden of the Netherlands, chimes from Belgium’s Tower. I know now that under the white carnation won by Grover Whalen, Great White Feather of The Fen, beat the heart of a major poet. I muse, sometimes, on the distant day when archeologists shall dig up the Time Capsule where the Westinghouse Building stood on the Fair Grounds. I wonder if they will be able to reconstruct the Great White Father’s World as it really was, if they will be able to picture it swarming with pilgrims awed by his handiwork, if they will realize it was a place somewhat more astonishing than the world into which Alice stepped on the far side of the looking glass.
Berger, Eight Million, p. 247.

Externally, the Grand Central Terminal resembled a Palace of Industry in some nonexistent World’s Fair. But was not New York itself becoming the universal expositions, the world’s international playground?
N. cit.

It is possible that the final city, the City of Tomorrow only faintly visible in the embryo of New York, will be so constructed that the cost, in energy, to maintain life, will be less then at an outside point? On an average, people assembled in cities eat too much, if statistics are true. In the future city this may be changed. Ideal air and temperature balances will reduce the desire for caloric feeding. There will be less close eating and more idealistic drinking, not necessarily alcoholic; maybe a matter of skin absorption through gaseous as well as liquid painting. The common plate of ham and beans will eventually go into the garbage can, to the delight of billions of unborn hogs and the abolition of our reeking slaughterhouses.

Reisenberg, p. 64.

Within a few days after Pearl Harbor, the Japanese Pavilion at the World’s Fair was dismantled ... The famous Japanese Garden in Brooklyn’s Botanical Garden would be renamed the Oriental Garden ... A Japanese garden, one of the twelve that made up Rockefeller Center’s “Gardens of the Nations” located on a setback on the eleventh floor of the RCA Building, was shorn of its chrysanthemums and replaced by a Chinese garden dedicated to Madame Chiang Kai-shek.

Diehl, pp. 67-8.

Con Edison’s “Edison Man,” a quarter-ton brass, copper and aluminum sculpture that was a part of the “City of Light” exhibit at the 1939 World’s Fair was sacrificed during WWII.

Diehl, p. 165.

The Trylon and Perisphere were demolished and melted down to make weapons during World War II.

Samuel, p. 18.

At dawn, now, night herons flap over the marshes to feed in the waters on Grover Whalen’s vanished World of Tomorrow on Flushing Meadow. Pheasants light in tall, swaying meadow grasses to hunt for weed seeds and for insects. Cottontails break from brush and hedge; show their white flags in hoppity flight. Beside the rustic summer house on the edge of the old Gardens on Parade—the Queens Botanic Gardens now—a wild duck has laid seven large eggs in ground ivy. A few weeks ago majestic swans sailed down from April skies to light in Flushing Creek. Wee things creep in the grass. Wild birds whistle and flute in old Fair-ground trees. Fishermen plod to the meadow to dangle bait in the creek, in old Fountain Lake and in Willow Lake just beyond the stretch where the Amusement Center made brazen clamor nineteen years ago. The anglers catch carp, catfish and sunnies. In twilight, frogs swell their throats in batrachian chorus. From early morning into early evening, from fifty to sixty old men and women come each day to the Meadow with burlap bags slung from their shoulders to search in dandelion-starred greensward for dandelion greens and for button mushrooms. They look like Millet’s rustics—figures in “The Gleaners” and “The Angelus.” Park Department foresters prune the Meadow’s pin oaks, red maples and weeping willows on the 1,200 odd acres where Mr. Whalen's gardener-army planted them nineteen years ago. The paved roads that ran between glowing World Fair pavilions are carefully patched, but weeds grow in the cracks as in a ghost city. The new World's Fair in Brussels seems to have made people think of yesterday's World of Tomorrow. They wander on the Meadow in vain search for the buildings that wrote lambent loveliness against the sky there in 1939 and 1940. Only two structures still stand: the Building of the City of New York and Billy Rose's Aquacade. The city operates roller- and ice skating rinks in the New York building at night and police rookies study there by day. On summer nights, water shows are staged in the Aquacade and children use the pool up to noon. But of the dream houses that stood in the meadow—the Futurama, the pallid Trylon and Perisphere, all the pastel pavilions—there is no sign. Local hausfraus set up easels and paint the gardens and the lakes. Amateur botanists, including women deep in the winter years, look after the rock-garden plantings. One great patch near the old Gardens on Parade throbs with the color of 12,000 enormous tulips, a gift of Louis Dupuy, a greenhouse man in Whitestone. Azaleas flame at wide intervals over the whole meadow. No other green spot so close to granite-towered Manhattan has quite the sylvan lure of the old Fair grounds. It is a place to dream on a spring or summer day among the grasses, beside the creek or on the lake banks, with bird music pulsing all about. El train rumble comes in like mild thunder from the Roosevelt Avenue trestle, but only after wide silences. By-and-by you come upon a dark marble cylinder that reaches up out of the meadow. Its inscription says: "This Time Capsule deposited fifty feet beneath this spot by the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company on September 23, 1938. Preserving for The Future a record of the History, Faiths, Arts, Sciences and Customs of the People then alive... Scientists and Engineers designed it, Scholars chose its contents... to endure for 5,000 years."

1960 not only seemed like a brilliant, glittering, dream from the perspective of 1939, but looking back, 1960 was a brilliant glittering dream. The Fair kept its promises. So many of its predictions came true.

Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 36.
Postscript

And the "Rhapsody in Blue" orchestration swells. The film cuts to a magnificent skyline of Manhattan, the early-morning sun casting it almost in silhouette; the sun sets in another, a different, skyline, and, finally, Manhattan is shown at night, its buildings and bridges illuminated with thousands of lights. "Rhapsody in Blue" reaches a crescendo as the film cuts to a black background, white credits popping on and off the screen.

Allen & Brickman, Manhattan, p. 271.
Part 2
Interlude

At 5 A.M. Manhattan is a town of tired trumpet players and homeward-bound bartenders. Pigeons control Park Avenue and strut unchallenged in the middle of the street. Most night people are out of sight—but the day people have not yet appeared.
Talese, pp. 9-11.

At 5 A.M. the Broadway regulars have gone home or to all-night coffee shops where, under the glaring light, you see their whiskers and wear... You also see cleaning lades going home, always wearing kerchiefs.
Ibid., pp. 9-11.

We would watch the sky lighten and have a last drink with no ice and then go home in the early morning light, when the streets were clean and wet (had it rained in the night? we never knew) and the few cruising taxis still had their headlights on and the only color was the red and green of the traffic signals... I liked the bleak branches above Washington Square at dawn, and the monochromatic flatness of Second Avenue, the fire escapes and the grilled storefronts peculiar and empty in their perspective.

Toward dawn, as if released at the rasp of iron hinges, succubae and incubi fly out: nightmare thoughts, in check during the day, point with skeletal fingers to remorse, death, and vanity, their victims everywhere—tossing alone in bed, staring at the ceiling beside a snoring stranger, or plodding home after the bartender jerks on the lights and watched the deflated customers file out.
Caldwell, p. 2.

As late as even five o’clock the milk man in the quiet streets is a symbol and mystery. By six o’clock he is a common purveyor.
Strunsky, p. 706.

Down below, there flows the stream of humanity. At first, before dawn, there is a blackish-purplish mass of Negroes, who carry out the most arduous and dismal tasks.
Mayakovsky, America, p. 47.

At 5 A.M. it is mostly quiet. New York is an entirely different city at 5 A.M.
Talese, pp. 9-11.

It is five a.m. Something of the burden of the city has been lifted. The air is light. The heart seems freed. I feel happy to be walking. I love the space and the quietness. I have got rid of the idea of going to bed, got rid of the routine of daily life. New York and its millions, its wealth, its mysteries, are mine. There is a sense of conquest. The bustle has died down and I am still walking. The majority of people are asleep—but I am not the least sleepy. It seems as if life has just begun. I am dancing on a springed floor.
Graham, pp. 36-52.

Five A.M. and waiting for the light at Times Square, a black guy runs up to my window.
Weideman, p. 9.
Open Air Canteen at Broadway and 47th Street at five in the morning. Bryant Park... same time.
Weegee, Naked, pp. 30-1.

5:23 A.M. The sky is gray-blue now. Empty buildings stand like cardboard cutouts against the slowly brightening day. A sleeper on one of the benches stretches slowly. The day is at hand.
Philips, p. 28.

The sun has barely come up even with the rooftops.

Few city residents awake to see the sunrise. Almost no one notices the daily rise and fall of the tides on the Hudson River.
Mittlebach, p. 1.

The sunrises (I saw them) are admirable: in a violet fog or dull atmosphere the solar fanfare bursts forth like a salvo, raw and clean, on the surface of one tower, then another, then many others. An Alpine spectacle which lights up the vast horizon of the city. Rose crystals, rose stone. There are tiaras over it, sometimes gold-colored, and not at all comic in effect but often beautiful.
Corbusier, p. 66.

It is about five-thirty in the morning. We drive down lower Broadway. There are two black doors at 653. We go in the door. It was Infinity. There are two thousand guys.
Haden-Guest, p. 16.

Creatures of the night, they cower and dissolve the incoming of the light. The yellow glare of their oil-torches and the ghastly violet-blue of their vacuum tubes pale, flicker, and go out before the onrush of dawn.
Strunsky, p. 697.

When the long attended hour of sunrise approaches, the they are appalled by the absence of even the slightest indication of the reappearance of the orb of day. There is no lightening of the dense cloak of darkness, and the great city seems dead.
Serviss, p. 60.

Dawn in New York groans on enormous fire escapes
Reznikoff, p. 97.

At 6 A.M. the early workers begin to push up from the subways. The traffic begins to move down Broadway like a river.
Talese, pp. 9-11.

Have you ever arisen at dawn or earlier in New York and watched the outpouring in the meaner side-streets or avenues? It is a wondrous thing. It seems to have so little to do with the later, showier, brisker life of the day, and yet it has so very much. It is in the main so drab or shabby-smart at best, poor copies of what you see done more efficiently later in the day. Typewriter girls in almost stage or society costumes entering shabby offices; boys and men made up to look like actors and millionaires turning into the humblest institutions, where they are clerks or managers. These might be called the machinery of the city, after the elevators and street cars and wagons are excluded, the implements by which things are made to go.
  Dreiser, p. 5.

Six in the morning. Thunder and rain. It’s dark, and it’ll stay dark until midday.
  Mayakovsky, America, p. 46.

The gray of dawn overtakes the armies from the markets, the car- barns, and the excavation pits in full retreat from the ferries, the bridges, and along the main arteries to the crowded sections where the early risers live. They scatter in every direction, weary, heavy-eyed, with no sense of defeat in their souls. They throng to the ferries to lose themselves in the mysterious wilds of Jersey. Their cavalry and train rumbles down empty Broadway to South Ferry. The pour eastward toward the bridges where they lose themselves in the sellers and ramshackle corner booths of the East Side. They plunge into the subway and, stretched out at full length in the illuminated spaciousness of the Interborough’s cars, they pass off into the sleep which falls alike upon the just and unjust, contrary to general supposition… The beauty of New York rising to meet a new day is for these lowly workers, and for the unfortunates who stay out in the night not to work but to sleep, because night in the open are their refuge.
  Strunsky, pp. 704-5.

As daylight begins to fall on the city, their buckets will clatter in the halls, and downstairs their hollow voices will echo through the marble corridors.
  Talese, pp. 33-35.

He says, I wonder what the red sky means. I look up and the sky has a red pale glow on the bellies of clouds. It is getting towards dawn.
  Wojnarowicz, p. 175.

The tremulous milky gray of the firmament followed by the red flush of daylight is reserved in New York for the truck-farmer from the suburbs, the drayman, the food-vendors, and the early factory hands. For them only is the beauty of New York as it heaves up out of the shadows.
  Strunsky, p. 704.

The first light of the morning outlines the towers of the World Trade Center at the tip of the island. You turn in the other direction and start uptown. There are cobbles on the street where the asphalt has worn through. You think of the wooden shoes of the first Dutch settlers on these same stones. Before that, Algonquin braves stalking game along silent trails.
  McInerney, p. 180.

The slow dawn is beginning to be apparent on the outer traces of horizon, I am thinking mass energy, white fields of light, protective energy, the voices get closer, feel claustrophobic on the edge of the great river on the edge of the great city, massive distances come and gone, the great endless sky and feels claustrophobic like, no place to run.
  Wojnarowicz, p. 123.
It is now almost six in the morning… it is still dark… but the church is open… and the early morning worshippers find solace inside… except for this tired Sunday traveler who, a few blocks away, finds a resting place under the canopy at number 711 Amsterdam Avenue. This avenue is full of saloons, and they are called just that… no fancy foreign names like Cocktail Lounges… So sleep on stranger… no one will bother you… not even the cops… Sunday is a good day for sleeping—so is any other day—when one is tired.

The dawn is on its way up with lightening colors of sky, a rusty tinge of red-orange coming up behind the factory across the way, the one past the next pier, the two simultaneous stacks almost merged with one another in the perspective of sight and growing a brown brick color, emerging from the darkness into the coming dawn, shadows slowly easing away, the water with small almost indiscernible flickering lines, like schools of fish just beneath the surface racing along and surging but not yet moving further but where they are, turmoils of water.

Wojnarowicz, p. 124.

What moves me most, I guess of a sunlit morning is being alone with everyone I love crossing 6th and 1st at ice-cold 6 a.m. from where I come home with two French donuts, Pepsi and the New York Times.

Berrigan, p. 149.

Watch the intense visuals of dawn, the elevated structure of the Westside Highway and the burning lampposts, the incineration of the dawn, the backdrop domelike sky over the city lightening and the water turning to an azure blue, to turquoises and silvers, the merging of blood rust reds into the surfaces as if dawn were a flaming vehicle come rolling down across the plains and highways to step slowly into the river of time, the Indian giver of moments, the pulling in and the pushing forward, the continuance of senses, the changes that have rolled up and in and pulled me along since my return from the quiet city of Paris, the lonesome city and the darkness that shuts off my sense of abandonment in that faraway place.

Wojnarowicz, p. 124.

The sun heaves up from its sleeping-place somewhere in the vicinity of Flatbush, an extremely early riser.

Strunsky, p. 697.

Across Times Square while the sky shows its first real signs of light, I see the clock on the New York Times building: 6:16.

Already at six and six-thirty in the morning they have begun to trickle small streams of human beings Manhattan or city-ward.

Dreiser, p. 7.
dragging themselves through the negro streets at dawn looking for an angry fix
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

In the now gathering dawn and somewhere out there are two huge metal barges filled with stuff I can’t make out, bobbing and drifting in the river as huge waves pulled in from passing tugs and barges and small ships and the moon long gone and the open doorways of the warehouse across the way revealing orange.
Wojnarowicz, pp. 124-5.

Maybe it is the dark light of dawn just as the sun is rising in the east but buried behind buildings, maybe it’s midnight, the light qualities fluctuate.
Ibid., p. 223.

Cold rosy dawn in New York City
Berrigan, p. 127.

We lay there for some slow minutes with our hands beneath our heads staring up: large mobile clouds with reddish tinge to their bellies and the jigsaw sections of turquoise sky behind them, shuttering for moments until they were once again covered, one spire way up catching the gradually warming light of dawn way east of the river and tenements. The yard was still filled with a descending night, like some old Magritte scene.
Wojnarowicz, p. 177.

A new day dawns living.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Toward seven, it’s an uninterrupted flow of lights. On they go, in the direction of their hundreds of thousands, to their places of work. But their resinated yellow waterproofs sizzle and glitter like innumerable samovars in the electric light—running wet, yet inextinguishable, even under this rain.
Mayakovsky, America, p. 47.

Look at them flowing into the city’s lower parts in the morning rush. The downtown region sops them up as dry bread lifts the gravy from a platter.
Reisenberg, p. 28.

By seven and seven-fifteen these streams have become sizable affairs.
Dreiser, p. 7.

Movement of the city regiments and the commuting storm troopers, in and out of the business citadels takes a fifth of the “working” day.
Reisenberg, p. 70.

Alternating magnet and ejector of commuters.
Ibid., p. 207.

Great silent weeping stream of people in the canyon streets.
Donleavy, N. pag.
No rush, no hurry. Only slow movement. Yet all are surely and gradually slipping away.
Dreiser, p. 10.

By seven-thirty and eight they have changed into heavy, turbulent rivers.
Ibid., p. 7.

With the morning sun on them, the apartment buildings far to the west, on Lexington Avenue, look like an orange mesa.
Maxwell, p. 3.

It is 7:53 Friday morning in the Universe
New York City to be somewhat exact I’m in my room wife gone working Gallup fucking in the room below had 17½ milligrams desoxyn

A Scarsdale commuter station where the passengers, reading newspapers to use the time in waiting, line up at the spots on the platform where they know the doors of their train will open; once aboard, they return to their papers, and each car becomes an informal study-group in current events.
Conrad, p. 249.

At eight-thirty they are raging torrents, no less. They overflow all the streets and avenues and every available means of conveyance. They are pouring into all available doorways, shops, factories, office-buildings—those huge affairs towering so significantly above them.
Dreiser, p. 7.

It’s 8:54 a.m. in Brooklyn it’s the 28th of July and it’s probably 8:54 in Manhattan but I’m in Brooklyn I’m eating English muffins and drinking pepsi and I’m thinking of how Brooklyn is New York city too how odd I usually think of it as something all its own like Bellows Falls like Little Chute like Uijongbu
Berrigan, p. 117.

Wall Street and Broadway, shortly before nine o’clock in the morning. The empty streets fill suddenly with swift-moving clerks, tellers, stenographers, and office boys pouring from subways, ferries, and elevated trains; while bankers and brokers arrive almost as promptly in chauffeured automobiles or by planes landing at a ramp near the foot of Wall Street.
WPA Guide, p. 86.

By 9:30, the crowd flows along, inundating the apertures to the underground protruding into the covered thoroughfares to the airborne trains, and racing through the air at a height in double- and triple-decker parallel overhead trains.
Mayakovsky, America, p. 48.

Here they stay all day long, causing those great hives and their adjacent streets to flush with a softness of color not indigenous to them.
It's ten-fifty when you get to Times Square. You come up on Seventh Avenue blinking. The sunlight is excessive. You grope for your shades. Down Forty-second Street, through the meat district. Every day the same spiel from the same old man: "Girls, girls, girls—check 'em out, check 'em out. Take a free look, gentlemen. Check it out, check it out." The words and rhythm never vary. Kinky Karla, Naughty Lola, Sensational Live Revue—girls, girls, girls.

If your eyes could penetrate the opaque masses of the façades at 11 a.m., they would see an incredible spectacle: three hundred thousand, five hundred thousand men and women—perhaps more—at work in a pool of space at the same time. A humanity having broken its millenary destiny which was to be attached to the ground, which is suspended between heaven and earth, going up and down at high speed in clusters of twenty and in sheaves of two hundred. Is it a new scene in purgatory?

At the hour of noon light suddenly broke overhead. Beginning in a round patch enclosed in an iridescent halo, it spread swiftly, seeming to melt its way down through the thick, dark mass that choked the air, and in less than fifteen minutes New York and all its surroundings emerged into the golden light of noonday.

It is 12:10 in New York. In Houston it is 2 p.m. It is time to steal books.

The lunchtime crowd churns Park Avenue.

It is 12:20 in New York a Friday three days after Bastille day, yes it is 1959 and I go get a shoeshine because I will get off the 4:19 in Easthampton at 7:15 and then go straight to dinner and I don't know the people who will feed me.

From twelve noon until about two-thirty, there is a carnival. Since the place has an appetite like a hundred anacondas, food is eaten by the carload; beauty shops and barber shops seethe; merchandise is purchased and sold in staggering amounts and the sound of money changing hands can be heard all over the place.

Standing in the waterfront bar, having stopped for a beer in midafternoon, smoky sunlight fading in through the large plate-glass windows and a thumping roll of music beating invisibly in the air...

The city traffic in the afternoon, people standing on street corners, streets filled with cars and buses humming, and even through it was overcast there was some startling nature to the light, everything graphic in detail, a heavy sense of rain in the cool air.
After two-thirty the restaurants gradually become empty, the shops are vacant, the streets sparsely filled.
Atkinson, p. 95.

At three o’clock, an air of suspended animation between the morning and evening rush hours.
Morris, Incredible, p. 299.

in the warm New York 4 o’clock light we are drifting back and forth between each other like a tree breathing through its spectacles.
O’Hara, p. 360.

I remember “four o’clocks.” (A flower that closes at four.)

Already, at four o’clock, the somber hues of night are over all. A heavy snow is falling, a fine, picking, whipping snow, borne forward by a swift wind in long, thin lines. The street is bedded with it, six inches of cold, soft carpet, churned brown by the crush of teams that the feet of men. Along the Bowery men slouch through it with collars up and hats pulled over their ears.
Dreiser, p. 228.

And of an early winter afternoon—the time for which I most lovingly remember the El, for the color of the sky as it fell through those painted windows, and the beauty of the snow on the black cars and iron rails and tar roofs we saw somewhere off Brooklyn Bridge—when the country stove next to the change booth blazed and blazed as some crusty old woman with a pince-nez gave out change, and the heavy turnstiles crashed with a roar inside the wooden shed—then, among the darkly huddled crowds waiting to go out to the train, looking out on Brooklyn Bridge all dark sweeping cable lines under the drifts of snow, I pretended those were gaslights I saw in the streets below.
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 678.

Late one afternoon, while waiting for a Fifth Avenue bus, I noticed a taxi stop across the street to let out a girl who ran up the steps of the Forty-second Street public library.
Capote, p. 45.

At five p.m., the foot of the buildings the revolving doors are whirling like crazy wheels, each fan blowing out human beings on to the sidewalk. In Europe there are no crowds. One must go to Asia or come here to get the feel of that air-current, that unsubstantial monster, impersonal and cowardly and tender, calling for the death of a black boxer, writhing for love before the coffin of Valentino, mourning a father before the bier of Lincoln, welcoming a bridegroom in Lindbergh.
Morand, p. 509-17.

It is growing dark. Great white lights are throwing a magic glare over streets and buildings. All the windows of the palaces and great buildings glow with light. Mysterious shadows come and go. Nothing seems real. Am I awake or am I dreaming?
Sharpe, p. 229.
It’s a Wednesday but outside feels Mondayish and the city looks vaguely unreal, there’s a sky like from October 1973 or something hanging over it and right now at 5:30.
Ellis, Glamorama, p. 18.

The flood streams up Broadway, washes over Brooklyn Bridge, invades the “L”—as the Elevated Railroad is called—and swamps the subway stations. Then an individual order follows this momentary chaos; some stop before the newspaper display windows where the fleeting newsstrips announce that Trotsky is going to settle at Monte Carlo, or congregate round the special editions which pile up at the street-crossings, or make for suburban repose, for the cottage or bungalow with its aerial on the roof and its artificial flowers, or for supper at the Y.M.C.A., while others seek their aspirations in the great luminous halo of the cinemas and theaters of Times Square and the Forties.
Morand, p. 509-17.

From five until seven is the most boisterous, the most congested time. To those who have finished work, there can also be added the shoppers, male and female, and simply the flâneur.

I have seen it in the sunset from a bridge, majestic above its waters, its incredible peaks and pyramids rising flowerlike and delicate from pools of violet mist to play with the flaming clouds and the first stars of evening. Then it lights up window by window above the shimmering tides where lanterns nod and glide and deep horns bay weird harmonies, and has itself become a starry firmament of dream, redolent of faery music, and one with the marvels of Carcassonne and Samarcand and El Dorado and all glorious and half-fabulous cities.
Lovecraft, p. 295.

One more slight spasm of trade after five o’clock when the commuters begin passing on their way to the suburbs. But after that everywhere is as dark and silent as the grave.
Atkinson, p. 95.

The sun’s moved to Jersey, the sun’s behind Hoboken.

Covers are clicking on typewriters, rolltop desks are closing; elevators go up empty, come down jammed. It’s ebbtide in the downtown district, flood in Flatbush, Woodlawn, Dyckman Street, Sheepshead Bay, New Lot Avenue, Canarsie.

Pink sheets, green sheets, gray sheets, FULL MARKET REPORTS, FINALS ON HAVERE DE GRACE. Print squirms among the shopworn officewear sagging faces, sore fingertips aching insteps, strongarm men cram into subway expresses. SENATORS 8, GIANTS 2, DIVA RECOVERS PEARLS, $800,000 ROBBERY.

It’s ebbtide on Wall Street, floodtide in the Bronx.
The sun’s gone down in Jersey.
Dos Passos, p. 169.

That most magical moment of the day when the buildings around Central Park are still visible in a blue mist, the lights simultaneously shining at every window.
Evening falls. The skyscrapers, these great presses of humanity, disgorge their exhausted contents. The vertical arrangement of individuals will now give way to the new, horizontal arrangement for night-time.
Morand, p. 509-17.

At six, they are going, pouring forth over the bridges and through the subways and across the ferries and out on the trains, until the last drop of them appears to have been exuded, and they are pocketed in some outlying side-street or village or metropolitan hall-room—and the great, turbulent night of the city is on once more.
Dreiser, p. 7.

Near sunset, the clouds, the long bridges, the tops of some of the structures on the Queens shore, and the bridges of the ships are brushed with rose, while the grayish water turns slowly to ink.
Philips, p. 136.

The sky is bleeding now onto 57th Street of the 20th Century & HORN & HARDART’S

A setting sun sending shadows east.
Donleavy, N. pag.

Tonite I walked out of my red apartment door on East Tenth Street’s dusk—
Walked out of my home ten years, walked out in my honking neighborhood
Tonite at seven walked out past garbage cans chained to concrete anchors Walked under black painted fire escapes, giant castiron plate covering a hole in ground —Crossed the street, traffic lite red, thirteen bus roaring by liquor store, part corner pharmacy iron grated, past Coca Cola & Mylai posters fading scraped on brick Past Chinese Laundry wood door’d, & broken cement stoop steps
For Rent hall painted green & purple Puerto Rican style
Along E. 10 ‘s glass spattered pavement, kid blacks & Spanish oiled hair adolescents’ crowded house fronts—
Ah, tonite I walked out on my block NY City under humid summer sky Halloween
Ginsberg, p. 633.

Outside a premature dusk is settling over the city as the gray haze of rain clouds blow in from the southeast. I cross the street and walk north to a subway kiosk. Before I reach it the rain starts again. A train pulls out of the station, giving me five minutes to six to wait.
Spillane, p. 288.

Early in the evening, as thousands of New York secretaries go heel-clacking and swishing out of office buildings, another large army of women prepare to move in. And from twilight to sunrise these women will seemingly control New York... They will keep skyscraper lights burning all night, and along the windows their silhouettes and brooms will be reaching and touching like a ballet of witches.
Talese, pp. 33-5.

Darkling perfumed city of fair women passing closely in the dusk; crowds hurrying away and returning.
Reisenberg, p. 209.

The streets are pouring with them at six o’clock. They are a great tide in the gray and dark.
Dreiser, p. 82.

Sultry July dusk.
Jolas, p. 472.

dusky sash across Manhattan
Hughes, p. 426.

There is a certain yellow, white and green complexion that can be seen every night around 6 o’clock, swaying and faint on the Madison Avenue bus. It is the face of a physically and emotionally overheated society.
Bladford, p. 111.

Twilight over terrible Manhattan. The New York sky that had been a twanging blue when I entered the hotel is now a tender violet. The street lights are golden bubbles, golden fruits, hanging from their wrought-iron trees. From the doorway where I am standing I can see a forest of jeweled towers rising serene and magical against the lovely sky. They are the hotels and apartment houses that light their windows against the coming dark. To the west a varicolored mist hangs low—that is Columbus Circle with its neon signs and its whirligig of traffic lanes. And everywhere the people hurry through the gloom.
Atkinson, p. 42.

Hart Crane arranges a landscape of impressionist imprecision inside the frame of his window: “At twilight on a foggy evening . . . it is beyond description,” he says of the harbor—beyond description because beyond perception, atmospherically smudged, the top of the Woolworth Building swallowed by a cloud.
Conrad, p. 234.

When they emerge from the thunder and foul air of the subway, the last dregs of the day are mixed with the street lights.
Nabokov, p. 226.

Across the way in the twilight stretches the dark jungle of Central Park.
Atkinson, p. 41.

It is 6:30 when I leave my room. I walk slowly down Broadway. The lights are twinkling, and the hurrying crowds tell of universal impatience for the pleasures of the evening. How many of these people are going to the theater? How many are hastening home to domestic comforts? Many a man is going to meet an old friend for a long sweet dinner and a longer and sweeter talk. Many a girl is hurrying to meet the man she has known for so long that meeting him after hours has become a pleasant habit. Others, like myself are merely vaguely looking forward for something amusing or affecting to happen.

Hapgood, p. 189.

A twilight hour in early spring—it is March—when, starting from the Brooklyn end, I face into the west wind sweeping over the rivers from New Jersey. The ragged, slate-blue cumulus clouds that gather over the horizon leave open patches for the light of the waning sun to shine through, and finally, as I reach the middle of the Brooklyn Bridge, the sunlight spreads across the sky, forming a halo around the jagged mountain of skyscrapers, with the darkened loft buildings and warehouses huddling below in the foreground. The towers, topped by the golden pinnacles of the new Woolworth Building, still catch the light even as it begins to ebb away. Three-quarters of the way across the Bridge I see the skyscrapers in the deepening darkness become slowly honeycombed with lights until, before I reach the Manhattan end, these buildings pile up in a dazzling mass against the indigo sky.

Mumford, Sketches, p. 129.

The early part of the night on Broadway, which is but the bedraggled fringe of day.

Strunsky, p. 698.

Workdays repeat themselves: night reinvents itself with every sunset. After the commute, and as full darkness is accomplished, first restaurants come to life, then theaters, bars, and clubs, then after-hours dives—all of them venues for drama, rewritten every second it plays. Glamour, lust, license, and crime emerge from the shadows and parade under the lights, high life and low life, polished veneer and sweaty beastliness.

Caldwell, p. 2.

When I finish eating and climb behind the wheel of the car it is almost eight. The evening shadows have dissolved into night, glossy and wet, the splatter of the rain on the steel roof an impatient drumming that lulls thoughts away. I switch on the radio to a news program, change my mind and find some music instead.

Spillane, p. 318.

The foreground is thickly dark, obfuscated by the looming stump of a building. There are some lights below, like gems in a mine, but they don’t help, since you can’t tell to what they belong.

Conrad, pp. 85.

Dark between these buildings.

Donleavy, N. pag.

That’s part of the magic of the night, the way that the moon and the stars, though invisible, smothered in the contaminated skies of big cities, nonetheless manage to charm silver and gold out of the pockets that are zippered shut in the daylight.

Haden-Guest, p. 4.

Men and women who work in New York skyscrapers by day never meet the men and women cleaners who take over at night. They form independent tides that never rip or cross.

Berger, New York, p. 42.
The sempiternal New York night.
McCourt, p. 21.

After dark, consciousness is no longer on sentry duty. Sleep is the city’s restitution. At night the body is consigned to its own metabolic devices. No longer required to do things for its demanding mental employer, it fantasizes about its longed-for liberty.
Conrad, p. 272.

Below Canal Street, night covers a dark blot, except for the scrubbers’ dim lights.
Reisenberg, p. 29.

It’s 8:30 p.m. in New York and I’ve been running around all day old come-all-ye’s streel into the streets.
Berrigan, p. 28.

It’s 8:30 p.m. in New York and I’ve been running
Wind giving presence to fragments.
Ibid.

The dealers of the night are concerned with bread, flesh, milk, butter, cheese, fruits, and the green offerings of the fields.
Strunsky, p. 698.

Outside the broad office windows the night is gray and foggy. Here and there a few lights make up dim horizontals and perpendiculars of asterisks.
Dos Passos, p. 326.

Night… a black velvet curtain has dropped over the white sky… a few mothers went looking for their kids… found them here… dragged them home for supper… but they are back again… but that’s the same Empire State Building in the Background…
Weegee, Naked, p. 37.

It is nine o’clock of a summer’s night. The great city all about is still astir, active, interested, apparently comfortable. Lights gleam out from stores lazily. The cars go rumbling by only partially filled, as is usual at this time of night. People stroll in parks in a score of places throughout the city, enjoying the cool of the night, such as it is.
Dreiser, p. 217.

It’s a wintry night and the clouds are low. Walking through the midtown streets my chin is thrust into my coat, my hands are chilled inside my fur-lined gloves.
Brook, p. 17.

On the way up Broadway we passed the church around 11th Street, which has a front yard with a large urn the size of four men side by side and dark green lawns and some trees and flowers that had recently lost their petals. The entire yard is bathed in night shadows but over the roofs and spires the sky is turning a deep cobalt. I turn to him and say, I haven’t lain down on grass in ages… We stopped and rest our hands on the wrought-iron fence, white against gleaming back. Then, I say, There’s too much dog shit in the parks to lay down.
Wojnarowicz, p. 177.
The city at night is taken from those who think they run it and handed over to its amoral aborigines—the sexually hungry, the larcenous, the violent, all of them agents of somnambulistic id. Conrad, p. 272.

A couple resting from dancing in the Mall in Central Park some starry summer night. Atkinson, p. 40.

It is maybe ten-thirty of a Wednesday night, and I am standing at the corner of Forty-eighth Street and Seventh Avenue. Conrad, p. 284.

Who roams Manhattan's midnight range
From neonrise to neonset?

At midnight, those coming out of the theatres drink a last soda, eat a last ice cream, and crawl home at one, or at three, should they hang about for a couple of hours foxtrotting, or in the final yelling of "Charleston." But life does not come to a stop. In the same way, shops of all sorts are open, the subway and the elevated are still running, you can still find a cinema which will stay open all night, and sleep there as long as you like for your twenty-five cents. Mayakovsky, America, p. 55.

A clock chimes midnight. The last few news watchers leave. The lights go out. Then, of a sudden, the sign flashes again, you stand transfixed. What now? Words trip before you. THE NEW YORK TIMES WISHES YOU GOOD NIGHT. The pavement seems a little less hard. Somewhere, up behind the screen, is a dash of kindness. A strictly practical sign would just shut off its light and save that extra watt of current. Reisenberg, p. 158.

The hands of the lighted city clock
Climb one on top of the other
Like a street dog on his accidental mate—
Twelve.
Now the hoarse song of blood rises
To the night ears of the city.
Now the whole city sings the song of two.
Now the whole city cries the cry of one to one.
And the lighted city clock replies:
Twelve.
Glashteyn, p. 498.

Behind Midnight's screen on St. Mark's Place
Berrigan, p. 594.

At midnight Jack raises his window and sits close to it. He catches his breath at what he sees, though he has seen and felt it a hundred times.

Far below and around lies the city like a ragged purple dream. The irregular houses are like the broken exteriors of cliffs lining deep gulches and winding streams. Some are mountainous; some lie in long, monotonous rows like the basalt precipices hanging over desert canons. Such is the background of the wonderful, cruel, enchanting, bewildering, fatal, great city. But into this background are cut myriads of brilliant parallelograms and circles and squares through which glow many colored lights. And out of the violet and purple depths ascend like the city’s soul sounds and odors and thrills that make up the civic body. There arise the breath of gaiety unrestrained, of love, of hate, of all the passions that man can know. There below him lies all things, good or bad, that can be brought from the four corners of the earth to instruct, please, thrill, enrich, despoil, elevate, cast down, nurture or kill. Thus the flavor of it comes up to him and goes into his blood.

On the subway, a girl who has fallen asleep, her head lolling, her mouth slightly agape.

We need urgently a vindication of the Night, and especially of night in the city.

Strunsky, p. 697.

The streets at one A.M. are very very dark up in the 30’s, as if all the lights are concentrated in 42nd Street. Everything else dims in the radius spreading out from that street. Everything, each surface has a glittering quality. There is so little light that touched anything directly, as signs of life, little granules of glass in the asphalt, the sidewalks, pools of wet stuff, occasional faraway streetlights, pools of black darkness where it’s hard to discern grates and barricades and doorways and burglar gates and occasionally the dim light of what seems like a fifty-foot-high streetlamp illuminating a sphere of sidewalk, piles of large cardboard boxes from factories and sweatshops hidden behind the fashion/garment district facades and showrooms. Nothing but the sound of skittering newspapers, pieces of cardboard dragging down the street, garbage spread everywhere, rotten produce in the gutter, sounds of traffic on the main avenue, occasional side street cabs bumping potholes, indiscernible click of traffic lights on empty streets, vague silhouettes of mannequins behind dark windows and solder gates, poor versions of American fashions for overseas. On 8th Avenue there’s rarely a living being below 40th Street—it’s maybe too dangerous or the pickings too slim to draw any interest.

Suddenly darkness moves and a human is sliding along the storefronts close to the windows and doors moving bent over with intent or with loss—something in the body language or the clothing, broke, in pain, weary, hopelessness. Cars come in twos or threes burning up the Avenue with foot pushing the gas springing from a red light that’s finally changed, charging uptown giving the impression there’s nothing here to stop for, people rushing from one location to another and I wish at times I could read the entire history and intentions and structure of a person to know what sad destinations they have before them in that moment.

On 37th Street on the west corner of 8th Avenue, there was an illuminated window, gates half down, a donut shop, and the apparition of a man naked above the waist mopping the floor around the horseshoe counters. I stood on the opposite corner—the image was kind of beautiful, in the periphery of sight it was just six-story buildings and empty streets, everything buried in black shadows and gritty low-level light, newspapers lifting gently in the warm breeze, the skip of occasional car wheels over manhole covers, the metallic hum of circuitry in the traffic lights and the sky that weird charcoal blur gray where night is softly illuminated from the city below. And in the midst of all this desolation a bright rectangle ten feet by twenty feet fluorescent unreality and thousands of fresh donuts stacked into the racks and a sexy Puerto Rican man, his muscular body just beginning to fade from youth softening up at the edges sweeping motions of the mop from side to side, white kitchen pants and athletic shoes and he’s totally unaware of being watched.
Wojnarowicz, pp. 236-7.

One A.M. on the corner of Sheridan Square—across from the unlit triangle of park benches streaming in the night, neons as far as you can see, then the shell of darkness beyond, and back there over that indiscernible line drawn by lack of lights is the whole pocket of memory and a sense of the past few hours, past days, seeds of weariness brought on by the crashings of black beauties.
Ibid., p. 148.

At two A.M. the Spearmint sign blacked out and plunged Times Square into sudden darkness. One by one the neons died: the Cadillac, the bars and grills in the deeper Forties. Store windows darkened and theater lights drained off. The Square huddled in ever-deepening shadow.
Berger, Eight Million, pp. 166-167.

The streets of Harlem make an unreal scene of frightened silence at 2 A.M.
Gamble p. 391.

2 AM it was the hour for “taking you home,” “going home,” and the teenagers and sailors walked arm in arm with their “women,” and the women giggled. At 2 AM in the morning, it seemed, to me, one of the lonely souls, that everybody was walking in pairs, and every smart woman had found her man, and any man worth his pants had managed to hook up with a woman... Only the poets are free.
Carpenter, p. 341.

In a few minutes the lights on the marquees start going off and by 2:00 A.M. the street is dark. The moving news sign on the tower a block away is out, and the big advertising signs in the Square are switched off, too.

The night has already turned on that imperceptible pivot where two
A.M. changes to six A.M.
McInerney, p. 1

For sheer beauty—don’t miss the breaking of dawn across the East River—or a full moon—bathing Avenue C in magic light at two or three in the morning.
Reay, p. 271.

And the great city sleeps, its pulse scarcely disturbed by the feverish activity of the hosts of darkness. Or if the city catches a rumble of their movements and stirs in its slumber, it is only to turn over and go to sleep again. No hypnotic spell will account for this indifference of a city of five million to the presence of an army in its gas-lit streets. It is merely habit. If here and there in the cubical hives where New York takes its rest an unquiet sleeper tosses in his bed and resents the disturbance, it is not to wish of his prowlers of the night were caught and sent to jail, but only to wish that they went about their business more discreetly—this great host of market-men, groceries, butchers, milkmen, push-cart engineers, and news-vendors would’ve engaged since soon after midnight on the enormous task of preparing the cities breakfast.

For this, of course, is the real nightlife of New York—the life that beats at rapid pace the great water-front markets, and the newspaper press-rooms around Brooklyn Bridge, Under the acetylene glare over excavations for the new subways, and in the thousands of bake shops that line the avenues and streets.

Strunsky, p. 697.

At three in the morning the dreary street sprawls slant-wise across the town in all the ugly meanness of disuse.

The markets on the waterfront are the heart of the city’s nightlife, but in all five boroughs there are local centers of concentrated vitality—the milk-depots, the street-railway junctions, the car-barns. Where elevated or subway meets cross-town and longitudinal surface lines you will find at three in the morning as active and garishly illuminated a civic center as many a city of the hinterland would boast at nine o’clock in the evening. Groups of switchmen, car-despatchers, conductors, motormen, and the casual onlooker whom New York supplies from its inexhaustible womb even at three in the morning, stand in the middle of the road and discuss the most wonderful mysteries—so it seems, at least, in the hush before dawn. And because the cars which they switch and side-track and despatch on their way depart empty of passengers and lose themselves in the shadows, their business, too, seems one of impressive mystery.

Strunsky, p. 700.

A car-conductor at 3 o’clock in the morning is the most delightful of people to meet. His hands are grimy with the dirt of alien nickels and dimes. His temper isn’t as yet unworn by the days traffic.

Ibid., p. 700.

A trip down Amsterdam Avenue in a surface car at 3 A.M.

Ibid., p. 703.

The night is primarily the time of the innocent industries, employing simple, innocent, primitive men—slow-speaking truck-farmers; brawny slaughterers in the abattoirs; stolid German bakers; apathetic milkmen.

Ibid., p. 698.

Rise at three in the morning and walk a mile between the rows of wagons and stalls in Gansevoort or Wallabout Market, drawing strength from the piles of sweet, green produce, dewy under the lamplight and learning patience from the farmers’ horses... When you stroll through the markets, between lines of wagons, stalls, crates, baskets, and squads of perspiring men, you need not force the imagination to call up the solid square miles of brick and stone barracks in which New York’s five million, minus some thousands, are asleep, outside the glare of the arc-lights and kerosene-torches.

Strunsky, pp. 698-9.

Little girl... what are you doing out at three in the morning... you should be home asleep.

Weegee, Naked, p. 28.

There is a point past 3 a.m. when the loudest noise a stray visitor hears in Times Square is the click-click of the inner workings of a traffic signal, switching lights.

Philips, p. 23.

3:10 A.M. You can walk a block in Times Square and not see a soul.

Ibid., p. 27.

There it sleeps, the big, dark brute, and in another three hours it will yawn and sit up and blink its eyes and roar for its food.

Strunsky, p. 699.

Night creeps into the cellars, musty and dull.

Tuxedos totter through the rubble of the street.

Faces are moldy and worn out.

The blue morning burns coolly in the city.

Lichtenstein, p. 513.

When street traffic dwindles and most people are sleeping, some New York neighborhoods begin to crawl with cats.

Talese, p. 5.

it is 3:17 a.m. in New York city, yes, it is 1962, it is the year of parrot fever.

Berrigan, p. 70.

Then I walk out in the bleak village in my dreams, for they are present! I wake up aching from soft bed Back to books. It is 3:17 a.m. in New York city

Berrigan, p. 68.

I remember the clock from three to three-thirty.

Take your place on Williamsburg Bridge some morning, for instance, at say three or four o’clock, and watch the long, the quite unbroken line of Jews trundling pushcarts eastward to the great Wallabout Market over the bridge. A procession out of Assyria or Egypt or Chaldea, you might suppose, Biblical in quality; or, better yet, a huge chorus in some operatic dawn scene laid in Paris or Petrograd or here. A vast, silent mass it is, marching to the music of necessity. They are so grimy, so mechanistic, so elemental in their movements and needs.

Dreiser, p. 5.

It is amazing how a great city can snore with equanimity while entire regiments and squadrons carry on operations in the streets, quietly, but with no attempt concealment.

Strunsky, p. 697.
The Square, north of the Crossroads, is a black pit now. It is almost four o’clock. Only one or two neon signs glow redly through the dark.

Berger, Eight Million, p. 169.

Rewarding myself with a hustler at 4 am.
Reay, p. 12.

the last door closed at 4. A.M.

Crossing Park Avenue
South; 4:14 a.m.; going West at 23rd; September 1st, 1971
Berrigan, p. 493.

The milkman alone is enough to redeem the night from its undeserved evil reputation. A cartload of pasteurized milk for nurslings at four o’clock in the morning represents more service to civilization than a truckload of bullion on its way from Sub-treasury to the vaults of a national bank five hours later.
Strunsky, p. 698.
Part 2
Preface

J. Pierpont Morgan dealt himself another hand of solitaire and listened for the twentieth century. It was the night of December 31, 1899, and Morgan sat in the library of his Madison Avenue mansion. Logs crackled in the fireplace. To the left of the hearth stood a bookcase holding two metal statues of knights in armor, a clock perched between them. From time to time Morgan may have lifted his dark-hazel eyes to glance at the clock.

The hulking six-foot financier sat at his desk in his usual flat-footed position, toes turned out. With strong and well-formed fingers, he laid out the cards, playing almost automatically, as he did when he had something on his mind. A long cigar protruded from the paper cigar holder clenched in his teeth under his mustache.

Although it was almost midnight in Morgan’s mahogany study, it was the high noon of capitalism in American, and no American stood out so starkly as he. Morgan was centralizing the control of industry and credit. He was the capitalist’s capitalist. President William McKinley of the large head and barrel torso sat in the White House; but businessmen guided the nation’s destiny and Morgan guided the businessmen. Indifferent to social reform and defiant of public opinion, Morgan felt that the public owed nothing.

The clock began tolling the hour of midnight. Morgan may have raised his massive head at the very first bing. So the twentieth century had arrived? Very well. Within a little more than a year Morgan was to create the first billion-dollar corporation in history, the United States Steel Corporation. Bong!

Ellis, pp. 456-7
a - Bohemia

Uptown is uptown is downtown. It’s sort of a voluntary apartheid. Haden-Guest, p. 273.

There were not many ideas uptown. Ibid., p. 108.

I found out the main difference between uptown and downtown was people are more for real up there. They got to be, I guess. Uptown a whore was a whore; a was a pimp; a thief was a thief; a faggot was a faggot; a dike was a dike; a mother-hugger was a mother-hugger.

Downtown it was different—more complicated. A whore was sometimes a socialite; a pimp could be a man about town; a thief could be an executive; a faggot could be a playboy; a dike might be called a deb; a mother-hugger was somebody who wasn’t adjusted and had problems. Holiday, p. 77.

It’s always surprising to me to think how small the downtown New York City avant-garde scene was in relation to how much influence it eventually had. A generous estimate would be five hundred people, and that would include friends of friends—the audience as well as the performers. If you got an audience of more than fifty, it was considered large. South of 14th Street things were always informal. Warhol, POPism, p. 69.

Somewhere above Fourteenth TAKE THE EXPRESS
Crane, “The Tunnel,” p. 60.

All of uptown seems to be headed downtown for Saturday night. McInerney, p. 160.

Dwellings

The first apartment dwellers were artists, and their needs had shaped early apartment buildings, sometimes quite directly and explicitly. Hawes, N. pag.

Artists were responsible for large, light-drenched double-height rooms. Ibid.

A typical uptown artists’ apartment was hung with tapestries and Turkish drapery, which provided atmospheric background for portraiture. Ibid.

An artist carving out an appropriate space to activate his life was not unlike the wealthy industrialist demanding chandeliered reception rooms and paneled libraries to achieve his own social ends. It was a sound urban idea and a particularly sane solution to a particularly exotic style of living.

Ibid.

The first New York co-op was formed by a group of ten well-known artists, led by the landscape painter Henry Ward Ranger and including Childe Hassam, who banded together to finance a fourteen-story apartment house on West 67th Street. The block quickly became known as a bohemian enclave. It conveyed its sense of fraternity physically, for a passerby was drawn in by the similarity of the facades on the front, the banks of double-height windows on the back. Its ingenious use of space was appealing. In volume alone, its studios were sumptuous. And to a populace who had only recently been swept off its feet by the premiere of Puccini’s La Bohème, its very raison d’être was romantic.

Ibid.

Anyone with an eye for fashion in 1908 might have predicted that the souston Street at the time I noticed in certain upper-story windows houseplants or interior lights shining into the night, signifying that someone might be residing there.

Kostelanetz, p. 5.

Plants are to SoHo what lawns are to suburbia.

Ibid., p. 140.

The development of SoHo is often sited as a Maciunas legacy, contributing on a smaller scale, as a gardener, to the greening of SoHo. A beautiful potted forest of very healthy rubber trees flourished under his vigilance, as well as the baby trees he planted—illegally—in front of the building at 80 Wooster Street that are over two stories high today. [Nature]

Williams & Noél, p. 194-5.

He was interested in revealing the cast-iron detailing in the structure and cleaned off a lot of old paint. In the front of the building he worked on restoring the cast-iron sidewalk panels with lenses that let light down into the basement, and he took delight in finding a large quantity of these lenses at bargain prices. In front he planted some Allanthus trees (the Tree of Heaven), to cover up some illegal electrical work.

Ibid., p. 177.

In my twenties, when I passed through SoHo late at night after some party, I would detour by his block to see the light shining in his window. I would feel oddly secure in the thought that he was up in his loft working, revolving like a planet through his self-created cosmology of painted shapes and plaster structures.

Pinchbeck, N. pag.

Over many an artist’s loft, one can still hear the machines banging away, slamming out their products.

Anderson & Archer, p. 13.

de Kooning’s studio: “The loft was just too large; it wasn’t good for an apartment. There was heat until five or six p.m. each day provided by the large radiators in the front and back, an amenity that many rough lofts of the time lacked. And there was a hot-water boiler in the kitchen. But there was no stove and no tub, and the overall condition of the loft was poor. There was no flooring, only subflooring. It was a wooden floor, but it was unfinished and gray. “Stevens & Swan, p. 195.

In those studios, the heat used to go off after five o’clock because they were commercial buildings. de Kooning would be painting with his hat and coat on. Painting away, and whistling. Ibid., p. 198.

As long as he lived on there friends said, de Kooning would knock off work early on Saturdays in order to scrub down his loft. Ibid., p. 147.

Westbeth nicknamed Deathbeth and Westdeath. Strausbaugh, p. 499.

SoHo has good and bad artists, brilliant and dull minds, saints and frauds. Still, the collective life is there, and that it should so much resemble, well, anybody’s life, strikes me as worth mentioning. For a very long time, the life of the artist has served as an emblem in the middle-class conundrum of how to live authentically. If SoHo taken as a community, has any meaning, it is that this myth—of the artist’s emblematic, sanctified, ridiculed struggle—has passed out of its heroic phase. Of course, the myth, if it is a myth, not only has reality, but also vast power, and that power is installed in the minds of almost everyone. It is institutionalized in SoHo. Yet actual life there seems to demonstrate something slightly different: the thirst for community itself—and that despite the ferocious rivalries, the intensely high-powered ambitions at work there, despite its grand and often arcane intellectual tradition. SoHo has become a major community, not only a community in which art is being made, but also (and not quite the same thing) a place where the notion of what it means to be an artist is being tested and enacted. What happens there will one day be important not merely because of the art that has been produced by artists living there, but also for the version of the artist’s identity which it creates. Any community creates its own pressures and promises. For an entire generation of art students now pouring into it. SoHo has become the place to be, a place where the heroic, heady task of self-creation is to be performed. Anderson & Archer, p. 17.

One does not live well or badly in SoHo; one works well or badly. Doing work—one’s “own,” of course—over coming obstacles to work, living with work, and one’s partner’s work, these are the insignia of authentic living. At moments, even routine banalities like “How have you been?” seem replaced by “How’s your work been going?” or, more politely, “What have you been doing?” “What have you been doing?” it being understood that the only thing really done is work. What’s happening in SoHo is that the artist’s identity—his social definition of himself—has become completely saturated with the idea of work, while romantic visions of free spirits fall into desuetude. The ethos clamps its defining power over the very layout of the lofts. Those immense rectangular spaces would be ruined by subdivision into lots of little rooms. And so the space is organized, instead. The principle of organization is that of “work space” as distinguished from “living space.” Almost invariably, the work space arrogantly overwhelms the living space, which is scrunched into some small comer where one sits feeling primarily the irrelevance of whatever amenities are supposed to take place there. Not that SoHo lacks its amenities—but one glances up from a serenely appointed dinner table to look directly into an environment replete with drafting tables and power tools.

SoHo’s impulse to wed the space of work and living, like its impulse to live where no life was ever intended to be lived, is a variety of elegance. That elegance is of course connected to the taste for incongruity which is among the oldest modernist principles of style. But a deeper logic reveals itself here, for adopting the identity of an artist almost always means adopting a special set of attitudes toward the middle class. It remains the great alternative identity. In SoHo, those of America’s children who have chosen that identity reveal themselves. Childhood’s hated suburban distinction between home (i.e., life) and work (located not only in a different place but a different city) is resolutely eliminated. In a single stroke all the mortifying pettiness of the American “home” is ripped away; everything about making art that feels possibly tainted by that cozy triviality is demolished. One lives in work—that’s what’s wanted. The inevitable, and unnatural, sexual resonances of having been raised in Mom’s town (where real life is lived), remote from work in Dad’s town (the unseen, meaningless, uninhabitable city) are also dramatically refused. Suburbia and its wall-to-wall alienations have led to a new image for the ancient one of the artist as androgyne, and after the misadventures of the 60s, it finds itself taking a social, rather than specifically sexual, expression. True enough, an industrial look has been important to the image of the modern artist’s virility. But the style’s stronger aim is to resolve the sexually laden contradictions of a recent American childhood. In SoHo, working and living are at last reunited, and work becomes real. [Labor]

Ibid., pp. 16-17.

This was a place where hard work was done and respected. Artistic production requires intensive labor, and there was a recognition by the blue-collar workers that artists did work hard, even if they worked odd hours. There were no distinctions made by those who worked in SoHo based upon social status or occupation—at least among those who “toiled.” [Labor]

Hudson, p. 49.

Until the mid-seventies, the answer to the question “What do you do?” would refer to an actual job, such as “I’m a teacher, lawyer, worker,” etc., but by the end of the seventies (and especially from 1977 onwards), the replies became “I work in cinema, music, writing, art...” One replied, in other words, by citing one’s “hobby” or, better, one’s elective affinity. This was a sign of changing times that saw the shift from a culture based on the Marxist idea of work—an idea linked to the industrial era—to the post-Ford one, in which work and the factor receded to the background, to the benefit of the theory of the needs and desires of postindustrial society. [Labor]

Frisa, p. 382.

A performance is the word used when referring to any event in SoHo in which people do things in front of an audience. Whether a performance is good or bad, interesting or not, it is always a major SoHo social event. For some reason, one must always climb stairs to reach a performance. The ascent is the same to reach the most modest dump, with battered floors and grimy windows, or the cool sanctum of the Castelli Gallery. And when you’ve gotten to the top of whatever stairs you climbed, you will find yourself not in a theater, but in a 'space.' (Space, like work is one of SoHo's cherished words. For example, the correct compliment for a new loft is 'What a beautiful space.') The space will be crowded with people milling around the pieces of electronic equipment, which generally have been arranged in the most conspicuous manner possible. While edging around the video monitors and stepping over cables, the waiting audience begins to spin the web of acquaintance with the customary small nods, waves, smiles, flashes and raised eyebrows. There is likely to be a great deal of sitting on the floors along with perching on windowsills and leaning against pillars.

Anderson & Archer, p. 77.

They want to climb those vertiginous loft building stairs on Howard Street that go up five flights without a single turn or bend—straight up!—like something out of a casebook dream—to wind up with their hearts ricocheting around in their rib cages with tachycardia from the exertion.

Wolfe, Painted, p. 17.

It's a rainy Thursday evening when I step out of a cab at the corner of Broadway and Franklin streets in lower Manhattan on my way to dinner with William Burroughs.

I gaze down a line of warehouses with a haphazard mixture of small trucks and old cars parked in front of them, spot Burroughs' four story building, hurry diagonally across the street, push open the door and step into the foyer. The hall light is out and I feel cautiously for the banisters as two bottles of cold white wine clink in the crook of my arm. Warped wooden stairs lead to the top floor past a series of wall paintings.

The loft is impeccably clean. The old wooden floors beam with polish, the bed is neatly made, all surfaces are devoid of other than essentials... I notice an efficient looking brand new kitchen has been installed. The loft feels warm and lived in whilst remaining concisely organized.

Bockris, Burroughs, p. 83.

Not in SoHo. The naïve but powerful doctrine of art as self-expression and therefore self-discovery swings precious little weight in those elegant lofts. It is dismissed as a trivial adolescent fantasy.

Anderson & Archer, p. 15.

SoHo on Saturdays resembles an enormous, floating party which begins in the galleries and ends up in local bars, restaurants and lofts.

Ibid., p. 21.

SoHo fashion: "Flamboyance is out: the standard uniform consists of work clothes, jeans and a T-shirt or sweatshirt are usually considered best (and they should be worn, by preference, without any asinine inscriptions or decals)." [Labor] [Fashion]

Ibid., p. 16.

They probably sit around on the floor with wine and cheese and mispronounce "allegorical" and "didacticism."

Allen, Manhattan, p. 197.
Oh, to be young and come to New York and move into your first loft and look at the world with eyes that light up even the rotting fire-escape railings, even the buckling pressed-tin squares on the ceiling, even the sheet-metal shower stall with its belly dents and rusting seams, the soot granules embedded like blackheads in the dry rot of the window frames, the basin with the copper-green dripping-spigot stains in the cracks at the bottom, the door with its crowbar-notch history of twenty-five years of break-ins, the canvas-bottom chairs that cut off the circulation in the sural arteries of the leg, the indomitable roach that appears every morning in silhouette on the cord of the hot plate, the doomed yucca straining for light on the windowsill, the two cats nobody ever housebroke, the garbage trucks with the grinder whine, the leather freaks and health-shoe geeks, the punkers with chopped hair and Korean warm-up jackets, the herds of Uptown Boutique bohemians who arrive every weekend by radio-call cab, the bag ladies who sit on the standpipes swabbing the lesions on their ankles.

Wolfe, Purple, pp. 325-6.

Canal Street: “For generations, it has served as an immense, ten-block-long hardware store and junk shop for the surrounding industry. For the artists of SoHo, it has become a vast luxurious, tangled garden of the real. Through its pathways, one strolls in the cool of the evening. There are crates of poser tools, barrels of pliers, rack upon rack of Flexiglass, whole floors crammed with cheap office furniture. Here on Canal Street, lofts are furnished, works and careers are conceived, souls are soothed. From Canal Street and its like, the improbable elegance of the place has been assembled.”

I first found Canal Street in the late 50s, early 60s. You see, at that time, the small business people were moving out of the lofts, going to New Jersey or Philadelphia because New York all of a sudden had a very high tax rate for them. So they moved out. That left a lot of empty lofts in the Canal Street area. So, we artists started moving in. The rents were cheap, about $65 per thousand square feet. Naturally, we were living illegally because we could not pass the fire inspection laws or the housing department laws. So during the day, we would stay locked in our lofts, fearing to answer the doorbell, that it might be a housing inspector or a fire inspector, but after six o’clock when we knew that would be no more inspectors, we would all come out like, just coming all of the lofts and going to a nice restaurant that was called Canal Street Bar—it’s other name was Dave’s Place, because Dave owned it—and there we would meet, and talk over about what we were doing, or what we planned to do, or what shows we hoped to get, or what shows were planned for us. And this was a good period. Everyone felt like comrades. We were fighting everybody. This was the Canal Street I loved.

And there were so many beautiful stores on that street, so many beautiful stores. There were junk stores, electronic stores—you could find anything there. And this is how Pop Art really got going, because all the material was right there on the street: you didn’t have to go anywhere. That’s where I started making my music machines with sound motors for 25 cents apiece. There was a toy store that only sold broken toys so I got all the cheapest guitars I could find. It was a good time. That was my Canal Street.

Then came what I call the Canal Street Blues. You see, we had a mayor—a Burgomaster—called Mr. John Lindsay, who decided to make living in lofts legal. Now, what really happened was the real estate speculators bought the buildings, so now if you wanted a legal loft—the same loft that used to cost you $65 a month—you had to buy it. So that meant that you had to pay at least, at that time, $25,000 for the loft and then $2000 a month for maintenance fees. Yes, that was Canal Street Blues, and what hurts more is—you know what really happened?—artists could not afford it. They moved out, they couldn’t pay that kind of money. Many went to Brooklyn, some to Staten Island, some just left New York completely. And guess who moved into these beautiful lofts? Lawyers, doctors, Wall Street brokers. Oh yeah, yeah, yeah. It became so chic, this Canal Street: fancy boutiques, French restaurants, even had its own newspaper. This is when I left Canal Street. A long, long time ago.

I got the Canal Street Blues. Canal Street Blues. I got the Canal Street Blues. Canal Street, I still think of it. Can’t help it. I remember the good times on Canal Street and I want to keep on remembering it, but it’s not the same, not the same at all. In fact, I never want to see Canal Street again. It’s gone. There is no more Canal Street for me. Sorry about that but... let’s face it, there is no Canal Street anymore. [Gentrification]

Jones, “Canal Street,” N. pag.

Bars

Cedar, San Remo

A list of their names, when I reel them off, is for me like a mantra that magically evokes the essence, spirit, and soul of the downtown New York I knew in 1949 and on into the early fifties: Julian Beck, Judith Malina, Parker Tyler, John Ashbery, Willard Maas, Marie Menken, Dorothy Van Ghent, Edouard Roditi, John Bernard Myers, Harold Norse, David Sachs, John Button, Alvin Novak, Jean Garrigue, Marguerite Young, Oscar Williams, Gene Derwood, John Cage, Merce Cunningham, Lou Harrison, Irving Feldman, José Garcia Villa, Anaïs Nin, Ned Rorem, Edwin Denby, Harold and May Rosenberg, Percival Goodman, Irving Howe, Dwight Macdonald, George Dennison, Fritz and Laura Pens, Isadore From, I. Rice Pereira, Robert Motherwell, Jackson Pollock, and, if we forget that prior meeting through John Ashbery, Frank O’Hara. Some of these names are now forgotten and will be recognized only by readers who were on the scene at that time.

Lesueur, p. 18.

Gooch, p. 203.

Clement Greenberg: “At the Cedar, everybody looked unattractive.” Ibid., p. 203.

The Cedar smelled of spilled beer and tobacco smoke. The air was thick, the light a “bilous yellow-green,” said one Cedar regular, “that made everyone look worse than they already looked.” In the low light, you could not be sure, at first, who was sitting in the booths along the wall. The Cedar... was a working-class bar entirely without distinction. And that, in the New York of the 1950s, was precisely its distinction. It appealed to the downtown painters because it was not French, not tasteful, not smooth, not witty, not, that is, a Parisian café where artists chatted and sipped. These were important "nots" to painters determined to declare their independence from Paris:
the Americans were hard drinkers at a dive whose existential aura owed more to Brando on the docks than to Sartre at Deux Magots. The Cedar represented a perfect blend of high and low, of proletarian circumstance and intellectual aspiration. English hunting prints in elegant black frames hung, absurdly, on the dingy walls.
Stevens & Swan, p. 361.

The Cedar, which Rivers described as a "verbal news shop," was nondescript, with flaking green plaster walls bare except for a few Hogarth prints, glaring white ceiling lamps dangling overhead, a long bar in the front and a honeycomb of brass-studded leatherette booths in the rear. Looming from its back wall was a round industrial clock whose hands sometimes turned backward like a prop in a Cocteau movie.

The notable absence of collectors at the Cedar Bar.
N. cit.

Helen Frankenthaler posts a sign, "No Beatniks" in the Cedar Tavern, then rats out Kerouac for urinating in a sink outside the men's room.
Gooch, p. 203.

Pollock was celebrated for ripping the men's-room door off its hinges at the Cedar. He would glower into his drink, greet men with "Fuck you" and women with "Wanna fuck?" and often pick fights. In the middle-fifties, the New York art world... was still in the two-drink stage of its party. Pollock was regarded as the pioneer, the man who broke the limits of conventional European practice not only in his painting but also in his cowboy-on-a-spree drunks.
Stevens & Swan, p. 365.

At the Cedar, de Kooning and another painter once took turns slapping each other as hard as they could across the cheek, the idea being to take the hit without flinching.
Ibid., p. 365.

The atmosphere of the Cedar was very much that of a saloon, its Wild West rowdiness only increased by the presence of Pollock, who usually appeared on Tuesday nights after coming in from the Hamptons for his weekly psychiatric session. Pollock tried to overcome his extreme shyness by drinking inordinate amounts of whiskey, which then allowed him to release his Cody, Wyoming, cowboy persona. Pollock's two-fisted swagger set the bar's somewhat paradoxical tone, filled as it was mostly with macho men who were in truth hypersensitive artists who sometimes had trouble relating to the women in the bar with their black stockings, black eyeliner, and very long hair. "Most of those guys you couldn't even sit and have a cup of coffee with because they could barely socialize with anyone, men or women," recalls Al Leslie.
The din of the Cedar regularly hit a high note with Pollock's explosions of fist-fighting or shouting. Once when he and Kline had a brawl he tore the door off the men’s room and smashed a few chairs. Pollock thrived on such angry confrontations. To a black man he said, “How do you like your skin color?” To a lady painter, “You may be a great lay, but you can’t paint worth a damn.” He made licking motions with his tongue at John Myers whom he leerily asked, “Sucked any good cock lately?” To Larry Rivers, who was then in a phase of using heroin, he pantomimed shooting-up. On at least one occasion he called O’Hara a “fag” to his face and was enough of a menace that O’Hara fled the Cedar one night when he heard that Pollock was on a drunken rampage. But this unpleasantness was always forgiven in the name of genius and art. As O’Hara later wrote, “If Jackson Pollock tore the door off the men’s room in the Cedar it was something he just did and was interesting, not an annoyance. You couldn’t see into it anyway, and besides there was then a sense of genius. Or what Kline used to call the dream.”

Ibid., p. 204.

In a way, Jackson Pollock had to die the way he did, crashing his car up, and even Barnett Newman, who was so elegant, always in a suit and monocle, was tough enough to get into politics when he made a kind of symbolic run for mayor of New York in the thirties. The toughness was part of a tradition, it went with their agonized, anguished art. They were always exploding and having fist fights about their work and their love lives. This went on all through the fifties when I was just new in town, doing whatever jobs I could get in advertising and spending my nights at home drawing to meet deadlines or going out with a few friends.

I often asked Larry Rivers, after we got to be friends, what it had really been like down there then. Larry’s painting style was unique—it wasn’t Abstract Expressionist and it wasn’t Pop, it fell into the period in between. But his personality was very Pop. He rode around on a motorcycle and he had a sense of humor about himself as well as everybody else. I used to see him mostly at parties. I remember a very crowded opening at the Janis Gallery where we stood wedged in a corner at right angles to each other and I got Larry talking about the Cedar. I’d heard that when he was about to go on “The $64,000 Question” on TV, he passed the word around that if he won, you could find him at the Cedar Bar, and if he lost, he’d head straight for the Five-Spot, where he played jazz saxophone. He did win—$49,000—and he went straight to the Cedar and bought drinks for around three hundred people.

I asked Larry about Jackson Pollock. “Pollock? Socially, he was a real jerk,” Larry said. “Very unpleasant to be around. Very stupid. He was always at the Cedar on Tuesdays—that was the day he came into town to see his analyst—and he always got completely drunk, and he made a point of behaving badly to everyone. I knew him a little from the Hamptons. I used to play saxophone in the taverns out there and he’d drop in occasionally. He was the kind of drunk who’d insist you play ‘I Can’t Give You Anything but Love, Baby’ or some other songs the musicians thought were way beneath them, so you’d have to see if you could play it in some way that you wouldn’t be putting yourself down too much... He was a star painter all right, but that’s no reason to pretend he was a pleasant person. Some people at the Cedar took him very seriously; they would announce what he was doing every single second—‘There’s Jackson’ or ‘Jackson just went to the john!’... I remember he once went over to Milton Resnick and said, ‘You de Kooning imitator!’ and Resnick said, ‘Step outside.’ Really.” Larry laughed. “You have to have known these people to believe the things they’d fight over.” I could tell from Larry’s smile that he still had a lot of affection for that whole scene.
“What about the other painters?” I asked him. “Well,” he said, “Franz Kline would certainly be at the Cedar every night. He was one of those people who always got there before you did and was still there after you left. While he was talking to you, he had this way of turning to someone else as you were leaving, and you got the feeling of automatic continuity—sort of, ‘So long… So this guy comes over to me and…’ and while you may have flinched at his indiscriminate friendliness, he did have the virtue of smiling and wanting to talk all the time. There were always great discussions going on, and there was always some guy pulling out his poem and reading it to you. It was a very heavy scene.” Larry sighed. “You wouldn’t have liked it at all, Andy.”

He was right. It was exactly the kind of atmosphere I’d pay to get out of. But it was fascinating to hear about, especially from Larry.

“You didn’t go to the Cedar ‘to see the stars,’ though,” Larry added. “Oh, sure, you may have liked being in their aura, but what you came back for night after night was to see your friends… Frank O’Hara, Kenneth Koch, John Ashbery.”

The art world sure was different in those days. I tried to imagine myself in a bar striding over to, say, Roy Lichtenstein and asking him to “step outside” because I’d heard he’d insulted my soup cans. I mean, how corny. I was glad those slug-it-out routines had been retired. They weren’t my style, let alone my capability.

Larry had mentioned that Pollock came in from the country every Tuesday. That was part of the big out-of-the-city-and-into-the-country trend that the Abstract Expressionist painters had started in the late fifties when they were beginning to make money and could afford country places. Right in the middle of the twentieth century, artists were still following the tradition of wanting to get out there alone in the woods and do their stuff. Even Larry had moved to Southampton in ’53—and stayed out there for five years. The tradition was really ingrained. But the sixties changed all that back again—from country to city.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 15-18.

O’Hara might get himself started in the morning with a filterless cigarette and a glass of bourbon and orange juice. Arriving at the office in the late morning, he worked and talked on the phone for an hour or so before heading off for lunch, which often began with a martini or a negroni at Larré’s French restaurant on West Fifty-sixth Street. In the evening O’Hara could drink several vodkas or bourbons without falling down or losing control.

Gooch, p. 378.

Like the San Remo a few years earlier, the Cedar had been picked up by the media and was now overcrowded with tourists on the lookout for Pollock-like painters and young guys cruising for loose art girls.

Ibid., p. 327.

At the Cedar Tavern, suddenly it seemed that every art student in America was arriving at the bar to get drunk with Bill and Franz. Slumming uptown celebrities and Hollywood stars—including Elizabeth Taylor—passing through dropped in regularly.

Stevens & Swan, p. 423

Two major feeders of personalities and ideas into the early Factory were the San Remo / Judson Church crowd and the Harvard / Cambridge crowd. The San Remo Coffee Shop on the corner of MacDougal and Bleecker streets in the Village was where I met Billy Name and Freddy Herko. I’d been going there since ’61, when it was a lot artier—a few poets and a lot of fags coming down from the 53rd Street and Third Avenue area. It was a big thing in those days to “go to the Village,” to places like the Gaslight and the Kettle of Fish. But around ’63 when you walked into the San Remo through the frosted glass doors with flower designs, past the long bar and the booths, it was all full of hustlers who usually sat on the railing of Washington Square Park who’d been taken to the San Remo for one-draft beer. All the amphetamine men—“A-men”—fags on speed who would howl laughing at the very thought of going to a “gay bar,” loved the San Remo because it wasn’t really a gay bar, there were very few gay-world clichés there.

Not everyone at the San Remo was gay, of course, but the stars of the place certainly were. Most of the customers were just there to watch the performance. A lot of the San Remo boys used to write for a mimeographed sheet called The Sinking Bear (named after a poetry magazine that was around then called The Floating Bear), which was one of the first underground newsletter papers. One of these was Ondine—or “Pope Ondine,” as he was occasionally called. Ondine would sit in a booth with his Magic Markers and write replies to people with sex queries/problems for his column, “Beloved Ondine’s Advice to the Shopworn,” and the “problems” would be coming to him on notes passed from the other booths as fast as he could reply. One afternoon Ondine rushed in with an “appalled” look on his face, and as he put his flight bag down on the table, he pointed back toward Washington Square Park and said, incredulously, “A guy just said to me, ‘Would you like to go to a gay bar?’” Ondine shook his head, laughing in disbelief, “Horrible experience.”

The San Remo was almost entirely A-men. I say “almost entirely,” because I remember being introduced to the Duchess for the first time there, and a few minutes later, the owner came over and asked me, “Do you know her?” and when I said yes, he told me, “Then take your friend and get out.” I never did find out what she’d done, she was such a terror. She was a well-known New York post-deb, a part-time lesbian on speed who could put even the A-men in their places. I hung around the San Remo a lot and got to know some faces and bodies I’d be seeing drift in and out of the 47th Street Factory day and night during the next few years.

Warhol, POPism, pp. 69-70.

The San Remo’s success was founded upon, like that of so many Parisian cafés, the discomfort of the tiny apartments in which many of its patrons were living. Among those who could regularly be found drinking its fifteen-cent beers, or martinis, were Tennessee Williams, John Cage, Paul Goodman, Dylan Thomas, Allen Ginsberg, William Burroughs, Judith Malina and Julian Beck, Miles Davis, Merce Cunningham, Dorothy Day, and James Agee.

On the San Remo: “The place is an ordinary house during the day, serving truckers, garage men, postal clerks, and others who work in the area. At night, the place goes into outer space. By two or three in the morning, there usually isn’t a customer in there who isn’t on something, more likely a combination of somethings, nodding out, speeding, tipping, and, in the case of the reactionaries, just plain drunk.

On entering, it looked ordinary enough, with groups clustered in booths and others hunched over the counter. Only when I looked at the groups closely did I realize that it was a drug-induced caricature of every other hash house in the country. People were speaking, but they weren’t talking. They were looking at each other, but they weren’t seeing. Their hands and bodies moved, but their selves were motionless. At the core was solitude.” [Speed] [Drugs]

Hamilton, p. 96.

At the San Remo we argued and gossiped: in the Cedar we often wrote poems while listening to the painters argue and gossip. So far as I know nobody painted in the San Remo while they listened to the writers argue.

Stanley’s Bar at 12th and Avenue B. was the bar of the time; as through its doors passed a steady stream of artists, poets, filmmakers, musicians, and every type of radical publisher and nuclear-disarmament peacemaker. Avenue B between 10th and 12th, in those days, was a sacred road. In addition to Stanley’s, there were several other artists’ bars, and above the bars were cheap pads, and there was the Charles Theater where there were regular showings of underground films. The filmmakers met at Stanley’s after the screenings and there was a great sense of energy and excitement.

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 198

Greenwich Village folk scene bars: Gaslight, Gerde’s Folk City, the Kettle of Fish, Izzy Young’s Folklore Center, the Village Gate, Café Figaro, Rienzi’s, the Tin Angel, Café Reggio, the Wha, the Night Owl, San Remo, the Bizarre, the Derby, Mills Tavern, Minetta Tavern, the Borgia, the Other End.

N. cit.

The most popular meeting place for local artists was Stewart’s at Twenty-third Street and Seventh Avenue… There were also two additional artist meeting places in the otherwise dark and deserted neighborhood. One was the Oasis Bar, across the street from Stewart’s. The other was a Horn & Hardart Automat. Together, said Milton Resnick, the three places constituted “the center of the art world at that time.”

For artists who painted alone all day, the late evenings at Stewart’s offered a kind of vigorous release, a lively and ever-changing round of debate, jokes, and discovery. Hunched over in their chairs, cigarettes in hand, the regulars at Stewart’s would pick apart the history of modern art, trying to understand what worked… Often, after the cafeteria closed around one or two in the morning, the debaters would return to de Kooning’s loft “and talk some more and make coffee,” said Denby.

As an artist’s hangout, the elegant cream-lacquered interior of Mr. Chow’s is light-years away from the Cedar Tavern, that grubby Greenwich Village haunt of the artists of the New York School 30 years ago.

The crypto-queer San Remo, the macho Cedar Street Tavern, and the blustering White Horse.

Lesueur, p. 128.

Max’s
The businessmen who came to Max’s Kansas City in the afternoon. McCourt, p. 244.

Why was Max’s never raided for much the same activity they went after at the Stonewall? Because of those front room businessmen. Ibid., p. 246.

As Five Points make a star in the American flag, so was Max’s that American. Ibid., p. 244.

Adversity on spindly legs, creatures at Max’s might have been renamed Maxine. Ibid., p. 245.

Forrest “Frosty” Myers’ laser sculpture, which he called “From My Place To Max’s a/k/a Good Vibrations,” in which he ran a laser beam from his studio two diagonal blocks to Max’s, where it hit a mirror attached to a speaker wired to the jukebox. When the jukebox played, the mirror vibrated and created a light show on the back room wall. Huffa, N. pag.

Mickey Ruskin co-owned Les Deux Mégots, but by 1962 had had enough of the business... “He wanted to make more money. We used to walk in there, bring our bottle of wine, buy a cup of coffee, drink the coffee, and then pour the wine in. So we weren’t even buying the coffee... they weren’t making any money. It was a poetry hangout.” At that point, the coffee shop had been robbed twice. Ruskin quit to open what would turn out to be a very successful restaurant, the Ninth Circle; he would ultimately open the legendary Max’s Kansas City. Kane, p. 39.

In September we started going regularly to a two-story bar / restaurant on Park Avenue South off Union Square that Mickey Ruskin had opened in late ‘65. It was called Max’s Kansas City and it became the ultimate hangout. Max’s was the farthest uptown of any of the restaurants Mickey had ever operated. He’d had a place on East 7th Street called Deux Mégots that later became the Paradox, and then he’d had the Ninth Circle, a Village bar with a format similar to what Max’s would have, and then an Avenue B bar called the Annex. Mickey had always been attracted to the downtown art atmosphere—at Deux Mégots, he’d held poetry readings—and now painters and poets were starting to drift into Max’s. The art heavies would group around the bar and the kids would be in the back room, basically.

Max’s Kansas City was the exact place where Pop Art and pop life came together in New York in the sixties—teeny boppers and sculptors, rock stars and poets from St. Mark’s Place, Hollywood actors checking out what the underground actors were all about, boutique owners and models, modern dancers and go-go dancers—everybody went to Max’s and everything got homogenized there. Warhol, POPism, p. 234.

When I wasn’t getting laid elsewhere I went to Max’s Kansas City every night. It was a bar and restaurant two blocks away from where I lived and you could sit there all night and bring yourself coffee. It was free. And you always signed the check and never paid the bill. I felt so guilty, I had an unpaid bill of about two or three thousand dollars. I guess that was a lot in the sixties. I had friends that would sign the check “Donald Duck” and “Fatty Arbuckle.” It was just so wonderful and all the waitresses were beautiful . . . and all the busboys . . . You could have sex with all the busboys. I mean, not right there, but later. And anybody who walked into the room, you could fuck, because they all wanted to be in the back room. And you would say, “You’ll have to fuck me and I’ll let you sit at a good table.” So it was wide open, but it wasn’t gay, thank god. We hated gay bars. Gay bars? Oh please, who wanted to go to gay bars? At Max’s you could fuck anyone in the room, and that was what was sweet about it. [Sex] McNeil, p. 27.

It was fabulous! It was very _Satyricon_. There was a lot of acid being taken, and everyone would... I would just run around in rags. At one point, I had a purse that was a suitcase, and, you know, just the way people would dress. Oh! They were just very, very crazy. Very “up.” And Mick Jagger and Bianca... people would just walk in. I mean Salvador Dali and Veruschka and her sisters would be at the round table. It was... You see, I started going there towards the end of ’69-’68. /69. I mean, Max’s was in its heyday in ‘66, ‘67, ‘65, and so I was going there. Andy very seldom went there. At one point, he would go there every night to eat.

Smith, Warhol, p. 244.

I went to Max’s every night. Every single night. At first it was full of Warhol people. During that period you’d see Andy Warhol there with his entourage: Viva, Jane Forth, Joe Dallesandro. Taylor Mead would be hanging out in the corner, drinking. Or some crazy girl with dreadlocks, holding a baby doll, talking to herself. Warhol’s Factory had been up on Forty-seventh Street, but then they moved it to Seventeenth Street, right off of Union Square Park, a few blocks away from Max’s. So you could just walk across the park and hang out at the Factory when Max’s closed. And that was usually the place where everybody had video cameras following them. It was pretty much like that scene in the Doors movie where they meet Nico and go off and do heroin... The back room was vicious. Vicious. Everyone was on a different drug, and if you got up to use the bathroom you didn’t dare turn your back. The bathroom was on your left, and you had to back out of the back room to get there, because if you turned your back, people would talk about you. People would say horrible things about you the minute you got up.

McNeil, p. 96, 98.

In a way you could feel the generations change at Max’s... the Warhol crowd who helped invent Max’s... but as the seventies progressed, the rockers took it over, and the order changed.

_Ibid._, p. 106.

All those girls that hung around those glitter bands at Max’s were evil. All those girls worked in massage parlors—which were a thriving industry in New York at that time. You’d go in, supposedly to get a massage, but it was really for a hand job or a blow job. And all your girlfriends worked in massage parlors, “massaging” all day. All these girls lived in fantasy worlds. And they could afford to not work because they were whores or strippers and made a lot of money. And the way they got these guys interested in them was by being so weird, paying for all their drugs, and paying their rent. And once one of these guys had one of these girls on his tail, he couldn’t get away from her. Because that was their profession, to follow you. If they were interested in a guy in a band, they had to make sure that they gave blow jobs to the security guards at every concert they played, and spent three hundred dollars on cab rides to follow the tour bus, and got plane tickets to California. [Prostitution] [Drugs]

Ibid., p. 148.

Mudd Club

The Mudd Club: the antithesis of fabulous.
Haden-Guest, p. 99.

The Mudd Club’s original name was supposed to be the Molotov Cocktail but ultimately was named after a comment a critic made about Amos Poe’s films, that they looked like mud.
Ibid., p. 99.

The ugliest, nerdiest people, like people wearing plaid, would get free passes to the Mudd Club. On weekends, no fat people were allowed in because they could only fit four hundred people in.
Ibid., p. 100.

Where Studio was disco, coke, glam, multicolored, and polymorphous perversity, the Mudd was punk, heroin, glum, black leather, and—if a couple should actually manage to get it on—straight. If the body parts on display at Studio were the cute ass, the exposed nipple, the serrated nostril, the Mudd anatomy featured the sunken cheekbone, the unseeing eyeball, the perforated upper arm.
Ibid., p. 101.

This ain’t no party, this ain’t no disco,
This ain’t no fooling around
This ain’t no Mudd Club, or CBGB,
I ain’t got time for that now.
Talking Heads, “Wartime.”

Bohemia

They were a Depression generation. Poverty in those days wasn’t sad. They had enough to eat and it didn’t matter to have a beautiful loft. It represented a kind of honesty.
Comenas, “Ab Ex,” N. pag.

A Bohemian and a successful person, who was once a Bohemian, sat in the café together. The successful man was well drest, with a look of assurance and of well meaning benevolence. He was cheerful and talked loudly altho not in an ill-bred manner. It was merely the exuberance of health and of worldly success. He was as definite as his bank account and his standing in the community—a fortune and a reputation which he owed to his own ability. The overcoat which hung on a peg near by was of rich material and bagged in the back that sign of the well-to-do, the quintessence of generous fashion. He was a man of about thirty years of age. His hair grew a little thin at the temples, and his live eyes toned with the vigor of his speech.

His companion was of about the same age. His voice was low, and his coat, tho well-brushed, shone in the much used parts and was frayed about the edges. His patent leather shoes were badly cracked, and his overcoat, as it hung by that of his friend, looked like a younger brother, tho evidently much older. In his well-cut features there was the melancholy of thought, and about the lips only partly closed something of the irresolution of will often married to intellectual delicacy. Instead of buoyant optimism there was in this face refined fatigue, which lent a kind of distinction to his manner.

“Old fellow, you have lost the feeling for the imperceptible. I have to hit you on the head now to convey and idea. You are so definite. You are so energetic that nothing but a bellows or a hammer can make any impression on you... You have learned to think that there is nothing real that isn’t prominent, nothing beautiful that isn’t effective.”

Hapgood, pp. 212-3.

The American even when he is a Bohemian is seldom the “real thing”: he always retains an element of strenuousness. He not only occasionally works hard, but it is his common practise to “talk hard.” He even talks extremely; a real Bohemian, however, does nothing in excess; he avoids stress of any kind. Then again the American Bohemian is not entirely careless and disreputable and the foreign Bohemian generally is.

Ibid., p. 120.

The supernatural darkness of cold-water flats floating across the tops of cities contemplating jazz

Ginsberg, Howl, p. 3.

Never had I seen a dwelling of its kind before. With a sinking sensation, I wondered if this was what lay in my future. There was no refrigerator, I remember, and only the barest necessities—a pinched, woebegone scene, to be sure. But because of the presence of books, hundreds of them, and an upright piano, it was inevitable that I would romanticize the whole thing, and that I’d do it in hackneyed, bohemian terms: the struggling artist, his humble garret, a life of high-principled sacrifice.

Lesueur, N. pag.

His pad on East 4th Street was a three-room citadel of verminous grime.

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 143.

Must watch for police—tombs stay avoided by leap from trolleyback, running back with dogs to huddle safely—home? heartfilled wandering, more like it—apartment is dirthole with rats, mice, and other friends—they at least don’t talk back.

Jones, Modernism, p. 228.

He located an apartment at 28 Allen Street, a few blocks south of Houston. It was a typical two-room tub-in-the-kitchen slum apartment painted dogtongue green. The human who had previously lived there had somehow caused the walls to become streaked with long lines of gray brown grease furry to the touch because of the trapped soot. The plaster was tumbling from the ceiling and the front window, opening on Allen Street, had been based in and replaced with the door of a cigarette vending machine. What a crummy apartment.

Sanders, Beatnik, p. 205.
Outside the door of her loft are steep threatening steps and total ugliness.
Blandford, p. 175.

In recollections of the 1950s, in films, and in photographs, perhaps the most striking feature of Manhattan that emerges again and again is its emptiness—the abandoned look of even its most important arteries. Third and Sixth Avenues had the excuse of sudden exposure after decades under the shadow, soot, and screech of their elevated lines. But much of the rest of New York looked similar—beaten up and exhausted by hard use. This comes out most poignantly in photographic records of Greenwich Village. The streets are void of traffic, both vehicular and pedestrian: parking spaces abound; the signs are handmade and amateurish. Café and restaurant interiors resemble grammar school classrooms, a clutter of junk and a creativity more childish than avant-garde. Exteriors seem forgotten, embalmed: in a 1960 photo of the White Horse Tavern on Hudson Street, now a sidewalk café overrun by models and stockbrokers, looks like what it then really was: a seedy bar on the corner of fire escapes and walkup apartments. [Desolation] [Pollution] [Sound]
Caldwell, pp. 300-1.

Allen Ginsberg denounces the city’s robot apartments, invisible suburbs, and sphinxes of cement and aluminum not simply for the pure machinery of their homogenous spatial aesthetics but also for the psycho-social damage that they inflict upon urban subjects by bashing open the skulls, eating up the brains and imagination, and destroying the best minds of his generation.
Bennett, p. 6.

Moloch! Moloch! Robot apartments! invisible suburbs! skeleton treasuries! blind capitals! demonic industries! spectral nations! invincible madhouses!
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 7.

All young, all poor, all sloppy, all artists, and all interesting, smart, and fun to be around. Hooray for us, and fuck the doctors, lawyers, dentists, and accountants our parents wanted for us!
Tucker, p. 140.

Eccentric urban experiences that exist beneath the surface, on the margins, or along the interstices of the city’s more homogenous urban center. The explore aberrant spatio-temporal dimensions, heterogeneous urban topographies, and deviant urban paradigms, but they explicitly associate these anomalous urban spaces with some kind of alternative, counter-hegemonic city-within-city or some marginalized urban space that is dominated, opposed, stalked, haunted, or repressed by the corporate city that surrounds it. [Psychogeography]
Bennett, p. 9.

When you went over to La Monte and Marian’s place, you were there for a minimum of seven hours—probably end up to be two or three days. It was a very Turkish type scene. It was a pad with everything on the floor and beads and great hashish and street people coming and scoring—and this droning music going on. La Monte had this whole thing where he would do a performance that would go on for days and he would have people droning with him. Droning is holding a single note for a whole La Monte Young was the best drug connection in New York. He had the best drugs—the best! Great big acid pills, and opium, and grass too.

La Monte Young: “I was—so to speak—the darling of the avant-garde. Yoko Ono was always saying to me, ‘If only I could be as famous as you.’”

James Schulyer: “It’s a remarkably dreary day out here and I think I’ll soon be staying more at my New York pad, on East 35th—a nice blah sort of neighborhood, unostentatious middle class, my dish exactly. I admire my friends who have the courage to live on the Lower East side; I certainly haven’t.”

As I hovered ghost-like in the Plaza Red Room of a Saturday afternoon, or went to lush and liquid garden parties in the East Sixties or tippled with Princetonians in the Biltmore Bar I was haunted always by my other life—my drab room in the Bronx, my square foot of the subway, my fixation upon the day’s letter from Alabama—would it come and what would it say?—my shabby suits, my poverty, and love. While my friends were launching decently into life I had muscled my inadequate bark into midstream.

In our century, nostalgia not for displaced immigrants but for displaced bohemians.

The Village

If you want to get out of America, go to Greenwich Village.

Let’s make the Village or go to the Lower East Side and play Symphony Sid on the radio—or play our Indian records—and eat big dead Puerto Rican steaks—or lung stew—see if Bruno has slashed any more car roofs in Brooklyn—though Bruno’s gentled now, maybe he’s written a new poem.

Or look at Television. Night life—Oscar Levant talking about his melancholia on the Jack Paar show.

The Five Spot on 5th Street and Bowery sometimes features Thelonious Monk on the piano and you go on there. If you know the proprietor you sit down at the table free with a beer, but if you don’t know him you can sneak in and stand by the ventilator and listen. Always crowded weekends. Monk cogitates with deadly abstraction, clonk, and makes a statement, huge foot beating delicately on the floor, head turned to one side listening, entering the piano.

Lester Young played there just before he died and used to sit in the back kitchen between sets. My buddy poet Allen Ginsberg went back and got on his knees and asked him what he would do if an atom bomb fell on New York. Lester said he would break the window in Tiffany’s and get some jewels anyway. He also said, “What you doin’ on your knees?” not realizing he is a great hero of the beat generation and now enshrined. The Five Spot is darkly lit, has weird waiters, good music always, sometimes John “Train” Coltrane showers his rough notes from his big tenor horn all over the place. On weekends parties of well-dressed up-towners jam-pack the place talking continuously—nobody minds.

O for a couple of hours, though, in the Egyptian Gardens in the lower West Side Chelsea district of Greek restaurants.—Glasses of ouzo, Greek liqueur, and beautiful girls dancing the belly dance in spangles and beaded bras, the incomparable Zara on the floor and weav ing like mystery to the flutes and tingtang beats of Greece—when she’s not dancing she sits in the orchestra with the men plapping a drum against her belly, dreams in her eyes.—Huge crowds of what appear to be Suburbia couples sit at the tables clapping to the swaying Oriental idea.—If you’re late you have to stand along the wall.

Wanta dance? The Garden Bar on Third Avenue where you can do fantastic sprawling dances in the dim back room to a jukebox, cheap, the waiter doesn’t care. Wanta just talk? The Cedar Bar on University Place where all the painters hang out and a 16-year-old kid who was there one afternoon squirting red wine out of a Spanish wine skin into his friends’ mouths and kept missing...

The night clubs of Greenwich Village known as the Half Note, the Village Vanguard, the Cafe Bohemia, the Village Gate also feature jazz (Lee Konitz, J. J. Johnson, Miles Davis), but you’ve got to have mucho money and it’s not so much that you’ve got to have mucho money but the sad commercial atmosphere is killing jazz and jazz is killing itself there, because jazz belongs to open joyful ten-cent beer joints, as in the beginning.

There’s a big party at some painter’s loft, wild loud flamenco on the phonograph, the girls suddenly become all hips and heels and people try to dance between their flying hair.—Men go mad and start tackling people, flying wedges hurtle across the room, men grab men around the knees and lift them nine feet from the floor and lose their balance and nobody gets hurt, blonk.—Girls are balanced hands on men’s knees, their skirts falling and revealing frills on their thighs.—Finally everybody dresses to go home and the host says dazedly.—“You all look so respectable.”

Or somebody just had an opening, or there’s a poetry reading at the Living Theater, or at the Gaslight Cafe, or at the Seven Arts Coffee Gallery, up around Times Square (9th Avenue and 43rd Street, amazing spot) (begins at midnight Fridays), where afterward everybody rushes out to the old wild bar.—Or else a huge party at Leroi Jones’—he’s got a new issue of Yugen Magazine which he printed himself on a little cranky machine and everybody’s poems are in it, from San Francisco to Gloucester Mass., and costs only 50 cents.—Historic publisher, secret hipster of the trade.—Leroi’s getting sick of parties, everyone’s always taking off his shirt and dancing, three sentimental girls are crooning over poet Raymond Bremer, my buddy Gregory Corso is arguing with a New York Post reporter saying, “But you dont understand Kangarooonian weep! Forsake thy trade! Flee to the Enchanted Islands!”

Let’s get out of here, it’s too literary.—Let’s go get drunk on the Bowery or eat those long noodles and tea in glasses at Hong Pat’s in Chinatown.—What are we always eating for? Let’s walk over the Brooklyn Bridge and build up another appetite.—How about some okra on Sands Street?

Shades of Hart Crane.
Don Joseph is a terrific cornet player who wanders around the Village with his little mustache and his arms hangin at the sides with the cornet, which creaks when he plays softly, nay whispers, the greatest sweetest cornet since Bix and more.—He stands at the jukebox in the bar and plays with the music for a beer.—He looks like a handsome movie actor.—He’s the great super glamorous secret Bobby Hackett of the jazz world. What about that guy Tony Fruscella who sits cross-legged on the rug and plays Bach on his trumpet, by ear, and later on at night there he is blowing with the guys at a session, modern jazz—

Or George Jones the secret Bowery shroud who plays great tenor in parks at dawn with Charley Mariano, for kicks, because they love jazz, and that time on the waterfront at dawn they played a whole session as the guy beat on the dock with a stick for the beat. Talkin of Bowery shrouds, what about Charley Mills walkin down the street with bums drinkin his bottle of wine singing in twelve tone scale.

“Let’s go see the strange great secret painters of America and discuss their paintings and their visions with them—Iris Brodie with her delicate fawn Byzantine filigree of Virgins—"

“Or Miles Forst and his black bull in the orange cave.”
“Or Franz Klein and his spiderwebs.”
“His bloody spiderwebs!”
“Or Willem de Kooning and his White.”
“Or Robert De Niro.”
“Or Dody Muller and her Annunciations in seven feet tall flowers.”
“Or Al Leslie and his giant feet canvases.”
“Al Leslie’s giant is sleeping in the Paramount building.”

There’s another great painter, his name is Bill Heine, he’s a really secret subterranean painter who sits with all those weird new cats in the East Tenth street coffeeshops that dont look coffeeshops at all but like sorta Henry Street basement secondhand clothes stores except you see an African sculpture or maybe a Mary Frank sculpture over the door and inside they play Frescobaldi on the hi fi.

AH, LET’S GO BACK TO THE VILLAGE and stand on the corner of Eighth Street and Sixth Avenue and watch the intellectuals go by.—AP reporters lurching home to their basement apartments on Washington Square, lady editorialists with huge German police dogs breaking their chains, lonely dikes melting by, unknown experts on Sherlock Holmes with blue fingernails going up to their rooms to take scopolamine, a muscle-bound young man in a cheap gray German suit explaining something weird to his fat girl friend, great editors leaning politely, at the newsstand buying the early edition of the Times; great fat furniture movers out of 1910 Charlie Chaplin films coming home with great bags full of chop suey (feeding everybody), Picasso’s melancholy harlequin now owner of a print and frame shop musing on his wife and newborn child lifting up his finger for a taxi, rolypoly recording engineers rush in fur hats, girl artists down from Columbia with D. H. Lawrence problems picking up 50-year-old men, old men in the Kettle of Fish, and the melancholy spectre of New York Women’s prison that looms high and is folded in silence as the night itself—at sunset their windows look like oranges—poet e. e. cummings buying a package of cough drops in the shade of that monstrosity.—If it’s raining you can stand under the awning in front of Howard Johnson’s and watch the street from the other side.

Beatnik Angel Peter Orlovsky in the supermarket five doors away buying Uneeda Biscuits (late Friday night), ice cream, caviar, bacon, pretzels, sodapop, TV Guide, Vaseline, three toothbrushes, chocolate milk (dreaming of roast suckling pig), buying whole Idaho potatoes, raisin bread, wormy cabbage by mistake, and fresh-felt tomatoes and collecting purple stamps.—Then he goes home broke and dumps it all on the table, takes out a big book of Mayakovsky poems, turns on the 1949 television set to the horror movie, and goes to sleep.

And this is the beat night life of New York.

The monkish Mondrian took up jazz dancing while in New York as a tribute to the spirit of the place.

Conrad, p. 121.

All here is intimidation, if you are young and recently arrived in the Village: Kafka and Brecht, Artaud and Ionesco glower from book jackets; the clerks look through you; Eli Willentz, the owner, sighs when you mispronounce a writer’s name. But look: There is James Baldwin, home from Europe, talking near the counter to Eli—a man like any man, not a statue in the park; Robert Creeley is in from Black Mountain College; the small, dark man looking at the book of drawings by Heinrich Kley is Alfred Andriola, who draws “Kerry Drake” in the Mirror; the thick-bodied man with the face of a disappointed stevedore is Franz Kline; and walking past the store, waving diffidently, is Harold Rosenberg. To make this a perfect New York evening, the next strolling New Yorker would have to be Sal Maglie.

There, wandering up from MacDougal Street: That’s Joe Gould, who has translated Rimbaud into the language of seagulls and is writing the oral history of the world.

You have come up out of the subway from Brooklyn or Queens or the Bronx and are engulfed by swarming crowds, lining up for Bergman or Fellini at the 8th Street or the Art, and the very air seems thick with sensuality.

You are once again at the bar of the Five Spot on St. Marks Place. You are listening to Monk, of course, and working hard at being hip.

You could sit on a bar stool and look out the windows to the snowy streets and see heavy people going by, David Amram bundled up, Gregory Corso, Ted Joans, Fred Hellerman.

Dylan, Chronicles, p. 47.

I remember when Ron Padgett and I first arrived in New York City we told a cab driver to take us to the Village. He said, “Where?” And we said, “To the Village.” He said, “But where in the Village?” And we said, “Anywhere.” He took us to Sixth Avenue and 8th Street. I was pretty disappointed. I thought that the Village would be like a real village. Like my vision of Europe.

This is an unexposed film of Greenwich Village because nothing ever happens there... The artists have all gone in for still life... because the models are working in defense plants and eating regular... A girl who doesn’t wear moccasins and slacks is considered anti-social… the favorite meeting place is at the “Cercle de la Paix”—the circle of peace—that’s Washington Square Park… When it gets colder the rendezvous is at the Waldorf Cafeteria at 6th Avenue and 8th Street… You can tell the artists by their berets and beards… and frustrated looks.

Weegee, Naked, p. 229.

I love the Village… the most sensitive spot in town… the soul of the city, where people are friendly, understanding, and approving—there are no lonely-hearts clubs there. Up to the time this book went to press I continually photographed the Village… compiling a memento of a place that seemed to be fast disappearing. New York University is tearing down all the old buildings and putting up more classrooms so they can teach Ceramics, Square Dancing, and primitive Painting à la Grandma Moses. (Where do they get all the money?) The old landmarks are going the way of all brick—threatening a severe shortage of cold water flats. But there is a counter movement to tear down all the modern half-room apartment houses… and a petition is making the rounds in the better bars and espresso coffee houses to move N.Y.U. out to the Yucca Flats in the Arizona Desert so the soldier boys can practice dropping H-bombs. On the site of N.Y.U. will be erected cold water flats, the greatest blessing to modern civilization.

People flock to the Village to escape… to be different… or even just to be themselves and to meet kindred souls. A weekly visit to your analyst is a must (an analyst can be seen toting a collapsible couch through Washington Square Park, on his way to a house call). Freud is the favorite author. The Village is full of creative talent: painters, actors, dancers, writers, waiting to be recognized. However, if you meet a guy who composes songs, flies a plane, reads The New Yorker, cooks spaghetti, wears a bow tie and a goatee, and smokes a pipe… he’s no genius.

There’s plenty of nightlife in the Village. Broadway is now called “Cinderella Land” because everything shuts off at midnight. But that’s the hour things start humming in the Village.

The best time to start on a tour of Bohemia is 10 o’clock at night (stay away Saturday night—that’s when the tourists from the Bronx flock to the Village, and the Villagers flee to the Bronx). Sheridan Square is the place to start—you can tell it’s Sheridan Square because that’s where you’ll find the couples kissing hello and goodnight at the subway station. At Sheridan Square look into the window of the Limelight, maybe two or three times an evening. Then across the Square and into the Riviera—the friendliest spot in town… then go to Louis’s for a beer—very crowded, and on to the Montmartre for another beer—only 15¢ a glass, and refreshing and the exercise is good for you. But don’t stay in any one spot too long… travel… move.

The shops on West 4th Street have good windows to look into: handmade leather goods, jewelry, paintings, sculpture, etc. Stop in at Jon’s Scandinavian Shop for wine on the house. Take a look at the people around you too… the men with beards, the girls sans makeup and ponytails—both in dark jerseys, blue jeans and sandals.

Walk along MacDougal Street and peek into the window of the Caricature Coffee House—just peek, you don’t want to mix coffee and beer. Drop in at the Kettle of Fish Bar… then up to Rienzi’s for a quick look at the bulletin board, where you see that you can get to model to pose in the nude for $2 an hour, in case you want to take up art… People advertise for room-mates, soul-mates, helicopter pilots (probably for the girls who found a cold-water flat on the sixth floor). Then you can stop in, say, at the San Remo bar—see what’s going on there.

If by 4 o’clock, the witching hour, you have not met anybody, something is wrong with you—maybe you should go to the nearest analyst. But don’t give up hope—last stop is Lenny’s Hideaway, on West 10th Street. But be careful... a lonely ponytail all by herself is okay... stick close to her... in the Village it’s all right to talk to a stranger without an introduction from Emily Post. But beware of the girl tourists from the Bronx and Brooklyn... they make the rounds of the Village in wolfpacks, tightly corseted and copiously petticoated, flashily dressed in tailor-made suits from the Thrift Shoppe, and $20 Shoes. You can tell the immigrants by their orange pancake makeup and purple lipstick... they usually chew chlorophyll gum and carry a copy of Confidential. These are the career girls looking for Johns (Suckers) to wine and dine them and take them home in cabs... they offer nothing in return... they refuse to give... These are the liberated females who have sold their souls for a weekly paycheck... they hold on to stupid, dopey, uninteresting jobs, and dine at Chock Full O’ Nuts. Their real career begins when they leave their jobs at 5 to attend evening courses at N.Y.U.—where they hope to meet a Jocko who will marry them and free them from the monotony of 9 to 5.

Monday nights they take courses in BALLET... SKIING... HEAD SHRINKING and SKIN DIVING... Wednesdays: PLUMBING... INTERIOR DECORATING and HOW TO BE A DISC JOCKEY... Thursdays: HOW TO BE A HOSTESS AT SCHRAPP'S TEA SHOPPE... HOW TO HAVE A NERVOUS BREAKDOWN & HOW TO MEET YOUR ANALYST... Friday, Saturday & Sunday nights they hang around outside Louis’s Bar on West 4th Street waiting for someone to buy them a drink, their favorite being Scotch with Ginger Ale, mixed.

At least once a week someone throws a party in the Village—a rent party... admission usually 50¢... probably in a loft where everybody sits on the floor, with dark circles under their eyes and listens to bongo drums. Bring your own liquor and your own girl, if possible... Guys go to parties to find girls, but usually they’re all taken. Village girls don’t dress up for parties... just the usual pony tail, dungarees, black jersey... no bra, no makeup. The Village girl seems to be from another planet... she could walk through walls... she seems to have an inexhaustible capacity for beer—sometimes she round trips to all the places... You never see anyone eat in the Village—the steady diet is beer.

Sunday is a big day in the Village. In the afternoon everyone meets at the fountain at Washington Square Park—you can tell it’s a fountain because there’s no running water... Kids come with their banjos and harmonicas and sing folksongs... and folks wander about—maybe looking at the outdoor art show... People sit in the sun and look put for friends.

Evening falls, and in ones, twos and threes, lamplit figures drift away, leaving the park almost deserted... except for a couple here and there sitting close together. The solitary lonely ones, startled put of their reveries by the silence, awake to the reality of the evening meal and the approaching Monday morning... and to postpone lonely reality, they start their weary rounds... looking... searching.

Q. Do you think Greenwich Village girls come to a good end?

No they don’t. The ones that came here were very sick in the first place. After staying here, they’re either sicker or not so sick. If they’re sicker, they’re interesting, but not all right. If they’re not sick, they’re not interesting.

Q. What do you mean by sick?
Neurotic.

Toreador pants, flat ballet slippers (if she isn’t wearing Murray Space Shoes), a pony tail or a short man-styled hair cut. [Fashion]
Ibid., p. 19.

A penchant for woolen knee-socks. [Fashion]
Ibid., p. 23.

Properly faded blue jeans that are reasonably tight; a fashionable seedy white sweatshirt; a Paisley scarf, moccasin-type shoes. [Fashion]

Listens to Bob and Ray, to music on NYC and QXR, and hates Dorothy and Dick. She faithfully reads Time, the New Yorker, the Village Voice, occasionally the Reporter, the Saturday Review, and Partisan Review. For hours she gloats over Vogue’s fashion pictures. She can write, paint, decorate, make pottery, make strange earrings and even dance to tom-tom music. There is at least one philodendron plant in her apartment.

Her job is less creative that she would like. Her office associates talk about her as if she were a cultured prostitute.

She smokes Pall Malls or Marlboros, is a moderate drinker, prefers Scotch, likes gin, but settles for beer.

“There is no room for youth and vitality in New York,” said Gregory Corso. “It is a city full of guilty academicians.”

“Too big, too multiple, too jaded,” chanted Jack Kerouac.

Balaban, p. 40.

At once time in the past it was said that they danced on the Arch and spoke and swung from trees and stumbled round the Square over grass, into grass, and ran and fell on top of each other on the grass, and once too the grass was full with not too many dirt spots, brown and lifeless with bits of grey showing through where the earth had been worn right down to the rock on which everything stood.

Coleman, p. 206.

I flutter down the jocund aisles, the plaintively-garish corridors of New York, bumping into solemn-eyed, three-fourths happy poets, drained, humorous futurist-artists, wives of poets who have short strings to which their husbands are attached, enormous-bearded, bubbling sculptors, prostitutes who are not prostitutes, and Emma Goldman… Goldman: marriage enslaves women; schools stifle children; prisons breed crime; private property perpetuates wars; and religion lulls people into passivity.

Reitano, p. 128.

The greater part of New York is as soulless as a department store; but Greenwich Village has recollections like ears filled with muted music and hopes like sightless eyes straining to catch a glimpse of the beatific vision.

Barnes, p. 225.

Greenwich Village dark and shining and hands reach my way as I traipse thinking they are worse off than I.
Jones, Modernism, p. 224.

Perhaps it would be wise, the night before the General Strike, to have small beat groups scatter throughout the city, pasting up manifests. Then, on the appointed day, events can begin with a motorcycle corps roaring in from the far reaches of the Bronx, from Long Island, from New Jersey, and by ferry from Staten Island, scattering leaflets on their way. Harlem, which was born hip, would swing down in a night march, augmented by roving bands of boppers from Spanish Harlem who would have sheathed their weapons in honor of the occasion. I would suggest that a skiffle group start at 59th Street and jazz its way down Madison Avenue, preaching great New Orleans truth into every door and window of that sad tense street.

Meanwhile, special contingents would be gathering at every coffee shop in the city, each such contingent to be led by a poet and two bongo drummers. Man, in my mind’s most inner eye I dig that sound as it rocks down the great tenement avenues! These groups would all converge on Washington Square, picking up thousands of curious citizens as they bopped along, singing and dancing in the streets. It would be a dramatic sight as the column of Harlem hipsters was joined constantly by new coffee-shop contingents. The folk singers would have already met at Washington Square, where a fantastic morale-building hootenanny would be in full swing. Special hip agents who for months had worked on Madison Avenue under the cover of shaven faces and Dacron suits (and who had even written advertising copy to prove they were square) would be seizing control of the TV and radio stations in order to broadcast good jazz during the daytime, thus alerting the city to the Revolution at hand.

By this time I assume the hipsters would have assembled a crowd of vast proportions. The poets, strange angels of death and of life: improbable possessors of such impossible insane hallucinations as brotherhood, compassion, God—they would lead the line of march. I can see that wonderful assemblage now—folk-singers and dancers bongo-drummers and poets—the whole mighty column marching joyous through the streets, past the Tishman project, right down to City Hall. And there, finally, sustained and inspired by magic horns of jazz, the hip population of our city would march seven times around the City Hall while we stand by the hundreds of thousands to watch. Perhaps—just perhaps—the walls of indifference would crumble, injustice fall broken to the ground. Perhaps Wagner dressed in his usual confusion, would flee. Perhaps Moses would agree to be sheathed in concrete and set in Central Park as a monument of some kind or for pigeons to breathe on. DeSapio, being a shrewd man, would doubtless take off his dark glasses and join the line of march. And thus at last the back of the Tammany Tiger would be broken.

Alas and unfortunately, this is all nothing but fantasy. I’m sure the beats would be no more effective with their General Strike than we have politicos have been with our General Elections. Still—they might be more interesting.

Great things are still being said and done in Greenwich Village today, if you’ll have the patience to wait until some aged scribe sets them to music in the year 1989.

Reisenberg, p. 114.
Tompkins Square Park: in those pre-hippie days it was a bleak and forbidding place frequented by disgruntled old people.
Waldman, p. 295.

Suppose, just for a moment, that everything physical and tangible was an art trend. Everything: food, clothing, shelter, water, trees, animals, sex. This is a wild thing to imagine. But if it were so, the sun, which normally hatches hot from the East River and falls at dusk into the Hudson, would come to an abrupt stop right above Tompkins Square Park. Geographically, this is the dead center of the little hamlet known as the East Village.
Mueller, p. 256.

I loved the slums, my slums, the sweet slums of Bohemia and beatnikdom, where sunflowers and morning glories would bloom on fire escapes in the summer and old ladies weigh down by breasts leaned on goosedown pillows in windows, self-appointed guardians of the street, and Tompkins Square with its onion-topped church had the greyness of photos of Moscow.
Johnson, p. 973.

He rented two-room apartment at 521 East 11th Street in December of 1961 for fifty-six dollars a month. It was on the third floor. One room was a combined kitchen and living room. The other was supposed to be a bedroom. There were no closets, only a five-pronged clothes rack nailed to the wall in the bedroom. The rooms were tiny and both had lumpy metal ceilings stamped with leaf-like patterns in six-inch squares.

The two living-room windows opened onto a fire escape which protruded rustily upon a back courtyard crisscrossed with clotheslines and wet clothes getting gritty from the anus of Satan, otherwise known as the Consolidated Edison smokestacks belching a few blocks away. Some mornings he would awaken with the inside of his nose black-caked with fallout.

Spanish music floated in from the courtyard by day by night by dawn. Someone close by had a rooster and occasionally he heard a faint baaaaa. On the roof of the building directly opposite his fire escape there was a five-tiered pigeon warren which was used ostensibly to supply food for a family in the building. The super, however, swore up and down that the birds were shipped downtown to a Chinese restaurant for squab gobble.

The backroom or bedroom had a single window to the outside which was sealed shut, its panes painted lightless with many coats. When he pried the window open he saw why. The vista was of a gray-streaked solid brick wall about five feet away and a sheer drop to the rubble of the alley dotted with dropped garbage bags, a common disposal method on the East Side.

Like many dinky New York apartments, there was a window between the kitchen and the so-called bedroom. This too was completely covered with years of paint, the newest being avocado green. The icebox was strictly early American and rattled as the motor struggled to propel the refrigerant. The door was almost as cold as the interior and a piece of rubber insulation hung down from the top and prevented it from closing properly. Next to the icebox was a large, low sink which apparently had been originally intended also for use as a washtub. Next to the sink was the bathtub with a removable porcelain-glazed metal covering. Above the bathtub were the kitchen cabinets whose crooked doors could never quite be shut and whose interiors were a sour-smelling barrenness of decayed oilcloths, cockroach egg cases, kernels of roach-chewed rice, coffee grounds, and greasy dust.

The watercloset was jammed into a small booth in the hallway. There was something wrong with the light fixture so he placed a candle on the ledge. Either the user left the hall door open, or lit the candle, or voided in darkness. The toilet gurgled with spilling water twenty-four hours a day. Roaches loved the watercloset. There were hundreds of them. He gave up at once trying to maintain the watercloset with the result that his friends, even the funkiest among them, were loath to lower any exposed skin upon the seat.

There were eight layers of linoleum on the floor. These he chopped up and carted away by the armload. The bare floor itself had never been painted or varnished. It was raw wood. He wondered if he should leave it the way it was. Enough paint splashed on it when he was working on the ceiling and walls, however, that he decided to make it black also.

He wound up painting the entire apartment, floor, ceiling, walls, door, black except for one wall which he painted white intending to cover it with murals. The living room was red orange when he rented the place. There were many buckles, cracks and ridges in the plaster. When painting, he left the cracks and ridges red orange so that there were these groovy abstract red lines and patterns running through the black expanses, man. As for the long white wall, he spent the next few months carefully painting it with multi-colored cuneiform stanzas of Sumerian poetry which he had studied in college.

In those days the Lower East Side on Wednesday nights was a free department store. For it was then that residents would place upon the pavement old furniture, kitchen cabinets, smashed TVs, mattresses tied up with cord, etc., for the refuse department to cart away. Sometimes, as when an elderly person without family would die, the sidewalk outside an apartment would be jammed with trunks full of old clothes, boxes of books, lamps, utensils, and the debris of fifty years. This produced a grab scene almost as if someone had thrown money on the ground. Citizens were thrilled to seize from an old trunk a sport shirt from Honolulu or a photo album dated 1923.

The very first Wednesday he forayed and found a large, lidded packing crate from Japan which he lugged home, painted black, and added to the pad as a table. Some things he had to purchase. One such item was a ten-foot-by-ten-foot bamboo mat edged with black cloth. This was the living room fun-rug. Floor pillows he obtained from old sofas found on the streets. He hung another smaller bamboo mat in the doorway between the two rooms. He rigged a string from the bottom up over a nail at the top of the doorjamb so that the bamboo curtain could be raised or lowered by a tug on the string.

He walked the side streets looking for a throwaway mattress. It was a poor day for freebies. Finally he spotted an old mattress tied up into the shape of a jelly roll with rope and leaning against garbage cans at 9th and Avenue C.

The first thing to ascertain, when checking out a free street mattress, was why it was that the owner had discarded it. He regarded the mattress. Even as a throwaway, it was rather a pitiful specimen. In the first place, the prior owners had not been the most continent of humans as evinced by several widespread spills, so to speak, all over the middle of it. But, when given the firmness and bounce tests, it seemed very substantial. To the nose it was not particularly offensive and he could find no indication thereon and therein of cootie, tick, crab or roach. Therefore, all considered, he grabbed the mattress upon his back and staggered toward 11th Street to his apartment.

Sally is loosing her face she lives on St. Marks Place
In a rent-controlled apartment, eighty dollars a month she has lots of fun, she has lots of fun, but Sally can’t dance no more

She was the first girl in the neighborhood to wear tied-dyed pants, ah, like she should
She was the first girl that I ever seen that had flowers painted on her jeans
She was the first girl in her neighborhood who got raped on Tompkins Square, real good
Now she wears a sword, like Napoleon and she kills the boys and acts like a son Reed, “Sally Can’t Dance.”

I do remember that everything in the East Village begins and ends on street level. It was like that in the misty, idealistic ‘60s, when I first moved here and sat with thousands of hippies right where the homeless now sleep. We listened to Jefferson Airplane playing from the bandshell. And through all the fires and muggings and the heroin of the ‘70s to the present —our empty, deadly ‘80s.

Kapralov, p. 88.

I remember Second Avenue and strawberry shortcake at “Ratner’s.”

I remember the St. Mark’s movie theatre until six. The red popcorn machine. And lots of old men.

I remember “Le Metro.” (A coffeehouse on Second Avenue that had poetry readings.) Paul Blackburn. And Diane di Prima sitting on top of a piano reading her poems.

I remember how beautiful snow made the Lower East Side look. [Weather]

I remember “Folk City.” “Man Power.” And selling books at “The Strand.”

I sat at the bar with some middle-aged accountant-looking type: glasses, thinning hair, business suit, the works. He just didn’t look right on Avenue A.

Hamilton, p. 17.

Slum Goddess from the Lower East Side
Slum Goddess gonna make her my bride
Not a chick in the world who’s happy to be she My swinging little goddess from Avenue B
Fugs “Slum Goddess.”
He spent nothing until he passed Gem Spa at St. Mark’s and Second Avenue where he plunked down fifteen cents for a chocolate egg cream and ten cents for the Village Voice.

Jimmy made all his own costumes out of beads and feathers, just putting the materials together as he went along. He lived on Tompkins Square on the Lower East Side where you could still rent whole floors of rooms for just thirty or forty dollars a month. I’d lived in that part of town myself when I first got to New York, on Avenue A and St. Mark’s Place. Even just a little bit of work a month could pay your rent down there. Right up till the summer of ‘67, before drugs came in, the East Village was, in a way, a very peaceful place, full of European immigrants, artists, jazzy blacks, Puerto Ricans—everybody all hanging around door stoops and out the windows. The creative people there weren’t hustling work, they weren’t “upwardly mobile,” they were happy just to drift around the streets looking at everything, enjoying everything: Ratner’s, Gem’s Spa, Polish restaurants, junk stores, dry goods stores—maybe go home and write in a diary about what they’d enjoyed that day or choreograph something they’d gotten an idea about. They used to say that the East Village was the bedroom of the West Village, that the West Village was the action and the East Village was the place you rested up in.

By the early sixties the Judson dance concerts were a fulltime dance theater. They could stage a whole ballet for no more than fifty dollars—the kids in the company would ransack friends’ apartments for props and go down to Orchard Street and pick through materials for costumes. The same went for the plays done at places like the Café La Mama and the Caffe Cino, where a lot of the Judson dancers performed when they weren’t waiting on tables.

Back in the 1970s, an urban eccentric named Adam Purple (born David Wilkie), built the Garden of Eden on Manhattan’s Lower East Side. An oasis of agriculture amidst a sea of bricks and steel, the garden was a stunning design of plants and flowers, brilliantly organized into concentric circles around a central Yin-Yang symbol. Purple had miraculously transformed five abandoned city lots into a wonderland of raspberry bushes and roses. Dressed entirely in purple, he would bicycle up to Central Park to collect horse manure and then ride back downtown with fertilizer in tow. For eighteen years Purple lived an astonishingly ascetic life with no heat, no electricity, and no plumbing. He spent his days scavenging for wood (a wood-burning stove cooked his only food, a tofu-based vegetarian stew), collecting cans (an income of $2,000 a year from recycling sustained him) and tending to the dilapidated building.
Segal, p. 76.

Long after midtown office towers have been deserted for the day, as many New Yorkers snuggle into bed in their high-rise apartments, another world comes to life in the seedier districts of Lower Manhattan. From 11 p.m. to 5 a.m., Monday through Sunday, the young and the active pack into musty East Village basement bars, cavernous lofts in warehouse districts, or short-lived speakeasies that, because they lack liquor licenses, tend to fall prey to police raids. Disdaining the laser lights and droning beat of ’70s discos, these clubs offer an ’80s alternative: riotous after-hours vaudeville complete with drag shows, art auctions, raunchy comedy revues and theme parties celebrating such diverse topics as sexual obsession and Tupperware. The purpose, believe it or not, is art. For many of the city’s thousands of working artists and countless aspiring actors, shunned by conventional artistic outlets like uptown galleries and Broadway, the clubs offer a congenial, supportive alternative—a brave new world wilder than the dreams of the sleeping city. This outlandish scene has its own celebrities (John Sex and Gracie Mansion), fashions (spike cuts and crew cuts) and rules for conduct (regulars rarely dance, even in clubs with constant rock music). Says one club-hopper, “It encompasses Berlin before and after the war—the decadence of before, the look of after.” Weekend tourists from the 9-to-5 world, unlike in-crowd members, wait in lines at club doors, pay $3 to $15 cover charges and rarely get free drinks. All in all, a small price to pay for an eccentric evening out.

Small, N. pag.

One Wednesday around midnight a woman named Philly and her friend Stephen Tashjian, both in their 20s, scuttle around the basement of a onetime Ukrainian blue-collar bar revamped in 1982 as the Pyramid Cocktail Lounge. Philly, who dropped her given name when she moved to the East Village from Philadelphia, smears on the same apple-red lipstick that Stephen wears. He is draping himself with plastic oranges and cherries for his Carmen Miranda act; she is stuffing tiny rotten bananas under layers of shawls and rags that transform her into a “monkey/woman/creature.” Finally, clad to fruitarian perfection, they climb up a wooden stairway and emerge into a tiny, windowless room where a solid mass of sweaty kids flail to the beat. A spotlight hits the stage, where a sign bears the name of tonight’s extravaganza, Flying Down to Rio. Shaking his hips to a calypso beat, Stephen takes center stage carrying a trombone. Combining the best of Tiny Tim and Shecky Green, he sings in falsetto, toots his horn, treats his fans to a few raunchy jokes and exits. Philly comes on next to the tune of the Belafonte hit Day-O. “I love bananas, big yellow bananas,” she screeches as she spits some on the cat-calling audience. Five minutes later she curtsies primly and exits.

“That was sort of a throwaway performance,” Philly admits afterward. She and Stephen, who play the clubs as often as four times a week, usually perform in more literate skits—such as I Love Ruthie, their version of I Love Lucy ‘80s-style and In Praise of Java, a show for coffee believers. That’s as legit as they get. “Boy George is interesting but he’s too polished. You need a bit more slime and a bit more trash than that,” says Philly. Mark Phred, who appears with Philly in some of her other performances, details the logistical realities of their profession: “They call us up and say, ‘Can you be South American sun gods showing a synthesis of Egyptian and Polynesian cultures and the space theory in a sort of go-go dance?’ And we do it—because that’s how we pay our rent.”

On the downtown nightclub circuit, where most performers earn about $50 a night—with occasional gusts up to $1,000—Philly and her partners are far from unique. As actor Kestutis Nakas puts it, “Working the clubs is much more exciting and vital than hustling your resume to get a bit part on a soap opera.” John Sex agrees. Best known for his straight-up hairdo and slimy nightclub act, John, a former male stripper, now supports himself singing hits like his R-rated version of That’s Life. “I’ve been a hustler, a hooker, a honcho, a hero, a dike and a queen,” John sings to the classic Sinatra tune. Sex, who has been 24 for years, just landed a recording deal with Island Records. “I’m a nice Catholic boy from Long Island and everything my mother didn’t want me to be,” he admits.

Joe Bernard, alias Zette, earns $110 a night acting out Area’s regularly changing themes, often behind glass in an enclosed stage resembling a department store window. For the theme of Confinement, Zette, 25, impersonated Rapunzel, Quasimodo, Anne Frank and various women under hair dryers. (Area nixed his crucifixion act because he wanted to do it during Easter week.)

In 1979, seasoned pro Ann Magnuson, 27, ran the now-defunct Club 57, a low-budget, high-energy cabaret where almost all of today’s scene makers first displayed their talents. Now Ann presents 25 or so characters, including an evangelist named Alice Tully Hall, “a combination of Loretta Lynn and Lotte Lenya,” in comic half-hour vignettes. About the growing club circuit, Ann says, “Most of the people here are trying to make sense of what they grew up with in the ’60s and ’70s. We take all those elements and put them back together in different configurations and try to make people laugh. And we make them think.”

Gracie Mansion, who named herself after the New York mayor’s residence, used to show her friends’ artwork in her bathroom. Now she owns one of the East Village’s most successful galleries. To stay in touch, she regularly attends clubs whose walls are covered with the work of artists she represents. Who first thought of showing art in nightclubs is a point of endless contention, but the best guess is now-well-known artist Keith Haring, who curated a show in 1979 at Club 57 during its heyday. Anyway, all the right places now do it—and some even specialize in it. Haoui (pronounced Howie) Montaug, 32, a veteran clubgoer who helps run Danceteria, explains the phenomenon: “Everybody who used to be a musician in a band is now a painter. For the locals, art is a bigger draw than anything else, including music. And the clubs have to go with what people want.” Neophyte fashion designer Michael Wylde, 23, praises the clubs for the same reason most painters do: “Showing there makes my clothes more accessible to the people who buy them. Nobody I know would go to a fashion show at noon.”

Kamikaze, in a warehouse next to the Hudson River, runs the most elaborate art shows. Every other Thursday curator Stacie Teele, 23—or one of her friends—opens a new exhibit with an average of 20 contributors. During the past nine months about 1,000 young artists have hung their works for as many as 1,500 art lovers per opening. Says Stacie, “In a gallery you look at a painting for two seconds. In a club, you look at it several times a night.” It was probably Limbo, a two-year-old art bar now closed for a move to a larger space that ran the first club art auctions. Once 80 works were sold in a single night for $40 to $575 apiece. Moreover, the benefits are not merely monetary. “The first go-round you look at the paintings,” says one faithful viewer, “the second go-round you look at the people.”

On any given night the four floors of Danceteria might house an art exhibit, a live band, a dinner party and a fashion show. Across town, 8 B.C.—located in a deteriorating 1850s farmhouse with a large stage (and a slight cockroach problem) on a burned-out street—sometimes presents five short theater pieces a night. Area, an immaculate space in New York’s old Pony Express building, celebrates its complete redecoration every six weeks with a special Wednesday bash. On Mondays exotic performers invade the Area dance floor for Obsession nights to act out such compulsions as “pets” and “body oddities.” Limelight, a traditional disco on many nights, despite its location in a former Episcopal church, also sponsors wild theme parties. Recently art director Malcolm Kelso, 34, recreated scenes from different Fellini movies there; another night he threw a pajama party for 1,600 people. Meanwhile, the Limbo crew runs a production company called Anonymous Productions that books about 100 acts (including the Pop Tarts) into various clubs.

All this activity does not go unappreciated. Desirable patrons are under steady—though imaginative—emotional siege. Stephen Saban, 38, who writes a column about the clubs for Details, a fashion and nightlife magazine, jokes that they send him invitations every 15 minutes. Danceteria and the Pyramid print newsletters every two weeks, Area invitations come with a dog bone, a beach thong or other prizes. Of course, the hippest club-hoppers—like Saban and Dianne Brill—don’t need invitations to know which way the wind is blowing. Dubbed the Queen of the Scene, fashion designer Brill, 25, goes out midweek—weekends are too crowded—but this Florida native knows New York’s nightlife better than most. “A ‘scene person’ has to be involved in art, fashion and music and have a pretty good understanding of what’s fresh in these mediums,” says Dianne of the hundreds of club-goers she sees nightly. “You also have to be active—at least go to the key parties once a week. It takes discipline to know when to go out and when to stay in. Believe me, having fun is work.” Then, with an appropriately dramatic sigh, she adds, “What a life.”

Ibid.

The Pyramid on Avenue A was the haven and birthplace of a whole new breed of drag queens: Ethel Eichelberger, Hapi Phace, John Kelly, RuPaul, Lypsinka, Lady Bunny, Taboo!

Frisa, p. 167.

The Palladium: “What I was most interested in was that the discotheque as a building type almost extends beyond the conventional idea of architecture and that even substance is lost in its space. Needless to say, however, its space is naturally built and affected by forms and their material composition as in a usual traditional building, nevertheless, these greatly lose their importance in a disco space, and, instead, momentarily passing lights, sounds and visionary images come to the fore. Although lighting, video and music are elements of an architectural space, they come to play the main roles in a discotheque. Each of these elements is the material and media of a new type brought forth by the technology of this age. If it is confirmed that space can be transformed by such elements, it will be quite a rare case in the sphere of contemporary architecture where a field of experiment has been lost. Above all, in a discotheque, such technologies pour over the whole body of a person like a shower and stimulate all the senses. It is as if hidden desire is evoked. Rather it would be better to say that a shower of technologies gives birth to successive desires.”

Ibid., p. 178.

Tinkerbelle, an underground celebrity who had written for Interview and had starred on cable TV. Her whole life revolved around nightclubs. The worst was when she couldn’t get into the Palladium. That was such an enormous blow to her. She talked about it for weeks and weeks and weeks, and didn’t let up, and went back to it, and niggled away. It just devastated her. It blew her ego away. On January 22, 1986, she leapt to her death from a fifth-story window.

Haden-Guest, p. 277.
We couldn’t wait for it to open. It was going to be the most sophisticated club in New York: the one with space done by an architect and the decor done by artists. It was going to have more speakers, more video screens, more lights, more DJs, more space than any other club in New York. It does. It has more speakers and video screens and lights and DJs and space than any other club in New York. But who has more than one perfect body to take it all in? Who has more than one pair of eyes to see it all? Who has more than one pair of ears to hear it all? Who has more than one brain to sift through it all? Who can see another’s face in that kind of machine gun light? Who can talk to another in that kind of industrial noise? Who can find a friend in that dark smoky factory of entertainment?

Are the seventies already being revived? Who’s heard your joke? Who touches your elbow? Who can see you dancing? Who knows it’s you? Who is the man sitting at the bar? Where is the man who was sitting at the bar a minute ago? Look at that green hair. Look at the scenery going up. Look at the video screens coming down. Look at the tiny people swarming up and down the stairs. Look at those people like fluttering confetti on the dance floor. Who are you here? A feverish molecule in a disco dictatorship trying to catch desire by the tail. But dictatorships think only of the masses (consisting of all those who think more is better and that it’s the only place to be if you have to line up outside to get in). It’s like a large department store: they have everything but you can’t find what you are looking for. It’s like an airport, or a train station (without planes or trains to take you places): a space so huge you become anonymous in it. It’s like the first day at school, only at night, and in a class of 3000. That’s entertainment in the post-Orwell metropolis. Rumor has it that Big Brother furtively swings at the old El Morocco.

Ibid., p. 178.

At Area: “The silver bar is where worlds collide. Andy Warhol might be brushing up against Malcolm Forbes, Keith Haring and Jean Michel Basquiat against David Byrne or Giorgio Armani, Scavullo and Joan Rivers against Phoebe Cates or Henry Geldzahler. And if no one’s mixing, Stephen Saban, the Boswell of the night, will push them together, later to remind them what happened in his column in Details.”

Kornbluth, “Area,” p.34.

I can’t exactly remember when the world stepped out of the underground and entered the unceasing flux of consensus. It happened, I guess, around 11 o’clock on the evening of December 8, 1980, uptown New York, on the sidewalk in front of the Dakota building. David Mark Chapman, twenty-five years old, from Hawaii, popped out from the underground of his mind and fired five shots at John Lennon. When Lennon died at St. Luke’s–Roosevelt Hospital Center, the underground ended and the eighties began. The seventies were the subsoil of our culture, maybe not really the sub-soil but only a sad basement, one of those with windows at sidewalk level, from where you can see people’s ankles passing by. The ankle is that part of the body that more than any other reveals how unsexy the seventies were. From the basement the world was seeking out for some form of deliverance. From their ankles the seventies wanted to climb up as far as to the shoulders.

Honestly the true underground was finished by the end of the sixties, with the livid turmoil of the 68’s movement making mincemeat of it. The seventies, by contrast, were a pimple on the face of Western society. The underground was the smell of cigarette smoke, unmade beds, bodies naked, not bundled up, dark glasses even at night, speed not thrift, personal not collective risk, vulgarity not malaise, personality not insecurity. The bullets that smacked into John Lennon’s body arrived from the seventies’ awkwardness, shattering what was left over from the sixties. Those bullets made a breach in the sewers of the Western world’s underground, from which it poured out the excessive effluvium of a decade in which success and excess swapped places continually, softening even the hardest dwellers of sewers, cellars and miserable basements.

The eighties were a blaze of fireworks in the sky of the history of our still 100% pure Western world... The third world, the real underground of our civilization, appeared in the streets of New York ennobled by the collarless shirt of Francesco Clemente, the forerunner of all the rebels who since then have been splashed on the covers of the best reviews, flushed out of their cellars and hosted on cozy couches of Soho’s lofts. The eighties wiped off the sweat of India, blew away the dust of Mali, sweetened Mexican chilies. The apartheid society of success and consensus was born.

Underground dwellers were no longer allowed into restaurants, clubs, bars, exhibitions, everything was now reserved for “the people” of the rowdy eighties. To be against meant simply and solely being lonely on the outside, devolution was no longer sexy but simply the “ankle” of society. AIDS began to devour excess but not success, and strikingly even illness became mainstream. As the eighties wore on, the difference between the opening of a gallery and a funeral service became increasingly slender. Dying is better, when all’s said and done, than sliding downstairs into the basement. Basquiat was the dark side of Warhol, Mapplethorpe of Haring. The damned no longer existed or at least no one really wanted to meet them. Everyone who used to be part of the culture of the underground simply became losers in the eighties. The underground disappeared because it had lost its charm and the eighties were the time when defeat was no longer an alternative but an antisocial gesture, a time when the individual no longer offered any energy to the flux and hence had to be isolated, forgotten, abandoned and eventually terminated.

Those who died as losers died twice over in the society of the eighties. While the seventies brought about the genocide of individual ideas and identities, the eighties saw the genocide of those who were “different,” not sexually or racially different but economically different and marginal. The eighties saw the extermination of those who failed to enter the flux of consensus, of success and excess. The eighties saw the massacre of those who for one reason or other survived the final demolition of the underground. The eighties poured layers of concrete into the subsoil and it’s still hard to see what survived underneath. In a imaginary world of sci-fi archeology, when someone will dare to dig into the crust of the twentieth century, they’ll reach a point in which a void will appear, like an air chamber: they will have uncovered the civilization of the eighties, an era when a whole society was erected on top of a void surface. Religion, politics and rebellion arrived drained by the violence of the seventies and, passing the border of the new decade, let themselves be disarmed by a generation that no longer saw in the night a darkness where to disappear into, but the fight shining off a perverse but unrotten hedonism. Shooting up unknown substances, the eighties’ society no longer rotted, it exploded. As in Antonioni’s final film, Zabriskie Point, the explosion of the eighties still continues today, though increasingly in slow motion and with less and less energy. Work has resumed again on rebuilding basements, cellars, undergrounds, where a new generation seems to have holed up, once again to rediscover the stimuli, ideas, and reactions to hide from a bulimic world, which seeks to digest everything and immediately in the juice of consensus. The true underground, however, is holed up there, in those societies still desperately in quest of their modernity. The eighties projected a corrupt image of the West onto the world: they unwittingly caused gangrene in the wounds of those worlds where the underground does not simply conceal the desire for an alternative transformation but also hide the violence of a barbarism that is trying to sink the whole world into an abyss of darkness, where no mainstream will ever succeed in welling up again. The five bullets that hit John Lennon in the darkness opened the terrible, dazzling and unavoidable, necessary eighties.
Frisa, pp. 274-6.
New York Dada

Dada cannot live in New York because all New York is dada, and will not tolerate a rival.
Jones, Modernism, p. 3.

Picabia called it a Cubist city in 1913, and on his return in 1915 credited it with his conversion to the mechanomorphic style, for America shows that 'the genius of the modern world' resides in machinery. The Cubist Albert Gleizes told a reporter, "New York inspires me tremendously." Duchamp declared, "I adore New York."
Conrad, p. 115.

In Duchamp's America, art had been supplanted by engineering. The country's creativity, he thought, went into its plumbing and its bridges; all art had to do was make selections from its utilitarian stock, as he did when he tagged the Woolworth Building as a ready-made. Because New York was already 'a complete work of art,' it absolved Duchamp from the necessity of creating new works of art. Its gift to him was that it silenced him. "I have not painted a single picture since coming over," he boasted.
Ibid., p. 115.

New York itself is a work of art, a complete work of art. Its growth is harmonious, like the growth of ripples that come on the water when a stone has been thrown into it. And I believe that your idea of demolishing old buildings, old souvenirs, is fine. It is in line with that so much misunderstood manifesto issued by the Italian Futurists which demanded... the destruction of museums and libraries. The dead should not be permitted to be so much stronger than the living. We must learn to forget the past, to live our lives in our own time. [Death]
"Duchamp Iconoclast," p. 5.

Duchamp suggests the Woolworth Building as a monumental readymade, merely awaiting the proper title. [Commodity]
Marquis, p. 127

One day I ask Marcel Duchamp how many people he thinks really liked avant-garde art and he replies, "Oh, maybe ten in New York and one or two in New Jersey."
Myers, 33.

There were around two hundred artists in New York in 1960 and one could meet them all in a relatively short period of time.
Yau, p. 278.

"I came over here not because I couldn't paint at home, but because I hadn't had anyone to talk with." [Singularity]

Duchamp himself remains completely elusive. One day I meet him at the elevator of the View office. He arrives a bit earlier than I and is waiting for me. I notice he has in his hand a pocket chess set, the black and white men arrayed against each other. I ask him whom he might be playing against and he answers, "Marcel versus Duchamp."
Marcel Duchamp perfectly adapts to the violent rhythm of New York. He is the hero of the artists and intellectuals, and of the young ladies who frequent these circles. Leaving his almost monastic isolation, he flings himself into orgies of drunkenness and every other excess. [Alcohol] [Sex]

Jones, Modernism, p. 58.

Duchamp's relationship to masculinity in his New York Dada period parallels the "Warren Beatty effect in Shampoo"—the less macho man adopting feminine attributes in order to seduce women. [Sex]

Ibid., p. 9.

Arriving at 7:30, we find Duchamp sitting in a corner of the small living room by a window overlooking University Place there he remains—serene, utterly at ease, seldom speaking although in no way aloof—until nearly three o'clock in the morning. His participation in the evening's social intercourse takes the form of a twinkle in his eye and a barely perceptible hint of a smile, and yet his presence charges the room.

Brown, Chance, p. 269.

He has the presence of a "smiling corrupter."
Marquis, p. 110

Duchamp tells a reporter that he had tried to obtain a studio in a skyscraper, "one of the highest," but was dismayed to learn that "people are not allowed to live in them." [Architecture] [Real Estate]

Ibid., p. 113

Duchamp calls America a one-class country and marvels that people who can afford chauffeurs go to the theater by subway. [Class] [Structure]

Ibid., p. 113

His occupation of the Washington Square arch ratifies Washington Square as a monument of the avant-garde. [Psychogeography]

Banes, p. 15.

The Republic of Washington Square takeover of the arch, Gerturde Drick aka Woe reads her Declaration, which consists of the word "Whereas" repeated over and over, and nothing else.

Miller, Greenwich Village, p. 59.

A rumor that Duchamp's original Bottle Rack has been found complete with signature, date, and forgotten inscription, on a New York junkman's truck. [Garbage]

Marquis, p. 127

One evening in January 1916, during dinner with the Arensbergs at the Cafe des Artistes at 1 West 67th Street, Duchamp leaps up and impulsively signs his own name to a huge old-fashioned battle scene painted on the wall behind him. The gesture, he explains, makes the mural his own readymade; it has "everything except taste."

Ibid., p. 128

"My capital is time, not money."

Ibid. p. 246
In the 1940s Duchamp was so poor that he traveled all the way to Brooklyn for some dental work at a free clinic. The dentist pulled a whole group of teeth, and on the way home Duchamp collapsed on a street curb... He paid for treatment by his dentist, Daniel Tzanck, with a beautifully hand-lettered check for $115, drawn on 'The Teeth’s Loan and Trust Co., Consolidated, 2 Wall St., New York.” [Body in the City]

Ibid. p. 143

Jimmy Ernst, the son of Max Ernst, dined with him one evening in 1967 at “a swank New York restaurant” He asked Marcel, “as a connoisseur who had dined all over the world,” to pick the wine. While the wine steward waited patiently, Duchamp perused each item on the extensive wine list, occasionally asking details about a particular year or cru. Then he ordered “a little white and a little red.” Somehow, this incident found its way into a popular newspaper column. He was also deliberately unpretentious in his choice of favorite foods: pastrami and French fries. [Alcohol]

Ibid. p. 289

threw potato salad at CCNY lecturers on Dadaism
Ginsberg, Howl, p. 18.

William Carlos Williams describes Duchamp during the 1940s as “idling in a telephoneless 14th Street garret.” [Technology]
Marquis, p. 246

From the Baroness’s point of view, Duchamp and Williams exemplify the tendency among male avant-gardists to make radical art in their free time, while living more or less bourgeois lives, driven by neurasthenic fears of the modern challenges to their coherence as male subjects.
Jones, Modernism, p. 8.

William Carlos Williams on The Baroness’s apartment: “The most unspeakably filthy tenement in the city. Romantically, mystically dirty, of grimy walls, dark, gaslit halls and narrow stairs, it smelt of black water closets, one to a floor, with low gasflame always burning and torn newspapers trodden in the wet. Waves of stench thickened on each landing as one moved up . . . I saw them [her dogs] at it on her dirty bed.” [Real Estate]
Ibid., p. 8.

Paris has had Dada for five years, and we have had Elsa von Freytag-Loringhoven for quite two years. But great minds think alike and great natural truths force themselves into cognition at vastly separated spots.
Ibid. p. 2.

In Elsa von Freytag-Loringhoven Paris is mystically united [with] New York. [Psychogeography] [Empire]
Ibid. p. 2.

The Baroness is the first American dada; she is the only one living anywhere who dresses dada, loves dada, lives dada.
Ibid. p. 3.
The Baroness used detritus she found on the street as well as items stolen from department stores to craft elaborate costumes which she would then wear, complete with black lipstick, shaved head or brightly dyed hair, and other body adornments, to the legendary Greenwich Village balls or (notoriously, and surely far more noticeably) through the streets of New York. [Crime] [Garbage] [Body in the City]

Ibid. pp. 3-4.

Djuna Barnes, writing c. 1933: “Baroness Elsa von Freytag-Loringhoven... was one of the terrors of the district which cuts below Minetta Lane and above eighteenth street to the west. The lip of a burnished coal scuttle for a helmet strapped to her head with a scarlet belt which buckled under the chin, Christmas tree balls of yellow and red as ear rings, a tea strainer about her neck, a short yellow skirt barely covering her legs, and over the precision of her breasts a single length of black lace she would walk the city... She made a great plaster cast of a penis once, & showed it to all the ‘old maids’ she came in contact with.” [Surrealism]

Ibid. p. 208.

The Baroness, with her leaky, smelly, grotesque body and flamboyant costumes cobbled together from urban detritus and stolen commodities, performed an irrational, antimasculinist, and radically queer subjectivity against the grain of New York’s abstracting spaces and phallic skyline. [Body in the City]

Ibid. p. 222.

audacious modernity

How do we construct a legitimate or convincing history when we only have a pile of disconnected anecdotes (anecdote being, as Djuna Barnes put it, ‘the skeleton of life’)?

Ibid. p. 30.

“My uncle’s garage, that Frank Lloyd Wright thing on Fifth Avenue,” said Peggy Guggenheim. [Architecture]

Trager, p. 623.

One would never expect to see another “Guggenheim” aped somewhere down the Avenue. [Simulacra]

Monson, p. 31.

No one can now deny the uniqueness of the plain apartment blocks behind the Guggenheim, for it was the Museum building which gave them a reality which themselves they had not had until its construction. [Mundane] [Banal]

Ibid., p. 31.

For the Mexican muralist J. C. Orozco in 1929, New York constituted a challenge to the modernizing artist. Its architecture stood as a rebuke to the inequity and fatuity of ancestral Europe, and where the buildings had boldly led, Orozco proclaimed, “painting and sculpture must certainly follow.” Mondrian too saluted the city’s overthrow of a tyrannical past, a liberation symbolized by its engineering, its electricity, its jazz, and the displays in its shop windows. [Commodity] [Window Display]

Conrad, p. 115.
Joseph Cornell, who located the oddments he reverently boxed in the shabby arcades of Times Square, the musty bookstores of Fourth Avenue, the flower stalls on West 28th Street, and the curiosity shops above Madison Square.

Cornell remembered passing a shop window displaying compasses, then, two blocks farther, a window full of boxes. ‘It occurred to me to put the two together.’ He is the bricoleur as an elegiac wanderer in memory, a votary of the souvenir. [Flâneur] [Commodity]

Presently we went through the kitchen, where Cornell’s mother was sitting reading the Sunday paper. It could have been any kitchen on Utopia Parkway—ruffled curtains on the windows, some plant cuttings on a sill. I glimpsed the pantry, which seemed to be filled with bags of birdseed, for the good reason that Joseph had in his backyard a birdbath, birdhouses, bird feeders. He explained that he enjoyed the visits of sparrows, pigeons, robins or any other bird that came by. There was a wire fence in the rear of the yard. Other backyards stretched to the left and right, all fenced off, each with a garage. It was to the Cornell garage that I was led, and when the doors were swung open, I felt as though I were entering Aladdin’s cave. There were shelves and more shelves lining the garage on which were stored objects, constructions, materials for new boxes, dolls. I cannot say which boxes I liked the most. I cannot say if I understood the meaning of them. I only knew that these creations were among the most beautiful and mysterious things I had ever seen, the total embodiments of le merveilleux.

After a light lunch of cottage cheese, toast, bologna, jello and milk (Joseph picked at his food as though eating were a nuisance), I was invited to go for a bicycle ride. There were two bikes in the garage and off we went on a tour of the neighborhood. But the sights most memorable were pure Cornell. ‘Stand here,’ he said at one spot, ‘and hold your hands to the right and left of your eyes so that you see only what is in front of you.’ In the distance was a small old-fashioned brick building, probably a pump house. By cutting off the surrounding environment, it became a Swiss chalet nestling among trees. It looked like the kind of romantic vista one sees in an old engraving. The next spot provided a spectacular view of New York, the whole of it stretched out and illuminated by the silvery gray light of the afternoon. I had never seen New York from such a vantage point. Its skyscrapers became minarets, it seemed to float on a low-lying mist. It was Baghdad. When we got back to the house, I was not shown the attic, where more treasures were stored, or his cellar, which serves as a studio. Instead, we went upstairs to Joseph’s room—as austere as a monk’s cell—where there was a large collection of Victrola records and a wind-up Victrola. I was shown a portfolio devoted to an early nineteenth-century opera singer called Malibran. In it were programs, engravings, sheet music, reproductions of letters, a host of memorabilia through which Cornell could summon the presence of the celebrated diva. (Cornell had already put his vast collection of this sort of visual material, plus several thousand silent movie stills, to practical use. He conducted an archives service rather like the huge-scale Bettmann Archive; commercial art directors who needed a picture of, let us say, a kitchen stove circa 1846 would call Cornell and invariably he would have the sought-after image.)
While I was looking through this sheaf of material, selections on various recordings were played on the wind-up Victrola. These were not necessarily operatic arias or overtures. Some of the music evoked a Malibran who might have lived in another period—music by Erik Satie and Debussy, for instance. It became clear, however, from glancing at the covers of many of the record albums, that Joseph’s passion was for the Romantic composers—Schumann, Schubert, Berlioz, Chopin.

It was time for me to leave, but Mrs. Cornell insisted I have a cup of tea and some Lorna Doone cookies. Her deafness prevented much conversation, and I felt I had stayed too long, although Joseph assured me I hadn’t. I said goodbye to his brother, Robert. [Nature] [Psychogeography] [Antiquity] [Technology] [Sound] [Panorama] [Food]

Suppose the greatest artist in the history of the world, impoverished and unknown at the time, had been sitting at a table in the old Automat at Union Square, cadging some free water and hoping to cop a leftover crust of toasted corn muffin or a few abandoned translucent chartreuse waxed beans or some other item of that amazing range of Yellow Food the Automat went in for—and suddenly he got the inspiration for the greatest work of art in the history of the world. Possessing not even so much as a pencil or a burnt match, he dipped his forefinger into the glass of water and began recording this greatest of all inspirations, this high point in the history of man as a sentient being, on a paper napkin, with New York tap water as his paint. In a matter of seconds, of course, the water had diffused through the paper and the grand design vanished, whereupon the greatest artist in the history of the world slumped to the table and died of a broken heart, and the manager came over, and he thought that here was nothing more than a dead wino with a wet napkin. Now, the question is: Would that have been the greatest work of art in the history of the world or not? [Food] [Water]

Wolfe, Painted, pp. 86-7.

When an equestrian statue of a general has both front hoofs off the ground, it means the general died in battle; if one hoof is off the ground, he died of wounds received in battle. [Nature]

Talese, p. 19.

New York Schools

As 1950 approached, a feeling akin to manifest destiny began to course through the art world. This was ‘the American century,’ the Luce magazines constantly trumpeted, and Americans had a heroic role to play in resisting totalitarianism and celebrating Western values. Buoyed by the new optimism, the downtown artists decided to stage a Christmas part at the Club. Most of the charter members spent several evenings creating one or two huge collages apiece. In the end, the collages—"daring and dazzling" to look at—covered almost every inch of the Club’s walls and ceilings. The partying mood did not end after Christmas. The biggest day of all, New Year’s 1950, was approaching. Bridge tables were covered in paper tablecloths and lined up in a long row for a communal dinner. After dinner the dancing began.

... And then it was midnight and 1950. And then it was morning, and still no one went home. Many artists simply broke for breakfast and a new bottle. The partying lasted for three days. Sometime during the... marathon, Philip Pavia stood up and delivered a ringing proclamation. "This is the beginning of the next half century," he announced. "The first half of the century belonged to Paris. The next half century will be ours." [Empire]

Stevens & Swan, p. 292.

De Kooning’s “Excavation” had none of the monkish reserve of Parisian cubism, but seemed brash and pulsing, like a blinking sign in New York. A black and white city that glinted with occasional color, New York was itself a kind of synthesis of cubism and surrealism, a combination of strict grids and liberating gestures in which order and chaos, reserve and craziness, appeared locked in a tense balance. New York in 1950 was not the bland caricature later known as ‘the fifties.’ It celebrated the exaggerated self and the strut of personality. And yet, the city could also be cold and detached, a place of gritty grays and inhuman scale… No other American painting—not even Stuart Davis’s pictures—conveyed with comparable force the jazzy syncopation of the city. [Grid] [Surrealism] [Jazz]

Ibid., p. 296.

New York School art works with titles about New York: Jane Freilicher, Early New York Evening, Larry Rivers, Second Avenue, Grace Hartigan, Grand Street Bridges, Allan Kaprow, George Washington Bridge (with Cars), Franz Kline, Third Avenue.

no.cit.

Publicity had not been an issue with artists in the Forties and Fifties. It might come as a bolt from the philistine blue, as when Life made Jackson Pollock famous; but such events were rare enough to be freakish, not merely unusual. By today’s standards, the art world was virginaly naive about the mass media and what they could do. Television and the press, in return, were indifferent to what could still be called the avant-garde. “Publicity” meant a notice in the New York Times, a paragraph or two long, followed eventually by an article in Art News which perhaps five thousand people would read. Anything else was regarded as extrinsic to the work—something to view with suspicion, at best an accident, at worst a gratuitous distraction. One might woo a critic, but not a fashion correspondent, a TV producer, or the editor of Vogue. To be one’s own PR outfit was, in the eyes of the New York artists of the Forties or Fifties, nearly unthinkable—hence the contempt they felt for Salvador Dalí. [Advertising] [Media]

Spatters of paint from the brushes of Arshile Gorky can be found on the floor of a 14th Street studio still occupied by a painter. [Death] [Gentrification] [Bohemia] [Real Estate]

McDarrah, p. 15

Harold Rosenberg and Dwight Macdonald for twenty-five years lived in the same four-story whitestone on East Tenth Street in the Village and rarely spoke to one another, often barely grunting hello. Jumonville, p. 140.
The ultimate dream of any Painting and Design person was to go to New York and get a studio. That word “studio” was enormously charged, it was much more charged than “sex” or “fuck,” because it implied this whole life, I mean, this was it! The most talented and independent people would come to New York in the summer and sublet somebody’s studio with an outdoor toilet for $18 a month. [Real Estate] Bockris, Warhol, p. 78.

I remember the first time I met Frank O’Hara. He was walking down Second Avenue. It was a cool early Spring evening but he was wearing only a white shirt with the sleeves rolled up to his elbows. And blue jeans. And moccasins. I remember that he seemed very sissy to me. Very theatrical. Decadent. I remember that I liked him instantly. [Street] Brainard, N. pag.

I remember Frank O’Hara’s walk. Light and sassy. With a slight bounce and a slight twist. It was a beautiful walk. Confident. “I don’t care” and sometimes “I know you are looking.” [Flâneur] Ibid.

I remember one very cold and black night on the beach alone with Frank O’Hara. He ran into the ocean naked and it scared me to death. Ibid.

O’Hara matched the spirit of his new artist friends by trying to create a poetic city of New York. Other poets had certainly written about Manhattan—Whitman, Crane, Lorca, Auden. But over the next fifteen years, O’Hara composed a fragmented epic of the city, focusing particularly on the humor and chaos of the growing metropolis and using his experiences as a trail through an ever-changing urban labyrinth rather on the scale of Joyce’s Dublin or William Carlos Williams’s Paterson.

Gooch, p. 191.

From the moment Frank O’Hara arrived in New York, the twenty-five-year-old poet began absorbing the images, smells, and sounds that appeared in his work—newspaper headlines, subway bathrooms, yellow construction helmets, taxi honkings, funeral home signs, painters’ lofts, instant coffee, negronis, abandoned storefronts, lunchroom tables, smoke-filled bars, liquor stores, and tobacconists. Ibid., p. 191.

O’Hara was vexed by Warhol’s rise. They had both arrived in New York at about the same time. But Warhol’s acceptance by the art world in which O’Hara was so celebrated was peripheral at best. Of Warhol’s first show at the Hugo Gallery in 1952, an unimpressed Art News reviewer had written that his drawings of young boys’ heads and women dressed in the style of the twenties were “airily” reminiscent of the novels of Truman Capote. As a curator, O’Hara had visited Warhol’s studio in 1959. “He was very unkind to Andy,” says the poet John Giorno. “This was when Andy was still drawing shoe ads and making all that money. Frank O’Hara and two other people came to visit Andy in that house on Eighty-ninth Street and Lexington Avenue. It was very chicly decorated at the time—black vinyl walls, a horse from a carousel. I remember Andy saying that Frank walked into that front room and just started laughing and putting him down for being chi-chi. That’s not what they wanted to see or what they thought was important. He told me, ‘Frank was so meeeean.’ That carried through when he became a famous artist. But then at some point Frank made a change and thought that what Andy was doing was valid."

Warhol had begun doing drawings of feet long before the shoe as an expression of his fetish. Introduced to O’Hara by Willard Maas at Charles Henri Ford’s, Warhol asked O’Hara if he could draw his feet. Well aware of the eroticism in the suggestion, O’Hara refused. “But you let Larry Rivers draw your feet,” complained Warhol, who had early on bought a Rivers drawing from John Bernard Myers on an installment plan of five dollars a month for five months. “Well that’s Larry Rivers!” O’Hara exclaimed. O’Hara was not nearly so difficult with Jasper Johns, who made a sculpture of wood, lead, metal, brass, and sand in 1961 titled “Memory Piece (Frank O’Hara),” in which a rubber cast of a foot in the sand was taken from a plaster mold of O’Hara’s foot. “I remember casting his foot on Front Street in my studio,” says Johns. “I cast his foot and did a drawing for the piece, which included a cabinet with the drawers full of sand. At that time I had a house in South Carolina. I needed a carpenter but could never find anyone to do it. I think it was done after his death. But I gave Frank the drawing for it.” This was the piece referred to in O’Hara’s letter-poem to Johns, written in 1963: “Dear Jap, when I think of you in South Carolina I think of my foot in the sand.”

Masterful at the art of manipulation and careerism, Warhol had targeted O’Hara at first as someone who could open doors for him. “Andy wanted Frank’s respect, I think,” says Gerard Malanga. “But Andy was not getting it, so he was kind of two-faced about the situation. He actually was not that impressed by Frank. But he would get hurt by these negative reactions from people he thought he could look up to. Soon enough, of course, doors opened without O’Hara. Warhol’s one-man show in November at the Stable Gallery, which included his Marilyn diptych, 100 Soup Cans, 100 Coke Bottles, and 100 Dollar Bills, set him at the head of the pack, which O’Hara would rather have seen him trailing. Bill Seitz, the chief curator of the Museum’s Department of Painting and Sculpture, bought a Marilyn for himself for $250. Philip Johnson bought the Gold Marilyn for $800. Yet when Warhol gave him one of the Marilyns, O’Hara instantly put it in his closet. Jim Brodey, a poet from O’Hara’s New School class, recalls a cocktail party at O’Hara’s at which Warhol gave O’Hara an imaginary drawing of the poet’s penis, which he crumpled up and threw away in annoyance.

O’Hara’s antagonism toward Warhol was mixed with art politics and sexual politics. Warhol was relegating the Abstract Expressionists to the past. By threatening O’Hara’s allies, he was threatening O’Hara’s own vanguard status, a position he had enjoyed since he was a teenager. He offended O’Hara as well by rejecting the brushstroke, with its touching, personal, humanistic implications, in favor of silkscreening and mechanical reproduction. Larry Rivers’s commissioned billboard for the first New York Film Festival in 1963 included a camera, strips of celluloid, a Rudolph Valentino cameo, a leopard, a figure of Jane Russell in her briefest costume from Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, and stenciled letters. When it was mounted at the corner of Broadway and Sixty-fifth Street, O’Hara wrote to Joan Mitchell, “You can make out what the message is through a few well-placed letters here and there, but mostly it is pure Rivers—no Andy Warhol he. It’s quite funny that they do all those paintings that look like billboards, and when a billboard is finally commissioned it looks like a painting, or rather is one.”

“In his love of objects in his poetry and in his association with Larry Rivers he certainly wasn’t antirealist,” says the painter Wynn Chamberlain. “On the other hand he was very much anti-Death, which is what Warhol signified to him I think. And to all of us at that point. He was the prophet of doom. There was a complete division between the Warhol-Geldzahler camp and the O’Hara-Rivers-de Kooning camp. Frank was at the Museum of Modern Art, and that Museum was the thing to be overcome by the younger Pop painters.” Among his fellow curators at the Museum, O’Hara was actually relatively open to some of the “New Realists,” if not always to Warhol. “Like a lot of people who were involved with Abstract Expressionism I was very resistant to Pop,” says Waldo Rasmussen. “It really seemed trivializing to me. And in some aspects of it he was too. But he was much more open to it than I. He became very quickly a good friend of Claes Oldenburg. He liked Lichtenstein’s work.” (The painter Al Leslie recalls a panel discussion at the Skowhegan School of Painting and Sculpture in Maine at which O’Hara savagely “devastated” an art historian who criticized Lichtenstein, beginning his tirade with his trademark insult, “You big sack of shit!”)

Some of O’Hara’s peeves with Warhol were personal. Paramount was a friendship of Warhol’s with Freddy Herko—the young dancer who had roomed with Vincent Warren after rooming with Diane DiPrima. Warhol had filmed the struggling dancer roller-skating all over New York on one bleeding foot in a sixteen-millimeter film titled Dance Movie in September 1963. In October 1964, Herko killed himself tripping on LSD by dancing out the fifth-floor window of a friend’s Greenwich Village apartment while Mozart’s Coronation Mass played on the record player. When he heard the news, Warhol reportedly said, “Why didn’t he tell me he was going to do it? We could have gone down there and filmed it!” O’Hara, who attended the memorial service organized by Diane DiPrima at Judson Church, reacted to Herko’s death with his usual overblown mourning and sorrow. Warhol’s response cinched O’Hara’s opinion of him as cold-blooded. As he wrote to Mike Goldberg, “How did you know incidentally about my being so depressed about Freddie? I was, very, but when this girl told me that Andy Warhol and Alan Marlowe had found it ‘beautiful’ and I said that I hoped they would both be locked into a Ben Hecht movie and left to starve, I felt greatly relieved.”

O’Hara was first brought to Warhol’s “Factory,” which was then located in a warehouse and factory building at 231 East Forty-seventh Street, by Joe LeSueur in 1964. (LeSueur had appeared eating a banana that year in Couch, a lightly pornographic movie filmed in July on an old red couch in the middle of the Forty-seventh Street Factory with cameo appearances by Malanga, Ginsberg, Corso, Orlovsky, Kerouac, Mark Lancaster, and Baby Jane Hoizer.) O’Hara half-heartedly agreed to write, with LeSueur, a segment for a plotted movie (conspicuously missing until then in the Warhol canon) to be called Messy Lives, but he never did it. His only contribution was an episode written with Frank Lima called “Love on the Hook.” “Frank left the Factory that day not very impressed with what Andy was doing,” says Malanga of O’Hara’s only visit. “But there was a weird homosexual climate there at that point. Maybe he felt Andy was too sissified for his tastes.”

Warhol’s style of homosexuality was counter to O’Hara’s, who preferred the artist cowboys of the Cedar. Warhol felt alienated by such aesthetic roughhousing. As he later wrote of the Cedar, “I tried to imagine myself in a bar striding over to, say, Roy Lichtenstein and asking him to “step outside” because I’d heard he’d insulted my soup cans. I mean, how corny. I was glad those slug-it-out routines had been retired—they weren’t my style, let alone my capability.” The Factory was Warhol’s attempt at a party he could control, and the scene’s infiltration of Max’s Kansas City in 1966 changed the life of artists at least as much as the Janis show. Max’s—with its red velvet booths and black vinyl walls covered with works by Frank Stella, Donald Judd, Dan Flavin, and Richard Bernstein—became the new Cedar. The dividing line O'Hara had described as so “New York” in his letter to Warren from Madrid, between the heterosexual painters who liked him and the effete homosexuals who didn’t, had been erased.

Eventually O’Hara, like the rest of the art world, made room for Warhol. As the painter Joe Brainard wrote, “I remember Frank O’Hara putting down Andy Warhol and then a week or so later defending him with his life.” In 1964 Warhol, using his Bolex, shot movie footage of O’Hara giving a poetry reading at Café Le Metro—a subbasement coffee shop and antique furniture store on Second Avenue between Ninth and Tenth streets that was the hangout of the East Village poets until the founding of the Poetry Project at St. Mark’s Church in-the-Bowery in 1966. In an interview with a British Journalist in October 1965, O’Hara found kind words to say about Warhol: “I went to Boston recently and saw the full mounting of the picture of Mrs. Kennedy... It was never shown in New York full scale. And it’s absolutely moving and beautiful. Not sarcastic, and it’s not some sort of stunt. It really is compelling work when shown in the way he wanted it to be shown. When it’s as big as it’s supposed to be and there are that many images of her and the color somehow works from image to image. And I think that he—you know, just as one knows that Duchamp’s serious—I think Andy is a terribly serious artist rather than an agent to make everything lively, which he sometimes is taken for in the United States. The European evaluation of him is much more exact.” In a memo written shortly before his death, on a Pollock retrospective he was organizing, he proposed a panel of five critics and artists he thought would be “pentagonally opposed”—Harold Rosenberg, Clement Greenberg, Barnett Newman, Alfonso Ossorio, and Andy Warhol.

To Capote himself, New York was “like living inside an electric lightbulb.”

Bockris, _Warhol_, p. 78.

Warhol wrote fan letters to Truman Capote and Judy Garland... Throughout his first year in New York, he had written Capote almost daily fan letters, announcing he was in town and asking if he might draw Truman’s portrait.

“I never answer fan letters,” Capote would later recall, “but not answering these Warhol letters didn’t seem to faze him at all. I became Andy’s Shirley Temple. After a while I began getting letters from him every day! Until I became terrifically conscious of this person. Also he began sending along drawings. They certainly weren’t like his later things. They were rather literally illustrations from stories of mine... at least that’s what they were supposed to be. Not only that, but apparently Andy Warhol used to stand outside waiting to see me come in or go out of the building.”

_Ibid._, pp. 86, 91.

Capote on Warhol: “He seemed one of those helpless people that you just know nothing’s ever going to happen to. Just a hopeless born loser, the loneliest, most friendless person I’d ever seen in my life.”

_Ibid._, _Warhol_, p. 91.

The city was changing. De Kooning’s New York was hot and fervent, now a more iconic and cool city, which Andy Warhol would soon symbolize was developing around him. The contemporary art world was becoming increasingly remote from his inner life as an artist. The constant parties, the bright young faces, and the air of fashion took him far from his own roots. There seemed to be no center any longer.

Stevens & Swan, p. 422.

The multiplicity of learned traditions, the diverse institutional bases of learning, popularization, and vernacular cultures, make it no easy task to identify either elite or popular culture. A simple "high" / "low" scheme is utterly inadequate. The cultural life of the modern city, of New York City in particular, has been divided and subdivided along both historical and vertical axes—with no universally recognized principle of hierarchy or priority. [Grid]

Bender, p. 61.

If anybody wants to know what those summer days of ‘66 were like in New York with us, all I can say is go see Chelsea Girls. I’ve never seen it without feeling in the pit of my stomach that I was right back there all over again. It may have looked like a horror show—"cubicles in hell"—to some outside people, but to us it was more like a comfort—after all, we were a group of people who understood each other’s problems. [Cinema]

Warhol, POPism, p. 233.

I remember the day Frank O’Hara died. I tried to do a painting somehow especially for him. (Especially good.) And it turned out awful.

Brainard, N. pag.

Warhol: “One night I happened to be at Max’s when Larry came in. That afternoon Frank O’Hara had been buried in Springs, Long Island, with Jackson Pollock’s grave in the distance, and half the art world had gone out there for the funeral. Larry came over to my table holding a drink and sat down. He looked terrible. He’d been really close friends with Frank. After he was hit by a car, they took him to the nearest hospital, Larry told me, where they didn’t realize he was bleeding internally until the next morning, and by then he’d been losing blood for eight hours. Frank’s best friends, Larry and Kenneth Koch and Joe LeSueur and Bill de Kooning, were all called to the hospital, and de Kooning and Larry went up to his room to see him. ‘He thought he was at a cocktail party,’ Larry said. ‘It was a dream conversation. And three hours later he was dead. I made this speech at the funeral today—I was practically in tears. I just thought I’d describe what Frank looked like that afternoon, the marks on his body, the stitches, the tubes coming out of him. But I didn’t get to finish because everyone was screaming at me to shut up.’ Larry shook his head. It sounded like a very Pop eulogy to me—just the surface things. It was just what I hoped people would do for me if I died. But evidently death wasn’t something the people out there in Springs that afternoon wanted to be Pop about.

‘It’s very selfish of me, I know,’ Larry said, ‘but all I can think is that there’ll never be anybody who likes my work as much as Frank did. It’s like that poem of Kenneth’s—‘He Likes My Work.’”

It was scary to think that you could lose your life if you were taken to the wrong hospital or if you happened to get the wrong doctor at the right hospital. It sounded to me like Frank wouldn’t have died if they’d realized in time that he was bleeding.

I’d known Frank, too. He was kind of small, and he always wore tennis shoes, and he talked a little like Truman Capote, and even though he was Irish, he had a face like a Roman senator. He’d say things like ‘Listen, Circe, just because you’ve turned us all into pigs, don’t think we’re going to forget you’re still our queen!’”

Frank O’Hara’s dead & we are not. [Death]
Berrigan, p. 620

It’s hard to imagine what N.Y. will be like without Andy. How will anybody know where to go or what is “cool?” [Death] [Parties]

Haring, Journals, p. 156.

Literature

W. H. Auden himself may be seen fumbling by in the rain—Paul Bowles, natty in a Dacron suit, passing through on a trip from Morocco, the ghost of Herman Melville himself followed by Bartleby the Wall Street Scrivener and Pierre the ambiguous hipster of 1848 out on a walk—to see what’s up in the news flashes of the Times. [Dandy]

Mapplethorpe [Flâneur]

Wystan Auden could probably be considered one of the first modern poets to homestead the East Village.

Malanga, pp. 23-4.

W.H. Auden’s parties in his apartment in the Village, attended by an incongruous mix of high-powered literary figures and street scum boys, who Auden and his partner had picked up.

Reay, p. 11.

I was living in New York when my early poems were written, and the thing then was to be experimental. We thought that using slashes and “wd” instead of “would” was experimental writing. I finally asked Joel Oppenheimer, who was well known for this, why he used slashes instead of apostrophes and he told me that it was because he was a typesetter and the typesetting machines had no apostrophes. So I guess it wasn’t all that avant-garde after all. [Textuality]

Kane, p. 8.

The cowboy look extended into the poetry and writing coming out of the Lower East Side scene. [Fashion]

“Edited, published & printed by Ed Sanders at a secret location on the Lower East Side, New York City.”

no.cit.

The New York poets seem to be nourished by a reservoir of attributes including, mainly, wild, improbable juxtaposition, diction that turns corners sharply, put-ons, very mock ingenuousness and urbane faggotry.

Kane, p. 175.

John Giorno’s benefit for Ron Gold at the Poetry Project in January of 1970 included setting up a guerilla pirate radio station called Radio Free Poetry that could reach a radius of ten blocks, a light and sound show, perfumed air, fog machines and a bowl of LSD punch that was distributed at the church’s altar. [Technology] [Smell] [Air] [Drugs]
Ibid., pp. 184-5.

The St. Mark’s Poetry Project is closed for the summer. But all over the world, poets are writing poems. Why?
Berrigan, p. 592.

On January 10, 1968, Kenneth Koch read at the Poetry Project. His reading was interrupted by the poet Allen Van Newkirk yelling out “Stop!” followed immediately by the sound of a pistol. Newkirk had quietly walked from the rear exit of the parish hall up to the front of the stage, pulled out a pistol, and fired two blanks directly at Koch.
Rod Padgett remembers: “A tall, somewhat scraggly white man, in his mid-to-late 20s and wearing Dostoveskyan overcoat, emerged from the door behind the podium and took a few steps store Kenneth, on Kenneth left side, and he aimed a small revolver at Kenneth and from close range fired several shots. It was quite loud and stunning. Kenneth cringed and lurched. The audience jumped. I jumped too, but I kept my eye on Kenneth and saw that he was not shot. Around this time there were a lot of Happenings, and other unusual art events with pranks set up to fool the audience, so you never knew. But it was very unlikely that Kenneth was going to set up a thing like this. When I saw Kenneth wasn’t in fact hurt, and I realized that this must be some kind of a stunt, I was mightily relieved. Meanwhile, the assailant walked down the center aisle toward a cohort who was distributing leaflets from the back—it turned out to be on Andrei Codrescu, who had recently arrived in this country. The two were told to leave —by Ted Berrigan, I think—and they did, shouting slogans.”

Koch sounds a little shaken as he states, “that was a benefi shooting.” This comment elicited what seemed like relieved laughter from the audience, and Koch resumed reading his poem. He stopped his reading to say in a sardonic tone, “poetry is revolution.” Then Koch is heard to sigh, “well, “as he looked at one of the flyers Newkirk and his cohorts was circulating throughout the parish hall. After some period of silence, Koch stated, “Well, now, I don’t want the congregation to get upset by these hijinks. These young people have a fine cause that they’re working for, and this seems to be about Leroi.
Now, I don’t think the judge should’ve put Leroi in jail because he wrote a poem. If that’s the point these people wanted to make they could’ve made it in a better way it seems to me. So why don’t you stop interrupting the reading.” At this point Newkirk heckled Koch again, to which Koch responded by shouting, “Scram!” In response to Koch, Newkirk shouted, “Fuck you! “Koch again yelled out, “Get out! “The heckler then intoned, “Revolution—the only solution! “Some audience members could be heard laughing rather contemptuously in response to the slogan. Koch said, “Grow up! “And then, in an indignant if amused tone, muttered “revolution.” [Unrest]
Kane, pp. 171-3.

What happened with the “assassination” of the poet Ken Koch in 1968?

Ben Morea: Koch was a symbol to us of this totally bourgeois, dandy world. Myself, Dan Georgakas, Alan Van Newkirk and some of the other Black Mask people went to one of his readings at St. Marks Church. I think I came up with idea to shoot him with a blank pistol. Alan looked like the classic image of the bomb-throwing anarchist. He was about six foot three, long and thin with a gaunt face and always dressed in black—the anarchist incarnate. So we decided “You’re the one, you’re going to shoot him.” (laughter) We printed a leaflet and all it had on it was a picture of Leroi Jones with the words “Poetry is revolution.” On the night when Alan shot the blank Koch fainted and everyone in the audience assumed he was dead and started screaming. Some people threw the leaflets from the balcony into the crowd and then we all left.

Reactions after the event were split between people who thought it was the greatest thing they’d ever heard and those that thought we were a bunch of sophomoric assholes. Which was great because so much of what Black Mask and The Family was about was pushing people to decide “Do I belong with this group of people or this one?” We were determined to be outrageous in order to force people to decide where they stood on things. We wanted to push people, force them to think. “Why shoot Koch? He’s just a nice poet.” [Unrest]

On an average day in New York, William S. Burroughs gets up between 9:00 and 10:00 and shaves. In a dream note made on 13th August 1975 he wrote: “Things needed. Shaving mirror. Anyone used to shave feels deterioration if he cannot.” From Retreat Diaries. Burroughs associates shaving with civilization and throughout his travels has never grown a beard or mustache.

Then he takes a 100 milligram capsule of vitamin B1 because he believes it replaces the B1 that alcohol removes from the system. He dresses, washes last night’s dishes, and eats breakfast. He likes coffee with a donut, English muffin, or angel food cake.

Around 11:00 he goes down four long flights of stairs to get his mail (5-10 pieces daily). Between 11:30 and 12:30 he putters around the loft looking at notes, writing notes, and checking through various books.

Between 12:30 and 1:00 Bill often goes out shopping for groceries or, lately, new clothes. He’s usually back by 1:00, eats no lunch and writes between 1:00 and 4:00 in the afternoon.

If James Grauerholz is working with him on a manuscript or a reading, James will arrive around 4:00 in the afternoon and will stay through dinner. This happens, on the average, three times a week. They go over the work between 4:00 and 6:00 when Burroughs often relaxes, sitting in a rocking chair by the window. “It’s a very beautiful sight,” James says. “I’ll be working at the other end of the loft. I’ll look up, and there will be William just sitting perfectly still in his chair looking kind of serene.”

At 6:00 P.M. Burroughs pours himself a drink. Dinner is between 7:30 and 8:30.

All his life Burroughs has eaten in restaurants. Today, he shops and cooks for himself, often having friends over, or going to their places nearby for dinner. After dinner, conversation continues until 11:00 or 12:00 and then usually home or to bed. Occasionally he stays up talking till dawn.

An average Burroughs day produces six pages. Sometimes he’ll write as many as fifteen. When he started Cities of the Red Night he produced 120 pages in two weeks. “William’s very good at knowing when to leave things alone and when to go back to them. He knows when enough is enough,” James reports. “Sometimes I may try to push him on something—looking at a manuscript when 600 pages have been written and saying, ‘We should begin editing that’—and he’ll say, ‘No… that’ll take another couple of years.’ He’s seen enough time pass that he knows how to pace himself.”

Burroughs currently lives on the Bowery in a large three-room apartment which used to be the locker room of a gymnasium. He calls it the Bunker. Going to the Bunker can be a hazardous experience, and in fact William personifies more than any other man I have ever met a person aware of the hazards surrounding him. He has recently equipped me with a cane, a tube of tear gas, and a blackjack. “I would never go out of the house without all three on me,” he says pointedly.

In fact, walking down the street in a dark blue chesterfield, his homburg pulled down over one eye, a cane swinging alertly from his right hand, Bill steps right out of a Kerouac novel… I was constantly struck by the similarity of Kerouac’s portraits of Bill to the William who was slowly becoming revealed to me during the time I was constructing this portrait.

It wasn’t until late 1975 that Burroughs found what would become his HQ New York City. The Bunker is an elegant old red brick building. One of the first people I ever brought over to visit him was the British writer Christopher Isherwood, whose novels and travel books Burroughs had read and admired as well as used, and his companion the artist Don Bachardy. I turned on my tape recorder just as the cab pulled up in front of the locked iron gate of the Bunker on the chilly, deserted, windswept Bowery.

BOCKRIS [on the street]: A foreboding entrance. It’s rather hard to get in here sometimes; it depends on whether the gate’s open or not. Bill will come down and unlock the gate.

DON BACHARDY: Is that because it’s a bad part of town?

BOCKRIS I don’t think that’s the reason. It’s a big building and they lock the gate. Bill doesn’t personally lock it. [We walk across the street to a bar half a block away. Icy wind. People wrapped in blankets leer out of doorways.] Now this bar’s perfectly safe, we’ll call Bill and he’ll come down. [Open door, go into bar, loud noises of laughing, shouting, breaking glass, screams. Christopher and Don run very close behind. Voices from various conversations appear on tape: ‘That’s my two dollars’ etc.] Is there a telephone in the bar?

BARTENDER: Nope. There’s one right across the street.

CHRISTOPHER ISHERWOOD [gleefully]: It’s so Eugene O’Neill! [Open door into second bar. Repeat of above atmosphere. Voices drift in and out of the tape: ‘You and me are gonna meet tomorrow, you better believe it! When your friend ain’t around. I’ve had enough of your shit! All your goddam friends!’]

BOCKRIS: This is part of visiting William Burroughs though, isn’t it?

[On phone]: Hi! James! We’re down on the corner here… [Hangs up.] They’re coming down. [Walks out into street.] Is it worse to be a drug addict or an alcoholic do you think?

ISHERWOOD: God, I don’t know. I never tried either.

BOCKRIS: You do see more alcoholics in the world. It seems that drug addicts either die or else they don’t get in such bad shape.

ISHERWOOD: I’ve drunk rather a lot during my life, but I never came anywhere near to being an alcoholic.

BOCKRIS: [Burroughs’ secretary, James Grauerholz, appears behind the iron door with a key. We walk up a flight of stone steps.] I’ll lead the way. [They walk into William Burroughs’ spacious apartment.] I’ll introduce everyone. [They shake hands, nod, smile.]

BURROUGHS: Why don’t you take off your coats, gentlemen. [All put coats in Bill’s room next to his pyjamas, which are lying neatly folded on his bed, come back into living room and sit in a series of office-style orange armchairs around a large conference table that Burroughs has in the kitchen section of his apartment.]

GRAUERHOLZ: Can I get you a drink?
EVERYBODY: YES!

ISHERWOOD [looking around]: This is a marvelous place.

BURROUGHS: There are no windows. On the other hand, there’s no noise. This whole building was a YMCA. This used to be the locker room.
The man upstairs has the gymnasium and downstairs is the swimming pool.
It’s a furniture shop now.

BOCKRIS: Why did you move from Franklin Street to the Bunker?

BURROUGHS: I was very dissatisfied with walking up those stairs in Franklin Street; also they were putting up the rent. The “in” was John Giorno, who has a place upstairs. The landlord showed me this place. No one wanted it because it didn’t have any windows. It was used for storage then. The sink was already in and the shower and toilet. I decided to take it. It was originally one space so we put up these partitions. James moved in first for about six months, and then I moved out of Franklin Street. I was trying to sell it because I’d spent a good deal of money on Franklin Street. It was in a pretty bad state when I moved in and by the time I had bought a refrigerator and put in a sink and a set of cabinets and some reflooring, it cost me $7,000.
But nobody would give me anything for it, so I finally gave it to Malcolm McNeil, who lives there now. I happened to hit the market at the wrong time. Also, nobody wanted it because it was a three-story walkup. Now it’s a hell of a thing to have a refrigerator brought up three flights. It costs you a lot extra.

BOCKRIS: What gave you the idea to paint the Bunker’s floors white?

BURROUGHS: When I first moved in it was battleship gray and it looked dingy. It’s obvious you need all the light you can get in here since there isn’t any natural light and I was very pleased with the results. There is of course no view, but what kind of view did I have at Franklin Street? I had some buildings to look at. Also I have four doors between me and the outside and I have people down there in the daytime. It’s pretty impregnable.

BOCKRIS: This entry via telephone system is good. No one can come knock at the door unexpectedly and bother you.

BURROUGHS: I think it’s better this way. I am very comfortable here.

[Neighborhood] [Real Estate] [Gentrification] [Bohemia] [Mundane]
[Drugs]

Bockris, Burroughs, pp. 85-7, 89-91.

Have you ever noticed that no American writer of any consequence lives in Manhattan? Dreiser tried it, but finally fled to California.
White, Physical, p. xxvi.

There arises sporadically and from time to time in American literary circles a sort of patriotic fervor which is not so much a Xenophobia as a sort of determination that all matter printed in America shall be marked: Written and manufactured in the United States.
Ford, America, p. 155.

So far no “Elegy Written in a High-Speed Elevator” has appeared among modern masterpieces. [Technology]

Reisenberg, p. 75.
Whitman the housebuilder and (as a newspaperman) manufacturer of literature works to construct an epic city. After him, no one seems to work there. At best they have careers.

Conrad, p. 193.

"He who touches the soil of Manhattan and the pavement of New York," said Lewis Mumford, "touches, whether he knows it or not, Walt Whitman."

Federal Writers, p. 15.

The ghost of Whitman still presides. He sits naked, bearded, wearing a sun hat, and watches the gymnastic revels of a crowd he might have invented. A female bather—his muse perhaps—studies him from her deck chair.

Whitman’s commonplace sighting of eagles, horses, and boats “sparkling” on the Hudson “as thick as stars in the sky”—cannot be remembered by anyone still alive.

Stettner, p. 11.

Serious reading was the order of the day. Downy-haired flappers tucked up their bobs and rolled down their stockings and went to it.

Collins, Money, p. 297.

O. Henry was forty years old before he ever saw New York and he lived there only eight years (1902-10).

The City of NY, p. 207.

Pepys was better off when he lived than if he had lived to day. He was an artist in life, but if he had tried to shape his way in this world of Manhattan his artistic job would have been a bigger one.

Hapgood, p. 259.

Waverly Place is a writing street; no other spot in America produces so much real literature. [Street]

Irwin, p. 123.

Willa Cather wrote her greatest novels of the prairie and the Southwest in a small house on Bank Street in Greenwich Village. [Psychogeography]

Lopate, Writing, p. 194.

Asked to recite her poetry at a party, Edna St. Vincent Millay would toss back her hair, bare her long white neck—she speculated in an early poem that she would someday be “strangled”—and launch into full declamation. [Death]

Douglas, Honesty, p. 55.

Gertrude Stein is long dead but under cover rides the torn down El. Bennett, Post-WWII, p. 18.

James Thurber, drunk and legally blind, kept setting himself on fire with his cigarettes in the Algonquin Hotel. [Alcohol]

Douglas, Honesty, p. 23.

The Four Seasons restaurant. Joseph Baum will claim to have been inspired by reading haiku poetry in planning the new restaurant. [Food]
Mark Rothko was engaged to paint a series of works for the restaurant in 1958. Accepting the commission, he secretly resolved to create “something that will ruin the appetite of every son-of-a-bitch who ever eats in that room.”

“Four Seasons,” N. pag.

There are several totally uneducated men on the east side of New York who write literature of a high order. They present simple truth in misspelled and almost illegible manuscripts.

Hapgood, pp. 18-19.

One night J. and I were walking along when we saw, carefully lined up in the glow of the spots, the complete works of Wilhelm Reich, in chronological order of publication. We each took two books, feeling a bit guilty about it, since they seemed intended for some purpose. We joked that they were meant to greet visiting flying saucers. [Garbage]

Berman, NY Calling, p. 27.

Among the peddlers on Astor Place, the same set of the works of Khrushchev (Foreign Language Press, Moscow) circulated from hand to hand for at least a year. Nobody ever bought it, but every day it would appear in someone else’s stock. [Unrest]

Sante, “Commerce,” p. 111.

Imagine, if you will, a rainy Sunday afternoon in New York. All over town, writers are lying in bed, their heads under their respective pillows. They are a of varying heights and builds, races, religions, and creates, but they are as one: whining. Some of them are whining to themselves. Some to companions. It matters not in the least. Simultaneously they all turn over and reach for the phone. In a matter of seconds every writer in New York is speaking to another writer in New York. They’re not talking about writing.

Leibowitz, p. 174.

Now on this particular Sunday afternoon a phenomenon has occurred. Every single writer in the city of New York is not writing. [Idleness]

Ibid., p. 175.

My father was writing stories for The New Yorker magazine and hoping that one day he would be able to write a novel. He was an artist, but he liked to keep up appearances. In the morning he got dressed in a business suit from Brooks Brothers with a rep tie and felt hat with a grosgrain band and rode down in our building elevator with all the other men dressed the same way on their way to work. They got off at the first floor and left the building through the lobby on their way to Wall Street and midtown. My father crossed the lobby and walked down the back stairs to the basement, where he wrote all day in a windowless storage room in his boxer shorts, with his suit carefully hung against the wall. [Real Estate]

The parts of New York are as the pages of a money’s-worth best seller.

The notorious mutual masturbation of that Manhattan clique called "The Violet Quill."
Fritscher, p. 284.

This poem was wroted by Kim Carsons after a shoot-out on Bleecker Street, October 23, 1920.
Burroughs, p. 1489.

You can spend an entire Saturday among the used bookshops along Fourth Avenue.
Hamill, "Lost," N. pag.

And the Fourth Avenue bookstores! How many hundreds of afternoons they spent in the twenty or so dusty stores with the worn wood floors; noses whiffing that excellent store-air, a mixture of dust and floating minutiae of antique leather bindings and frayed linen. What a heaven of data, to stand on a rickety ladder at the top of a fourteen-foot wall of out-of-print verse!
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 5.

In 1969 there were just twenty-one bookstores in five blocks in a rather quaint sector south of Union Square, running from Ninth to Fourteenth Streets. In 1947 there had been thirty stores. There is a fear among dealers that the book center may become just a footnote in the City's history.

Some dealers think that the grip of the electronic media on young people has hurt the book business and may eventually do it in. "Young people have been so conditioned by the lighted box that their attention span is oriented to it. They are not very friendly to the book. While the printed book has lasted 500 years, there's no guarantee it will last another 500. It will last the century. Someday you'll have a telephone with a screen and you'll be able to dial a book. They'll put you in instant contact with thousands and thousands of books."
[Technology]
Philips, pp. 78-84.

On occasion they gathered their first editions of poetry and novels and sold them to rare-book dealers. They were always getting writers to sign their books. At poetry readings at the 92 Street Y, they usually managed to hang out backstage grabbing the 'graphs, man. A signed first edition, ahhh that was a pleasure.
Sanders, Beatnik, p. 5.

Ted Berrigan stole books by famous authors and forged their autographs. He then sold them back to the dealers he stole them from at greatly increased prices. [Crime]
Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag.

An intense intellectual from the Upper West Side, earnestly reading the New York Review of Books on the train, just to make sure I knew what everyone was talking about that week. [Media]
Hamilton, p. 6.

You examine the wares in the window of the Gotham Book Mart, and take note of the sign: WISE MEN FISH HERE.

McInerney, p. 68.

Gould called this book “An Oral History," sometimes adding “of Our Time.” As he described it, the Oral History consisted of talk he had heard and had considered meaningful and had taken down, either verbatim or summarized—everything from a remark overheard in the street to the conversations of a roomful of people lasting for hours—and of essays commenting on this talk. Some talk has an obvious meaning and nothing more, he said, and some, often unbeknownst to the talker, has at least one other meaning and sometimes several other meanings lurking around inside its obvious meaning. He professed to believe that such talk might have great hidden historical significance... He told people he met in Village joints that the Oral History was already millions upon millions of words long and beyond any doubt the lengthiest unpublished literary work in existence but that it was nowhere near finished... “As soon after my demise as is convenient for all concerned,” he specified in the will, “my manuscript books shall be collected from the various and sundry places in which they are stored and put on the scales and weighted, and two-thirds of the by weight shall be given to the Harvard Library and the other third shall be given to the library of the Smithsonian Institution.” ... One evening in June, 1942, for example, he told an acquaintance that at the moment the Oral History was “approximately nine million two hundred and fifty-five thousand words long, or,” he added, throwing his head back proudly, “about a dozen times as long as the Bible.” (cf. Columbia University’s “The Oral History Research Office” [Media])

Mitchell, Hotel, pp. 624-5.

Henry Miller declared it the most horrible place on earth.
Morris, Manhattan ‘45, p. 23.

Martha Graham developed her savage choreography by walking up and down back and forth in the Central Park Zoo before the lion’s cage, studying his potential for violence. [Nature]
Douglas, Honesty, p. 51.

Crane confessed to having to stitch together for ‘The Tunnel’ the hundreds of notes he’d written while swinging on the subway straps as he passed under the East River, the wheels screeching against the rails, the agate lights blinking in the midnight tunnel, the car deserted, as he rode back to his apartment after a night in Manhattan.
Mariani, p. 233.

Hart Crane was financed by banker Otto Kahn.
Trager, p. 450.

Driving down a Los Angeles boulevard, a billboard was legible from a half-mile away. It said one or two words. In Los Angeles, people are used to reading single words, very large at far distances, and passing by them very quickly. It’s totally the opposite in New York where we get our information by reading a newspaper over somebody’s shoulder in the subway. [Voyeur]
Goldsmith, Theory, N. pag.

During his first trip to New York City in 1964, Samuel Beckett went to a doubleheader at Shea Stadium with his friend Dick Seaver, who explained the game of baseball to the Irish writer. Halfway through the second game, Seaver asked, “Would you like to go now?” To which Beckett replied, “Is the game over, then?” “Not yet,” said Seaver. Beckett concluded, “We don’t want to go then before it’s finished.” The Mets won both games, unlike their double loss two months earlier in what had been the longest doubleheader in Major League history, clocking in at nine hours and fifty-two minutes.
Music

The afternoon following Pearl Harbor, the Metropolitan Opera announced that it would not perform Madame Butterfly until Japan was defeated.
Diehl, p. 67.

The antique shops of Madison Avenue are selling even to this day those Jennie Lind rum-bottles out of which our rustic chivalry used to drink to her health.
Irwin, p. 9.

Tin Pan Alley: “In Twenty-seventh or Twenty-eighth Street, or anywhere along Broadway from Madison to Greeley Squares, are the parlors of a score of publishers, gentlemen who coordinate this divided world for song publishing purposes. There is an office and a reception room; a music-chamber, where songs are tried, and a stock room. Perhaps, in the case of the larger publishers, the music-rooms are two or three, but the air of each is much the same. Rugs, divans, imitation palms make this publishing house more bower than office. Three or four pianos give to each chamber a parlor-like appearance. The walls are hung with the photos of celebrities, neatly framed, celebrities of the kind described. In the private music-rooms, rocking-chairs. A boy or two waits to bring professional copies at a word. A salaried pianist or two wait to run over pieces which the singer may desire to hear. Arrangers wait to make orchestrations or take down newly schemed out melodies which the popular composer himself cannot play. He has evolved the melody by a process of whistling and must have its fleeting beauty registered before it escapes him forever. Hence the salaried arranger.

Into these parlors then, come the mixed company of this distinctive world: authors who have or have not succeeded, variety artists who have some word from touring fellows or know the firm, masters of small bands throughout the city or the country, of which the name is legion, orchestra-leaders of Bowery theaters and uptown variety halls, and singers.
Dreiser, p. 245.

The name is attributed to a newspaper writer named Monroe Rosenfeld who while staying in New York, coined the term to symbolize the cacophony of the many pianos being pounded in publisher’s demo rooms which he characterized as sounding as though hundreds of people were pounding on tin pans.
Reublin, N. pag.

The persistent image of the “Gay Nineties” as one of the happiest and least troubled times in American history has been derived largely from these songs... Regardless of the happy times the music connotes, we cannot forget that Tin Pan Alley was not about love peace and happiness, it was about selling songs... There were no altruistic desires on the part of the publishers to solve the problems of society nor were they attempting to create a happy world. They were simply about trying to create and sell music that people bought.
“Tin Pan Alley,” n. pag.

Ibid.

Ibid.

The popular conception of Tin Pan Alley, a conception aided by Hollywood and its talent for hyperbole, is still that of an uninhibited madhouse, with composers and their lyricists in the role of zanies who nail the reluctant publisher to a chair while he listens to the year’s (unpublished) smash hit. A sober tour of the district, however, is enough to convince anyone that the glamor-and-screwball atmosphere has long been concealed behind polite but firm secretaries; executives who, aside from their Broadway tastes in haberdashery, might as well be in the cream separator business; mahogany desks and, more often than not, photo-murals in place of the old-time collection of autographed pictures of stars who plugged the firm's songs. Here and there, of course, an office typical of the Alley in its halcyon youth can still be found. Here the telephone girl reads Variety as she hums one of the firm's numbers; zanies scramble hither and thither; and from innumerous cubbyholes fitted out with antiquated uprights come (with or without words) the unpublished and, alas, often never-to-be-published smash hits of the season.

Statistically, the shorter-lived hits of today are written by fewer songwriters as the new century's downbeat sounds its accent. A closer concentration of the music business, the decline of the sheet music and phonograph record industry, and the rise of radio and moving pictures—these factors augured ill for the many. The lucky few among the nation's songwriters were rewarded with air-conditioned bungalows in the glamour City of Celluloid. The less lucky stay-at-homes obligingly ground out "You Ought to Be in Pictures" and continued to take schnapps with their schmaltz (cheaply sentimental sweet music) in the depths of the Fifty-Second Street underground.

Federal Writers, p. 244.

'I never read Shakespeare in the original.' —Irving Berlin.
Douglas, Honesty, p. 430.

Vaudeville puts together what does not fit... The charm of vaudeville lies in its health and naturalness, the result of being determined by that healthy autocrat, the common man. Only the "real thing" is represented, and consequently the average man and the philosopher find in the vaudeville stage their common account... Everything is calculated to cradle the mind to please by an appeal to what is always present in human nature. All the senses are taken care of. Tobacco throws a thin blue veil about the hall, which lends an easy grace to the movements on the stage... The attractive side of vaudeville is well brought out by a comparison with the artificial farce of the day—the senseless mechanical performance which has a strong hold on some legitimate theaters on Broadway... In this farcical swirl of artificial complications all the easy genuine humorous quality of less compactly constructed vaudeville is lost. Pleasant unction droll characterization, sentimental appeal, is shut out of the swiftly moving farce. Farce is artistic for its own sake. Vaudeville, nothing as form, presents the real stuff of life.

Maciunas described Fluxus as striving "for the monostructural and nontheatrical qualities of a simple natural event, a game or a gag. It is the fusion of Spike Jones, Vaudeville, gag, children’s games and Duchamp." [Downtown]
Huxley, p. 330.

The Old Met: the Yellow Brick Brewery on Broadway.
McCourt, p. 111.

Modernist refugee composer Paul Dessau worked on a New Jersey chicken farm upon arriving in the US.
the jerky automata of jazz
Jackson & Dunbar, p. 567.

What better acoustic chamber could jazz musicians have had than a city built of solid stone and on solid stone? (Chicago rests on mud, not stone.) [Nature]

If the blues were the roots of American’s modern sensibility, jazz was its oxygen; if blues were buried treasure under the ocean’s floor, jazz was the deep-sea diver bursting back up into the air. The generation that invented jazz was the first “to get our feet off of the ground!,” as the expatriate poet Harry Crosby put it, the first to defy gravity and colonize space. It coined the word “airmindedness” and advertised its day as “the Aerial Age.” Radio shows were “on the air,” planes toured the heavens, and buildings competed with clouds.
Everywhere people were netting the sky and finding in the air what seemed an androgynous free-for-all of spiritual energy. [Skyscraper] [Air] [Radio] [Technology] [Cosmic]
Ibid., p. 434.

“I spent the rest of the war on 52nd Street and a few other streets.
I had the white gowns and the white shoes. And every night they’d bring me the white gardenias and the white junk.” [Fashion] [Drugs]
Holiday, p. xiv.

Holiday’s overview of the working conditions for musicians in New York: “You can be up to your boobies in white satin, with gardenias in your hair and no sugar cane for miles, but you can still be working on a plantation.”
Ibid., p. xiv.

But another time, on 52nd Street, I finished a set with “Strange Fruit” and headed, as usual, for the bathroom. I always do. When I sing it, it affects me so much I get sick. It takes all the strength out of me.
Ibid., p. xiv.

Take 52nd Street in the late thirties and early forties. It was supposed to be a big deal. “Swing Street,” they called it. Joint after joint was jumping. It was this “new” kind of music. They could get away with calling it new because millions of squares hadn’t taken a trip to 131st Street. If they had they could have dug swing for twenty years.

By the time the ofays got around to copying “swing” a new-style music was already breaking out all over uptown. Ten years later that became the newest thing when the white boys downtown figured out how to cop it.

Anyway, white musicians were ‘swinging’ from one end of 52nd Street to the other, but there wasn’t a black face in sight on the street except Teddy Wilson and me.

But 52nd Street couldn’t hold the line against Negroes forever.
Something had to give. And eventually it was the plantation owners.
They found they could make money off Negro artists and they couldn’t afford their old prejudices. So the barriers went down, and it gave jobs to a lot of great musicians.
Ibid., p. 110.

As I write I still have no New York police card, and this keeps me from singing in clubs in New York.

Ibid., p. 194.

"... and Leroy comes in and tells me Miles Davis was clubbed 12 times last night outside BIRDLAND by a cop"

O'Hara, p. 335.

On the evening of September 7, 1964, Frank O'Hara held a small party to watch the arrival of the Beatles at Kennedy Airport where they were met by a screaming crowd of ten thousand. [Media]

Gooch, p. 420.

The thing that gave me hope for the future of poetry was this Rolling Stones concert at Madison Square Garden that I saw in 1974. Jagger was real tired and fucked-up. It was a Tuesday, he had done two concerts and was really on the brink of collapse—but the kind of collapse that transcends into magic.

Jagger was so tired that he needed the energy of the audience. He was not a rock & roller that Tuesday night. He was closer to a poet than he ever has been, because he was so tired, he could hardly sing. I love the music of the Rolling Stones, but what was foremost was not the music but the performance, the naked performance. It was his naked performance, his rhythm, his movement, his talk—he was so tired, he was saying things like, "Very warm here / warm warm warm / it's very hot here / hot, hot / New York, New York, New York / bang, bang, bang.'

McNeil, p. 159.

Downtown

It started with JOHN GIORNO and BURROUGHS at the Nova Convention in December 1978. It’s reading CAGE and starting my first recording with four cassettes at SVA in February. It’s the poetries of video-tape and BARBARA BUCKNER. It’s BURROUGHS and GINSBERG and GIORNO upstairs at the MUDD CLUB. It’s living with DREW B. STRAUB, who was reading BURROUGHS thoroughly. It’s VIDEO CLONES with MOLISSA FENLEY. It’s ART SIN BOY and CLUB 57 POETRY READINGS EVERY WEDNESDAY NIGHT THIS SUMMER. It’s reading SAINT GENET by SARTRE on the subway going to work in QUEENS. It’s books from SVA library all summer and tape recorders from SVA for most of the summer. It’s BOOKS THAT YOU JUST FIND IN A LIBRARY... BOOKS THAT FIND YOU. It’s PATTI SMITH ON THE BIG EGO ALBUM with GIORNO, MEREDITH MONK, GLASS, etc. It’s reading RIMBAUD, KEATS, JEAN COCTEAU, JOHN CAGE, HEGEL, JEAN GENET, TALKING POETICS FROM NAROPA INSTITUTE. It’s meeting another like you and sharing everything including your body but mostly your ideas. It’s POETIC UNDERSTANDING AND JUSTIFIABLE HATE. It’s July 4 on the top of the Empire State Building after reading an ART SIN BOY mimeograph at Club 57 watching fireworks and thinking about the smile exchanged on the street and nothing but a second glance and lots of dreaming. Its KLAUS NOMIS at Xenon. READING GINSBERG’S JOURNALS, READING SEMIOTEXT, READING GERTRUDE STEIN, READING “HOWL” FOR THE FIRST TIME. It’s NOW—NOW—NOW and paintings I did in the fall of 1978. It’s Chinese pattern paintings in KERMIT’S HOUSE. BARBARA SCHWARTZ ON 22ND STREET AND DREW AT JOHN WEBER GALLERY BUILDING A ROBERT SMITHSON. DREW’S RAIN DANCE IN LITTLE ITALY. It’s listening to JOHN GIORNO read GRASPING AT EMPTINESS for the 27th time. It’s letting records skip for ten minutes and thinking it’s beautiful. IT’S HAVING DINNER ON AVENUE C WITH DINA, DOZO, AND FUGACHAN (A MAN). It’s thinking about SEX as ART and ART as SEX. It’s continued situations and controlled environments, B-52s, BATHS, AND SEX WITH FRIENDS. IT’S PAPA AND JOHN MCLAUGHLIN AND OUTER SPACE AND JET SET AND DELTAS AND THE ASTRO TWIST AND KENNY SCHARF AND LARRY LEVAN. It’s being heckled reading what may be my favorite mimeograph piece with two tape recorders and being called a FAGGOT. IT’S LISTENING TO OTHER POETS AT CLUB 57. TALKING TO POETS. BEING A POET AT CLUB 57. It’s painting on ST. MARKS outside of STROMBOLI PIZZA. It’s having one night at Club 57 when everyone in the open reading was in top form and everyone knows it and everyone is smiling. It’s HAL SIROWITZ READING. IT’S BEING QUOTED IN HIS POEM AS SAYING, “I CONSIDER MYSELF MORE OF AN ARTIST THAN A POET,’ SAID KEITH.” IT’S MAKING XEROXES and mimeographs. IT’S MEETING CHARLES STANLEY AND BEING APPREHENSIVE. IT’S TAPING UP XEROXES WALKING HOME DRUNK. It’s looking in the window at BUDDHA. It’s seeing a TRUCK THAT SAYS “BETTER METHODS.” IT’S BUYING JEROME ROTHENBERG’S BOOK TECHNICIANS OF THE SACRED that BARBARA BUCKNER had lent to me in spring and now TIM MILLER has it out of the library and now I’m reading references to it in a new book I bought. IT’S ALL THOSE THINGS THAT FIT TOGETHER SO PERFECTLY THAT IT APPEARS PREDETERMINED. IT’S DREAMS OF FALLING INTO WARM WATER HOLE WITH EXOTIC FISH CREATURE AND ENOUGH LIGHT TO SEE EVERYTHING. It’s finding HANDBILLS ABOUT SIN that are poems in themselves. It’s painting on walls in the suburbs. It’s the bridge in LONG ISLAND WITH 1958 AND 1980 on parallel poles. IT’S FINDING OUT THE SPACE AGE BEGAN IN 1958. It’s STEVE PAXTON dancing in the sculpture garden at MOMA. It’s CARL ANDRE POEMS IN THE MOMA SUMMER SCULPTURE SHOW. It’s JONES BEACH ON SUNDAYS. It’s MATISSE. IT’S MATISSE. It’s painting on walls in the suburbs. It’s the bridge in LONG ISLAND WITH 1958 AND 1980 on parallel poles. IT’S FINDING OUT THE SPACE AGE BEGAN IN 1958. It’s STEVE PAXTON dancing in the sculpture garden at MOMA. It’s CARL ANDRE POEMS IN THE MOMA SUMMER SCULPTURE SHOW. It’s JONES BEACH ON SUNDAYS. It’s MATISSE. IT’S MATISSE. It’s listening to old cassettes I made in winter and under standing them for the first time. A NOTION OF PROPHECY. IT’S DOUGLAS DAVIS’S ARTICLE IN THE VILLAGE VOICE about postmodern art. “POST-ART.” It’s pornographic pictures and black feathers. It’s GERMANY. It’s JAPAN. It’s hearing DOW JONES AND THE INDUSTRIALS. It’s loose joints and conversations. IT’S THE SAME THING, THE SAME THING. It’s understanding painting. IT’S SOMEONE YELLING “LICK FAT BOYS.” IT’S CONVERSATIONS ABOUT ALL ART BEING PRETENTIOUS. It’s not going to look at ART in the galleries all summer. It’s seeing drawings by KEVIN CRANDFORD AND DREW B. STRAUB and thinking about the relationship. IT’S THINKING ABOUT THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN SEEMINGLY UNRELATED OBJECTS AND EVENTS. It’s an art “context.” It’s thinking about poetry on as many different levels as I can. It’s thinking about myself. It’s companions and ratios and mathematical principles. IT’S THE POETRY OF NUMBERS. Language, culture, time, spirit, universe. IT’S THE PAST PRESENT FUTURE ALL TIME NO TIME SAME THING. It’s systems within systems that evolve systems. ORDER-FORM-STRUCTURE-MATTER. It’s seeing TRISHA BROWN DANCE. IT’S ITALIAN FILMS FROM 1967. IT’S LAURIE ANDERSON AT MUDD CLUB. It’s NEW MUSIC, NEW YORK at the KITCHEN for a week. IT’S CHARLIE MORROW’S PIECE FOR 60 CLARINET AT BATTERY PARK IN CELEBRATION OF THE FIRST DAY OF SUMMER AT SUNSET. It’s the BRONX ZOO. Reading RIMBAUD’S LETTERS. Reading RIMBAUD’S ILLUMINATIONS ON THE SUBWAY AND IN A CAFE EATIN’ CREMOLOTA AND DRINKING PER RIER. IT’S FELLINI FILMS WITH TSENG KWONG CHI. It’s finding things on the street. IT’S CONVERSATION WITH LYNN UMLAUF ABOUT THE NOW NOW NOW TAPES A.J. WEBER GALLERY SHOW. IT’S XEROXES PUT UP IN the West Village for Gay Pride week end and hearing people that had seen them months later. IT’S THE NINTH CIRCLE AFTER THE GAY PRIDE MARCH TALKING ABOUT APATHY AND MILITANCY. It’s wearing and distributing red-and-white stripes for one evening. IT’S READING AT CLUB 57 WHILE THIS WOMAN who I later found out was GLORIE TROPP is saying things like AHHH and DO IT and YEAH while I’m reading and it feels good. IT’S XEROXES at GRAND CENTRAL STATION IN A HURRY. It’s the poetics of chance. IT’S GOING TO THE POETRY SECTION INSTEAD OF THE ART SECTION WHEN YOU GO INTO A BOOKSTORE. It’s a panel about performance art with MEREDITH MONK, LAURIE ANDERSON, JULIE HEYWARD, CONNIE BECKLEY, AND ROSELEE GOLDBERG. IT’S GRAFFITI IN THE SUBWAY. It’s riding the BUS FROM KUTZTOWN TO N.Y.C. WITH CONNIE BECKLEY. It’s BRIAN WARREN’S NEW PIECES. It’s reading BRIAN’S journal and feeling close to it. IT’S A SHORT POEM CALLED “ART BOY.” It’s feeling real good about being an artist. It’s depression that can kill. It’s telling other people that depression can be productive and talking to yourself. IT’S KOZO’S BIRTHDAY PARTY AND SPANISH AND JAPANESE AND HEBREW. It’s “Running on Empty.” It’s delivering tropical plants in Manhattan. IT’S MANHATTAN IN THE SUMMER. It’s reading NAKED LUNCH. IT’S DISEASE XEROXES. It’s JOSEPH KOSUTH AT CASTELLI ON CONCEPT AND CONTEXT. IT’S JOAN JONAS’S “JUNIPER TREE.” It’s CONNIE BECKLEY’S INSTALLATION in the VIDEO ROOM AT MOMA. IT’S KERMIT’S NEW DRAWINGS. It’s playing CROQUET in Kutztown. It’s talking about epileptic fits in an art context. It’s suicide. It’s ART AS SIN AS IF NO ART AS ART. It’s MOHOLY–NAGY. It’s JEAN COCTEAU WRITING ON “THE ORIGINAL SIN OF ART.” IT’S ANONYMOUS SEX. It’s RE-READING DREW STRAUB’S “UNI-VERSE” WHILE LISTENING TO THE “UNI-VERSE” cut-up tapes we did in February or March IN AUGUST. IT’S READING BURROUGHS’S TALK ABOUT WORK WITH CUT-UPS ON TAPE IN AUGUST MONTHS AFTER WE HAD READ THE THIRD MIND AND DID THE SAME THING. It’s the most logical step. LOGICAL DOESN’T MEAN RATIONAL. It’s science-fiction films. It’s reading SARTRE’S SAINT GENET ALL SUMMER with much else in between. It’s 40 postcards sent to KERMIT OSWALD 172 W. MAIN ST. KUTZTOWN PA. 19530. It’s not painting all summer except maybe once or twice. IT’S UNDERSTANDING WHY I SHOULDN’T TRY TO UNDERSTAND. It’s “NEGATIVE CAPABILITY”–AS SAID KEATS. DIANE DI PRIMA ON “LIGHT AND KEATS.” It’s wanting to know more. It’s an accumulation of information. IT’S AN IDEA FOR TOTAL THEATRE. It’s a new understanding. IT’S A BEGINNING A SEED A GARDEN IT’S THE BIG CHUNK CALLED POETRY.

Haring, pp. 62-6.

New York art styles of the eighties: Julian Schnabel, whose surfaces were covered with broken plates and fragmented images, David Salle, whose works emphasized collages of images related to film editing, Eric Fischl with his film-like realism, Jean-Michel Basquiat and his tribal expressionism, Robert Longo with his Men in the Cities, the so-called “graffiti artists,” such as Keith Haring with his electric radiating line, or Rammelzee of “iconoclastic futurism.”

Frisa, p. 383.

Who shall paint New York? Who?

Sharpe, p. 200.

The first graffiti writer: In 1971, a young Greek-American began writing his nickname, Taki, followed by 183, for the street he lived on in upper Manhattan, on subway cars and station walls all over the city.

Freeman, p. 275.

LOOKING AT JEAN (SAMO)’S WINDOW AT PATRICIA FIELD’S.

PAINTED BOXES
PAINTED CLOTHES
LOOKING AT PAINTINGS HANGING ON A RACK

I like looking at paintings in a clothing store. SAMO in Patricia Field’s. [Fashion] Haring, p. 87.

In a 1974 essay Mailer cheers the existential pluck of the graffiti daubers in the subway. Defacement is their faith, and Mailer finds in their slapdash virtuosity the same idolatry of gesture that excited the critics of Abstract Expressionism. The angry adolescents with their spray cans are mute, inglorious Pollocks, whose dribsbles, flicks, and whorls of paint scribble psychic signatures. They willfully affront the blank theater of the canvas or the impersonal metal of the city’s surface. They’re prepared to risk their lives to make art. They climb along a cliff above the Harlem River to get to the A train yard at 207th Street, paint through the winter with frostbitten fingers, and triumphantly decorate inaccessible areas of wall on the wrong side of the electrified rail. Conrad, p. 308.

When the wild-style cars came roaring into a station, they were as exciting and shimmering as Frank Stella birds. Gopnik, p. 192.

A city undefiled by scabby walls! Fillia, p. 48.

New York is becoming the New El Dorado, but instead of streets paved in gold, the streets are paved in art. On black paper on subway platforms people look for new Keith Harings to tear off and take home. Mueller, p. 247.

80 percent of all East Village art looked the same; 70 percent of it was inspired by money; 60 percent of it was rendered by impostors; and 50 percent of it was expendable. Ibid., p. 257.

Yes, our host, Jean-Michel Basquait, the bright graffiti artist turned suddenly wildly successful genius painter, was in a ho-hum kinda mood. Watching him, I filled in the blanks myself. Maybe he was, for the first time, thinking what a sham this success nonsense was. Maybe he was asking himself if this was all there was. Where was the joy that’s supposed to come with fame and money? Wasn’t life supposed to be fun and glamorous and fulfilling after one was successful and rich and had a beautiful home, famous friends, lovers, esteem, respect? When was the real deal going to start? When came the Fun at the Top stuff? When was the panorama up there going to look better than any other vista? When was it going to mean something?

It was later in the evening, around 3 A.M., after people had eaten and drunk and were whipped up and sweating in samba frenzies, when I looked up from my dancing partner’s face and saw Jean quietly slipping out the door. No one noticed that the host himself was leaving. No one noticed because the party was that good, it was ripping, one of the year's best. No one noticed and half the crowd, the hollow party people, the ones that appear uninvited at every party not even knowing who the host might be, didn't care an iota.

The host had had enough of his own party. Let them eat cake, the guests, let them laugh and dance and slop drinks all over the floor, whatever. The host was going out into the night. A guest of wind bearing a few gold and red leaves and a stray piece of newspaper blew in after him and that was all.

Young, gifted, and black, it was clearly destined for the history books. Already his paintings were selling furiously, even still wet and oily. Fresh from his studio he was making hotcakes. His name was on all the buyers, gallerists, and arts students' lips. Already he was considered an old master, soaring to the ranks of a Constable. He was dancing in the dizzying heights of fast becoming a great 20th-century artist. It was a school of basement imitators, but no one could top the master, no one could paint this prolifically or beautifully with such incredibly shocking ease. He even outdistanced himself by being so prolific. He turned out a few canvases a day sometimes.

He was becoming internationally famous, he was having shows all over the world. A photograph of him sitting in a chair with his sweet eyes and luscious café au lait coloring graced the cover of the New York Times Magazine, and he was doing collaborative work, sharing canvases with Andy Warhol. Warhol had become a close friend. They phoned each other every day. [Parties] [Ambition] [Fame] [Fashion] [Media]

When asked how Warhol has influenced him, Basquiat says, "'I wear clean pants all the time now.'"

McGuigan, N. pag.

Five years ago, he didn't have a place to live. He slept on the couch of one friend after another. He lacked money to buy art supplies. Now, at 24, he is making paintings that sell for $10,000 to $25,000. They are reproduced in art magazines and also as part of fashion layouts, or in photographs of chic private homes in House & Garden. They are in the collections of the publisher S. I. Newhouse, Richard Gere, Paul Simon and the Whitney Museum of American Art. [Celebrity]

Ibid.

Eugene Schwartz, for example, who, along with his wife, Barbara, amassed an important collection including Frank Stella, Morris Louis and David Smith, stopped collecting altogether in 1969. One day in 1980, he saw a painting by the artist Julian Schnabel in a dealer's gallery. "It brought us from the 60's to the 80's in about 14 seconds,'" he said.

Ibid.

One dealer, visiting his loft and noting his fondness for health food, went away and came back with a big jar of fruits and nuts. "'But what she really wanted were my paintings,'" he says. "'She tried to tell me that her chauffeur, who was black, worked with her in her gallery, not that he was her driver.'" As she walked out of his door in defeat, Basquiat leaned out his window and dumped the contents of the jar on her head.

Ibid.
"The black person is the protagonist in most of my paintings," he says. "I realized that I didn’t see many paintings with black people in them."

Ibid.

Once when he was trying to sell his photocopied postcards on a SoHo streetcorner, he followed Andy Warhol and Henry Geldzahler into a restaurant. Warhol bought one of the cards for $1. Later, when Basquiat had graduated to painting sweatshirts, he went to Warhol’s Factory one day. "I just wanted to meet him, he was an art hero of mine," he recalls. Warhol looked at his sweatshirts and gave him some money to buy more.

Ibid.

"He’ll run in here in an $800 suit and paint all night," says his friend Shenge. "In the morning, he’ll be standing in front of a picture with his suit just covered in paint." [Fashion] [Luxury]

Ibid.

Paige stayed overnight with Jean Michel in his dirty smelly loft downtown. How I know it smells is because Chris was there and said (laughs) it was like a nigger’s loft, that there were crumpled-up hundred-dollar bills in the corner and bad b.o. all over and you step on paintings. [Smell] [Body in the City]

Warhol, Diaries, p. 519.

Miguel Algarín: "The poet sees his function as troubadour. He tells the tale of the streets... The voice of the street poet must amplify itself... A poem described the neighborhood of the writer for the reader. ... The Nuyorican poets have worked to establish the commonplace because they have wanted to locate their position on earth, the ground, the neighborhood, the environment."

Abu-Lughod, p. 144.

I’M FUCKIN ALIVE is the name of Revs’s book, which consists of a series of autobiographical pages written on the walls of subway tunnels, and it was down here that I first encountered them. On large, light-colored panels, he would write dated entries on subjects ranging from childhood episodes to personal commentaries. Initially, he planned to write a page in every subway tunnel in the city; 235 were finished before he was arrested in 2000.

Solis, p. 88.

In the 1970s a New York artist persuaded two street gangs to hold a rumble inside the Museum of Modern Art. Without warning, the gangs turned on the audience and beat and robbed them.

Fritscher, p. 287.

A group of women artists staged a feminist protest at the Whitney, leaving used tampons and smashed eggs in the stairwells.

Tucker, p. 93.

We’d just come out, shoot up, lift weights, put flashlights in their eyes, whip giant bullwhips across their faces, sort of simulate fucking each other onstage, have Andy’s films blaring in the background, and the Velvets would have their backs to the audience.

McNeil, p. 16
c - Text

Reading the City

Reading the city as one would a text—from a distance.
Tester, p. 31.

The city is a sentence, harsh, staccato, in an alien tongue.
Frank, p. 133

The city is a language, its people entries in a vocabulary.
Conrad, p. 123.

The city rises in high hard words. Each building is a word.
Ibid., p. 123.

The difficulty of reading a city that has made itself abstractly illegible. New York's readability has always been in doubt. It is too vast, too diverse for easy comprehension.
Ibid., p. 122.

"New York, New York" designates the city of New York in the state of New York but has other meanings for those interested in the city as text. "New York, New York" suggests the repetitiveness of New York, its doubleness and its excessive, hyperbolic character. It is such an extraordinary city—from the top of the World Trade Center Michel de Certeau called it "the most immoderate of human texts"—that saying its name just once, simply would not do. "New York" is almost the only proper adjective for New York. [Simulacrum]

Tallack, N. pag.

The most salient characteristic of the city in modern literature is precisely its illegibility.
Brooks, p. 2.

The act of walking is to the city what the speech act is to language.
Ibid., p. 2.

Walking is a speech act.
Jacks, p. 44.

They walk—an elementary form of this experience of the city; they are walkers, Wandersmänner, whose bodies follow the thicks and thins of an urban "text" they write without being able to read it. These practitioners make use of spaces that cannot be seen; their knowledge of them is as blind as that of lovers in each other's arms. The paths that correspond in this intertwining, unrecognized poems in which each body is an element signed by many others, elude legibility. It is as though the practices organizing a bustling city were characterized by their blindness. The networks of these moving, intersecting writings compose a manifold story that has neither author nor spectator, shaped out of fragments of trajectories and alterations of spaces: in relation to representations, it remains daily and indefinitely other.

de Certeau, pp. 91-4.
The long poems of walking manipulates spatial organization, no matter how panoptic they may be: it is neither foreign to them (it can take place only within them) nor in conformity with them (it does not receive its identity from them.) It creates shadows and ambiguities within them.

Blomley, p. 26

Interpreting the city as a politically charged work of art or a species of ideologically laden poetry written in glass, steel, and concrete on texts twenty blocks wide and fifty stories high.

Bennett, Deconstructing, p. 18.

Urban stories, it is clear, can be told only by those immune to the stress and the seductions of the city, who can turn those seductions to good account, that is, into a text that will exercise its own seductions.

Tester, p. 28

A kind of reading of the street, in which faces, shop fronts, shop windows, café terraces, street cars, automobiles and trees become a wealth of equally valid letters of the alphabet and together result in words, sentences and pages of an ever-new book.

Ibid., p. 81

To what erotics of knowledge does the ecstasy of reading such a cosmos belong? Having taken a voluptuous pleasure in it, I wonder what is the source of this pleasure of “seeing the whole,” of looming down on, totalizing the most immoderate of human texts.

Szeman, p. 264.

The 1370 foot high tower that serves as a prow for Manhattan continues to construct the fiction that creates readers, makes the complexity of the city readable, and immobilizes its opaque mobility in a transparent text.

de Certeau, pp. 91-4.

In 1928 a visitor said of Times Square: “Here the eye does not read any writing, it cannot pick out any shapes, it is simply dazzled by a profusion of scintillating lights, by a plethora of elements of light that cancel out each other’s effect.” Visual incapacitation.

Sharpe, p. 211

Trivial as commercial lighting instantly became, the messages were so crude and powerful that legibility was unavoidable, even if, as Loti noted, their legibility was tied to their evanescence: “Everywhere multicolored lights change and sparkle, forming letters, and then dissolving them again. They fall in cascades from top to bottom of the houses, or in the distance seem to stretch in banners across the street.”

Ibid., p. 211

In Forty-second Street there are no more windows in the buildings—nothing but letters. It is a kindled alphabet, a conspiracy of commerce against night; in the sky, an advertising airplane.

Morand, p 192.
G. K. Chesterton visited New York in 1922, observing, “What a glorious garden of wonders this would be, to any one who was lucky enough to be unable to read.”

Sharpe, p. 211

“Let us suppose that there does walk down this flaming avenue a peasant, who is as innocent as Adam before the Fall. He would see sights almost as fine as the flaming sword or the purple and peacock plumage of the seraphim; so long as he did not go near the Tree of Knowledge.” For Chesterton, reading was a fall from Edenic grace into a sorry understanding. The signs of the great republic do not, alas, say “Liberty, Equality, Fraternity” but rather “Tang Tonic To-day; Tang Tonic Tomorrow; Tang Tonic All the Time.”

Ibid., p. 211

Intensifying the color, lights, and excitement of Broadway by translating the commercial message into form and color, a wordless interpretation of New York.

Ibid., pp. 210-1

But even if the signs cancel each other out, this apparent Babel is not meaningless.

Ibid., p. 211

As we read the text of the city–so extravagant in its tropes, so intense and varied in its rhythms, so bold in its presence, so encompassing in its reach, so firm in its grasp–it also reads us, or rather shows us how to reach ourselves.

Connell, p. xiv

And everywhere I looked, there were signs, the names of firms occupying the buildings on which the signs hung. Most were black letters on white, or gold letters on black, and they hung out over the sidewalks or were wired to building ledges just below rows of windows, slanting slightly downward so they could be read from the street.

Finney, pp. 228-9.

The city was and remains object, but not in the way of particular, pliable and instrumental object: such as a pencil or a sheet of paper.

Lefebvre, Cities, p. 102.

When we walk the city we are quoting the walkers who have come before us, and performing communal turns on each quotation.

Jacks, p. 44.

No women were involved in designing NYC’s skyscrapers of the 1920s; if the decade was engaged in “reading the phallus,” Manhattan might supply the text. Storming the sky, the skyscrapers substantiated Freud’s worst fears about a fatherless world, a paradoxical homage to a feminine principle that “blurred the issue of paternity.”

[Psychoanalysis]

Douglas, Honesty, p. 442.

